participation in drills or military ceremonies of any kind under the ROTC. In a corollary measure Maverick proposes to make seven books required reading in the ROTC. The books are Zweig's "The Case of Sergeant Grischa," Dos Passos's "Three Soldiers," Crane's "The Red Badge of Courage," Millis's "The Road to War" and "The Martial Spirit," Remarque's "All Quiet on the Western Front," and Stallings's "The First World War."

BRIEFER MENTION. Camel's nose out: George Creel has announced severance of his official relation with the WPA as chairman of its "advisory" committee, a non-salaried post held since last August, the purpose of which was to help the WPA sell itself to the public in an election year without changing its brand. . . . Camel's nose in: Donald Richberg, publicly denounced by John Lewis et al. during the NRA for his anti-labor shenanigans, is worming his way back into the councils of his old clients, the railroad brotherhoods, with the help of a small clique of their leaders, who like the Bourbons never learn. He has been given a trial assignment, drafting an extension of the railway act's Section 7-b further to guard against road consolidations at the expense of labor. . . . Unforeseen result of Guffey Coal Act: the consumer for the first time is to have a voice in fixing rail freight rates. The Guffey board and its consumers' counsel, Thomas M. Woodward (too honest to keep his Shipping Board job), have intervened in pending ICC hearings on the continuance of emergency freight surcharges on soft coal, which is partly responsible for the fact that miners get less than carriers do out of the consumers' coal dollar. Heretofore these rate hearings have been merely private litigation between roads and producers, with the interlocking financial interests of litigants blocking the real fight to lower rates and leaving the battle merely one over regional differentials. Woodward calls the resulting rates an "economic absurdity." . . . In eight weeks of desultory work Congress has handled only three major pieces of legislation, passing two—the bonus and the farm bill—and dodging the third, permanent neutrality legislation. In the remaining weeks of the session it faces only four other measures of comparable importance—relief, taxes, housing, and ship subsidies. The stage is set for sloppy, anti-social handling of all four in the rush to go home and rebuild political fences. . . . The last chance of the Supreme Court's prodding Congress to constructive legislative action passes with the TVA decision, and Justice McReynolds, already recognized as the most repugnant personality on the bench, emerges as the most admirable, too. . . . The Brain Trust triumphs at last: the Appellate Court's decision in the Buzzards Roost-PWA power-loan case was a victory for Jerome Frank, "purged" from the AAA last year, over Newton D. Baker, batting for the widows and orphans who own the power trust.

Maverick of Texas

Not Now, Maybe Later

CHAOS AND COWARDICE IN WASHINGTON

BY MAURY MAVERICK

NOT now. Maybe later. That seems to be the general idea around Washington. People should be told the truth about the constitutional issue. We ought to stay out of war. Something should be done about relief. Civil liberties must be defended. But not now. This is an election year. After the election, maybe. But not now.

Washington has been completely paralyzed by the fear of doing anything that might lose votes. It has become intellectually and spiritually aimless. Neither the Administration nor its opponents have any program whatever. Not even the Progressives show much sign of life. The American people are considered a set of prize boobs who are too ignorant to be told anything. And the nation's leaders turn to shadow-boxing or simply shirk their duty, fleeing ghosts that don't exist.

The neutrality fight is the most dismal instance of this legislative paralysis. Senators Borah and Johnson, as usual, are for nothing and against everything. Senator Pittman blandly proclaims a one-man war against Japan. John Bassett Moore, three-score-and-tenner, rises from the grave claiming to know everything, offers half a dozen authorities—all being himself—to prove himself right, and rants at any collective action for peace or even any single action for peace. He asks that we do nothing except repeat the errors we made in the World War. And he does all this in a rigmarole of scholastic and cabalistic terminology which would drive any sensible person to distraction. A few leaders of Italian-Americans, speaking darkly of "five million votes"—which don't exist—denounce neutrality. Oil and steel and cotton and shipping groups put the screws on Senators and Representatives and the Administration. The President backs out. The State Department, after weeks of testimony, tapers off into nothingness. And thus we have the stalemate of the neutrality legislation—easily the most dishonest betrayal, spiritually and intellectually, that the Administration and the State Department and Congress have thus far combined to effect. And those who should be leaders and who should know better go running away like a pack of scrub coyotes.

It is hard not to feel hopeless about the whole national political situation. Large numbers of bills curtailing civil liberties and otherwise blocking progress are being seriously considered, while some very good bills suggesting constitutional amendments receive no consideration. The American mind, reeling from an on-again, off-again, Democrat-Republican bombardment, is so punch drunk that it can no longer think about any real problems. No "movement" or philosophy seems to offer relief. Oh, yes. They do talk a good deal about a third-party movement.

I remember a friend who said to me, "Why have a third party when you haven't even got the first two?"

In such a time of confusion it may be worth while to get down to a few simple facts and to draw from them a few simple conclusions. Whether my conclusions form even the basis for a program, I do not know. But until such times as the broken parts of our national economy can be pieced together they contain at least some principles that seem to me essential. I want to list four of them.

First, civil liberties must be preserved and any effort to curtail them must be desperately fought by every group that wants to maintain even the appearance of democratic government.

The sniping at freedom of speech and freedom of the press is now greater than in any previous peace-time period in our history. We have before us in Congress the McCormack military-disaffection bill—Senator Tydings has now disavowed it—which includes search-and-seizure provisions and gives you a nice two-year rest in the federal penitentiary for "disaffecting" the soldiers. Then we have the Kramer sedition bill, offering you a five-year rest at the same penitentiary for what might be considered sedition. These bills and others like them represent the worst hysteria of the times. All this is accompanied by a sickening bilge about "communism," which flows from the desperate desire of holding to the status quo. The spearhead of the movement for the suppression of civil liberties is furnished by the "patriotic" societies, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the United States navy—the War Department seems for the time to have withdrawn from this activity—and the heavy industries operating in steel and war materials.

Second, the Constitution is a document written by human beings, and the Supreme Court is a body composed of human beings.

Many Americans have a hazy idea that the Supreme Court is a sort of Ark of the Covenant—a repository of divine wisdom. The first essential is that we should recognize that the Constitution was written by human beings and Americans, and that the Supreme Court is also composed of nine human beings. Next we must understand that nowhere in the Constitution is the court expressly given the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. And despite this the court goes on denying powers to Congress because they are not to be found expressly granted in the Constitution. Thus the unwritten right of the Supreme Court to exercise judicial review is used to blot out the unwritten implications of the written right of Congress to provide for the general welfare. We must, moreover, recognize that all this talk about written and unwritten constitutions obscures the basic issue. The English constitution is unwritten, yet that has not removed the difficulties that block the path of constitutional change. But when there has been a unified demand from the English people, backed by leadership in the House of Commons, that change has always taken place. The same thing can be done in the United States. The Constitution as written should not stand in the way of proper social and economic legislation. If it does, the massed pressure of the people must bring about its change.

Third, we must conserve our natural resources, using public ownership when that is necessary and practical to effect this purpose.

Unless we conserve the natural resources of the country we shall have nothing left to conserve. The country will be so washed away and blown away that the soil will not be able to support the population. And how can we achieve conservation? One of the best ways is shown by the TVA. It has a program for preventing soil erosion, for reforestation, for flood control, and for the generation and sale of cheap power. It embodies a recognition of the fact that the fight for conservation must be carried on not only against the natural enemies of flood and wind but against such man-made enemies as the private ownership of public resources. Surely we have as much right to own our resources as we have to own and operate the Post Office, the Panama Canal, roads, and bridges.

Fourth, we must stay out of war, even at great temporary sacrifice, and we must observe strict neutrality.

The world has not learned from the last war. All the promising efforts toward collective action for peace have been defeated, and the world is back where it started—except that it is in a worse condition than before. Now, when 90 per cent of the American people favor neutrality and peace and are willing to make many sacrifices to stay out of war, the same "leaders" who brought us into the last war are getting ready to bring us into the next. Senators who have blocked every effort at peace still want political isolation. But they are anxious for economic participation in world affairs. The two combined mean a dangerous treading of the road to war. Professors, not personally evil, are none the less writing about "freedom of the seas" and "the rights of neutrality," with vicious consequences. The Administration has run a disgusting shell game of international legalities and cheap precinct politics. As a result of all this America is left with no policies of any kind on neutrality.

I may be accused of talking like a prophet of despair, but it seems to me that the country is existing on wishful thinking. We know that there are at least 11,000,000 unemployed. We know that civil liberties must be maintained. We know that the members of the Supreme Court are subject to human frailties like everyone else. We know that we must conserve our national resources, and that we must adopt a definite and stringent neutrality policy. Yet we do something else. Not now, we are told. Maybe later. I can only say that if we cannot recognize the need for attacking these perfectly obvious national problems, we might just as well pack our government up, put it in cold storage, and let the country go to pieces.

Beware of Inflation!

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

TALK of inflation is once more in the air. The passage of the bonus, the threatened enactment of the Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage bill, and renewed agitation for a direct issuance of currency to cover emergency appropriations have sent chills of fear up the spines of conservatives, comparable only to the fright engendered by the alleged threat to the Constitution. Among the specific factors usually cited by those who foresee the country's ruin unless the Administration returns to orthodox financing are the probability that governmental expenditures for 1936-37 will greatly exceed those of any other peace-time year in American history, and the prospect of another budget deficit of more than three billion dollars. Such governmental generosity, critics of the Administration rightly maintain, cannot continue without a day of reckoning.

That a certain amount of inflation has already occurred cannot be denied. Any rapid and prolonged increase in prices—assuming that there has been no breakdown in production—may be considered a definite sign of inflation, regardless of the euphemisms applied to it. Such a rise in prices indicates that the volume of effective purchasing medium, as represented by money and credit, has increased more rapidly than the supply of available goods. Unquestionably this has been true in the past three years, when wholesale commodity prices have advanced by one-third and the cost of living by 18 per cent. In terms of commodities the dollar of today has a purchasing power of only seventy-five cents as compared with that of January, 1933.

What disturbs most economists, however, is not the increase in prices which has already taken place. They will admit that a certain readjustment was normal and healthy after four years of continuous deflation. But they ask whether this process can be checked before it turns into a runaway inflation of the type experienced by Germany and Russia after the World War.

Discussion of this danger usually turns on the possibility that large amounts of fiat money may be issued to cover the increasing governmental deficits. Some ten billion dollars in the gold reserve presents a temptation difficult to resist. Yet despite the activity of currency fanatics in Congress, there seems little real danger of a printing-press inflation. Even the most harebrained of the inflationists recognize the undesirability of unlimited currency expansion, and there appear to be enough orthodox-minded Congressmen to prevent the enactment of a crude inflationary measure. As long as the government is able actively parallel to that of 1929. The danger is latent rather than immediate. Nevertheless, the banks' excess reserves of more than three billion dollars on deposit with the Federal Reserve are more disquieting than the Treasury deficit. Excess reserves of member banks are not, it must be noted, under the direct control of the Federal Reserve authorities. For the most part they represent deposits of wealthy individuals or business establishments which are being held for subsequent investment. During the depression profitable business opportunities have been few, and men of wealth have not unnaturally refrained from investment until new openings should appear. The commercial banks, having no need for large currency holdings, have deposited these surplus funds with the Federal Reserve banks, where they have accumulated in excess of legal requirements. This excess is not only subject to withdrawal on demand, but may—at the discretion of the banks—be made the basis for an expansion of credit of at least ten times its amount. Thus if business conditions continue to improve, the banks could, by ordinary loans, increase the volume of effective purchasing power by more than thirty billion dollars without the issuance of a single greenback. Since present-day bank deposits and currency total approximately fifty billion, this would represent an increase of approximately 60 per cent in the existing medium of payment—enough to make the boom of 1929 look like a piker's affair. If greenbacks were issued to pay the bonus, or for any other purpose, this additional currency would likewise flow back to the banks and become the basis of a potential expansion of credit ten times as large as the issue. With a continued rise in business activity, aided by government expenditures, there is every reason to expect that these reserves will be used.

The gravity of this menace becomes apparent when one recalls that prior to the depression excess reserves of $100,000,000 were considered abnormally high. In 1930 the Federal Reserve authorities began to buy government to sell its short-term bills at less than 1 per cent interest, the urge to start the presses should be easily held within bounds.

If the danger of an unbridled inflation exists, as it doubtless does, it is in a wholly different quarter. Neither the bonus nor the huge governmental expenditures for relief are likely to have much effect on the situation. It is generally admitted that the United States could, if necessary, support a federal debt double the size of the present debt. In terms of relative national wealth both the British and the Italian debt burdens are more than twice as heavy as that of the United States. The fact that Treasury bonds are selling at close to their all-time peak indicates that the government's credit is as strong as at any period in American history. And why not? Despite huge deficits the Treasury has accumulated approximately 45 per cent of the world's supply of monetary gold, together with some two billion dollars' worth of silver. Despite inflationary rumors, the dollar has consistently remained above par—except for a brief and unimportant lapse in the last few weeks. It is doubtful whether foreign pressure on the dollar could reduce our huge gold hoard to manageable size, much less cause a serious threat to our monetary stability. With exports running consistently above imports, the probabilities are in favor of further additions to our unwieldy monetary reserves.

This seeming impregnability merely conceals what is undoubtedly a serious weakness. While there is little danger of currency inflation, there is a real threat of an uncontrolled expansion of credit, which would be equally disastrous. Only 5 to 10 per cent of American business transactions involve an exchange of cash; the remainder are financed by some form of credit, chiefly through the medium of checking accounts. The boom of 1928-29 was essentially a credit inflation, and was finally terminated by a contraction of credit initiated by the Federal Reserve authorities.

No one would suggest that the present situation is ex-securities in the open market for the purpose of easing credit. By the beginning of 1934, when the United States altered the gold value of the dollar, the Federal Reserve banks had paid out approximately $2,400,000,000 in purchase of such securities. Most of this money was used by the hard-pressed banks to pay off existing indebtedness or to meet the public demand for cash for hoarding purposes, but $800,000,000 which was not so needed was deposited with the Federal Reserve banks over and above reserve requirements. Although this brought excess reserves to an unprecedented height, no anxiety was felt since they could be absorbed at any moment by the sale of the Federal Reserve's newly acquired securities.

Revaluation of the dollar changed this picture fundamentally. In the first place, it presented the Treasury with a profit of $2,800,000,000 on its existing gold stocks, which, if spent, would be added to the reserves. Approximately $800,000,000 of this has been disposed of in such a way as to have only a slight effect on reserves, but the remaining $2,000,000,000, at present assigned to the exchange-equalization fund, hangs over the American economy like a sword of Damocles. Secondly, the undervaluation of the dollar has led to a marked increase in the country's gold stocks, which in turn has swelled excess reserves. In 1934 approximately $1,400,000,000 was added to the nation's gold supply, and in 1935 an additional $1,900,000,000 was accumulated. When the price of gold was raised from $20.67 to $35 an ounce the producers and holders of gold were in effect subsidized to the extent of nearly $15 an ounce. Domestic hoarders were penalized by not being permitted to cash in on this profit, but gold miners and foreign speculators were able to take full advantage of the change, which inevitably increased the number of dollars of available purchasing power. This purchasing power remains in circulation even though the gold itself is stored in the vaults of the Treasury.

The Administration's silver program has been almost equally inflationary in its effect. In the final analysis there is very little difference between fiat paper currency and fiat silver money. The bounty paid domestic silver producers and foreign holders of the metal involves the creation of new money, which, since it is not needed at the prevailing level of business activity, returns to the banks and is added to reserves. The increase in idle funds resulting from the Administration's monetary policy has been offset only partially by the floating of large-scale government loans. Ultimately the money borrowed is distributed as wages or relief payments and finds its way back into the banking system. The rise in business activity associated with recovery has caused a small increase in the use of currency and credit, but not to the extent to which new purchasing power has been created.

The existence of surplus reserves was of little importance as long as the Federal Reserve authorities possessed the power to smother any embryonic inflationary tendencies. But it is doubtful whether their authority is adequate to cope with the present situation. As reorganized by the Banking Act of 1935 the Federal Reserve Board has three specific devices for curbing an abnormal expansion of credit: (1) it can raise the rediscount rate; (2) it can increase the reserve requirements of member banks; and (3) it can raise or lower margin requirements on stock purchases. The first of these is certain to be wholly ineffective in the face of an over-supply of idle funds. The second has been definitely recommended by the Federal Advisory Council, but is such a drastic measure that it probably cannot be used effectively without adversely influencing earnings and driving banks out of the Federal Reserve system. Under any circumstances, all that is permitted is a doubling of reserve requirements, which would not absorb existing excess reserves. The third affects the demand for credit but has no influence on its supply.

One other important weapon remains at the disposal of the banking authorities—to sell the $2,400,000,000 in government securities now held by the Federal Reserve banks. Under the 1935 act the power of directing Federal Reserve policy in this connection was taken out of the hands of the board and intrusted to a special Federal Open Market Committee composed of seven board members and five representatives of the Reserve banks. No one will question the effectiveness of this weapon under reasonably normal conditions. The purchase of government bonds from 1930 to 1933 laid the basis for the present recovery, and disposal of these holdings would check the present incipient inflation if devaluation had not created excess reserves far in excess of security holdings. At the end of 1933 the Federal Reserve system held $2,400,000,000 in bonds as against excess reserves of less than $800,000,000; today the holdings are the same, while reserves are in excess of $3,000,000,000, not taking into account the unspent profits of revaluation which may any day be added to the present reserves. Should there be a general revival of business, these powers would obviously be inadequate to prevent a substantial credit expansion. The only effective weapon would be a steeply graduated tax program which would prevent the accumulation of idle funds.

For whether we are dealing with inflation or deflation it is evident that the fundamental problem faced by the American people is the maldistribution of wealth. The recent studies of the Brookings Institution indicate that at the present stage of economic development the concentration of income in the hands of a few must inevitably result in an inadequate consumer buying power, followed by economic stagnation or collapse. The large-scale government spending of the New Deal is an attempt to offset this tendency. The government has replaced private enterprise in a considerable sector of the national economy, but governmental expenditures have never fully made up for the contraction in private business. Moreover, there has been no fundamental redistribution of income during the depression. A privileged few have continued to obtain incomes greatly in excess of their expenditures. Lacking adequate investment opportunities, much of this excess has accumulated, useless, in the vaults of our banks—to the detriment of consumer buying power—or has been invested in the stock market, where it has contributed to the existing abnormal prices. Faced by a continued deficit in mass consuming power, the Administration has found it necessary to administer repeated doses of inflation. So far the effect has not been drastic, owing to lack of business confidence, but once capital begins to move into private enterprise, it will be difficult to put on the brakes.

But why seek to apply the brakes if credit inflation is synonymous with business recovery? Is this not what the Administration has been seeking to achieve for the past three years? The Advisory Council of the Federal Reserve system has supplied at least part of the answer when it declares that the "very large excess reserves of the member banks, creating a plethora of . . . bank credit, has a . . . tendency to foster and encourage speculative activity, increase prices, and raise the cost of living of the population." After its initial stages the benefits of an inflationary rise in prices are restricted to entrepreneurs, shareholders, and speculators. And experience has shown that with drastic inflation only the largest business establishments are able to maintain their position. Speculators are the one group certain to profit from the chaos which would result. Whatever gains these few might obtain would be at the expense of all other portions of society. Retail prices are more sensitive than wages or salaries, and in an inflationary period the cost of living almost invariably increases more rapidly than incomes. White-collar and professional groups would be particularly affected since their incomes are usually fixed in terms of dollars. Farmers might profit during the early stages of inflation, but would suffer more than any other group in the collapse that inevitably follows a boom.

Despite the losses which inflation would inflict on the majority of the population, a program of "sound money" has distinct political limitations. If the Republicans were again to come into power they would find it extremely difficult to take the necessary preventive steps. It would be possible, for example, by revaluing the dollar upward to reverse the forces that were set under way by the Roosevelt monetary policy. But this would almost certainly lead to a sharp collapse in prices and a renewal of the deflationary cycle. For all their talk about economy, it is doubtful whether the Republicans really yearn for this type of political suicide. A second possibility would be a vigorous program of social taxation, so as to relieve the wealthy of their troublesome surpluses. This seems even less likely under a Republican Administration. Equally remote are possibilities of a general increase in real wages or a wholesale reduction of prices. But unless one of these steps is taken there can be no escape from another 1929.

Death Rattle in Akron

BY FRANK ROBERTSON

Akron, Ohio, March 3

AKRON is an industrial boom town with the death rattle in its throat. The desperate strike at the plants of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company is a symptomatic spasm. The fatal affliction is capitalistic competition. The townsfolk suspect the full truth but prefer to shut their eyes. The workers in the rubber shops, however, realize what is happening and they are panicky.

Akron is experiencing its most serious labor trouble since 1923, when "Big Bill" Haywood and the I. W. W. tied the city in a knot for weeks. Now another city-wide general strike impends. The 1913 strike, which scared the rubber companies so badly that they have spent millions since then on labor-spy systems and black lists, came when the sensational Akron boom was just beginning. The automobile was coming to be an essential instrument of transportation. The World War was in the offing. Both of these factors meant a constantly expanding tire production regardless of cost. Labor commanded its own price. Wages for workers in Akron's boom shops ran from $50 to $90 a week and sometimes more. Meanwhile Akron's older industries—her cereal mills, farm-equipment factories, a truck-manufacturing plant, heavy-machinery shops, and many others in which wages were governed by the cutthroat competition of "settled business"—withered and died. Akron quickly became and has remained a one-industry town.

Today the tire industry admits to a production capacity of 75,000,000 tires a year, with a market for not more than 50,000,000. That means vicious price-cutting, ruinous selling, and a relentless drive from the top for reductions in cost. Above all it means a greater and greater speed-up for workers at smaller and smaller wages.

The banker was finding it difficult to get the unpleasantness over with, even if he was speaking for one of those financial institutions claiming to be the world's largest. The man before him was the head of the world's largest rubber company. The heavy fingers tapped the polished surface of the desk at which he sat. At last he spoke.

"Mr. Litchfield, we may as well get down to cases. Speaking for interests holding enough stock to bring about a change of management, I find it my duty to tell you that in our opinion a better showing must be made in Goodyear earnings, or we will place men in charge who are capable of getting the desired results. Putting the matter quite frankly, we want to know if you will co-operate with us in effecting certain changes of policy or if it will be necessary to install new management."

A conversation something like the above, I am told, was primarily responsible for the strike which ten days ago closed down the sprawling Goodyear manufacturing plants here, throwing 16,000 people, one-fourth of the working population of the community, out of work. For P. W. Litchfield, who draws $81,000 a year in salary exclusive of bonuses, according to the federal income-tax reports, chose to remain and institute "certain changes."

The changes involved longer hours, lower pay, and dismissal of from 20 to 25 per cent of the employees, whose work would be done through the speed-up of those surviving. The changes also involved getting rid of men who had been with the company five, ten, and even fifteen years, replacements to be made with youths able to stand eight grueling hours at the pace set by the hated Bedaux system. The twenty-year men were to be kept as evidence that Goodyear takes care of its veterans.

In the engineering departments of Akron's enormous tire plants are built the casings and tubes on which the automobiles of the whole world ride. Machines have been devised which would eliminate two-thirds of the present number of workers and double the output, but the managements have not dared to set them up out of hand. The easier way is to slough off as many workers as possible with the machines now in operation. The ultra-modern new machinery can be set up later when the industry quits this city, as it is in gradual process of doing.

The New York bankers who laid down the law to the head of the world's greatest tire company made it plain that they had taken the trouble to whip other rubber concerns—big competitors—into line on labor policy. No matter how bitter the competition between the rubber kings, they have always been able to get together on labor problems since 1913; and any lowering of labor standards by one company is immediately imitated by all the others. But the master-minds revealed their customary stupidity when they handed Goodyear the "short straw."

It so happens that it was Goodyear, back in 1930, that began preaching the virtues of the six-hour day, having found that four men working in six-hour shifts could maintain a faster pace and earn more money for the owners than three men working eight hours each. Goodyear, too, had pioneered the company-union idea when most managements considered it suicide to discuss any problems with employees. As company unions go, so even the members of the A. F. of L. United Rubber Workers' Union tell me, the Goodyear "industrial assembly" had a good record with the men. When unionization became possible, under Section 7-a of the NRA, Goodyear was the toughest nut for the A. F. of L. boys to crack. No real success attended their efforts until Akron rubber workers, seeing the writing on the wall, began last fall to indorse enthusiastically John L. Lewis and the industrial-union idea. President Litchfield, ever since 1930, had been widely publicized throughout the United States for his advocacy, first, of the six-hour day and, later, of the thirty-hour week. He wrote a book. He gave many interviews. He signed imposing articles, with convincing statistics, in the company's own weekly paper.

When, to save his own job, he was forced to lengthen hours, cut hourly and piece-rate pay, and replace middle-aged workers who were slowing down, he couldn't take that up with his company union. Instead he had his statisticians work out a lot of phony figures about living costs and "real wages." They discovered that a man who was working six hours a day now and getting $122 a month for it could by working eight hours get more pay. To be exact, he could get $3 more a month. In a word, the proposed "readjustment" amounted to a wage cut of nearly 25 per cent, since men had to work one-third more hours for almost the same pay. And the extra hours meant that 20 to 25 per cent of the workers would lose their jobs.

This elaborate essay in misrepresentation was printed in the company house organ early last fall. Not only was a strike threatened at Goodyear; the rubber workers promised to close down Goodrich, Firestone, General, Seiberling, India, and the rest of the Akron companies.

Factory-wide application of the new schedules was called off at Goodyear. A few weeks later, however, a new device was tried. Workers were summoned individually and notified of their assignment to eight-hour shifts. Evidence collected by union leaders shows that occasionally an entire operation was put on the new schedule. This produced "sitdowns," which meant that men sat at their machines without working, but such protests failed to halt the ruthless progress of factory-wide "readjustment." According to officials of the United Rubber Workers' Union, it was the wholesale replacement of five- and ten-year men by young lads just out of school that set off the accumulated resentment and brought on the strike. It started as an "outlaw" strike, but it is "outlaw" no longer. The Goodyear local of the United Rubber Workers of America stepped into the breach, supplying leaders and a program. President William Green of the American Federation of Labor and President Lewis of the United Mine Workers temporarily have shelved their dispute over industrial and craft unions to send aid. Assistant Secretary of Labor Edward F. McGrady, back in Akron today for a second try at mediation, terms the Goodyear situation "the most critical in America." Litchfield, believing that the future of unionization not only in the rubber but in the automobile industry as well is at stake, has lost even the sympathy of Akron merchants by a flat refusal to discuss issues with representatives of the men on strike. The Akron Central Labor Union, in a rousing mass-meeting yesterday, authorized a general strike if any effort is made to reopen the strike-bound Goodyear plant. The general strike may be an actuality before this gets into print.

If Goodyear succeeds in forcing the longer day with lessened pay, the other rubber barons will "be forced to make similar adjustments." The rubber industry has seen this struggle coming. Branch factories have been built in the Southern states, where labor is cheap and the TVA promises lower power costs. Others are going to be built there just as rapidly as the rubber companies can write down their Akron plant investments. Akron is on its way to becoming like those tragic New England towns which once constituted the textile center of the world. But labor does not propose to accept its fate without fighting.

Germany Prepares for War

BY LOUIS FISCHER

THE most important question I wanted my Berlin stay to answer was this: Will Germany's food and financial troubles seriously impair its ability to complete its armament program? I think the answer is in the negative.

German industrial production has reached a post-war high. But much of it can neither be eaten nor worn. Germany is freezing huge quantities of its capital in war materials. Experts estimate that 3,000,000 more persons are employed now than in January, 1933—there are 750,000 more office-holders, 750,000 more soldiers and sailors, and 1,500,000 more factory hands. But the volume of consumers' commodities remains relatively low. The period between January, 1933, and October, 1934, therefore saw a 25 per cent reduction in real wages for industrial and clerical workers, and the total fall in Germany's standard of living under the Hitler regime is put at 30 to 35 per cent. If the inferior quality of manufactured articles is included, the decline is greater still. Hitler and the papers predict further sacrifices and hardships in 1936. "The wage level," Joseph Winschuh, writing in the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung of December 31, warns, "will scarcely tolerate further price rises." Goebbels has announced that wages cannot be increased. Yet shortage pushes prices up. Indeed, Winschuh himself says that exports must be stimulated and that "the standard of living should be subordinated to this purpose." The year 1936 promises no relief and no improvement. Nevertheless, the best observers, foreign as well as German, expect that the production of German military equipment will actually be intensified during the first six months of 1936, only to taper off after June on account of money stringency. The technical apparatus of the German army—aeroplanes, guns, tanks, and so on—will reach its high point in 1936, when the army will be fully prepared for war.

In other respects, however, 1936 will not find Germany ready for war. Nation-wide military conscription has just commenced, and the Reichswehr's cadres are not sufficiently trained for a conflict with major powers. Nor have the enlarged officers' corps and staff had time to acquire the efficiency and knowledge demanded by modern warfare. The World War veterans are old, physically below par, and technically backward. Germany must wait till the new millions are molded into soldiers fit for long and trying battles. When will that be? Some specialists say 1937, most say 1938, some say 1939. The Reichswehr today probably numbers 800,000 commanders and men. In 1939 it will count 1,000,000 men under arms and 2,500,000 freshly drilled reserves. This is about the right amount of cannon fodder for a beginning.

The chief problem is raw materials. The government will endeavor to purchase some fats abroad on its clearing agreements but it will devote its foreign currency as far as possible to imports of raw materials. Nevertheless, in the event of a blockade or effective League of Nations sanctions Germany might lose a prolonged war by reason of its limited natural resources. Germany uses 3,500,000 tons of petroleum a year. Very little is mined at home. Borings have been made in numerous places, deposits have been discovered, and the wells have been sealed for future exploitation. Astounding progress has been registered by the synthetic-petroleum industry. Germany already produces one-third of its annual motor-fuel requirements. In 1938 this will have been raised to two-thirds, and in 1939 to 100 per cent. If private automobiles were taken off the streets, the volume of home-made oil would eliminate the necessity of oil imports in 1938. Germany is also creating huge reserves of petroleum. Foreign countries obligingly aid. The air force needs very high-grade lubricants. Germany lacks the experience and technique to refine them. The American Socony-Vacuum Company, therefore, is building a refinery in Hamburg which will convert inferior oil into aviation lubricants. The plant will be finished this year.

Research laboratories are working on substitutes for steel, iron, copper, cotton, and sulphur. The authorities have a scientific record of all non-ferrous metals in private and industrial use. In time of war these reserves—underground telephone cables, for instance—would be requisitioned. Germany, moreover, is financing the production of soya beans in Hungary, bauxite in Yugoslavia, and tobacco in Bulgaria; the German Vereinigte Stahlwerke own 1,700,000 of the 3,000,000 shares of the Alpine-Montan Company, the largest metallurgical firm in Austria. Germany hopes to draw supplies from these sources when war breaks out.

The army's orders are the chief food of German heavy industry, and industry in turn subordinates its activities to military considerations. The army is supervising the erection of a big Opel automobile plant at Brandenburg. There are General Motors and International Telegraph and Telephone Company factories in Germany which, though American-owned, cannot be entered by any American; they are turning out war equipment.

All Germany is an armed camp. One who like myself returns to Germany after irregular absences notices the marked increase in the number of Reichswehr cars and uniforms. The ordinary army trucks which now pass through the streets of Berlin are painted with camouflage. This is a part of the practical preparation for war. But it is also part of the psychological preparation which goes on with unrelenting intensity every hour of every day in the press, radio, and schools.

Germany's mental mobilization is of supreme importance. Every nation is frantically increasing its armaments. This phenomenon has become so normal that few ever stop to think how many shoes, shirts, loaves of bread, pounds of meat and butter, medicines, comforts, and pleasures it steals from hundreds of millions of human beings every morning, afternoon, and evening. Sometimes one comes to the conclusion that a humanity which submits to such madness really deserves a war which will exterminate most of it. Mental mobilization is largely to blame for the supineness with which populations accept the privations resulting from armaments. Every government tells its citizens that arms are necessary either for defense or to maintain national dignity and honor. German papers regularly pay homage to Adolf Hitler because his conscription declaration of March 16, 1935, restored to Germany pride and self-esteem. It is for this, it is said, that Germany is concentrating its industrial efforts on war preparations. I do not underestimate the significance of nationalism and patriotism in politics. But I do not believe that the primary purpose of the Nazis' rearmament program is to feed these sentiments. There must be another object. Is it territorial aggression? German statesmen deny this, but could they do otherwise? They must deny or stand condemned and exposed. Germany, in fact, charges that Bolshevik Russia harbors aggressive designs, just as Rome charged that Abyssinia was the aggressor. The Germans contend that they are pacific, and Hitler has made several speeches which are quoted in Berlin as evidence of Germany's deep desire for peace. Can an objective truth be lifted out of this polemic?

Passed Fit for Service

George Grosz

The Germans, notoriously, have always been bad diplomats, and the reason is that they put little trust in diplomacy and therefore little effort into it. They respect force; they are cynical about words. Hitler came to power in January, 1933. Poland grew frightened. In the previous year equality in armaments had been conceded to Germany by the League, and Warsaw feared that a re-armed Germany ruled by super-nationalistic Nazis would seriously menace Danzig and the Corridor. In March, 1933, accordingly, the late Marshal Pilsudski concentrated five army corps near the German frontier and sounded France and England on the desirability of a preventive war against Fascist Germany. Rumor has it that General Weygand, then French Chief of Staff, lent an ear to the idea. In April Polish troops occupied the Westerplatte, a strip of Danzig territory. It looked like the beginning of war. On May 16, 1933, President Hindenburg wrote to his assistant, State Secretary Meissner, a note the facsimile of which was published in the Berlin Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung of August 12, 1934. It said: "These days you can of course get in touch with me at any time of the day or night." The very next day Hitler summoned the Reichstag to listen to a long pacifist speech. "No new European war," the Chancellor declared wisely, "could create conditions better than the unsatisfactory conditions of today. . . . Germany is always ready to assume further security obligations of an international character. . . . Germany would be prepared to abolish its entire military establishment." The world at large did not know that these promises were designed to ward off an imminent war. The Western powers, however, were glad to take Hitler at his word because they did not want to fight. Paris vetoed Pilsudski's preventive war.

Chancellor Hitler made another pacifist speech on May 21, 1935. Every German with whom I have spoken recently quoted this address as the cornerstone of German foreign policy. The address had two motifs, one of which was friendship for England. Three weeks later the Anglo-German naval agreement was signed. Hitler wanted it very much. The speech of May 21 was a bid for it. The second motif was hostility to Bolshevik Russia. Hitler outdid himself in fiercely, wildly attacking Moscow. On the next day the German government offered the Soviet government a billion-mark long-term credit. Germany needs Soviet raw materials—oil, manganese, timber, and so on—and wants to put her unemployed plant to work. Even though Moscow must distinguish between business advantages and political sympathies, it has not accepted the proposal.

That speech would reward fuller analysis than it can receive here. Berlin will hark back to it more than once. Its fundamental thesis was National Socialism's rejection of collective security. A catastrophe like the first World War, Hitler said, "can arise all the more easily when the possibility of localizing smaller conflicts has been rendered less and less by an international network of intersecting obligations, and the danger of numerous nations being dragged into the struggle becomes all the greater." How could a war be localized? Very simple. "The other nations," Hitler suggests, should "withdraw at once from both sides at the outbreak of such a conflict rather than allow themselves to be involved in this conflict from the outset by treaty obligations." Concretely, this means that if Germany attacks Czecho-Slovakia or Austria or Lithuania, the other nations, the nations bound by treaties to aid the invaded country, are to withdraw at once and let Germany and Lithuania or Germany and Czecho-Slovakia fight it out between themselves. Then, let us assume, Germany, having gobbled up the first victim, moves on Hungary or Yugoslavia. Again the other nations refrain from interfering and try to keep the struggle localized between Germany and its single antagonist. If one accepts Hitler's contention that Germany will never become an aggressor, this idea becomes ludicrous. The Soviet Union, let us say, violates Poland. The result would probably be the subjugation of Poland. Being bent on aggression Moscow would probably next attack Germany. Would it not be in Germany's interest if, the moment Russia struck at Poland, all neighbors should fall upon Russia collectively and nip aggression in the bud? What is this adamant objection to collective security, then, if not an attempt to prevent the formation of a united front against Germany in case it precipitates war? I was unable to get an answer from any German with whom I argued this point. I think there is no answer. Indeed, Hitler's presentation of May 21, 1935, warrants the fear that Germany has reserved for itself certain spheres of future conflict. One is Austria. Hitler stated that he wanted "self-determination" for Austria. A high German official said to me the other day that Germany wanted a plebiscite in Austria to determine whether or not Austria wished to adhere to Germany. Germany has been asked and has refused to guarantee Austria's territorial integrity. The second is Lithuania. "We are ready," Hitler declared on May 25, "to conclude pacts of non-aggression with all our neighbors except Lithuania." This may sound innocent, especially as Hitler added that if Lithuania adhered to the Memel statute which guarantees the rights of the German minority the exception could be removed. But this problem is a complicated one. It may remain open for a long time. And Lithuania is a step toward the Soviet frontier.

Anti-Sovietism is now most popular in Germany. In his recent interview with François-Poncet, the French Ambassador, Hitler devoted a great deal of time to an attack on the U. S. S. R. In his three-hour talk on December 13 with Sir Eric Phipps, the British Ambassador, Hitler spent even more time arguing against the U. S. S. R. Some weeks ago Hitler gave an audience to the staff of the S. S. His main theme was anti-Sovietism. No item favorable to Russia may appear in the German press. The intellectual and ideological barrage for aggression against the Soviet Union is in full swing. The persons who think it dangerous, those who recall that Germany lost the war of 1914-18 when the Kaiser scrapped Bismarck's policy of friendship with Russia, are ignored. But the preparations are not only intellectual. A judicious American to whose judgment many defer informed me in London some time ago that "while he had no proof, he was convinced that a German-Japanese alliance existed and that it was aimed against Russia." Germany is training Japanese military aviators. In December twenty-six German aircraft specialists went to Japan via Italy. Japanese delegates to the naval conference stayed with General Göring for two days en route to London. Other evidence is not wanting.

But perhaps, since Germany will not be ready for war

Workmen's Quarter

George Grosz

until about 1938, there is no cause for immediate alarm. This would be a false and dangerous attitude. Until 1937 or 1938 or 1939 Germany will not be in a position to cope single-handed with a group of powers which includes France. But if Germany finds an ally in Japan or Poland or Hungary, the date may be advanced. Moreover, the weaker the probable coalition against Germany, the nearer the catastrophe. Innumerable Germans are convinced that Britain's preoccupation with Italy and the Far East and its dread of air attacks upon London will keep England out of the next war unless it is directly menaced. Would England be as ready to give battle for Austria, Czecho-Slovakia or Lithuania as it was for Abyssinia? The fate of European civilization may depend on the answer.

Everything, accordingly, depends on how many friends Germany can win and on the extent to which it can undermine the potential enemy. The outstanding and rather transparent purpose of German diplomacy at present is to separate France from Russia, France from England, and Russia from England. Simultaneously it strives to weave closer ties with London as a preliminary to neutralization. But even this last all-important goal is subordinated to Germany's policy vis-a-vis Italy. A weakened Italy makes Germany's task in Austria easier. On the other hand a revisionist and embittered, because thwarted, Italy might be an ally in a world war. Yet Italy could also side with France against Germany. Italy's defeat in Abyssinia might end in Mussolini's fall, which would react to the detriment of German fascism, both at home and abroad. That defeat, if hastened by League collective action, would be a terrifying precedent for the next aggressor. Germany, therefore, watches the Ethiopian affair with hope, trepidation, and indecision. It does not wish to offend England by word or gesture, but it also does not want to alienate Italy. Hence the "neutrality" to which Germans point as proof of their pacifism. They are waiting to see how the wind blows.

Europe's great good fortune is that the period of highest tension in Italy, which produced the Abyssinian adventure, did not coincide with the same period in Germany. If the two periods had coincided, the two countries would be allies and Europe would be a shambles. European statesmen feel obliged to settle the Anglo-Italian-Ethiopian conflict before the German problem grows much riper. This is wisdom. It is also difficult.

A Note on Literary Criticism

BY JAMES T. FARRELL

II

THERE are three acceptable definitions of proletarian literature. It may be defined as creative literature written by a member of the industrial proletariat without regard to his political orientation, as creative writing that deals with some phase of the life of the industrial proletariat, or as creative writing that by reason of the author's point of view or his actual use of the material is concerned with the life, the problems, or the attitudes of that segment of the proletariat which is class conscious.

No matter which of these definitions one utilizes, the fact remains that they do not become categories of value, and that they do not constitute an a priori basis for the critical destruction of works that will not fit easily into these categories. Further, whichever one of these definitions is used, it does not follow that work fitting snugly into it will be uninfluenced by "non-proletarian" writing.

The terms "bourgeois" and "proletarian," as used in literary criticism, are then merely descriptive. Within the category of bourgeois will be found progressive as well as regressive elements; and surely one of the tasks of the critic is to further the understanding and efficacy of the progressive elements wherever they may be found. Only in this way can he hope to release and not dam up the stream of cultural continuity.

A generalized description of one function of literature is that it provides a record of how people live and feel in different epochs. John Strachey, in "The Coming Struggle for Power," writes:

"Literature" is perhaps the most remarkable of all the ideal constructions which the human mind has begotten. It is a great sea into which for centuries have been poured all those thoughts, dreams, fantasies, concepts, ascertained facts, and emotions which did not fit into any of the other categories of human thought. Into literature have gone philosophical ideas too tenuous for the philosophers, dreams too literal for plastic expression, ascertained facts too uncorrelated for science, and emotions too intertwined with the particular instance to find expression in the glorious and precise abstractions of music.

It is characteristic of life that it constantly tends to overflow the intellectual categories which are set up as the basis for apprehending, organizing, understanding, and controlling it. Strachey's definition is a description of the role that literature plays in acting as a reservoir for this overflow. Continuing, Strachey writes:

Literature, for the most part, attempts to illuminate some particular predicament of a particular man or a particular woman at a given time and place.

This would seem to suggest that there can be in literature a considerable degree of diversity in method, in procedure, in content. But the "leftist" enthusiasts often allow it no such latitude. Consider, for example, the false bifurcation they have established between the "individualistic" and the "collective" novel. Individualism, in the context of classical economy, reflects the belief that the individual is the best judge of his own needs and wants, and that he has a right to satisfy them in his own way with a minimum of legal restraint. But the term has been taken out of its context and as a result has attained a justly merited unpopularity; finally, used in its most derogatory sense, it has been smuggled into "leftist" literary criticism. A work describing the particular predicament of a particular man or woman at a particular period of time has been criticized as individualistic, and therefore as a "bourgeois" hangover representing a false psychology.

John Dos Passos's novel, "The 42nd Parallel," on the other hand, has been praised as a collective novel. Yet there is no important or noticeable difference between the manner in which Dos Passos seeks to establish character and the manner in which many so-called "individualistic" novels establish it. The characters in "The 42nd Parallel" have thoughts and feelings. They say things. They participate in various actions. They make, or they fail to make, relevant analyses of the meanings of what they say, do, think, and see. Where is the essential difference? What Dos Passos does is to rely on size, extent, and number rather than on intensified evocation of a few characters.

A novelist in developing characters is or should be aware that they belong to a group or a class, and that that group or class is a conditioning factor; he knows also that human beings resemble one another and are subject, moreover, to the working of a whole series of natural laws and of social processes. But he is also concerned with his characters as unique human beings. Yet in so far as a novelist deals not only with the similarities but also with the dissimilarities in human beings, his work must be tainted with the individualistic psychology which the "leftists" profess to abhor. What is the precise meaning of "individualistic psychology," and what is the precise meaning of "collective psychology"? What have critics been talking about when they have indulged in this particular kind of distinction?

The truth is that it is a false distinction; and the confused use of the categories of bourgeois and proletarian in critical writing is the result of a crass and oversimplified utilization of the Marxian concept of the class struggle. It is true that the Marxian concept of this struggle posits the existence, objectively, of social classes. But how does the class struggle impinge upon the life of an individual? It impinges upon him in his role as a breadwinner. It dictates his relationships to other men; it de-limits the kind of life he may live. It builds up habits of response and thinking of which he may or may not be aware. But the class struggle does not in any sense produce so complete and total a differentiation between human beings as to wipe out all similarities between those who, objectively, belong to different classes. Neither does it mean that at every minute of a man's life the class struggle is a direct, potent, and conscious factor in his life.

One of the mistakes of "leftist" criticism is that it has hypostatized the class struggle and made it an article of faith. This has been damaging in two ways. In the first place, it has led writers to build their characters from this concept instead of from life, with the result that these characters have been merely obvious and unrewarding illustrations of a thesis. In the second place, critics who praise such works go one bad step farther and use them to diminish the reputation and the understanding of works that have not conformed to their false standard. Yet the works they have celebrated are merely the restatements of ideas that have been developed in books and articles and pamphlets, to which no understanding or life has been given. The so-called characters who people them are merely abstractions walking in the wrong place.

Closely connected with such a utilization of the Marxian concept of the class struggle has been the confusing use of the slogan, "All art is propaganda." When one makes the attempt to propagandize large masses of people, it is necessary, of course, to find common denominators. This means that ideas must be conventionalized into slogans or stereotypes. Lenin's slogans were effective propaganda in this sense, but do those who defend and advocate the formula that all art is propaganda mean it in this sense? If so, they seem to be confusing the tactics and the role of the politician with literary practice and the function of literature. Politics is obviously concerned with government. It must find answers which can be embodied in action. Literature is not and cannot be so directly concerned with finding immediate answers in terms of action.

When the attempt has been made to press it into such service, the result has often been mere ineptitude. An instance of such ineptitude is to be found in a number of the so-called proletarian "poems" written in America a few years ago and published in various little magazines. In those days any number of poets constructed verses which had no evocative power but were merely statements. Such poems did not add anything to the readers' awareness or understanding, but appealed only to convictions already imbedded in the minds of a very limited audience. These poems would make statements about the conditions of American workers in various industries, and then suddenly in bold-faced type would leap to the slogan, "All power to the Soviets." Besides being bad poetry, such efforts were also bad politics, because they lacked intelligent reference to the problems, the needs, and the psychological state of the American worker. They were examples of that extremism which Lenin castigated in one of the genuine classics of revolutionary thought, "'Left Communism'; an Infantile Disorder."

Sometimes propaganda is given a different meaning. It is now taken to mean the expression of any idea, attitude, emotion, or sentiment. But when it is given this meaning, when literary history is combed to show that one writer preached despair, another wrote to prove the world was pessimistic, another to make people believe that man was good, and another to show the lift in the eternal spirit of man, the meaning of the term is broadened to meaninglessness. For if propaganda is used in this broad sense, the work of almost any writer can be shown to mean almost anything. What happens generally is that left extremists use "propaganda" in its larger sense when they are referring to the literature of the past, and in its narrower sense when they are referring to the literature of the present—and then establish a conclusion based on the false notion that they have used the word in the same sense in both references.

Propaganda, then, must be given a more definite meaning. And I believe that in America it should mean a method of conventionalizing and epitomizing thought and policy. Given such a meaning, it is not applicable to literature, and if it is applied it will retard the development of literature, prevent it from producing what it can produce and from serving the function in society which it is equipped to serve. One of the aims of literature, as of all art, is to present fresh insights and new interpretations, to render qualities and surfaces in such a way as to increase awareness and extend sensibility. Another of the aims of literature, aptly defined above by Strachey, is to provide a reservoir for the overflow of experience. And if this be one of its functions, some other content must be given to the formula, "Literature is propaganda."

It is for this reason that I have chosen the phrase, "Literature is an instrument of social control." As such it serves various functions. It increases understanding. It makes readers more intensely conscious of the problems of life, the predicaments of people, the possibilities and limitations of living, the diversity of human experience. It makes implicit or explicit judgments on the value of conditions, actions, thoughts, situations, environments, hopes, despairs, ideals, dreams, fantasies. It also provides its readers with additional equipment for proceeding with their own lives. It points their emotions, their impulses, their wishes, and their thoughts toward or away from certain goals. It creates in an ideal and formal sense the consciousness of an epoch.

My objection to "leftist" revolutionary criticism is that it ignores the proper tasks which criticism must perform. Literature is created out of a complex in which the preponderantly causal factor is material relationships. But it in turn has an effect on the future. It both reflects the past and organizes the future. But its functions are not exhausted or even well performed if it seeks to limit itself to the usurping of functions better served by direct political agitation, by political slogans, and by political pamphlets. Its main effect, and also its more lasting effect, as literature, is the result of making men understand their world more clearly, of making them feel life more keenly, more quickly, more sensitively, more imaginatively. In this way it plays its role in changing the world.

[Part I of Mr. Farrell's article appeared last week. It is concluded in this issue.]

Buzz Windrip—Governor of Georgia

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

II

ABOUT a century and a half ago Gene Talmadge's great-grandfather came from New Jersey and settled on a small farm in Monroe County in central Georgia. Ever since the Talmadges have been small owning farmers. In 1934 Our Gene bought the original homestead, largely for sentimental reasons, and added it to the extensive landed possessions which his wife had inherited from her first husband. On week-ends he usually drives down to this old Talmadge farm, plows, feeds the hogs, and gets his shoes full of manure. He is a dirt farmer! Unlike those dudes, Wallace and Tugwell, he knows what the farmer needs. The farmer must get higher prices while he raises all he can! "But how can he do both?" I asked. "He can do both," was the answer, "by hard work if he is unintimidated, unmolested, and not taxed to death.

His Excellency was born on September 23, 1884, in Forsyth, Monroe County. In 1907 he graduated from the law school of the University of Georgia. After a brief and sorry attempt to practice law in Atlanta, he went back to central Georgia. He settled in Telfair County, five miles from the county seat, McRae. Rapidly he went native again. He was a good Baptist, a sound Democrat, a Sigma Nu, and strong for fertilizer without sand. Above all, he was a pillar of White Supremacy, not loudly but with the assured bigotry of the cracker born and bred. From 1912 on he mainly farmed. He helped his neighbors with legal counsel. He dabbled in parochial politics more and more. In 1918 he achieved the solicitorship of the McRae City Court. From 1920 to 1923 he was attorney for Telfair County. Eugene Talmadge was slowly rising in the Georgia veldt. All he needed was an issue and a public enemy. The issue, of course, was the perennial plight of the farmer. The enemy was J. J. Brown.

J. J. Brown had been Commissioner of Agriculture almost since Oglethorpe. He was so much of a fixture that nobody thought of challenging his power. His department was corrupt, smug, and inefficient. He had over two hundred "oil inspectors" alone, whose only apparent function was to keep his machine well greased. In 1927 Talmadge decided to run against Brown, and to everybody's surprise he was elected.

For three terms, from 1927 to 1933, Talmadge was Commissioner of Agriculture. All he accomplished during that period was to reduce the number of oil inspectors to six, to slash other really essential services, to cut wages by about 25 per cent, to enforce with far more noise than vigor the law which specifies the content of fertilizer, and above all to give full scope to his gifts of demagoguery. He filled every issue of his Market Bulletin with political harangues. He made a big show—and a big flop—of finding new markets for Georgia farm products and hogs, and of boosting farm prices. He also was almost impeached for taking a flier in hogs in Chicago, losing illegally $12,000 of the state's money. "I stole it for you," he told an assembly of farmers later on. He saved himself by the Huey Long technique of fixing enough Senators to sign a round robin not to impeach him.

During his commissionership of agriculture Talmadge intrenched himself in the affections of Georgia's crack-erdom. He did not rise by building a powerful machine. He does not have one now. He is singularly impotent in inspiring loyalty in able men, good or bad. The gang around him is a collection of a dozen dreary heels—shabby, inept, corrupt, and Ku Klux-minded. They are outspoken Negrophobes, Jew-haters, labor-baiters. In short, Talmadge consolidated his power psychologically rather than structurally. He is a congenital night-rider with an irresistible appeal to the vigilante spirit, the recrudescence of which in the black belt can be measured by the depth of the depression. As Commissioner of Agriculture he was in covert intimacy with the Black Shirts, the "American Fascisti." Their program was "to protect the chastity of White Womanhood," "to maintain and forever secure White Supremacy," to place white men in black men's jobs, and primarily to terrorize both white and black labor in town and country. Their chief sport, especially through 1930, was night-riding among the colored share-croppers. The leading spirits in this organization, all enthusiastic Talmadge men, were John A. Boykin, who as Solicitor General of Fulton County secured the conviction of Angelo Herndon; Judge James Davis of the Stone Mountain Circuit Court, a sort of modern Simon Legree on the bench, and Kenneth Murrell and Al Henson of the American Legion. All through the state local judges, small-town lawyers and prosecutors, chiefs of police, sheriffs and their deputies were enrolled Black Shirts, whose official sheet was a monthly incitement to lynching and terrorism. Today this same crowd call themselves Men of Justice. The leading personnel is the same. These Men of Justice are the shock troops of Talmadge's campaigns. Not so very long ago they framed a number of colored bell hops with white prostitutes in several Atlanta hotels and then forced the managers to hire white bell hops in their stead. Talmadge is even closer to the Women's National Association for the Preservation of the White Race. The "national president" of this society is a Mrs. J. E. Andrews. Her anthropological views are strictly Nazi. In the monthly organ of her society, the Georgia Woman's World, she writes essays in defense of the "Gentiles," arguing that Lincoln was assassinated by the international Jewry, that Jews and Negroes are descended from the more villainous characters in the Bible, and that the Roosevelt family spends all its time with Negroes. The printing bill of this lynch sheet, of which thousands of copies were recently distributed by Talmadge's game wardens, is paid in cash by the office of Hugh Howell, the state Democratic chairman.

In short, Talmadge rose to power entirely on the ground swell of bigotry and ignorance. And he keeps in power by exploiting the lowest passions engendered by the pauper misery of the rural sections. In 1934 the average gross income—cash and produce—per family of even the owning farmers in Georgia was only a little more than $500 a year; that of the average tenant farmer was around $250 a year; and the total income of the average share-cropper of either race, when he was not thrown off the land, was about $150 a year. Such incomes breed Talmadges.

By 1932 Talmadge felt himself strong enough to run for governor, and in looking around for "radical" issues he found three. His main plank was a flat three-dollar automobile-license tag. He also came out for a reduction in taxes and public-utility rates. The moment he was elected he cut the essential personnel and the pay rolls of the various state services to the bone, some 25 per cent. Through his control of the Senate he reduced school appropriations drastically—in a state which leads in illiteracy. With questionable legality, though he was later upheld in the courts, he evicted the old and corrupt highway board and put in his own gang. Two of the three highway commissioners are under the thumb of John A. Whitley, a highway contractor, known as "the slave driver" for paying as low as ten cents an hour to free labor. Talmadge also fired the old Public Service Commission, which he had a legal right to do, and appointed as chairman of the new Public Service Commission Jud P. Wilhoit, the only competent and efficient appointment of his career. He immediately suspended the collection of all automobile-license taxes except the flat three-dollar tax. When the time came for assessing ad valorem taxes he reduced them from five mills to four, thus cutting the state's income for social services by one million dollars a year.

The three-dollar automobile tax is, of course, a boomerang to the cheap-car owner. A real reform would have graduated the tax from three dollars up, thus allowing cheap tags without robbing the state of a $3,000,000 income from taxes on expensive cars, trucks, and buses.

In his fight against the public utilities Talmadge first threatened to equalize their valuation for tax purposes with their valuation for rate-making purposes. The Georgia Power Company, the leading public utility in the state, is allowed to evaluate itself at $45,757,000 for tax purposes, while the same company is allowed to charge electric rates on its own property valuation in excess of $230,000,000. Talmadge of course never even attempted to carry out his threat of equalization. But he did reduce rates. Yet the same public utilities which had fought him bitterly during his first campaign subsidized heavily his campaign for reelection. What really happened was that the general tax reduction from five to four mills cost the Georgia Power Company only some $50,000 in tax increases, while the rate reduction actually increased its earnings, as Mr. Wilhoit said it would and as the company stupidly refused to believe. The increase in the use of electricity due to an 18 per cent reduction has netted the company $120,000 a year. The same thing happened in all the other public utilities. The 17 per cent reduction in telephone rates has installed in one year 14,300 more telephones in Atlanta alone. In other words, the public utilities gained in income and in liberal reputation. "Of course," Mr. Wilhoit admitted, "cheaper utility rates make little difference in the rural communities. These reductions are helpful in the larger cities and to people in least need of relief." Through the state only about one out of seven owning farmers uses electricity; tenants and share-croppers almost never do. Outside of Atlanta only about one family in twelve has a telephone.

Talmadge's state-tax reduction of one mill penalizes mainly the rural counties which have always received more from the state treasury than they put into it. It has forced these counties to raise more in local taxes for their social services, especially for schools. Greene County, a typical one, has had to raise a special school tax. But even after this increase in local taxation the public schools had less money than in pre-Talmadge days. The real effect of Talmadge's reduced-taxation plan can be seen in the allocation of $1,600,000 by the federal Administration in the spring of 1934 to keep the rural schools of Georgia from closing. As in everything else Talmadge ever did, he thundered from the left and showered upon the right.

It was during his first administration that Talmadge began to fight the national government. At first he cooperated willingly enough with the FERA and the WPA. The federal government allocated the funds and Talmadge appointed the jobholders who administered them. When it became too crassly obvious that the Talmadge machine was converting federal relief and public works into a local racket, the Administration took the whole thing out of the Governor's hands. This is the real source of his bitterness against Roosevelt's "killing religion in the hah'ts of the American people."

By the time Talmadge was running for his second term he had become the darling of all the big business interests. And he completely solidified his position with the industrialists, especially the cotton manufacturers, during the great textile strike of September, 1934. The primary election was to be held on Wednesday, September 12. On the preceding Friday he met at the Hotel Ansley in Atlanta with about twenty of the leading textile manufacturers of the state and with Theodore M. Forbes, secretary of the Cotton Manufacturers' Association of Georgia. At this meeting it was arranged that immediately after election day Talmadge was to call out the National Guard and break the strike. For this service the manufacturers raised a purse of approximately $20,000, which was given in cash to John A. Whitley, the highway contractor, for campaign purposes. For such purposes, the textile workers pointed out, this gift seemed quite unnecessary, for Talmadge's reelection was never in doubt. He carried 156 out of the 159 counties in the state.

Immediately after election Talmadge declared martial law, called out 3,700 national guardsmen, and put hundreds of workers into an open concentration camp near Fort McPherson. The only mills which received no "protection" were the Calloway mills. Mr. Calloway refused to contribute to the campaign fund. But during a strike in February, 1935, the Calloway mills did get troops by "putting the heat" on the Governor. The most amusing incident in Talmadge's strike-breaking tactics occurred when he shipped Pearl Bergoff's gunmen out of the state. The newsreels publicized this fact as a liberal gesture. Talmadge, of course, chased Bergoff's outfit away because they threatened to compete with his own activities. "Talmadge is the best Governor this state ever had," Mr. Forbes confided. "He broke the strike for us."

Toward the end of 1935 Talmadge had the upper house, which he controls, force the adjournment of the Legislature without an appropriation bill for 1936. At this moment the state of Georgia is ruled financially without legislative appropriation. On January 31, 1935, the state had $2,500,412 left. Of this $1,395,582.74 was allocated. The rest of it the Governor can use as he pleases—if he can get away with it. The state also has some seven and a half million dollars of unexpended money, a good deal of it in the highway department. With this amount Talmadge figured he could run the state until June, 1936, and he stated that when the time came for collecting new taxes he would do so through martial law. The whole procedure is raucously unconstitutional, for all the Governor has to do is to call a special session of the Legislature. But this Talmadge does not care to do, partly because he prefers to juggle the funds and partly because of the growing sentiment for his impeachment.

This whole procedure was as stupid as it was brazenly illegal. Talmadge is by no means intrenched in his dictatorship as was Huey Long. And he has by no means planned out his campaign of financial thuggery. At this moment it looks as though Mr. Talmadge is going to be far too busy in his own state, at least for a while, to play much of a part in the national campaign.

But the publicity which all these dictatorial antics brought him before he got into this jam made him feel that he was enough of a national figure to issue a call for a "Grass Roots Democratic Convention" in Macon, Georgia, for January 29, 1936. Talmadge's co-signer of this call was John Thomas Kirby, a millionaire Texas oil and lumber man, a nominal Democrat, for years a high-pressure tariff lobbyist, thick with the National Republican Committee, and devout disciple of the Liberty League.

Talmadge's contact man with Northern Republican and reactionary forces is Barry Wright, who was Hoover's Georgia campaign manager in 1932 and Talmadge's go-between with the textile manufacturers in the 1934 strike. The more reactionary Republican forces have promised Talmadge that in case of a Republican victory he will be the "Jeffersonian Democrat" in the Cabinet as Secretary of Agriculture. And the Liberty League helped finance the Macon convention with a subsidy of $5,000.

Now who were some of the "dirt farmers" invited to this Grass Roots Convention? One of the leading delegates was W. C. Bradley of Columbus, Georgia, known as Mr. Columbus, chairman of the board of that bulwark of Jeffersonian freedom, the Coco-Cola Company. Mr. Columbus is also president of three-quarters of the banks and half the cotton mills, and is on the boards of all the others in Columbus. Another Jeffersonian Democrat invited was George Lanier of West Point, Georgia, president of the West Point Manufacturing Company, the third largest textile chain in the South. Among the leading "dirt farmers" was also John Barry of Rome, Georgia, the largest hosiery manufacturer in the state, owner of two stove foundries and a notorious open-shopper. Another delegate was H. D. Pollard of Savannah, Georgia, president of the Central of Georgia Railroad Company and the Ocean Steamship Company. Also present was Thomas L. Dixon, author of "The Clansman" and professional Negro-baiter, who addressed the convention in the best spirit of the Klan. And finally there was the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith, organizer of the practically defunct Share Our Wealth movement, who soon after Huey Long's death was sidetracked by the Louisiana machine because of his fantastic notion that he was the inheritor of Huey's mantle. For the rest there were Men of Justice, sheriffs and their deputies, county attorneys, all sorts of small political fry, and a crowd of gaping cracker yokels. Of the 2,500 "delegates" present about 2,350 were Georgians. Talmadge had expected around 10,000 from all over the South.

On every seat of this "convention" lay a copy of the Woman's World. The editor of this rag is a Mrs. James Rogers Wakefield. I called on Mrs. Wakefield. I found her incredibly common, ignorant, and half-tight. From people who know her past I gathered that journalism has not always been Mrs. Wakefield's profession. Much of the filth which appears in this lynch sheet is written in the office of Hugh Howell, the state Democratic chairman and Talmadge's man Friday, whose legal practice is almost entirely confined to what is known throughout the state as the "pardon racket." William Schley Howard, for many years a progressive Congressman and one of the leading criminal lawyers in the South, has some amazing evidence on the pardon ring, of which the two leaders are Hugh Howell and a lawyer named Charles Stewart. Mr. Howell drove me out one Sunday morning to Stone Mountain. On the way we got on the race question. "Do you really mean to say," asked Mr. Howell, "that you don't believe in lynching at any time?"

The "convention" was a total failure. It did not even pretend to organize itself. It cussed out the New Deal, spewed forth race hatred, warned the American people against the "communism" of President Roosevelt, and called the amalgam a "platform." It probably finished Talmadge as a national gadfly. It was significant only as a Northern-financed effort to create regional fascism in the darkest South.

The Liberty League bought a pig in a poke. It will have to wait for a bigger and better demagogue. Huey was right. Talmadge is "too dumb for his ambition." He is, however, a political symptom of the social lesions of our time, especially south of the Mason and Dixon Line.

[This is the second of two articles on Governor Talmadge by Mr. Stolberg. The first appeared last week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

UNDER the heading The Fallacy of Conquest, Nathaniel Peffer recently contributed an admirable article to Harper's Magazine. Dealing with the stupidity of those who believe that a nation can add to its wealth by subjugating native peoples or robbing them of part of their territory, it brings the discussion up to date by taking up directly the case of Italy, Germany, and Japan. Especially valuable is his demolition of the current humbug that we must deal gently with these nations because they must have their "place in the sun," because they are without sufficient colonies, or because their overflowing populations cannot be adequately maintained on the territory they have. Mr. Peffer confirms what some of us have been saying right along—that colonies do not today relieve congested populations. England, the largest colonial power, would gladly export two million workers if it could. The dominions have put up immigration bars against the mother country, and the tropical colonies take only Englishmen of the ruling class. British labor cannot compete with tropical labor.

The biggest humbug of all is the demand of Germany for the return of its colonies, which Hitler recently made a prerequisite for limitation of air armaments in his talks with the British Ambassador at Berlin. Ever since the war, whenever I have visited Germany, I have been assailed by people who asked me why my demand for justice for the Germans did not include the return of their colonies. My first answer was my opposition to any country's governing subject races. My second objection was to the harsh militaristic character of Germany's colonial administration. My third was that Germany did not get anything out of her colonies and that they were not population outlets.

This always brings a roar of dissent, but I have never found that one of my interrogators knew how many Germans were living in German colonies before the World War. The guesses ranged up to 500,000. Actually, as Mr. Peffer points out, there were only 24,000 Germans in the colonies, 22,000 of them in the 900,000 square miles of their African territory. Mr. Peffer also shows conclusively that possession of colonies no longer guarantees enjoyment of the economic perquisites thereof, for trade no longer follows the flag—Japan, as he points out, is getting the trade of England in India, the Malay Peninsula, and elsewhere. Again, he rightly stresses that "possession of a colony grants prior right but not monopoly. . . . Great Britain controls the rubber of Malaya, but it had to come to terms with American manufacturers." He does concede that expansion to secure access to raw materials "still has a certain validity. . . . Possession of a colony does give prior rights to such natural resources and at least yields a profit from their exploitation." But that is all the profit that the whole colonial business gives to conquerors and exploiters; "it does not solve the fundamental economic problems of a country." Even that profit can quickly disappear if there is charged against the colony the cost of administering and policing it and its share of the cost and maintenance of the cruisers and battleships needed to "protect" it in war time.

In the case of Italy and Ethiopia the situation is clear. There are no great supplies of raw materials in Ethiopia. There are indications of diamonds and gold, but not sufficient to warrant any serious exploration in search of them. There is no coal, no genuine sign of oil. Even if there were raw materials, the cost of getting them out would be prohibitive. The current jest that if there had been wealth in Ethiopia, England would have stolen it years ago is altogether justified. As to the boast of an Italian general on taking Adowa that there would be a million Italians settled there within ten years, that is absolutely absurd; there are only 4,283 Europeans in Eritrea, which has been Italian territory for fifty years. Japan stole Formosa, Korea, half of Sakhalin, and all southern Manchuria, but its overflowing population will not go to those territories, and despite all our alarmists they have gone to the Philippines in far smaller numbers than the Chinese, though there has been no bar to their entrance. People accustomed to one kind of climate are not eager to go to a different one, and farmers who would emigrate need capital, which farmers today do not have.

There is a bait for dictators in the man-power of colonies. Is not that one of the major objectives of Mussolini in Abyssinia? France would cling to its colonies for that reason even if they all put it deeply in the red. Press reports say that there are more French colonial troops garrisoned in France than ever before. The French armies would probably have collapsed early in 1917, or sooner, if it had not been for the colored troops and the Indo-Chinese work battalions. Today, with its falling man-power, France needs those colored troops more than ever, and I have seen apparently reliable statements that the government is steadily building up black reserves in Africa. Mussolini, as everyone knows, dreams of other than African conquests. What a help it would be if he could throw, in addition to his Askaris, let us say 300,000 well-trained Ethiopians on to a European battlefield! They could no more protest than can the French colonial troops, or could the hapless Indian troops in 1914 when England threw them into the holocaust that concerned them not at all. As long as war continues I fear we shall have the imperialist powers clinging to their colonies in order to squeeze out every black soldier that they can.

BROUN'S PAGE

MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN. A picket line of twelve hundred men and women swung round the plant of Hearst's Wisconsin News, and a visiting guildsman from New York rubbed his eyes and said, "By golly, how we've grown!" He remembered little meetings of ten or twelve in New York less than three years ago, and as the marchers shouted, "Don't read the Wisconsin News!" he was reminded of the fact that in the beginning everybody had said, "Of course, we won't ever be able to strike. The best we can do is to persuade the publishers."

To be sure, the answer to that state of mind has already been given in Newark and in Harlem. But this time the struggle is on against a Hearst paper. Nobody can accuse the newspaper men and women any more of picking out the weaklings. Naturally only a small percentage of the encircling regiment around the Wisconsin News was made up of reporters, copy readers, or photographers. This was the voice of labor making common cause with a group somewhat inappropriately known as "white-collar" workers.

Mr. Hearst has said frequently that the essential quality in reporters is initiative. Certainly the newspaper men and women of the Wisconsin News have taken him at his word. Never before have reporters shown the same enterprise that they are displaying now in Milwaukee. Courage is an essential quality in any finder of facts. The boys and girls of the staff have displayed that in abundance. It was twenty below zero a few days ago, but the picket line was maintained. They had to do it in fifteen-minute shifts because the strikers are going to need their fingers and their ears when they get back on their jobs. Indeed, they need them now. In this fight for recognition the strikers are probably working as hard as they ever did in their lives. They have a world to gain, not only for themselves and other newspaper men and women, but for the craft itself. It would not be surprising if twenty years from now the Wisconsin News strike should be recognized as one of labor's truly decisive battles.

Of course it would be extremely useful to have that recognized right now. This is no private fight. This is a struggle for the right to organize and bargain collectively. It is being waged against William Randolph Hearst. Here is a chance for those who oppose Hearst labor policies to enlist for duration. I don't see how anybody can be neutral. Either you believe in the union movement or you think that hours and wages should be left wholly to the discretion and the bounty of the employer. Which side are you on? If you want to help the cause of organization—and I honestly think the guild has a right to say that it is battling for the labor movement in general—write to the American Newspaper Guild, 49 West Forty-fifth Street, New York. If this isn't Armageddon, it will do for the season of 1936 at any rate.

Nobody can or will make greater sacrifices than the strikers themselves. The seven o'clock picket shift came into headquarters an hour later. One of the girls was making the coffee. "You know," she said, "I think next week I'm going to ask for a few days on a later shift. Bobby's old enough now to dress himself, but I sort of hate to have him going off to school without his breakfast."

It seems to me that among other faults William Randolph Hearst isn't a very good business man. If you were running a paper what kind of staff would you want to have? Would you choose men and women who had the courage and the intelligence to organize as the Milwaukee Guild has done, or would you prefer a terrified staff afraid to speak its mind? Let's assume that this is one of those twenty-below-zero mornings. Which fellow seems to you the better material for newspaper work—the reporter with the sign "Join the Guild" who is going up stream against the wind, or the strike-breaker self-consciously darting into the nice warm office? A staff of courage and of confidence is essential to any successful paper. You can't put out anything of interest from a city room whose every inmate shudders at the sight of rat poison.

And as for the romance and glamor of the newspaper business, a guildsman from New York who has been familiar with other beverages tells me that undoubtedly the best drink of all is the coffee that you get at eight a. m. in strike headquarters after your spell on the picket line. And I saw another guildsman from New York who to my certain knowledge has not walked two hundred yards in the last twenty years marching one mile in the strike parade because at the end of the journey he would have "an opportunity to hear distinguished speakers." And it did thrill him to hear Mrs. Victor Berger call for a united front of all workers in Milwaukee in the struggle against the News.

I think it is a battle deserving the attention of the country. The newspapers print very little. Perhaps they feel it isn't news. Of course it isn't news if a Hearst executive cleans out a staff just to show that he has authority. It isn't news when Hearst or any other publisher fires a man or woman with scant notice or none at all after twenty years. It isn't news when the hard-won forty-hour, five-day week goes back to six days and an indefinite number of hours. But isn't it news when the guild says, "Hold on, Hearst, we don't like your salaries or your hours on this paper in Milwaukee?"

There stands a great castle at San Simeon and in it dwells a potentate, and when he speaks whoever is within the sound of his voice says, "Yes," or "Quite so," or "How right you are," or "I'll do it immediately." This has gone on for fifty years, and so it is news, and good news, too, that the men and women of the Wisconsin News have lifted up their voices and answered, "No. Not on your life. Not till our picket line freezes over."

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

GATEWAY TO VEBLEN'S WORLD

BY MAX LERNER

WESLEY MITCHELL'S anthology of Veblen's writings* reminds us, if we needed to be reminded, that Veblen has already become a classic. In this Norskie farm boy who grew up to be a college professor America has produced its most considerable and most acid intelligence in the realm of social thought. In these lumbering six-syllabled sentences, with their devastating understatement and their poisonous indirections, America has produced a unique literary manner. In this man at once fierce and desperately shy, rooted in the soil like a giant in the earth and yet wandering nomadically from one university to another, turning his "swift wit and slow irony" on you so that you recoiled in fear, mumbling his lectures incoherently yet gathering disciples wherever he went—in this curious personality America has produced one of its complex and legendary figures. The five hundred pages selected from his twelve books and the definitive essay on Veblen by the editor constitute a gateway to Veblen's world.

What sort of world is it? Its outlines have the essential unity of any great theoretical system. It is a fluid unity however—not, like that of Marx or Kant or Herbert Spencer, one in which all the pieces fit, or can be made to fit, together, but rather a Gestalt that comes into being after you have soaked yourself in Veblen's writing and approached with him, by roughly the same paths, one problem after another. For there can be no doubt that Veblen is repetitious to the point of despair. He traverses and retraverses the same ground, from the "Theory of the Leisure Class" in 1899 to "Absentee Ownership" in 1923. In a sense the core of his entire body of thought can be found in his early essays and his first book. The rest was elaboration, sharpening, strengthening.

Partly this is to be accounted for by the fact that Veblen waited until he was forty before he wrote his first book. When he first flashed through the American heavens he was a meteor already fully formed, with all his strength and brilliance gathered and tightly knit. Partly also it is to be accounted for by the fact that Veblen lived so secluded a life that he was able to create an intellectual world with unmistakable features of its own. It has its own landscape, its own heaven and earth, its own seasonal moods, its own mythology and demonology. He buried himself in his reading and his brooding. He read the economists, the anthropologists, the socialists—and the nineteen-volume Report of the Industrial Commission. While Veblen knew America and seemed able to breathe a sense of America into his pores, he lived insulated against its passing fashions and follies. His greatest generalizations were brilliant intuitions or uncompromising deductions from daring premises. The unity that his thought has is a unity not so much of structure as of mood and method.

Since Veblen does not have a "system," the body of his thought defies any easy analysis. The key idea is generally held to be the antithesis Veblen finds between industry and business—the one concerned with satisfying human needs, the other with creating artificial pecuniary values. Industry is with Veblen a continuing evolutionary process, starting with the savage state of the industrial arts and coming to its present climax in the modern machine technology. Business is the art of getting something for nothing—also an evolutionary process, starting with the predatory barbarism that followed the peaceful savage state and ending with present-day corporation finance and the techniques of the holding company. Industry and business are the economic forces operating in a psychological medium—in a world of instinct and habit. The deep unrests in our life now arise from the fact that the habituations of the industrial process, based on the instinct of workmanship and the parental bent, are moving ever farther away from the "idiot" institutions of our society maintained by the vested interests. When the gap has become so great that it has strained the limits of tolerance of the engineers and the workers, we may expect a change. Meanwhile there is still a considerable social lag which limits "the prospects of an overturn."

Thus, despite Veblen's delvings into neolithic times and his wanderings in the morass of instinct psychology, there is a Veblen who has meaning for today. To vary somewhat the title of one of Joseph Wood Krutch's essays: he belongs to the present. And he belongs to the present for the reason that he has so searchingly explored the past and analyzed the economic and psychological roots of our modern being. I have pointed out elsewhere that there are two Veblens rather than one. There is Veblen the liberal, with his fetish of disinterestedness, his awareness of his own preconceptions, his lingering irony, his Olympian detachment from the real struggles of a real America. This is the Veblen who offered, and still offers, consolation to those unwilling to take sides in the planetary turmoil of an era of finance capitalism, yet anxious to liberate themselves from the values of a leisure-class society. There is also the second and more revolutionary Veblen, implicit in the first from the very beginning, yet emerging with ever greater clarity after the outbreak of the war and the coming of peace. This was the Veblen who began to think in terms of the collapse of a decaying world and the seizure of a power. My only quarrel, if I have one, with Mr.

*"What Veblen Taught." Edited by Wesley C. Mitchell. The Viking Press. $3.

Mitchell's anthology is that he overvalues the interest that the earlier Veblen—especially Veblen the destroyer of the idols of classical and hedonist economics—has for us, and undervalues the real interest of our generation in Veblen the revolutionary thinker.

Apply Veblen to the issues that confront us today and you get some notion of his continuing vitality even for a world that is no longer agitated by Darwin and Spencer. In a sense Veblen was part of the movement of populist thought in the first decade of this century and therefore part of the progressive tradition in America. Yet in a curious way he seems completely out of place amid the writings of the progressive era, at once strident and indecisive. By the same token his approach to the problems of this generation would be quite different from that of the other progressives and radicals. He would not so much rail at the patrioteers and the Liberty League as calmly destroy them by detached analysis of how closely their mental temper corresponds to that of dementia praecox. He would seek the roots of fascism not only in the immediate struggle for power but more searchingly in the entire history of the predatory barbarian tradition. He would understand why it is that middle-class patterns of ideas still linger sufficiently in the minds even of our workmen to make a united labor party a thing of long-run rather than of immediate concern, and he would stress the peculiar need for an alliance between the workers and the technicians. On the issue of neutrality and the war he would get away from the Nye hearings sufficiently to analyze the character of the dynastic state under capitalism and its compelling urge toward war. And when he came to the Supreme Court he would probably analyze it not so much as a judicial agency as in terms of its economic utility or wastefulness, much as he did in his unparalleled economic evaluation of the churches, which may be found in a long footnote in "Absentee Ownership." I am sorry that Mr. Mitchell did not find a place for this passage, which represents Veblen at his maddest and best.

None the less, most of the famous Veblen passages are in this book, and one comes upon them with a delight that can be explained only by the fact that Veblen is stylist as well as thinker. You will often have someone come up to you in an exasperated sort of way and ask why it is that Veblen is so unintelligible. The answer is that he is not. The manner of his writing is one that was beautifully calculated to achieve the purpose of his thought. He has, to be sure, a vocabulary of his own, but it is not merely an erratic vocabulary. Such phrases as "conspicuous waste," "absentee ownership," "vested interests," "leisure class," "invidious distinction," "calculable future," have worked themselves into the texture of our own vocabulary in a way that shows the enduring appeal of Veblen's writing. He had to create a new style because he was dealing with a range of ideas which completely cut under the prevailing range of ideas in America. The important thing about his style is that his entire intellectual method, with its satire and its detachment and its indirection, is implicit in it. Any anthology of American prose in the future and any history of American literature will ignore Veblen at its peril.

BOOKS

Actors, Apologists, and a Critic

THE HOOVER ADMINISTRATION: A DOCUMENTED NARRATIVE. By William Starr Myers and Walter H. Newton. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

LIBERALISM FIGHTS ON. By Odgen L. Mills. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

THE RAINBOW. By Donald R. Richberg. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

INTERPRETATIONS: 1933-1935. By Walter Lippmann. Edited by Allan Nevins. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IN A famous passage Lord Macaulay declared that "almost every intellectual employment has a tendency to produce some intellectual malady. Biographers, translators, editors—all, in short, who employ themselves in illustrating the lives or the writings of others—are peculiarly exposed to the Lucretian or Boswellian, or disease of admiration." Macaulay was talking about a biographer whose subject was dead. Apparently the disease can be more virulent when the apologist has known a public man and has been spoken to kindly by him. This may explain but it certainly does not excuse the volume which bears the names of Mr. Myers (Princeton professor of politics) and Mr. Newton (former member of Congress and secretary to President Hoover).

So far as content and contentment go, the volume could bear the imprint of Mr. Hoover's pre-convention campaign committee. The thesis is that "almost wholly through the battles fought by President Hoover and his associates" the country successfully weathered five economic crises. The first was the result of the stock-market crash of the autumn of 1929 (not, be it noted, that the stock-market crash was rather itself a "result"). The second crisis was caused by the central European banking situation of June, 1931; the third was England's abandonment of the gold standard in September of that year; the fourth was the withdrawal of gold from the United States in February, 1932; and the fifth was "the breakdown of public confidence due to obstruction in Congress in June, 1932." The country was "five times turned back from" these crises. Recovery was under way, but it stopped with the election of November, 1932, because of fears of "a prospective change in politics and especially of a prospective devaluation of the dollar." Then came "the actual panic in February, 1933, brought about by the collapse of the banks, which certainly was caused in large part by the approach of the New Deal." Since the authors stop with Mr. Hoover's departure from the White House, they are not compelled to explain the remarkable rehabilitation of public confidence which synchronized with the measures that the new Administration took to implement its "new deal," and they apparently are not aware of or decided to ignore the resulting havoc to their logic.

Such an argument is not worth traversing. Hence the book will be useful chiefly as an accessible repository of certain documents and as furnishing a running account of Mr. Hoover's activities during his Administration. But what can one think of a work which purports to deal with this Administration and which contains only two references to the Hawley-Smoot tariff, both in Presidential speeches that are reprinted? Another example of omission is the account of the President-elect's unwillingness to cooperate with Mr. Hoover on war

PAUL de KRUIF'S WHY KEEP THEM ALIVE?

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MICROBE HUNTERS,"

"MEN AGAINST DEATH," etc.

A Glimpse at the Table of Contents

1. WHY SHOULD THEY DIE? —In "Microbe Hunters," "Men Against Death," "Hunger Fighters," Paul de Kruif told vast numbers of Americans of the battles which science was winning for them against disease and death. They need not die—some of them.
2. DISCOVERY THAT CHILDREN ARE FORGOTTEN—Every year, de Kruif found, over 1,100,000 American children die preventable deaths.
3. DISCOVERY THAT IT'S DOLLARS OR CHILDREN —But it would cost money to save over a million lives. On the one hand, the marvels of science, on the other the mothers and fathers who can't afford to buy it. Is it dollars or children?
4. THE POWER OF SCIENCE WITHOUT MONEY —The law of the survival of the fittest would be a fine rule to live by if you really knew who was fit to survive. Is having enough money the answer?
5. THE PEOPLE'S DEATH-FIGHT —When people get excited, they can do something. Look at the story of Detroit and its fight against tuberculosis.
6. DROUTH IS A BLESSING —Is it really? Can scarcity ever produce plenty?
7. WHO OWNS OUR SCIENCE?—From the evidence in this book, there is only one answer.
8. OBSERVATION OF THE CHILDREN OF THE SHADOW—Some stories of the mass murder of children in typical American cities.
9. SHOULD CHILDREN EAT? —Or should milk be thrown away to keep prices up? There never has been enough milk for American children.
10. CHILDREN CAN LIVE—The story of the Dionne quintuplets. They had only one chance in a billion to live when they were born. Science —and money—made that chance a reality.

"Every decent man and woman in the world should get de Kruif's message—if they can. This book tells what is the matter with the world in a new way. And it is no bore: it would fascinate our vigilantes, for example!"

—Lincoln Steffens.

"If you have an iota of social consciousness, a jot of regard for children, or a tittle of interest in public (your) health, you will read, and read avidly, WHY KEEP THEM ALIVE?"

—United Press.

Just out, $3.00

MOSCOW REHEARSALS

by Norris Houghton

Introduction by

Lee Simonson

The first book in English in ten years on actual methods of production in the Soviet theatre, today the most stimulating theatre in the world. Based on the author's several months' study in Moscow, both in the theatre and in the rehearsal room, it is a carefully detailed story of why and how the Soviet Theatre produces such astonishing results. A fascinating and useful book, it contains a thousand details, dozens of personalities, and many unusual photographs of productions. 291 pp., illustrated, $2.75.

DISCOVERIES OF A MUSIC CRITIC

by Paul Rosenfeld

author of Musical Portraits

Forty chapters on musical subjects, ranging from the days of the Court Masques to Chavez. Readers will be particularly interested in the fresh definitive treatments of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, etc., as well as by the reasoned comments on modern American operas, on such modern figures as Harris, Copland, Stravinsky, Shostakovich, etc. 402 pp., $3.50.

HARCOURT, BRACE
AND COMPANY

383 MADISON AVENUE,
NEW YORK

debts during the interregnum between election and inauguration. That is criticized, but there is no suggestion that President Hoover invited coolness by publishing his motivé telegram of invitation. The jittery feeling with which Mr. Roosevelt and his advisers approached the conference may have been unjustified—there was no possible way that the repudiated President could put them at a political disadvantage—but the fact nevertheless is that the then occupant of the White House was as much to blame for the failure to collaborate as the then occupant of the Executive Mansion at Albany.

The past concerns Ogden Mills much less than does the future. In titling his book he labels himself a "liberal" and thus will make readers who have similarly thought of themselves wonder whether they must not move to the left. Although he may be a new convert, Mr. Mills is faithful to one liberal tenet—he is always vague. His "liberalism" makes him a believer in "free government, free enterprise, and free men." The people and not the state must be sovereign. Free enterprise means that "the government lays down the rules and acts as umpire" for the competitive capitalist system, "but does not enter the game or direct the play." Mr. Mills does not quarrel "with the professed aims of the New Dealers." Everyone would "like to do away with injustice . . . and to provide a more abundant life for all." Rarely does Mr. Mills become concrete. He believes that "a wide distribution of property is the greatest safeguard of a free society," but he does not hint at a tax program or any other device to realize his ideal. "Liberalism fights on" but doesn't know where it is going.

A liberal of long standing is probably the way Mr. Richberg thinks of himself. He has been the principal office-holder of the present Administration, and he has written a pièce justificative which does little more than prove, unnecessarily, that Mr. Richberg is a pleasant gentleman. Urbanity has its uses. But in this book urbanity becomes namby-pambyness. Mr. Richberg, who has had wider experience than anyone else in this Administration, is so polite and reticent that he tells no story. The colors of his book are as faint as they are in most rainbows. He is most detailed in his discussion of the labor section—7-a—of the Recovery Act, but even here, though Mr. Richberg was its principal draftsman, there is still some doubt as to what the provision was intended to mean. The most clear-cut opinion of the book is that unless the government is prepared to empower its labor boards to go the whole distance, it had better confine their powers to those of mediation and conciliation. Mr. Richberg accepts some of the responsibility for the decision to delay a test of the constitutionality of the statute, but ignores its tragic unwisdom. The "problem of building up the legal division" of the National Recovery Administration is described as "a secondary obligation." That, clearly, was one of the reasons why the National Recovery Administration came the cropper that it did, and the reason was unrelieved by the fact that while Mr. Richberg devoted his energies to non-legal matters, the second in command and some of his associates were able lawyers.

It is probably no longer true that Walter Lippmann is the indispensable matutinal companion of the clubwoman's coffee, but he is still our most widely read journalistic expositor of public questions. In three years he wrote five hundred pieces. Allan Nevins has selected, abbreviated, and topically arranged one hundred and fifty of them. The result is an absence of the tergiversations sometimes commented on by his daily readers and further evidence of Mr. Lippmann's flair for the calm and felicitous explanation of the issues underlying public questions. Not the least interesting aspect of the collection is the index which it offers of the tremendous range of the Roosevelt experiments. They have come so thick and fast that the trees have obscured the woods. That, it would appear, has been the case for some of those who in the Administration have excogitated and implemented policy. For those outside the Administration the sweep has been so rapid that before critics have had time adequately to consider a matter in relation to what has preceded or is likely to follow it, some new and seemingly more important problem clamors for attention. These "interpretations" will be useful for those who wish to reorientate themselves.

LINDSAY ROGERS

God Wot

NO VILLAIN NEED BE. By Vardis Fisher. Doubleday, Doran and Company and The Caxton Printers, Caldwell, Idaho. $2.50.

THIS is the end of Mr. Fisher's tetralogy, all four members of which bear titles taken from five lines by George Meredith:

'Tis morning: but no morning can restore
What we have forfeited. I see no sin:
The wrong is mixed. In tragic life, God wot,
No villain need be! Passions spin the plot:
We are betrayed by what is false within.

"In Tragic Life" started the hero, Vridar Hunter, on his highly neurotic career as a boy in primitive Idaho; "Passions Spin the Plot" took him part way through college and through his marriage to Nelo Doole; "We Are Betrayed" carried the painful tale of their relationship to its logical conclusion in her suicide at Chicago; and now "No Villain Need Be" shows Vridar trying to understand himself in Chicago, in Baltimore, in New York, in Europe, and finally in Idaho again. We are left with implications that Vridar has succeeded in understanding himself and that he is therefore equipped to write the one "honest" novel ever written. That novel, presumably, is "In Tragic Life"; for Vridar Hunter is none other than Vardis Fisher, who like Proust has told in a series of volumes how he got ready to write the first one, and who like no one but himself is haunted by the notion that novels are good in proportion as they respond to his personal cries for the truth—the whole truth, and nothing more.

The whole truth, judging by the way Mr. Fisher's tetralogy has run steadily and disastrously downhill, is not enough, and perhaps it is not what we want at all. Mr. Fisher, if he is as much like Mr. Hunter as I take him to be, would snort at this and demand who "we" are; whether, for instance, we aren't the whole caboodle of festering hypocrites who poison earth's air with our pitiful, evasive lies. But it is very simple. We are the people who want the novels we read to be as good as possible, and who have discovered how much truth there is in the almost forgotten definition of a good story-teller as a good liar. He is at any rate, we think, an artist of some kind, and as an artist he must long ago have learned a certain lesson, namely, that the depths he would explore lie neither in himself nor in his story but in the two of them together—each respectful of the other because neither can live alone. Mr. Fisher has obviously thought a great deal about himself, but he has thought too little about himself as an artist. He has been too proud to study the distinction between veracity and verity, between honesty and truth; or, in technical language, between autobiography and fiction.

The autobiographical novel is never good when it signs itself as such. As soon as we perceive that its reference is to something outside itself, something which, whether confessed or unconfessed, cannot be explained because it is the author's own mind and life, we cease to credit what we read. Someone is speaking who has no right to speak, and he is so far from telling the story's truth as merely to be expressing himself. His private voice, however honest it may be, sounds thin and false after those tones which art manages at its best or even at its second best to utter. Art is the voice of life; which is another way of saying that Mr. Fisher has had less to tell us as he has staggered nearer to the present stage of his existence. Vridar's stout consciousness that the book he is to write will speak the whole truth about Vridar is a warning of the literary weakness to come. The old saying that an author writes best about himself needs to be accompanied by one important qualification: he had better not know that he does, or if he knows, he had better try not to. Somerset Maugham, who in "Of Human Bondage" wrote an autobiographical novel without letting it be felt as such, has suffered in his later books from a too great success at self-suppression. His stories now need him as badly as Mr. Fisher needs a story. Mr. Fisher like Thomas Wolfe has been falling headlong ever since he got away from that portion of his childhood which makes the best because the most imaginative portion of any autobiography. The tragic fact about both authors is that they have only themselves to blame. No villain need be, God wot; but there he stands anyway, and he is dressed in self-pity.

I have neglected to say how beautiful and powerful "In Tragic Life" was and is, and how terrible in its unremitting analysis of a boy's most secret agonies. The next two novels, though they lost something as we realized their narrower nature, still held up because of Nelo's presence in them. Not only was she interesting in herself; by her resistance to Vridar she objectified him and lent him outline. Without her in this fourth book, and with a successor, Athene, who is unable to preserve the outline, he goes quite literally to pieces. Mr. Fisher believes that Vridar finds himself because he arrives at certain conclusions which are in agreement with his own. The fact that these must be stated, however, in letters to friends, in long New York conversations, and in a European travel journal is the clearest sign that the character for whom they might have been true has ceased to exist. He was lost in Mr. Fisher.

MARK VAN DOREN

"Creature of Air and Flame"

VOLTAIRE. By Henry Noel Brailsford. Henry Holt and Company. $1.25.

THIS latest study of Voltaire, from the pen of Henry Noel Brailsford, is a sketch of the life of the philosophe written in Mr. Brailsford's best manner: it has charm of style, critical insight, and, above all, a full understanding of the liberal temper that was Voltaire. Though brief, the book gives a fairly adequate idea of Voltaire as "an event" in human history, and admirably fulfils the purpose of the Home University Library.

Voltaire's numerous works, so widely read in his day, now gather dust in library shelves, always excepting that inimitable satire "Candide." Indeed, it may be truthfully said that Voltaire is often quoted but seldom read. Yet who touches French prose today touches Voltaire. If he created no masterpiece he did succeed in creating a literary style the influence of which has been far greater than many a masterpiece of literature. But Vol-

HOW TO UNDERSTAND

The ideas, teachings and beliefs of America's most original social thinker

Thorstein VEBLEN

We all know ABOUT Veblen, we have heard his theories quoted and discussed. Now we can have
THE ESSENCE OF VEBLENISM in one volume of his most important writings. This volume is for those who wish to refresh their knowledge of Veblen's teachings, for those who want to grasp his major contributions, and for those who do not yet know Veblen. Here, clearly, forcefully, are his leading ideas: criticisms of orthodox economics in the light of other sciences; satiric studies of the leisure class; analyses of the business man and the engineer, of Europe's past and America's future, etc. A complete expression of the man who was the Darwin of social evolution.

He wrote yesterday—for today and tomorrow. He understood over-production before America had to "plow-under." He predicted the World War when Europe slumbered. He anticipated the Technocrats by two decades. His contributions to social science are becoming increasingly important. Learn about him now, in selections from his own works. Use the coupon below.

WHAT VEBLEN TAUGHT

Edited by
WESLEY C. MITCHELL

ORDER YOUR COPY TODAY

SEND NO MONEY. Just mail the coupon. When the postman brings your copy pay him the $3 purchase price plus a few cents postage. GUARANTEE: If not completely satisfied, return the book to us within five days and your money will be refunded.

MAIL THIS COUPON NOW

THE VIKING PRESS

18 E. 48th St., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Please send me copies of What Veblen Taught at $3.00. ☐ Send C.O.D. I will pay the postman, plus a few cents postage. ☐ Check or money order enclosed. Send prepaid.

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

N-3-11

taire was no mere literary man. To the great problems of his day he brought, not a philosophic system of formulas and doctrines, but an attitude of mind which, he believed, would ultimately solve the problems of mankind. And this attitude may be best described by the word "toleration." However, like Voltaire's "simple" style, his simple solution was the outcome of a sophistication that plumbed the very depth of worldly wisdom, and of a passionate love of mankind that overflowed the boundaries of race, of faith, of opinion, of class, and of sex.

What was "toleration"? Behind that word was an interpretation of society and a philosophy of human nature that was distinctively Voltairean. Despite his frequent cynicism Voltaire was convinced that human nature was essentially good and kind. He declared that nature gave to man "no more weapons than she gave to pigeons and to rabbits"; and that man becomes wicked only "as he becomes sick." His explanation of the glaring contradiction between an evil society and the essential goodness of human nature was that, from the very dawn of history, man has been bewitched by an evil spirit, revealed religion. As a consequence man's natural goodness and common sense were atrophied, and he became a helpless tool of designing men who profited from the evil system. As long as people believed in absurdities, Voltaire maintained, they would always be moved to commit outrages.

Toleration alone would destroy such absurdities. In the religious field it would permit competing sects and faiths. It would permit free-thinkers to make successful raids on the faithful, thereby lessening the numbers and influence of the latter. In the secular field toleration would establish freedom of speech, from which would flow the countless blessings of increase of knowledge and greater enlightenment. Toleration would destroy political tyranny either through parliamentary opposition or through an enlightened monarch. It would promote prosperity by abolishing restrictions on labor and capital imposed by monopolies.

In the war for toleration Voltaire devised a new weapon which he wielded with such terrific effect that his opponents were left mute and helpless. And this new weapon was "satire of sincerity." The troubles of the world are due not only to the wicked but even more to those sincere, honest people who are so fanatical in their beliefs that they are willing to go to any length to carry them out. Hypocrites are not nearly so dangerous as fanatics. The former may be brought over to the "side of the angels" by appeals to self-interest, but fanatics are beyond reason, beyond fear, beyond self-interest, beyond mercy. From time immemorial satirists had used ridicule to expose hypocrisy, implying that if people were only sincere in their professions and honest in their conduct all would be well. This was the method of the two great satirists who preceded Voltaire, Molière and Erasmus. Voltaire's method was to admit fully the sincerity and good faith of his opponents, and then pour ridicule on what they believed. The atrocities related by Candide are committed by sincere men acting from secular as well as from religious motives, by Bulgarian patriots and English admirals no less than by Portuguese Inquisitors and Turkish Mohammedans.

The style of Voltaire was marvelously fashioned to suit its chief function of being a weapon of attack against the social order. The reader smiles his way through pages of airy, sparkling narrative and cynical comment, quite unaware that the author has any object other than to amuse him. Then he becomes aware that something is burning inside of him, and before long he is aflame with indignation at the senseless cruelty of man's inhumanity to man. A sentence, a phrase cunningly inserted in a smiling paragraph, or a home thrust given at the end of a tale insinuates the terrible implication that the real trouble is not that this man is a fool and that one a knave, but that the entire social order is a conspiracy against reason and humanity. The tale in "Candide" of a Negro slave in Surinam is a good illustration of Voltaire's method. The slave lacked a left leg and right hand. He explains to Candide how he came to be crippled in this manner. "If we should chance to have one of our fingers caught in the machinery of the sugar factory in which we work they cut off our hand; if we attempt to escape, they cut off one of our legs; and I was unlucky enough to be guilty of both of these offenses." And then comes the home thrust. "This is the price at which you eat sugar in Europe."

This "creature of air and flame," as Taine characterized Voltaire, captured the imagination of Europe as no literary man had done before him or has since. However, once the battle for religious toleration and intellectual freedom was won, Voltaire became a tradition instead of a battle cry.

The appearance of Mr. Brailsford's book is no accident. It is one of a number of books which have recently appeared on the philosophes of the eighteenth century, indicating a revival of interest in the origins of liberalism. And the reason is not far to seek. Many are listening intently to the maddening beat of the tom-tom of political fanaticism, which in some lands has already drowned out the silvery laughter of the mind.

J. SALWYN SCHAPIRO

Minority Report

IN DUBIOUS BATTLE. By John Steinbeck. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

THE surface action of John Steinbeck's new book, which has already been acclaimed as a topnotch proletarian novel, moves about a strike in the California apple-picking country. A group of itinerant workers, dispirited and disorganized, are bullied, cajoled, and harangued by two Communist organizers into a sort of solidarity which enables them to fight a bitter battle for better wages and better conditions. The incidents of the strike are, of course, dramatic: murder, kidnapping, and arson scar its progress. Nevertheless, the novel which Mr. Steinbeck has woven about the events in Torgas Valley is, in an odd way, academic, wooden, inert. Mr. Steinbeck's novel is no strike drama but a kind of interior monologue on the part of the author about the technique of strikes in general. This interior monologue is not presented brazenly as such; rather, it is couched in the form of a Socratic dialogue between the two organizers—Mac, the elder, seasoned in party work, and Jim, the green recruit to the Communist Party, who is being initiated into its methods. Other characters join the conversation with occasional observations of their own; of these, London, the itinerant worker, the natural leader of men, and Dr. Burton, the philosophic, disillusioned observer of men, have the most to say. Almost the whole novel is in dialogue form. The dramatic events, the small, separate climaxes of the strike, take place for the most part off stage, and are reported to the conversationalists, as in the Greek drama, by a breathless observer.

It is quite possible that a successful proletarian novel could be written according to this classic scheme; but I submit, in this minority report, that Mr. Steinbeck was not the man to write it. If a revolutionary general with a talent for prose—say Trotsky—had cast his reflections upon the technique of class warfare into the form of a novel, though they would fall more naturally, as did Caesar's, into the form of a memoir, the results might have been exciting. Caesar—and doubtless Trotsky—had something to say about the curious and wonderful behavior of embattled human beings; Mr. Steinbeck, for all his long and frequently pompous verbal exchanges, offers only a few, rather childish, often reiterated generalizations.

Mr. Steinbeck may be a natural story-teller; but he is certainly no philosopher, sociologist, or strike tactician. Mr. Steinbeck, for instance, is interested in crowds. Men in a crowd, he declares over and over again, behave differently from men by themselves. How a crowd is different, why a crowd is different, he cannot say; he is content to assert at great length that a crowd likes the sight of a little blood, that a crowd is certainly different, and no more. That the legitimately dramatic incidents of the strike should be subordinated to such infantile verbalizations is unfortunate. The reader who is not allowed to see the vigilantes burning a barn or the kidnapping of Doc Burton, and who is not given adequate, intellectual compensation for the loss, has every right to be annoyed. In several unpretentious scenes Mr. Steinbeck shows how well he can report the behavior of men dealing with simple, material things. His picture of two men eating hamburgers, for example, gives a suggestion of what this strike novel might have been like had he confined himself to the facts and restrained himself from ponderous comment upon them. For the most part, however, the author and his characters remind one of those tedious persons who in the theater indefatigably chat through the climaxes of the play, and whose vocal efforts have nothing to recommend them but their loudness. MARY MC CARTHY

Shorter Notices

THE BALCONY. By Adrian Bell. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

A certain similarity of purpose has helped to link the name of Proust with this bemused little memoir, but Mr. Bell is not likely to benefit by such a comparison. It is clear that Mr. Bell has derived from Proust something more palpable than delight alone, and that, after a fashion, he too is concerned with the mystery that follows in the path of the dipped madeleine. However, it becomes a little absurd to impose Proustian touchstones upon a chronicle dedicated so obviously to trance and nostalgia rather than an integrated analysis of "things past." "The Balcony" is poeticized autobiography, with perhaps equal parts of poetry and autobiography. The fact that it confines itself to childhood alone may in itself be sufficient to suggest the mood of unhurried retrospect in which it is conceived and the andante temper of the writing as a whole. Mr. Bell leaves little to be desired in the way of stylistic ingratiation; but he hews to the turn of a phrase rather than the line of an idea, and in so doing is as likely as not to substitute rhapsody for experience. It is often difficult to trace the growing human lineaments beneath the façade of rhetoric. Moreover, his similes are at times touched by a preciousness not only enfeebling in itself but false to the child mind as well. When, for example, we find the young child likening the movement of a swan to a "melody through the vibrations of music," we are inclined to suspect Mr. Bell of a confusion of focus here. With less sophistication of ornament, he would have achieved a more credible compromise: his first snowfall, with the countryside "iced like a party-cake," and his grown-ups, "all stiff with clothes," are exactly as they should be, and instantaneously clear. Their rightness derives from the fact that they are literal transcriptions of phenomena—and this is not an unktion to be laid to the book as a whole.

PERSONAL:

What price did you have to pay to adjust yourself to the world?

Read

HOMAGE TO BLENHOLT

By DANIEL FUCHS

Author of "SUMMER IN WILLIAMSBURG"

"A shattering experience . . . staggering and terrifying . . . The date of Fuchs's next novel should appear in red on the calendar."—STANLEY YOUNG in the N. Y. Times.

$2.50 • At All Bookstores • Vanguard

424 Madison Ave., N. Y.

SAFEGUARD PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL

Bank credit deflected from production of goods and employment of labor by recurrently inflating ground rent and heavy taxation.—Credit thus piles up abnormally.—Interest rates fall and credit goes into stock speculation.—Real issue today is productive capitalism vs. finance capitalism.—Can be dealt with only by transferring taxation from industry and improvements to ground values.—No exploitation of labor by capital in absence of ground monopoly.

Minneapolis Tribune: "A sensible suggestion at a time when big business and small business as well is crying for relief from heavy taxation. . . . Seems to fit the picture of what industry needs today."

A new approach to the business problem, by LOUIS WALLIS, author of "The Struggle for Justice" and other volumes dealing with economic forces in world history. 75c.

All booksellers

Published by DOUBLEDAY, DORAN, Garden City, N. Y.

A FEDERAL HOUSING SUBSIDY IS UNNECESSARY

Under scientific taxation we would not need consider ■ wild scheme, such as Senator Wagner's ten billion dollar housing bill, discussed in the newspapers.

We propose the following scientific formula to give the maximum amount of building that society wants and can afford:

- 1—Abolish all taxation on buildings.
- 2—Have government collect the entire yearly rent of land through taxation.

A typical instance (Slum Replacement)

	Present System	Interest 5%	Tax 2.5%	Total Annual Charge
New Building..	$750,000
Slum Land....	250,000
Total.....	$1,000,000	$50,000	$25,000	$75,000
	Single Tax System
New Building..	$750,000	$37,500	No Bldg. tax
Slum Land....	no cost	none	$12,500 (land 5% tax)
Total.....	$750,000	$37,500	$12,500	$50,000
			Saving, 33 1/3%	$25,000

Under this formula the only overhead is interest on building capital and yearly land rent collected in taxation. Under it as many and as good buildings would be put up as we want and can pay for—the same way as all goods, from Automobiles to Zippers.

Under the Single Tax System, ■ reduction of 25% is made in the investment, or 33 1/3% in yearly carrying charges. This makes Senator Wagner's bill, for a federal subsidy unnecessary.

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION for SCIENTIFIC TAXATION
Room 1712, 11 Park Place, New York City

BLACK MAN'S VERSE. By Frank Marshall Davis. Chicago: The Black Cat Press. $3.

Kansas born, Mr. Davis brings a Western note to Negro expression in his first volume of verse. With little of the melancholy of his race, little influenced by the mood or style of the spiritual, Mr. Davis accepts the raw vigor of his environment and responds to its casual aspects of beauty in a free-running verse that has something of the hard brightness of Sandberg. Yet a more complicated feeling enters as the book progresses, and the last poem is ironically aware of the many pitfalls awaiting a Negro poet in a white civilization. It tells the history of one Roosevelt Smith, "the only dusky child born and bred in Pine City, Nebraska."

At college they worshiped the novelty of ■ black poet and predicted fame

But Roosevelt listened too conscientiously to the critics as his successive books appeared. Told that he wasn't using his racial material, he took up darky dialect. Told then that he sentimentalized the Negro, he went sophisticated. Told that sophistication was inappropriate to ■ Negro, he tried for classic simplicity. Told again that he was being only a black-faced white, he went to Africa. When the critics could make nothing of the resulting book, "since it followed nothing done by any white poet," Roosevelt traded conscience and critics for the leather pouch and bunions of a mail carrier and read in the papers until his death how little the American Negro had contributed to his nation's literature . . .

This book suggests a different fate for Mr. Davis.

COSMOPOLITANS. By W. Somerset Maugham. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

There was nothing to prevent Mr. Maugham from publishing these ten-cent tales in the Cosmopolitan between 1924 and 1929, but his better judgment might have told him not to bother with them now. Far from adding to a reputation already endangered by the existence of so many trifles, this volume sinks it to a new low. Mr. Maugham begins with a preface in which he defends his right to be merely "entertaining," and snaps rather suspiciously at those of his contemporaries who are so thick-witted as to think before they write. The stories which follow are the perfect answer, for they are not even entertaining. Mr. Maugham should remember that there is nothing so entertaining as the use of the mind, and that there is no such thing as a "mere" story.

THE BEDSIDE BOOK OF FAMOUS AMERICAN STORIES. Edited by Angus Burrell and Bennett A. Cerf. Random House. $3.

More than half of the stories in this very handsome volume were written in the present century, and all but seven of them since the Civil War. This makes Hemingway equal to Hawthorne and gives the whole picture a brightly modern hue, as is perhaps proper. At any rate it is the editors' business to preserve what proportions they please, and they have been candid about their reasons in a preface which declares for "truth" and "tempo" in the short story. What truth is another generation may decide in its own jesting way; and as for tempo, one can imagine posterity complaining that the narratives of Conrad Aiken and William Saroyan stand absolutely still. At present, however, they do move, as do the contents of the volume as a whole. It is one of the most interesting collections of its kind, and incidentally an admirable introduction to the contemporary American short story.

THE OPEN ROAD in SOVIET RUSSIA

helps you get beneath the surface. Through long-established connections with Soviet institutions and through its own independent representation in Moscow, it enables you to meet people . . . affords more than ordinary tourist services. Inquiring travelers . . . students, teachers, and members of the professions . . . are invited to consult regarding their plans . . . either for group tours or individual arrangements . . . without obligation or expense.

Tenth Season

The Open Road

12th Floor, ■ West 40th St., New York
Cooperating with Intourist

$372 round trip New York with a month in the Soviet Union. Other tours up to $900

MAGAZINE BARGAINS

All subscriptions for one year, new or renewals.

The Nation and Harpers Magazine $6.50 The Nation and Readers Digest $6

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City

Send me the magazines ordered below. ☐ I enclose payment in full $ ☐ OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Magazines

Send to

3-11-36

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

DRAMA

Empire Goods

"LOVE ON THE DOLE" (Shubert Theater) has been extremely popular in its native England, but unless I am a much worse prophet than I think I am it will not find equal favor in American eyes. Upon such matters as these we generally agree with London much better than we used to. Masterpieces are transported without great danger, and "Call It a Day" is a striking example of the popular play which is just as acceptable on one side of the Atlantic as on the other. But just as the English still find a certain variety of American exuberance rather more than they can bear, so we still wonder that they can be as patient as they are with a kind of mild, musty sentiment which seems dull and fatuous to us.

I have not, goodness knows, been oversympathetic to the more obstreperously revolutionary of our native dramas. But though it is a bitter choice to make, fairness compels me to say that I can find more excuse for even the lesser of our Marxian melodramas than for the tepid brew being served at the Shubert. The title is topical. Obviously the intention is to suggest a sociological study of some kind, and it is true that there are various references to the dole as well as to other aspects of life as it is led close to the edge of starvation. But the whole mood of the piece is hardly more than the mood of conventional sentiment. The principal characters are romantically prettified and the subsidiary ones treated as quaint after the manner of the nineteenth-century local-colorists. Even the machinery of the play does not turn about its true center, and the catastrophe, instead of being brought about by any factor in the situation supposedly under discussion, is precipitated by one of the stalest of melodramatic devices: our hero loses his job because the girl whom he loves has spurned the dishonorable advances of a fat man with influence. Wendy Hiller, the girl in question, is extremely pretty and extremely engaging. I suspect that she is also a very capable actress, but she fits the kind of play the authors have written rather better than the situation with which they are supposed to deal. Despite a very satisfactory accent, she suggests a young girl in fancy dress rather more than she suggests the slums of Manchester. Even the fetching disarray of her hair is such as only a skilful coiffeur could achieve.

"Mainly for Lovers" (Forty-eighth Street Theater) is no less conventional in its own far more frivolous way, but at least there is nothing offensive about an artificial comedy which is rather more than usually artificial and familiar. Besides, the second act at least is made genuinely funny by the delightful performance of Dorothy Gish as a wife who generally bites her husband during a thunder storm. Miss Gish has a certain delightful style of outrageous humor all her own. She can descend from decorous comedy into a special sort of slapstick with amazingly graceful abandon, and it is a great pity that she has never really had a play exactly suited to her talents.

As to the present one, it is concerned with a divorced wife who is anxious to prevent her sister from entering upon a trial marriage with a gentleman of not too robust an intelligence. Since she is convinced that the said sister is merely frightened by the spectacle of her own disastrous marriage, she forces the ex-husband to pretend that all has been made up between them. Naturally the husband falls in love—but stop me if you have heard this one before.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

New! Higher Fidelity Recording of STRAWINSKY'S THE FIRE-BIRD

by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra

THE low strings set the scene of an enchanted night, and at once you become aware that here is the real FIRE-BIRD suite—warmly alive—and glittering with every facet and cadence that dazzles you when you sit in the actual presence of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Seductively mysterious, the music lures on the young Tsarevitch, until he sights a strange glow among the trees...and now the orchestra breaks into a shower of brittle, iridescent tone as the wondering eyes of the Tsarevitch blink at the glory of the Fire-Bird. In a charmed world, Stravinsky unrolls the entire scroll of human emotions.

Stravinsky spends prodigally every resource of the orchestra to reveal this fabulous fairy-world. And, through Victor Higher Fidelity recording, nothing is lost—not one muted violin note in the love passages, not one excited gasp of the wood-winds as the dread Ogre makes his appearance. For the first time, in any recording, all the glowing color of The Fire-Bird Suite has been caught. Don't deny yourself the delight of hearing the new Victor Higher Fidelity recording of The Fire-Bird Suite at your dealer's. Recorded on 5 12-inch Red Seal Victor Records, 10 sides. $10.

RCA Victor Division, RCA Manufacturing Co., Inc., Camden, N. J.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN with
INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS
GUILD THEA., 52nd St., W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
 Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee EphraimCALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by Dodie Smith
 with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE
MOROSCO THEA., 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
 Matinees, Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30. Extra Matinee Wednesdays

4 REPEAT PERFORMANCES
MARCH 7-8-14-15
 Civic Repertory Theatre, 14th St. & 6th Ave.
The THEATRE of ACTION in
 Michael Blankfort's new play "THE CRIME"
 Tickets 35c. to $1.65 All Workers Bookshops or Call Long. 5-9116—Bry. 9-8378

"One of the most honest social dramas of our time."
 Brooks Atkinson, Times

LOVE ON THE DOLE

With WENDY HILLER
SHUBERT THEA., 44th St. W. of B'way. Evgs.
 8:45, 55c to $3.30. Matinees Wednesday
 and Saturday, 2:40, 55c to $2.20

ERWIN SHAW'S NEW PLAY

"BURY THE DEAD"

Will be Published Complete in APRIL ISSUE
NEW THEATRE MAGAZINE
 15c per copy

RECORDS

We are offering THE WORLD'S BEST RECORDED MUSIC

at 50¢ and 75¢

Per Record (values $1.50 & $2.00)

Among thousands of other marvelous values are to be had the following Symphonic and Orchestral Works—

BACH's Brandenburg Concertos, BEETHOVEN's
 Nine Symphonies, CHOPIN's Piano Music,
 BRAHM's Symphonies, DVORAK's New World,
 FRANCK's D Minor, RAVEL's Bolero, SCHU-BERT's "Unfinished," WAGNER's Prelude &
 Liebestod from Tristan, etc., etc.

[All Brand New Electric Recordings.]

Call or Write for a complete list.

Mail Orders

Safe Delivery Guaranteed!

The GRAMOPHONE SHOP, Inc.

18 East Forty-Eighth Street, New York
THE WORLD'S BEST RECORDED MUSIC

COMING IN THE NATION*Homage to Havelock Ellis*

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

THE recent release by Columbia of Beethoven's Emperor concerto played by Walter Gieseking and the Vienna Philharmonic under Bruno Walter (five records—$7.50) affords pianists an opportunity for comparative study. Arthur Schnabel and the London Symphony under Malcom Sargent (five records—$10) and, less recently, Wilhelm Bachaus and the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra (four records—$8) have recorded the same concerto for Victor. A choice between the Gieseking and Schnabel recordings must be largely a matter of personal taste. The former takes one less side than the Schnabel, a fact partly accounted for by Schnabel's slower tempi in the adagio and in part of the first movement. The melodic line, as a result, tends to come out more clearly with Gieseking, for the percussive quality of the piano is usually more obvious on records than it is in the concert hall. Furthermore, the orchestra under Bruno Walter, especially the string section, plays with greater precision of attack. On the side of the Victor publication it must be noted on the other hand that Schnabel phrases with more deliberate clarity—notice, for example, the opening arpeggio passages—and that both piano and orchestra are reproduced with greater faithfulness.

Together with Beethoven's Emperor concerto, Columbia lists Haydn's Emperor quartet played by the popular Lener String Quartet (four records—$6.50). The Leners' freshness and vigor of attack are well represented in this performance, especially in the first and last movements. The hackneyed variations of the old Austrian national anthem that constitute the second movement are set forth with a beautiful balance not always present in the playing of this movement by the Elman String Quartet, released by Victor some years ago (one record—$2). Do not overlook the last side, which is the Andante from Haydn's Opus 76, No. 2, the "Fifths" quartet. It is both the best-played and the best-recorded part of the set.

For brilliant string-quartet playing and recording, listen to Victor's recent release of Villa-Lobos's Brazilian quartet No. 5 played by the Carioca String Quartet (two records—$3). It is particularly recommended if you are one of those to whom the modern idiom is incomprehensible or if you have friends to educate. In it you will find such characteristic devices of the idiom as bitonality, two meters used simultaneously, abrupt rhythmical changes, dissonances, jazzy syncopations, and blatant parallel fifths. Yet it is all easy to understand, especially as the movements end on comfortable tonics, and there are even such familiar sentimentalities as tunes played in tenths. Señor Villa-Lobos, himself an experienced quartet player, knows the potentialities of strings and makes liberal use of eccentric effects—natural and artificial harmonics, pizzicato, spiccato, glissando, sul punto. The result is vastly entertaining—a performance that requires the services of four virtuosi, music that explores the borders of modern compositional and technical developments, and withal music familiar enough for you to feel at home in it.

And while we are on chamber music, let me recommend to your attention Columbia's release of Montclair's music from "Les Plaisirs Champêtres" played by the Société Henri Casadesus des Instruments Anciens (two records—$3). Two records of this archaic sweetness and grace are probably all you will want to hear; but some day these fine artists may let us have the music of Jean-Baptiste Locilliet, a later composer who wrote not only with charm but also with deep musical feeling.

HENRY SIMON

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

BOY MEETS GIRL. Cort Theater. Rough and ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since "Once in a Lifetime."

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

ETHAN FROME. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon, and Raymond Massey.

LIBEL. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English courtroom play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

ANNIE OAKLEY. R.K.O. A minor American masterpiece based on the life of Buffalo Bill's best-loved sharpshooter. Barbara Stanwyck as Annie Oakley divides the honors with Sitting Bull.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

MUTINY ON THE BOUNTY. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. A long and noisy film, elaborated tirelessly from the famous books by Nordhoff and Hall; but distinguished by the great acting of Charles Laughton as Captain Bligh.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Alexander Korda. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

WAY DOWN EAST. Fox. D. W. Griffith told the story better and more simply, but it remains a good story for movie purposes, and pictorially this version is very fine.

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES FOR EARLY
PUBLICATION . . .

The Supreme Court

In a forthcoming article Charles A. Beard who has been in the thick of the constitutional fight since 1912 admits he is "a hard-boiled old sinner" on constitutional matters and differs from most of the attitudes on the court expressed thus far. He views the court and the problem of constitutional amendment from the long perspective of history and makes a plea "for all parties to the dispute to wait a while." On the other hand Max Lerner, in the last article of his series on The Riddle of the Supreme Court, reviews the various proposals that have been advanced for dealing with the court and concludes that the drastic curbing of the judicial power is the most important issue before the country.

Can LaGuardia Be Re-Elected?

Politically, New York votes Democratic. To say that free-lance Mayor LaGuardia can be re-elected in 1937 means that he will poll enough Democratic votes to defeat the Democratic candidate. But none of New York's four previous reform Mayors has defeated Tammany the second time. Can LaGuardia? George Britt believes he can and tells why in an informative article which involves Tammany, Farley, the Governorship of New York and the Presidential election.

Murder and Karl Marx

The mystery story has traveled a long way since the early 1920's when a wealthy English gentleman was found dead in his study, all the doors and windows locked, and the fatal weapon missing! Mary MacCarthy, who collaborated with Margaret Marshall in the controversial series on Our Literary Critics, traces trends to the currently popular class-conscious mystery story and discusses implications.

Also

Broun's Page Heywood Broun
Issues and Men Oswald Garrison Villard
Washington Weekly Paul Ward
Recorded Music Henry Simon

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for one year for $5. ☐ I enclose my check OR

☐ I will pay in thirty days. ☐ 2 years for $8 ☐ 3 years for $11.

Name _____

Address _____

3-11-36

Letters to the Editors

A CASE FOR TEARS

Dear Sirs: What of Germany today? True to her ancient disposition she squabbles, squabbles, squabbles. With a million enemies thundering at the gates she must perforce exercise her time-honored prerogative—and squabble! The dregs of forty-six parties suppressed by Hitler are splitting hairs in 10,000 beer cellars. Horn in on three Germans talking, gesticulating wildly, and you may hear four arguments. Of course, we have the underground movement which The Nation dotes on with the sublime regard of a baboon for its offspring. In Germany there is always an underground movement. Let the Messiah and all his angels reign in Potsdam and there would still be an underground movement; millions of rats scuttling in their holes. Should the Nazis go under and the rats come out of their holes and take charge, do you think for a moment that the essential grievances of Germany—lack of colonies, of money and markets, of resources, of ground, of a thousand things—would be liquidated by the whimsical fiat of Marxism?

Then, too, we have the ironic spectacle of Catholics uniting with Communists in a solid front against the civilizing efforts of Hitler. The Catholics, by the way, esteem the most ghastly rot as eternal truth. They are against birth control; their ideal is a dozen bawling brats around every garbage can in Christendom. They are against sterilization of the unfit—a bumper crop of idiots they interpret as the will of God. Whatever is right in the name of common sense and common decency, you may rest assured the Catholics will be against it; and they are a clarion voice in the Fatherland.

For many years the Fatherland, thanks to Jews and Marxists, was in a terrible state—every Czech, Polack, frog, kike, intellectual, wop, Communist, Socialist, Mason, Catholic, and what not spewed his guts out and wiped his feet on the bound and recumbent Gulliver. Hitler soon put a stop to that. He has made Germany the most powerful nation on earth. There's no nation that can defeat her single-handed. And, having power, she is respected and no longer a punching-bag as under the Marxists. Why be intellectual, why be cultural, why be liberal, democratic, fair, when it brings 65,000,000 people nothing but grief, nothing but vassalage to fifth-rate powers, weakness, corruption, and a rot that spreads like wildfire? To us officers of the Reichswehr it is a heartrending spectacle that England, whom we can whip before breakfast, should own and control three-fifths of the globe while we, who have ten times the power, can't even call land we have lived on for thousands of years our own.

There has been a measure of brutality in Germany but not nearly enough to meet the demands of the situation. If anything Adolf has been far, far too lenient. Göring is more my man. I would equip each one of the S. A. with a bungstarter and turn them loose upon the kraut-heads, with instructions to use bungstarters with unprecedented gusto upon their imbecile pates—especially the Catholics. In that way it is barely feasible a soupçon of sense might be drubbed into them. If Adolf sometimes weeps, as they say, it is not to be wondered at, for surely 'tis a case for tears.

SIEGFRIED HETZLER,
German Reichswehr

Milwaukee, Wis., February 25

STRAW VOTES IN A FREE STATE

Dear Sirs: Students of the University of California at Los Angeles held a poll recently to decide whether they favored compulsory military training. On the day scheduled for the vote, February 19, the Los Angeles Times carried an editorial on the subject of "Wasting Students' Time." Said the Times:

A singularly useless straw vote on the question of "compulsory military training" in American universities is scheduled to be held today among the students of the University of California at Los Angeles. . . . In no case is it within the province of beneficiaries of free state education to attempt to dictate what shall be included in the curriculum. If the malcontents don't like it they are at complete liberty to go somewhere else. The university would no doubt be glad to be rid of them.

In spite of the fulmination of the Times the university students voted decisively against compulsory military training, 2,131 to 951.

It would seem unnecessary to add that the result of the poll was not published in the Times.

LOUISE DAVIES

Ventura, Cal., February 25

CONTRIBUTORS

MAURY MAVERICK, fighting Congressman from Texas, lawyer, and business man, is one of the few exponents of liberal opinion in the House. A veteran of the World War, his first-hand knowledge of international conflict undoubtedly added vigor to the courageous battle he made for a strict neutrality program.

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's Moscow correspondent, has just completed a trip around Europe. His series of articles, Arms Over Europe, of which this is the seventh, has presented the political scene with emphasis on Italy and Germany.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG'S article on Governor Talmadge of Georgia began in last week's Nation. Having characterized the South's Barzelius Windrip, he will start work on his study of John L. Lewis.

JAMES T. FARRELL'S most famous work is the "Studs Lonigan" trilogy. His two articles discussing proletarian criticism are part of a book on criticism which is shortly to appear.

FRANK ROBERTSON is the pseudonym of an Akron newspaperman.

LINDSAY ROGERS, lawyer, labor expert, author, editor, has been Burgess Professor of Public Law at Columbia University since 1929.

J. SALWYN SCHAPIRO, professor of history at the College of the City of New York, is author of a biography of Condorcet, the great French liberal. He should be best known to readers of this paper as the author of the longest review that ever appeared in The Nation, that of H. G. Wells's "Outline of History" in 1921. The review ran to seven and three-quarter pages.

MARY McCARTHY was coauthor with Margaret Marshall of the highly controversial series in The Nation last fall which criticized the critics.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · MARCH 18, 1936

NUMBER 3689

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

333

EDITORIALS:

A NEW WATCH ON THE RHINE	335
WHO ARE THE TYRANTS?	336
A SOUND TAX	337
"ALT HEIDELBERG"	338
AN OPEN LETTER TO F. C. BELLINGER	338
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	339
WILL FARLEY REELECT LAGUARDIA? by George Britt	341
POLAND: BETWEEN POVERTY AND WAR by Louis Fischer	343
FEDERAL RELIEF—SOLD DOWN THE RIVER by Edith Abbott	346
THE DECLINE OF FRENCH FASCISM by M. E. Ravage	347
THE CONSUMER FRONT by Ruth Brindze	349
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	350
BROUN'S PAGE	351
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
THE POLITICAL SUBJECT by Joseph Wood Krutch	352
APPRAISING THE DICTATORS by Peter H. Odegard	353
RACES, NATIONS, AND FATHERS-IN-LAW by E. C. MacDowell	354
BRILLIANT TAXIDERMY by Katharine Simonds	354
THE USES OF PLAUSIBILITY by Ben Belitt	355
MORE BOOKS FOR GUINEA PIGS by Ruth Brindze	356
THE MIDDLE WAY by Norman Thomas	358
DRAMA: MR. COHAN PRESENTS by Joseph Wood Krutch	359
FILMS: THE HIGHER JINGOISM By Mark Van Doren	360
DRAWINGS: by George Schreiber, Peggy Bacon and Godal

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELLS STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

The Shape of Things

*

THE ATTITUDE OF THE AVERAGE TENANT in New York has been an important factor in making the building-service strike one of the most orderly lessons in class consciousness New York has ever seen. There were other elements even more important. There was first of all a strong union with efficient leadership making reasonable demands for overburdened, underpaid workers; there was a city administration which declared an emergency under the health regulations but kept clear of any strike-breaking moves in the name of law and order; there was finally the Realty Advisory Board, which assumed the black role of villain. The board refused to arbitrate, called in the notorious Bergoff band at nine or ten dollars a day, and in general put on such a demonstration of high-handedness that many of its owner members deserted and capitulated to the enemy. Meanwhile with a few exceptions the tenants, who as the "outraged public" might have broken the strike forthwith, remained passive or took up the defense of "the boys" who make life easier in a thousand ways for $70 or $80 a month. In the agreements signed so far the union has in some cases won the closed shop; in general it has obtained the raise demanded, the preferential shop, a board of arbitration to adjust differences, and a promise of non-discrimination. The owners have given the public a fine example of refusal to arbitrate; they have also provided a nice exhibit of strike-breakers, complete with mugs, police records, and lengths of iron pipe. There is even the story of one landlord who hastily accepted the closed shop when he saw the gentlemen sent to "protect" his property. "My God," he said, "I'm afraid of 'em myself."

*

EARL BROWDER AND JOSEPH STALIN EACH discussed communism last week. Stalin talked to Roy Howard about Russian preparedness for a Japanese or German attack, about the capitalist roots of war, and about the much-discussed non-propaganda provisions of the Litvinov agreement with Roosevelt. Unfortunately, on the absorbing topic of Russian democracy whole passages quoted in the stenographic report were omitted from Mr. Howard's account. While some of it savored of official Communist apologetics, the interview as a whole was vigorous and forthright, and would bear comparison with the recent radio address of the new English king. Mr. Browder's speech was undoubtedly a disappointment to those who expect a Communist leader to have a hundred heads like Cerberus, each of them spitting fire. Eugene Paley, of the Columbia Broadcasting Company, must be commended for his courage in withstanding the hysterical protests of red-baiters who shuddered at the thought that through a national hook-up Browder's speech would reach millions. The incident was not without its humor. Outside the broadcasting office pickets from the Americanization League marched with sartorial splendor, wearing spats and silk mufflers to show how the well-dressed picket should be turned out, and carrying banners that read starkly, "Smash Communism." But inside, in a voice as soft-spoken and "fireside" as Roosevelt's, Browder was saying that "every great crisis in American history has required a new party to solve it," and calling for the formation of a Farmer-Labor Party with an immediate program of gradualism—trade unionism, social security, Negro rights, a Supreme Court curb. Ultimately of course the impetus toward a Farmer-Labor Party must come from the farmers and workers rather than from any existing party. Meanwhile support must be welcomed from any group that is genuinely willing to explore the possibilities of economic change through electoral processes.

*

THE PRESIDENT OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY was a member of a delegation which appeared before the legislative committee on education on March 5 and urged the repeal of the Massachusetts teachers' oath law. Dr. Conant was accompanied by Presidents Neilson of Smith College, Cousens of Tufts, and Marsh of Boston University, and they brought representations from the heads of Radcliffe, Wheaton, Amherst, Williams, and Mount Holyoke. The temper of the legislative committee, especially that of Representative Frederick T. McDermott of Medford, was uniformly hostile. Dr. Conant was commanded to answer yes or no to the question, "Are there any Communists at Harvard?" Mr. Neilson, amid laughter and cheers from the audience, among whom there were many college students, was forced to deny that he was connected with the University of Moscow. A "Patriots' Handbook of Who's Who Among American Radicals" was frequently consulted by Representative McDermott in an attempt to fix the "Communist" status of the protesting educators. Most significant, however, was the frank admission by J. Raymond Walsh, professor of economics at Harvard, and John D. Connors of New Bedford that the teacher's oath had already forced teachers to pull their punches in presenting to their students material dealing with labor unions and politics. The college presidents were joined by representatives of the Teachers' Union, the A. F. of L., the State Federation of Labor, and various parents' and teachers' organizations.

*

THE QUALITY OF MERCY, AND THAT OF justice as well, was decidedly strained last week in the decision of the highest New York court—the Court of Appeals—declaring the minimum-wage law for women unconstitutional. We have grown hardened to catastrophic decisions, but this was flagrant and mechanical. It happened to involve the laundry industry, which is notoriously ill-paid, long-houred, exploited. The workers are principally Negro women. Their work is unskilled; cut-throat competition abounds in the industry; the firms are small and many; union organization is weak. It was no utopian whim but sheer pressing social necessity that led to the enactment of the minimum-wage law three years ago in the depth of the depression. The framers of the statute remembered that the Supreme Court had declared a minimum-wage law valid in 1917, in Muller vs. Oregon, but held against another in 1923 in Adkins vs. Children's Hospital. They remembered also that the latter case had left a loophole. They drew their statute accordingly, prefacing it by an elaborate finding of fact as to the nature of women's employment in industry and providing that wage boards be set up in each industry to study its peculiar conditions. Six states followed suit with similar statutes. Now the Court of Appeals in a four-to-three decision, speaking through Chief Judge Frederick Crane, bases itself flatly on the Adkins case, fails to see any substantial difference between the two statutes, and undoes the entire work of the legislature. Speaking for the minority, Judge Lehman makes out an impressive case for the statute. The "liberty of contract" that Judge Crane seeks to protect is of course the liberty to exploit and be exploited. It is the liberty of the workers to return to sweatshop conditions and starvation wages—to ten dollars a week instead of the thirteen dollars which had been achieved for them.

*

RAILWAY LABOR, WHICH HAS SEEN ITS RANKS diminished by more than a million since 1920, faces further displacement as a result of the mergers of railroad facilities, particularly terminals, ordered by the coordinator of transportation. The order has been temporarily deferred. Meanwhile representatives of railway management and the heads of twenty-one unions are trying to reach an agreement on the protection of workers who may be eliminated by such mergers. Section 7 of the Emergency Transportation Act bars railroad economies which would result in less employment than existed in 1933, but that act expires on June 16. On March 4 there was introduced in Congress the Wheeler-Crosser bill, which stipulates that the carrier must provide for those displaced "comparable employment under no less favorable conditions" or adequate compensation. On March 8 President Roosevelt addressed to both sides a letter in which he strongly urged settlement by negotiation rather than by legislation, implying his disapproval of the pending bill. The history of labor and industry demonstrates the folly of seeking to combat the forces that operate in a declining industry. The railways differ from the ordinary industry, however, in that they are under public control. This places a special responsibility on the government to see that any workers who are eliminated in the interest of efficiency receive adequate compensation. We are glad to note that Joseph B. Eastman, the coordinator, seems prepared to use his influence toward this end. The President assuredly should back him up.

THE FIRST REACTION IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES to the choice of Koki Hirota as the new Premier of Japan has been one of relief. Although closely associated with the reactionary Black Dragon Society, Hirota at least appreciates the need for conciliating world opinion. He has not occupied a position of leadership in the fascist movement as has General Araki or Baron Hiranuma, both of whom were mentioned as possible candidates for the Premiership. Yet if there was any doubt that Japan would adopt a more aggressive foreign policy as a result of the Tokyo revolt, that doubt has been laid at rest by recent developments in China. Hachiro Arita, the new Japanese Ambassador, has informed Nanking that the sending of government troops into Shansi to combat the growing red "menace" will be permitted only in accordance with the third of Hirota's "three points." Since this point calls for Sino-Japanese "cooperation" against the Communists, the statement implies that Japan is planning to send its own troops into the interior on the pretext of combating bolshevism. On this occasion the pretext is a fairly convincing one. The appearance of a considerable red force in the North along the borders of Inner Mongolia has given Japan real cause for concern. From their new base the Chinese soviet troops could easily cut the Japanese lines of communication at Kalgan, the gateway to Outer Mongolia, and could probably establish communications with the sovietized Mongolian People's Republic. But the pressure that is being brought on Nanking and the report of a Japanese-fomented separatist movement in Fukien indicate that Japan is moving forward irrespective of the Red Army. Militarism appears to be more firmly than ever in the saddle at Tokyo.

*

THE FIG LEAF HAS NOW COME TO THE university campus. From an exhibition of American painting at the University of Wyoming, five nude studies—the work of Emil Ganso, Bernard Karfiol, Kuniyishi, David Morrison, and Jules Pascin—were removed by order of the president, Dr. Arthur Griswold Crane. The art studios where the exhibit was held are used by training-school classes of grade and high-school pupils, and Dr. Crane at first justified his action on the ground that he had received "numerous complaints" from parents who did not wish their children to see the paintings. Temporarily the pictures were placed in a room open to adult students only, but later they were removed from view altogether, Dr. Crane then explaining that his objection to them "was not because they were nude but because they were ugly and out of taste for an educational exhibit." In so doing the president based his decision on a question of taste, although he has confessed, even boasted, that he is out of his depth in matters pertaining to the fine arts. One might commend him for his honesty were it not that his position in the present instance has permitted him to translate his own aesthetic prejudices into a moral mandate and impose it upon 1,200 students and a community of 10,000. This is significant not as an isolated phenomenon but as it reflects the acts of dozens of other President Cranes in the seats of power in American higher education.

A New Watch on the Rhine

BY moving troops into the Rhineland in violation of the Locarno pact, Hitler has precipitated a crisis far graver in its implications than that which followed his rearmament announcement of a year ago. Rearmament had been under way for several years, and its announcement merely brought into the open a fact which had overshadowed European diplomacy ever since the Nazis' seizure of power. But the present step, timed to forestall any possibility of further sanctions against Italy, appears to be a deliberate attempt to destroy the foundations of international organization. The reasons for it are clearly set forth in Hitler's dramatic Reichstag address. There is the old question of German prestige, the passion for equality which has characterized every official utterance since the war. But even more marked is the implacable hatred of Soviet communism. Rightly or wrongly, Hitler has taken the position that Europe is not large enough for both bolshevism and fascism, and in the supreme task of uprooting communism he has come to look upon the Franco-Soviet pact, the League, and Germany's international obligations merely as so many obstacles to success.

The crisis is gravely complicated by the fact that Mussolini and Hitler are now in a position where they can play the powers against one another. While it may seem somewhat cynical to assume that both Germany's offer of a twenty-five-year non-aggression pact with France and Italy's acceptance of the League's peace proposals are wholly insincere, the fact remains that both men have consistently scorned all principle in international relationships. Il Duce very obviously hopes that the preoccupation of the powers with the new Nazi peril will lead them to forget their solemn obligation to see that Italy does not profit from its aggression in Ethiopia. And there is a strong possibility that his hopes will be realized. As the country primarily affected by the militarization of the Rhineland, France has indicated a willingness to make substantial concessions to obtain a guaranty of Italian support. Great Britain, on the other hand, appears to favor giving way to Germany in order to assure a firm stand against Italy in case the latter's promise to discuss peace terms comes to nothing. The danger is that both France and Britain may be forced into concessions which will be tantamount to scrapping the principles of collective organization in favor of a new system of alliances.

From the standpoint of collective security, firmness toward Mussolini would seem the surest way of preventing Hitler from launching his widely heralded drive toward the Soviet Ukraine. Informed observers agree that German rearmament has not yet reached the point where there is immediate threat of Nazi aggression. In the meantime France is amply protected by existing treaties. Final ratification of the Franco-Soviet pact of mutual assistance by the French Senate is a matter of days. The Little Entente has already indicated that it will cast its lot with France, and preliminary reports suggest that even Poland can be counted on to support the League. While Mussolini might carry through his threat to abandon the Stresa front, this loss would be more than offset by the increased certainty of support from a rearmed Britain. Even the United States would probably throw its influence behind a League that took its obligations seriously.

Despite the logic of this position, the chances are against its adoption. In a situation as complex as the present one, statesmen are prone to fall back on traditional methods, even though these measures are bound to lead to war. But this does not mean that we should give way to despair. No one anticipated that the League would meet the challenge of the Italian-Ethiopian conflict as effectively as it did. Its action was due not so much to the League statesmen as to an overwhelming popular sentiment against war. Perhaps it is too much to expect another such spontaneous expression of public opinion as that which rose against the Hoare-Laval peace pact. But something approaching that demonstration is vitally necessary if the principles of collective security are to be preserved in the face of the latest desperate maneuvers of the fascist war-makers.

Who Are the Tyrants?

CHARGES of tyranny are being hurled thick as brickbats at the Roosevelt Administration. Whether they have broken any campaign bones remains to be seen. But they seem thus far to have included in their sweep every form of despotism, intimidation, and vindictiveness known to the mind of man. At present writing the latest incident is the turmoil over Senator Black's methods of tracking down lobby activities by seizing the records of telegrams and long-distance phone calls sent by various firms and organizations. In a diapason formed by the combined voices of Representative Wadsworth, Senator Steiwer, Silas Strawn, Jouett Shouse, Mark Sullivan, Walter Lippmann, Arthur Krock, the Hearst papers, and sundry corporation lawyers and utility executives, we are told that the Senator is a "Peeping Tom of public life," a bounder, an inquisitor into the private affairs of peaceful and liberty-loving citizens, an engine of the Star Chamber, a Torquemada.

These are grim charges. But they are only part of a long succession. Before the Black incident there was the incident of General Hagood. Earlier there was the lively dispute about the so-called Democratic tyranny over the radio waves. Still earlier there was the pother over the Morgan investigation. What charge will follow the Black incident must be left on the lap of the gods, but in our mortal way we may be certain that it will have to be pretty "hot" in order to avoid an anti-climax. It is undoubtedly the hope of Republican campaign strategists that these charges of tyranny will find lodgment in the minds of the voters as part of a pattern the other elements of which are the charges of communism, of designs against the Constitution, of a corrupt use of relief funds, and finally of reckless expenditures and bureaucratic waste.

Since Woodrow Wilson's "new freedom," publicity has been the principal instrument relied upon for the control of corporate activities. We do not ourselves subscribe to Mr. Wilson's faith in the unaided force of publicity—a faith that seems to be shared by Senator Black, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Securities Exchange Commission. In the bewildering barrage of events today the public's memory is a short one, and publicity is useful mainly in so far as it leads to more drastic regulatory measures. But even publicity seems to our industrialists a veritable nightmare of control. For example, the proposal to extend the publicity powers of the Federal Trade Commission has evoked from Elisha Hanson the charge that we are witnessing the formation of an American OGPU.

Behind the opposing campaign strategies of the two parties there are certain issues of constitutional freedom that cannot be neglected. The Fourth Amendment guarantees the American people freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures on the part of the federal government. There is undoubtedly a point at which the powers of inquiry become arbitrary. Walter Lippmann is greatly agitated as to what will happen if we surrender to Senatorial investigating committees the right to subpoena telegrams and business records in a general way, and to rake witnesses over the coals in committee hearings. Adopting the long historical perspective for which he has become so notable, he sees a Star Chamber in every committee room. He identifies the cause of the men who by their own admission forged thousands of signatures on telegrams protesting against the Wheeler-Rayburn holding-company bill with the battles that have been fought in the past and will be fought in the future for freedom of speech and press. He points out that it is not only holding-company lobbyists but also liberals and trade unionists who must fear the tyranny of the legislative inquisition.

In his solicitude to lump together all kinds of freedoms and tyrannies Mr. Lippmann fails to see that the real connecting or dividing principle is their economic base. The anti-radical campaigns of 1919 and 1935-36 have not been accidents of history. The authors of the red-baiting investigations—Lusk and Fish, Kramer and McCormack, Ives and Dorgan—are merely the spearhead of a movement for which the real momentum is furnished by the men in corporations who stand to gain by a return to power. It is the Liberty Leagues and the Sentinels of America, the Chambers of Commerce and the Manufacturers' Associations—the very groups now being investigated—which furnish the economic base for the anti-radical campaigns. Without them those campaigns would have little sinister in them, and would be merely the fantastic exercises of the imagination of cranks and fools. What Senator Black is doing, therefore, constitutes not an arbitrary violation of liberty but one of the indispensable paths to liberty. There are still a few men in Congress who are taking seriously the task of economic control, who know that the only thing that will have effectiveness as against the massed force of wealth is the massed power of the federal government.

Who are the tyrants? They are not these few Congressmen, supported sporadically by the Administration. They are rather the industrialists who talk about privacy and freedom from tyranny but who utter their Olympian words from seats of power to which they have risen by oppression and monopoly. We wish we could understand the mentality of people like Mr. Lippmann and Mr. Krock. Do they really think men like Mr. Strawn and Mr. Raskob are champions of the dear and cherished liberties of our Western heritage? Do they prefer to listen to the words rather than to observe the behavior of the bankers and lawyers and munitions makers they are defending? Men who have for decades controlled the political as well as the economic fortunes of our country; men who are accustomed to the vocabulary of command; men who breathe the atmosphere of dominance and expect thousands in mines and factories and laboratories to jump to their bidding—these men are of course likely to sniff despotism on every breeze of government control. They ought to know about despotism, having had experience with their own.

But it is the function of the commentator not to be taken in. He ought not to confuse the struggles for freedom of speech with the attempts of big business to avoid regulation. He ought not to be so confused by historical analogy as to believe that like the Englishman's home every Western Union office is a Liberty League castle.

A Sound Tax

BOTH from a political and an economic standpoint, the President's proposed tax on undivided corporation profits represents masterly strategy. By advocating a substantial increase in taxation at this time Mr. Roosevelt has shrewdly cut the ground from under his opponents. He can go into the election with the prospect of a budget more clearly in balance than that of the Hoover Administration during its last two years in office and at the same time enjoy the political prestige that comes from having spent billions on unemployment and farm relief. Moreover, he has saved Congress from the painful necessity of imposing an income or sales impost on the eve of a national election. No tax could be devised which would be less likely to alienate the voters. Even the shareholders, if the stock market may be taken as a criterion, are so cheered by the prospect of increased disbursements that they are willing to overlook the fact that dividends are to be subject to the normal income tax.

That such a happy political choice should also be extraordinarily well adapted to correct one of the gravest defects in our economic structure is perhaps accidental but none the less fortunate. Recent studies have shown that one of the primary causes of the depression is to be found in the tendency toward oversaving on the part of wealthy individuals and corporations. In the case of individuals this tendency can be combated by progressive income, inheritance, and gift levies. The attempt to apply the principle of graduated taxation to corporations, however, has led to the preposterous plan of taxing them in accordance with size, which bears no relation either to a corporation's capacity to pay or to the soundness of its financial policies. The exemption of dividends from the normal tax on individual incomes has been an inducement to directors to retain as large a share of corporation earnings as possible in surplus accounts. During 1928 and 1929 these surpluses were deposited with the commercial banks, where they were used to swell brokers' loans, or were invested directly in the money market, where they served to intensify the speculative frenzy of the period. In recent years they have stagnated as excess bank reserves and thus constituted a serious threat to economic stability.

The proposed tax would not deprive corporations of ordinary working capital. Reserves would be allowed, as at present, for depreciation, obsolescence, and bad debt. Beyond that the corporations would be permitted and expected to accumulate as large surpluses as they required, but the tax should counterbalance the pressure from large shareholders to prevent the distribution of earnings because of a desire to hold down their personal taxes. Yet despite its adequate protection for legitimate business, the Administration's plan has been attacked by conservative banking interests on the ground that the maintenance of dividend payments out of corporation surpluses tends to cushion the shock of a depression. They point out, for example, that the existence of a large surplus enabled the American Telephone and Telegraph Company to maintain full dividend payments of $9 a share throughout the depression, and argue that the cessation of such payments would have aggravated the crisis. From the standpoint of the individual corporation there would seem to be some justification for this contention. Obviously corporations which possessed a large undivided surplus in 1929 came through the depression with less difficulty than those which did not. But to assert that the country as a whole is better off because of the cautious policies of a few large concerns is to ignore the fact that the purchasing power withheld through excessive corporation reserves was one of the prime causes of the depression. It can scarcely be argued that a few stockholders are more important for maintaining consumer purchasing power than the recipients of government relief.

Back of the bankers' argument lies the old fallacy that a nation can lay aside money in good times for use in time of depression. Actually, of course, this is impossible. It is possible to store up such commodities as cotton, wheat, steel, and petroleum, but the attempt to hoard money, if generally practiced, can only result in disaster. Sound economic policy dictates a full distribution and use of current production as the only means of maintaining economic stability. In so far as the Administration's tax proposal will aid in that purpose, it has elements of real value.

This is not to suggest that we approve of the whole of the President's tax program. The reimposition of the processing taxes, even at a lower rate, imposes a burden on the masses which violates the first principle of sound taxation policy. Fortunately, however, these levies are to be temporary, while the tax on undivided profits is to be incorporated as a permanent portion of the tax structure. Although it does not eliminate the need for a drastic increase in the inheritance and income levies, it ranks as one of the few "reform" measures of the New Deal which bear the earmarks of forethought and careful preparation.

"Alt Heidelberg"

IN what should be the serenity and confidence of advanced age, the University of Heidelberg is the center of a furious academic controversy. Invitations have been issued by the Rector to a celebration of Heidelberg's 550th birthday on June 30 next. In a wave of apparently spontaneous protest against Nazi stifling of academic freedom, British universities began politely but firmly to decline, among them being Oxford and Cambridge, which can if they like boast of approximately 775 and 725 birthdays respectively. In retaliation Heidelberg merely made the belated and ineffectual gesture of withdrawing all British invitations.

So far American universities have shown no disposition to imitate the example of their British cousins. Cornell, Columbia, Vassar, and Harvard have already accepted. The latter based its acceptance on the following grounds: "The president and fellows . . . recognize the ancient ties by which the universities of the world are united and which are independent of the political conditions existing in any country at any particular time." History has shown and is showing today that there is no such independence as this promises. During the Reformation Heidelberg itself was a stronghold of Protestant learning; the Thirty Years' War inflicted damages on it from which it did not recover for 150 years. In our own time we have seen the Italian universities become the servants of the Fascist state. And today at Heidelberg forty-four professors have been dismissed since the accession of the Nazis to power because of "racial, religious, or political reasons." The ivory tower of learning is all too often painted with the color of the current political faith. Today in Germany it is emblazoned with the swastika.

Denials from Heidelberg that there has been any departure from the old liberal tradition are pitiful and hollow. It is claimed that professors of high standing continue to give the same sort of lectures as they gave before the Hitler putsch—provided they do not attack the Nazi Weltanschauung. It is asserted that several Heidelberg professors continue to teach although they have Jewish wives: it is declared that expelled Jewish professors who can establish the fact that they are only one-quarter Jewish have actually been invited to attend the celebration. More important even than these unendurable limitations on freedom of teaching, however, is the practical certainty that the Heidelberg anniversary celebration, like the Olympic Games at Garmish-Partenkirchen, will be made the occasion not for a salute to German scholarship and the pursuit of learning, which through the centuries have deserved the highest possible honor, but for a bombastic tribute to the Nazi state.

This is the best answer to Harvard's position. It is difficult to believe that the president and fellows of Harvard mean to imply that they recognize stronger ties with the culture that surrounds Heidelberg than with the culture that surrounds Oxford and Cambridge. Unless they mean that, it is better for free universities today to refrain from celebrating German culture.

An Open Letter to F. C. Bellinger

DEAR Freddie: It seems a bit strange to be calling you Freddie when up to yesterday I didn't even know that you lived at 925 Park Avenue in a twelve-room apartment with three servants' rooms and five baths. But you can't begin to realize the thrill I got out of reading all about you in the papers. There I was, riding home on the subway, when all of a sudden I came upon that piece about you. You know the one I mean—get out your clippings, Freddie—the one in the World-Telegram under the headline "Runs Elevator, Shotgun at His Side, Then Forms Tenants' Defense League." Well, sir, it was just as though I had been in the March on Rome or the Munich putsch and were seeing history made.

Of course, I was sorry to read in the Herald Tribune that only one of your servants' rooms was occupied and that you had to borrow on your soldier's bonus: that is probably the result of confiscatory taxes and the exorbitant demands of the elevator operators. But I was somewhat reassured to learn that you are able to pay $250 a month rent for your apartment. Some fellow—a red—was saying that $250 a month is more than twice as much as the best-paid elevator operators earn in the same time, but I didn't pay any attention to him. But the best news of all was that you are the son of Brigadier General John B. Bellinger, assistant paymaster of the army. That really sold me on you. In times like this, Freddie, we must look to the military mind to solve our problems.

Well, I am certainly crazy about your idea for forming the Tenants' Defense League, only—if you don't mind my saying it—I would change the name. It ought to be called something with real punch, like the Bellinger Storm Troopers or the Park Avenue Heimwehr. Only people who make over $5,000 a year, who live in twelve-room apartments, who hate elevator operators and other foreigners, and who know how to use a gun will be eligible for membership. Of course I don't want to tell you how to run your business, but I think it would be nice if, after you got going, you could add Jew-baiting, Communist-extermination, and nationalism to your agenda.

I see, according to the latest bulletin from the Park Avenue front, that you say that if the elevator strike is won, New York will be practically sovietized. And you are absolutely right! Why, I know a fellow who works on Fourteenth Street, you know, right down near Union Square, and he was telling me that his boss overheard someone in the subway saying that he knew a fellow who knew a Communist, and this Communist said that the whole strike was being financed by Russia. He said he even saw the check, signed by Stalin. He says what they are trying to do is to get the elevator men's pay raised to twenty-five cents an hour, and then they will make the men kick back half of their raises to help finance the revolution.

Wishing you luck in your wonderful undertaking,

WALK-UP

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

March 8, 1936

WELL, they're at it again. The nation's economic overlords have launched another desperate offensive to vanquish and kill off a Congressional investigation. This time their target is the Senate's lobby investigation. But the fury of their attack, its careful organization, and the size of the attacking forces encourage belief that the campaign's ultimate objective is to defeat the Black anti-lobby bill and permanently cripple the investigatory powers of Congress. If they attain even their immediate objective, however, it will be only because they first have captured the White House, for Senator Black will keep the lobby investigation going until he is persuaded by Roosevelt that he must surrender or bring defeat to the Administration in November.

If permitted to keep going, he and his colleagues on the investigating committee in a month or so will have demolished the American Liberty League and all the other fake organizations used by big business to cover its grappling-irons with the gauze of patriotic, non-partisan interest. Black will produce evidence indicating that the league is by any reasonable definition a political party, organized in its present form so that the law forbidding corporations to contribute to political parties may be winked at. And he will show that the hand that beats the breast of Jouett Shouse while he intones his litany of the Constitution is the paw of Mellon, Morgan, and Rockefeller as well as of the du Ponts. Indelibly he will impress upon the public that these Samurai have all "lent" thousands to the League; that their loans are repayable immediately after the election in November; and that such loans make a splendid tax-dodging device, since if they are not repaid they may be marked off as "losses," whereas if they had been outright gifts in the first instance, they would have been taxable.

If the fight grows too hot, Black may even destroy one of the haute bourgeoisie's favorite myths by investigating the labor lobby and revealing, perforce, that far from being a lobby able to make Congress jump through its hoop at any time, it is ludicrously moribund and feeble. And yielding to Hearst's clamor that he investigate the peace lobbies—one of their leaders, who supports the Black lobby bill, has already begged him to do so—he may spread out that investigation to include all the "patriotic" societies which maintain lobbies here and sell their services to whatever interest has the price.

Roper the Unctuous

The campaign against Black's committee began several weeks ago with a series of inspired newspaper stories to the effect that Black and his committee were intent solely upon digging up ammunition for the Administration to use in the election campaign. Meanwhile, the opposition was preparing its batteries to commence firing as soon as the committee resumed hearings on March 2. The first shot, fired on that day, came in the form of an injunction suit instituted here by Andrew Mellon's lawyer, Frank J. Hogan. To help build up the picture that the committee's aim was purely political, a Republican plaintiff had been selected; Hogan acted for the Chicago law firm headed by Silas H. Strawn, vigorous critic of the New Deal, member of the Republican Finance Committee, and partner of a member of the Liberty League's Lawyers' Committee. Hogan alleged that in subpoenaing copies of all telegrams that passed between Washington and the Strawn firm's Chicago offices in a ten-month period last year, the Black committee was attempting an illegal scrutiny of confidential communications between lawyers and their clients.

As soon as the suit was filed, mimeographed copies of Hogan's petition and a five-page "Note to Washington Correspondents" were distributed to all newspaper offices here. Simultaneously there burst forth in the press a series of denunciations of Black's committee. Quickly the impression was created that the committee's investigators had been examining not only messages dealing with legislation but also billets doux passing between "husband and wife," and sundry other matters with which it had no proper concern. Then came stories that, having no authority to examine the telegraph companies' files, the committee had borrowed the Federal Communications Commission's powers and by that devious route had read five million telegrams.

In dignified editorials the press deplored this desecration of the constitutional guaranty against "unreasonable searches and seizures." It was suggested that the committee, if decent, would have specified exactly what telegrams it wanted. The journalistic torch singers did not explain how that could be done. They suggested, however, that the task of selection be intrusted to the courts. One got the impression that federal judges may scrutinize what may not be seen by members of the Congress. One also got the impression that missives which are perfectly safe in the hands of telegraph operators, clerks, and messenger boys will be defiled if gazed upon by Senators.

Now here is what actually happened. Black started out by sending questionnaires to interests that campaigned against the holding-company bill. The answers were too innocent. He went after their files—and found them empty. Outfit after outfit had destroyed all records of the campaign. So Black turned to the telegraph companies. He served upon them subpoenas naming certain firms and persons, and calling for all telegrams within the scope of the Senate resolution which were charged to or signed by those firms or persons. The resolution was incorporated in the subpoenas. The companies balked, saying that it would be a tremendously expensive task for them to comply with the subpoena and that, besides, they did not want to take responsibility for construing it in the selection of telegrams. It was then agreed that the committee's agents, subpoena in hand, should make the selection.

Meanwhile, the Communications Commission, interested in the Black committee's disclosure last summer that thousands of forged telegrams had rained upon Congress during the fight over the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, publicly had announced an investigation of its own to see whether the telegraph companies had been violating federal regulations in accepting fictitious messages, soliciting business, permitting addresses to be faked, and slashing rates on messages in bulk. While ten to a dozen of the Black committee's investigators combed the telegraph files, one or two agents of the commission sat in and took notes on messages pertinent to their own investigation. Black's investigators were equipped with a list of known lobbyists. They leafed through the telegraph files, examining only those messages signed by lobbyists or charged to their accounts.

They copied, it is estimated, less than one-half of 1 per cent of the messages so examined.

One witness after another has been compelled to admit on the basis of documentary evidence from the telegraph files that his replies to the committee's questionnaire were false. The testimony thus far taken has also disproved several other accusations and insinuations against the committee, and one of the accusations has been disproved by the conduct of a committee member, Senator Gibson, a Vermont Republican. Looked upon as an old dodo too inept to impede the committee's work, he has surprised all observers by turning out to be one of its most aggressive members. With dryly humorous questions, he strips away the hypocrisies of high-paid lawyer-witnesses and lays bare the actual significance of their testimony so that even a Liberty Leaguer cannot ignore its meaning.

Gibson is quick to deny the charge that the committee is bent solely upon smearing the Administration's foes, and there is no support for the charge in the record. It will show that Roosevelt's friends who are running the International Mercantile Marine are caught in the committee's net; if there is any doubt that they are his friends, it should be dispelled by the knowledge that Roper, the unctuous, has just granted them another reprieve from having to forfeit $1,000,000 for not fulfilling their part of the Leviathan lay-up contract. The record already shows a large smear representing the testimony pried from agents of Henry L. Doherty, a frequent White House visitor and arranger of the President's birthday balls. Doherty spent at least $100,000 fighting the Wheeler-Rayburn bill and gave $25,000 of it to Arthur Mullen, one of Roosevelt's brigade commanders in his war on "intrenched greed."

Finally, there is the insinuation that the committee will do nothing personally embarrassing to members of Congress and that it will keep its hands off the powerful farm and veterans' lobbies. Yet the committee has just shown that Senator Nye got one of his friends, an ex-Congressman, on the pay roll of one of the power lobbies. In addition, it has shown that George K. Brobeck made use of his prestige as "legislative agent" for the Veterans of Foreign Wars to do $400 worth of lobbying against the Wheeler-Rayburn bill for the Standard Gas and Electric group. So far he is the only member of the veterans' lobby whom the committee has caught doubling in brass. The lobby business, of course, is a peculiar one and makes friends in all kinds of places. But so far no two-timers have been discovered in the farm and labor lobbies.

Black of Alabama—Gibson of Vermont

Will Farley Reelect LaGuardia?

BY GEORGE BRITT

NEW YORK CITY is overstuffed with Democrats. The official 1935 enrolment showed 1,546,322 of them and only 290,621 Republicans; so that, precisely as in the Solid South, the winner in any election must carry on his side a large slice of the Democratic vote. The elements of this huge local Democracy today are scattered as sheep, having no shepherd. The sight would arouse scorn and unbelief and perhaps an itch to take them in hand in those positive characters who once bossed the territory—Murphy, Croker, and Honest John Kelly. A similar itch is patently agitating James A. Farley, spiritual heir to the old-time Tammany leaders, but his efforts have been far from completely successful.

For this reason it is not fantastic, in spite of the wistful pessimism of the reformers, to fly in the face of a record which says that no reform mayor has ever been elected twice and to declare boldly that Mayor LaGuardia has quite a good chance to be reelected in 1937.

Tammany as a phrase has come to mean the Democratic party machine in New York City. But Tammany as a fact today means the Manhattan organization only, a skeleton of its old self. The treasury in 1934 was so hard up that for the first time in mortal memory Tammany had to ask the state committee for money with which to do its part in the gubernatorial campaign. And this year the chairman of the New York delegation to the Democratic national convention will not be the leader of Tammany Hall; he will probably be the Brooklyn boss, Frank V. Kelly.

In place of the hard-fisted, bearish men who once kept the outlying boroughs in line as vassal dukedoms, Tammany now has upon the throne James J. Dooling, its youngest leader, a college graduate and impeccable citizen, unproved, unfearful, and uneasy. Many of his district leaders are plotting revolt, and in the next borough on either hand is a dangerous rival jealous of Tammany's pretensions and alert for a chance to strip it of power.

While the old bosses were dying off, Tammany's votes were escaping across the bridges, eventually creating the hard issue of "reapportionment," which hinges upon the rivalry between leaders for jobs to give their followers. Manhattan today is the Number One rotten borough of the United States. Stubbornly holding out on its neighbors, Manhattan continues to elect the same number of Assemblymen as Brooklyn, one more state Senator, and several more Representatives in Congress. Yet Brooklyn passed Manhattan in population a dozen years ago. Moreover, the Bronx is almost ready to step ahead, and Queens is pressing hard. These boroughs have a common cause against Tammany in their demands for redistricting.

Both Tammany Hall and the general outlook for harmony are weakened also by Farley's federal patronage, which in theory should build up the machine but in practice has created discord. Chairman Farley personally may claim only three of the city's five boroughs. One is the Bronx, over which rules Edward J. Flynn, an original Roosevelt-for-President man, the city's ranking leader, a boss of finesse and ambition. Farley also has made Queens and Richmond his own provinces, having kicked out the old stubborn Tammany-allied war lords there and set up his own leaders, maintaining them with federal support. In Brooklyn the machinery is in the hands of Frank Kelly, a rising power unlikely to yield precedence to Flynn. A delegate to the Chicago convention of 1932 who voted for Al Smith, he seized Brooklyn in defiance of Farley, owes Farley nothing, and has flourished without his help. Dooling himself, though he promised to support President Roosevelt, is no Farley henchman. While the good federal jobs were being distributed, he was kept on a starvation diet. He heard all the storm raised by Al Smith's Liberty League speech and then placed Smith on the official slate as a Tammany delegate to the national convention.

The borough leaders all have different ideas as to New York's next mayor and are perfectly capable of sulking if their own choice is rejected. The most available possibility seems to be Grover Whalen, now in affluent retirement in the liquor business, a resident of Manhattan, a friend of Kelly's, on warm terms with Farley, for years Tammany's best item of window-trimming although not so loyal now. Whalen shakes hands all around. But in time he must commit himself, and he can't choose the whole field.

Such is LaGuardia's opposition. The prestige belongs to Flynn, spokesman for the President himself. The votes are in Kelly's pocket. Tammany is being squeezed between them. The interests of the three are, in practical terms, irreconcilable.

Jim Farley, busy with national problems, has also kept an eye upon the confusion at home and has a solution for it. It is to move in upon Tammany, attaching district leaders to himself one at a time until he can boss the Hall. Then, with Brooklyn brought into a community of interest, Farley would be dictator of the party not only in the nation and state but in the city.

Farley's ambition is said to run not merely to power but to office as well. Does it satisfy him to be Postmaster General? Not at all. He would prefer to be Governor of New York. And since that extraordinary vote-getter, Governor Lehman, is a desirable running mate on the state ticket with President Roosevelt this year, Farley's chance will come in 1938.

So the program takes shape. If the chairman captures the city he may immediately impose a Tammany peace to implement his own career. But suppose Tammany holds out against him. Is he likely to mix at all in the local brawl of 1937, alienating votes he would need a year later? Wouldn't he prefer to let the mayoralty fight settle itself?

Mayor La Guardia - 1934 -

Courtesy of the Downtown Gallery

The Farley problem is complicated here, as at every other turn, by the Smith problem. New York's chief political phenomenon, the Honorable Alfred E. Smith, is first of all a local issue and after that a national problem. He represents a vast uncertainty, but the most conservative forecaster must be prepared for him to trace still another dividing line through the city Democracy. The Jim Farley Democrats will line up on one side and the Al Smith Democrats on the other. The local candidates that Farley backs, Smith will fight. With all his strength Smith will block Farley from Tammany Hall. And with the wounds of 1936 still fresh, how likely are the Democrats in 1937 to patch up an effective combination against LaGuardia?

At first glance it looks as if the national campaign management, desperately needing New York next fall, would sell LaGuardia out—accept his support and then double-cross him in 1937. But even supposing that Farley should wish to betray him, could he sell him out to Tammany without intrenching the principal opposition on his own road to the governorship? It would be a maneuver of the most delicate strategy, with many chances of mishap.

LaGuardia's main strength last time was the City Fusion Party composed of anti-Tammany Democrats and progressive Republicans, a group symbolized by its emblem of the four-leaf clover. Hundreds of these workers expected jobs but got none; the leaders found themselves not consulted, not even received with politeness. "I will not," said LaGuardia amid their victory jubilations, "turn out one set of politicians just for the sake of putting in another set." The regular Republican machine workers who supported him have been left to starve, without enough patronage to support their clubhouses. Certainly they will not want him for mayor again. But LaGuardia will be able to carry the Republican primary because of the lack of any comparable opponent.

The friends of good government in all parties should support LaGuardia because he has realized so many of their dreams for them. On the whole he has given New York a much better return for its tax money than it has had in a long time, a higher standard of official conduct, a more intelligent conception of what the city government can do. His commissioners actually are administrators of departments, chosen and directed to get work done, not district leaders supported for party activity. LaGuardia has reestablished the city's broken credit. His law department has saved millions of dollars by defeating all sorts of phony claims. An open-air campaign rally for LaGuardia in some new city park, on the clean grass, beside the children's swings and slides installed by his Park Commissioner, Robert Moses, would be a matchless object lesson and the despair of hecklers. The Mayor unquestionably has the knack, difficult and special, of making the rusty wheels of the city government turn around.

But that, of course, has little or nothing to do with chances for reelection. LaGuardia's votes must be expected principally from the large extra-political, class-conscious groups with which he has conducted an unwavering courtship, notably labor, the Jews, and the Italians. By this time hundreds of thousands of these should be in a mood to turn out loyally for him whenever he rings the alarm bell. In this wooing at times he has unblushingly played the demagogue. It would be hard otherwise to explain his refusal to license an alien German masseur upon the pretext that the government in Germany was persecuting the Jews. He also lent his presence to the Italian Red Cross mass-meeting at which other speakers furiously praised Mussolini. Such incidents may depress his followers, but as bids for a mass vote they cannot be discounted. LaGuardia also may count upon a heavy labor vote. The last reform Mayor, John Purroy Mitchel, was accused of being "too much Fifth Avenue." LaGuardia is not. The president of the Central Trades and Labor Council admits publicly that "labor has got a better break since LaGuardia has taken office than ever before."

The Mayor may benefit also from two promising potential scandals which indicate political connections—the Drukman murder case in Brooklyn, which is being investigated by Special Prosecutor Hiram C. Todd, and the racket inquiry of Special Prosecutor Thomas E. Dewey. Each of these, fully developed and with luck in the timing, might arouse a brief flare-up of the indignant-citizen vote.

Still another possibility is the issue shot from under the Mayor by the courts last year but still susceptible to resurrection, his proposal for a municipally owned power plant. Under the initial threat of it he won a reduction of some $2,000,000 a year in the city's own electric-light bill. If another swing of this club should scare out a rate cut for the small householder, that would be indeed heaven's blessing, in every way as good as Tammany's overworked device of saving the five-cent fare.

At the next election, furthermore, the police will be under LaGuardia's own command. No political machine is going to use against him the force which Tammany has often relied on in the past for an additional 50,000 or 100,000 votes.

LaGuardia personally is the most important item aiding his chances to win. New York City never had a mayor like him. To honesty and an encyclopedic grasp of public business he adds the dramatics of a born campaigner, a long-range view of political strategy, and a touch of the audacity and madness which often before have spelled luck for him. He has defects, which are exasperating, but also the strength of his defects. Years ago as president of the Board of Aldermen he lived in the vortex of a perpetual squabble, and the late Comptroller Charles L. Craig once implored Mayor Hylan in open meeting to "hit him over the head with your gavel." The same sentiment has been breathed since by hundreds of colleagues and associates. He can be petty under criticism, overbearing, unfair, stubborn toward his enemies and often more stubborn toward his friends.

He has appeared at his raucous and irritable worst toward protestants over relief. He has bullied them when they persisted, and he put an entirely unconvincing face upon the recent police interference with the relief parade, when Representative Marcantonio was placed in "protective custody." For months he has kept alive a juvenile warfare with Room 9, the City Hall press room, as if taking pains to insure a worse record of his administration in the newspapers than any hostile editor would dictate.

But the heat generated by this erupting volcano radiates personal magnetism. If he is dogged enough to hang on to an indefensible position, he is equally keen to attack an impregnable opponent. He gives visitors a lift of the spirit. He has charm and knows how to turn it on. When he starts after votes again—no doubt of it—he will be able to call back into the ranks and put diligently to work many a disgruntled veteran who swore never again to lift a finger in his behalf. From 1916 on, failing only once to be a candidate, he was never defeated for Congress until 1932, although he was almost always rated a sure loser at the start and was only twice in that time persona grata to the political respectables and the organization of a major party. The untimely deaths of two colleagues now have demoted him to a minority position on the Board of Estimate, but it is as a minority fighter that he always has been most effective.

The great weakness of his opponents appears to be the want of united dynamic leadership, exactly that element which LaGuardia contributes most inspiringly to his side of a fight. His prospect of reelection may be slight, but as the beneficiary of the Democratic feuds and selfish rivalries of Jim Farley and Tammany Hall, better government in New York has at least as rosy a chance today as it seemed to have just before LaGuardia was first elected. Its friends are blind if they don't fight for it.

Poland: Between Poverty and War

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Warsaw, February 15

ENGLAND and Poland can determine whether or not there will be another European war—England by its strength and prestige, Poland by its geographical location. If England and Poland declared in advance that they would march against an aggressor, the likelihood of war would be considerably diminished. Germany would never attack the U. S. S. R. if it knew positively that England, France, Poland, and Czecho-Slovakia would unite against it. Under the same circumstances, it would keep out of Austria. London, however, consistently refuses to participate in an Eastern Locarno. There are many who believe that a clear declaration of purpose by Sir Edward Grey in the summer of 1914 would have prevented war. There are many who believe that England's responsibility is equally great in the crisis now developing.

Poland's role in European peace is also an important one. The difference is that whereas all England knows it has nothing to gain from another war, many Poles are not so sure. Poland, in my opinion, is playing a doubtful diplomatic game based on the idea that since war is inevitable it might as well get something out of it.

In Europe at present it is difficult to know where any government will stand tomorrow. But it is relatively simple to ascertain what are its objectives today. Poland's foreign policy, however, is the most unintelligible in Europe. During the past week here I have talked at length with Foreign Minister Beck; Finance Minister Kviatkovsky, the economic dictator of the country; General Burhart-Bukachi, of the Inspector General's office; Colonel Ignace Matushevski, editor of the Gazetta Polska, a government organ; and various Foreign Office officials, foreign diplomats, foreign and Polish journalists, business men, and "men on the street." I cannot write what they told me. What I write is my reaction to what they said.

The Poles are convinced that sooner or later Germany will go to war. They believe that in the beginning they can stay out and sell their neutrality dearly. Their present

"unprejudiced" attitude, moreover, would subsequently make it possible for them to side with the strongest battalions. In any event, the war is not yet here. So why choose between one combination and another? Better let both camps court and pay. This is or was the Polish foreign policy. But a weak country experiences difficulties in following such a course.

The present phase opened in 1933 when Hitler offered to respect the Polish Corridor for ten years. It would have been insane to reject this welcome proposal. Poland thought it could accept and still retain the old friendship with its allies, France and Rumania. But there was much resentment in Poland against France, part of it justified. France had often offended Poland's exaggerated amour propre. Pilsudski and Beck had never been warm lovers of France. Warsaw's new and improved connections with Germany gave Poland an eagerly desired opportunity of showing Paris a more independent front. Poles talked volubly about being a "great power."

Fence-sitting, however, requires skill, and after a while Poland lost its balance and fell over into the German camp. The press of each country no longer knew anything bad about the other, and wrongs to minorities were squeezed into small type. German statesmen made visits, some of them unsolicited, to Warsaw and to Polish hunting grounds—on one such occasion, incidentally, Göring tried to sound Pilsudski on the question of an anti-Soviet war, but the wily Marshal refused to be drawn out. Poland began to echo Germany's objection to the eastern pact and collective security, preferring, like Hitler, bilateral treaties which are ineffective because they carry no element of compulsion. Polish delegates at Geneva appeared to be speaking on behalf of the Wilhelmstrasse; or was it that they had so identified themselves with Nazi foreign policy that no difference could be discerned between the two? Amicable Polish-German relations next drew Poland closer to revisionist Hungary. Inevitably Poland's relations with France, Rumania, and Russia grew worse. Moreover, the corollary of the German-Polish honeymoon seemed to be a superfluous quarrel with Czecho-Slovakia about the treatment of Polish minorities in the rich border province of Teschen, where the munitions industry flourishes.

The Polish attitude to Germany consists of equal parts of fear and respect. Poles take it for granted that these sentiments are shared by other powers. They believe, consequently, that if Germany goes to war, enough nations will remain aloof to enable Germany to win. Poland's benevolent neutrality might then be handsomely rewarded. Poland would undoubtedly prefer German expansion in the direction of Austria and Czecho-Slovakia. The Poles would presumably receive Teschen and the Hungarians Slovakia; thus a common Polish-Hungarian frontier would be created, which appeals to some minds.

For selfish considerations Poland could hardly welcome a German attack on the U. S. S. R. The German army would reach Soviet territory either through Poland, a development Poland would not relish yet might not be strong enough to prevent, or through Lithuania and Latvia, with Finland perhaps cooperating in the North, in which case half of Poland would be uncomfortably surrounded by Germans. Germany today respects the Corridor. A victorious and aggrandized Germany might decide to eliminate it. This may be the logic of Polish disinclination to see an anti-Soviet military move. But in actual fact Polish friendship with Germany enhances its likelihood. Were Japan and Germany ready to invade Russia, the Poles, even if they did not see the apparent advantage of joining the anti-Bolshevik front, could be compelled to do so. The Poles know too well the nature of Germany's and Japan's designs. The Japanese use Warsaw as a coordinating point for much of their military intelligence and diplomatic activity in Europe. Poland's foreign policy is dangerous because it encourages the enemies of the status quo and threatens to draw the country into a conflict which can bring only harm.

Powerful elements in Poland are fortunately beginning to see this simple truth. One learns that General Ridz-Smigly favors a more pro-French orientation. Ridz-Smigly is the real head of the Polish army, the biggest factor in Polish politics. In a very direct sense he is Pilsudski's successor and political heir. Since the great marshal's death he has kept out of the limelight and devoted his time to solidifying his influence with the armed forces. Now there are signs that he proposes to counteract the excessively pro-German line of Poland's policy. The army has a French tradition. General Sossenkovsky, second only to Ridz-Smigly, is known to be Francophile. But if the Polish army's pro-French leanings will merely offset without eradicating the pro-German sympathies of other powerful elements, uncertainty will rule in Warsaw, and suspicion and grave concern abroad. Moreover, it is not enough to be pro-French. If the army's aim is to replace the Soviet Union in the French security system, the total will be a minus quantity. There ought to be room in the councils of peace for France, Russia, and Poland. These countries, with the Baltic states, Czecho-Slovakia, and Rumania, and with Germany should it decide to adhere, can guarantee peace in Eastern Europe. Unfortunately, most authorities in Warsaw would like to think of the eastern mutual-assistance pact as dead. (If it is, many hopes for Europe's tranquillity die with it.) England's collaboration, however, could reconcile them to the pact. British prestige is very high in those parts of Europe.

The trouble with Polish foreign policy is its refusal to be guided by principle. It rejects the long view and attacks each objective as it presents itself. Some years ago a foreign diplomat, in the presence of Joseph Beck, asked Marshal Pilsudski why, since he possessed absolute power, he did not introduce the constitutional reforms at one stroke. Pilsudski answered in the words of Goethe: "In der Selbstbeschränkung zeigt sich der Meister." ("Genius reveals itself through self-limitation.") This rule may work very well when one controls all the factors, but in diplomacy it breeds the worst kind of opportunism. Poland must decide whether it stands with the violent revisionists or with those who want collective security.

How any sane Pole can contemplate the outbreak of war baffles the intelligence. Poland least of any country can afford a war. Its people are poverty-stricken. Armament expenditures are breaking its back. Neutral or not, Poland might easily be the battlefield of a European war, and be ruined. No one denies Poland's terrible material plight. Joseph Poniatovsky, an accepted authority, estimates that of a total population of 33,400,000, some 9,000,000 in the villages alone are "surplus." One hears this repeated on all sides in Warsaw. A country which has many sparsely settled agricultural areas is rated "over-populated" because of its low living standards. The restriction of emigration to America and elsewhere has been a serious blow for the Polish economy.

Poland counts 540,000 employed workers and 330,000 unemployed. The nominal wages of the employed are 45 per cent lower than in 1928-29; their living standard is 35 per cent lower. The 330,000 government employees and 300,000 private-office employees are living at a level 10 to 15 per cent above the 1928-29 level. The armed forces, according to government figures, number 271,510. All this in itself reflects a rotten state of affairs.

About 63 per cent of Poland's population is rural. In the Sejm, on December 5, 1935, Minister Kviatkovsky said: "Poland has 3,300,000 farms. Of these, 34 per cent are smaller than dwarf households, and an additional 31 per cent are small households of two to five hectares. In the southern provinces the number of dwarf households exceeds 54 per cent. In this great stratum of population are 10,000,000 persons who stand completely outside the realm of economic life and activity." They neither buy nor sell. One can imagine the lot of these 10,000,000 Polish citizens when one learns that, as Kviatkovsky went on to say, the peasants who have ten hectares of land—millionaires compared to the dwarfs—spend on the average 40 gold zloty or $8 per year per person. This means eleven groshen or about two gold cents a day. In 1929, Kviatkovsky declared, they spent $22.40 a year. Such a nation is not a great power. Poland imports less per capita than any other European country except Albania. Poland has weak industries, and although the metallurgical, chemical, and electrical industry has expanded in the last decade, the army is poorly mechanized, the roads are bad, and real military strength is therefore limited.

Of late the peasants have been reacting violently against their poverty. In May, 1935, a serious insurrection in the Volhynia district lasted several months and had to be suppressed with armed force. A similar event occurred in central Poland in December, 1935. Bloody revolts grow more and more common. The oppositionist National Democrats sometimes inspire them and often try to lead them. Usually they are accompanied by pogroms against Jews. Anti-Semitism has spread since 1933. Bombs are thrown into synagogues, Jewish houses burned, and Jews beaten and killed. The government either cannot or will not stop these excesses.

The only real solution of the peasant problem is land reform. Radicals sometimes believe that the redistribution of land to benefit the peasantry requires only a will to undertake it on the part of the government or the ruling class. This is not true in Poland. Many owners would be glad to get rid of their estates in exchange for some money. If the state expropriated them, the national economy would be ruined, for most landlords are heavily in debt. Moreover, there is no point in giving land alone to the peasantry. Money is also needed for animals, equipment, and seed. The government does not possess such funds. For a time the Polish authorities implemented a mild land reform and divided approximately 2,200,000 hectares among land-hungry peasants—half of it the former property of Germans. But financial stringency has interrupted even this insufficient measure.

Mr. Kviatkovsky, the Minister of Finance, is an enlightened liberal economist—originally a physicist—and he is striving valiantly to cope with a most distressing situation. His panacea is deflation, which brings him enemies. His hope is a foreign loan and bigger foreign markets; neither prospect is bright.

With all these economic, social, and political problems to solve, Poland ought to be the most pacifist nation of Europe. It is not.

Polka, 1936

Federal Relief—Sold Down the River

BY EDITH ABBOTT

THE collapse of the FERA has brought great suffering over wide areas of the country, not only for the unfortunate, mislabeled "unemployables"—the old, the sick, the handicapped, the widowed mothers with dependent children—but for large numbers of the able-bodied unemployed, as clearly "employable" as any men and women can ever be. These are the unemployed who came on the relief rolls after the arbitrary dead line of November 1, 1935, set up by the Federal Works Progress Administrator as the date after which no more "employables" would be accepted for the new WPA program. Among the employables who are still on relief are also large numbers of able-bodied women, for whom street work and the other WPA jobs have not been exactly suitable. There are also the employables in areas where WPA projects could not be set up to provide for the numbers available for the new made work. These later groups of the unemployed, as well as the so-called unemployables, have been turned back to the bankrupt treasuries of the local taxpayers and to the well-meaning but incapable overseers of the poor, county commissioners, poor boards, and county supervisors, whose announced object is to save money for the taxpayers who elected them and will in due course be called upon to reelect them.

The old challenging messages to the country which once issued from the press conferences of the Federal Relief Administrator, whose office has now been abolished with the FERA—the statements that "hunger is not debatable," and "no one shall starve"—are no longer repeated to an appreciative group of newspaper men and women. There is an ominous silence in Washington about the misery that is reported from one section after another. Even the liberal Senators who were early supporters of federal relief seem to take no notice of the destitute men, women, and children who have been left not only hungry but without fuel, and with eviction notices almost as terrifying as they were in the days before Mr. Hopkins began to set things right. "This business of relief" has ended as far as the federal government is concerned, and hunger is once more abroad in the land as it was in those three winters of bitter memory from 1930 to 1933.

For months the FERA struggled along, like Eliza crossing the ice. One major crisis after another was faced or dodged by the various state emergency relief administrations; one hope after another rose and then died away. But Eliza, clinging to the ice floes, was unable to escape and finally was sold down the river.

A year ago, when the President announced that he intended to "end this business of relief," no one knew exactly what he had in mind. There were many states, notably those south of Mason and Dixon's line, where the federal government had been providing from 95 to 98 per cent of all the relief given; and certainly this meant that the federal government had been giving help to the "unemployables" as well as to the able-bodied unemployed. According to the statistics recently placed in the Congressional Record by a Republican Senator, whose figures are probably right even if his politics are wrong, there were only twelve states in which the federal government had been carrying less than 70 per cent of the relief burden. Did Washington think that it was possible for the local relief authorities to take back any such burden as this? Do the liberal Senators know what is happening in their own states? Mayor LaGuardia's relief commission showed last year how inadequate relief had been even with federal help and even in the wealthy city of New York. What did the President's relief advisers think relief would be like without federal help—and in the really destitute and bankrupt areas?

The bitter truth has gradually dawned upon social workers that we are doomed to drift back to the old days of pauper relief, that we must turn the unemployables and many of the country's unemployed back to the tender mercies of the petty local officials, who give inadequate doles to the "worthy poor" and do not worry about what happens to the "unworthy"; who order the non-residents out of town or, like California, stop them at the border. Transients, many of whom are really unemployed seasonal laborers, are once more sleeping in the police stations and being told to "move on" and "get out of town."

The new social-security program will, in states where an acceptable plan has been worked out in conformity with the federal law, ultimately bring some help to the old people and the dependent children. But the wheels of this great machine have been turning very slowly for many a long and weary month, and in the meantime heart-breaking tragedies are reported in one state after another. Just why the federal "business of relief" was ended before this major part of the new program was ready to function has never been explained. Just why the great investment in the Federal Emergency Relief Administration was destroyed before any permanent, modern public-welfare substitute could be put in its place can never be understood. The one thing that is clear is that intense suffering has followed in the wake of the latest experiment at Washington, and that prolonged misery will accompany the revival of the old, discredited system of pauper relief.

The end of the FERA has been one of the tragedies of the Administration program. Our most promising experiment in public welfare has been destroyed in the house of its friends.

The Decline of French Fascism

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, February 28

EVENTS move rapidly in France these days. I had been away a bare six months, and during my absence I had kept in touch—or thought I had—through newspapers and correspondence, with developments here. Yet it needed but a few days for me to realize how different was the France I found from the one I had quit late in August. In a country where revolution and counter-revolution are at mortal grips, one must, it seems, be on the spot, in hourly contact with men and movements, if one is not to drop hopelessly out of line.

The day of my departure the counter-revolution was apparently master of the situation, the bulk of the nation apparently cowed. I say apparently because beneath the surface the tide was even then turning toward the left. The fascist grip had, indeed, begun to slip as long ago as November, 1934, when Doumergue, deflated and outmaneuvered, had gone back to his country seat in Tournefeuille, and the reactionary scheme of casting him for the role of Hindenburg had revealed itself as an idle dream. Yet outwardly the rise of Laval to power, after the Flandin interlude, looked dangerously like a reinforcement of the right. Laval was younger, subtler, more agile, and less scrupulous than the former President of the republic, and he was closer both to the financial-industrial oligarchy and to their militant tools, the De la Rocques, Taittingers, and other civil-war mongers. A complaisant Chamber abdicated its mandate over the purse, granting Laval at the banks' behest the deflationary decree-laws it had refused Flandin. He carried on for a time like a sort of dictator pro tem. He openly favored the fascists and their chiefs. When on July 14 the democratic parties marched to the Bastille to reaffirm their faith in the republic, he invited De la Rocque to lead his Croix de Feu in a counter-demonstration up the Champs-Élysées to the tomb of the Unknown Soldier. Flandin, too, had deemed it a gesture of reconciliation for the head of the republican government to attend the service at Notre Dame commemorating the heroes who on February 6 of the year before had fallen in a patriotic attempt to overthrow the republic. But whereas Flandin, who had acted from weakness, had been properly rewarded for his trouble by the fascists' spitting upon him in the cathedral, his successor, knowing exactly what he was doing and why, was hailed by the entire right for his broad hint that law and order—meaning the effective dictatorship of two hundred huge fortunes—were not defenseless.

Thus encouraged, De la Rocque was conducting himself one day like the heir-apparent of the seemingly dying republic and the next like Reichsführer Hitler. He bullied the Premier as a mere regent who was keeping the throne warm for his legitimate successor. Failing compliance by the republican authorities, he mobilized his dispos (shock troops) and shot up a Paris suburb, a northern industrial town, or the city of Limoges. The Croix de Feu was growing in numbers and arrogance, clashes with workers and left partisans became regular occurrences, public men were assaulted nearly every day, civil war was in the air. Superficial observers with a taste for analogy declared the republic doomed and fascism inevitable.

Laval knew better. He did his utmost, being himself one of the richest men in France, to prime the upstart for his role of national strike-breaker à la Hitler, as the two hundred wealthy families desired. But he early perceived that De la Rocque—army officer, nobleman, clerical, coxcomb—was not of the stuff of which popular dictators are made. He lacked the folk touch. He did not speak the language of the little man of France—the shopkeeper, the civil servant, the peasant, the artisan, the workers of the outlying faubourgs and the red-belt suburbs. Moreover, by his strutting and his airs he antagonized the rival fascist groups with their own embryonic Mussolinis.

Laval saw through the rootlessness of the Croix de Feu and the hollowness of its "revered leader." But he used the fascist bluff for his own ends. The abortive putsch of February 6, 1934, had consolidated the demoralized left majority in parliament and in the country into a united front, which, as time went on, recovered its morale and its force. Laval waved the fascist menace before the Front Populaire to keep it in check and himself and his friends in power. Labor, the Socialists, the Communists, the Daladier Radicals, and the small business men organized mass demonstrations to protest against the ruinous deflationary measures. The government, far from heeding the demand for the dissolution of the fascist associations, connived at their arming, at their infiltration into the air service, and encouraged them to stage riotous, often bloody counter-demonstrations. It quietly directed the capital police and the national gardes mobiles to hound the left while leaving the extreme-right factions in full command of the street. The grande presse needed no orders to do its part; it had gone fascist in February, 1934.

Laval used the fascist bluff, too, in his relations with Italy, Germany, the U. S. S. R., England, and the League. The recovering parliamentary forces in Parliament and outside pressed him hard on the left. He reluctantly went to Moscow to conclude the negotiations initiated there by Herriot and carried forward by Barthou. He was obliged to take Paul-Boncour to Geneva, vote Italy the aggressor, and verbally assent to sanctions. But he looked with a friendly eye upon the right opposition to the ratification of the Soviet pact. He hoped to escape swallowing the bitter Russian medicine by pretending to carry on conversations with Hitler.

Such was the French scene in August and the months that followed. True, the left forces, aroused by the common danger and pressed by the rank and file, had mobilized ninety-odd groups—running all the way from the Radical Socialists to the Communists and from the powerful trade unions to the tenants' association and the committee of anti-fascist intellectuals—into a single bloc. This heterogeneous union had come together on a negative issue and it continued on the defensive. Its very range—and diversity—promised ill for its permanence; there were too many interests, traditions, prejudices to conciliate. For six months a program commission deliberated and dickered before it could agree on a platform acceptable to them all. Nor was the enemy idle. The right, after driving the Radical Socialists into the arms of the Marxists, now sought, by fair means and foul, to wean them away again in the hope of disrupting the coalition. There were times, notably after the riots attending the strikes in Toulon and other naval ports last summer, when it seemed as if they might succeed.

Now, six months later, the atmosphere is completely changed. It is not so much that Laval is gone and that a new Cabinet predominantly left governs in his place. The Sarraut Ministry is itself a symbol of the distance French politics have covered in my short absence. A foreigner who knew nothing of the "historic February 6" would scarcely guess that a fascist putsch had ever occurred, and that for two years this country had been ruled by a pre-dictatorship. The Front Populaire now holds the key to the situation. It is the fascist leaguers who are on the defensive and avoid encounters with their foes and cede the sidewalk to them. One had an overwhelming instance of this phenomenon on February 16 during the impressive five-hour parade in protest against the unsuccessful attempt to assassinate Blum. The Croix de Feu? Not a sound from it. The Colonel has, in the French vernacular phrase, disappeared from the traffic.

In addition to the fact that, among a people with the history and character of the French, fascist dictatorship could never have more than a feeble chance, several concrete developments had occurred during my absence which could not but alter the face of things. I list them as they came. The Stavisky trial, which after being held up for two years finally reached the courts late last fall, demonstrated to the most benighted Frenchman that the whole scandal had been deliberately timed and sprung by the opposition to discredit the left majority and to nullify the will of the electorate. By mid-January the program committee at last published its platform. If this mildly socialistic document disappointed the extreme now-or-never, all-or-nothing revolutionaries, they comforted themselves with the thought that a cleaner sweep could not have received the unanimous vote of all the groups, and that insistence could only have resulted in disrupting the bloc. The more moderate elements, for their part, found matter for congratulation in the fact that while the Bank of France and the key industries were to be nationalized, private property was to be left untouched, and also in the fact that the Marxists did not bolt. Not least, Mussolini contributed his share. The Ethiopian adventure served to break the spell of dictatorship by concretely demonstrating what no amount of agitation could quite prove—that fascism means war. The French, who have everything to lose and nothing to gain by upsetting the international status quo, are resolutely for peace.

The elimination of Laval, as I have said, is symbolic of the recovered strength of the left. In point of fact the Front Populaire could have got rid of him three months earlier if it had chosen to. It preferred to avoid a ministerial crisis before the elections. Two things finally drove it to act. The Communists, and some others as well, seeing that Laval meant to shelve the Franco-Soviet pact, pressed for his downfall. More important still, all the participating group and parties feared that with Laval in office it might not be possible to have fair elections. For though the ex-Premier had bowed sufficiently to left pressure to get a bill to the Chamber for the dissolution of the fascist league, he was in no hurry to execute it. The new government, despite the presence of Flandin, Mandel, and Maurin, depends for its existence on the Socialists, who have voted for it, and on the Communists, who have at least not voted against it. It needed but the encouragement so conveniently offered it by the royalists in their incredibly mad attempt on Blum's life to proceed to the suppression of the civil-war mongers and to turn the country back to the parties whom the voters in 1932 had put in control.

Is the fascist danger quite eliminated in France? It is dangerous to prophesy. Other leaders with other tactics may well arise. But the chances of a successful counter-revolutionary dictatorship are unquestionably slimmer than before.

Drawing by Daumier

From Actualités, 1866

European Equilibrium

The Consumer Front

BY RUTH BRINDZE

ONCE again there is a move to pull the teeth of the Federal Trade Commission. This time the offending molar is publicity. Business in general and particularly the advertising moguls object to the FTC including in its news releases information about formal complaints issued by the commission. Such publicity is unfair, they say, because the product or the organization is condemned by the public before the hearing and the adjudication of the case. On its face there appears to be some merit to this argument, but on closer inspection the fallacies become apparent. First of all, the publicity given the news from the FTC is decidedly meager since few publications find it fit to print. Furthermore, before the complaint is issued, the commission advises the party against whom it intends to proceed of the charges and accepts evidence in defense of the alleged violations. As a result (1) the case may be dismissed; (2) the respondents may sign a stipulation to cease and desist; or (3) a formal complaint may be issued which gives the defendant an opportunity to contest the action, first before the commission, and then on appeal to the courts.

Until February, 1934, when a new policy went into effect, the FTC omitted the names of companies which signed stipulations from the official publicity releases as an inducement for a settlement without litigation. From the public's point of view, full publicity for every case is desirable. The trouble is that even today nothing approaching full publicity is achieved. However, no one should be a better judge of the effectiveness of publicity than the advertising men. Their cries for "justice" indicate that even the little news that finds its way into the American press is embarrassing to big business.

Hearings on the Wheeler-Rayburn bill to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act are now being held by the Senate committee. This bill, Printer's Ink warns, "changes the Trade Commission Act from an instrument to protect competition to one that also protects consumers," and it also goes on record as believing that "there are other and better ways . . . of accomplishing a real degree of consumer protection." At a time when stop-gaps are the order of the day, the consumer will welcome a strengthening of the commission. This the Wheeler-Rayburn bill attempts by incorporating the FTC's suggestion (see The Nation of January 29) that it be given jurisdiction over "unfair or deceptive acts and practices in commerce," a change which would have brought victory instead of defeat in the famous Marmola case. The bill also increases the commission's power to enforce its orders by authorizing it to apply for an injunction when it has reason to believe that the defendant "intends to or is about to disobey" the commission's ruling, and by providing an initial penalty of $500 and an additional fine of $25 per day for failure to comply with the commission's orders. The ridiculously small penalties heretofore attached to disobedience of FTC rulings have long needed correction.

ANOTHER sour note on milk prices has been interjected by the Commissioner of Markets of New York City. In a speech to clubwomen Commissioner Morgan observed that the price of milk was too high and that Mayor LaGuardia intended to break the hold of the "trust" by the establishment of a city-owned pasteurization plant. Plans are, of course, indefinite, and it is not unlikely that the Mayor's spokesman was merely issuing a threat. However, the Commissioner's statement is significant in the light of a report on the milk trust submitted to the Mayor a few months ago by the Marketing Department, in which the need of a change in our present method of milk distribution was emphasized and suggestions were made for public or cooperative distribution.

It is probably too much to ask that city and state officials agree even on such matters as the efficiency and economy of our present system of milk distribution. Still it is ludicrous for the city to be advocating public ownership while the state stands sponsor for an advertisement in New York City newspapers, entitled "A Bargain at Your Door!" which points out that "through producer, transportation, bottling, all the way to delivery of the milk at your door, costs are held down by a system that is without parallel for efficiency. The marvel is that milk can cost so little, that you can buy it so cheap." Certainly, this advertisement, paid for by state funds, does not jibe with the findings of the New York City Marketing Department or with those of the FTC's investigators of the milk trust.

THE fight for the grading of canned goods is narrowing down to a private war between the National Canners' Association, representing nationally advertised brands, and the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, 60 per cent of whose canned-goods sales are of their private brands. A year ago, when the code makers were still busy in Washington, A and P broke the solid ranks of the canners by agreeing to grade and label its private-brand canned goods according to United States standards. The code administrator and the consumer agencies in Washington hailed this as a great victory, since the grading of canned goods has long been regarded as a test of the entire movement for honestly labeled consumer goods. The skeptics waited for something more tangible. This A and P has now supplied with fourteen items of food clearly labeled with the government grades, a move which is paying them well in good-will and advertising.

[Miss Brindze's page appears in The Nation every other week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

OUR extraordinary lurch into enormous armament expenses goes on apace, and every day brings additional proposals for military or naval increases. Now comes the news of a proposed five-year program calling for 4,000 army planes at a cost of $70,000,000. A bill to this effect has been offered by Chairman McSwain of the House Military Affairs Committee. Mr. McSwain's contention is that though the Morrow board fixed the ratio between the navy and army forces at ten to eighteen, the naval aircraft authorized or built total 2,190, while the army authorization still remains at 1,800, when it should be 4,000. The new Chief of Staff, General Malin Craig, has made the usual appeal for increased armaments; in a speech over the radio he declares that he is not in favor of an overwhelming force but only of an army of reasonable size with effective reserves.

The amount of money appropriated continues to stagger the public. The War Department's military expenditures have increased from $108,382,063 in 1913 to approximately $375,000,000—the total of the strictly military expenditures in the pending record-breaking army bill of $543,000,000. The navy bill, if it stays at the limit fixed in the new budget, will bring the total for army and navy to approximately $950,000,000, to which will be added sums set aside by the WPA and PWA not yet expended which may carry the total as high as $1,200,000,000, or much more than the entire cost of the United States government in 1916. The President is also asking in an especial bill that the naval reserves be increased by no less than 110,000 men; thus we shall have an additional fixed charge for the maintenance of these reserves as soon as they are established. Last year the Congress authorized the construction of six new air bases to cost $12,000,000, but that money has not yet been appropriated. The navy has just asked for an additional 221,000 tons of auxiliary ships merely to carry ammunition and supplies, and so it goes. When is it to end?

It is obvious from this that we are engaged in an armament race with the rest of the world. Russia has taken the lead with the largest standing army in the world, 1,300,000 men, costing, with the Russian navy, the huge sum of $7,000,000,000 a year. To this is added the announcement that they are going to build their navy up to rival the Japanese.

No one knows what the Germans are spending on armaments or how rapidly their plans are going forward, although even conservative observers calculate that by 1939 they will be "ready." Ready, that is, to plunge the world into another period of slaughter. Stanley Baldwin gives as one of the reasons for the great new British arms program the fact that certain ships now building for the German navy will be completed in two years instead of five. Hoover, when he was President, bewailed the fact that the world was spending $5,000,000,000 a year for armaments while many countries were on the verge of bankruptcy. I do not know whether he included the Russian figures in this estimate or not, but if he did, the world's army and navy expenditures have gone up at least seven or eight billions a year more because of the German rearmament, our own great increase in expenditures, and the enormous Russian outlay. It would not be surprising if the world were spending today twelve or thirteen billions a year for increasing armaments. Yet Calvin Coolidge spoke the truth when he said that no amount of armament ever kept a country out of war or insured it victory when it got into war.

It is plain that we are rapidly reaching the ideal of all militarists, when the world will be entirely in arms. But will the world be a better and safer place with all the nations armed to the teeth? Wouldn't they be just as well off relatively if none of them armed at all? If it is true, as so many people insist, that armaments lead to war, of course these great equipments and huge armies will sooner or later lead to a terrific explosion. Stanley Baldwin declared only three years ago that if a new armament race began, a number of nations would be bankrupted. Somehow it seems to me perfectly idiotic that human beings should continue to place their faith in weapons and armed men instead of trying to find some other way of settling their international disputes.

So far as we are concerned, it would not be out of place for the American public to ask its government, first, against whom we are arming; secondly, whether we are getting a dollar's worth of defense for every dollar invested, since high army and navy officers declare that this is not the case; thirdly, whether we have a defense program which is meant for defense and not for offense; whether there is any coordination whatsoever between army and navy—which army and navy officers also deny; whether if we are truly on the defensive and have no idea of aggression, as the President has repeatedly said, the last time at the grave of the Unknown Soldier on last Armistice Day, we need 35,000-ton battleships, and so on. One of the highest officers in the navy assured me only a week or ten days ago that it would be impossible for the American and Japanese fleets to wage war against each other. If this is true, ought we not to make a great change in our whole policy? As it is, it is contended that we are ladling out money with little or no reference to any sound policy, just as the President has been pouring out money for public works without a far-reaching program.

BROUN'S PAGE

WHEN and if Frank Knox becomes the President of the United States it is not likely that relief allowances will be particularly generous, for the Chicago editor is rigorous in his ideas of thrift. "The Story of Frank Knox" is running serially in an interesting clip sheet issued by the Frank Knox for President Committee. In the first instalment one may read:

"His first job, at the age of eleven, was carrying newspapers. He got up at three o'clock in the morning to deliver 100 papers to subscribers, pay $1.25 a week. After school he delivered 100 more for $1 a week."

So far so good. The work was arduous, but it made a man of the little merchant and gave him his first lessons in the freedom of the press. It is the subsequent sentences which give one pause.

"Frank's mother was thrifty, and she taught him to save part of his wages every week. That became a habit. In life and in business he learned never to spend more than his income. His mother taught him that, and upon that lesson he built his newspapers in later life."

Anybody who has not only lived but saved money on $2.25 a week is likely to set the unemployed upon singularly short rations. Personally I am more attracted by Frank's father than by his mother. The Colonel seems to have learned thrift by both direct and ricochet fire, for it is recorded of William Edwin Knox that he was "trained as a plumber and steamfitter but when Frank was born he was an oyster-market man near Faneuil Hall." Four years later the family moved to Nova Scotia, where William Edwin went into the lobster-canning business. "That was not a success," records the Colonel's biographer, "and the family moved back to Boston, broke."

Next we find the enterprising William Edwin Knox moving out to Grand Rapids, Michigan, to make a fresh start. Here the head of the house went into marketing, but the biographer is forced to record, "He was too easy in giving credit and the business was never a great success."

It is an extremely interesting study for Freudians, for we find this Presidential candidate conditioned by an ambivalent early life. Probably even today he is torn between the impulse to follow his father's easy credit ways and become a New Dealer and the tendency to be swayed by his mother's example and emulate Governor Landon, the Kansas Coolidge. The stimulating candor of the clip sheet makes all things plain. The split tradition of the family has committed the Colonel to a definite political and economic position. His subconscious plants him precisely in the middle of the road. In fact he's rutted in it.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST has gone in for a series of articles about the freedom of the press. They are reprinted from an address made by M. Lyle Spencer, Dean of the School of Journalism at Syracuse. Mr. Hearst seems much comforted by the statement of the Dean that the masses do not like American newspapers very much. When the Sage of San Simeon notices people edging away, he likes to be told that there is nothing personal in it.

The Dean thinks that it was monstrous that anybody should have suggested that Colonel Lindbergh went abroad because he and his family had been plagued by the high-power methods which Hearst executives imposed upon their reporters and camera men. I assume that the good Dean has J. David Stern in mind when he says, "The whole yarn smelled of holier-than-thou newspaper practice, where one paper or one group gets and avails itself of an opportunity to throw stink bombs at a competitor—usually to its own eventual discredit."

But there has been no denial of the New York Post's story that Hearst camera men forced the Lindbergh car to the sidewalk so that they could get a picture of the baby. Just why the Dean feels that it is discreditable for one paper to expose such practices in another I do not know. It may be that the Dean's nose for buttered bread is even keener than his nose for news.

The Dean's device for capturing lost confidence is that all publishers should stick together and never peach upon each other. He recommends this unholy alliance as a means of protecting the freedom of the press. The best and the liveliest journalism can be found, in my opinion, only where competing publications keep sharp check upon each other. When all the publishers begin to walk around arm in arm, the reading public suffers. I like to see editors get mad at each other, because in such circumstances they may begin to make interesting revelations.

Of course, there ought to be some regular service which studies news just as advertising has been studied. Such a service might furnish information on how much benzoate of soda the reader is getting with his political dispatches and how much saccharine per column on the editorial page. Certainly when a publisher uses artificial coloring matter the clients have a right to know. And in spite of Dean Spencer's suggestion that any kind of skulduggery can be hushed up by a little friendly cooperation, I have a notion that the truth will pop out. My only worry is that the truth, like the groundhog, is apt to get frightened by its shadow and scurry back into hiding once again.

THE punishment of General Hagood, while wholly in line with precedent, was a stupid political blunder on the part of the Administration. And yet in the long run it may not work against the President. When he does a foolish thing the recollection of it is usually wiped out by the much more stupid things said or done by his opponents. Colonel McCormick of the Chicago Tribune is the lifesaver in this case with the statement, "If we do not have a Republican victory next fall, this nation will cease to be a republic."

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE POLITICAL SUBJECT

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

A FRIEND of mine who had been a student of Professor John Dewey once had the temerity to ask him an impertinent question. "Why is it," he demanded, "that you express your ideas in a form which the democracy you so much admire cannot possibly understand?" Professor Dewey put his arm about the disciple's shoulder and replied with that mildness so characteristic of him, "I am making a career for you younger men whose business it will be to translate my works."

Not infrequently I have wished that the same question might be put to various imaginative writers—poets in particular—who address the proletariat in a manner which seems to assume that the typical worker is naturally well grounded in the symbolist poets and the work of Mr. Eliot. One such is Stephen Spender, but Mr. Spender has just published a volume of criticism,* which may be later reviewed, one purpose of which seems to be to disentangle him from the embraces of those who over-hastily and over-enthusiastically welcomed him into the ranks of propagandist poets.

He has, he admits, a "political subject," but the phrase implies something a good deal less specific than might at first sight be supposed. It means that he writes about man as part of society, that the world of thoughts and feelings with which he deals is not exclusively either a private or a hypothetical one. But it is far from meaning that his poetry is intended to advocate a specific political program or that its purpose is to serve as a "weapon" in any sense acceptable to those who like to talk of the "artistic front."

He is, to be sure, a "socialist artist." As such he is concerned with "realizing in his own work the ideas of a classless society; that is to say, applying those ideas to the life around him and giving them their reality." But he is not "primarily concerned with ways and means" because—dreadful heresy to those who insist that attitudes are the product of conditions, not conditions the product of attitudes—"if man changes . . . the economic system will change also." What is worse, Mr. Spender also quotes with approval some of the strictures made by Max Eastman in his "Artists in Uniform." The artist must not be subservient to a party because it is his business to criticize in terms of their human value the results produced by any party's activity. "Unless artists insist upon their right to criticize, to be human and even 'humanitarian,' communism will become a frozen era, another ice age."

One does not have to follow left-wing criticism very closely to perceive a certain drift in the direction of the first article of Mr. Spender's creed. I fancy, for example, that James T. Farrell, whose "A Note on Literary Criticism" appeared in the two last issues of The Nation, would agree quite heartily; and even in Russia there seems to be less and less of the tendency to demand that all art shall be directly didactic or hortatory in tone. But unless I am very much mistaken there is far less disposition to recognize the second claim which Mr. Spender puts forth in behalf of the artist—the claim, that is to say, to a certain autonomy by virtue of which the artist himself has a right to decide what approach he shall employ.

Mr. Spender, if I understand him aright, wants the function of the artist to be recognized as coordinate with that of the political philosopher. To him it seems that the independence of the poet's judgment is necessary if criticism from his point of view is to have any value; and it is just this independence of which the Russian state seems to have only a very faint conception. It may, for example, order a revival of the classic, or decide at a given moment that the time has come to encourage the production of works not narrowly political in their implications. But by the very fact that it does so it indicates clearly enough that it still assumes that artistic policy will continue to be imposed upon the artist and from above.

Some months ago, for example, writers were told that they should now concern themselves more actively than they had been accustomed to do with romantic love. There even appeared in one of the leading newspapers an article which urged some form of public rebuke for those citizens who showed themselves incapable of experiencing this noble emotion. But though this change was urged upon me at the time as a striking example of increasing liberalism, I could not but feel that there was more significance in the fact that one was now commanded to love than in the fact that the official disapproval of this activity had been at last removed. "Liberalism" of this sort reminds one of the sort so dictatorially enforced by the Great Catherine in Shaw's play, or even of the little sketch in which Miss Beatrice Lillie appeared as a harassed cockney mother spending the day with her fretful child at a dismal seaside resort. When the child whimpered too much, Miss Lillie put him across her knee and exclaimed to the accompaniment of sundry resounding smacks: "I brought you here to enjoy yourself, and enjoy yourself you will."

Only a week or two ago the famous and much-feted operatic composer Shostakovich was suddenly cast forth into outer darkness. Without warning Pravda declared a newly formulated conviction that the true spirit of Soviet music was classical rather than experimental, and denounced Shostakovich's work. Almost immediately it was all but banished from the Moscow theaters. The Union of Soviet composers rearranged its program for the coming year to eliminate his operas and ballets. The Bolshoi Theater canceled plans to present his opera "Lady Macbeth of Mtensk"—only recently a great triumph—and two other Moscow theaters stopped rehearsals on his recent ballet "Limpid Stream."

*"The Destructive Element." By Stephen Spender. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $2.

Perhaps all this indicates that the Soviet authorities are to be congratulated upon recognizing the claims of the classical style in the arts. But it certainly does not indicate any tendency to recognize the right and the duty of the artist to explore in his own way and from his own point of view the artistic possibilities of the world in which he finds himself. Neither does it indicate any disposition to permit him to appeal to the suffrage of his audience. On the contrary it reaffirms the conception of him as one whose function it is to follow a party line which is artistic as well as political.

Almost at the moment when this artistic purge was taking place George Soule was publishing in the New Republic his opinion that "the Russian theater is as far ahead of ours as our plumbing is ahead of theirs." Perhaps. But Mr. Shostakovich, sitting amid the ruins of his reputation, may be pardoned if he wonders whether it would also be true to say that the playwright in Moscow is that much better off than the plumber in New York.

BOOKS

Appraising the Dictators

DICTATORSHIP IN THE MODERN WORLD. Edited by Guy Stanton Ford. University of Minnesota Press. $2.50.

THIS book has destroyed another myth, namely, that scholars when they write are ponderous, prolix, and obscure. The essays in this volume are brilliant, brief, and to the point.

Although the authors show little love for dictators or dictatorship, they maintain an objectivity that is refreshing in these propaganda-infested days. Like Veblen in his treatment of the toper, they endeavor to understand rather than to defend or denounce. They are concerned with dictatorships as a system rather than with dictators as individuals. Mussolini may be a "Sawdust Caesar," Hitler a political Savonarola, and Stalin a glorified "Charlie" Murphy, but modern dictatorship is, as Max Lerner says, something more than a madman's dream of power. Nor is it merely a form of crisis government. Dictatorship in the modern world is not to be confused with the exercise of emergency powers under a Defense of the Realm Act, an Article 48, or a National Recovery Act. Max Lerner writes:

It is a complete scheme of life. It seems at first sight to represent a reversal of our whole cultural and political drift during the past three centuries. Actually, however, it is a direct and natural outgrowth of our present society. The dilemmas which fascism [for example] seeks to resolve are our dilemmas, the institutions it wished to conserve are the basic economic institutions of our society, the loyalties it appeals to are the loyalties that attach to the nation-state which we have created. The militarism it exploits is the same militarism that leads to our own wars, the passions it channels to its purposes are the race and class passions that grow out of the competitive struggle inherent in our society.

In short, modern dictatorship of the Italian or German variety finds its institutional roots and its ideological rationalizations in the capitalistic, competitive culture of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. It represents, in a sense, nationalistic capitalism with its democratic mask removed. More precisely, perhaps, in the case of Germany its evolution follows the familiar Aristotelian cycle of democracy degenerating through demagoguery into dictatorship. The skilful mobilization of discontent growing out of social insecurity provides mass support for a class state. National Socialism is not to be regarded as an alien system cruelly imposed upon a bankrupt German democracy. Its roots extend deep into German culture—deeper, indeed, than the roots of the Weimar system. Moreover, it is not a mere imitation of Italian fascism.

Those [says Harold Deutsch] who are disposed to regard the Hitlerite dictatorship as inspired in the main by the example of Mussolini and Italy forget that the National Socialist program was conceived two years before the fascisti marched on Rome. This misconception goes hand in hand with the tendency to confine the search for the origins of Hitlerism to the sequelae of the World War, which is to forget that Nietzsche and Houston Stewart Chamberlain ever lived, and to interpret Spenglerism as a post-war phenomenon.

This volume will be disconcerting to those who would fit modern dictatorship into a single rigid mold. The pattern shifts from time to time and place to place, not only in organization but in terms of origins and objectives. J. Fred Rippy's gallery of Spanish-American dictators offers abundant evidence of this. One common element, however, appears to be necessary. All of them—Juarez, Díaz, Santa Cruz, Páez, Flores, Sarmiento, and Castillo—arose out of chaos, confusion, insecurity, and social collapse. It was the absence rather than the presence of a stable hierarchy of wealthy capitalists, churchmen, and landlords that made dictatorship possible, and even necessary. Nor was it altogether evil.

During the age of the dictators [says Professor Rippy] population and wealth increased, and progress was made in art and literature. The expense of the new order was great, but its benefits should not be ignored.

The similarity in method of Fascist and Communist dictatorships has tended to obscure the fundamental contrasts in origin and purpose which they embody. Both, it is true, are for the moment anti-democratic. But the Communist's opposition is based on the identification of contemporary democracy with monopoly capitalism, whereas the Fascist assault is based on the assumption that democracy is but the advance agent of equalitarian socialism. Communism is secular, scientific, and pragmatic; and in theory, at least, represents the logical culmination of the democratic principles of liberty and equality. The recent liberalization of election methods in Russia and the relaxation of repressive measures are cited as evidence of the essentially democratic purpose of the Communist regime. Moreover, communism is internationalist in outlook. Fascist dictatorship is "charismatic, nationalistic, and permanent." It represents a philosophy of regimentation and inequality as the enduring principle of social organization.

Fascism can claim that dictatorship is an essential element of its doctrine and therefore the justified means to achieve an end perfectly in harmony with the means. Communism regards dictatorship only as the necessity of a transitional period; for it, the question remains open how far the way followed will influence the end pursued.

It would be presumptuous to undertake even a partial summary of the contents of this remarkable volume. Henry Spencer's essay on the Mussolini regime is a brilliant account of its origin, methodology, and objectives. Nowhere have I seen so much information packed into so few pages. The same may be said of Denis Brogan's sober discussion of the Prospects for Democracy. It is surprising, for example, that such militaristic leaders as Hitler and Mussolini should overlook the fact that the last war was won by democratic governments. In the long run any government to survive must meet the minimum expectations of its people. Ultimately the dictator's fate will "depend upon his ability to deal successfully with the foreign and domestic difficulties of his country." How long the masses will "be content with the continuous and reckless drawing of bills upon the future" remains to be seen.

PETER H. ODEGARD

Races, Nations, and Fathers-in-Law

WE EUROPEANS. By Julian S. Huxley and A. C. Haddon.

With a Contribution by A. M. Carr-Saunders. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

HITLER and Madison Grant will not approve of this book; nor will those who, fearing the destruction of their own particular cultural group, are willing to deny their intelligence in their frantic efforts to maintain their prestige. Such people have seized upon heredity and, pointing to its power to maintain differences between pure breeds of domestic animals, have in the name of science developed a mythology of pure human breeds. By ascribing a heroic past to one of these, argument is found for its heroic future, and a continuity of heredity is invoked to combat social discontinuity.

This doctrine has been advertised so vociferously and with so much show of conviction that it has led a modern nation to commit cultural suicide in order, ostensibly, to reestablish its mythical "racial" unity and thereby its legendary preeminence. But Germans include such diverse ancestry that before this fictitious unity can be realized, many besides that cultural group called Jews will have to be eliminated. Even the present leaders, who exalt the Teutonic type as fair, long-headed, tall, and virile, include among themselves the opposite traits: Hitler's darkness, Rosenberg's broad head, Goebbels's shortness, Göring's stoutness, and Streicher's lack of virility. It is high time that the rest of the world should hear from unimpassioned ethnologists before all minds become emotionally blind to ethnological facts.

Read this book and thereafter hesitate to speak of races of men! For here is set down for all to read the history of biological differences between European groups. Unanswerable questions cloud many parts of this history, and the necessary qualifications make difficult reading, but one point stands out with great clearness: that different groups of men have wandered back and forth over Europe from earliest times, and whenever two groups have met, interbreeding has occurred. In Europe today all peoples, no matter how uniform their culture, come from mixed ancestry. There are no races comparable to domestic breeds. But animal experimentation does explain the continued variability shown by men of mixed ancestry. The breed is not a unit of heredity; even the purest breed of dog depends on great numbers of hereditary units (genes) which are held in constant assortment by mating within the breed; but after outbreeding these units reappear in all possible combinations and continue to recombine for many generations. The diversity of the geographic distribution of these units gives the impression of dramatic differences when extremes are compared, but between all of these diverse combinations of units occur continuous intergrades. National boundaries do not and cannot separate certain groups of genes. Tribal loyalty has evolved into patriotism, but the biological relationship has dropped out; the pater in patriotism is only a father-in-law.

The gist of the book is given by its introductory and concluding chapters and its maps. The independence and repetitiousness of the various chapters on the history, methods, and pitfalls of ethnology, as well as those on specific ethnic groups, give the impression of a collected series of essays. A shorter, better-integrated presentation might have more influence and command greater respect. While pleading for objective study, the authors give much space to frankly conjectural accounts of certain ethnic groups. To go so far into Mendelian heredity as to discuss the recombinations following a cross involving ten independent genes, without mentioning that genes within the same chromosome do not show this independent reassortment (the whole subject of linkage), may seem unfair to hostile critics. And, finally, to show by photographs of sixteen persons (answers at the back) that nations include individuals divergent from the reputed type does not go very far toward proving that nations are not biological units; particularly when it is urged that not averages but frequency distributions are required to describe populations.

But whatever its imperfections, the book stands alone, and Messrs. Huxley, Haddon, and Carr-Saunders are to be thanked for rendering an important service. Here you will find a sane view of the contribution of ethnology to political problems.

E. C. MACDOWELL

Brilliant Taxidermy

THE THINKING REED. By Rebecca West. The Viking Press. $2.50.

YOUNG, beautiful, rich, and tragically widowed, Isabelle was the daughter of one of those St. Louis families which have never lost their French character. What she dreaded more than anything else was to be betrayed by impulse into an act of violence, and all the effort of her sensitive and humorous mind was bent on imposing order and reason on her life.

It was her perverse fate, therefore, to be constantly in a position from which only violence could save her. In her loneliness after the death of her husband she fled to the "violent frivolity" of André, whose mind was as mediocre as his body was beautiful, and who brought to love "a midwifely sententiousness." From him she rescued herself by an act unreasonable and disorderly in its violence, hoping thus to be free to accept the quiet haven which Laurence Vernon, master of serene Mount Iris, had offered her. But he had been witness to what he conceived to be her madness; from his new coldness she fled to the "violent heat" of Marc Sallafranque, and married him. Though he enjoyed kicking waiters with his yellow shoes, and insulting dowagers, she found peace with him until the moment when from his drunkenness and his insane passion for gambling there was no escape except a new violence on her part, another and still more epoch-making disorderly scene. Thereafter she hated him for the violence to which he had driven her; but in the end, inevitably, she must return to him because, in spite of his violence and irrationality, in spite of the fact that "all his ties were with the strong and not with the weak, he would not have a sparrow fall anywhere in the world."

This is the plot; but the plot does not matter. For though Miss West assembles characters and backgrounds and analyzes them with the understanding and neatness so familiar in her criticism, she cannot be said to be a novelist; she is the most brilliant of taxidermists. On her wide travels in the jungles of Europe she has captured many strange beasts; and she arranges them in her pleasant sunlit museum with an unerring eye for their peculiarities, in attitudes which reveal their essential characteristics, and against backgrounds which she herself has painted in colors only a little more precise and bright than nature. One looks at them and cries, "For a moment I thought they were alive!"

Miss West writes with the easiest brilliance; the broad river of her style is broken constantly with small waterfalls of epigrams, always unexpected and always delightful. But all this ease and brilliance and humor never conceal the seriousness of Miss West's mind, or her loyalty to her convictions. With the traditionally masculine weapons of logic and irony she combats the limitations which men at their best still impose upon their women; most bitterly of all, the masculine invention of "feminine intuition," that phrase by which men rationalize their determination not to admit that there is such a thing as feminine intelligence. Beneath the fantastic exteriors with which human beings laboriously fortify themselves, she can detect weakness, fatuity, but also decency; and that decency is the chief concern of her main characters, and the chief reason why a real liking, for both characters and author, early imposes itself on the reader.

KATHARINE SIMONDS

The Uses of Plausibility

THE SON OF MARIETTA. By Johan Fabricius. Translated from the Dutch by Irene Clephane and David Hallett. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

AS a rule the novel of romance prefers plot to plausibility, unless the latter follows gratuitously from the former. It is a matter of small concern with practitioners of this order that a given effect, instead of proceeding from a given cause, is eventually determined by the requirements of pace and suspense. As long as he counts himself amused, the reader, so the theory goes, is prepared to anticipate instead of appraise; and it accordingly becomes the chief task of the romancer—in the opinion of romancers—to invent as complexly as he can.

Johan Fabricius's three-in-one romance is notable for the reason that it attempts a fusion of the two objectives and fails, not through a lack of either plausibility or inventiveness, but through an inadequate distribution of the parts. In general "The Son of Marietta" need make no apologies for the genre to which, by virtue of its eighteenth-century background and general derring-do, it must be assigned. Despite the cavalier vigor with which he has attacked the problem of projecting an age and a country foreign to his own, the author makes it clear that he is moved by something less florid than the picaresque ideal. For the space of at least a book and a half—that portion of the novel which concerns the fortunes of Marietta up to the birth of Benedetto, her son,—the story achieves as rich and sensitive a plausibility as is possible with the devices of the professed realist; and the entire section takes on a distinction in direct proportion to the justness of this portrait.

It is with the young manhood of the hero that the reader first senses the sharp division of emphasis. Fabricius here gathers cloak and sword into an old portmanteau and sends the young Benedetto packing to Venice and a certain "little Gothic palace in the Rio di San Felice." We are permitted a glimpse of the palace, planted into its setting like a slide in a stereopticon:

Pale gray and slender rose the little Gothic palace out of the green-black waters of the Rio di San Felice. It had small rose-windows and a balcony of carved stone tendrils and foliage. . . . Behind a low wall of the same tender gray stood several austere cypresses, black as ink. . . . The garden opened onto a miniature harbor just large enough to contain a gondola, and protected by a gate that autumn had covered with bright red leaves.

Don't Miss the SOVIET UNION

in 1936

The intelligent traveler cannot afford to overlook the U.S.S.R. in his European vacation plans in 1936. Drawing towards the completion of its Second Five Year Plan, the Soviet Union is making rapid changes in industry, agriculture and in all fields of culture. Rates for tourists have not changed from previous years. They are still $5.00 per day third class; $8.00 tourist class and $15.00 first class. The recent stabilization of the rouble is an advantage in the purchase of travel incidentals. The daily tour rates cover all essentials: hotels, meals, all transportation on tour, sightseeing daily, trained guide-interpreters. Write to Intourist for illustrated booklet and colored map NA-3 of the U.S.S.R.

Apply to Your Travel Agent

INTOURIST, INC.

545 Fifth Avenue, New York

BURLINGTON

The Syllogism of America Today

More and better business is imperatively demanded by the conditions of today. More factory goods and more farm goods MUST be produced and sold through quick turnover if America is to come through into the clear light of prosperity.

Two Reasons Why

- (1) Bigger and better industry is urgently required as a fiscal base to carry the growing tax-load—since all taxes are ultimately paid out of PRODUCTION alone and not out of "money".
- (2) Industrial expansion is needed to absorb unemployed labor, which will increase mass buying-power and cut down relief taxation.

Blocked by Prevailing Set-up

But industrial expansion is blockaded by the prevailing economic set-up, which forces productive capital to operate between the upper millstone of heavy taxation and the lower millstone of recurrently inflating ground rent. The mere, initial cost of ground alone defeats not only government projects of slum clearance but also private initiative in the erection of badly needed new housing throughout the country—thus keeping a great deal of labor out of work, depressing mass-power to buy goods, and narrowing the fiscal base. The housing illustration is but one of hundreds to the same effect.

Like It or Not

The only way out is to shift the main burden of taxation from PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL to ground values, urban and rural, improved and vacant.

Productive Capital the Goat

Productive Capital, then, is overloaded with taxation and compelled to pay billions for the rental or purchase of ground; while at the same time further tax burdens are proposed by Townsendites, Bonusites, and Share-the-wealthites. Moreover, to cap the climax, the Marxites mistakenly identify productive capital as the central villain of the economic tragedy, and advocate its total confiscation. More and more people are studying the logic of the American economic situation in—

SAFEGUARD PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL,

by Louis Wallis

(Reading time only one hour)

Seventy-five cents at bookstores,
or direct from

DOUBLEDAY, DORAN & CO.
GARDEN CITY, LONG ISLAND, N. Y.

No devotee of the popular operetta will fail to identify at sight the "green-black waters" and the "balcony of carved stone," "the cypresses black as ink," the little "harbor just large enough to contain a gondola," and the postern gate picked out synthetically with "bright red leaves"—and identify them in terms of cardboard. Nor is it probable that the register of chapter heads which follows will call forth in such a reader any but the very homeliest sensations of rapport: The Fair Maid in the Box, A Woman Without a Heart, Music in the Night, In a Garden by the Brenta. For this reader, the subsequent rehearsal of Benedetto's unhappy amours with Gracias, the Spanish seductress, and Leah, the melancholy young Jewess, will recommend itself with the vested authority of the obvious, the shopworn, and the traditional. But it is hardly to be expected that those who found the preceding volume and a half reason for gratulation will share his enthusiasm.

The "problem" here is of course one of proportion, of focus, primarily. It is readily summed up in the query: To what extent may the writer of romance who strives after something more than diversion alone defer the appraisal of character to the simple detailing of events qua events? The query is not a "modern" one and has been tellingly prosecuted in the past by such a work as Thackeray's "Henry Esmond." There, at least, it is made sufficiently plain that a mirror held up to one century is still a mirror held up to all of nature.

BEN BELITT

More Books for Guinea Pigs

AMERICAN CHAMBER OF HORRORS. By Ruth de Forest Lamb. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

GUINEA PIGS NO MORE. By J. B. Matthews. Covici-Friede. $2.

EAT, DRINK, AND BE WARY. By F. J. Schlink. Covici-Friede, $2.

THE education of the consumer continues apace, with three more books on the popular practice of fraud. Two are by those prolific friends of the consumer, F. J. Schlink and J. B. Matthews of Consumers' Research; the third is a dignified, well-documented, and effective apologia for the Food and Drug Administration, written by its chief educational officer, Ruth de Forest Lamb.

Her book, "American Chamber of Horrors," is, according to the blurb writer, not "official," but unofficially the administration's chief must surely have blessed its author and wished the book godspeed. For Miss Lamb writes of the courageous war waged by food-and-drug men against adulterators, quacks, and charlatans. To members of Consumers' Research who have been regaled with stories and incidents of the sloth, dishonesty, and big-business bias of the administration, Miss Lamb's presentation of the other side of the picture will be both novel and instructive. Yet the administration's budget for 1936—an increase over previous years—allows only a little more than a cent per person for safeguarding consumers; there are only seventy-eight food-and-drug inspectors for field work, and another handful for laboratory and administrative duties. Equally ridiculous, Miss Lamb points out, is the antiquated and inadequate act governing the administration.

In making her case for the Food and Drug Administration, and for the passage of the Copeland bill, the author repeats the now old but still horrible story of the dye that blinded one young woman and killed another but is still within the law and being sold; and the story of the depilatory made of rat poison against which the administration has no legal authority to act. She is not interested merely in muckraking or in naming names. Dispassionately, with none of the hysterics which have weakened the later works of Schlink and his school, Miss Lamb conducts her readers through the American Chamber of Horrors and points to the woeful impotency of the present consumer agencies. Thus far Miss Lamb agrees with other critics of the present set-up. She differs, however, in the suggested remedy. "With all its defects," she says, "the Copeland bill is not so bad as opponents on the extreme left would have you believe. Their opinions are naturally colored by their political philosophy, with which no purely remedial legislation can be entirely harmonious. . . . They may, indeed, be entirely right. But we are still living under a capitalist system, and unless we propose to overthrow that system we must, if we are going to correct such abuses as those which flourish in the food, drug, and cosmetic industries, be realistic about them."

This is a book which everyone, even those surfeited by exposés written for the hundred million guinea pigs, should read. Pictures of the Chamber of Horrors exhibits add point to the text and the appendices are in themselves a worth-while contribution to consumer literature, including as they do an outline of the legislative history of the Copeland bill, data on the cost and composition of such well-known cosmetics as Coty's, Elizabeth Arden, Bourjois, and others, and a government report on the grades of 500 advertised items of canned food.

Mr. Matthews's book also has a valuable appendix, a proposed enabling act for a Department of the Consumer, drafted by Oscar S. Cox, assistant corporation counsel of New York City. Unquestionably consumers would be more adequately served if the several government agencies which now devote a part of their activities to safeguarding the public's interest were integrated into such a department and implemented with power to control business practice. For the rest, Mr. Matthews's book, in spite of its philosophic pretensions, has little to offer to sound social theory. In his brave new world the capitalistic system would continue under the dictatorship of the consumer. Problems of quality, standards, and adulteration would be solved; but no attention would be given to production and the distribution of wealth. Mr. Matthews is a rabid anti-Communist. He offers empirical evidence of the failure of Soviet Russia: seven out of eight samples of Soviet toilet soap were ranked by Consumers' Research standards as "C—Not Recommended"; Russian face powder and contraceptives were found equally undesirable.

Mr. Schlink's "Eat, Drink, and Be Wary" is the first of his Consumers' Research crusading books undertaken without the assistance of a collaborator. The experiment is not successful. Lacking a steadying hand, Mr. Schlink flounders hysterically and indulges in shrill outcries against his pet hates. Badly organized, repetitious, and devoid of scientific objectivity, the Schlink invective loses force and meaning. This is unfortunate because there is a real need for a popular exposé of food frauds and faddists and of dangerous practices current in the food industries. While the milk trust, aided by state-supported advertising campaigns, is urging greater consumption of milk, it is instructive—and consoling—to learn that according to respectable medical opinion a quart of milk a day per child and a pint per adult are too much. There are many families who never could afford this quota and others who never would drink it. However, ranting against pasteurization because the expensive equipment required is out of reach of the small distributor and then waxing indignant over two epidemics of septic sore throat is ridiculous. Muddled thinking and bad temper are evident throughout the book. RUTH BRINDZE

WHAT IS THE WAY OUT?

Here is the Communist answer

MR. BROWDER, Secretary of the Communist Party, U. S. A., is its authorized spokesman. In this direct and straightforward volume he clears up many current misconceptions regarding the Communist attitude toward the use of force, toward the family, religion, the "united front," etc. Moreover, Mr. Browder discusses the compelling political and economic issues of the day from the Communist point of view.

WHAT IS COMMUNISM?

By EARL BROWDER

Secretary, Communist Party, U. S. A.

$2.00 At All Bookstores

VANGUARD, 424 Madison Ave., New York

CHEESE IT -THE COPS!

By Emanuel H. Lavine

*Author of "The Third Degree"
(the book that was never answered)*

- ▶ Unadulterated
- ▶ Unperfumed
- ▶ Unfumigated
- ▶ UNCENSORED

The real "low-down" on the police of our great cities

$2.50 At All Bookstores

VANGUARD - 424 Madison Ave., N. Y. C.

Consider The LIVING WORLD!

Today, with the pace of social change more rapid than ever before, intelligent travel is increasingly interesting and valuable. EDUTRAVEL was created to plan your travel as a constructive cultural adventure . . . to direct your eyes upon the living world.

The following two Field Courses illustrate the wide range of special EDUTRAVEL projects. Send for booklets.

CONTEMPORARY ART AND ARCHITECTURE

Interviews with leading artists in England, France, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Austria and the Soviet Union. Auspices of New School for Social Research.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT ABROAD

Study of delinquency and reform under Joseph F. Fishman, sponsored by The New School for Social Research. Discussions with prominent penologists in 5 countries.

If you are interested in travel to specific countries or in other specialized fields, write stating your needs. The EDUTRAVEL program may include just what you want . . . or we will gladly plan independent tours. Address Dept. NA-3.

EDUTRAVEL

An Institute for Educational Travel

535 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK, N. Y.

Land tours in Europe in conjunction with Amerop Travel Service Inc. (in U.S.S.R., in cooperation with Intourist, Inc.).

What's Behind All This Talk About

CRAFT OR INDUSTRIAL UNIONS?

KEEP POSTED on one of the most significant movements of modern times—Aiming to organize more than 30,000,000 unorganized—Led by John L. Lewis, Chas. P. Howard and other heads of powerful unions.

Full news and information now available for individual subscribers at a special rate of

$1

INCLUDING—

1. Subscription to UNION NEWS—weekly news sheet of the Committee for Industrial Organization—for 1936.
2. All future pamphlets issued by C. I. O. in 1936, including latest illustrated pamphlet: "The Case for Industrial Organization."

Three pamphlets already issued may be obtained for an additional 20c.

COMMITTEE FOR INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATION

45 Rust Building

Washington, D. C.

The Middle Way

SWEDEN: THE MIDDLE WAY. By Marquis W. Childs. Yale University Press. $2.50.

THIS is a book which deserves the attention that it seems to be winning in the United States. It is a story of a people which has made astonishing progress in ordering to its own advantage the economic machinery of the modern world without violence and without confusion. It seems to the author that what the Swedes have done "constitutes a fairly well-defined middle course . . . between the absolute socialization of Russia and the end development of capitalism in America." He finds the wisdom of the Swedes "above all in their willingness to adjust, to compromise, to meet what appears to be reality. They have not been bound by a 'system,' nor have they been committed to a dogma. In a sense they are the ultimate pragmatists, interested only in the workability of the social order."

In chapters written in a livelier style than the foregoing quotation might suggest the author gives a very readable account of the achievement of the Swedish consumers' cooperatives; the admirable work in which the state, cities, and co-operatives have joined forces to provide low-cost and attractive housing; the role of the state in industry, especially in the production of power; the relation of the king, the Socialists, and the capitalists to one another; and what the farmers, following to some degree Danish practice, which the author reviews in considerable detail, have managed to do for themselves. To anyone who from a soap-box or in a social group wants to prove that able men will work effectively from some other motive than profit and that there can be a democracy in economic life which does function, Mr. Childs has presented an invaluable supply of ammunition.

His book is good, but it would be better if it gave an account of the dynamics of the change which he describes. It is fuller and better in its description of the cooperative movement than of the labor unions and the Socialist Party—the leading party in Sweden, although it does not have an absolute majority. Swedish socialism is definitely of the right wing, but it is socialism, and as such not so exclusively pragmatic as Mr. Childs implies. Moreover, as I read his book I remembered some remarks made to me by a representative of the Swedish Socialist press in America a few weeks ago, in which he expressed grave doubts concerning the adequacy of the security provided in the Swedish Utopia.

It is fair to Mr. Childs to say that he himself recognizes the limitations upon the great Swedish achievements to a degree which his hasty readers and reviewers have overlooked. For instance, the country's recovery would have been quite impossible if Sweden had not been able to profit by the friction between Great Britain and Soviet Russia to increase its timber exports to Britain at Russia's expense. Moreover, Sweden's mines and iron and steel industries have been the beneficiary of the European craze for rearmament. However much Socialists and cooperators may admire the excellence of Sweden's internal economy, recovery or prosperity based upon a race in armaments constitutes no Socialist Utopia. Denmark and little Iceland, quite comparable to Sweden in the excellence of their internal arrangements, have lost not gained by the hates, the fears, and the tariff wars of the larger nations.

Clearly it will take more than the pragmatic shrewdness, the innate democracy and good sense which a homogeneous people like the Swedes have displayed, to solve problems of plenty, peace, and freedom in our troubled world. No purely imitative policy is possible in America, whether the model be on the one hand Russia or on the other Sweden. But when all this is said there is a great deal that is reassuring, suggestive, even inspiring in what not only the Swedes but the other Scandinavian peoples have accomplished through their co-operatives, their labor unions, and their Socialist parties.

NORMAN THOMAS

DRAMA

Mr. Cohan Presents . . .

GEORGE M. COHAN is at it again. This time the play is called "Dear Old Darling" (Alvin Theater), and again the outline is that of the "crook play" which Mr. Cohan has favored more than once before. As usual it will entertain the popular audience of whose limitations he is seldom unaware; but as usual also it is, in addition, part of a private joke the exact nature of which he has never revealed because, perhaps, he does not quite understand it himself.

In the earlier days Mr. Cohan was content merely to build a better cltrap than his neighbor and to let the world beat a path to his door. If "Little Johnny Jones" and "Forty-Five Minutes from Broadway" were anything more than showman's stuff, the fact was too skilfully concealed, and at the period when they were written their author seemed at one with the audience he entertained. But as time went on Mr. Cohan began to see through the shoddiness of his tradition and to write satires on himself. Like the more sophisticated sort of prestidigitator who exposes his own tricks, he took the spectator into his confidence and concentrated attention upon the skill with which the thing could be done. Every moment which the audience could be inveigled into taking with real seriousness was followed by one in which it was invited to laugh at itself, and the motto was always, "It's fun to be fooled."

"Dear Old Darling" follows this method, and as usual it is Mr. Cohan as actor, no less than as playwright, who contributes the almost unanalyzable charm of a personality so blatant, so aggressive, and so cocksure that it would be offensive in anyone who did not have his matchless gift for a disarming blarney. Always the center of any stage, he cavorts with abandon and "mugs" outrageously. He is, indeed, the one triumphant example we have of the kind of actor whose whole success depends upon the fact that no one forgets for more than a moment that he is that particular actor no matter what part he happens to be playing. It is Cohan the showman and Cohan the personality of whom we are always aware. Every scene begins with a "Now watch me take you in!" and ends with a "Didn't I do that well?" But in between, the show is a very good show indeed. Mr. Cohan has the mercurial but irresistible insincerity of the successful scamp. He can bluster or cajole, dazzle or ingratiate. One moment he turns on the tremolo of sentiment and the next looses a wisecrack of abysmal cynicism. He is appealing one instant, cocky the next, and mocking the third. But somehow he is not inconsistent because at bottom one is somehow aware that one reality is always present—the reality of Mr. Cohan himself delighting in his gift for exploiting his own insincerity. It makes little difference that this particular play happens to be about a somewhat self-confident old gentleman who is the victim of a blackmail racket involving an eighteen-year-old girl who pursues him implacably with declarations of love. These matters are merely

An important book
that tells what others have left untold!

THE TRAGEDY OF NIJINSKY

by ANATOLE BOURMAN and D. LYMAN

Written by the closest friend of Nijinsky in his student days, this book is a fascinating revelation for anyone interested in either the man or the Ballet Russe. Bourman entered the Imperial Ballet school at the same time as Nijinsky and was for many years a member of the ballet company with him. The story he tells of Nijinsky's youthful ambitions and defeats, his brilliant rise to fame, his gay exploits with other students, the almost incredible ill-fortune which followed him from the first presents a new and delightful picture. Illustrated $3.00.

2nd Printing Before Publication

WHITTLESEY HOUSE ■ McGraw-Hill Book Co., N. Y.

VACATION TOURS

CONDUCTED and INDEPENDENT

We are arranging a number of interesting itineraries to SOVIET RUSSIA, PALESTINE and other countries including:

Russian-Spanish Tour
Scandinavian Tour
Palestine-Russian Tour
Soviet-Riviera Tour and others.

MEDICAL TOUR
For Physicians-Dentists
July 1st, 1936
Conducted by
DR. EDWARD COHEN

SPECIAL ARRANGEMENTS FOR TEACHERS

Consult us about your travel plans; our service is free of charge or obligations. Write — call for literature.

AMALGAMATED BANK OF NEW YORK

11-15 Union Square

Algonquin 4-1500

New York City

YOU KNOW
STUDS LONIGAN

—BUT HAVE YOU MET

GAS-HOUSE MCGINTY

Another novel by JAMES T. FARRELL

The Only Novelist on "The Nation's" Honor Roll

$2.50 At all bookstores Vanguard 424 Madison Ave., N. Y. C.

an excuse for an entertainment never intended to be taken very seriously and, above all else, an excuse for the almost continuous presence of his own beguiling self.

If Mr. Cohan had enjoyed the advantages or disadvantages of a literary education and of an experience with the sophisticated world, he might have turned out to be a playwright like Ferenc Molnar. His preference for adroitness over sincerity is much the same; but the difference is, of course, that Mr. Cohan belongs to Broadway about as exclusively as anyone could. His idea of an elegant home—as revealed, for example, in the principal set of this play—is the idea of a salesman for a pay-as-you-go furniture establishment. His idea of the elegantly déagé includes the audible sucking of his teeth before the delivery of a devastating comeback. Nothing could have produced exactly him except the particular show business in which he grew up, and he is, in his way, as American as Babbitt—the eternal Irish scamp as modified by New York. No one not familiar with him and his tradition could possibly understand why he has been for years the most popular personality of the New York theater both behind the curtain and in front of it. Fifty years hence no historian will be able to understand what he was like or why audiences took him to their hearts in precisely the way they did. The fact remains, nevertheless, that he is irresistible. If the present play had been either written or acted by anyone else it would have been merely another crook play to be forgotten by tomorrow. Actually it will stick in the memory because one will not be able to forget Mr. Cohan doing any one of the dozen vivid, foolish, and essentially insincere things he does.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

The Higher Jingoism

VIEWED quite generally "Rhodes" (Roxy) is an inferior motion picture. It moves slowly when it moves at all; each separate episode is allowed to die before the next one is born, so that we miss the magic of elision, the sense of having stepped from one scene into another without knowing that our feet had left the ground; and the South African settings (veritable, I believe) too seldom appear to be taking part in the action, with the result that such figures as Rhodes (Walter Huston) and Jameson (Basil Sydney) are likely to loom up with the effect of accident. Nevertheless, the film possesses the merit, in a fortnight otherwise barren, of raising a discussable and indeed a highly interesting question. Two other films have raised it recently—"Itto," a French work dealing with the conquest of Morocco, and "Frontier," a Russian work dealing with the suppression of a counter-revolutionary minority; but the question asks itself clearly enough in "Rhodes" alone.

The question had better be made to emerge from a description of what goes on. Put briefly, the story is of Rhodes's rise in South Africa from the day he met Dr. Jameson and was told he had six months (or years) to live until the day of his burial among the great stones of his favorite mountain. Between these limits he lived the life we know, and the only thing of interest at the moment is the spirit in which the events of this life are set forth. Doubtless they could have been set forth in any one of a hundred ways; and the information that the film comes from London would perhaps lead to expectations of something on the jingo side, something empire-minded. But if the film ever took that tone I was worse than deaf to it. What I heard, in fact, was an undertone of reservation so clear and strong that I could not but take it to be the music of the piece—the intended music, the conscious burden. The song it sang said in effect that Rhodes might after all have been terribly mistaken; that the destiny about which he was so eloquent might simply have been tenth-rate; that civilization and colonization may combine at any time to produce something either ineffably absurd or grossly cruel; that progress is an illusion; that empires are built not merely upon blood but upon error. Why otherwise were all our sympathies fixed on Kruger and King Lobengula? Why was Anna Carpenter allowed to be so persuasive in her criticism of Rhodes? Why was Jameson so peculiarly offensive? And why was Rhodes himself, played though he happened to be by Walter Huston, so stuffed with nothingness, so impotent to carry conviction? Oscar Homolka as Kruger and Ndanisa Kumalo as King Lobengula were the stars of the film for reasons other than those having to do with their great native capacities; they were stars, I think, because the rest of the sky was dark, and because the direction had put its heart in them alone. The direction had not believed in Rhodes and empire. It had not believed the story it was presumably telling.

The parallel with "Itto" and "Frontier" is quite exact. Our sympathies, or at any rate mine, were wholly with the Moroccan chieftain who was slain in his castle, so that the splendor of his burial by the magnanimous French failed even for a second to make me stop asking what on earth the French were doing there. So with the wilderness people of "Frontier"; I could not but resent the superior numbers of those who came from Moscow to wipe them out, and their inferior imaginations. But the question still to be asked is this: Was any of the three films thus intended? And if so, where has propaganda got to? The cultivation of ambiguity is something that any art comes to in its prime—or perhaps a bit beyond its prime. Is the art of propaganda, then, ripe to the point of rotteness; ready, in other words, to become "pure" art? I do not know. I merely ask the question, and admit in passing that there may be nothing in it after all. The Moors, the Boers, and the Russian minorities were conquered long enough ago for sentiment to have come full circle. Northern books and films about the Civil War have long been prone to take the Southern, the defeated side. Perhaps it is only time that tells us what to do in such cases—I doubt, for instance, that Haile Selassie can be the hero of any Italian film before 1960.

"The Voice of Bugle Ann" (Center Theater) borrows several actors, including Lionel Barrymore, from "Ah, Wilderness" without making the best use of them; managing, strangely enough, to be at the same time pedestrian and sentimental about the fox hound of Missouri. "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine" (Paramount), advertised as "100 per cent natural color," seemed to me to hit 175 per cent, especially in its browns and blues; but its feud was well managed. "Le Bonheur" (Cinéma de Paris), based on the play by Henri Bernstein about an anarchist who fell in love with a wealthy movie actress he had been ordered to assassinate, seemed to me false and trivial in spite of certain fine moments. As for Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers, I like them as well as anybody does, but wish that someone would write a tolerable story for them. The story of "Follow the Fleet" is even more tiresome than that of "Top Hat." Such charming persons deserve at least a vehicle that will hold together past the first dance—as "Roberta" did, I seem to remember, until the very end.

MARK VAN DOREN

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

ETHAN FROME. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon, and Raymond Massey.

LIBEL. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English courtroom play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

FEDERAL THEATER PROJECT PLAYS: "American Holiday," Manhattan Theater; "Chalk Dust," Daly's Theater.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

ANNIE OAKLEY. R.K.O. A minor American masterpiece based on the life of Buffalo Bill's best-loved sharpshooter. Barbara Stanwyck as Annie Oakley divides the honors with Sitting Bull.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE 39 STEPS. Alexander Korda. Months old, but should be seen wherever possible. A swift and beautiful thriller set in the Highlands, and one of several films which argue British leadership in the immediate future.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Alexander Korda. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
END OF SUMMER
 A comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN with
INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS
GUILD THEA., 52nd St., W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
 Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
 in association with Lee Ephraim
CALL IT A DAY
 A Comedy by Dodie Smith
 with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE
MOROSCO THEA., 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
 Matinees, Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30. Extra Matinee Wednesdays

"One of the most honest social dramas of our time."
 Brooks Atkinson, Times
LOVE ON THE DOLE
 With WENDY HILLER
SHUBERT THEA., 44th St. W. of B'way. Evgs.
 8:45, 55c to $3.30. Matinees Wednesday
 and Saturday, 2:40, 55c to $2.20

NEW THEATRE NIGHTS!! SAT. & SUN. MAR. 14th & 15th AT 8:30
 EVENINGS
 48th ST. THEATRE, 48th & L. W. of BROADWAY
 The LET FREEDOM RING ACTING TROUPE in
BURY THE DEAD
 A NEW PLAY BY ERWIN SHAW
 "The most brilliant and vital peace play of the 20th Century"—ALBERT BEIN.
 Also Condensed Version of "OVER HERE" by Walter Ben Hare
 Tickets 35c to $1.65, all Workers' Bookshops or call LOnG. 5-9116 or BRy. 9-8378

TRAVEL

TRAVEL IN SOVIET RUSSIA

With a Group, or on Your Own

Either way The Open Road helps you to more than the usual tourist sights. Well planned group travel under informed leadership affords fullest opportunities at least cost of time and money.

The Open Road offers you a choice of comprehensive trips under leadership of authorities such as Louis Fischer, Princess Skariatina, Julien Bryan, Professor Colston Warne, Joshua Kunitz, Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell Stewart, Henry Shapiro.

$372 round trip
 New York
 with a month in the Soviet Union.
 Other tours up to $850

Tenth Season

The Open Road

12th Floor, 8 W. 40th St., New York
 Cooperating with Intourist

COMING IN THE NATION

HERESY AND ART

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

M-DAY

REVIEWED BY
 WALTER MILLIS

Letters to the Editors

A LETTER FROM REXFORD TUGWELL

Dear Sirs: The Nation for January 22, 1936, printed an open letter addressed to me and signed by Tom Burke. The case mentioned by Mr. Burke has been investigated and I am glad to present herein an accurate statement of the case of Pierce White of Chambers County, Alabama.

To begin with, we have been unable to establish that Mr. Burke ever interviewed Mrs. Pierce White despite the fact that he opens his letter by boldly asserting, "I have just visited Mrs. Pierce White."

Mr. Burke's accusation that Mrs. White and her four daughters were starving is entirely incorrect. At the request of our own local officials, Miss Elna Carson, director of the Chambers County Welfare Board (not a Resettlement organization), visited Mrs. White's home after her husband had been jailed and found sufficient food to sustain the family.

The assertion that rental and parity checks were collected from the Pierce Whites is not only a falsehood but an impossibility, as the farm on which the Whites were located was not covered by an adjustment contract. The account of Mr. White was given credit for the three bales of cotton mentioned by Mr. Burke. The cotton brought $120.26, less $25.40 ginning tax.

Mr. Burke made the following statement: "Pierce White has been in jail for two and one half months now, just for selling about 200 pounds of his own seed cotton." Investigation revealed that Mr. White was sent to prison for six months, plus time to be served in lieu of payment of costs, when he pleaded guilty to trading in farm products (cotton) "between sunset and sunrise" in violation of an Alabama statute.

Mr. White knew he was violating the state statute. He knew further that the cotton involved was covered by a lien and consequently was not his property. He knew still further that he violated, ethically and legally, his agreement with the Resettlement Administration. Mr. White was arrested on a warrant sworn out by L. H. Smith, County Supervisor, who was advised by Vernon E. Jennings, his assistant, of the disposal of the cotton.

As Mr. White had violated the terms of his rehabilitation contract, Mr. Smith then took steps to drop him from the rehabilitation rolls and to recover property that was pledged as security for his loan. At the same time both Mr. Smith and Mr. Jennings reported to Miss Carson that Mr. White had been arrested and asked that his wife and children be provided with relief, if necessary. Mr. White was unable to secure bail and remained in jail until tried. The law requires that one who signs a bail bond have enough money or property to cover the amount of the bond. This law is not peculiar to Alabama. Mr. Jennings stated that he gave no unsolicited advice in regard to a bond for Mr. White.

I agree that this is an unfortunate case. However, the purpose of the Resettlement Administration is to rehabilitate poverty-stricken farmers by extending them small loans, placing them on good land, and providing them with every possible assistance. Since we deal with almost a half-million farm families, we are forced to operate on a business-like basis in order that we may do the greatest good for the greatest number.

I regret very much that Mr. White brought sorrow to his family by violating both the law of the state of Alabama and his contract with the Resettlement Administration. I regret further that the facts in this case, intentionally or unintentionally, have been misrepresented and distorted.

R. G. TUGWELL, Administrator
Washington, February 12

MR. BURKE REPLIES

Dear Sirs: Mr. Tugwell says he cannot establish the fact that I interviewed Mrs. Pierce White. Two witnesses were present at the interview. At the time I used the name Larry Ward, and Mrs. White wrote to me later under this name. Mr. Tugwell's investigators know, if he does not, why a union organizer finds it necessary to use an assumed name. The Resettlement Investigation office in Birmingham has a copy of Mrs. White's letter. It was, by the way, a plea for aid because she and her children were about to be evicted. Milton McDuff, head of the National Detective Agency, the Birmingham red squad endowed by the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company, took the original of the letter from Rob F. Hall, national-committee member of the Share-Croppers' Union, in a raid last January. Besides, I was interviewed by Resettlement investigators in Birmingham relative to the Pierce White case and gave them all the facts as I knew them.

Maybe Miss Carson of the Chambers County Welfare Board did not believe the White family was starving, but Mr. Tugwell is accepting the opinion of one who is interested in reducing relief rolls. Mrs. White told me she had only corn and peas and a cow that gave half a gallon of milk a day. This is not even what President Roosevelt called a third-class diet. It is the diet that breeds pellagra, sickness, and death, certainly not a diet for a government official to defend.

Few of the rehabilitation farmers know definitely whether or not they signed AAA contracts. It seems odd that a cotton farmer on the resettlement program did not have such a contract. The practice has been to call the resettlement farmers to meetings where they were told to sign the AAA parity and rental checks over to the resettlement field foreman. Mr. White's case is the first exception, for a resettlement cotton farmer, that I have heard of.

The statement that Pierce White "broke the law" by selling his cotton "between sunset and sunrise," and "broke his resettlement contract" by asserting his right to sell his own cotton when he was desperate for money to help his wife through childbirth, brings us to the heart of the case. The law prohibiting the sale of cotton "between sunset and sunrise" is only one of the many laws inflicted on the enslaved white and Negro share-croppers. Mr. Tugwell has denied the resettlement farmers the right to sell their own crops because Resettlement has a lien on the crop for the total debt of the farmer. The resettlement officials have seized entire crops to satisfy this government debt. The resettlement farmers had nothing when they signed contracts for this program, and the Pierce White case, representative of thousands of resettlement cases, shows that they get nothing from the program. Mr. Tugwell has catered to all the traditions of exploitation and persecution peculiar to the South instead of trying to abolish them.

Mr. Tugwell accepts at face value the word of Vernon E. Jennings that "he gave no unsolicited advice in regard to the bond for Mr. White." Did Mr. Tugwell think that Jennings would indict himself? Did Mr. Tugwell think Jennings's landlord cronies would betray him?

With this type of investigation, and with a screen of technicalities, Mr. Tugwell sees fit to drop the White case as "unfortunate." It is indeed unfortunate that there has to be a White case, and much more unfortunate that the basic elements of the White case are present in thousands of other rehabilitation cases. Does Mr. Tugwell propose to throw up his hands in despair at the problem confronting the Resettlement Administration? Mr. Tugwell can use his power and influence to get Pierce White off the chain gang immediately. He can provide the White family with a farm and decent relief. He can have Vernon Jennings thrown out of office. He can make this case an example and rectify the miserable conditions on resettlement farms all over the South. He can stop the wholesale eviction of resettlement farmers in Chambers County and many other places. He can make sure that resettlement farmers have the right to their crop and that Resettlement does not use the lien on the crop as a means of taking every last thing from the farmers. The right to live comes before debts, and the government should be the first to recognize this.

I told Mr. Tugwell's investigators that they need not expect a full story from these oppressed people without some definite guaranty of protection from landlord terror. If Mr. Tugwell is interested in facts and their social implications, other than those he gets from the landlords and their cronies in the administration, if Mr. Tugwell wants to see social justice done to these poverty-stricken people who raise the cotton for America, he has the power and influence to act.

Mr. Tugwell, by the stand taken in his letter, has forfeited all the right he ever had to be classed as a liberal.

TOM BURKE

Birmingham, Ala., February 20

"POPULAR" AND "SHALLOW"

Dear Sirs: Mark Van Doren's review (in The Nation of February 12) of my contribution to "The Movies on Trial" challenges a retort. He accuses me of "the conviction that no movie is worth mentioning as art unless it represents a technical advance over all previous movies. A corollary is that there have been no movies worth mentioning since D. W. Griffith was in his prime—since, in fact,

"Intolerance." I hardly think that anything in my essay supports this sweeping interpretation; on the contrary, I devoted many pages to enumerating the principal cinematic achievements which followed, in some cases by many years, the production of "Intolerance."

Further, Mr. Van Doren assumes, "with a touch of horror," that I do not want the cinema to remain popular. The contrary is true; I am very much concerned lest it lose its popularity—this conceivably may happen some day—and disappear completely. But I do not want it to remain popular at the cost of also remaining eternally shallow—a word which Mr. Van Doren does not think I use with discretion—or at the risk of being turned, as in Russia today, from a serious and vital art into a standardized mass-entertainment. If the film is to remain a mass-art—a dubious and dangerous position, by the way—only on the condition that free and unbridled creative experiment be forever barred from it, then perhaps it had better disappear.

Mr. Van Doren is one of the few film critics whose work I find it easy to respect; but I am frankly disappointed at his misunderstanding of the spirit of my chapter. Perhaps he will see light if I suggest, for example, that poetry, literature, and the drama be completely popularized, first by the elimination of all their unpopular accomplishments to date, and, second, by the future suppression of

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

—with—

CHARTS OF SEX ORGANS WITH DETAILED EXPLANATIONS

by ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M.D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital

a 3-Way GUIDE:

TELLS

SHOWS,

EXPLAINS:

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."
—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."
—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

"Tells the ordinary man and woman what they want to know, simply and directly. I should like to compel everyone—particularly men—to read it (they'd give women a straighter deal if they did)."
—Ethel Mannin in the New Leader

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."
—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."
—American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."
—Journal of the American Medical Association

"The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians."

by
O. B. S. Evans, M.D.,
F.A.M.A., Member White House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch.M., M.B., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecologist and Sexologist, London, England.

a 3-Way GUIDE:

CONTENTS

- Section I. Bride and Groom
- Section II. The Cold Wife—Frigidity
- Section III. The Unsatisfied Wife
- Section IV. Married Courtship
- Section V. The Perfect Physical Expression of Love
- Section VI. Illustrative Charts and Explanations

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View •
The Internal Sex Organs • The External Sex Organs • Female Sex Organs, Front View • Entrance to Female Genital Parts • Male Sex
Organs, Side View • Male Sex Organs, Front View • Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views.

(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

"From a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly. As a general thing, even in so-called normal coitus, the man considers only himself and not the woman at all."

Only $1.95

(Postage 15c extra)

EMERSON BOOKS

Dept. 365-N

333 Sixth Ave.,
N. Y. C.

FREE OFFER

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 365-N
333 Sixth Ave., New York.

Send me in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE IN MARRIAGE for FREE EXAMINATION. I will deposit $1.95 plus few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded.

Name
Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee.)

any and all creative efforts that seem, upon preliminary inspection, unlikely to win mass approval.

SEYMOUR STERN

Hollywood, February 22

Dear Sirs: If Mr. Stern and I agree (a) in our desire that the movies remain popular and (b) in our detestation of any attempt which censorship, whatever its form, may make to set them going in an artificial direction, then we would seem to agree on every essential point, and my review would appear to have misrepresented him. I freely admit that his first paragraph is more accurate as an account of the passage in question than my somewhat humorously exaggerated sentence was. But my impression persists that the adjectives "unpopular" and "shallow" have different values for us. They are deep words and I shall not presume to define them; remarking merely that I think I trust the mass judgment farther than Mr. Stern does—provided, of course, that it expresses itself innocently and is not conscious of being a mass judgment. Operating as the several judgments of seventy million individuals it gives the cinema what any art should be delighted to have, an audience both vast and eager. As for "free and unbridled experiment," I consider it necessary but should like to see it happening naturally—that is, at the centers of production and not in little studios set up to worship Art. It is perhaps unfortunate that the cinema ever discovered itself to be an art, or that the deadly distinction between art and entertainment ever thrust itself in. Perfect entertainment is perfect art, and both are trying to be what only Shakespeare ever succeeded in being: perfectly lifelike. Or, if Mr. Stern insists on the word, perfectly shallow.

MARK VAN DOREN

New York, February 25

"SAWDUST CAESAR"

Dear Sirs: While "Sawdust Caesar" represents an immense amount of industry, and although Professor Salvemini reviewed the volume enthusiastically in The Nation for January 22, I think attention ought to be called to two points.

1. Mr. Seldes makes the a priori contention that the church is good and that it alone stands for untrammelled expression. On page 259 he says, "It is quite true, as Fascists contend, that all the liberal, democratic, and intelligent minority in Italy . . . had taken refuge in the Azione Cattolica." But on page 246 Seldes writes that the church supported Mussolini in the Matteotti murder. "This was the only support Mussolini had at the time. But it was important [italics mine]." How does one resolve such a contradiction?

2. Mr. Seldes make the a priori assumption that Masonry is good and that fascism is evil. On page 184 he says, "The order . . . has remained [italics mine] the standard-bearer of freedom." And then on page 185 I am astonished to read, "From the time the first fasci were formed until after the March on Rome, Masonic lodges cooperated, went so far as to organize Fascist locals and to join the employers in subsidizing Mussolini [italics mine]." Where does the old Masonic conception of liberty and the rights of man enter the picture?

If we want to fight fascism we need to have facts presented consistently and accurately. While "Sawdust Caesar" has an imposing array of "facts," nevertheless it presents so many loopholes in the defense against fascism that friends of fascism can ridicule the liberals' efforts to preserve the old rights.

ALFRED KLAUSLER

Glendive, Mont., February 10

A PEOPLE'S THEATER

Dear Sirs: I feel it should be interesting news to readers of The Nation in the uptown areas of New York City to learn that a new theater presenting plays of social content has been organized in the Bronx, namely, the People's Theater Associates.

We have two one-act plays now in rehearsal scheduled for early spring production, to be followed by a full-length play with which we expect to open the fall season of 1936. Classes in puppetry, voice culture, technique of acting, and dancing are now being formed, free to those interested in developing such a theater as well as their own native ability.

We shall be glad to interview technicians, give critical readings to plays submitted to us, and give a hearing to experienced or talented amateurs for parts in our forthcoming productions as well as for membership in our classes.

All inquiries should be addressed to me at 1706 Davidson Avenue.

H. HERNE, Executive Director
New York, February 20

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

GEORGE BRITT has been a newspaperman for twenty years, working on papers in Kansas City, Oklahoma City, Chicago, and Washington, D. C. He is at present with the New York World-Telegram. His most recent book is "Forty Years—Forty Millions," a biography of Frank Munsey.

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's Moscow correspondent, is back in the U. S. S. R. after a European tour. A series of articles, Arms Over Europe, of which the one on Poland in this week's Nation is the eighth, has presented the European scene in all its complicated and ominous detail.

EDITH ABBOTT has been a force in social work for many years. She has published books on immigration problems, women in industry, juvenile delinquency, crime and the foreign born. An editor of the Social Service Review, she has also since 1924 been dean of the School of Social Service Administration at Chicago.

M. E. RAVAGE is the newest addition to The Nation's roster of foreign correspondents. He will contribute an article about political events in that country from time to time.

RUTH BRINDZE will continue, under the title The Consumer Front, her regular bi-monthly page in The Nation in the interest of the forgotten consumer. She cannot, however, answer questions respecting the merit of specific products.

PETER ODEGARD has taught government at Columbia University, at Williams College, and at Ohio State University, where he now is. At the convention of the American Political Science Association during the Christmas holidays he led one of the most vital of the discussion groups, that on civil liberties.

E. C. MACDOWELL has for twenty years been doing research in genetics as resident investigator of the Carnegie Station of Experimental Evolution at Cold Spring Harbor, New York.

KATHARINE SIMONDS, daughter of the late Frank Simonds, contributed, under the name of K. S. Thompson, a lively article to The Nation of January 3, 1934, on the reviewers of "Anthony Adverse."

NORMAN THOMAS, twice candidate for President on the Socialist ticket, is the leader of the left wing of the Socialist Party. His latest book is "War: No Glory, No Profit, No Need."

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · MARCH 25, 1936

NUMBER 3690

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 365

EDITORIALS:

WILL EUROPE CALL HITLER'S BLUFF? 368

PROSTITUTION IN NEW YORK CITY 369

WHO WON THE STRIKE? 370

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward 371

PROSTITUTION IN THE SOVIET UNION
by Alice Withrow Field 373

OUR JOURNALISTIC NOBLESSE by George Seldes 375

SHALL WE SEND THEM BACK TO HITLER?
by Louis Adamic 377

THE FATE OF THE SUPREME COURT
by Max Lerner 379

MURDER AND KARL MARX by Mary McCarthy 381

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 384

BROUN'S PAGE 385

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

HOMAGE TO HAVELOCK ELLIS
by Joseph Wood Krutch 386

BUT DON'T PAUSE FOR BREATH
by Louis Kronenberger 387

THE MYSTERY OF SIR BASIL by Benjamin Stolberg 388

THE NEAR AND THE FAR by Mark Van Doren 388

FIVE YEARS BEFORE SARAJEVO by Felix E. Hirsch 389

DOLLARS OR CHILDREN by John A. Kingsbury 390

SHORTER NOTICES 391

DRAMA: SHAW'S CLASSIC by Joseph Wood Krutch 392

RECORDS: by Henry Simon 393

DRAWINGS: by Anton Refregier, George Schreiber, William Steig, and Stuyvesant Van Veen

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

The Shape of Things

*

GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION IS NOTHING new in American history. It has generally been used to break strikes; it is now being used to break Congressional investigations; how it will be used in the future depends upon the ingenuity of our corporation lawyers. Chief Justice Wheat of the District of Columbia Supreme Court has issued an injunction restraining the Black lobby committee of the Senate from seizing telegrams sent by Silas Strawn's law firm. The Justice's ground was that the subpoena with which Senator Black was equipped was actually a drag-net or a fishing line, and that it violated the searches-and-seizures provision of the Fourth Amendment. At this point Mr. Hearst also applied for an injunction, invoking the First Amendment to protect a telegram he had sent to his editorial flunky, James T. Williams. As usual in business appeals to the Bill of Rights, liberty is being invoked in order to protect intrenched privilege. The lobbyists and utility executives are desperate lest the full extent of the money power in politics be revealed by Senator Black's expert and uncompromising methods. They are also fearful that the Liberty League and other such organizations will, as a result of the lobby investigation, shape up for what they are in reality—political organizations using corporate contributions without being subject to the corrupt-practice laws that apply to political parties. The whole incident is another example of how under the pressure of a vigorous legislative attack the bourbons always turn to the courts for extreme unction.

*

MANUEL AZANA'S LIBERAL GOVERNMENT IN Spain appears to be facing a situation uncomfortably similar to that which confronted the Kerensky regime in Russia. Although placed in power by the votes of the Socialists, Communists, and Anarcho-Syndicalists, Azaña is not prepared to institute fundamental economic reforms. He has released the majority of the political prisoners held over from the previous government and ordered the arrest of General Ochola, charged with responsibility for the Asturias massacre, but has given no indication that he intends to meet the demands of the left. On the other hand, the fascist elements, which virtually dominated policy under the Lerroux government, have become more and more insistent that Azaña curb all further demonstrations of the left. This the Premier has apparently attempted to do, but without success. In the course of celebrating their electoral victory Socialists and Communists have rioted almost daily, have burned churches and convents, and have even gone so far as to seize the estate of President Zamora. The situation bears a striking resemblance to that which existed after the revolution in 1931, and it is possible that the Premier may, as on that occasion, obtain control by bringing pressure on the Socialist leaders. But unless drastic action is taken to remove the causes of the existing unrest, there is danger that Spain may be plunged into worse turmoil than anything it has experienced in the past five years.

*

THE NEW TOTALITARIAN REGIME IN PARAGUAY appears to be definitely fascist in its essentials. Arising out of the unrest following the Chaco war, the revolutionary party consists primarily of war veterans and students, though it has a certain amount of working-class support. The movement is intensely nationalistic, being directed particularly against groups of foreigners who have enriched themselves out of the war. It has as its leader Colonel Rafael Franco, a war hero who was exiled in February as a Communist but who enjoys tremendous personal popularity. It has barred all political activity by trade unions and other organizations not connected with the dominant party, and has placed all labor disputes under administrative jurisdiction. Colonel Franco calls these restrictions only temporary. He claims that his aim is to have "a true democracy of workers and peasants, who are the eternal victims of their economic weakness." This sounds suspiciously like fascist demagoguery, although the Paraguayan brand of fascism may prove to be considerably less "advanced" than that of Germany or Italy.

*

THE GHOST OF THE NRA WALKED IN Washington again last week. George Berry's Committee on Industrial Policy, which somehow emerged out of the fiasco of Mr. Berry's conference of business and labor executives last fall, has turned in a set of recommendations for the economic future of our country. There are three things to be said about the recommendations. One is to note the fear and trembling with which the committee introduces such a necessary proposal as that of a minimum wage and overtime rates. The committee finds it necessary also to praise all that "individual initiative, free competition, and the incentive of profit" have done for America before it dare suggest that some "governmental intervention" in private industry is necessary. The second is that our business executives seem to have forgotten nothing and learned nothing since the beginning of the depression. Their best wisdom still seems to be the wisdom embodied in the NRA. The third is that a dangerous tendency toward a semi-fascist set-up is revealed in the committee recommendations. There is to be production control; the anti-trust laws are to be suspended; and, worst of all, a "permanent advisory economic council" is to be established, consisting of representatives of management, labor, and the public interest. That the committee's ideas should take this familiar form is proof of the bankruptcy of economic thought on the part of our business leaders.

THE SENATE HAS ELIMINATED FROM THE Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill the $26,500,000 item for ocean-mail ship-subsidy-contract payments. It was, however, not motivated by a desire to put the shipping industry on a sound economic basis. Senator Glass, who engineered the move, has admitted that its purpose was to force the passage at this session of a bill bestowing direct subsidies in place of the indirect mail-contract subsidies. If such a bill is not passed, the $26,500,000 will undoubtedly be included in the deficiency bill. Meanwhile, some hundred shipping executives, lawyers, and lobbyists, in Washington attending the hearings of the Senate Commerce Committee on the Guffey bill and the indefensible Copeland bill, showed that their intelligence was not as extensive as their greed. Just as they had not even been able to agree among themselves on the original Copeland bill, introduced when the session opened, so last week they could not agree on the compromise bill. John M. Franklin, president of the International Mercantile Marine, read at precisely the worst moment a statement for the American Steamship Owners' Association which charged that the present choice of bills amounted to "reputation" of the shipping industry by the government. Then he asked for reenactment of the existing Jones-White law. Senator Copeland, who is well aware that if this continues the Guffey bill will pass, lost his temper on one occasion and called the executives "a lot of Dumb Doras." But he is still their best friend.

*

LOW WAGES, UNLIMITED HOURS, AND BAD working conditions are the rule and not the exception on American ships. The Morro Castle disaster demonstrated that one of the greatest hazards run by passengers is created by the hiring of inexperienced men at low wages. The chairman of Secretary Roper's own National Committee on Safety at Sea, which he set up in December, has pointed to the labor turnover on American ships, which runs as high as 30 per cent, as a "serious symptom of unrest" among those who earn their living at sea. Secretary Roper's remedy is to increase the personnel and pay of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection. Certainly the taxpayers, seagoing or not, would be willing to finance an efficient bureau they also have the right to expect that Mr. Roper might use his influence to persuade the shipping companies to make a contribution to safety in the form of decent wages and tolerable conditions for the necessarily skilled workers who are the ultimate safeguard of the traveler. Instead, they are treated to the spectacle of Mr. Roper, self-appointed Secretary of Safety, shouting "Mutiny!" because the crew of the steamship California struck, not at sea but in port, for a raise in pay from $57.50 to $62.50 a month. It is possible, of course, that a passion for the safety of passengers is the primary motive in Mr. Roper's hysteria. It is just possible on the other hand that his views as far as labor is concerned resemble those of the shipping barons whose strongholds around the coast are being ever more militantly attacked. To hang the label of mutiny on a ship strike would certainly fulfil their fondest dream of safety.

THE JONES AND LAUGHLIN STEEL COMPANY recently walked out of a hearing of the National Labor Relations Board, charging that the board had no jurisdiction over the case. The complaint was filed by twelve employees of the corporation's Aliquippa plant who alleged they were fired for union activities. Contending that steel manufacturing is intrastate and not interstate commerce, Earl F. Reed, counsel for Jones and Laughlin, argued that his client alone had the right to hire and fire his employees. When the board indicated that it was not convinced, Mr. Reed left the courtroom, but the case went on. It was like enacting a melodrama without the villain. All twelve of the discharged men claimed that their union activities were alone responsible for the loss of their jobs, while the company asserted they had been fired for inefficiency. If that was true, then it took the company a long time to discover that these particular workmen were inefficient, for the average length of service they had rendered the corporation was more than ten years. The witnesses uniformly contended that "Aliquippa workmen are crying for union organization but are afraid for their jobs." These twelve men serve as so many living examples to the other nine thousand steel workers in the community. Aliquippa is a company town. Its local bank, street cars, motor coaches, water supply, and a real-estate company which owns most of the houses the workers live in are controlled by the Jones and Laughlin Corporation, which also dominates the county elections and the local police. Under these circumstances, the workers testified, "if you don't do what the company wants you to, it's too bad for you."

*

SOME TIME AGO A NUMBER OF HONEST AND sincere persons directed to Thomas Mann a request that he publicly and unequivocally state his position on the Nazi regime. Thomas Mann, already a voluntary exile in Switzerland, did not answer this appeal at the time. But in a letter recently published in the Neue Züricher Zeitung he has made an answer so frank and clear as to silence all criticism.

German anti-Semitism, however, or that of the German rulers, is aimed, spiritually regarded, not at the Jews at all or not at them exclusively. It is aimed at Europe and at all the higher Germanism itself. It is aimed, as is becoming more evident all the time, at the ancient Christian foundations of Occidental morality. It is the attempt, as symbolized by the withdrawal from the League of Nations, to shake off civilizing connections, an attempt that threatens to effect a fearful, an evil-laden estrangement between the country of Goethe and the rest of the world.

As if to prove beyond a doubt that this noble indictment is justified, comes the news of a controversy now being waged in Germany on the issue of "German Physics versus Jewish Physics." The dispute was occasioned by an article in the Völkische Beobachter attacking Albert Einstein and all theoretical physicists as "Jews or products of the Jewish spirit." Not only race and religion but science itself is hereby drawn into this evil controversy—a further attempt "to shake off civilizing connections" and to estrange Germany from the rest of the world.

THE COOLIDGE-KERR IMMIGRATION BILL, now before the Senate Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, is not an ideal measure but has been considered a step toward softening the rigors of our immigration policy. On March 11, however, an amendment was introduced which on no account should be included if the bill becomes a law. It provides for the mandatory deportation of aliens convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude. The importance of this provision will be clear when it is remembered that nobody knows exactly what moral turpitude is. It is not necessarily a felony as opposed to a misdemeanor; it includes not only the major crimes but very likely a number of minor ones. Suppose an alien striker breaks a factory window. Suppose he successfully plants a rock on the neck of one of Mr. Bergoff's scabs. Is this moral turpitude? At the present moment it probably isn't. Simple assault and disorderly conduct have not yet been included in this particular category. But there is nothing to prevent an anti-labor judge from so construing them. When feeling is running high during a strike in which many workers are aliens, almost anything may happen. The Kerr bill as amended puts a weapon in the hands of anti-labor, anti-alien forces which they will not be slow to use. Secretary Perkins is reported as "deploring" the amendment, although she is unwilling to make a public protest because she wants the bill as a whole to pass. But the bill as a whole is not good enough to bear the weight of this provision.

*

THE LOGIC OF HISTORY MAKES THE WEST, with its Populist traditions and its hostility to Eastern finance, the breeding-ground of third parties. For that reason the coming state convention of the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party on March 27-28 may yield interesting results. Two county conventions, embracing the cities of Minneapolis and Duluth, have already met and called upon the state convention to come out for a national Farmer-Labor Party which will place a ticket in the field in 1936. No one, of course, expects that such a ticket would stand a chance of victory. But a national Farmer-Labor Party this year might return a bloc of Representatives and Senators, and consolidate the progressive forces in Congress. It would be a powerful force in fighting the rising reaction. And, a start once made, it would be in a good position for making a bid for power in 1940.

*

BURNING RESENTMENT HAS BEEN AROUSED in California's neighbor states by Los Angeles's action in setting up an armed border patrol along the state line to turn back would-be entrants whose material assets are not considered up to Los Angeles standards. All those refused admission were impartially labeled "vags and hobos" by the border patrol. This some of them undoubtedly were, but the greater part represented transient farm and factory laborers essential to those communities where work is seasonal. The action of Los Angeles springs from a fundamental malaise which threatens the whole nation. What is to be done with the homeless migrants, now numbering nearly half a million, who, by the closing last September of the federal transient bureaus, have been thrown back on their own, which is to say, non-existent, resources? The states claim that the transient problem is an interstate, and therefore a federal, affair; the federal government finds the burden too great. Jobless migrants will be with us until we achieve a stable economy. Meanwhile, unless the government adopts remedial measures, the ranks of the migrants will be swelled by the influx of school and college graduates for whom there is no chance of employment in sight. In the Amlie-Benson American Youth Act shortly to come before the Senate, providing federal aid for the unemployed between the ages of sixteen and twenty-five, there is an opportunity, if the government will but grasp it, to enact legislation which would alleviate the pressing danger of the transient problem.

Will Europe Call Hitler's Bluff?

AFTER more than a week of frenzied diplomatic activity the crisis precipitated by Germany's military reoccupation of the Rhineland remains unresolved. Hitler's Karlsruhe speech, though conciliatory in its references to France, was little more than a reaffirmation of his Reichstag address of the previous Saturday. In his Munich speech he stated that Germany would never allow itself to be judged at the bar of world opinion. And as a final gesture of intransigence, he refused to attend the London conference unless it promised to take up his "concrete proposals for new guaranties of European peace." Whether he will subsequently accept the League offer on the basis of promised "equality" remains uncertain as we go to press.

The situation is probably the most difficult which Europe has faced since 1919. That Germany has broken both the Treaty of Versailles and the Locarno agreement is scarcely open to question. Nor can it be doubted that the remilitarization of the Rhineland constitutes a real threat to France and to a lesser extent to its allies. As long as the German army remained out of this area, the danger of a surprise attack on the French frontier was practically non-existent. Today France no longer has that security. Yet the weight of international condemnation of the Third Reich has been somewhat lessened by recognition of the truth of Hitler's contention that Germany can never have equality until it exercises full sovereignty over its territory. It is difficult to work up sentiment for sanctions against a country for occupying its own soil. Unlike Japan and Italy, Germany cannot be accused of aggression.

But when it comes to making distinctions regarding treaty violations, one heads into severe difficulties. While all international agreements are not equally important or equally just, it would be difficult to convince the average Frenchman that a move which endangers the security of his native land should be ranked as unimportant. If effective international law is ever to be created, agreements must be uniformly respected. Collective security is meaningless if its principles are to be enforced only by the country or countries most affected. Few persons in Europe today, however, are concerned with general principles. The one thing that is important is the finding of some means of preventing a rearmed Germany from launching a war of desperation or revenge. Hitler's bellicose references to the Soviet Union and his "inadvertent" omission of Austria and Czecho-Slovakia from the list of countries with which Germany is willing to conclude non-aggression pacts belie his claim to pacific intentions. Although his attack on communism may be somewhat discounted on the ground that it was meant primarily for home consumption, no responsible leader can indulge in repeated denunciation of a neighboring nation without running the risk that his words will ultimately be taken seriously, both at home and abroad. The Führer may believe that he is sincere in declaring that he would rather spend money for workers' houses than for shells, but the world notes only his facility in creating international incidents when they are needed to bolster his prestige at home. It also notes with unconcealed anxiety that with the remilitarization of the Rhineland Hitler has exhausted the possibilities for international histrionics which do not affect the integrity of neighboring states. Unless the League powers take drastic action, we may assume that the next step will involve Memel, Austria, or the Soviet Ukraine.

Since negotiation on the basis of the status quo is so obviously in line with Germany's desires, the League powers have only three weapons with which to combat the threat of Nazi aggression: sanctions, a preventive war, or a resurrection of the pre-war system of military alliances. Of the three, sanctions would definitely be preferable in that they would make possible the retention and strengthening of the present instruments of collective security. While it might be argued that a preventive war now would be far less destructive than a general conflagration later, it would be difficult to persuade French or British public opinion that a war to prevent war would be any less destructive than a war to save civilization. So far it has never been established that peace can be achieved through war. Economic sanctions would be not only a far less dangerous weapon but a more efficacious one. The chances are that the threat of really effective penalties would soon bring Hitler to terms; if not, their imposition would have the supreme value of retarding Nazi war preparations. Moreover, they would keep the record clear as far as the League was concerned, and prevent Italy from pushing its claim for a suspension of the penalties imposed against it.

At the moment both England and Italy appear to be unalterably opposed to sanctions of any type. Instead of imposing collective penalties, the powers will probably fall back on a system of alliances guaranteeing the present frontiers in Eastern and Western Europe. Presumably England will be forced to be a party in such an agreement, which it has resisted since the signing of the Treaty of Versailles. This would of course mean the end of any pretense of collective security through the League and would mark a return to power politics of the most dangerous type. Such an arrangement may be necessary and it might be temporarily effective in staving off hostilities, but it would totter the moment another international situation arose calling for a new line-up of the powers. Ultimately the result would be a return to the balance-of-power concept which dominated pre-war Europe, carrying with it almost certain war. It may be argued that there can be no assurance against war, regardless of the steps taken, as long as fascism remains dominant in two of the leading countries in Europe. Recent events have shown beyond question that the doctrines of fascism are incompatible with international organization. But if the powers, backed by the pressure of public opinion in the non-totalitarian states, can somehow keep alive respect for the principles of collective security and law, and at the same time make a vigorous attempt to find a solution for the troublesome problem of raw materials, they may make it impossible for either Hitler or Mussolini to fight the successful war which is necessary to the perpetuation of their power. If collective security is to be achieved, there can be no compromise with lawlessness.

Prostitution in New York City

THE most interesting aspect of Mrs. Field's article on prostitution in the Soviet Union, which appears elsewhere in this issue, is not that the number of prostitutes has markedly declined since the Russian Revolution—though that is significant enough—but that in Russia the prostitute is considered not a moral problem but an economic one. The idea that women disposed of their persons for pecuniary profit out of sheer depravity has long since lost credence with intelligent people. It is clear that in the vast majority of cases women have embraced the world's oldest profession because they knew no other way to make a living or because they were cast out by neighborhood censure from whatever economic field they had a place in. In either case economic necessity was the guiding force—but "immorality" was the category under which they were first judged and then punished.

In New York City, prostitution, although it is not a criminal offense, is handled by the police, and prostitutes themselves are finger-printed and otherwise treated as criminals. Arrests are made for "disorderly conduct," "loitering," or the like. Since there are no licensed houses, guesses of the number of women so engaged vary from 25,000 to 300,000. No reliable authority will make an estimate of the total number. However, an average of 3,000 prostitutes come before the Women's Day Court each year. Those arrested are chiefly of the lowest order of prostitutes—women forced to solicit on the streets. The number of arrests do not vary much from year to year, although there are periodical fluctuations closely related to pressure put upon the police by anti-vice crusaders and others who wish to attack a moral stain on the body politic. It is interesting to note that over week-ends there are practically no arrests. Despite a recognized increase in prostitution at such times, one may suspect that the police do not enjoy spending their Saturdays and Sundays in court.

Since the depression there has been a marked increase in the number of Negro prostitutes. This, despite popular superstition to the contrary, is not because Negro women are more gifted and hence more popular, but because they are cheaper. Until 1929 the average of arrests was two white women to one Negro woman. Since 1932 the proportion has been reversed. Prices range from twenty-five cents to $2 for Negroes, and from $1 to $5 for whites. It is evident, therefore, that even though the profession has an economic basis, its returns are not high. The petted, bejeweled playmates of wealthy men, despite their frequency in the more lurid popular fiction, are in fact few and far between. Since this is a business like any other, it may be said categorically that the hours are long, the wages low, and the working conditions abominable.

Few prostitutes escape venereal infection for more than a year. Until January, 1935, no medical examination of prostitutes was made until after conviction. Even now examinations are perfunctory from a medical standpoint, and only if they indicate active infection are women committed for hospital treatment. Only one city hospital receives them; it accommodates 150 women, is always overcrowded, offers no recreational facilities and but meager educational opportunities. For the most part the women sit idle for two months exchanging experiences, so it is not surprising that they know precisely where to find the best opportunities for themselves when they leave the hospital. They are not permitted to receive visitors and are watched over by armed guards, even when they are not under arrest. In contrast to this dismal and benighted method of treating the physical and mental hazards of the profession, the Soviet prophylactoria sound like havens of refuge and light.

Nor is New York City alone in its want of social vision in treating the problem. Of all American cities only Cincinnati and St. Louis are concerned except perfunctorily with even the venereal-disease aspects of prostitution. In those cities arrested women receive treatment if they are ill and are discharged if they are not. Many social agencies in New York try to "help" prostitutes, as unfortunate creatures, but none of them busy themselves with the causes of prostitution or attempt to eradicate them. Preventive work is almost unknown. And even purely from the public-health angle, neither social agencies nor the City of New York provide adequate facilities for detecting and treating venereal disease on a large-enough scale to be socially effective.

As a picture of the way the second largest city in the world handles one of its most important social problems, the foregoing facts are highly distressing. Enlightened social workers have for a long time known that prostitution should be approached in some such way as the Russians have approached it, but they have been powerless to convince the public. In time, when the "social evil" has been eliminated from the U. S. S. R.—as unemployment has been eliminated—we may be willing, as a people, to go to school to the Soviets.

Who Won the Strike?

WALTER GORDON MERRITT, head strike-breaker of the Realty Advisory Board, violated the settlement in the building-service walkout before the ink was dry. Having forced a loophole in that agreement in the form of a provision for the arbitration of "individual disputes" between employers and strikers, though presumably former employees were to be taken back without discrimination, Mr. Merritt and his more powerful colleagues immediately crawled through it. "Satisfactory employees," Mr. Merritt announced with a sudden access of consideration for the workingman, "employed in good faith . . . with assurances that their employment is not temporary, should not be abandoned." The pressure which made the union leaders consent to a compromise on the basic issue of reinstatement remains to be revealed. As we go to press, some 1,500 strikers are locked out, mainly in buildings owned by big real-estate interests.

The new agreement is based on the Curran award of a year ago. Under that agreement, apartment-house employees were to get from $70 to $90 a month for an average sixty-hour week, and minimums in office and loft buildings were set at $21 for a forty-eight-hour week. When the award expired on March 1, many owners were evading even these low minimums, and it was not uncommon to find men working seventy-two and eighty-four hours a week for $60 and $65 a month. It was only after months of fruitless cajolery that some 45,000 workers walked out, demanding a blanket increase of $2 a week, a forty-eight-hour week, the closed shop, and a three-year contract.

The settlement represents an advance provided Merritt and his friends are not allowed to nullify it. There is to be an immediate arbitration of minimum wages; the question of both wages and hours is to be reopened a year from now and again two years from now; the agreement runs for three years. The union has gained in membership; and it has gained tremendously in public sympathy as a result of its conduct of the strike. It goes without saying, however, that if the lockout instituted by the owners succeeds, the net result will be a weakening of union strength.

The strike fell with astounding suddenness on the cliff dwellers of Riverside Drive and the silk-stockings district to the east. Twenty-seven hundred members of the Realty Advisory Board sent out frantic calls for strike-breakers to run 13,500 elevators, to fire furnaces, remove garbage, and scrub floors. Above all the owners needed guards to protect their five billions of assessed valuations. Apartment-house owners have been hard hit by the depression. Nearly two-thirds of their properties have been taken over by the mortgagees—in most cases banks and insurance companies. These diehard, anti-union moneyed interests were the real power behind the Realty Advisory Board.

There was little or no violence in the strike, undoubtedly because the sympathy of both the police and the tenants was with the strikers. It was decidedly against the strike-breakers and guards, many of them with police records, who graced the city's lobbies for two weeks. One of these individuals, recently released from the penitentiary, will shortly return there. With the scab operator he was assigned to guard, he conspired to break into an apartment. Their haul was $55,000 in jewelry. In a raid on the offices of the American Confidential Bureau, by no means the most notorious of the scab-recruiting stations, police arrested eighteen persons on charges of violating the public-enemy law. The bureau's license has been suspended.

Three of nine metropolitan dailies sided with the workers when the owners refused all arbitration attempts. Tenant support was widespread. Tenants organized, or forced scabs to leave, or refused to pay rent, and in about forty instances induced landlords to sign with the union.

In the end, of course, the consumer will pay, unless the tenant organizations spread and become a bargaining factor. As one agent for Bing and Bing put it, "In this building sixteen employees may get wage increases of $2 a week, or $1,664 a year. We have 114 apartments and we'll raise the rents $5 a month, or $6,840 a year, leaving the owner a neat $5,176 profit. So for every $1 the workers win on this strike, their employers will win $3."

Throughout the strike it has been the thankless task of Mayor LaGuardia to follow a course which would not incur the wrath either of the bankers who are his credit source or of the workers whose votes will reelect him. It is up to him to "crack down" on the owners in their new attempt to prolong the controversy. Unless they can be persuaded to abandon Mr. Merritt, there is more stair-climbing ahead for the tenant-consumers.

Drawing by Refregier

Day in the Life of a Strike-Breaker

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington, March 15

HEARINGS have just been completed here on a proposal to repeal the teachers'-oath bill that Congress imposed last year on the District of Columbia at the behest of the local crackpots, Klansmen, and red-baiters. It is more than likely that by mid-April the repealer will have been adopted, for the hearings on it have brought the bill's proponents out into the open and they cannot stand the light of day. They compose the usual coterie of patriots, militarists, and female busybodies. Worse still for them, their intellects cannot withstand even the polite sort of interrogation to which they were subjected at the hearings this week. Their testimony produced only guffaws, and those guffaws were duly echoed by all sections of the local press save that controlled by Hearst.

The oath bill is quantitatively worse than that of any state. Under it the District teachers must make affidavit of loyalty to the status quo once a month—that is, each pay day—and the janitors and charwomen, who also are affected, must make a similar profession twice as often, for they are paid every two weeks. The affidavit, prescribed and insisted upon by J. R. McCarl, Comptroller General, says the signer has not "advocated or taught" communism since last pay day. The law construed by McCarl as requiring such an affidavit—though the District Corporation Counsel construed it otherwise—was slipped into the District appropriation bill last June by Representative Blanton of Texas in a deal with Senator Copeland of New York, and passed through Congress almost unnoticed. The bill to repeal it has been introduced by Representative Sisson, Democrat, New York, at the serious risk, I am told, of bringing upon himself defeat when he stands for reelection in Herkimer and Oneida counties in November. This former school teacher carried his district, the Thirty-third New York, by only 252 votes in 1934, and his health probably will prohibit his making a vigorous fight this year.

At the hearing on the Sisson bill one of its leading opponents, Mrs. Margaret Hopkins Worrell, was compelled to confess that the civic association for which she spoke had cast only eighteen votes on the issue and that seven voters favored repeal. Major General Amos A. Fries, former chief of the Chemical Warfare Service, essayed to testify against a bill to soften but not repeal the oath bill, though he had to admit he had never read the proposed amendment. Some years ago General Fries, while still in the War Department, charted a "red network," on which all proponents of the child-labor amendment were listed on the apparent assumption that they must be in receipt of Moscow gold. He appeared this week for something which is called the Public School Association but which, it was testified, is made up in large part of delegates from the Ku Klux Klan and kindred abominations. Then, of course, there was the usual legionary, one E. Brook Fetty, and, finally, a lawyer, George E. Sullivan, who opposed the repealer in behalf of the Federation of Citizens' Associations, although it was later testified he spoke without authority, the federation having taken no stand on the issue.

Sisson Is for Repeal

Mr. Sullivan, whose own association within the federation voted for repeal, is connected professionally and by marriage with an estate that has been trying for some time to sell to the District land it needs for a new high school. Blanton, self-appointed dictator over all District affairs, has in the past denounced Sullivan's price to Congress as highway robbery. He and Sullivan, however, have become friends since the lawyer took up red-baiting. Blanton is certain to oppose the repealer when it reaches the floor on April 13, and he will have the support of Representatives Patman, McCormack, Randolph, and Ditter. He also will have the support of Congresswoman Jenckes, Democrat, Indiana, the only member of the subcommittee in charge who is opposed to the repealer. Mrs. Jenckes testified hysterically before the committee and then, refusing to be questioned, fled from the room.

The bill is virtually certain to reach the floor on schedule, for Mrs. Jenckes's four colleagues on the subcommittee—Kennedy, Schulte, Short, and Brewster—favor it, as does Representative Norton of New Jersey, chairman of the full committee. Mrs. Norton, who by virtue of her chairmanship can control such things, plans to devote the whole of April 13 in the House to debate on the Sisson bill, and in the process, if she can arrange that too, the blatant Blanton and his fellows will be plowed under.

THE Liberty Leaguers had barely stopped crowing over the temporary victory of Silas Strawn in his injunction action against the Black lobby-investigating committee, when Hearst instituted a similar action in defense of sacred "privacy." And now the Townsends are threatening to seek the protection of the courts if the House committee soon to begin investigating them invades their "privacy." If this thing keeps up, it will not be necessary for Congress to have these privateersmen thrown out of court; they'll be laughed out. Incidentally, Black's committee is about ready to knife open the most insidious lobby of all, the Washington social lobby. It uses wine, women, song, and the society columns instead of threats and campaign contributions to accomplish its ends. Probably before this reaches print, Black will have shown that one Middle Western Congressman, a Democrat, has been living with a lobbyist here and lavishly entertaining his colleagues at the lobbyist's expense. The result of all this good fellowship has been the hopeful resurrection of a bill the lobbyist for years has been striving with more direct but less effective measures to get passed. Later Black may be able to show that one of the smartest "clubs" in Washington serves a similar purpose. It is a resort frequented by diplomats, Congressmen, and a few of the journalistic elite. An invitation from its super-smart hostess is a social accolade and will continue to be treasured as such until it is learned that the Black committee has examined her telegrams, too.

Three Patriotic Lobbyists

BRIEFER Mention. According to competent judges, Assistant Attorney General John Dickinson's presentation of the government's case in support of the Guffey Coal Act before the Supreme Court was magnificent. Thomas Reed Powell, who helped prepare the case, apparently persuaded Dickinson to shed his pomposity for the occasion. . . . Seeing Chief Justice Hughes presiding over the argument, United Mine Workers officials were optimistic; Hughes was counsel for the union before he entered the Harding Cabinet, and they figure that he, at least, understands what they are up against. . . . The first fruit of the labors of Coordinator Berry's Council for Industrial Progress turns out to be a fascist ovum—a recommendation for "a permanent economic advisory council" of industrialists and labor leaders to help run the country and keep Congress straight. . . . Hopkins has set out in earnest to discover how the WPA came to be building garment factories in Mississippi, under the guise of "vocational-training schools." It is now admitted by the WPA that the projects were well along toward completion when Hopkins's cancellation order was dispatched. The local paper at Brookhaven, site of one of the projects, quotes the district WPA administrator as saying Hopkins's order won't block completion of the "factory" because the WPA's $35,000 contribution to it has been practically spent. All this suggests a solution of the Italo-Ethiopian crisis. Let's give Italy Mississippi in place of Ethiopia; the Italians could never tell the difference and we'd be getting rid of both Bilbo and Harrison. Senator Harrison, despite charges that he is deeply involved in the Mississippi "vocational-school" scandal, refuses to open his mouth. . . . The National Committee on Rural Social Planning charges in a memorandum to Roosevelt that WPA and Resettlement Administration officials here can't and won't make their Arkansas agents provide relief for evicted share-croppers, said agents being dominated by the landlords at present engaged in a campaign of terrorism to smash the tenant-farmers' union. The WPA agents won't certify the croppers to the RA agents, and the RA agents won't help them unless they are certified. Hopkins's answer to the charge is a shrug and an assertion that the federal government is through with "direct relief." . . . The ascension of H. R. Tolley to the AAA's helm in place of Chester Davis promises no improvement in the share-croppers' plight. Tolley is director of the Giannini Foundation and reflects the interests of California growers and their bankers. . . . The United States Conference of Mayors, led by LaGuardia, comes to Roosevelt's assistance and assures him that the tales told against the WPA are all canards. They want the program continued virtually as is but with a little more power in their own hands. They like having Washington help balance their budgets by enabling them to do much municipal work with relief labor in place of regular city workers. . . . Things look increasingly bad for the NLRB in connection with its first major court test of the Wagner Labor Act. That test, the Greyhound Lines case, is to be tried late this month before the Third Circuit Court of Appeals at Philadelphia, and the court yesterday gave proof that it will not stand on merit if there is near at hand a technicality on which to perch instead. Upholding the hair-splitting brief of the Department of Justice in the McIntosh-Virgin Islands case, Judge Buffington whitewashed the trial-court judge, T. Webber Wilson, and rebuked the Interior Department for suggesting that the important thing in the case was that McIntosh was an innocent who by all the tenets of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence had been denied a fair trial. Judge Buffington refused to hear the Greyhound case in January. He said he'd hear it in March and take the record with him, then, to a sanitarium for study. He's eighty-one.

Prostitution in the Soviet Union

BY ALICE WITHROW FIELD

IT comes as something of a shock to many persons to learn that the Soviet Union has not yet succeeded in wholly eliminating one of the grossest forms of human exploitation—the prostitution of women's bodies. Yet compared with the extent of commercialized vice elsewhere or with the practices of Czarist Russia the situation in the Soviet Union has been brought remarkably under control. Prior to the war there were as many as 40,000 registered prostitutes in St. Petersburg alone. Once or twice a week they were subjected to a compulsory, if perfunctory, medical examination by which the diseased were temporarily segregated. After having been duly registered, those who obtained a clean bill of health were given yellow tickets in place of their regular identification papers; they were not allowed to change their place of residence without police permission, and were required to wear colored arm bands or dresses of special colors. These rules applied only to prostitutes from the common people; those of good birth were usually ignored by the police.

Until 1880 registered prostitutes could not return to normal life unless they produced certificates of ill health signed by two doctors. In some places, as at Minsk, death was the only escape for them. No real attempt was made to reclaim prostitutes or to eliminate the causes of commercialized vice. Owners of licensed brothels were subject to very little police regulation, and procurers were seldom annoyed by the authorities. After the October revolution all brothels were outlawed, and women who formerly had been licensed received full citizenship rights. With this accomplished it was thought that if all women were given full legal and social freedom, prostitution would cease to exist. This was not the case, although commercial prostitution dropped to almost nothing during the period of war communism. At that time the bawdy houses disappeared or lost their old glamor and luxury; procuring was neither easy nor profitable; and women began to assume a position of equality in social and economic life which minimized the opportunities for exploiting them.

Nevertheless, at the end of the civil war and famine, and concurrently with the growing unemployment problem, the large cities again became crowded with women who tried to earn their living by selling their bodies. These were for the most part peasant girls who had wandered to the cities in search of work, and women of the declassed groups—petty bourgeois, aristocrats, and even intelligentsia—who had not been able to adjust themselves to the changed social order. The war, civil war, and famine had destroyed the old standards and security in a far deeper and more personal sense than did the mere political changes of the revolution. The effects of the attending social chaos and the general poverty were of course most severe on unattached persons and those untrained for useful and immediately necessary trades. Contributing also to an increase in prostitution was the lack of adequate housing facilities for the hundreds of thousands of persons who migrated to the large cities in search of work during the reconstruction period.

By 1923-24 the incidence of venereal infection had not begun to diminish in the U. S. S. R. as it had in other countries. This fact brought prostitution into the limelight in the field of public health. Apprehending and treating infected persons in the elaborate network of clinics which had been established to safeguard the health of the people was not reducing the number of women who had to turn to the streets to earn their living. Giving women an equal chance in the labor exchanges had not guaranteed them jobs, for work was scarce.

During the reconstruction period it became apparent that women needed special social protection if their citizenship rights were to be realized. Their health needed careful guarding, and social and occupational outlets had to be found for them before they could function equally with men. Thus the elimination of prostitution presented itself as only one aspect of the general problem of establishing social and economic equality for women. But for reasons associated with the public health special and immediate action was necessary. Venereal infection, tuberculosis, and other communicable diseases could not be adequately dealt with as long as this small but ever-present source of infection remained. Nor could women take their place as equals in a socialist society while the possibility of sex exploitation existed.

From the beginning the Soviets insisted that the prostitute herself must not be mistreated or made to feel a sense of shame. Her name and her reputation were dependent primarily on her willingness to cooperate in the building of a new society. The war was on prostitution, not on prostitutes. The first Five-Year Plan aided this program by drawing maladjusted persons, including prostitutes, into normal economic life. In a surprisingly large number of instances this change effected a rehabilitation of once anti-social persons. The very fact that the prostitute was wanted as a woman and a worker gave her a sense of social responsibility and was the real beginning of Soviet success in handling the problem.

Even before the first Five-Year Plan the growing social and economic security of the people contributed to a reduction in prostitution. In addition, the fight against prostitution has been carried on through many organizations—general health clinics, venereal-disease clinics and hospitals, maternity centers, points of medical consultation with birth-control departments, legal-advice bureaus (where women can get help and obtain compensation from all persons against whom they have valid grievances), clubs, trade unions, prophylactoria for prostitutes, dwelling-house soviets, the peoples' courts, and institutions for the mentally defective. The most effective agencies for combating prostitution are the prophylactoria. The first of these was founded in Moscow as an experimental hostel where unattached women suffering from venereal infection could live. Soon afterward other similar institutions were founded in Moscow and elsewhere. In 1927 there were eight prophylactoria and one experimental suburban branch in Moscow alone, but subsequently the numbers of prostitutes in that city diminished to such an extent that at present only the original hostel remains. It now accommodates two hundred women, and there is room for fifty more.

Entrance into the prophylactoria is in all cases voluntary, but in order to be admitted the women must agree to stay for at least one year. While in residence they are given medical treatment for whatever diseases they may have—tuberculosis is also very common among prostitutes—are taught a trade, and are given avocational training according to their aptitudes. Women are sent to the prophylactoria from the numerous social agencies, usually those connected with hospitals, venereal-disease clinics, and travelers' aid societies. Occasionally they apply for admittance of their own accord. By far the largest numbers are reached, however, when the police make periodic round-ups of homeless women. Although they are not arrested, every effort is made to encourage them to enter a prophylactorium if they are diseased. In any case all venereally infected persons are required to undergo treatment whether or not they enter special institutions. Responsibility for infecting others with a venereal disease rests squarely on the diseased person. Anyone who is the source of such infection may be subject to three years' imprisonment, although sentence is passed only after the second offense. As soon as a venereally infected person is discovered, he is instructed in his responsibility to the community and to himself, and after such instruction he is considered criminally liable if he spreads the disease. Mental defectives and others not responsible for their actions are confined in appropriate institutions.

It is not difficult to persuade prostitutes to enter the prophylactoria. They are usually homeless and jobless, and the prophylactoria offer both a place to live and regular wages. They also provide good medical care and assume responsibility for finding jobs and lodgings for the women after they are discharged. The rules governing residents in the prophylactoria are simple and do not tend to restrict personal freedom. The women regularly attend trade-union and other meetings, go to concerts, and are encouraged to develop personal contacts outside of the institution.

Part of the women's earnings is deducted to pay for their board and to provide a nest egg when they leave. But by far the largest part is given them to spend as they like, a practice which has been found to have great educational importance. Though occasionally it is difficult to persuade newcomers to take pride in themselves, as a rule their first thought is personal adornment. Through advice on styles an approach can be made to girls who otherwise remain aloof to all friendly overtures. The fact that they are spending their own money and can exercise their own taste breeds a pride and confidence which are essential to the building up of self-respect.

Since Moscow is a textile center, the women work in textile or knitting factories. In other cities, of course, the work is different. In the first years of the prophylactoria the fact that these women had been prostitutes was kept secret from the other workers. But with the growth of popular understanding that prostitution is a responsibility of the whole community the truth is no longer hidden.

Although certainty of employment for residents in the prophylactoria was of great value to the prostitutes themselves, it was not always an effective or permanent means of reestablishing them in normal life, because it tended to set them apart from other workers. It was not until the first Five-Year Plan provided more than enough work for everyone that the prostitutes began to feel they were needed and were not being employed merely because it was feared that they would again become anti-social.

It has been the experience of those in charge of the prophylactoria that prostitutes are frequently hard to manage, moody, subjective, and unreliable. Many of them never acquire the self-discipline necessary to emotional stability even when they are otherwise well adjusted. The tendency to neuroticism is at least in part accounted for by the fact that prostitutes are usually very young. In Moscow in 1931 all prostitutes in the prophylactoria were under twenty-five and one-fourth of them were under sixteen.

There has been no census of prostitutes which covers the whole country, but those most closely connected with the problem are confident that there has been a substantial reduction in the total number each year. There are, however, areas in which prostitution is presenting itself as a new and serious problem. In the new industrial centers there is a tendency for local peasant girls to become camp followers in return for tempting gadgets such as silk stockings and cosmetics. To counteract increased prostitution in these localities great effort is being made to move in workers' families as soon as possible. After that the procedure is the same: prophylactoria, hospitals, clinics, and social agencies are established.

In the older cities professional prostitutes now mainly confine their efforts to attracting foreigners. These "valuta girls" are not many in number and are less of a danger in spreading venereal disease than the otherwise well-adjusted men and women who are given to over-casual sex relations without mercenary inducement.

There have always been maladjusted people in society, and the Soviet Union is no exception; but one way of measuring the success of a social order is by the extent to which it is able to absorb its misfits into normal life and provide opportunities for the social and economic adjustment of its people. In the Soviet Union every effort is being made to eradicate the social and economic factors which contribute to personal maladjustment and unsocial action. Both from a preventive and a therapeutic point of view this social approach to personal problems has met with considerable success because it tolerates none of the moralistic attitudes which tend to obscure the main issues.

Our Journalistic Noblesse

BY GEORGE SELDES

IN THE early 1920's, when I asked the director of our foreign-news service why he had chosen Mr. A to succeed me in the capital of X, he replied: "Because A is the only reporter we have who doesn't speak the language. He knows nothing about the country. In fact, he is the only man we have who has never visited Europe. So you see he will be unaffected by the propaganda and intrigues of those foreigners. What we want is the real American viewpoint."

The Mr. A's whose ignorance of Europe served them so well in the formative days of several American foreign-news services, with various more enlightened colleagues, are now serving as the intelligent American's guide to international affairs, combining high adventure, derring-do, and romance with philosophic trimmings by Freud and Stekel, William James and Karl Marx. The world is their ovster cocktail and the best-seller list their clubroom.

There you will find Vincent Sheean (once Jimmy to his pals) recounting his personal history, Walter Duranty claiming he writes as he pleases, John Gunther telling the inside story of Europe, and Negley Farson confessing his transgressions. It was not so long ago that H. R. Knickerbocker, Edgar Ansel Mowrer, Eugene Lyons, Anna Louise Strong, and others uttered historical or sensational remarks on Germany and Russia, while Larry Rue, the first foreign correspondent to fly his own airplane, told of Afghanistan, and Mrs. Marguerite Harrison confessed she was an American secret-service operator while masquerading as a representative of the Baltimore Sun and the Associated Press.

All these men and women were my colleagues. For fifteen years I worked with them in Europe, and now as I read their best-selling books I too am carried away by the excitement, physical or mental, the spirit of adventure, the thrill of history in the making, and at times the tropical romantic pages which have brought such unprecedented popularity to the noblesse of the reportorial profession, the foreign correspondents. If these books affect me in this way, how much more fascinating must they appear to the lay reader! And what a heroic portrait they must give of the authors!

Yet, strange as it may sound in realistic days, this knightly stained-glass picture is not entirely false. This colorful panel, begun by Floyd Gibbons in war time, exhibited on the stage by Sam (and Bella) Spewack of the old New York World, touched up today by Negley Farson, who might have stepped out of the crossed works of Richard Harding Davis and O. Henry, is the picture of the glorified reporter.

Between him and the journalist there is no sharp differentiation, inasmuch as most newspapermen on foreign service go through both phases. To illustrate, there was the famous Genoa conference, when the Bolshevik diplomats, in mysterious official silence, made their first appearance in Western Europe. There were more than 450 journalists at this conference, most of them with spats and canes, who stood around in respectful attitudes. But among them were two New York reporters freshly arrived, and they did what every reporter and no journalist would ever do: one of them crashed through the third day's diplomatic parade to the convention hall, seized Chicherin by the coat, and extracted the first interview with a Russian; the other by hook or crook, probably the latter, got a world scoop on the Russo-German treaty. For reporters on European service, manners and ethics, unwritten codes, and diplomatic protocols have no more importance than at home, and they pursue their prey in the manner they made notorious during the Lindbergh honeymoon. For them Europe is no more than a glorified police court.

But for the majority of newspapermen abroad all life is not running to a fire, or even to a revolution. The reporters in time become journalists. The Walter Duranty who catapulted out of Cambridge University and the Paris office of the Times into a life of scoops, the Dorothy Thompson of the King Karl of Hungary adventure, the Jimmy Sheean of the Riffi No Man's Land inevitably join the non-adventurers like Edgar Mowrer and William Henry Chamberlin and Louis Fischer in serious contemplation of the European scene and the prosaic work which marks the journalist as compared to the adventurer-reporter. At the risk of destroying all illusions, I have summed up under seven headings the activities of an American journalist in partibus infidelium.

1. Ear-biting. This is not the most important source of news but the recommended first step. It consists in getting oriented by pumping dry your colleagues who live in the capital and know the country well, the term ear-biting being the invention, I believe, of that same Mr. Spewack who broke up the Genoa conference and retired to Broadway and Hollywood. (Incidentally, the most famous ear-biter in Europe is the journalist Isaac Marcossou, who has glorified for American hero-seekers the three leading charlatans of Europe—Hugo Stinnes, Ivar Kreuger, and our old colleague B. Mussolini.)

2. The press of the country. Some say that 75 per cent and others that 95 per cent of the foreign news sent to America comes from the newspapers in the countries where correspondents are stationed; at any rate it is acknowledged that this press is the source of most of it. In Berlin my assistant and I read forty papers a day, including the leading Hamburg, Frankfort, Cologne, Munich, and Dresden dailies, and got most of our news from them. In London you do not even have to trouble much about translating.

3. News services. Although the Associated Press has tied knots around all the official and semi-official news agencies, almost every journalist buys one or more rival services. He also hires a parliamentary reporter and uses string men in the provinces—the latter erroneously named after their American prototypes who keep a string of their dispatches and are paid space rates.

4. Hand-outs. Although European governments do not do much handing out of "news," a major Washington activity, the press bureaus furnish considerable usable material, obtain statements which later appear as interviews, and generally supply a fair part of your cable crop.

5. Scoops: bought and paid for. You may remember that Mr. Hearst and one of his reporters named Horan were expelled from France after publishing a world scoop about a Franco-British naval agreement. That document was purchased. You will not remember the world scoop on Admiral Scheer's report on the Battle of Jutland to the Kaiser; that item cost me only $50 in gold. Exclusive interviews with Lloyd George at certain times were part of a contract; and once when I begged Professor Einstein for a statement he agreed on condition the Chicago Tribune would donate $25 to the Palestine fund. Lindbergh and Byrd flew the Atlantic for the Times; King Tut's tomb was opened for the London Times; the first Zeppelin trip to America belonged to the Hearst service; and a dozen of the big stories and scoops of recent times, including Queen Marie, were bought and paid for by the North American Newspaper Alliance.

6. Think pieces. Despite forty newspapers, the various news services, the bought scoops, and the stuff from the foreign office, it frequently happens, in fact several days a week, that there is no news, or that the situation is in such flux that no definite bulletin news can be made out of it. Whereupon the foreign correspondent sits lightly down and taps two hundred or a thousand words out of his head. These are known as think pieces. The layman can detect them easily by watching for the stock phrases: "I learn on good authority" (a favorite with the British type of journalist); "in official circles it was said"; "a usually reliable source informs your correspondent"; and when all else fails, an even more anonymous, "it is reported."

Take, for example, the cables from Mr. Duranty. This correspondent has now reached a position where he can put his best pronoun forward and say "I," but it has been an unwritten rule among American newspapermen to hang the news on someone else. "No one gives a damn what you think," is the way one of my editors once put it to me. So you write your own think piece with the phrase "in high circles," and it is immediately regarded with the proper awe by the receiving end. Of course I cannot tell how many of the Duranty cables which contained these qualifying lines were out of high circles and how many out of his mind, but on rereading them I find that they were usually intelligent and frequently brilliant, and never tendentious.

Consider, on the other hand, the think pieces of Mr.

Duranty's colleague in Rome. Last October, for instance, Mussolini was facing a blockade, whereupon the Cortesi think piece informed us that "the European situation is considered here to have become critical. . . . It is interpreted as evidence that Britain is ready to go to war . . . the belief that the present deadlock is inevitably leading toward a European war consequently is gaining ground." Now this is a fair example of tendentious reporting; it is a think piece which either originated in the Cortesi head or was planted there by the propagandists of the Foreign Office.

7. "Original work"—by native assistants. The foreign correspondent, on taking over a European capital, usually surrounds himself with assistants, American and native. Sometimes the work of the Americans is signed, but usually it is unsigned and frequently it is credited to the head of the bureau. Natives of course get no recognition. But very often, when there is a scoop or a fine piece of "original" work produced by one of them, it is blazoned and headlined with the illustrious name of the American correspondent who is the head of the bureau. (Having stated orally for a decade that a large number of my masterpieces were the work of my American assistant, Miss Sigrid Schultz, I now hasten belatedly to say so in print.)

These seven headings I believe account for 90 per cent of the time and work of a foreign correspondent. This 90 per cent is routine work, leaving only 10 per cent for war, revolution, coup d'état, violence, and romantic adventure, subjects occupying 90 per cent of the volumes of personal history, memoirs, and autobiography which in the course of time make their best-seller appearances. Very naturally their authors are too good judges of human interest to ask their readers to spend time on the dull, everyday office work when there is so much to tell about kings and dictators, rebels and charlatans, plots, the rise and fall of dynasties, the armed march of economic and social philosophies.

This is what the life of foreign correspondents has been like ever since the great expansion which occurred during and as a result of the World War. Up to that time the few who comprised the corps—outside the news-agency men—were considered a luxury, but in 1919 not only all the New York morning newspapers but the Chicago Tribune, Chicago Daily News, Christian Science Monitor, and Philadelphia Public Ledger extended or established services, and the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, Baltimore Sun, Detroit News, Detroit Free Press, Newark News, and other important papers sent one or more permanent correspondents to Europe.

While it is true that not many of these men and women who became the nobility of American journalism were chosen originally because of their ignorance and provincialism, as in the case of my successor at X, it is equally true that few of us were especially fitted for the job. Several of us were accidents: we were in the army, or we happened to be in Europe, or we pulled the best strings in the home office because we considered the foreign assignment an adventure or good fun or a chance to see the world on an expense account. There were few Mowers, Durantys, and Chamberlins among the lot, more Gibbonses and Rues and Farsons. The majority, it is safe to say, were reporters not journalists, and we never had a thought in the world outside the production of news. (I speak of course only for the twenty capitals where I have been stationed.) Some of my colleagues drank themselves to death, several reformed, some made love to each other's wives, one committed suicide, several were married or divorced or psychoanalyzed, most of them shot dice and played poker, one made a fortune in foreign real estate, two wrote poetry, one collected shoes, nearly all tried their hands at plays and novels. They were no more cowardly or bold than other workmen who live in economic insecurity, although they gave a swaggering appearance of brave freedom.

Generally speaking, the majority of foreign correspondents in my time were men who took no sides, who did "straight" reporting, spent most of their time in their offices, wrote a few think pieces, kept themselves neutral in all political storms, never entered entangling alliances (except amorous) in European countries, and maintained pretty well the American provincial attitude of looking down upon everything foreign. But after reading the numerous important and valuable books which have been written lately by foreign correspondents, I realize that everything is different now. Obviously and almost without exception the men who have been cabling about bolshevism and fascism, the collapse of the capitalist system, wars and revolutions, have really been thinking about them. They seem suddenly to have discovered that there are economic forces at work in a world whose adventurous surface they have reported; not only have they found a social conscience loose in Europe, but they seem to have sounded themselves and also found it within. They have apparently advanced from reporters of symptoms to interpreters of cause and effect. At least in their books.

Rather than explain this phenomenon I would just welcome it as another proof that the first to recognize a sinking social system and move to higher ground are the intelligent minority. The journalistic noblesse seems to have come of age since that day when the linguistically crippled, the socially irresponsible, the economically illiterate were thought the best representatives in foreign lands, and when Ring Lardner was sent by his Chicago newspaper to write "the comic side of the World War."

Shall We Send Them Back to Hitler?

BY LOUIS ADAMIC

CASE One. Walter Saupe is nineteen, short and solid of body, with a broad, pleasant face and a firm, quick handclasp. He was born in Penig, a semi-industrial town in Saxony. Both his parents were workers, belonging to unions and workers' clubs. His mother died in 1931. Two years later his father, who had been active in the German underground movement, "disappeared." The boy believes he was killed.

His brother, Paul, is "different." He quarreled with his family in 1930 and became a storm trooper—Walter thinks because he wanted to wear a uniform and boots and carry a revolver—and is now a member of the Schutzstaffel, one of the mainstays of Hitlerism.

At seventeen Walter was taken to a forced-labor camp in East Prussia and given war training for thirty-seven weeks at the equivalent of seventy-five cents a week. He was an anti-Nazi before. In camp he became a passionate anti-Hitlerite.

A year and a half ago he got a job as a stoker's helper on the Hamburg-American liner Reliance. Soon he began to have trouble with the second officer, who was the political organizer of the Nazi cell aboard the ship. Walter was lax, it seems, about greeting his superiors with the required "Heil Hitler!" He would turn his back, become preoccupied with his work, indeed do anything to avoid giving the salute. For a time the officers considered him just a damfool kid, and he escaped extreme Nazi treatment because of his youth.

Then one day, when the ship happened to be in New York, the captain saw him pass the swastika flag without saluting. He was ordered to raise his arm and shout, "Heil Hitler!" He refused and was told he would be taught to salute his country's new national emblem when the ship got to sea. Fearing he might be beaten and, on his arrival in Hamburg, sent to a concentration camp, he jumped ship, and with the aid of some near-relatives in New York found a job as a bus boy in a restaurant in Manhattan.

His desertion and political character, apparently, were reported to the Nazi authorities in Germany. Months passed. Then, on February 14, the New York Staats-Zeitung printed an official notice of the local German consulate, asking anyone who knew the whereabouts of several persons, whose names and descriptions were listed, to get in touch with the consul-general. In the list appeared the name and description of young Walter Saupe, followed by the remark that his brother—the Nazi, with whom he is not on speaking terms—was seeking him.

On February 17, obviously after some agent of the Third Reich had telephoned to Ellis Island, an immigration agent came to the boy's place of employment and arrested him as an illegal entrant deportable under the law. I saw him on Ellis Island three days later. He did not know who had reported him to the consulate, but imagined it was someone who did not suspect that the remark "brother seeking him" was part of the trap designed to catch a refugee from Nazi terrorism.

Case Two. Joseph Ganghofer is a "pure Aryan," a man in his middle years. For a decade or longer he was a well-known restaurateur and mountain-hotel keeper in Bavaria. Once he was also a leading storm trooper in his district. He had joined the Nazis "for business reasons after Hitler came to power." But Hitlerism went against his grain and one day early in 1935 he gave vent to his hate for the regime. Whereupon, to escape the concentration camp or even assassination, it became necessary for him to leave Germany in twenty-four hours. In his haste to get out of the country, Ganghofer

Deutsches Generalkonsulat

17 Battery Place
NEW YORK CITY

Die nachstehend namhaft gemachten Personen werden gebeten, sich beim Deutschen Generalkonsulat, 17 Battery Place, New York City, Zimmer 1941, in den Geschäftsstunden zwischen 9 und 2 Uhr, Samstags bis 12 Uhr, zu melden oder ihre Adresse mitzuteilen.

Gleichzeitig ergeht an diejenigen, die über den gegenwärtigen Aufenthalt der Gesuchten Angaben machen können, die ergebene Bitte, das Generalkonsulat zu verständigen.

Saupe, Walter, geb. 2. Mai 1916 in Penig; fuhr auf Dampfer „Reliance“. Bruder sucht ihn.

went to a town where officials had not yet heard of his great sin against the Führer and got a passport and visa which had certain technical deficiencies but which, in March of that year, admitted him to the United States as a visitor. The visa expired two months after his arrival here and could not be renewed because of its imperfections. He was here. Where could he go without a visa? What could he do?

He decided to stay in America illegally. He changed his name, got himself a job as a cook, and joined a chef's union, which contained numerous Nazis, including one who recognized him as Ganghofer, a man who was in extreme disfavor back home and a deportable alien here. Nazi secret agents in New York, it is believed, reported him to the immigration authorities on Ellis Island, who came and arrested him.

I give only two cases of imminent deportation to Nazi Germany; but they are typical of several now perplexing the American Committee for the Protection of Foreign-Born, which is trying to help the men get the right of asylum in this country. Both Saupe and Ganghofer are in extreme danger of being sent back where they came from under the provisions of existing immigration laws, and if they are returned to their native land they are almost certain to be put into concentration camps and perhaps beaten to death, as was Hans Kist, a recent deportee from Canada.

The law pertaining to the deportation of aliens, passed in 1918, says, "Deport them!" The Secretary of Labor has no discretion about it. But if I know anything about America, the tradition of this country is, "Let them stay!" In his Thanksgiving Proclamation of 1795 George Washington expressed the hope of seeing the United States "more and more a safe and propitious asylum for the unfortunate of other countries." When the reverberations of the European revolutionary movement of the eighteenth century disturbed the minds of the early Americans, and timid souls rushed into the enactment of alien-and-sedition laws, Thomas Jefferson, who caused the repeal of those laws, asked: "Shall we refuse the unhappy fugitive from distress that hospitality which the savages of the wilderness extended to our forefathers arriving in this land? Shall oppressed humanity find no asylum on this globe?"

After the abortive Hungarian revolution in 1848 the United States extended hospitality to Kossuth and his compatriots; and when the Hapsburg government demanded the return of one of the latter, Secretary of State March wrote to the Austro-Hungarian chargé: "To surrender political offenders . . . is not a duty; but, on the contrary, compliance with such a demand would be considered a dishonorable subserviency to a foreign power, and an act meriting the reprobation of mankind."

That is the American tradition, which apparently was ignored or forgotten when the Congress of the United States in the hysterical post-war era enacted laws restricting immigration and providing for the deportation of certain classes of aliens—with the shocking result that now the immigration service finds itself doing recruiting duty for German concentration camps.

Only recently, in connection with an anniversary celebration of the University in Exile, President Roosevelt, writing to Alvin Johnson, patted the country on the back for admitting Jewish scholars fleeing from Hitler's fury. But how about poor workers like young Saupe, or a man like Ganghofer, and others like them? Shouldn't they be given refuge here, too? Shouldn't the Administration get Congress to authorize the Secretary of Labor, who has charge of administering immigration and deportation laws, to use discretion in such cases and make it possible for the Saupes and Ganghofers to obtain temporary renewable permits to stay here till such time as they can safely return home, or to acquire the status of immigrants under the existing quota system without having to go through the formality of leaving this country and returning? Or if the Administration is too busy with bigger things, isn't there some group in Congress which could introduce and press through a resolution giving the Secretary of Labor temporary power of discretion to stay deportation in such cases, and then try to pass a bill—perhaps some such measure as Vito Marcantonio introduced on June 6, 1935, assuring political refugees asylum in the United States?

Ellis Island

The Fate of the Supreme Court

BY MAX LERNER

IN THE halcyon days before the Schechter decision Professor Corwin of Princeton had the courage to write a book under the title "The Twilight of the Supreme Court." He said that the court was on its way to a dignified but ineffectual old age, and that its sun was setting. The book was a good book and a learned book. It was well reasoned, and its conclusion should have been a sound one. But scarcely was the ink dry on its pages when the court handed down the first of its series of hostile decisions on the Roosevelt legislation. Instead of subsiding into twilight, it shone forth with the blaze of noonday strength.

The moral, is, I suppose, that it is always bad policy to compose a man's obituary before he is for certain dead. Yet Professor Corwin was less wrong than would appear. During the next decade or more the power of the Supreme Court will undoubtedly be challenged as never before. But if there is a decline in the court's power it will not come about by any gentle slipping into euthanasia. It will come about only after a stiff fight. There are any number of evidences that the fight has already begun. The court is now entering its iron age.

For one thing we are witnessing the first signs of a crack-up in what I called in my first article the sense of the divine right of judges. While Americans are still strongly imbued with it, they are no longer in a complete innocence about such matters. They are beginning to learn that judicial decisions are not babies brought by constitutional storks but are born out of the travail of economic circumstance. The poll held after the Hoosac decision by the American Institute of Public Opinion showed that some 53 per cent of those polled were in favor of requiring more than a Supreme Court majority to invalidate an act of Congress. That is in itself almost a revolution in American opinion. And the crack-up in opinion will grow every year as economic collapse makes legislation on a national scale more necessary.

But the court will have ample support in the struggle that lies ahead. It will have of course the driving force of the vested interests with all their control over the molding of public opinion. But it will have even more powerfully the strongest support that any tribunal or institution can have—namely, fear. I do not mean fear of the court, fear of the judicial power, the fear that one has of the whiplash of tyrants. I mean fear of not having the court. I mean the terrible fear of change and the unknown, which is to so many people more powerful than the felt needs and pressures of today. It is fear and not will that underlies a good part of our politics—the creeping fear of people who do not want to make decisions, and prefer to surrender their decisions to others. This sort of womb-retreat is no unknown thing to political psychology. It is a phenomenon familiar enough in fascism. We are just beginning now in America really to explore and understand the length and breadth and depth of the middle-class mentality in our politics. For that mentality the court's ancient sureness seems something not to be abandoned, lest we confront an uncharted future. If this is only a social myth it has thus far been a necessary one. It will have to do until we build a new set of necessary myths that are emotionally rooted not in fear but in the collective will, and economically rooted not in the class power of the dominant group but in an expanding economy for all. When that has happened, the struggle over the judicial power will be over, and the Supreme Court's iron age will be at an end.

Proposals for dealing with the court have been thick as blackberries. They have come from professional and amateur constitutionalists of every kind. They fall into three general groups: the remedial proposals, those looking toward a Congressional curb on the court's power, and those looking toward a constitutional amendment.

The first group, the remedial, implies the existence and desirability of the court's power. They are more concerned with lopping off the excrescences of that power than with challenging it. Perhaps the simplest proposal is that of a eugenics program for the court. Just as the vitality of the race is held by some to depend on selective breeding and thus getting the right babies, so the proper functioning of the judicial power is held to depend on getting the right judges. And that of course goes back to getting the right Presidents, who will appoint the right judges, who will in turn render the right decisions. This view, of course, sees judicial decisions as almost entirely a matter of the personnel of the court. Everything depends on the individual judge. In this sense, such a view is too optimistic. Individual judges are themselves products: their minds and their direction have been shaped by the dominant institutional forces of our life. Another difficulty is that getting the right President does not seem to insure getting the right judge. Examine the present composition of the court and you will find that Justice Brandeis, leader of the liberals, and Justice McReynolds, the most inveterate tory of them all, were appointees of President Wilson. Justices Stone and Sutherland, almost equally divergent in view, were appointees of President Coolidge. Justices Roberts and Cardozo, confronting each other in opposite judicial trenches, were appointees of President Hoover.

More drastic than the pious hope that better justices will be appointed is the movement for advisory opinions. At present a law is enacted, administrative machinery is set up to enforce it, taxes are levied, government and business expenditures are made on the strength of it, men are set to work—only to have the court, in passing finally on a specific case, declare the whole thing unconstitutional.

The proposal for advisory opinions would have Congress get from the judges their opinion on the constitutionality of a projected law before it had come into force and economic interests had become entangled with it. The great merit of this proposal is that it would do away with our present uncertainties. And one of the refreshing things about it is that, like the child in the Hans Christian Andersen tale, it innocently announces the nakedness of the king. It recognizes frankly that the court is a third legislative chamber, and insists that since this is so we ought to know the fate of our legislation as quickly as possible.

But for that very reason the proposal runs counter to the entire tradition of the court. That tradition is the tough, concrete tradition of Anglo-Saxon case law, in which the individual case has to bear the freightage of weighty issues. An issue of constitutional law does not arise until a specific case has arisen that involves it. Until then the heavens may fall, but the court knows no generalizations and will give no advice. Its wisdom is a pragmatic one. There is a good deal to be said in support of this approach. The true meaning of a law is not to be found in the bare statute. The statute must take root, like a tree, in the soil of actual circumstance, it must bear a leafage of functioning and consequence before it can be seen as a reality. "How do we know what we think," the judges may ask, "until we see how things work out?"

The proposal from the liberal members of the court is the exact opposite of advisory opinions—namely, judicial self-limitation. This tries to carry the implications of case law all the way. It denies that the court has anything to do with legislation directly, and insists that the judges must restrict themselves to the narrowest issues in the cases that arise. Judicial self-limitation of this sort was an integral part of Justice Holmes's entire philosophy of judicial tolerance. It is part also of Justice Brandeis's philosophy that a case cannot be torn out of its context—and that context includes the impulsions to the legislation, its consequences, and the entire economic and procedural history of the case itself. Judicial self-limitation has always been given some lip-service by the court, as in the rule that the judges will consider no "moot" cases, nor any cases raising only "political questions" (blessedly vague phrase). The deliberately adopted strategy of Justices Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo at present is to push this form of judicial hara-kiri much farther. It has found its best expression in Justice Stone's dissent in the Hoosac case, Justice Cardozo's dissent in the Mayflower Farms case, and Justice Brandeis's concurring opinion in the TVA case. These opinions not only made the general plea of judicial restraint (in Justice Stone's words, "The only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint") but pointed out the two directions in which it is to be exercised: always passing on as few issues as the court can get away with, and always giving the legislature the benefit of any reasonable doubt.

It may well be asked how dependable such a method is in solving the problem of the court's power. It involves not only the selection of extraordinary judges who will be willing to limit their own power. It involves the shaping of a new method, a new mood and temper, a new conception of the scope of the court's power. And to achieve changes in the midst of the present social tensions is a heroic task. The court has never operated in a social vacuum. It has always been an integral part of the social struggles of every period in our history. It has taken its temper from the prevailing ideology of an aggressive individualist capitalism. It has been part of the fiber of a culture dominated by business enterprise. It is terribly hard to expect the court to generate a new humility now. The whole idea of judicial humility is strikingly like the plight of the gigantic Serrovius in Shaw's "Androcles and the Lion," whose powerful frame shakes with all the passions of a healthy beast, yet whose Christian principles bid him stay his hand whenever it is raised to strike. How can a court cultivate this sort of humility when issues are at stake throughout our national life that touch the justices as much as they touch anyone else? That may account for the fact that, despite the perilous health of several of the justices—in both the liberal and conservative camps—there is no sign of any intention of resigning. They are holding on for dear life, lest someone take their place who views liberty and property differently.

I have mentioned the remedial proposals at some length partly because it is unlikely that we shall get anything more than that in the immediate future, partly because they go to the heart of the problem of the judicial power. But the most discussed proposals are the group that seek directly to curb the court's power. These are the proposals that rouse Liberty Leaguers to the highest pitch of fury. But they are not new. Although they have never been advanced in such profusion until this year, they have cropped up periodically when the court was under attack.

The simplest way to curb the court would seem to be to "pack" it. Congress has undisputed power to determine the size of the court. In Jackson's Administration the number of judges was increased from seven to nine in order to counterbalance the influence of the Marshall tradition. Under Lincoln, during the Civil War, the court was conveniently increased to ten, to make it safe for the war powers of the President. There seems to be ample proof that Grant packed the court in order to get a favorable decision on the Legal Tender cases. This is a technique that Mr. Roosevelt might have used if an unfavorable NRA decision had come down earlier than it did, while the country was still under the spell of the New Deal; and especially if the court had been closely divided on the issue. Now such a procedure would be fruitless—and what is more, impossible with a campaign pending. Eventually of course an Administration with enough temerity may do what the liberals did in England to the House of Lords—threaten the creation of so many new justices that under the threat the court would yield up some of its power.

The most frequent suggestion for a judicial curb is to regulate not the numbers on the court but the manner of their voting. It would provide that a majority of the justices were not enough to invalidate an act of Congress. Some number such as seven or eight or more than two-thirds of the court is usually suggested. The obvious answer is of course that, granted the existence of the judicial power, this would leave the decision on constitutionality in the hands of one or two justices. The answer to that answer is that just such an event is intended: that since you can usually count on one or two justices who will vote on the side of Congress, this leaves the decision on economic issues where it belongs—with Congress and the President. Another device, intended to have somewhat the same effect, would be to provide that unfavorable court decisions could be overruled by a two-thirds' vote of Congress. Still another would be to abolish entirely, by Congressional action, the court's right to invalidate acts of Congress; or to take certain types of cases or certain issues of legislation out of the jurisdiction of the court.

About all of these the same three questions arise. Are they constitutional? Would they be effective? Could they be accomplished? A strong case could be made out, on the basis of precedent, that Congress has the power to set the conditions under which the Supreme Court shall function, and that such a power would include the regulation of its numbers, voting, jurisdiction. The supreme irony of the whole situation is of course that whether Congress has such a power would have to be finally decided by the court itself. And it is very unlikely that, given the present temper of the court and the present tension of the country, the court would be willing to sign its own death warrant. If it did, some such proposal would seem an eminently desirable one.

One proposal for dealing with the court's power that has the amazing distinction of being favored by both sides is the amending process. The liberals and radicals want it because it seems to them a fundamental attack on the whole problem. The conservatives don't object to it because they don't really think an amendment has any chance of being adopted. The idea is therefore one calculated to assuage them in their present constitutional agony, and postpone a reckoning to the dateless future.

The questions that have been most often raised as to what form a constitutional amendment would take seem to me comparatively unimportant. We are not lacking in the political inventiveness and legislative draftsmanship adequate to solve the problem. More serious is the question whether the court will not interpret away any amendment, no matter how skilfully and shrewdly drawn, just as it has interpreted away many a statute in the past. But most serious of all are the issues of power. An amendment giving Congress the right to legislate on all issues affecting agriculture, industry, labor, and finance on a national scale would be so direct a path to the control of business enterprise by the state that it would meet the massed force of opposition from business enterprise. What lengths that opposition would go to it is now difficult to say. But it is clear that such an amendment could be carried through only as part of a larger movement not only to curb the court's power but to establish a controlled economy. Such a movement involves a greater degree of organization of the productive groups in our society than has yet been achieved, and a new political alignment. Into it the best democratic energies of the country will be poured. The court and the country are both entering on an iron age. The struggles of that age will determine whether the promise of American life can be made constitutional.

[This is the last of four articles by Mr. Lerner on The Riddle of the Supreme Court.]

Murder and Karl Marx

BY MARY McCARTHY

TO THE habitual detective-story reader ■ recent and popular mystery, "The Washington Legation Murders," by Van Wyck Mason, may have been an eye-opener. The habitual detective-story reader has surely never been obsessed by the quarrel between art and propaganda. Undoubtedly he believes that his favorite nightly reading matter is as free from political or class propaganda as his morning crossword puzzle, though a serious-minded Marxist might point out to him that the puzzle which daily defines the three-letter word "red" not as a "primary color" but as "radical" is not itself above reproach. The most somnolent reader-for-relaxation, however, must have recognized that Van Wyck Mason's latest thriller is about as empty of political implications as a Liberty League dinner. With "The Washington Legation Murders," Mr. Mason, hitherto a slipshod fashioner of third-rate bafflers, has on the eve of a campaign year emerged as a social thinker. His reflections on government and society center in this story about the passage through Congress of an anti-espionage act, which to the hero, Captain North of the Intelligence Service, spells "security" for the United States, and to the villain, an insurgent Senator who might be Borah or Norris or Nye, seems "a direct step toward fascism," "inspired by jingoes, war mongers, and munition makers." Mr. Mason is candid about his political sympathies. In ■ discussion of armaments he couples Russia with Japan; he makes ■ sympathetic character refer to anti-war newspapers as "pacifist rags"; he sneers at the progressive Senators who oppose the bill as delegates from "parasite" or "poor-relation" states, and elsewhere describes them simply as "jackasses." The leader of a lobby in favor of the act is called "the commander of a truly patriotic veterans' organization," and third-degree police methods are emphatically indorsed. Before the story is over, the "silver-tongued" insurgent Senator is shown up as ■ crook and a traitor to his country, and Mr. Mason has expressed his faith in that "fundamental common sense of the American people" which had already sent prohibition and the NRA to the showers.

"The Washington Legation Murders," however, is not the first example of what might be called the class-conscious mystery story; it is merely the most brazen. Within the last decade or so the detective story has for various reasons become increasingly social-minded. Ten or fifteen years ago only the crudest mystery yarns dabbled in national or international politics. Those stepbrothers of the adventure story, fathered by Wallace and Oppenheim and Rohmer, which featured action at the expense of detection and specialized in international spies and Chinese dope smugglers, were occasionally vocal about the Teutonic or the Yellow Peril, but the average respectable detective story stayed serenely above the battle.

In the early and middle nineteen twenties the interest was focused on the puzzle. A well-to-do gentleman (usually English) was found dead in his study; all the doors and windows were locked, yet the fatal weapon was missing. How and by whom was he killed? The murdered man's relatives, his partners, his neighbors, his heirs, his butler, and his solicitor fell under suspicion, and more often than not the solicitor, who up to the denouement had been kept well in the background, was the guilty party. This stage setting and this cast of characters were practically standard. For variety's sake the victim might meet his end in the spinney or the copse or even in his bedroom, and a discarded mistress might be introduced for a sexual thrill and a revenge motive, but the general pattern of the crime remained orthodox, and the human beings involved in it were about as real as the A and B of the algebra problems who are forever digging ditches or raising chickens. An unlikely character was inevitably the murderer, and as detective-story readers became more perspicacious, writers selected more and more unlikely criminals, until the chief of police, the amateur detective, indeed, the narrator of the story himself might be proved to be the blackest of villains, while the wastrel nephew who stood to gain fifty thousand pounds by his uncle's unnatural death was as innocent as a lamb. Persistent detective-story readers, however, quickly fathomed these authors' devices, and came to regard the most guileless character with suspicion. So the pendulum began to swing back. A mildly suspicious character is now regularly unmasked as the murderer, and soon a baffler will be written in which the person seen running from the scene of the crime with a smoking revolver in his hand will be found to have committed the murder.

The possibilities of the puzzle, in other words, are all but exhausted. The detective-story writer has been stalemated. He has asked "Who did it?" and he has given virtually all the available or even conceivable answers. The question, "How was it done?" has been explored with equal thoroughness. The well-to-do gentleman, who was originally shot or stabbed, has by this time been strangled, drowned, gassed, pushed over cliffs, burned to death, poisoned by every known and unknown poison; he has been shot by mechanical contrivances which required no human hand to set them in motion; the base of his skull has been pierced by an icicle which melted away, leaving no trace. The question, "Why was it done?" never one of primary interest, has also been answered to everyone's satisfaction. The answers to these three questions having been given and regiven, combined and recombined, the detective story as a scientific treatment of the problem of murder has lost its technical interest. To hold the attention of its enormous public the detective story has been forced to leave its special, technical, rather abstract field and come out into the world. It has been obliged, in short, to ask a fourth and not quite relevant question, "Where was it done?" The detective-story writer today is absorbed in the answers to that question; he is preoccupied with milieu.

Dorothy Sayers, one of the best of the mystery novelists, was perhaps the first to admit defeat at the hands of her medium, and to turn to the worlds of science and art for assistance. Her most recent stories have been, in all truth, treatises on painting, advertising, and bell-ringing. Other writers in search of milieu, less gifted or less energetic than Miss Sayers, have devoted themselves, some avidly, some half-heartedly, to politics and social problems. Politics and social problems have, in fact, become the mystery writer's playground, partly because politics has always been a best-seller, and mystery writers are not without commercial instincts; and partly because it is generally believed that painting, or psychology, or deep-sea diving are matters for experts, while politics is anybody's onion. In the last two years an extraordinary number of mysteries have concerned themselves exclusively with the political scene. There have been "Death Is a Tory," "The Brain Trust Murders," "The Case of the Dead Diplomat," "Death Wears a Purple Shirt," "Death in Four Letters," "Death of an Eloquent Man," "The Communist's Corpse," "The Washington Legation Murders," and many others. There have been an even greater number which have contained some political or economic interludes; and practically every detective story, in its manipulation of characters, draws some kind of class line.

Ten or fifteen years ago, of course, mystery stories also drew class lines, but these stories were so abstract, so remote from contemporary life, that the lines were faint. Since the murder almost always took place at a country estate, the economic set-up was feudal. The only member of the lower orders to fall under suspicion was the butler. The gardener or the scullery maid or the porter, if questioned at all, was merely unfailingly ready to swear that a tall man in a brown overcoat, gray spats, and a moustache had been lingering about the manor house at 4:43 on the afternoon of the crime. Today, in the realistic, urbanized murder mystery, the proletariat keeps its retentive memory, but it has new functions as well. Indeed, it is axiomatic that any member of the proletariat will be suspected of murder if he enters a modern mystery story as a character and not as a storehouse of facts. Certain members of the upper classes—the lovers, the aged, the clergy—are usually above suspicion. The proletarian is presumed guilty from the start, though it generally turns out that he was not so bad as he looked, merely an escaped convict, not a murderer. (To this generalization there is but one notable exception, the street-walker, who alone of the disenfranchised in recent mysteries appears as a lovable, sympathetic character.) If the average mystery-story proletarian of Anglo-Saxon lineage is an unpleasant personality, the average proletarian of foreign extraction is apt to be nothing short of loathsome.

Such simple-minded chauvinism and such childish class hatred are, in most cases, probably not conscious. To create an original villainous thug would be difficult; to use a handy stencil is a great deal less trouble; and our capitalist nationalist economy has furnished the lazy writer of detective fiction with innumerable stencils of villainy—the sinister Chinese, the surly day laborer, the oleaginous Jew—all ready to his hand. There is, however, a sizable minority of mystery fashioners whose political thought processes are not nearly so subliminal, writers who have recognized the detective story for the potential propaganda weapon it is and who deliberately cram the interstices of the mystery structure with political theorizing.

It goes almost without saying, of course, that few of these writers have taken up the cudgels for the downtrodden. Carter Dickson, the author of "The White Priory Murders," "The Red Widow Murders," and several others, is perhaps the most advanced thinker in his field, for he has actually gone so far as to let his detective, Sir Henry Merivale, naturally a sympathetic character, number a life-long adherence to socialism among his other eccentricities. Among British writers fascism is at the moment a very popular mystery-story subject. A few authors, like R. C. Woodthorpe—who loves Kipling and hates pacifists and allows his detective to say of Hitler, "I have a sneaking admiration for that man"—view fascism with a mixture of repugnance and fascination. The majority, however, have not a kind word to say for it, but offer in its place only a puzzled and extremely anemic liberalism. Francis Beeding, the author of "Death in Four Letters," is typical of the English anti-fascist detective-story writers. His book is a fervid denunciation of the international munitions makers and a plea for state manufacture of armaments, yet it ends with a conference in Nazi Germany at which a prominent and diabolical figure is the delegate from Moscow! E. C. R. Lorac, the author of "Murder in Chelsea," is equally confused; he paints a most unfavorable picture of fascism in high social and intellectual circles, but then hangs the murder on the cook and marries his heroine off to a fascist leader.

American class-conscious mystery-story writers are not much interested in fascism, but they do present a virtually united front against any form of social innovation, and they frequently speak with a good deal of enthusiasm of rubber-hose police methods. In the run-of-the-mill detective story of this type the expression of political convictions is merely a matter of routine nose-thumbing at government relief, the NRA, labor leaders, and Soviet Russia; but two new writers have arisen, both sponsored by the publishing firm of Smith and Haas, who convey their ideas with equal venom but greater subtlety. These writers, Joel Dane and Richard Wormser, both young men, are in their field intellectuals. They have a nodding acquaintance with the teachings and followers of Marx, an acquaintance which, apparently, they find distasteful. They are, however, bright enough to spoof the reds, not to flay them. "Murder Cum Laude," for instance, a college mystery story by Mr. Dane, contains the following analysis—irrelevant to the plot—of radicalism in our universities:

The campus Communists [says the hero about the members of the Liberal Club] . . . they're getting ready for the big doings tomorrow. . . . It'll be Union Square style complete. . . . Tomorrow's outbreak is due to be a protest against the ROTC. It doesn't matter that the ROTC is not compulsory here and that interest in it is so feeble that there are barely enough men enrolled to keep the unit alive. They're going to demonstrate anyhow . . . this campus radical business is a good deal of a racket. Mason, the leader of the liberals, covers campus news at space rates for two of the downtown newspapers. A couple of times a year his disciples put on one of these shows and it means real money in his pocket. . . .

Mr. Wormser, author of "The Man with the Wax Face" and "The Communist's Corpse," gives equally bland explanations of "red" phenomena. Both Mr. Dane and Mr. Wormser are briskly contemptuous of the old-fashioned school of thought which held that radicals are dangerous. "Most Communists and other 'wabbles' [sic] . . . are a nuisance . . . and they mostly hang around Union Square," Mr. Wormser says. To their enlightened eyes radicals are ludicrous, rather dishonorable, and (insists Mr. Wormser) distressingly dirty. Mr. Wormser and Mr. Dane, if they are familiar with the work of Van Wyck Mason, must feel nothing but scorn for his blunderbuss tactics; yet they are fellow-travelers. Together they have hauled the already toppling detective story down from its Euclidean pinnacle and enlisted in it the service of the status quo. It remains for the writers of the left wing once again to borrow the methods of the bourgeoisie and to make murder the handmaiden not of Morgan but of Marx.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

IT IS a most astounding fact that, despite all the charges against Mr. Roosevelt and his alleged Socialist policies, there has never been a Democratic leadership which has gone farther in taking over various old-line Republican policies than has Mr. Roosevelt's. Al Smith in his Liberty League speech said that the Democrats had caught the Socialists in bathing and had made off with their clothes. But an equally skilled arguer could make out as good a case for the contention that the Democrats have also made off with many Republican clothes. With all the spick-and-span garments of the New Deal and, in addition, clothes cut to Socialist and Republican patterns, no politicians ever had a larger sartorial array.

The most striking evidence of the interchangeability of party issues is the fact that the Roosevelt Administration has abandoned the Democratic policy of obtaining low tariffs through the Congress. Unlike the Cleveland and Wilson Democratic administrations, it has never introduced a general tariff bill, but has sought to obtain the same end by making bilateral agreements—that is, special bargains—with foreign governments. The Hoover tariff, better known as the Hawley-Smoot Act, remains on our statute books unchallenged. Next, it is noteworthy that Mr. Roosevelt has completely gone over to the Republican theory of great armaments. While it is true that under Grover Cleveland the reconstruction of the navy was begun, it has never been Democratic policy to go out for record-breaking armaments. Even more striking is the sight of a Democratic Secretary of Commerce, Daniel C. Roper, urging the policy of ship subsidies—against which the Democrats stood with united front in the administrations of Harrison, McKinley, and succeeding Presidents. Every time this proposal has come to the fore, Democratic and Republican votes have defeated it—chiefly the former. Yet no one in the Administration today seems to see any inconsistency in the Democratic Party's adopting a policy which the most stalwart Democratic leaders once declared to be designed for nothing but to create another specially privileged class and to grant favors to one group of business men. Whether this session of Congress will pass the Administration bill remains to be seen; there are some Democrats, like Congressman Moran of Maine, who will do everything possible to defeat it.

If we turn to less historic issues, it is perfectly obvious that in many fields Mr. Roosevelt has merely been carrying on Republican policies which he found in force when he took office. It was Mr. Hoover who was the first to advocate that the federal government should build its own post offices and consolidate the railroads. It was Mr. Hoover who asked for the Federal Farm Board for the express purpose of controlling speculation and preventing wasteful and inefficient individual methods of crop distribution. Mr. Hoover even demanded the right to prevent and control agricultural surpluses and bring about orderly production and distribution. Yet nothing that Mr. Roosevelt has done has subjected him to greater criticism than his attempt to carry out this Hoover policy. It was not Mr. Wallace, but Mr. Hyde, Herbert Hoover's Secretary of Agriculture, who demanded the scientific use of our land, such "as will yield greater economic and social values, will stay soil erosion and soil depletion, will preserve and conserve our land inheritance, and limit our agricultural plant to such size as will supply the nation's needs without the ruinous blight of overproduction."

Now that the AAA has been declared unconstitutional, Mr. Wallace and Mr. Roosevelt have fallen back upon soil erosion and soil depletion as the means of getting the government again into a position where, with the cooperation of the states, it will be able to "limit our agricultural plant." It was under Mr. Hoover, too, that the Perishable Commodities Act, compelling all commission merchants to take out government licenses which could be revoked for cause, was established. It was Mr. Hoover, above all others, who was constantly reaching out for additional power for such branches of the government as the Federal Radio Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Food and Drug Administration, the Bureau of Mines, and especially for the Department of Commerce. Thus Mr. Roosevelt has only followed good Republican precedent in establishing more bureaus and getting more and more power for them.

All of which merely illustrates how movable is the line of demarcation between Republicans and Democrats. Would it not be for the best interest of the Republic if the coming Presidential battle should line up in one camp all who believe in conservative policies and in the other all who believe that governments must progress or go backward? The difficulty is that Mr. Roosevelt himself is not very deeply rooted in principle, and that with both parties agreeing on so many issues it would be hard, indeed, to separate the sheep from the goats. That we need clarification and simplification of the issues before the public few will deny. Also we need able criticism of the incumbents in office by a strong minority deeply devoted to certain beliefs and ready to fight for them with skill and determination, with sincerity and courage. A brilliant New York woman declared to a politically hostile friend the other day that she had the deepest sympathy for Mr. Roosevelt because of his misfortune. "You mean his physical disability?" said her friend. "No, indeed," was the reply, "I meant his great misfortune in being without an intelligent, able, and effective opposition in Congress."

BROUN'S PAGE

OF LATE there has been a good deal of wholly justified criticism of the decisions by federal courts. But it seems to me that there ought to be even sharper comment concerning the indecision of some gentlemen in the hierarchy. Almost without exception the law's delays profit the powerful and enfeeble the weak. Rich litigants can afford to wait. Men who come to court under dire necessity of redress are scourged by the laggards on the bench.

I have a conspicuous case in mind. In December of last year the American Newspaper Guild protested against the discharge of Morris Watson by the Associated Press. The guild maintained that Mr. Watson had been fired because of his organizational activity. A complaint was lodged, and the National Labor Relations Board summoned the Associated Press to appear and answer the charges. The news agency, through its counsel, John W. Davis, went into a federal court and asked an injunction to restrain the National Labor Relations Board from proceeding. Mr. Davis, on behalf of his client, argued that the Wagner-Connelly Act was unconstitutional. The hearing was before Judge Bondy in New York City.

At the end of the arguments the Judge reserved decision but said he would rule very shortly after briefs were submitted. In a slight epilogue following the hearing he told a guild heckler that "economics have no place in a court of law." This somewhat lightened His Honor's burden but not enough. Briefs were duly submitted, but then passed a weary time. The Judge couldn't seem to make up his mind on the legal points involved. The action was one of the earliest brought under the Wagner-Connelly Act, but Bondy did not keep his place in the line of traffic. From Memphis and Rochester and various parts of the country decisions were rendered. Many of them upheld the constitutionality of the act and some dissented. Judge Bondy was in the fortunate position of being able to profit by the home work of his fellow-judges who had at least explored in part the legal ground to be traveled.

But the learned Judge did not commit himself. By sheer coincidence this served the Associated Press admirably. It was under no compulsion to meet the merits of the case, and Morris Watson remained fired. Originally there was a good deal of activity and organized support for Morris Watson in the guild unit in his shop. His fellows knew him as a brilliant worker and had no doubt about the reasons which led to his discharge. But time dawdled on. The first flush of enthusiasm waned. Morris Watson became a mute and inglorious martyr. He was buried alive in the bottom drawer of a judge's desk.

People began to forget about the case. The Associated Press was not likely to object to that. Silence and delay were much more punishing to the guild than the granting of an injunction. In that event it would have been possible to appeal and move the case along toward a final decision.

But Bondy blocked the road. It was generally believed that if the National Labor Relations Board undertook to proceed with the case, a stay would immediately be issued. If the board were mandamus'd, some other judge would merely toss the issue back to Bondy again.

The information may be apochryphal, but a lawyer told me that he knew of a case in which Judge Bondy had failed to render a verdict at the end of two years. Even if this is an exaggeration, it seems to be pretty well established that Bondy is a slow decider. A belated decision, even though favorable, would be of little help to the guild. The case will be complicated if Morris Watson takes another newspaper job. At the end of many months the issue will be academic and futile as far as the guild is concerned. The Associated Press may be expeditious in getting the news of the world on the wires and cables, but it does not regard labor disputes in its own office as news.

Seemingly, there is no legal method by which laggard judges can be made to quit sitting on china door knobs. A couple of weeks ago the guild tried to break the deadlock by making a direct appeal to Judge Bondy. The president of the American Newspaper Guild, with the approval of a general meeting of the New York Guild, sent a letter to the Judge pointing out the hardships which the organization suffered under the delay. The note made no attempt to take up the merits of the case. It did not argue for a favorable verdict but merely protested against inaction and demanded a decision, saying: "Although you have not granted an injunction you have allowed the Associated Press an easement, a kind of legal laxative which works while you sleep."

To this communication the Judge merely replied, "Your note has been received." The situation leaves the guild small choice as to what action it should now take to break the deadly silence and push the case of Morris Watson. Personally I think the guild ought to picket the Federal Court Building and distribute leaflets explaining the manner in which delay may strip a litigant of his legal rights. If such action is taken, there may be criticism of the guild as wildly radical. That will hardly be fair. There is nothing particularly radical in taking whatever measures you can to make the orderly processes of law remain orderly. Nothing is more disorderly than long delays. If an automobile broke down in the middle of a road and impeded traffic it would be pushed to one side and a new car or a repair wagon would be dispatched.

Picketing of courts is quite common in staid and conservative England. But the bulk of the American public has not yet made the mental leap achieved by our Anglo-Saxon cousins, who undoubtedly have as much or more respect for law than obtains in America. And they respect the law because they have come to the point of making judges realize that they are the servants of the public and not the masters.

BOOKS and the ARTS

HOMAGE TO HAVELOCK ELLIS

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ON OCTOBER 3, 1898, an English publisher went to trial on the charge "of having unlawfully and wickedly published and sold, and caused to be procured and to be sold, a wicked, bawdy, and scandalous, and obscene book." After he had entered a plea of guilty, Sir Charles Hall, the judge, delivered himself as follows:

I am willing to believe that in acting as you did you might at the first outset perhaps have been gulled into the belief that somebody might say that this was a scientific work. But it is impossible for anyone with a head on his shoulders to open the book without seeing that it is a pretense and a sham, and that it is merely entered into for the purpose of selling this obscene publication. . . . So long as you lead a respectable life you will hear no more of this. But if you choose to go back to your evil ways, you will be brought before me, and it will be my duty to send you to prison for a very long term.

The book in question was, of course, the first volume of "Studies in the Psychology of Sex," and it is something very much more than a mere coincidence that when, in 1931, our own Federal Judge Woolsey delivered his crucial decision clearing Dr. Stopes's "Married Love" of the charge of obscenity, he should have remarked as he did: "To one who has read Havelock Ellis, as I have, the subject matter of Dr. Stopes's book is," and so on. In other words, the work which had been in 1898 a "pretense and a sham," obvious to anyone "with a head on his shoulders," had become after thirty years a sort of criterion by reference to which the legitimacy of another might be tested.

Because of the savage attitude taken by the English courts the first edition of the "Studies" as a whole was published by Davis in Philadelphia, and the sober brown bulk of the six original volumes occupied a prominent space on the book shelves of a whole generation of intellectuals. Much of what those volumes had to say has been so thoroughly absorbed that they can doubtless never mean again what they once did, but if the handsome new edition,* including the supplementary volumes on "Eonism" and "Undinism," were nothing else it would be a necessary tribute to an educator whose influence is difficult to measure. However much the younger generation of today may take for granted certain of the intellectual freedoms which it enjoys, however much it may minimize, as one always does, those liberties which are inherited rather than fought for, the fact remains that the very privilege of speaking with casual disparagement of sexual enlightenment and its importance is due more to Havelock Ellis than to any other one man.

It was of course primarily as educator that he played his role. Despite a certain amount of original investigation, he was above all else a scholar, and the "Studies" are based chiefly upon published work which Ellis disinterred from the pages of a thousand learned journals as well as from innumerable books, many of which were exceedingly obscure. His work was to coordinate, to compare, and above all else to present to a general public a body of esoteric and forbidden knowledge. He might, indeed, put in a claim to that often bestowed title "the last of the Victorians," for his enterprise was in one of the great Victorian traditions—that, namely, of Lecky and Westermarck and Spencer and Frazer, each of whom was inspired by the typical late Victorian conviction that man was to be saved by availing himself of the knowledge which specialists had acquired in fragments and from which it was the business of such as they to deduce various usable conclusions.

The difference was merely that Ellis selected the last subject to be opened for discussion, that he proposed to apply to the study of sex that method of dispassionate inquiry which even those who ostensibly championed its universal applicability hardly wished to see employed in the exploration of a field surrounded by taboos which were the most difficult to exorcise because they had remained the least completely rationalized. Perhaps the greatest of his achievements was just that he was able ultimately to establish the assumption that knowledge about sex was not essentially different from knowledge about anthropology or politics or the social sciences.

The very limitations now most often cited against his work were virtues for the moment and for the purpose. He is descriptive, empirical, eclectic, and, to a certain extent, literary. In his anxiety to collect every scrap of relevant testimony his tendency is to be so far from rigidly critical that certain topics are treated almost after the manner of a commonplace book and that even the often valuable case histories are neither controlled nor critically evaluated. It is also perfectly true that he proposed no psychological or neurological system, that he seems often to do no more than to take testimony and record opinions. But the very fact that the influence of even such a system builder as Freud was relatively slight is fortunate rather than unfortunate. It would have been a calamity if the first great attempt to survey the field had been limited in its scope by the premature adoption of too fixed a method or too sure a conviction. And Ellis had what was much more important for the success of his enterprise—a spirit essentially humane. The atmosphere of the "Studies" does not repel as the atmosphere of Krafft-Ebing or even of much of Freud's writing repels by its suggestion of the hospital and the laboratory. He was not writing primarily for the clinical practitioner. He was not primarily concerned with the sexually ill. He was simply accustoming the general public as well as lawyers and doctors and teachers to the idea that a rational attitude toward sex was one of the essential conditions of a good life.

*"Studies in the Psychology of Sex." By Havelock Ellis. With a Foreword by Morris L. Ernst. Random House. Four Volumes. $15.

He had, indeed, only three leading ideas. The first was the premise, already referred to, that sex might be investigated and discussed in precisely the same spirit as any other subject of large human concern. The other two were equally simple. One was that we had better find out what men and women actually felt and desired and did before we classified as "perverse" or "abnormal" any feeling or desire or act; that our notions of what is "normal" ought, in other words, to be not a priori but empirical. The third was that man's capacity to love sexually could and should be valued, developed, and educated precisely as his capacity to think, to play, to create, or to exercise any other of the functions of a human being was valued and developed and educated—not of course in isolation or without regard to social consequences but as part of normal existence.

These three ideas, continually reiterated, give to the "Studies" such unity as they have. They seem, of course, now obvious almost to the point of fatuity—so obvious, indeed, that it is not easy to believe they were ever totally rejected. The fact remains, nevertheless, that Sir Charles Hall did exist and that his decision was handed down. The fact also remains that in a book cited by Ellis himself a Victorian doctor laid down the general principle that sexual pleasure in a woman was evidence either of abnormality or of immoral life. If much has changed since then, Ellis might truly say of the change: All of it I saw and a great part of it I was.

BOOKS

But Don't Pause for Breath

INHALE & EXHALE. By William Saroyan. Random House. $2.50.

"MINDFUL," says the jacket, "of the importance of 'Inhale & Exhale' to his literary future, Saroyan has chosen its contents with meticulous care." As a result a mere seventy stories have been allowed to see the light. But I am inclined to believe what the jacket says, for though Saroyan has included seventy stories, no doubt he has suppressed seven hundred. One gets the feeling from reading him that he writes day and night and with no respect for the Sabbath. One would like to know how much in all he has written since his first book appeared; one would like to know how much, if anything, he has rewritten; one would like to know whether he is merely the victim of an unappeasable itch to write, or whether he seeks to outdistance Time's winged chariot, whose hurrying near so visibly preys upon his mind. For the sense of death seems—not unpleasantly—to haunt him, to drive him to his typewriter in hysterical haste to pour out visions and emotions in cascades of cloudy words. Before it is too late, he seems to say, I must spear the essence of things.

Moments

Saroyan Does His Morning Inhaling

The result is chaos. Saroyan's very wealth is his poverty; his very genuineness as a writer is the reason for his writing with so little effect. At heart perhaps every writer is an amateur, ready to snap his fingers at the rules and at the opinion of others, for the mere thrill of writing as the spirit moves him, and on the mere chance that he may achieve not verbiage but miracles. Most writers become good artists by the same process that they become good citizens—through slowly perceiving the disadvantages of not toeing the mark. But Mr. Saroyan, aware that he has talent, aware that he has a real love of words and a real craving to tell stories, cannot see how, with such assets, he can go wrong; cannot see what else he needs or indeed could acquire. What he needs, I must say a little pompously, is to get into harness and to cultivate self-criticism.

The moral tone that has crept into my discussion—and many other reviewers' discussions—of his work, must irritate him a great deal when it does not amuse him. But as a matter of fact it is an uncommon tone for reviewers to take, and Mr. Saroyan might choose, if he cared to, to feel complimented. For in a field where there is not enough talent to go around, a man with the talent of Saroyan must be implored not to squander it, not to turn it into flatulence and confusion. What one resents about these stories is not that they are so bad, but that in spite of being so good they are so bad. With every chance of success, almost all of them end in failure. The reasons are manifest. Being too lazy to think straight, Saroyan poses as anti-intellectual. Lacking the discipline to be mature, he sprays everything he writes with nostalgic infantilism. Having nothing really personal to say, he smears everything he touches with "personality." Getting punch-drunk on words, he uses them to cloud rather than clarify his meaning. Worst of all, imagining that plain and homespun things will not have significance enough, he seeks to be imposing and grand, and only manages to be windy:

Right away when he wakened he felt the invisible insinuation of everywhere in dark oceanic hush of recent sleep and he felt the strangeness of his room before the frozen clarity of his steady and almost unawake glance, an event of no motion, yet with the cumulative rhythm of silence and suspension, the strange truth of the place surrounding his own strange truth, the power to see, the peaceful riotousness of being.

What is this but an adolescent who loves to spout? And elsewhere we have an adolescent who loves to pose, or to caper, or to shock, or at any price to hold the center of the stage. It is as though a man wrote a play and then cared more about starring himself in it than about the play itself. The result is not only disastrous art but painfully tiresome reading. I am afraid that for all his natural verve Mr. Saroyan, unless he is careful, will at length be dismissed—not as a show-off, not as a trickster, not as a noisy vaudevillian, but as a bore.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

The Mystery of Sir Basil

ZAHAROFF. By Robert Neumann. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

SIR BASIL ZAHAROFF is a very old man, eighty-six years of age, who was born, according to some, in the Greek slums of Constantinople and, according to himself, in the idyllic village of Mughla in Asia Minor. According to all his biographers, he began his career literally as a gangster in Constantinople, euphemistically called a "fireman." Then he worked up into a procurer, euphemistically called a "guide." Then he became a self-confessed thief; though it is now impossible to establish whether or not he killed a cop while breaking jail. After all this preparatory training he entered the armament industry. In time he became the boss of Vickers—Vickers in England, Vickers in France, Vickers in Italy, each Vickers taking out its papers in each country so as to keep its armament-patriotism above reproach.

Sir Basil was primarily a salesman. He was delicately gifted in the gentle art of devious bribing. One ingenuous Minister of Marine, for instance, won a fortune on a bet that "tomorrow is Thursday"; Sir Basil mistakenly thought it was only Wednesday. By losing many such bets, Vickers did splendidly. It was also Sir Basil who discovered the great game of selling cruisers, or what have you in any other lethal way, to one government and then frightening the hell out of its "enemy" with the bill of lading.

A decade ago, when at his height, Sir Basil Zaharoff was one of the half-dozen richest men in the world, one of the half-dozen most powerful, and one of the half-dozen most monstrous. He financed the Greek war—and collapse—against the Turks as a favor to Lloyd George and for the greater glory of Greece and Vickers. Periodically he endowed a chair of literature at Oxford or Paris. He became the boy friend of a Spanish Bourbon, a Knight of the British Empire, a high officer of the Legion of Honor. However, his main claim to international prestige and publicity is his "mystery."

Now suppose this same Zacharias Basileos Zaharias had begun life, as he did, as a Constantinople "fireman" who started fires to rob the victims, had then become a "brothel tout" for visiting parliamentarians and finally a thief in his uncle's business, and now—at the age of eighty-six—he were a retired but ordinary fence, white-slaver, and dope peddler. The long life of such a prosaic, legal, and logical criminal would be practically untraceable. The career of Gyp the Blood is a mystery, for Gyp made neither investments nor history. But to the journalistic thriller scribes, like die Herren Neumann and Lewinsohn, Gyp is no mystery simply because he rose from gutter to gallows, which seems fit and reasonable. The life of Sir Basil, on the other hand, seems to them so mysteriously fascinating because instead of winding up at the gallows he sent millions of decent men to death at an enormous profit per corpse.

That, however, is no mystery at all, things being as they are. And, indeed, the life of our friend Sir Basileos is really an open book—in those passages which are significant reading, which show how he became what he is. Every dollar he invested either has been or can be traced. Every war he bought and paid for is receipted. His every shady political trick either has been or could be brought to light. Indeed, Robert Neumann, the author of the thriller under review, has brought out about Sir Basil quite as much as we know about Messrs. Mellon or Morgan and much more than we know about such rarefiedly reputable gents as John W. Davis or Owen D. Young. Yet in every sentence Herr Neumann tiptoes and lifts his fingers to his lips and is just about to give up the riddle. Sir Basil is "a beast of prey dressed up like a man" prowling in the chancelleries of Europe, organizing devious companies, subsidizing South American revolutions. "Let us stop here. There is something wrong, surely . . ." Herr Neumann whispers. There really was nothing wrong in this case, except that Sir Basil fixed it so that he kept out of prison. "The writer leaves his anxious readers the choice" between the theory that Zaharoff may have been a Russian-Jewish soldier and/or a Siberian bandit at one time. He was, of course, neither/nor. The life of this armament racketeer, like the life of every other big-business racketeer, is plainer than yours or mine. And I'll bet dollars to doughnuts that if Arthur Sulzberger of the New York Times should send Louis Stark or Ray Daniell or Carleton Beals or myself to do the whole story on Sir Basil, any one of us would come back with all his tricks in the bag, including his birth certificate or its equivalent.

Then why all this mystery? The answer is that Sir Basil paid money for it, not to Herr Neumann or his previous biographers, but for that sort of publicity in general. It costs a lot of money to have a public career converted into a private mystery. All his life Sir Basil has talked about little else except how well he keeps his mouth shut; and since he has to pay for his lies with endowments and other bribes, his life seems to be written in Braille for men who can see. But don't let the Zaharoffs and Mellons and the rest of their ilk fool you. Sound journalistic suspicion backed up by heavy research Sitzfleisch solves the mysteries of big business every time. For one of the troubles with, or rather for, big business is that no matter how it juggles its figures, it's figures it has to juggle.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

The Near and the Far

ONCE WE HAD A CHILD. By Hans Fallada. Translated from the German by Eric Sutton. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

HANS FALLADA'S new novel proves him once more to be an attractive and touching story-teller, but it seems to prove at the same time, and even more clearly than before, how far he falls below the virtue of magnitude. It is his own doing, and in fact it is entirely to his credit, that the proof in the present instance is so clear. For he himself has supplied the standard by which his book comes to be judged, he himself has set the pace which most of his chapters fail to follow. The standard is erected in the first of six sections; the second section keeps within striking distance of it; the remaining four desert it altogether. Few novels have begun more brilliantly than this one, though many have ended as trivially; and the reason, provided it can be found, may have more than ordinary meaning.

The success of the first section is undoubtedly connected with the fact that its material is not contemporary. Fallada is constructing an olden background for his tale, and his delight in the task is such, and his capacity so great, that he seems to do all that fiction can ever do when it occupies itself with the past. The scene is a Baltic peninsula, cold and barbarous, remote and windswept. Fallada's business is to people a certain farm on this peninsula, the Gäntschow farm, with as many ghosts as possible—with as many memories, that is to say, of its early owners. They must be as violent, as wild, and as individualistic as imagination can make them, because they are to set the tone for a novel whose hero will be a Gäntschow of our time, a man whose distinction as well as his tragedy will derive from the fact that he is a farmer, an intransigent lover of the anarchical land. Fallada's imagination, helped in all probability by the imagination of the folk among whom he was born on a peninsula similar to this one of Fiddichow, sets the tone for Johannes Gäntschow only too well. The father, the grandfather, and the several great-grandfathers of Johannes are wonderful and fearful creatures—insane and hairy men whom the magic of distance permits us somehow to admire. Back there in the past where they belong they are not only credible but beautiful, as men in myths can be; and be it noted too that their stories are told briefly, as myths had better be told. Only the shining essentials are given, with the result that the disgust or the terror which we should feel in the actual presence of these men is never felt; on the contrary, they assume the highly attractive stature of abstract truths.

The problem then is to maintain the spell. Fallada does maintain it through the second section, which deals with the childhood of Johannes and which saves him, as childhood saves itself, from the test of contact with any living world. Johannes and Christiane, the girl whom he loves without exactly knowing it, are still the free inhabitants of that wild border region where past and present are scarcely to be distinguished; and Johannes at least promises to be an acceptable descendant of the ancient Gäntschows. A great novelist might have made him so, since a great novelist by definition is one who can prove the world we know to be as rich and luminous as any we may imagine. But Fallada lets his hero down. As lover, as husband, as wanderer, as farmer, Johannes grows steadily smaller. The rages of his forbears dwindle in him to petulance; their independence—mythical, we now remember—becomes the stupidest form of stubbornness; their way with women, now that we know Johannes's wife and mistress, ceases to be primeval and is merely swinish. And the religion of land loses the last shred of its mystery. There is nothing significant about our peasant at the end, valiant as Fallada's assertions are to the contrary. For Fallada seems not to have intended all this. His intention I think was to keep Johannes and the twentieth century up. That he has let them down does not need to mean, as some say it does, anything about the falseness of German life at the moment. It needs to mean no more than that an epic of the present—any present—is all but impossible; and that for Herr Fallada it will never be possible.

MARK VAN DOREN

Five Years Before Sarajevo

THE EVE OF 1914. By Theodor Wolff. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.50.

AMONG the German political writers of the last decades there was no argument as to who was the first gentleman of the journalistic profession. Except for a few people distracted by self-conceit, they all agreed that Theodor Wolff, editor-in-chief of the Berliner Tageblatt, was unrivaled. His articles signed with the famous initials "T.W." attracted every Sunday hundreds of thousands of readers; even men who disliked the political tendencies of his liberal newspaper gave attention to his essays, which combined a thorough knowledge of foreign affairs with a high degree of literary culture and an esprit rare in Germany. All the virtues of Wolff's writing during his singular career as an editor are now to be found in the second volume of his memoirs, which deal with the last five years preceding the world catastrophe.

For the reader outside Germany who is not conversant with Wolff's former literary production, the main interest of the book is to be found in the author's judgment on the Kaiser and the Wilhelmstrasse. Although T.W. has been an avowed democrat during his whole life, he is far from condemning all the diplomatic activities of William II. He does not share the cheap misconceptions of the emperor's policy which have been so familiar since 1914. He sees the weakness of William's character; he notes his sudden changes of mind, his preference for noisy speeches and tactless remarks, and his longing for Byzantine applause. But he admits that at many critical moments the Kaiser instinctively arrived at a sounder judgment than his advisers, and that while they were still thinking of peace, he saw the specter of danger. This was especially true after the insane and criminal refusal of the Serbian reply by the Vienna diplomats at the end of July, 1914. William's aversion to war and all hazardous enterprises was genuine, and Wolff is absolutely right when he says that the German emperor no more wanted to start a fire than a child playing with matches wants to. His, and Bethmann's, great sin was only that he gave carte blanche to the warlike Austrian statesmen on July 5, 1914.

The portrait of Bethmann-Hollweg is painted with much care and fine psychological understanding; Wolff enjoyed, especially after 1914, the personal friendship of the Chancellor and is able to reproduce some extremely interesting confessions of his about the war guilt and about a new order in Germany's home and foreign policy. The author, moreover, discerns elements of kinship between Bethmann and Sir Edward Grey; both of them had a predilection for ethics, fluctuated between doubts and self-confidence, and dismissed their private qualms with a gesture of resoluteness. His antipathy to Kiderlen-Wächter, the clever, unbalanced Secretary of Foreign Affairs, is very strong. But Kiderlen's successor, Jagow, lacked even the qualities the former certainly had, and that was the reason why his Vienna colleague, Count Berchtold, could proceed as he pleased. The difference between Jagow's inability and the unfair methods of the Austrian minister was, as Wolff states, "the difference between playing with insufficient thought and playing false."

The author shows that the statesmen of the Triple Alliance were not so immaculate as they liked to appear in their memoirs, but he is far from paying compliments to the leaders of the Entente. The portrait of Poincaré painted by a master of political psychology is not at all flattering. The many bad features of his character are clearly demonstrated, and Wolff draws the veil from the French President's political relations with so dubious a diplomatist as Isvolsky. Some very remarkable pages are devoted to the dangerous secret machinations of the English military circles, especially to the projects of Field Marshal Sir Henry Wilson, who worked as energetically for war as did his Austrian comrade, Conrad von Hötzendorff. Perhaps the most picturesque chapter of the book deals with the foremost figures of the Czarist court. Rasputin is shown as the bizarre and fantastic embodiment of the Russian's immense vitality, a vulgar peasant who brought the natural voice of the people into the luxurious apartments of the despotic weakling, Nicholas. The author also gives us an interesting account of the role the Serbian politicians played in the origin of the war. Nor does Wolff forget the attractive and somewhat amusing figure of King Nikita of Montenegro, "a mixture of Louis XIV and of a paternal sovereign and smuggler-patriarch."

Wolff prepared this book while he was still in his editor's chair, surrounded by his professional duties. One may hope that now, in his exile, he will write a third volume of his memoirs dealing with his experiences in the World War and with the great part he played in the rise of the Weimar republic. His career as a journalist has been finished, but as a historian he will still find an attentive community of readers throughout the world.

FELIX E. HIRSCH

Dollars or Children

WHY KEEP THEM ALIVE? By Paul De Kruif. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

ACCORDING to the Committee of Economic Security, "illness is one of the major causes of insecurity," and "in normal times from one-third to one-half of all dependency can be traced to the economic effect of illness." What lies back of these dispassionate words is told by Paul De Kruif in stirring stories that should move the stones of America to rise in protest.

Stirred by the story of a particular child who had died because the benefits of medical science were not available to her, De Kruif thought of an enormously rich friend, the beginning of whose wealth came through his understanding of science. "I wrote to this man," he says, "and told him how this infamy in the land of enormous wealth, in a country with unlimited requisites for good living—how this poverty causing the death of children like Joan—nauseated me, made me sick in my stomach." This friend wrote back very courteously telling him not to be impatient. "Millions of children have been dying for thousands of years, and we couldn't save them all at once, right now."

And as for my nausea [De Kruif continues] he merely prescribed a dose of bicarbonate of soda. This letter shook me and lost me a friend. Now I understood this: that no soda would ever soothe my nausea at the continuance of this infamy. I knew that the clever men who monopolized the common inheritance of science would never share it fundamentally. I knew that their greed, based upon fear, made them indifferent to a heartbroken child. I understood that the question today that will finally set friend against friend, brother against brother, is this one—Who owns our science? I thought that once the plain people, the mass, understood the whole truth of the story of children like Joan, once they got it clear in their head what it is that limits the food, the clothes, the shelter, the science that could have made her strong and healthy . . .

Those who know De Kruif merely as a proclaimer of scientific discoveries will be interested to learn what has happened to him, and he tells it with complete frankness.

In those days in the laboratory I had known nothing about the true causes of the sickening, the dying of children. I thought of nothing but microbes, and for years I was more interested in the health of my culture of microbes than in the death of a child. I might have gone on that way for the rest of my life. . . . Now at last my eyes were opening. Now the forgotten children, the dollars or children, the peoples' death fight, the drought of Wisconsin, Joan whose heart was broken, all those adventures of this year of hell were soaking it into me that it was not ignorance, or certainly not ignorance alone, that was at the bottom of the suffering and death of children. . . . What then is there left for me to do except to keep telling with all there is in me, till they shut me up, till they put me on the spot, till they send me down to the lower depths as they are sure to do if I only keep on telling it stronger and truer, telling to as many as I can get to listen—that, in the matter of the murder of children by our present economic order, the issue is clear; the battle can now be joined. Is money going to be made for man, or will man continue to be made for money?

When he had completed his book De Kruif must have made the same discovery that Mary Heaton Vorse made when she finished "A Footnote to Folly"—that no matter what he was writing about, droughts, or slums, or scientific discoveries, he was all the time writing about children. The theme of the book is, Dollars or children. Obviously De Kruif agrees with Mrs. Vorse that "in the last analysis civilization itself is measured by the way in which children will live and what chance they will have in the world." In his final story of the Dionne quintuplets he shows that they had one chance in a billion to live when they were born, yet science—and money—made that chance a reality.

Children always in his mind, he turns from every stirring story he tells to expose the cruelty of our present economic order, which he declares is guilty of nothing short of murder, the murder of millions of innocent children. The members of the Liberty League will say he has turned Communist; the Daughters of the Revolution will call him a revolutionist, and will ask to have him deported as a dangerous red. But the Communists—even the Socialists—will dub him a pussy-footer. They will accuse him of having no program because he doesn't tell us what the new order is to be like, but they won't accuse him of being a retainer of the rich!

Those who pay doctors' bills will close this book with a feeling of regret that in discussing the problem of the costs of medical care the author has said nothing about the burning question of state medicine or even about health insurance. Possibly this is one fear he hasn't yet got rid of!

The world knows Paul De Kruif as an inimitable interpreter of medical science. "Microbe Hunters," "Hunger Fighters," "Men Against Death," these and other stirring books and articles by him have deserved and secured a wide and various audience, but I venture a prediction that his latest book, "Why Keep Them Alive?" will eclipse all his earlier work in the size of its audience. This latest book has an emotional quality which his earlier work did not possess. He is no longer merely proclaiming the great scientific discoveries and praising the microbe-hunters. He himself has made a great discovery.

He has discovered that the underlying social problem is none other than the distribution of wealth. He has discovered that his science is not reaching the people and that it will not reach them so long as service is subordinate to profit. This discovery has stirred him to the depths, and his book is bound to ruffle the spirits of those who read.

JOHN A. KINGSBURY

Shorter Notices

THE INFLUENCE OF WOMEN AND ITS CURE. By John Erskine. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $1.50.

Mr. Erskine's little book bears the earmarks of popular articles for Sunday supplements. Formless enough to have been published in small doses, it has a point of view which is far from journalistic. The advantage enjoyed by a writer with Mr. Erskine's entree to the average home when he tackles seriously a subject as unpopular as the failure of the American woman is unquestionable. Mr. Erskine pays all honor and respect to the home-maker and the wage-earner. It is against the leisure-class woman who, through no accomplishment of her own, wields an undue influence in the American community that he directs his attack. Women, he says, have invented no educational system for themselves. They have merely appropriated man's, already proved inadequate. Nor have they improved the status of teachers, either socially or economically. A fundamental change in the educational system is essential, he feels. Women should teach girls; men, boys. "To put an end to social influence acquired by matrimony, the women should keep their maiden names and make their own reputations." Unsuspecting males in search of light reading may find themselves prodded by this book into wondering how large a share of the blame is theirs. Women, bearing in mind Mr. Erskine's charming portraits of Eve and of Helen, may be sufficiently enraged by it to undertake a thoughtful analysis of just how productively they have used the political and social freedom for which they fought so tenaciously.

THIRTY-SIX POEMS. By Robert Penn Warren. Alcestis Press. $7.50.

The poems of Robert Penn Warren, here collected from the magazines and anthologies in which they have previously appeared, are the work of a poet of authentic sensibility and fertile imagination, with a flair for vital diction and a graceful sense of form. Mr. Warren shares in the difficulties of his generation; he has been forced to be both critic and poet, to the detriment of his poetry. While grateful for the light cast by his criticism, one nevertheless cannot but be sorry that the critical spirit has entered into the poet. In these poems rationalization often hampers the free expression of poetic sensibility, and emotion is stifled by thought. It is the critic in Mr. Warren that has made him rewrite "Kentucky Mountain Farm," the poem which early won for him a place in the Fugitive group, and in the rewriting of this and other poems vitality is sacrificed for the sake of smoothness and intellectual pretentiousness. The intellectualism of the academic life has weakened Mr. Warren the poet while it has strengthened Mr. Warren the critic; the great promise of the young poet, hailed as early as 1928 by Edmund Wilson, has not been fulfilled.

VINCENT VAN GOGH. By Walter Pach. Artbooks Museum. $1.

In the case of Van Gogh more has been written about the Sturm und Drang of the inner life than about the evolution of the artist. For Vincent Van Gogh was of the stuff of which tragedies are written, and since he was himself master of the written word it is not surprising that attention has been focused upon the frustration of the man rather than upon the fulfilment of the painter. In the present study Dr. Pach, one of Van Gogh's first and most understanding American admirers, has turned his back on all but the bare bones of biography in order to examine nineteenth-century techniques and tendencies in their relation to Van Gogh. His book may prove hard reading for those less familiar with the period than Dr. Pach, since the research becomes considerably involved. It is, for example, difficult to discover why Cézanne's admiration for Redon finds its way into the discussion. But it is well to be reminded that we owe that rapid mastery of color and light which made possible the achievements of the Arles period to the forces which drove Van Gogh to post-impressionist Paris of 1886 (the year in which Seurat completed the "Grande Jatte") rather than to the overstressed influence of Gauguin. This brochure, the first of a series of dollar publications to be issued by the organization entitled Artbooks Museum, is an encouraging example of what may be done in the way of popularly priced publications on art. There are six excellent color plates and twenty-four less successful half-tone reproductions.

IN THE SECOND YEAR. By Storm Jameson. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Miss Jameson's picture of England under fascism is not a mere fantasy. She has translated the Nazi regime into English terms, provided an alien creed—as it seems to the naive, she would say—with a native habitation. Hitler appears as Frank Hillier, Prime Minister of the Nationalist Government; the anglicized Göring is the fat and flamboyant Air Minister, Colonel Hebdon; Röhm appears as the hermaphroditic Richard Sacker, head of the National Volunteers (Storm Troops); and Schacht is personified by Thomas Chamberlayn, financial wizard of the regime. Though the English are less obvious in their sadism than the Germans, they make no bones about concentration camps and the mass "suicides" of radical writers—Stephen Spender, for example. Under English fascism poverty is intensified, the trade unions are smashed, cultural life is will require closer integration of effort between private and public social work agencies.

CHANGES IN GOVERNMENTAL PROVISIONS FOR RELIEF AND SOCIAL SERVICE

The knowledge and skills required are made available in graduate curricula for professional social work leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees offered by

The Graduate School for Jewish Social Work

For information about requirements for admission, scholarships and fellowships, write to

DR. M. J. KARPf, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish
Social Work

71 West 47th Street, New York City

suspended, and war emerges as the only solution to social difficulties. The story itself, a thin convenience, is told by an English liberal who has been teaching at Oslo since pre-fascist days. Upon his return to England for a brief visit he is appalled by the situation, of which he has been kept in semi-ignorance by a censored press; but he is incapable of any decisive attitude except despair and a retreat to Oslo. Interest is well sustained by two devices: the progressive revelation of the situation through the fresh experiences of the narrator, who is as much a stranger to the situation, and therefore as curious and surprised, as the reader; and the restatement of themes already familiar to the reader, the bloody overthrow of Röhm, for example, on a plane of distinctly English experience. The sub-plot, a love affair between a young volunteer and a student, is irritating because it is so obviously a concession to Miss Jameson's conscience as a formal novelist.

DRAMA

Shaw's Classic

YIELDING again to Bernard Shaw's habitual insistence that he be allowed to have his full say, the producers of "Saint Joan" at the Martin Beck Theater give it the three hours and more which are necessary if every single word of the text is to have its hearing. For audiences which have become accustomed to a span of attention definitely shorter than this, the handicap is more important than it ought to be, and I will not go so far as to say that a few judicious cuts would not constitute a real improvement. The fact remains, nevertheless, that as Katharine Cornell and her company enact the play it reveals a solidity and a power which set it definitely apart. We were not wrong twelve years ago when we felt that it was, in many ways, the finest of its author's work. We were not wrong in sensing a certain warmth of emotion, a certain humanity, which are absent in most of his often cleverer exercises. The warmth and the humanity are really there, and "Saint Joan" is one of very few classics of the modern theater. It "dates" only as even the most substantial works "date"—which is to say that though time may make it interesting for slightly different reasons and in slightly different ways, time—twelve years of it at least—does not sensibly detract from its power to hold and to impress.

Doubtless we should have been somewhat less surprised than we were that Shaw had fallen under the spell of a legend which has fascinated so many men of such widely divergent tempers. Nothing is actually more characteristic of him than his strain of mysticism. No one who remembers the character of Mrs. George ought to be unprepared to find that strain asserting itself at the most incongruous of moments, and nothing was more natural—once he had selected Joan as a subject—than that mysticism should dominate the tone of the play, with which mysticism alone could be really congruous. Nor can I help feeling that this yielding to a tendency which he had so often restrained made the piece dramatically more comprehensible than all but two or three of his other works. It enabled him to face, as he usually refused to do, the ambiguities of his intellectual position and to withdraw from the argument in favor of Joan, who must be right simply because she is so obviously the most passionate and the most appealing of the disputants. The gesture may be damaging to the philosopher, but for the playwright it is unquestionably a better way out than that method which he has often adopted of pretending to settle once and for all a question which he has not really settled at all. That, the more I read his works, the more I am convinced is what he habitually does. He can be a Fabian, a fascist, and a communist by turns for the simple reason that he is perpetually doing what he does with great dramatic effectiveness in this particular play—permitting himself, that is to say, to rationalize the emotion which any extraordinarily powerful person or idea kindles in him.

Certainly "Saint Joan" offers no intellectual solution for the problem it discusses, and certainly the interest which that problem still holds is due in large part to the fact that it is a recurrent one. Joan is the anarchical individual who may in time become absorbed into an orthodox tradition but who stands for the moment in the same position as any other individual who sets himself up against a world which, not without reason, fears the destruction of the institutions which regulate its day-by-day existence. Shaw is not writing a mere two-dimensional satire against the dulness of those who cannot recognize saints when they see them. The long and passionate arguments which he puts into the mouths of the ecclesiastics are not merely stupid or merely wicked. The play is solid and exciting because they are not; because Shaw is voicing through them a point of view which he recognizes as tenable. Neither is it a plea for simple tolerance. Joan herself is as fanatical and as ruthless as her opponents. She is as ready as they to kill if not to burn. And she wins the dramatist as well as the day not so much because she is more right in any abstract way as because she is full of an even more passionate faith.

A moment ago I said that time had made the play interesting in a slightly different way without having made it any less powerful or impressive. Perhaps I should have said instead that in certain respects it has become, on the contrary, more obviously relevant than it was before. Twelve years ago Shaw's defense of the authoritarian position through the mouths of the ecclesiastics seemed little more than a tour de force. It was almost quaint in a world where libertarian ideas seemed, in theory at least, taken almost universally for granted. But what the church had to say is essentially what more than one kind of dictator in more than one country is saying today. I repeat that Shaw does not solve the problem in any intellectual fashion. He says only that in this particular case Joan wins—without making it a whit easier for other Joans to win in the future. He does not even say clearly whether she wins because she is right, because she has faith, or because historical tendencies were on her side. Yet "Saint Joan" remains, nevertheless, the best dramatic presentation of this particular conflict that has ever been written, and, incidentally, about as timely as any play could possibly be.

The production has been staged with great skill by Guthrie McClintic, and to my way of thinking Miss Cornell gives the finest performance of her career. In the past I have not concealed the fact that in some of her modern plays I have found her rather excessively radiant and unpleasantly suggestive of a type of woman too obviously looking for a convenient pedestal. Neither did I fail to say that I thought her Juliet pictorially effective without being emotionally profound. But her Joan could hardly be better. If my memory can be trusted, she is rather more the peasant, rather less the embodiment of girlish consecration, than Winifred Lenihan was in her stunning creation of the role. Yet her interpretation is no less convincing. It is simple, flexible, and amazingly varied. Somehow the girl and the saint are both there.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

THE phonograph news of the month for at least some readers will be that the Timely Recording Company, 235 Fifth Avenue, has issued three ten-inch discs of proletarian song (75 cents each). The selections include, of course, the "Internationale," given with lusty enthusiasm by the New Singers under Lan Andonian, and Hans Eisler's "United Front" with Mordecai Bauman, a young man with a fine voice excellently trained. Felix Groveman and the chorus deliver the "Soup Song" with an eye to the social significance of the words rather than with respect for the slender musical value of its tune—"My Bonnie Lies Over the Ocean."

In England the Wolf Lieder Society continues (with Volume 5, six twelve-inch records, $15) to bring out some of the finest recordings of the year. As for its previous volumes, the society has chosen from among the most distinguished Lieder singers and accompanists living and has spared no pains in making completely efficient recordings. Volume 5 includes twenty songs, almost without exception masterpieces, even though some of them are comparatively seldom heard in recital and few have been recorded before. Particularly striking are Elisabeth Rethberg's "Mühevoll komm' ich," Herbert Janssen's "Gebet," and Alexander Kipnis's "Cophtisches Lied I." The other singers are Gerhard Huesch and Ria Ginster, the latter doing rather better with "Sie blasen zum Abmarsch" and three other songs than she does in her Schubert recordings on last month's Victor list (one record, $1.50).

Other recent vocal publications include a duet from the mature Verdi, "Gia nella notte densa" from "Otello," sung better by Claudia Muzio than by her coadjutor, Francesco Merli (Columbia, one record, $1.50); Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser," delivered with sincerity and a beautiful restraint by Kirsten Flagstad (Victor, one record, $2); and two arias from Puccini's "Manon Lescaut" and Giordano's "Fedora," by Alessandro Ziliani (Victor, one record, $1.50). The "Manon" aria has been recorded frequently, and a comparison with the earlier releases from Caruso through Gigli and Martinelli will illustrate the progress of recording techniques. Caruso's version is still the most beautifully sung.

Another set of records which reveals the recent advances in recording is the reissue of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite, by Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra. This is one of the series of reissues which Victor is putting out to demonstrate the virtues of "higher-fidelity" recordings, and it is a convincing demonstration.

Finally let me call attention to two unusual releases by Columbia. One is a set of three engaging solos for unaccompanied flute by P. O. Ferroud, beautifully played by Marcel Moyse and unusually well recorded (one record, $1.50). The other is the "Funeral March for the Last Scene of 'Hamlet,'" by Berlioz, played by the London Philharmonic under Sir Hamilton Harty (one record, $1.50). The deep impression made on the young Berlioz by "Hamlet" is reflected in this composition; and its austerity and dramatic use of percussion make the record one to be owned by all the growing group of his "discoverers."

(Note.—The Wolf Society albums and other foreign releases may be obtained from various dealers, including the Gramophone Shop, 18 East Forty-eighth Street; the Liberty Music Shop, 10 East Fifty-ninth Street; and the New York Band Instrument Company, 111 East Fourteenth Street, all in New York City.)

HENRY SIMON

BARGAINS in BOOKS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail Order Book House

These offerings by America's oldest Mail-Order Book House save you up to 75% of their regular retail price. Each book is brand-new in condition, stock-perfect, a permanent addition to your library. In many cases the quantities on hand are the last remaining stocks. All orders promptly filled and covered by our 52-year-old MONEY BACK GUARANTEE.

LIMITED QUANTITIES of EACH TITLE

1. DON QUIXOTE, by Cervantes. Profusely illustrated with over 400 drawings by the famous Gustave Doré. ($12.50) $1.98

2. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL'S WORKS (Centenary Edition). In 7 handsome maroon linen volumes, stamped in gold. ($21.00) $5.95

3. His Entire Works, Formerly Only Available in 12 Vols. at $35.00

Now—COMPLETE IN 2 VOLUMES AT ONLY $3.98 THE SET

THE COMPLETE WRITINGS OF BRANN, THE ICONOCLAST

With a boldness that outraged convention, this wizard of words MADE THE WORLD BLUSH FOR SHAME. No one who has ever read a single paragraph of Brann's will ever forget his wizardry of words, his unflinching courage, his MAGIC OF EXPRESSION. A rare, exciting, stimulating "intellectual cocktail."

Artcraft leather binding, with headbands, gold tops. COMPLETE WORKS IN 2 VOLS. $3.98

4. PECULIARITIES OF BEHAVIOR. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Fascinating analysis of impulsive acts, disorders of instincts and emotions, etc. The textbook of psychoanalysis. ($10.00) The 2 volume set $2.98

5. THE SCIENCE OF LIFE. By H. G. Wells, 4 large, fully illustrated vols. ($12.00) The 4 volume set $2.98

6. A HISTORY OF CHINESE ART—From Ancient Times to the Present Day. 153 illus., incl. 80 in full-page color. ($10.00) $3.98

7. WRITE IT RIGHT. By Ambrose Bierce. A little blacklist of literary faults, by America's foremost master of style. Useful, witty. Interesting to those who like to write and think precisely. $1.00

8. DANTE'S DIVINE COMEDY. The famous Henry F. Cary translation. 130 full page Gustave Doré illustrations. 652 pages. Large clear type. Handsomely, durably bound in tan buckram, size 6 1/2 x 10". ($10.00) $2.98

9. FUNDAMENTALS OF MUSICAL ART. By Edward Dickinson, Litt. D., Editor-in-Chief. Introduces reader to the immense range and wealth of musical knowledge. Complete in 20 vol. ($40.00) $6.95
The 20 volume set

12. THE HOMOSEXUAL NEUROSIS. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Authorized translation by Dr. James S. Van Teslaar. ($5.00) $1.69

10. THE EPIC OF AMERICA. By James Truslow Adams. "The best single volume on American history in existence." Illustrated with wood cuts. ($3.75) 98¢

13. Marquis DeSade's JUSTINE, or the Misfortunes of Virtue. Written in 1791, this book led Kraft-Ebing, authority on sexual vice, to coin the word SADISM (from DeSade's name) to denote the strangest of all human perversities—sexual cruelty. Illustrated. ($7.50) $1.49

11. MARK TWAIN'S "1601". This much suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor." Conversation as it was in the time of the Tudors, and sketches Old and New. ($3.00) $1.58

14. BI-SEXUAL LOVE. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Authorized translation by Dr. James S. Van Teslaar. ($5.00) $1.69

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

N-3

Established 1884

367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14
(Mark circle around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 268-N, just off press!

Name

Address

City State

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE

MOROSCO THEA., 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thurs. and Sat. at 2:30
Extra Matinee Wednesdays

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 3:30

"One of the most honest social dramas of our time."

Brooks Atkinson, Times

LOVE ON THE DOLE

With WENDY HILLER

SHUBERT THEA., 44th St. W. of B'way. Evgs.
8:45, 55c to $3.30. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday, 2:40, 55c to $2.20
MOVES TO THE LONGACRE THEATRE MONDAY, MARCH 23

HAROLD J. LASKI

Will give 5 Lectures on

The European Situation and British Foreign Policy

Tuesdays at 8:30 P. M.
Beginning March 24
Series: $4. Each Lecture: $1.

THE NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH
66 West 12th Street, New York Tel. AL 4-2567

Travel in Soviet Russia

With a Group, or on Your Own

$372 roundtrip
New York with a month in the Soviet Union. Other tours
up to $850.

Either way Open Road helps you see more than tourist sights . . . group travel affords fullest opportunities at least cost of time and money . . . you have a choice of comprehensive trips under leadership of authorities: Louis Fischer, Princess Skariatina, Julien Bryan, Professor Colston Warne, Joshua Kunitz, Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell Stewart, Henry Shapiro.

Tenth Season

The Open Road

12th Floor
8 West 40th Street, New York
Cooperating with Intourist

COMING IN THE NATIONCHARLES BEARD

BY MAX LERNER

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

DEAR OLD DARLING. Alvin Theater. George M. Cohan doing all his tricks in a mystery play.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

ETHAN FROME. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon, and Raymond Massey.

LIBEL. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English courtroom play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

ANNIE OAKLEY. R.K.O. A minor American masterpiece based on the life of Buffalo Bill's best-loved sharpshooter. Barbara Stanwyck as Annie Oakley divides the honors with Sitting Bull.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE 39 STEPS. Alexander Korda. Months old, but should be seen wherever possible. A swift and beautiful thriller set in the Highlands, and one of several films which argue British leadership in the immediate future.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Alexander Korda. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

Letters to the Editors

THE NATION'S NEW FORMAT

My warm congratulations on the new format of The Nation. The magazine represents progress in appearance as well as content, and insures The Nation a leading place among similar publications, whether in America or in England.

RAYMOND LESLIE BUELL

New York, February 28

My experience with The Nation goes back only as far as Gruening and Villard, hence I cannot talk about your typographical dress of long ago. Nevertheless, I would not be surprised if your new overcoat, inaugurated with the March 4 issue, is the most beautiful of all time.

LEONARD TRAUBE

New York, February 28

Happy congratulations on the new format, and more power to you. There had been a lurking suspicion among many of us that the old Nation was subsidized by oculists. Now we know better.

S. GORLEY PUTT

New York, February 28

Congratulations on the new make-up. It is more like the New Masses in looks and content, with Gropper cartoons and such choice phrases as "he is the political pimp," etc. Smirkers of the world, unite; you have nothing to lose but your brains! I shall be no more a reader after my present subscription expires.

A. F. G.

Brooklyn, February 29

I think that the type used in your issue of March 4 is unsatisfactory and a bad imitation of that employed by the New Republic. The old type, although smaller, was much clearer.

E. C. GREENBLATT

New York, March 2

Keep my subscription going with The Nation. I confess to being influenced to some degree by your new pants, which I saw just this evening. Do you think they will have any effect on your outlook?

C. M. BAKER

Webster Groves, Mo., March 5

I have always considered The Nation to be the essence of neatness and legibility. I regret this present change. To me there is less legibility, owing either to the poorer quality of paper or the type.

BERNARD DICKSTEIN

Grand Rapids, Mich., February 29

I think the new format of The Nation is attractive. Congratulations.

ARTHUR HAYS SULZBERGER

New York, February 28

I got quite a kick at seeing how youthful an old friend can look. Even so simple a thing as a change of costume adds new interest to things we take as a matter of course.

JOSEPH PECK

New Rochelle, N. Y., March 1

The new Nation is very charming. I don't like it.

W. B. THOMAS

Kansas City, Mo., February 29

There is yeast all through your current Nation in its new format. Congratulations and best wishes.

PAUL KELLOGG

New York, February 28

My heartiest congratulations to you on the new costume. It makes it the most artistic and easy-to-read publication in America. As for the contents, they are better than ever.

ROBERT LEONARD TUCKER

Columbus, Ohio, March 4

Congratulations on the much-improved appearance of The Nation. As a printing-house executive, I think the change demonstrates the possibilities of modern typography and lay-out in a startling manner.

VICTOR J. BURGER

Louisville, Ky., March 6

I don't like the new Nation as well as I did the old. That may be because the old dress had become so familiar, and congenitally I like old things. However, I miss the sense of compactness the old Nation had; this is a little too bulky for my taste. But I'll not complain if you don't start tampering with the material. I also don't like the new-style automobile as well as the old.

MILES H. KRUMBINE

Cleveland, Ohio, March 6

Congratulations on The Nation's face-lifting. As one who has had to play with type somewhat during the last few years, may I venture one comment: I think you

2 new MODERN LIBRARY GIANTS

• CAPITAL

by KARL MARX, #G-26

The complete, authorized text of the all-important Volume One of Marx's great work, translated by Samuel Moore and Edward Aveling, and edited by Frederick Engels... now available for the first time at $1.00. 870 pages.

• The ORIGIN of SPECIES & The DESCENT of MAN

by CHARLES DARWIN, #G-27

Complete and unabridged in one volume, with full indexes, 1000 pages.

$1

Each volume COMPLETE and UNABRIDGED

Full size, cloth bound, —beautifully printed from brand new plates

each

Other recent Modern Library "Giants":

- G20 Renaissance in Italy, by J. Addington
- G21 Symonds (Complete in two vols.)
- G22 The Coming Struggle for Power by John Strachey
- G23 Anna Karenina by Leo Tolstoy
- G24 The Complete Works and Letters of Charles Lamb
- G25 Complete Plays of Gilbert & Sullivan

Send for FREE complete list.

MODERN LIBRARY

20 E. 57 St. New York

NEXT WEEK IN THE NATION

The Rhineland Crisis

By JOHN GUNTHER

have too many varieties of display type for your captions. It's a shame, too, that your new book-review heads are so space consuming. Otherwise, your new make-up seems swell.

CHARLES S. ASCHER

Chicago, March 6

The Nation's heretofore dignified appearance implied aloofness, intelligence, respectability. And now! Ugly little cartoons plastered all over the pages. The Nation has become a blatant and vulgar gutter sheet. Shame on you!

SIM LASHER

Chicago, February 29

I have just seen a copy of The Nation for March 11 in its new typographical dress. I think you have done a good job in making your changes, both in the type face in which the text of the paper is printed, in the headings, and particularly in your new front page. Speaking still typographically, about the only thing that I do not see the need for is a little too great variety in your heading type.

GEORGE FORT MILTON

Chattanooga, Tenn., March 7

Congratulations on the new Nation format. It is a complete success, except in my non-expert opinion, for one detail. The separate style of headings for Broun, Villard, and your other regular departments comes very near the typographical jitters.

LEE SIMONSON

New York, March 1

I can't tell you what an improvement I think the new make-up and type make in the magazine, nor would I have believed that there would thereby be such a difference in the whole feeling of the text. Everything seems fresher, clearer, and more pointed. I have known Blumenthal's work for a long time and have always admired it very much.

DOROTHY PRATT

Philadelphia, March 12

During the year I have subscribed to The Nation I have often felt that the contents were too heavy to be followed except when my mind was fresh. Since reading your March 4 issue, I realize that it was the small type which tired me rather than the articles themselves.

V. C. CHRISTIANSON

Ridgefield, Wash., March 9

You can quote me to any length about the new format. I like it all.

CLIFTON FADIMAN

New York, March 2

HEARST AND TROTZKY

Dear Sirs: On October 19 the New Militant printed an article by A. Tarov, a "Trotzkyite" who escaped from Siberian exile, on Stalin's persecution of revolutionists in the Soviet Union. Three months later, on Sunday, January 19, William Randolph Hearst lifted the article from the New Militant, and also Trotzky's comments on it, and published it in his chain of anti-labor papers—naturally without authorization or permission from Leon Trotzky or his American literary agents or the New Militant.

On the very same day the Sunday Worker charged that Leon Trotzky was an agent of Hearst and promised to reveal at a later date the price Trotzky was paid. The Daily Worker has followed this up with more slanders of the same kidney. Those who have some understanding of Trotzky's past and present value to the international labor movement scarcely require a denial of these slanders. Such methods, aping Hearst himself, are used as a smoke screen to divert attention from the revelations of Stalin's terror against the Leninists.

JAMES P. CANNON,

Editor, the New Militant

New York, March 1

HEIDELBERG AND VASSAR

Dear Sirs: When you accuse Vassar College of "bad taste" in accepting an invitation to be represented at the celebration of Heidelberg's 550th anniversary next summer, you are deceived by an erroneous item in the newspapers. Vassar College has not been invited to send an official representative to the Heidelberg festival; invitations were sent to the president of the college as an individual and declined by him, and to the head of the German Department as one of the first women to take a Ph.D. at Heidelberg.

Should the faculty be invited to send an official delegate to this celebration, the matter will be voted upon according to the regular custom in answering such invitations.

WINIFRED SMITH

Poughkeepsie, N. Y., March 10

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

ALICE WITHROW FIELD in 1928-29 made a study of prostitution in London under the supervision of Sir William Clarke Hall, magistrate of the Old Street Police Court. She has made three visits to the U. S. S. R. and has incorporated the results of her investigations in "The Protection of Women and Children in the Soviet Union."

GEORGE SELDES was a foreign correspondent in Europe from 1916 to 1928. He has been thrown out of Russia, Italy, and Fiume, and warned out of Rumania. His latest books are "Freedom of the Press" and "Sawdust Caesar," a study of Mussolini.

LOUIS ADAMIC, author of "The Native's Return" and "Dynamite," began life as a steel worker on coming to this country from Yugoslavia. He has written for The Nation on labor; last spring his articles on the LaFollettes aroused much discussion.

MAX LERNER'S four articles on the Supreme Court, of which the one appearing in the present issue is the last, will shortly be made the basis of a book on the subject.

MARY McCARTHY, who with Margaret Marshall reviewed the book reviewers last fall, has lately made an intensive study of detective fiction.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER is editor of "An Eighteenth Century Miscellany."

BENJAMIN STOLBERG is at work on a characterization of John L. Lewis for The Nation.

FELIX E. HIRSCH, German historian and former political editor of the Berliner Tageblatt, is now living in the United States.

JOHN A. KINGSBURY, former secretary of the Milbank Memorial Fund, is an authority on public health, child welfare, and state charities. He is the co-author, with Sir Arthur Newsholme, of "Red Medicine."

GEORGE SCHREIBER is in Washington at work on a series of political cartoons for The Nation.

WILLIAM STEIG is familiar to the readers of the New Yorker as the originator of finger-nail sketches of the Young Idea and other drawings.

STUYVESANT VAN VEEN contributes to this issue the first of a series of drawings representing great moments in the careers of present-day writers.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · APRIL 1, 1936

NUMBER 3691

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

STEPCHILDREN OF RECOVERY	400
HAS HITLER WON OUT?	401
BACK TO THE JUNGLE	401
HEROISM IN AUSTRIA	402
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	403
WHAT ABOUT THE CONSTITUTION?
by Charles A. Beard	405
THE RHINELAND CRISIS by John Gunther	407
HITLER STRENGTHENS THE FRENCH RIGHT
by M. E. Ravage	408
SLUM-CLEARANCE FARCE by Karen Dash	410
STRUGGLE IN MARBLE by Anita Marburg	413
THE CONSUMER FRONT by Ruth Brindze	415
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	416
BROUN'S PAGE	417

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

THE ARTIST AND THE ICE AGE
by Joseph Wood Krutch	418
CROSS-SECTION by Arthur Livingston	420
A MODERN MAJOR GENERAL
by Louis Kronenberger	421
HOW SOCIAL AND HOW SECURE?
by Abraham Epstein	422
WAR AND PROFITS by Walter Millis	424
THE TOWNSEND FANTASY by Maxwell S. Stewart	424
A NOVEL OF QUALITY by Dorothy Van Doren	425
SHORTER NOTICES	426
DRAMA: DREISER SIMPLIFIED by Joseph Wood Krutch	427
FILMS: TWENTY YEARS AFTER by Mark Van Doren	429
DRAWINGS: by George Schreiber, LOW, Daumier, Peggy Bacon, Rockwell Kent, Stuyvesant Van Veen

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Gruening,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

The Shape of Things

*

WHEN A CONSERVATIVE CONGRESSMAN CALLS Hearst "the fiend of San Simeon," that is news. When the House rises to its feet in noisy agreement, that is good news. Even more damning to Hearst was the laughter that greeted the charge of communism made in a Hearst telegram against Representative McSwain, who is a South Carolina conservative of unimpeachable devotion to the militarist interests. As a result Senator Black and his lobby committee received without a dissenting vote their $10,000 with which to pay court expenses in the legal battles that confront them, and the Hearst influence has been weakened by that most effective of weapons—ridicule. In view of the persistent fear that the Black committee is going beyond its constitutional rights, Senator Black's proof that his committee is doing no more than the Walsh-Wheeler committee did in the Teapot Dome investigation has great cogency. It is true of all instruments, and of governmental instruments as well, that they can be turned in both directions. For that reason the essential question to ask is what the temper of the investigating committee is, and what objectives it is aiming at. The answer as regards the Black committee is favorable on both counts. The most comic-sinister episode the committee has turned up thus far is the curious Brook Farm experiment in which six Democratic Congressmen went in for cooperative living with a lobbyist, and helped him gather around his dinner table forty or fifty of their colleagues. If the cooperative commonwealth is ever to come in this country, we can trust the lobbyists to achieve it—if there is enough in it for them.

*

THE EASTERN FLOODS, WHICH HELD UP TRAIN movements over a wide area, have compelled us to print part of this week's issue of The Nation on other than our regular paper stock. This is, of course, only a trifling item in the confusion and damage which the floods wrought. The press has described the picture of houses and bridges destroyed and whole areas devastated, and the terror, disease, and death the rivers in their relentless course have dealt out. The great tragedy is that this should come as a sequel to the disaster of the depression and that in each area it should bear most heavily on the very income groups which had already been hit hardest. As in the confusion wrought by all disasters, panic and heroism were equally evident. In the front ranks of the heroes emerged the radio amateurs, or "hams," as they call themselves, who stuck stubbornly to their home-made sets and flashed out warnings and messages while the waters rose around them, although in one case a mistaken report led to unnecessary panic. An attempt to make political capital out of the flood occurred when Speaker Ives of the New York Assembly charged Governor Lehman with playing politics because he issued a relief call before the Assembly did—a charge nullified by its own absurdity. One fact of social value has emerged. Although the present floods were largely unavoidable, a program of reforestation and cultivation of soil-building crops to make the land better able to resist the ravages of wind and rain would undoubtedly aid in the prevention of future disasters.

*

FORTUNATELY THERE CAN STILL BE A difference of opinion between the departments of commerce and of justice. The striking sailors on the steamship California whom Secretary Roper wanted tried for mutiny were not met by agents of the Department of Justice when they arrived in New York on March 18. They were subjected, however, to a punishment which for all practical purposes may be almost as serious. Sixty of them were logged from two to six days' wages and discharged, some with marks on their cards which will serve to blacklist them. The incident has precipitated trouble along the New York waterfront. The California canceled its trip back to the West Coast because it could not muster a crew; two other ships were affected by sympathetic strikes; and the rank and file is talking of a general strike unless the California's crew is taken back. As for the old-line leaders in the Seamen's Union, the California brought them also a cargo of trouble. With their customary militance against strikes, they have denounced the growing revolt as "unauthorized" and threatened expulsions, while the rank and file is agitating for a maritime federation to match those of the West Coast and Gulf ports.

*

AKRON'S 14,000 RUBBER WORKERS HAVE GONE back to their jobs after a strike of five weeks. The immediate issues were cuts in pay and personnel through the introduction of longer hours and the speed-up. Fundamentally the rubber workers are contending with a relentless pressure toward reduced costs in an industry cursed with over-expansion. Against that pressure they were able to enlist a remarkable counter-pressure of labor solidarity, particularly from those elements represented by the Committee for Industrial Organization. It was this counter-pressure that kept the strike at once solid and peaceful in spite of threats of violence from the "law-and-order" league, and finally won a favorable settlement, including union recognition. Two ominous provisions, however, found their way into the settlement. There is to be a temporary twenty-four-hour week in order to avoid lay-offs; and lists of contemplated lay-offs are to be given the union in advance. Will the reduction of the working force be any sweeter if carried out under union auspices? Footnote: The profits of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company for 1935 exceeded those of 1934 by almost a million dollars, and the annual salary of P. W. Litchfield, who precipitated the strike, is $81,000.

*

THE 1936 INCOME-TAX COLLECTIONS, WITH their 35 per cent rise, are being hailed by supporters as proof that prosperity has at last returned. In some quarters it is even being suggested that the Administration's tax on corporation surpluses should be modified or dropped in view of the prospect of a continued increase in revenues. But a more careful analysis casts doubt on these optimistic conclusions. The greater amount of this supposed prosperity is accounted for by the spectacular rise in corporation earnings. The National City Bank compilation of the earnings of 895 large industrial corporations shows a 47 per cent increase in profits for 1935 over 1934. Despite the fact that stock ownership is fairly widespread in this country, the bulk of holdings are concentrated in the hands of a relatively few individuals at the top of the income brackets. In contrast to the increased wealth of this group, there has been very slight improvement in the economic status of the wage-earning class as a whole. Wages in January, 1936, averaged nearly 7 per cent higher than in January, 1935, but this rise has been largely offset by a 4 per cent rise in the cost of living. Despite an increase of 10 per cent in business activity, the A. F. of L. figures for unemployment were within 400,000 of the 13,000,000 mark set a year ago.

*

A RELATIVE DECLINE IN THE PORTION OF THE national income accruing to the working class is normal during a period of expanding business activity. Business only flourishes under capitalism when profits are expanding more rapidly than costs. Nevertheless, the contrast between a 30 or 40 per cent gain for capital and a 3 per cent gain for labor should be disquieting even for the most reactionary economists. If it is true, as is indicated by the studies of the Brookings Institution, that the primary cause of our economic difficulties is to be found in the concentration of income in the hands of those who do not or cannot spend their income, it is evident that the present boom rests on most insecure foundations. The new tax program will aid somewhat in reducing the idle funds in the hands of individuals and corporations, but it is obviously inadequate to meet the growing instability of our economic structure.

*

BETHLEHEM STEEL AND FOURTEEN OTHER manufacturers of tin plate, including two subsidiaries of United States Steel, have been cited by the Federal Trade Commission for violation of the anti-trust laws. The commission charges that the steel companies have refused to sell their second-grade tin plate to small manufacturers of cans, and that this has created a monopoly for the huge American Can and Continental Can companies. There are three grades of tin plate. The best grade is bought by the large companies and is produced according to their specifications. The "seconds" and "over-runs," which accumulate in great quantity, constitute the second grade; it is bought by the small manufacturers who are financially unable to contract for the first-grade plate. The third grade is the hopelessly deficient product, and is called "waste-waste." The commission charges that in October, 1934, the steel companies entered into an agreement not to quote prices on or offer for sale the second-grade plate. It charges further that the prices quoted to the small companies on the first-grade plate are higher than those quoted to the two large companies; that there has been a vast accumulation of the second-grade plate; that some of the latter has been mutilated and sold domestically as "waste-waste," while the remainder has been exported in uncut shape; and that these acts "tend to increase the prices of tin plate above the prices which prevailed in the past."

*

"WHICH SHALL IT BE—THREE AND A HALF billion for the Youth Act or for crime?" With these words of William Fields, representing a group of transient boys and girls, hearings on the Amlie-Benson American Youth Act ended on March 20 before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor. A previous witness had said that the nation pays $3,500,000,000 a year for "youth's part in crime"—the sum which, it is estimated, the bill would compel the government to spend every year in aiding needy students and in providing work for the unemployed between sixteen and twenty-five. That is seventy times the sum allocated this year to the National Youth Administration, and much more than seventy times what is likely to be allocated next year. Mr. Hopkins merely "hopes" that the NYA work will be continued. Unfortunately, despite the impressive testimony offered to the committee, the bill has no chance of enactment. All that is likely to happen is that the committee will take the advice of Mr. Studebaker, the Commissioner of Education, and call for a "further study" of youth's problems. But study is not enough. Meanwhile ever more transients are riding our freight cars and new criminals are being made every day. Most important of all, an unemployed mass of young people form fertile soil for social despair and for all the reckless political movements that may lead to fascism. The Roosevelt Administration is making one of its most disastrous errors by failing to grapple with the problem of the desperate American youth.

*

ELEUTHERIOS VENIZELOS, THE GREAT GREEK leader, whose tempestuous career came to an end last week, was one of the outstanding statesmen of modern Europe. His policies were frankly nationalist. A realist both in aims and strategy, he did not appeal to history or pseudo-science or spurious idealisms for a justification of nationalism; he preferred to measure the worth of a state by the kind of life it made possible for its citizens. Himself dictatorial by temperament, he repeatedly rebelled against dictation from above. Yet he invariably submitted to the decisions of the electorate, for his intellectual convictions had made him a constitutionalist, a liberal, and a democrat. His realism was reflected in his foreign policy. In the World War he was pro-Ally because he knew that if Greece remained neutral it was bound to lose, whatever the outcome. After the disastrous blunder of the post-war expedition to Smyrna he had the courage to recognize the error of this imperialist adventure and to carry through a new policy of conciliation with Turkey which developed into the Balkan Pact, one of the few factors of stability and peace in a distracted Europe. For more than a quarter of a century he dominated Greek politics. His death leaves the face of Greece drastically changed. While the essential economic problems which underlie the Greek turmoil will not be measurably affected by his passing, the domestic wrangling of parties should be somewhat diminished.

*

IT DOES NOT ALWAYS PAY AN EX-CONVICT TO go straight. Walter Baer was convicted of burglary in 1917, of forgery in 1919 and in 1921. While he was serving his third sentence he decided to reform; he studied engineering in prison and entered the profession on his release. He married an American-born wife and is now the father of three American-born children. A large group of persons in Portland, Oregon, from the mayor down, have testified that he is a law-abiding and valuable resident of the state. Baer claims he was born in California; the United States government, which about a year ago arrested him and held him for deportation, says he was born in Germany. The deportation charge against him is that he is an alien, guilty of a crime involving moral turpitude; the fact that he was active in the preparation of a program of public works for relief embarrassing to the local authorities was undoubtedly a contributing factor. Baer has been at Ellis Island since last November; Federal Judge Robert P. Patterson on March 18 dismissed a writ of habeas corpus sought in Baer's behalf and declared he was powerless to prevent the deportation. If Judge Patterson is correct, then in this case, as in so many others in which it deals with aliens, the law functions in a brutal fashion.

*

WHILE THE WATERS OF THE ALLEGHENY AND Monongahela rivers were still swirling through Pittsburgh's business districts, it was reported that certain gentlemen whose offices were inundated put on top hats, morning coats, and rubber boots, and sloshed about in the flood. This is about the spirit in which the youthful Veterans of Future Wars have planned their organization and are rapidly gaining recruits in college after college. The flood is coming, they are saying, and we may very well drown in it; but if we can poke a little fun at our elders and betters before it happens, so much the better. Their humor is grim enough and they are doubtless very well aware of it. The young ladies who are joining them as the Gold Star Mothers of the Future, and who are asking for a trip to France to view in advance the graves of their as yet unborn sons, mean no disrespect to the mothers whose sons now actually lie there. But they do mean all possible disrespect and dishonor to the forces which brought about the last war and seem well on the way to bringing about the next. The "veterans" themselves, who now have posts in some thirty colleges, are demanding an immediate bonus of $1,000 to spend while they are still young and reasonably happy. Congressman Maury Maverick has promised to introduce and sponsor a bill to this effect, and Professor John B. Whitton of Princeton comments, "Judging from past experience it is likely to succeed." Real success in the movement, of course, would not consist in $1,000 apiece for every able-bodied man under thirty-six, but in routing war with ridicule. If the Future Veterans could do that, they would laugh not only now but hereafter.

Stepchildren of Recovery

TWENTY-TWO million people, or roughly one-sixth of our population, are living on relief. The all-time peak was reached in March, 1935, when 5,492,921 persons and their dependents were being given aid. On March 18, 1936, according to President Roosevelt's relief message, the number was 5,300,000. Because of the increasing poverty of state and local governments the share of the federal government in relief expenditures has steadily increased, until in 1935 it was carrying 74 per cent of the load and the President admitted that the states were doing as much as they could. Yet in a message filled with solemn expressions of concern for the plight of the unemployed he asked for a relief appropriation 15 per cent lower than the comparable amount being expended in the current year; and in one casual sentence he commended the destitute to the tender mercies of big business for any supplementary support they may need.

This request [for $1,500,000,000] together with those previously submitted [for the CCC and public works] will, if acted upon favorably by the Congress, give security during the next fiscal year to those most in need, on condition, however, that private employers hire many of those now on relief rolls. [Italics ours.]

For the rest the President appealed to big business to obviate the necessity for further relief appropriations by extending its operations to absorb the unemployed. And he recommended to them the device which has been conspicuous for its failure in the three years of his Administration, namely, "united action" on the part of industry to shorten hours, increase employment, and "maintain weekly, monthly, or yearly earnings of the individual." The federal government, he said, would be glad to cooperate.

There is no doubt that industry is in favor of united action, but not in the direction of higher wages and shorter hours. In the report on the extent to which the principles embodied in the NRA had been retained—a report which has never been made public—it was revealed that industry had continued to the extent of 85 per cent the trade practices established by the NRA, that is, the elements in it tending toward monopoly and price-fixing. The extent to which industry continued to observe the NRA minimums as to wages and hours is best indicated in the latest survey of the American Federation of Labor, which shows that the average work week was one and one-fourth hours longer in 1935 than in 1934, and that although increased earnings of industry made possible a substantial lifting of pay, the rise in real wages was negligible.

In his message the President stressed the fact that the trend of reemployment is upward. Yet according to the A. F. of L. figures, 12,626,000 persons are still unemployed. There could be no clearer proof that the recovery we are now experiencing is a dividend recovery. As such it will not serve to improve the lot of the millions who will continue to need relief; on the contrary it is already being used as propaganda for reducing direct relief to the unemployed and for curtailing the projects of the WPA and the PWA.

While the President defended the states from the charge that they had shirked their duty in the matter of relief, he also made it clear that the pressure toward shifting the burden back to state and local governments was having its effect in Administration circles. "It is not desired," he said, "to encourage any states to continue to shirk. The federal government cannot maintain relief for unemployables in any state." In view of this pressure, which will grow rather than diminish, a report of the FERA giving in detail the amounts contributed respectively by federal, state, and local governments in 1935 is pertinent. It throws a grim light on the relief dispensed by local agencies. In the Southern states the combined contributions of local and state funds ranged from 0.3 per cent in North Carolina to 6.8 in Mississippi. For Arkansas the figure was 3.2, for South Carolina 2.6. In the nation as a whole, state and local funds constituted only about 25 per cent of the total amount expended for relief.

The so-called budgets on which hundreds of thousands of persons are now living range as low as $1 every two weeks. In other words, in many localities relief is practically non-existent. Medical aid is being abandoned even in those places where it was once given; in this field the nation is piling up for posterity a liability in public health much more serious than the national debt which both the Liberty League and the "humanitarian" Administration of Mr. Roosevelt are so intent on reducing.

"This report," wrote a local relief administrator in Texas who contributed to a survey made by the American Association of Social Workers, "has been written with great restraint, but it is difficult to remain entirely objective in the face of the present conditions." Mr. Roosevelt, nevertheless, has asked for a relief budget considerably smaller than that of last year, and 700,000 persons are to be cut off the WPA by July 1. How long the shimmering tower of recovery can be maintained while an ever-deepening pool of poverty washes about its base remains to be seen. We can be certain only of one thing. In an election year recovery and not relief will be the theme song wherever politicians gather.

Has Hitler Won Out?

ON FIRST inspection the memorandum dispatched to the German government by the four other Locarno powers appears surprisingly firm. It not only condemns the Reich for its breach of treaty obligations, as was of course inevitable, but proposes ■ reestablishment of a neutral Rhineland zone to be patrolled by Allied troops pending the negotiation of new security agreements. In addition, it specifically prohibits Germany from erecting fortifications or preparing landing fields in the neutral zone. And finally, in the event that Hitler rejects these proposals, Great Britain and Italy are definitely committed to come to the assistance of France against Nazi aggression, and have drawn up a plan for cooperation among their general staffs.

Since this represents essentially all that France has been asking for ever since the Versailles conference, the French government has every reason to be satisfied. True, a re-armed Nazi Germany is far more of a menace than the defenseless Germany of the 20's. But in addition to the assurance of British support, hitherto never very certain, France now has definite commitments from Italy and the Soviet Union, both of which were at one time inclined to support the revisionist claims of the Weimar republic. For although the Locarno memorandum suggests that the World Court be asked to test the legality of the Franco-Soviet pact, that agreement was so carefully drawn that no one expects it to be invalidated. Should it be upheld, and should Poland join the Little Entente and the Balkan Entente against Germany, the iron ring which has been the object of French diplomacy will be complete. As long as it holds, the possibility of German aggression in the West will be reduced practically to zero.

On closer analysis, however, it is not so clear whether French or German diplomacy has scored the major triumph. Hitler's recent speeches have made it very clear that the tactics outlined in "Mein Kampf" constitute the backbone of present-day Nazi policy. Germany's immediate ambitions lie toward the East, and to assure a free hand in such a campaign Hitler desires above all else ■ guaranty of stability in the West. In this respect the plan drafted by the Locarno powers appears to play directly into his hands. Nothing is said about the necessity of an Eastern security pact, presumably on the theory that Locarno is confined solely to Germany's western frontier. This pretext is scarcely convincing in view of the fact that the powers promise to take up the German proposal for Eastern non-aggression pacts at ■ subsequent conference and specifically include Hitler's "afterthought" with respect to Austria and Czecho-Slovakia. But the memorandum contains not a word regarding the Soviet Union, which Hitler deliberately omitted from the list of countries with which he was willing to conclude non-aggression agreements. Apart from the Franco-Soviet and the Soviet-Czecho-Slovakian treaties, no protection has been envisioned against the probable next step of Nazi aggression. And it remains an open question whether France and Czecho-Slovakia would actually come to the assistance of the Soviet Union unless they could be assured of the support of Britain and Italy. In the absence of an effective system of collective security, bilateral pacts are little more than statements of present policy.

It goes almost without saying that neglect of the Eastern problem must ultimately mean collapse of all efforts to restrain Hitler, and must open the West as well as the East to the threat of Nazi aggression. The ring which French diplomacy has welded around Germany can be no stronger than its weakest section. It is possible that the first blow might not even fall against Russia. As M. Litvinov declared before the League Council, Hitler's attacks on the Soviet Union may only serve as a smoke screen for aggression which is being prepared against other states.

The proposal for a world peace conference to discuss limitation of armament, the liberalizing of trade relations, and possible redistribution of raw materials also represents a victory for Hitler, but one which no one will begrudge him. The threat of German aggression will never be removed as long as the Reich has grounds for feeling itself the object of unjust discrimination. Obviously there can be no permanent solution of the problem except on a quid pro quo basis. But if the League powers utilize their strong bargaining position against Germany, they can well afford to grant substantial economic concessions. Before making any concessions, the powers should, as a test of Hitler's sincerity, insist that Germany return to the League and participate in an Eastern security pact which includes the Soviet Union. If Hitler categorically refuses these conditions, we may be assured that he means war, and it would be folly to give way to him.

Back to the Jungle

THREE recent decisions by the New York state courts may be seen as the first skirmishes in what may easily prove to be a nation-wide constitutional struggle for social security. We commented two weeks ago on the decision of the New York Court of Appeals declaring the state minimum-wage law unconstitutional. Earlier Judge Dowling of the New York Supreme Court had declared the state unemployment-insurance law valid, but now comes Judge Russell of the same court and declares it invalid. On the other hand, Judge Leonard Crouch of the Court of Appeals has rendered a decision upholding the state Housing Authority Act. Two major issues emerge from this confused array of legal opinions. One is the constitutional question whether ■ twilight zone is being set up within which both the federal and the state governments will be powerless to act. The second is the broader social issue: Will America be stopped even in the tardy and fragmentary efforts it is making toward some sort of program of social legislation? Shall we be forced back to the jungle of an individualistic, dog-eat-dog economic system?

The constitutional arguments in the decisions are the old ones. They revolve around the doctrine of due process of law, which, as every constitutional scholar knows, is an elastic term signifying merely that the judge thinks a particular law is going too far in its invasion of property rights. Due process of law serves thus as a magnificently contrived screen to obscure the fact that the judge is passing on the wisdom, as well as the legality, of legislation. In the Railway Pension case Justice Roberts denied that Congress could legislate on railway retirement pensions because of due process: presumably that was left to the area of the state police power. The unfavorable New York decisions on the minimum wage and unemployment insurance apply the same reasoning to state legislation, and declare that such action does not fall within the state police power either. If there is any better example of an anarchic situation, we should like to know it.

The irony of this judicial reasoning is further brought out by a comparison of the minimum-wage and unemployment-insurance decisions with the housing-law decision. The Housing Authority is upheld because slum clearance "vitally affects the health, safety, and welfare of the public." It is thereby brought within the police power of the state. But if the kind of houses that people live in affects their health and welfare, how much more so do the wages they get and the insurance they get against the ravages of unemployment! It is difficult to understand the vagaries of a judiciary that can make the patent connection in one instance and ignore it in the others.

Difficult, that is, until we get behind the rhetoric of the decisions to their real social logic. Slum clearance, especially when carried on under the aegis of local realty interests, is no great threat to the industrialists. In fact it may be seen as a form of state subsidy to them, helping to furnish the housing that should have been furnished by more adequate wages. But the social-insurance scheme is still, rightly or wrongly, regarded with hostility by employers. The New York decisions are crucially timed. They are the first judicial utterances on the state laws that are being passed in pursuance of the federal social-insurance program, and are bound to influence its fate.

We are no militant defenders of the federal social-security legislation as it now stands. As Abraham Epstein points out in a review elsewhere in this issue, the legislation is tragically inadequate, hesitant, confused. But it does represent a start. America is one of the last of all civilized countries to take these steps. What Germany did a half-century ago, what England did a quarter-century ago, we are only now attempting. The ironic phase is that even such fragmentary steps as we are taking still seem to such jurists as Judge Russell too great a burden on business enterprise. The opposition of the courts and of the business men whose interests they express becomes clear when it is remembered that any program of social security is actually a program of workers' security. It is the workers alone, principally the industrial workers, who constitute the income groups that are hardest hit by unemployment, old age, inadequate housing. They are the groups upon whom in our economic system the heavy burden of insecurity rests. It is these groups, just beginning to emerge from the jungle of insecurity, that the judges want to send back.

Heroism in Austria

THE trial of twenty-eight Socialists and two Communists in Vienna offers every day new proofs of their heroism and of the vitality of the democratic idea. The charges against them are the usual charges of treason. Their real offense is that after the fascist coup of two years ago they succeeded in reorganizing the shattered remnants of the Socialist Party into an underground movement that has become a real force in Austrian life and has given new hope to the workers and to the middle-class democratic elements.

The trial itself has all the drama of the Reichstag-fire trial, in a setting not so much of heroic despair as of clear-eyed political realism on the part of the defendants. The excellent dispatches of G. E. R. Gedye to the New York Times present them as magnificently calm and self-contained. The leaders admit without hesitation having carried on the trade-union and party organization. But they insist that they are loyal Austrians, fighting to maintain democratic liberties; that their quarrel is not with the tradition of Austrian democracy but with the fascist regime and the even more ruthless Nazi movement; that they will gladly fight for Austria if the fight is against Nazi dominance and for the restoration of the liberties of the common man.

There is a tragic as well as a heroic note here. Faced by fascist terror the Socialist movements of Europe no longer look forward to a socialized state but backward with nostalgia toward the democratic liberties of the constitutional states that existed before the fascist glacial epoch. There can be no doubt that socialism is fighting for its life in Austria today. The trial is the climax of a general drive to suppress the Socialists and the organized labor movement. The working-class quarters are terrorized by police and spies; wholesale arrests have been made and the prisons are full of so-called political offenders; the government lives in fear of mass demonstrations. It is significant that the representatives of the French, Belgian, English, and Czech labor and Socialist movements have been denied admittance to the trial, and that their protests have gone unheeded. The arrests of the prisoners were made by the approved espionage and stool-pigeon methods of terrorist governments, and even the women were subjected to continual torture and harassment in an attempt to get confessions from them.

The irony of it all is that without the aid of the workers the Schuschnigg-Stahremberg regime does not stand a chance of resisting the advance of Hitler and the Austrian Nazis. They may have the support of Mussolini; their meager armies may be paid by Italian funds. But ultimately a German attack can be resisted only by the massed force of the workers. The full extent of the Socialist achievement is missed unless it is remembered that these efforts at piecing together again the fragments of trade-union organization are what has alone kept the Austrian workers who have witnessed the treachery of the government from succumbing completely to Nazi propaganda.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington, March 21

THOUGH the Copeland-Roper ship-subsidy bill has not yet reached the floor in the House or Senate—it promises to stir up the biggest battle of the session when it does—the boys already are fighting over appointments to the Maritime Authority it would create as its administering agency. J. Monroe Johnson—dubbed "Popeye the Sailorman" for a variety of reasons in addition to the fact that he resembles the comic-strip character—has hinted in public places that he is to be chairman of the authority. Joseph B. Weaver, director of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, also is on tap. Such appointments would be in keeping with the Administration's performance to date in the ship-subsidy situation. Roosevelt seems determined here as in other things to take one step forward and two back.

Weaver has been borrowed from the Newport News Shipbuilding Company to do his present job in the Commerce Department. When his first and second lieutenants there were suspended recently, he talked valiantly of resigning in protest and exposing conditions within the department if they were dismissed. But dismissed they were—for carrying their fight for safety-at-sea legislation to the public—and Weaver promptly shut up. Johnson, Weaver's immediate chief, is the South Carolina politician, highway commissioner, and legionnaire who last year succeeded Ewing Y. Mitchell as Assistant Secretary of Commerce. Mitchell was ousted by Roosevelt for protesting, in general, that the New Deal had passed over the Commerce Department and, in particular, that the public was being defrauded by the permission given Roosevelt's pals of the International Mercantile Marine to forget they had contracted to run the Leviathan in exchange for a bargain price on other ships sold them by the government at the time. Johnson made a good successor; he could scarcely be counted on to know whether he himself, let alone the public, was being defrauded.

Roper's excuse for naming Johnson was that he needed an assistant who was expert in matters of transportation. When Senators at the hearings of the Copeland-Roper bill expressed doubt that Johnson's expertness in such matters extended to marine transportation, Johnson replied that he could do almost anything with "a small boat." He also expressed the belief that he knew as much as any man in Washington about maritime affairs, and he proceeded to give his blanket indorsement to the bill, though it later turned out that its drafters had forgotten to include a clause canceling the present mail-contract system of subsidies. It also turned out that virtually none of the qualified experts in the Commerce Department had been consulted on the drafting of the bill, and when Senator Guffey summoned one of those experts, O. P. M. Brown, to the stand for questioning, Johnson bounced to his feet to make that point clear and to warn the committee that Brown did not speak for the department. His tone suggested that Brown was a nihilist and he was giving the committee fair warning to duck before the witness started throwing bombs.

"Popeye the Sailor"

Brown, a mild little man, turned out to be the chief of the Shipping Board Bureau's litigation and an attorney who, in defending the government in claim cases, had won some 96 per cent of his cases since 1921. Under questioning by Guffey, who had Thomas M. Woodward, former vice-president of the Shipping Board, at his elbow, Brown dismembered the Copeland-Roper bill and showed it up as the fraud it is. But bad as it is, it still is not bad enough for Roper, Copeland, and their pals, who without drawing a word of repudiation from the White House persist in calling it an Administration bill. Those parts of it that constitute improvements on the original Copeland bill were forced in by the Post Office Department; and the Commerce Department's expert witness, J. Craig Peacock, an income-tax lawyer who practiced with Roper before the Secretary made him director of the Shipping Board Bureau, ran out on those insertions when he appeared before the committee. But even with those insertions deleted, the bill is still unacceptable to the ship operators, for the only real gravy it offers them is in subsidies for the construction of new ships. They want no new ships. Among them, with the exception of the United Fruit and Grace lines, they have only $4,000,000 in free assets and can't finance new construction even on the excessively generous terms offered by the bill.

TWENTY-FOUR hours after beginning hearings Tuesday in its investigation of the $5,000,000,000 American Telephone and Telegraph structure, the Federal Communications Commission had to shift temporarily from its main line of inquiry. But the digression, caused by the absence of Walter S. Gifford, A. T. and T. president, was not without its value. Adroitly probing into the relations between the pious Gifford's outfit and the gambling syndicate that operates a network of illegal book-making joints in thirty-six states, Chief Investigator Samuel Becker showed how unscrupulous "the world's largest private enterprise" can be in small things. Becker brought out that the company's agents, with the knowledge and consent of their superiors, bribe police and prosecuting authorities, assist the touts and racketeers in concealment of their operations, and resort to all manner of flimflam to keep up a holy front. Having learned what the company will do for the sake of relatively insignificant profits, the public will be better prepared to resist the glib attempts of company apologists to explain away the larger and more intricate disclosures that are to follow.

Becker touched on some of those the opening day when he showed that in justifying to state regulatory commissions the equipment costs that pad out the rate bases for phone service, company officials urge comparison between the prices paid Western Electric, an A. T. and T. subsidiary, for the equipment and the prices charged by the Graybar Electric Company for identical equipment. On such occasions, company representatives, including Mr. Gifford, have sworn that Graybar was an independent company. Becker showed that even in the minutiae of its operations Graybar is under the complete control of Western Electric and buys from that company the equipment it sells to telephone companies outside the Bell system. Becker will show later that those companies have no more right to the title of "independent" than has Graybar. He will also blast the A. T. and T.'s claim to having its stock so widely distributed that the company is virtually publicly owned. He already has torn away its mask of paternalism by showing that such losses as it has suffered during the depression have been taken out of its employees' hides.

Dr. Copeland

Hoover's doctor of unemployment, Man-a-Block Gifford, was forced by Becker to admit that the drop in the company's operating revenues since 1929 has been matched almost exactly by the drop in its pay roll. Gifford, who gets $206,000 a year, also was forced to admit that this pay-roll cut was made chiefly at the expense of the lowest-paid workers and at no expense to the company's stockholders, who have continued to draw dividends at the rate of $9 per share.

THE government has just filed its brief in a Supreme Court case (United States vs. Elgin, Joliet, and Eastern Railway) that may drastically reshape the nation's railroad structure. If the court rules in the government's favor, the United States Steel Corporation will have to get rid of some twenty-five railroads that it owns. The property immediately at issue is the Chicago Outer Belt Line, which so encircles Chicago that all the other roads entering the city must pay tribute to it. The government holds that possession of the road by United States Steel is a violation of the Hepburn act's famous commodities clause, and has been ever since that act became effective in 1908. It charges that ownership of the road by United States Steel enables it to discriminate in service among its competitors and allies, including the "independent" roads, and to pocket profits which, in effect, are the same as illegal freight-rate rebates. Federal Judge Woodward, who presided at the trial at Chicago, ruled against the government; he could detect no material link between the Belt Line and its principal customer—United States Steel's mines, mills, and quarries. Coordinator Eastman, of course, is the person who pressed the Department of Justice into filing suit against the railroad.

DO YOU remember when Roosevelt was going to drive the money changers out of the temples of finance? James J. O'Shea probably does. He is the vice-president of the National Bank of Detroit who currently is held in $40,000 bail for being "criminally involved" in the theft of $349,000 of city funds intrusted to the institution. O'Shea turns out to have had a court record as a confidence man before he was made an officer of the new bank, which is owned half by the government and half by General Motors. He pleaded guilty in 1923 to a state charge of larceny by conversion and was put on probation. A year later he pleaded guilty in federal court to a mail-fraud charge and was again put on probation. Then he became a banker. The first Detroit bank of which he was made an executive collapsed in 1931, the second in 1933. On the ruins of the second, the huge National Bank of Detroit was raised by the Roosevelt Administration through the RFC, and O'Shea was hired as a vice-president. At least two of its directors are under indictment for banking-law violations that occurred before the government approved their appointment as directors.

NOTE on a revolution: When "Porgy and Bess" played at the capital's leading theater this past week, Washington's Jim Crowism went into a temporary discard. Negroes were admitted on the same terms as whites and not only to gallery but also to balcony and orchestra seats. When "Green Pastures" played the same theater a few years ago, Negroes were barred except for one "special show," which they properly boycotted. The change this week went almost unnoticed. Whites who attended came away still able to hold up their proud heads, including the Midwesterners, who as soon as they get to Washington always become more "Southern" than the South.

What About the Constitution?

BY CHARLES A. BEARD

WASHINGTON, one of the greatest whispering galleries in the world, is buzzing with talk about the Constitution and the Supreme Court. The talk goes on in the drawing-rooms, at receptions, in little dinner parties, and among members of Congress, off duty and on. Reporters, editors, and columnists engage in it and write sagely about the subject with few apparent misgivings. At first the buzzing seems to be a hopeless jumble of facts, opinions, declarations, assertions, and hair-splittings. But a patient analysis of the discussions reveals certain forms of patois and pattern. They may be summarized swiftly as follows:

1. Why bother about the old Constitution and the Supreme Court? They are mere manifestations of capitalism and will pass with the inevitable triumph of the proletariat.

2. The Supreme Court has usurped the power of passing on acts of Congress, and should be put in its proper place.

3. The Supreme Court is controlled by seven corporation lawyers hostile to the New Deal, and if it does not stop knocking out legislation the people will amend the Constitution.

4. The action of the Supreme Court is intolerable and some way must be found to get around its restrictions.

5. The Supreme Court is the last line of defense for the Constitution, liberty, and property, and not a breath of criticism is to be allowed. Otherwise the Constitution will be undermined and the country, deprived of its sustaining bulwark, will go to pot.

6. None of the recent cases is of the slightest social or economic importance, and discussing them is a waste of time. In the long run the Supreme Court has knocked out efforts of the states to enact effective social legislation, prevented Congress from acting, and facilitated the concentration of economic power in private hands. By taking this course it has helped to build up the greatest concentrated plutocracy in the world and thus prepared the way for the American people to choose between plutocracy and social democracy. Karl Marx himself could not have made a more satisfactory pattern of history and brought the deadly denouement nearer to its hour.

With variations in detail such are the philosophies revealed by conversations in Washington and columns in newspapers.

What could be said about them by a hard-boiled old historian, almost beyond the reach of earthly ambitions, whose mind is full of facts and opinions drawn from Breasted, Mommsen, Gibbon, Hegel, Marx, Spengler, Max Weber, Karl Mannheim, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, General Grant, John Marshall, Grover Cleveland, and several hundred other doers and sayers on the world stage since the fall of man through woman's sin? What can be said, indeed?

Such a hard-boiled old sinner would have to say, in the first place, that the business of the Constitution and the Supreme Court is not simple and that there is "something" in what each of the aforesaid proponents and contenders puts forward. Each has some facts to support his view, and is not entirely without reason. The sinner would likewise have to say that the immediate considerations, such as the NIRA or the AAA, are relatively unimportant, and that any action now taken must come under a long-run view of things.

But our hard-boiled sinner could actually be sure of very little. He might not expect much mercy himself from the seven former corporation lawyers, and yet be compelled to admit that he might get less mercy from the 531 representatives of the people in Congress assembled. That eminent body, now so zealously defended against the Supreme Court, has demonstrated in the District of Columbia just what it might do to education throughout the United States if it, and not the states, had control over the American schools. And according to pretty authentic rumor, it would pass now a whole sheaf of suppressive bills if it had not been warned by the President of the United States against embarrassing him in the coming election.

It is true that the Supreme Court has not been very hot in its defense of personal liberties and rights, but it has rendered a number of decisions blocking vigilante tyranny in various localities. Its civilization may be largely limited to legal lore, but it has some quality of mercy in its equipment. Probably the sharpest critic in Washington would rather risk his neck in the Palace of Justice than intrust it to a Nazi storm trooper. Has not an eminent lawyer in Germany said, "A handful of force is worth a bushel of justice"? Walk lightly. Things are not simple. The Congress of the United States could do a lot of damage to life, as distinguished from property, if it were turned loose without bridle or rider.

Some Congressional critics of the Supreme Court have recognized this peril and would make a distinction. They would deprive the court of power over economic legislation and would confine its annulling jurisdiction to matters of individual and personal liberty. This is really significant.

Then there are the amenders. Some of them think that the Constitution was made for horse-and-buggy days and should be brought up to date. But when they start to frame their sociological amendment, they encounter the very difficulty which confronted the framers of the Constitution. The fathers considered specification versus generality and decided on a combination. They conferred some powers expressly on Congress. Then they authorized it to make all laws "necessary and proper" for carrying into effect the powers conferred upon Congress and other branches of the government. They went farther than that. They empowered Congress to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States.

It would be difficult to frame an amendment broader than the general-welfare clause. But see how that clause has been neglected, mauled, manhandled, and whittled away! An amendment broad enough to escape Justice Roberts's strictures would have to be as broad as Hamilton's proposal in the convention: Let Congress legislate on all matters whatsoever. Under the sweep of such a provision Congress might order burned every historical work that mentions Russia and expel every teacher who refers to the subject. "You pays your money and you takes your choice."

By no means simple is the "bulwark" conception of the situation. The Supreme Court alone can stop the march of populism, socialism, and communism. That is what Joseph Choate said to the court in 1895 just before it knocked out the income-tax law. That is what the wise men of the pro-slavery party said in 1857 when the Supreme Court undertook to "settle the slavery question." It is still being repeated today.

What has history to say on that point? It cannot be sure. Sheer force can accomplish a lot in this world, for a time. Page Torquemada, P. Díaz, B. Mussolini, and A. Hitler! On the other hand sheer force may hasten revolt. John Adams said that the British sent over troops to quell a revolution that did not exist and managed to make a revolution. Such things sometimes happen too. Justice Stone shot the suggestion at Justice Roberts in the AAA case and warned him that an abuse of power may destroy it. It is for this reason that Communists want the Supreme Court to "do its worst." "When it gets dark enough we can see stars." Yes, but we cannot tell exactly whether they will be real stars or imaginary stars created by a policeman's tough stick. Many a bulwark has been busted, and matters made better—or worse—afterward.

By this time all readers who feel quite sure about things will want to stop. Uncertainty is cowardice, they will say—sheer trimming. The Constitution must be let alone. It must be amended. It must be overthrown. Those are the choices and every "honest man" must choose. That too is simple.

But perhaps the hour of dogmatic choice has not arrived. The hard-boiled historian knows that there have been hours of great decision in human affairs. Cromwell had them. So did Robespierre. So did Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln. We, the plain people, however, are in no such position of power. Those among us who are absolutely certain about what they would do if they were in the White House are deluding themselves. Nobody knows what he would actually do in circumstances other than those now surrounding him.

Two things are necessary for effective decision—knowledge and an intuitive judgment that the times are ripe. They go together. Without knowledge, intuition may head into astrology. Without intuitive judgment, knowledge may be sterile.

If action is taken before the times are ripe, the actor may lose his head or, worse, go down in a gale of laughter. There is always an element of risk in any great action, whatever the purpose or end. The result may be indefinite postponement or utter defeat, instead of the anticipated triumph. Yet those who take risks are not without uses. They may succeed. Then immortality may crown them. They may fail but mark a step onward. They may destroy, for years, for decades, perhaps forever, their own cause. Leaders in secession in 1860-61 destroyed slavery in trying to save it. Alas, that it should be so. But can history be false to its records?

Upshot? It may be well for all parties to the constitutional dispute to wait awhile. The search for and clarification of fundamental principles proceed. If we have any faith at all in human intelligence, we must pronounce that much good. The court seems to impinge upon a multitude of other things—the general context and unfolding of all things relevant, pertinent, tangent, and contingent. Big choices respecting the context may have to be made soon, but not now. In a few months the Supreme Court will render other decisions. By that time other issues will be joined and additions made to clarification. Perhaps another Hoover boom will be here and the storm will have subsided. Perhaps we may be in the midst of another major crisis, growing out of the intensification of the present dilemma.

In any case, however, we shall not be back in 1928. We shall be somewhere in the future. And those who may be directing affairs then should be made wiser by efforts to look all around and through this constitutional issue. It runs deeper than law. As the Father of the Republic knew, it runs into the very warp and woof of our economic life and our culture. In preparation for the shape of things to come there is no better source of information than the records of the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. If for a few months the rattle and chatter of debaters and discussers could be stopped and attention devoted to the study of these records, the American nation would be better equipped for wrestling with the science and art of governance.

The Rhineland Crisis

BY JOHN GUNTHER

London, March 20

FOUR times since 1933 Adolf Hitler, prompted by a drastic necessity to let off internal steam, has confronted the world with a gesture shocking to the morally minded. Once the gesture was domestic, thrice it has been in the foreign field. In 1933 he left the League of Nations; in 1934 he abolished Röhm and the S. A.; in 1935 he freed himself from the disarmament clauses of the Treaty of Versailles; in 1936 he denounced Locarno, and filled the Rhineland with his troops.

This time is not the least important. As I write in the early hours of Friday morning, Hitler can claim almost complete victory. It is true that Germany has been rebuked by the League Council, but this was an academic gesture. The overwhelming impression of those best informed is that Hitler's wary and ruthless boldness has once again presented Europe with a fait accompli impossible to resist. Hitler's reward for breaking the Treaty of Locarno will probably be the ultimate consideration of his "peace plan" by the powers. The French are being repaid for the policy of M. Laval. They are unhappily trying to get from the British what they can.

The bulk of Hitler's success may be seen from a consideration of its amazing details. He has the Rhineland. He has gone a goodish way toward the insertion of a wedge between British public opinion and France. He has food for another internal victory and for a possible easing of domestic tension. He has increased his prestige in Austria, Poland, and smaller countries. Why has all this happened? Largely, it appears, because British public opinion, grossly misled by so-called liberal newspapers, has permitted the pro-German faction of the British Cabinet to stifle the voices of those who thought Britain ought to stand by its Locarno signature and come to French aid.

Most of us here in the agitated corridors of St. James's Palace feel that Hitler's victory is a bad thing for Europe. And for the following reasons:

1. The collective system has received a blow from which it may take a long time to recover. Once again force, not law, has been the decisive element in the international crisis. Locarno, which has been the bastion of peace for the past ten years, has disappeared as far as Germany is concerned. The League is weakened.

2. Mussolini is a winner. It is now obvious to a nine-year-old child or even a member of the editorial staff of certain London dailies that oil sanctions have scarcely a chance of being applied and that France, aggrieved at Britain's refusal to interpret Locarno literally, can hardly be expected to support Britain in further attempts to throttle Italy. As Litvinov said in a private conversation the other day, "We thought we were rehearsing for a play, but if there isn't going to be a play, why rehearse?"

Peace Gesture, by LOW

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

3. Hitler, if he has his way, will have a position of approximate safety in the West, and perhaps in the South, while his hands are free for the East. It should not be forgotten that the most significant thing said by any statesman during these past tumultuous days was the announcement of Stanley Baldwin immediately after the crisis broke that Britain should bend itself toward a tripartite friendship with France and Germany. It would be premature to talk of the formation of an anti-Soviet bloc. But Hitler's enmity to the Soviet Union is subcutaneous and ineffaceable. And anything which tends to strengthen him in the West means danger to the Soviets in the East.

The basic disingenuousness of German tactics was never shown better than in Ribbentrop's speech today. What he said in effect was that Germany promised to behave herself hereafter if this "final" breach of international obligation were condoned. He said France, not Germany, was the real violator of the treaty. Thus he was in a position of promising not to violate any more treaties while denying that he had violated this one.

Britain and France, it is quite true, are in process of trying to negotiate an exchange agreement between the British and French general staffs. One thing only could compensate for Hitler's coup, namely, an outright Franco-British alliance in the West. But this has been by no means achieved so far. Eden has announced that Britain will provisionally stand by its obligations to protect Belgium and France from overt attack. He could hardly have said less. And any freezing of the frontier on the West only makes the East more dangerous.

It is quite true, also, that Hitler has offered an elaborate, comprehensive peace plan which will be discussed by the Locarno and other powers after the Council concludes its present job. This plan has been shot full of holes by Litvinov. Non-aggression pacts—there have been some 200 in the post-war years—have not proved effective. Pacts of mutual assistance Hitler eschews—because they could be effective. Apart from the question of the practical utility of what the Germans propose is the matter of their good faith. Hitler prefaces a request for new treaties by tearing up old ones. As a truth-teller he is a bad risk.

Why have the British permitted Hitler to succeed so far? The reasons are several. The British are hard-headed enough to know that from the first moment the only way to get the Germans out of the Rhineland would have been to fight. And though they have been so severe in the Mediterranean with threats against Italy, removal by force of the Germans from German territory is another matter. Again the British feel that the time has come for a new deal all around. They may not have great faith in Hitler's proposals or in his word of honor, but they think they can use the confusion of the present situation for building a new structure of European "security" to their advantage. What shape this structure will take—built on the sand of Hitler's plan—no one knows. Meantime, Germany, the only country in Europe capable of plunging Europe into general war, has won a hand. The new cards are in the fist of the potential aggressor.

Hitler Stiffens the French Right

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, March 11

NO SOONER had the echoes of Hitler's Reichstag speech reached this side of the Rhine than a vast hope stirred the bosoms of the French nationalists. The latest German threat was immeasurably graver than any that had preceded it. It was hardly a step removed from invasion. It brought the danger of war within the range of practical and immediate possibilities. The press and the politicians of the right reacted to the menace with the same anxiety, alarm, and resentment as other Frenchmen, only with rather more stir and emphasis. But the national calamity was, for internal purposes, an opportunity; and within twenty-four hours the moral of the dread event was drawn: in the face of the national foe, national union. This meant a non-partisan coalition ministry, headed by the late rejected Laval or someone of his stripe, to replace the present predominantly radical government. Even that, of course, was merely a preliminary. The war threat was to serve the larger end of putting courage into the ranks of the badly demoralized Front

National, thus improving its chances in the approaching general election.

So promptly did the fascist leaders, Taittinger and Ybarnegaray, seize the windfall, so speedily did the agitation for reshuffling the government, even for dissolving the chambers, find responsive echoes, that in the opposite camp no little credence was lent to the report that the Germans had timed their bombshell to explode at this particular moment in order, among other objectives, to help boost their brethren-in-doctrine across the frontier. The story has even gained currency that Eugene Schneider, head of the Creusot armament works, discouraged by the decline of the fascist leagues and frightened by the program of the Front Populaire, which proposed to lay hands on the Bank of France and the munitions and other key industries, had through his confreres Krupp and Thyssen got the Germans to advance their schedule.

This, if not actual fact, is not necessarily fanciful. Such maneuvers are classic in European political history. In any event, it would be merely repaying one good turn with another. The French Nationalists from Clemenceau on have succeeded by their intransigence toward the German republic in hoisting the German war party into the saddle; Hitler-Blomberg-Neurath could scarcely do otherwise than contribute their bit to save the Front National from certain defeat at the hands of the Front Populaire. But Berlin had more substantial reasons for favoring the right in Paris. All Frenchmen, regardless of party coloring, fear Germany and live in terror of that seventy-million-headed giant recovering his strength and breaking into a rampage of vengeance for past injuries. The left parties aggravate matters by their hatred of the present rulers beyond the Rhine. They hate Hitler and his consorts not only on principle, but because, having all along labored to conciliate Germany and thus obtain a lasting peace with her, they find themselves, thanks to the criminal bungling of Poincaré, confronted with a regime which they know to be irreconcilable. The nationalists in France, on the other hand, hate and fear Germany, but they worship Hitler. He is a fellow after their own hearts. He has crushed the German labor, revolutionary, and pacifist rabble, murdered and imprisoned their leaders, and by this summary process has in three short years wiped out all but the last traces of the defeat of 1918. The only thing they have against him is that he is on the wrong side of the river.

That is one reason that the powers in Germany would rather see in the next French Chamber a majority of the Front National than of the Front Populaire. There are others. Hitler, it should be recalled, before tearing up the Locarno treaty and "symbolically" remilitarizing the Rhineland, made a declaration to the French people in a sensational interview, assuring them of his friendship and affection and of his intention to revise "Mein Kampf." It is generally understood here that by some strange slip-up the interview, which was designed to influence the French Chamber of Deputies and thus halt the ratification of the Franco-Soviet pact, got into print a day too late. The acts of the following Saturday would therefore seem to have been intended in part as a warning to the members of the French Senate to consider carefully before emulating their colleagues in the Palais Bourbon. If that was the intention, the whole enterprise was of course a complete fiasco. It is a safe prediction that before these words are in print the Senate will have voted favorably on the Soviet treaty by a much larger majority than the most sanguine would have thought possible five days ago.* It is not merely that the senators resent the attempt of Berlin to dictate to them; with the German army on the Rhine the friendship and alliance of the U. S. S. R. have become an urgent need of French survival.

Courtesy of the Weyhe Galleries

Drawing by Daumier

My Bicycle

This somewhat disappointing result of Schrecklichkeit was perhaps not unexpected in Berlin. And it does not prevent the Realpolitiker of the Wilhelmstrasse from imagining things no less vain. They seem to think that a Front National government in France, because anti-Communist at home, would let the Soviet pact, even if ratified, become a dead letter. They take at its face value the noisy opposition to the pact, intended purely for internal consumption, of a certain fraction of the press, and overlook the fact that the French general staff is whole-heartedly for it, as are many leading industrialists, to say nothing of most of the French people. And they, the Germans, seem not to hear that the very nationalists who a few short weeks ago thought hanging too good for the 140 French deputies who urged sanctions against the aggressor in Ethiopia now clamor far more loudly for the same penalties against the aggressor on the Rhine.

On the other hand, the Germans would rather, when the crisis comes, have a right government in Paris, for the reasons, good and bad, already enumerated and for one more besides. The Germans have not forgotten, if some

*The Franco-Soviet pact was ratified by the French Senate on March 12.

French politicians act as if they had, that in each previous step they took toward the liquidation of the Versailles system they had facing them across the Rhine a government composed of men hardly to be mistaken for Socialists or Communists or even radicals. It was a nationalist ministry that perforce swallowed the repudiation of the reparations debt; it was another of the same color that let the Germans get away with the revival of conscription, after staging the solemn comedy at Stresa. Above all, it was Poincaré himself who marched his 40,000 men up the coal hills of the Ruhr and then rather foolishly marched them down again, thereby proclaiming to the world in general and to the Germans in particular that short of war there was nothing to be done against the determined recalcitrance of a great and injured nation. If Poincaré could do nothing against that nation—humiliated, demoralized, and disarmed—what will Laval, Doumergue, or even Colonel de la Rocque do against that same nation—confident, intoxicated with its new-found strength, and armed to the teeth?

The Germans have not forgotten. But does the average

French voter remember? Premier Sarraut, a man with no nonsense about him, has succeeded in squashing the maneuvers to disrupt, on the pretext of national danger, his majority and his government. It is altogether possible that he may hold both together for the few weeks that he has to go until the elections. What then? There is the big question. Before March 7 not a man in France, whatever his political coloring or preference, but conceded to the Front Populaire an overwhelming triumph. The results at the polls on April 26 and May 3 may yet, in spite of the clouded international sky, bear out that forecast. The admirable solidarity of the reunited General Confederation of Labor, which concluded its first congress as a single body on the very day the thunderbolt fell, was a heartening sign. The leaders of the left profess to be as confident of victory as ever. Some go so far as to predict that the brutal provocation from across the Rhine will only swell the ranks of the left. They may be right. If their prophecy comes true it will spell a tribute to the courage, the reasoned conviction, and the clear-sighted political realism of the plain man of this democracy.

Slum-Clearance Farce

BY KAREN DASH

SINCE 1932 public-spirited people in Detroit have been manifesting sharp interest in slum conditions. Social workers have exposed painful facts concerning the misery and degradation of Negro families living in Detroit's East Side slum district. These Negroes are unemployed and destitute through no fault of their own. John F. Ballenger, Wayne County Relief Administrator, has placed the blame squarely where it belongs—on the shoulders of Detroit's big industrialists.

Public indignation has been further stirred by the statistics from city-wide social surveys which show the results of unsanitary and shameful housing conditions. The fifty-block area three blocks east of Woodward Avenue and about a mile from Detroit's City Hall, which was selected as the first site for a slum-clearance project, shows excessively high rates in disease and all social delinquencies. Crime is $7\frac{1}{2}$ times the city average. Juvenile delinquency is $10\frac{1}{4}$ times, infant mortality is $1\frac{1}{2}$ times, and pneumonia is 8 times higher than the average for the city as a whole. The tuberculosis death-rate for Site Number 1 is 15 times higher than in Site Number 30, a somewhat better section of Detroit. One-third of the families living in this fifty-block area are dependent on public welfare. The average monthly rent for a family is \$8, and the average family income (1933) is \$300 a year.

On September 9, 1935, ten thousand cheering persons, the majority of them Negroes, jammed the vicinity of 651 Benton Street, Detroit, as Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt formally opened work on the slum-clearance project. With a wave of her handkerchief she signaled to a group of workmen to pull down the first house. The building crashed in a cloud of dust, and the $6,680,000 project was under way. Mrs. Roosevelt then gave a short address.

The ceremony over, Mrs. Roosevelt returned to Washington, confident that all was well. But the Detroit program did not "go ahead" as she hoped. In the months that followed many old houses were torn down, a hundred Negro families were ruthlessly ousted from their homes, but not one new building is in process of construction. The East Side slum-clearance program, discussed for over two years, has resulted so far in exactly nothing.

Late last autumn I started on a house-to-house survey of the Negro slum district known as Site Number 1. Getting off the Charlevoix crosstown car at Eliot Street, near Saint Antoine, I stopped at the first house I saw which had a condemnation notice pasted to the door. It was a miserable shack in the last stages of decay, occupied as place of business and home by a Negro tailor and his family.

The man was at first afraid to talk. He said he had been handed two weeks' notice to get out. He was deeply worried about where he could find a place to run his shop and keep his family. The rental of this shanty was $10 a month, and the man declared that although he had been hunting around for some time he could not find another location as cheap. No information about the new houses to be constructed on the site had been offered him. He said he was very poor, and that he would have to borrow the money to pay moving expenses. He was very nervous while talking; he kept asking me not to quote him, or use his name, as he did not want to "get in wrong with the government."

The house next door, in similarly bad condition, was occupied by Mrs. A—, an elderly Negro woman, and her son. The son, formerly employed by the Briggs Manufacturing Company, is now a "junkie." He earns the family living by going around with a hand-cart collecting rags and old papers. The average income of these people is $6 every two weeks. The woman is almost totally blind.

Four days before, she said, a man brought the notice of eviction. He refused Mrs. A— any definite information about when she must get out. "Right away!" he said. Mrs. A— was panic-stricken. She had no idea where to move to, or where to turn for advice. She had never even heard of the Relocation Office, which is supposed to offer assistance to all the ousted families.

Thirteen persons; four adults and nine children, were living in an unheated five-room hovel over on Rowena Street, near Beaubien. A thin, tired-looking Negro woman came to the door, carrying a child in her arms. Inside the house, which was shabby and forlorn beyond all description, children were swarming everywhere. They were dressed in rags, and not one of them had shoes or stockings. The mother, Mrs. B—, apologized for their appearance. Five of the youngsters were her own; four were the children of her dead sister. The Welfare had promised them clothing and shoes so they could go to school, but hadn't got around yet actually to give the needed articles.

Mrs. B—'s husband was out looking for a job. He had worked for the Ford Motor Company from December, 1922, until July, 1926. He had then worked for the Western Waterproofing Company for two years, and for the City Garbage until 1931. He had been unable to find steady employment since that time.

Mrs. B— said she didn't worry much about being evicted. "Things are so bad with us," she said simply, "they just couldn't be any worse."

This woman nurses her youngest child, a boy two and a half years old, at her breast. The Welfare is not giving out any more milk tickets, and Mrs. B— finds she can supply milk herself by drinking cocoa made with water.

Albert C— has a coal and wood store on St. Antoine Street. When I came in to talk to him, he was hacking lumber into small pieces to sell for firewood. He said he was barely "getting by" in his present location, where the rent is $6 per month. He had built up a small neighborhood trade, and was worried sick by the sudden eviction notice. "I'm perfectly willing to move," he said, "but I know I won't be able to find another store at $6."

He had been several times to the Relocation Office but they had no help to offer. There are no vacant stores available in the neighborhood, and no stores which can be rented for $6 in any Negro section whatever. Albert C—'s average monthly income is $18.

The Relocation Office is in a vacant bank building at the corner of Erskine and Hastings streets, in the heart of the Negro district. The information clerk, a young white man, was surly and suspicious of me. "We are doing everything possible for these people," he said. "They are mostly junkies, anyway. We give them about two weeks to find a new place and get moved."

"What help do you offer?"

"Well, we keep a list of houses for rent. Better houses, mostly, than what they're used to. But they won't take them."

"Why not?"

He shrugged. "Oh, because they cost three or four dollars more a month!"

"What do you do about the families who haven't the money to move?" I asked.

"They must apply to the Welfare," he snapped. "We have nothing to do with that angle."

The District Office of the Welfare Department is at Alfred and Russell streets. A young man at the information desk told me that the slum-clearance project was bringing them more trouble than they knew how to handle. Since enough houses at low rentals could not possibly be found, the evicted families would simply have to "double up," he said, and share whatever hole or corner could be found for them. Miss Clara Kramer of the District Office confirmed this statement.

I asked Miss Kramer how much time was allowed the evicted families to find a new place and vacate their homes. "Legally," she replied, "they have thirty days. But we want to get them out quick, so we're telling them they've got to be out in anywhere from five days to two weeks."

Courtesy of the Downtown Gallery

Drawing by Peggy Bacon

I began to investigate the homes available for Negro tenants. Since an overwhelming majority of the families living in the condemned area are paying from $3 to $10 per month for rent, I made up my mind to look only at houses within this price range. I had to give up this plan because a full day's search proved to me that there were simply no houses to be had at less than $10. On the following day, therefore, I walked from nine in the morning until dusk, looking at the houses offered for rent at from $10 to $20 per month.

In Alfred Street I saw a house with a "For Rent" sign on it. It was a small, gray frame house, partitioned inside to serve for four families. The wooden steps leading to the front porch were completely rotted away. I groped my way through a dark hall to the vacant flat in the rear. There were three medium-sized rooms in each of which the filth and decay were indescribable. The rain beat in through the broken windows and trickled across the soggy wooden floors. The wallpaper hung in streamers. There was no stove to heat the flat, no gas, no electric lights. Window shades were completely missing, and in many places the plaster had fallen away, exposing the bare laths of wall and ceiling. I took a look at the kitchen. Rags were stuffed in the broken windows. There were no faucets in the rusty old sink, no covering on the floor, no cook stove, no icebox. In the bathroom a bathtub stood in one corner. Three of its legs were gone, and it was not connected with the water pipes. The toilet had obviously been out of order for months.

This flat was offered for rent by a Detroit real-estate company at $12 per month. I called up the office of this firm, commented on the bad condition of the house, and asked whether they would not make some essential repairs before a new tenant moved in. The girl who answered the telephone said that the owner had no intention of doing anything whatever to improve the flat. The prospective tenant could take it or leave it.

During the next two weeks I looked at many other houses and talked with various Negroes who run real-estate offices and rental agencies in the vicinity. Everywhere I heard the same story. There is a serious shortage of houses for Negro tenants, and the landlords are making hay while the sun shines. Even "shack" prices are from $12 to $20. The majority are without even a pretense of a bathroom, such as the Alfred Street house offered. Houses that the owners were glad to get $4 a month for a short time ago can now be rented within an hour for $15 and upward.

During the two months I spent making this survey of actual conditions among the Negro population of Detroit, I was also trying to arrange an interview with Mrs. Josephine Gomon, secretary of the Detroit Housing Commission. I finally got an appointment to meet Mrs. Gomon in her cheerful and pleasant offices in the new Water Board building. Mrs. Gomon spoke very hopefully about the Detroit Housing Commission's plans.

She described the new housing soon to be erected in the Negro slum districts as modern, beautiful buildings with all sorts of conveniences, including play areas for the children and recreation facilities for adults. Rents, said Mrs. Gomon, would probably be from $16 to $25 per month.

I asked whether the evicted families were not having trouble finding homes at rents they could afford. Mrs. Gomon admitted this, but added that the one hundred families already evicted were managing somehow. "It's just a few dollars' increase," she said.

"What about the families on relief rolls?" I persisted. "How can they pay even a few dollars' increase when their allowance for rent is already so small?"

To this, Mrs. Gomon replied that the Welfare would increase relief checks to cover higher rentals. (This, unfortunately, is not true. John F. Ballenger, Wayne County Relief Administrator, has put into effect a 20 per cent cut in all welfare aid, and this slash affects every family on the Detroit Welfare.)

On leaving I asked Mrs. Gomon whether the sum allowed for rent would be enough, in any case, to permit families on relief, evicted from condemned houses, to live in the new apartments when they were ready for occupancy. Mrs. Gomon replied very definitely that it would not. She went on to say that the new buildings were being put up for the benefit of industrious, low-income families—not necessarily for the people now living in the slum areas but for any family that could afford to pay the moderate rental of from $16 to $25 a month!

A week later I went back to the Relocation Office and asked to be given a list of the names and new addresses of the one hundred families, who according to Mrs. Gomon, had been successfully moved from their old homes and established in new locations. I said frankly that I wished to see how and where they were living, and whether their condition had been improved by the change. My request was met with an equally frank refusal. The clerk said he had been given definite instructions not to hand out such a list.

I spent the last week of my survey tramping the Negro section trying to find some of the relocated families. Many of the houses I had visited earlier had been razed. Their former occupants had disappeared without leaving an address. Eventually I found six families which had been "successfully relocated." Five had been unable to find decent homes within their means and were living "doubled up" with other families. Children were sleeping three and four in a bed or on the floor. One family—a grandmother, man and wife, and sixteen-year-old daughter—had rented a five-room flat at $27.50 per month, and were taking in four men roomers, to help cover the cost of the rent. In no case was the condition of these people improved by the change. Instead, they were much worse off than before, especially those families which had been forced to "double up" with others.

These are the facts, and further comment would be superfluous. It seems painfully clear that slum clearance is just another New Deal measure—a fake, a humbug, and a joke.

Struggle in Marble

BY ANITA MARBURG

THE placid Vermont scene has been tense for five months with a struggle between the marble workers of Rutland County and the Proctor-controlled Vermont Marble Company. Three years ago a bitter granite strike of 1,500 workers of the Rock of Ages Company broke out in Barre, Vermont. Despite bayonet attacks and tear-gas bombs, the news of the strike reached New York City five weeks after its beginning, tucked into the real-estate page as an interesting item for companies needing granite. Today the marble workers have behind them a citizens' organization with headquarters in New York City—the United Committee to Aid Vermont Workers. The strike has been debated in Congress, and a mass-meeting is being held in New York on March 27.

It was this citizens' group that on February 29 sent a committee of seventy-five men and women, headed by Rockwell Kent, into the five marble towns to make an investigation and report its findings. United in a single effort were trade unionists from New York and Vermont, writers, Vermont property owners, teachers, students from Dartmouth and Bennington, and one American legionnaire. The marble hearings took place in the crowded town hall of West Rutland, the testimony came hour after hour, measuredly, soberly, with now and then an emotional reinforcement from the striker audience. Some 800 workers composed the audience, filling every seat downstairs and in the balcony, standing quietly in the rear and along the sides; mothers wearing tams, fathers in short workmen's coats, children sprawling over adult laps. Speeches were punctuated with babies' cries; a woman who gave testimony left her year-old boy in the lap of a committee member and spoke as long as the baby would allow.

What is the strike about? Basically it is a life-and-death struggle between two worlds over wages and freedom. On the one hand stands a proprietary family concern, controlled by three generations of Proctors; on the other stand skilled workers, born in the Vermont mountains, who have contributed their lives to marble. The fate of the industry, founded on tombstones, is now tied in the main to building construction. During the slump in building between 1933 and 1936, an enormous employment shrinkage went on—a drop from 2,200 to 800 workers—and with this shrinkage has come a policy of wage cuts which descend upon the men as a notice from the management, without warning or discussion. In February, 1934, the workers, acting under the NRA, took their own fate in hand and organized a union. One worker testified that "of course the company tried to put a company union over on us, but it didn't work." The vote came back 58 per cent for an international union, 10 per cent for a company union, and the rest for no union at all, but the company still refused to deal with the men's organization.

In December, 1934, the Regional Labor Board of Boston backed up the workers' demand for a union, but the company's attitude was not modified. By October, 1935, antagonisms had been further increased by wage cuts, and a small walk-out resulted. The answer of the management was to refuse any increase in wages (even two cents on an hourly wage of twenty-five cents); the answer of the men, further pressed by reductions and by a reclassification of skilled workers as common laborers, was a strike declaration in November involving all quarries and factories, and 600 of the 800 employees had the courage to walk out and stay out.

Neither state nor federal officials have thus far provided a solution for marble. Not much was expected of the State Industrial Commissioner, Clarence R. White, an appointee of ex-Governor Wilson, who was a Proctor-supported governor. His most radical suggestion was that the company "look again at its balance-sheet" and consider "its moral and social obligation." Governor Charles M. Smith, white-haired and sixty-seven, supposedly a political opponent of the Proctors, is nevertheless too smart to antagonize influential business. So far, he told the investigating committee, he has confined his activities to pressure for the White report, and friendly talks to company directors. He said that the Proctor management is somewhat to blame: "they were giving their workers starvation wages; instead of that they should have fired half of them." In the meantime the state offers no relief to desperate strike families, but supplies deputy sheriffs to the Proctors—a weekly gift costing between $800 and $1,700.

At last the federal labor conciliator, a little studious man, Charles J. Post, who later had the temerity to appear at the hearings, came to study the strike, and sent a secret report to Secretary Perkins on February 13. The Post report, according to the release of the Federated Press, is scorching: there is piled-up evidence of poverty, of company tyranny, and of sheriff-evoked violence. This valuable report had the misfortune to appear before, rather than after, a national election. Evidently poverty and tyranny cannot exist in 1936. But Governor Smith has at last been galvanized into some action by the speech of Representative Marcantonio on the floor of Congress. Under the pressure of publicity he has called a conference of company and union officials.

Wages for full employment were $13.30 a week. Because of reduced working hours they actually averaged between $5 and $7. After company deductions for rent, water, light, insurance, coal bill, and cow pasture, they were often reduced to sixty cents, twenty cents, two cents, or merely a yellow voucher marked "No check." On the other hand wages could be supplemented by relief. Now that the men are on strike little help is forthcoming, since several overseers of the poor are Proctor employees. A mother of six children testified that her milk allowance of two quarts a day was reduced to one, and that the overseer said, "You can keep the children quiet on water." Another, having but one pair of underclothes per child as protection against a Vermont winter, was told, "Put them to bed when you wash the underclothes." The state of Vermont has taxed its citizens to supply food to workingmen, while the Vermont Marble Company has been paying 5 per cent on its cumulative preferred stock.

Who are the Proctors of Proctor, who take no reasonable steps to conciliate 600 men, faithful workers and skilled workers, and now deliver eviction edicts to 186 families? In 1880 Colonel Redfield Proctor began combining competing companies, and made out of them the largest marble concern in the country. He established a tradition of benevolence, endowing three churches, a library, a Y. M. C. A., and constructing a twenty-two-ton marble monument to Old Charley, his Civil War horse. His grandson, the present Redfield Proctor, has been active in Republican politics in Vermont, was governor of the state, and is now a director of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and a trustee of Middlebury and Vassar Colleges. He is willing to offer charity to docile individuals, but when living wages are asked for by independent workers he has "nothing to say." There is something terrifying in this combination of refinement and cold tyranny.

Besides the extensive properties in Vermont, the company has quarries, factories, and offices in the states of Washington, California, Texas, Colorado, and even in Alaska. It supplied a goodly share of the $900,000 worth of marble in the Chrysler building, and the $982,000 worth in the Empire State building. Through its Washington lobbyist it secured three major jobs in the capital—the Red Cross Memorial, the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, and the Supreme Court building, the marble in the last-named building costing $3,800,000. In normal years its gross business amounts to as much as $8,000,000, with profits of something like $800,000. At present it has $5,000,000 worth of government contracts pending and a million dollars due it for work already finished.

Is this just another chapter in a story as familiar by now as the American scene? A company with wide holdings can afford to wait while 600 workers are squeezed out. However, the inert marble still remains in the ground. If it is to be worked at all, it is not the Proctors of Proctor that have the skill to do so. A story with the same beginning concluded differently in granite three years ago. On March 31, 1933, the Rock of Ages Corporation published a letter to its employees: "So long as the present management of this corporation is in control of its affairs, no power on earth will ever compel us to operate our quarries or a single one of our plants on any kind of union basis." These were mighty words from rugged individualists. But business considerations had to come first. Despite the defiance of the Rock of Ages Corporation, granite today is thoroughly unionized, and wages are from 50 per cent to 100 per cent higher than those in marble. In February the corporation signed a new contract for a year with the Quarrymen's Union. This success provides a living incentive to the strikers in Rutland.

A victory for marble will determine the character of the Vermont labor movement. Judged by numbers this movement is insignificant. Vermont is principally an agricultural state, and even among the industrial workers unionism is not very strong. But the marble strike has an importance in the labor movement out of proportion to the numbers involved. Labor stands as the sole force working against the Republican Party in the state. Last August the State Federation officially indorsed the Farmer-Labor Party. Barre is now the active labor center in Vermont. In order to make any impression on the reactionary Republican phalanx it needs the organized help of the Rutland workers. The struggle in marble has thus not only an economic importance. It is a sector on the political labor front as well.

The Consumer Front

BY RUTH BRINDZE

THAT usurious rates are charged for the privilege of making "easy payments" is pretty generally known, and that even the government in its 5 per cent FHA plan permits interest charges of 9.7 per cent is no secret. Still, the figures compiled by the Committee on Consumer Credit, appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts, and the Special Commission appointed by the Massachusetts General Court are sufficiently shocking to focus attention on the evils of the instalment business. In the purchase of new automobiles the commission found that the lowest rate charged was 10 per cent, the highest 36 per cent, and the average 25 per cent. These charges are low compared with an average of 47 per cent for used cars and one charge amounting to 881 per cent on a radio. There is only one reported instance of a true 6 per cent rate. A piano company whose name is not given said the rate was 6 per cent. "It was 6 per cent." (The italics are the commission's.) Besides the comparatively well-known practice of concealing and misrepresenting credit charges, both state bodies report the general use of the rebate by which the dealer collects both from the finance company and from the buyer, overcharging and defrauding by insurance coverage and by the use of unfair contracts.

Instalment buying is again increasing, and both committee and commission have proposed remedial legislation. The commission bill would require the licensing of retail finance companies and their operation under direct supervision of the banking department. The committee bill, wider in scope, applies to all instalment sellers and provides a standard form for instalment contracts on which the interest charges are stated as a given per centum per month calculated upon the unpaid principal balance; the entire contract is unenforceable if the seller fails to comply with the regulations.

IN THE little war with big implications which the cosmetics industry has been carrying on against the authorities of the state of Maine both sides are claiming a victory. The fight started when the 1935 session of the legislature passed a new cosmetics law providing for the registration of cosmetics sold within the state and giving the Department of Health power to refuse to register preparations containing "injurious substances." An annual license fee of $.50 is to be charged. This is Maine's second attempt to regulate cosmetics; two years ago a law was enacted but its enforcement was enjoined on constitutional grounds in an action brought by Bourjois, Inc. Now Bourjois is again leading the fighting-mad cosmetics manufacturers, and in a test case is attempting to prove that the new act also is unconstitutional. Last week's decision by the Statutory Court denying the Bourjois motion for a temporary injunction on the ground that there was no evidence of interference with interstate commerce left the legal battle undecided. Meanwhile the Toilet Goods Association advises its members to defer registration until further notice, and the Department of Health is notifying retailers that all sales must be confined to products which have been analyzed and approved.

The trade press rants about the injustice of permitting each state to levy a licensing fee upon nationally advertised products. The manufacturers are clearly opposed to any regulation. They fear the power granted to the Department of Health to prohibit the sale of injurious preparations.

ON THE national front the Food and Drug Administration has also been encountering difficulties. It was economy day for the House Appropriation Committee when the administration's 1937 budget came up for approval. With election-year thrift the holders of the House purse refused the $525,000 increase, saying that the enforcement of the Food and Drug Act could "be well met" without any increase in budget. Administrator Campbell, who presumably knows more about the cost of administering the act, disagreed emphatically, estimating the sum needed for "reasonably satisfactory" enforcement at $5,000,000, or $3,000,000 more than the recommended budget. It is true that the administration's budget was increased last year by $275,000, which brought it to a grand total of $1,968,637, or a little more than a penny per person per year for the enforcement of the Food and Drug Act, the Insecticide Act, the Caustic Poison Act, the Milk Act, the Tea Act, the Naval Stores Act, and the other work performed by the Food and Drug Administration. As it is, there are only seventy-eight inspectors charged with protecting the food-and-drug supply of the nation.

The little stick wielded by the Food and Drug Administration has again been brought down on two profitable food-adulteration rackets—one in salad oil, the other in fruit juices. The oil men have been substituting tea-seed oil for the product of the olive, a fraud which can now be easily discovered by a new laboratory test. Cosmos Food of Lynn, Massachusetts, and A. J. Capone, operating as the De Luca Olive Oil Company of New York, whose products are nationally distributed, have according to a recent statement of the Department of Agriculture been particularly active in the field. Packers of fruit juices have profited by a cheaper form of adulteration. Tap water and sugar are now so regularly added to canned "pure" fruit juices that the administration has issued a notice to the trade (effective July 1) that action will be taken against all watered stock whether or not consumers are warned, as they occasionally are now, by the words "sugar syrup added."

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

FOUR weeks of flirtation with a bit of pneumonia have given me plenty of time to think, or at least to ponder the American and the European scene. Naturally Hitler's latest coup has engrossed me most. It is less than seventeen years since Woodrow Wilson returned from Paris and pronounced the Treaty of Versailles entirely good. Today there is practically nothing left of that treaty. It has been destroyed by its own baseness, by its flat defiance of every rule of decency and humanity, of Christianity. The Nation was foremost in the American journalistic field in declaring that it divided the world into two camps, those who were for the "madness of Versailles" and those who were against it. But surely none of us dreamed then that the blood-cemented edifice erected at Versailles would collapse as rapidly as it has, or that the treaty itself would be so soon kicked to pieces by a man who at that time was still in a shabby corporal's uniform, an ex-house painter with no means and apparently with no future.

One must hand it to Adolf Hitler. Wherever he gets his ideas, whether from Rosenberg or Ribbentrop, or whether he conceives them himself, he carries them out with shrewdness and what, in the Boers, used to be called "slimness." Of course he has the great advantage of being able to act without the slightest regard for truth or consistency or international decency. But he skilfully picks the moment for his steps of defiance, a moment when the Allies are especially bothered by something very difficult and important, and so far he has got away with practically everything that he has undertaken. His latest move has again aroused the bulk of the people of Germany to the highest enthusiasm for him, just when there had been a steady decrease in the popular enthusiasm. Whereas Mussolini has once more bound the Italians to himself and his rule by a costly, and what may still prove to be a disastrous, foreign war, Hitler achieves the same result by tearing up the Locarno treaty and wiping his feet upon that which remains of Versailles. More than that, he has so skilfully worded his defiance as to confuse public opinion abroad, notably in England, where those who realize that wars lead to nothing but unmitigated suffering and misery are really affected by Hitler's offer of new treaties to guarantee peace for twenty-five years.

The overwhelming difficulty in the way of meeting Hitler halfway on any such proposal is that no figure in history has ever surpassed him in falsity, in deceit, in his willingness to stoop to anything to achieve his ends. Every word that he says today about his desire for peace is contradicted by his own words in his book, "Mein Kampf." The treaties of Locarno were not forced upon Germany; they were of its own seeking. They were unlimited in their duration, and what he offers in return is something much less worth while and carefully limited for a period of years. If the other nations give in to him now, if the League of Nations allows him to go unpunished for his violation of the treaties, it is, of course, only a question of time when he will move again. Whether he will strike to the East or suddenly overrun Austria, or demand colonies under threat of outlawing all the debts now owed by Germany, he is certain to act. His position as a dictator calls for it; so does the growing economic stress under which Germany lives—a stress that will grow greater the more rapidly Germany is rearmed.

The most alarming thing about it all is that the statesmen of England and France and Belgium and the other countries are so without vision, so unable to move constructively to deal with this man who menaces the peace of all the world. One would think that after Hitler had committed his country to rearmament the MacDonalds and Baldwins and Lavals and Flandins would immediately have turned their attention to the demilitarized district and invited him to a parley in regard to it, a move which would effectively have deprived him of any initiative in the matter. They could have made the terms; they could have purchased Germany's return to the League of Nations by doing the obviously right thing of giving it the control of its own territory. Instead, bankrupt English statesmanship could think of nothing to do but to make a naval agreement with Germany; it was too stupid to see that that meant, first, recognition if not approval of German naval rearmament and, second, the risk of alienating France at the crucial moment when the two countries had to stand together against Italy in Ethiopia.

I hear it said, it is easy to criticize but what would you do? Fortunately I am not compelled to decide. But I do know this, that the time has come for the League and the former Allies to act with great vigor, with the same daring and aggressiveness with which Hitler has acted. They can at least match his flagrant defiance of the public opinion of the world by some plain truths as to just how far they will permit him to go before, in self-defense, they decide to put on sanctions, to send Germany to Coventry. In other words, unity, vigor, and forcefulness are now absolutely indicated if the Allied nations and the League are to head off Hitler's suddenly overrunning Austria, or Memel, or Malmédy, or Eupen, or again seizing the provinces restored to Denmark by the Treaty of Versailles. Sooner or later there must be a united front against Hitler or Germany will impose its will upon all Europe—no, not its will, but the will of Adolf Hitler, Goebbels, Göring, and the other decadents and militarists by whom Hitler is surrounded.

BROUN'S PAGE

I HAVE never been very enthusiastic about organizations of veterans. Perhaps this dates back to the days when Uncle Ned used to have Sunday dinner with us. Uncle Ned belonged to the G. A. R. and had been at the Second Battle of Bull Run. And you know how it is with revivals. I wonder whether the first battle was as tiresome.

Maybe it is unfair to indict a whole Grand Army on the basis of a single member. Uncle Ned was wounded in the leg, and to his dying day he walked with a pronounced limp. He was strictly a one-battle man, but after all, he was related to my father and he had served his country.

Mince pie, Sunday dinner, and Uncle Ned are always associated in my mind. Curiously enough I don't particularly dislike mince pie although naturally I prefer apple, or lemon meringue. Coffee kept Uncle Ned awake and so we didn't give him any. While my father and mother were having theirs, Uncle Ned used to act out the Second Battle of Bull Run or rather that part of it in which he was concerned.

It seems he was coming across a cornfield with some other soldiers when he suddenly felt a sharp pain behind his right knee. At first he thought it was a bee and he said to himself, "This is peculiar." He kept right on walking through the cornfield but the pain didn't start to ease up the way it would in the case of a bee's sting. In fact, Uncle Ned finally said to himself, "That wasn't any bee." He looked down and saw that he had been wounded, and so he turned around and walked back to a field hospital.

If it had been a better hospital Uncle Ned would not have limped all the days of his life. But at any rate that was all he saw of the war and after the first few times the story more or less lost its tang. You knew how it was going to come out. In fact, I got to wishing that it had been a bee so that there wouldn't be any story.

Without wishing to generalize I think that veterans and veterans' organizations are inclined to make one battle cover too much territory. For instance, Uncle Ned and my Aunt Harriet had quite a verbal exchange one night because Ned said that the music of "Floradora" was old-fashioned. My aunt played the piano and Uncle Ned was not acquainted with any musical instrument. But he was pretty dogmatic about a lot of things. All on account of the Second Battle of Bull Run.

He thought that Admiral Sampson didn't deserve a nickel's worth of credit for the Battle of Santiago. But he didn't want to make a hero of Schley either because he declared it was generally known that no Spaniard had any notion of how to shoot. Uncle Ned said that he wouldn't give you a nickel for any kind of bottled beer. He also said that young Mr. Hearst, who had just begun to publish in New York, had forgotten more about newspapers than Joseph Pulitzer ever knew. In other words, Uncle Ned had an opinion on a great many different things and he was very sure about his opinions. The fact that he was wholly uninformed on the subject in hand never stopped him any more than the Confederate rifle fire stopped the Union forces at the Second Battle of Bull Run.

The bullet wound back of the knee gave the old gentleman a sense of authority. It hurt him quite a lot in damp weather, and whenever he felt a twinge he cursed out somebody. Now when you get millions of men with twinges, either psychological or psychic, you have a vast army a little too ready to condemn those things with which they are not very well acquainted. It is reasonable enough that ex-soldiers should want adjusted compensation. I don't mean that they are always entitled to it, but at least they are talking about a thing they know. When they get to free speech and civil liberties and the subjects that should be taught in the schools they are way out of their deep dugouts. They haven't any opinion.

That is the great danger of the veterans' movement in politics and in social affairs. The men concerned are too accustomed to taking orders. "Theirs not to reason why," has been too much impressed upon them. Anybody with a loud voice who happens remotely to suggest a major general can get the whole kit and caboodle to fall into line with a single word of command. The veteran, as a rule, is so much tied up with the past that he has small interest in the future. He can be enlisted in reactionary blocs simply because he is over given to reminiscences. His battles are behind him.

Accordingly, I am vastly interested in the formation of a new veterans' group which is being planned. This organization may well be much larger than any now in existence, and it will be by its very nature a forward-looking group. I refer, of course, to the proposed Veterans of Future Wars. These men will be alert in their study of current problems from the fact that their very existence is bound up in the march of things to come. I feel certain that Uncle Ned would have been a much more interesting Sunday dinner guest before the Second Battle of Bull Run.

As to the Veterans of Future Wars, the admission test should be exceedingly elastic. No one may fairly be barred on account of youth, since Germany and Italy have already shown that preparation for war may start in the cradle or thereabouts. Nor should senescence be a barrier either, since no one knows just what material may be required in the front lines of the future, and even the doddering old gentleman who cannot possibly shoulder a gun should not lightly be rejected as a member of the Veterans of Future Wars, for no one knows but that he may still do his bit as a cabinet minister.

Indeed, if the organization is properly recruited and organized, it should be able to hold a monster convention. And at this meeting the Veterans of Future Wars might well set an example worthy of emulation by the American Legion. They could vote unanimously to disband.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE ARTIST AND THE ICE AGE

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

TWO weeks ago I quoted here, and with no little glee, certain remarks which Stephen Spender had recently made about freedom and art. The glee remains and so, for that matter, does the general conviction that art and life are both served best when the artist is allowed to go his frequently perverse way in order that he may come, as he often does, upon truths less likely to be discovered by the most diligent and disciplined of the official seekers. In other words, it still seems to me, as apparently it did to Mr. Spender, that in any society the artist is the best as well as the safest exponent of those critical, protestant, and heretical tendencies which help to assure its health.

Candor compels me to admit, nevertheless, certain reservations with respect to one of Mr. Spender's phrases which I quoted with apparent approval. "Unless," he wrote, "artists insist upon their right to criticize, to be human and even humanitarian, communism will become a frozen era, another ice age." This is a fine rhetorical statement. It has oratorical value, and its ominous sound might conceivably strike a salutary terror into certain hearts. But it does less than justice to the toughness and persistence of the artistic and the heretical impulses. It assumes that both would be more easily put down than either have ever been in the past; that the artist will actually conform because he is told that he must.

Certainly he has been told that often enough in times gone by, and as a matter of fact there have been very few societies which in theory granted him the freedom that both Mr. Spender and I believe to be highly desirable. Nevertheless, he has very often and pretty persistently taken for himself what he was not freely accorded. The heretical artist has, in other words, most frequently done his work not because censorship did not exist but because he either defied or eluded them. Sometimes he is bold and sometimes he is sly. By being bold he has often achieved the most ringing utterance. By being sly he has no less frequently achieved the most ingenious satire.

Let us take an example in which the heresy is so old that the prohibition against it has been almost forgotten. Off-hand I should probably be inclined to assert that the historian cannot write well unless he is free to say what he really means. Yet the most admired, the most often read, and from the artistic standpoint the very finest part of Gibbon's history is comprised in those famous fifteenth and sixteenth chapters where he was compelled by the law against blasphemy to hint and imply what he dared not say. Nor is it by any means merely that he managed despite the law to convey what he wished to convey. The point is that he conveyed it much more entertainingly and beautifully than he would ever have done had he enjoyed complete freedom. The brilliance of the irony is a direct result of the limitations under which he worked, and had it not been for those limitations, there would have been no occasion for the subtlety and the wit which alone make the chapters still delightful in an age to which the thesis is no longer particularly interesting. It is, in other words, to the legal obstacles which were put in Gibbon's way that we owe one of the greatest masterpieces of irony in the English language. Nor is it by any means certain that parallel phenomena are not being produced at this very moment. Who can say, to take a more recent example, that "The Little Golden Calf" would ever have been written if direct criticism of certain aspects of Russian life had not been at the time distinctly unhealthy? During a period, at least, the Russian authorities, taking a second thought, did forbid the publication of the work. But it had already appeared serially, and it would probably never have appeared at all had the authors not received that stimulus to ingenuity which a censorship often affords.

No one is ready, I hope, to draw from all this any conclusions more paradoxical than those I intend. I am not, for example, urging that any state desirous of encouraging the arts should establish prohibitions for the purpose of promoting wit. But I am insisting that wit, like other expressions of the spirit of dissent, is not easily silenced and that the saving remnant has a way of persisting in even the most thoroughly "coordinated" of totalitarian societies. Nothing could have been more authoritarian in spirit than the medieval university, but the songs the students sung have survived to testify that they found a place in their hearts for impulses and interests which were not officially encouraged.

But perhaps I am doing less than justice to Mr. Spender himself. He did not say, "Unless communism grants their right to criticize, to be human, and even humanitarian." He said instead, "Unless artists insist on their right," and so on. The difference is vast and implies the whole argument, since the danger, if danger there is, lies less in the discipline which a party wishes to impose than in the willingness of the artist to accept it. So long as he has the will to freedom, so long as he refuses himself to consent to a dictatorship from without, he is still capable of playing his role as artist. But if the time ever comes when all artists are willing, as some now apparently are, to submit inwardly to dictation and thus to surrender their right to explore and innovate, then the new "ice age" may indeed be imminent.

Not long ago an ardent Communist critic told me with what seemed an almost masochistic delight how the

A presentation of tragic, plain-spoken fact

M-DAY

by ROSE M. STEIN

The author, closely associated with the Senate Munitions Committee, had an unexampled opportunity to study the facts, documents, and records relative to America's involvement in the last war. The first part of her book is an exhaustive study of this material, some of which was not revealed in public hearing. Preferring to rest its argument on cold, tragic facts, M-DAY is not sensationally written, but it is perhaps the most sensational revelation we have yet had of America's involvement in the last war, and the deepest analysis of our most vital concern, the future$2.50

PAUL DE KRUIF'S WHY KEEP THEM ALIVE?

"Stirring stories that should move the stones of America to rise in protest. . . . The world knows Paul de Kruif as an inimitable interpreter of medical science. MICROBE HUNTERS, HUNGER FIGHTERS, MEN AGAINST DEATH . . . have deserved and secured a wide and various audience but I venture a prediction that this, his latest book will eclipse all of his earlier work in the size of its audience."—The Nation$3.00

JOHN MAYNARD KEYNES'S THE GENERAL THEORY OF EMPLOYMENT, INTEREST, AND MONEY

This new work is "even more important than Mr. Keynes's standard two-volume A TREATISE ON MONEY," says the Wall Street Journal. It constitutes a general assault on the adequacy of existing orthodox economic theory, and develops a fundamentally new treatment of the theories of the marginal efficiency of capital, of interest, and of money. 403 pages.....$2.00

AMERICAN LABOR STRUGGLES

by SAMUEL YELLEN

10 great strikes—from 1877-1934—important in the history of American labor. Benjamin Stolberg writes: "His scholarship is brilliant, selective, meticulous and sound. . . . I fail to see how anyone who wishes to understand American labor, indeed to understand American history, can afford not to read this easily read book." Illustrated$3.50

T. S. ELIOT'S MURDER IN THE CATHEDRAL

The poetic drama now being performed in New York's Manhattan Theatre under the auspices of the W.P.A. 3rd printing$1.25

The America-France Award Novel

THE ABANDONED WOOD

MONIQUE ST. HELIER

Translated from the French by James Whitall. The story of an old house and a proud family in France face to face with poverty. "If you will read a novel for a handful of miraculously woven phrases, for a sensitivity delicate . . . then THE ABANDONED WOOD is for you."—N. Y. Times $2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

383 Madison Avenue,
New York

steam-roller had been run over him at a certain writers' conference when he had dared to express views deviating ever so slightly from the "party line." He was, if I understood him aright, glad to be flattened out because of the assurance which the flattening gave him that strong and ruthless men were in control of the party to which he belonged. To me it seems clear that he had somehow maneuvered himself into the position desperately achieved by Jonathan Edwards, who proclaimed his willingness to be damned for the glory of God. And that, I think, is more than ought to be required of any man.

BOOKS

Cross-Section

AMERICAN POINTS OF VIEW. A READER'S GUIDE, 1935. Edited by William H. Cordell and Kathryn Coe Cordell. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

THE editors of this collection of American essays of 1935 have used the "point of view" as their criterion of selection, and the volume as a whole aims to give a cross-section of American attitudes, prejudices, sentiments so far as these are reflected by intellectuals, public men, and men of letters. From this standpoint the collection is admirable. All of these forty essays, more or less, are significant and stimulating, and taken as a group they give a vivid picture of the great variety of feelings that are stirring in our widely scattered and intellectually very diversified population. Communism, I take it, is not only rampant but almost respectable—far more respectable than the innocent liberal socialism of two decades ago ever was in its time. (Earl Browder, "Who Are the Americans?" "Only the Russians," says Browder.) Liberalism too is fighting the Fascist-Communist attack much more vigorously among the intellectuals who write than among those who do not write. Our Jews have gone American. Ten years ago we were, in their eyes, the scum of the earth. Now Ludwig Lewisohn ("An American Comes Home") all but smothers us in soft soap. (Others are feeling the same way about us now. Count Sforza: "America is the one place where an honest man can breathe today.") Many of us are still worrying about the machine age (if only they would stop worrying long enough to read Pareto's Chapter XIII). The educational grouch is as grouchy as ever (Croswell Bowen, "I Was a Rich Man's Son"), and as bewildered as ever (two opposite trends—one toward a revival of old-fashioned discipline, another toward the training-school, employment-agency idea). Pacifism, rugged individualism, lower middle-class moralism (Charles Beard, of all things!!!) all have their say. I note a few absentees. Characteristic of 1935, I should say, would be an intensification of the regionalist spirit in our South. It is merely impolite, at present. Away in the offing it dreams of the revanche. As a matter of record one might have made room for it. So the Catholic neo-Thomists were perhaps entitled to a page or two, to say nothing of American Protestantism. Indeed, if one is to include in such a collection the "I Was Marching" of Meridel Le Sueur, that effusion should have been balanced by a good racy Salvation Army sermon, which would have been at once more representative, more intelligent, and certainly more grammatical. And why not some expressions of a plain ordinary American spirit—some essay of Bernard De Voto, at a hazard?

Moments

Havelock Ellis Introduces Sex to the English Public

This volume is also accompanied by some prize awards by Burton Rascoe, Erskine Caldwell, and J. G. Fletcher. These awards are incomprehensible except on the basis of some mystical or rankly impressionistic criterion known only to the judges. An essay, or even an "article," involves a subject matter. Almost inevitably it involves more or less of theory. Finally would come form, manner of writing, force, and perhaps utility or purpose. A good essay would, it seems to me, be an essay that is sound from all those points of view. By merest chance, it would seem, J. W. Krutch's "Was Europe a Success?" managed to get a third or fourth prize, when it was surely entitled to first place. I have no objection to the honor paid to Mr. Pfeiffer's "Why Liberalism Is Bankrupt," though to my mind the problem is erroneously stated in that article and the answer (or answers) is inconclusive. But how can anyone in his right mind prefer Mr. Hemingway's pretentiously ignorant and irresponsible chatter on international politics ("Notes on the Next War") to, let us say, such a charming and brilliant essay as Mr. Nock's "Thoughts on Utopia"? Or was it that the judges merely forgot to state that their first prize was a booby prize?

Taken all in all, the American essay, however interesting and stimulating, would seem from this collection to remain still a fairly crude affair. Our basic defect, as I take it, is the tyranny of the "lead" or "angle" under which virtually all our authors are compelled to work. No matter how serious a writer's thought may be, he has to develop it around some smart phrase in order to catch an editor's eye in the first instance and a reader's eye in the second. Then our public is grossly immature on the side of theory, if it cares anything about theory at all. Theory remains, for most of our writers, merely a device for organizing material. One never considers whether the theory be sound or false, old or new, absolute or relative. Hardly an essay in this whole collection pays any attention to the history of the question with which it deals. We are probably more self-conscious on the side of form and style, and one notes in these essays a number of historical lineages ranging all the way from the somewhat affected Anglican urbanity of Mr. Nock to the vulgar tabloid preciosity of Mr. Hemingway. But according to the tabloid judges who functioned in this competition, the tabloids have it.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON

A Modern Major General

THE GENERAL. By C. S. Forester. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

HERBERT CURZON, in Mr. Forester's novel, is anything but the pattern of a modern major general, and far from pretending to a knowledge of fugues and paradoxes, Raphael and Aristophanes, would indignantly deny that he had any. Which may well account for the fact that by page 237 he has become a lieutenant general, with "Sir" in front of his name. There was no nonsense about Curzon; he was a soldier who gave and took orders with the same undivided mind, and who passed up all cosmic conjecture in seeing to it that the line held firm. And hold firm it did, always, though every last man in it might be blown to bits. It was by such straight thinking that the obscure cavalry major of 1914 became, within three years, one of the leading generals in the British army, with decorations on his uniform three rows deep.

The portrait of Curzon is not the less terrifying because it is pat. There is nothing villainous about this Sandhurst prig swearing by that code that has made half the Englishmen of the past fifty years a subhuman species; there is only something monstrous. The race has simply sucked the individual dry; the brain has simply evacuated in favor of a few reflex actions. At moments one proffers an admiration as glacial as the man one admires, aware that even the snob, the brute, the careerist in Curzon are effortlessly subordinated to the Englishman who does his duty as he sees it. Here is, indeed, a not uncommon type of hero—the man who knows how to die magnificently, and does not in the least know how to live.

Forester has drawn Curzon monotonously to type, has drawn him almost to the point of caricature; yet it is absurd to cavil, since for all that he has drawn him scathingly enough to make one's blood boil. And he has done more; by means of this one man he has contrived to show us all the horror and imbecility of war. In a way, Curzon's perfect military manners are more damning than chapters of mental horror and physical agony would be, for they demand moral evaluation instantly. And they will instantly bring about a schism dividing humanity in half. There will be those to whom Curzon seems like a savior, and those to whom he seems like a devil; nobody will see him as anything that lies between the two.

And for that very reason this book cannot accomplish its purpose in the way that "All Quiet" and "Sergeant Grischa"

The Syllogism of America Today

More and better business is imperatively demanded by the conditions of today. More factory goods and more farm goods MUST be produced and sold through quick turnover if America is to come through into the clear light of prosperity.

Two Reasons Why

- (1) Bigger and better industry is urgently required as a fiscal base to carry the growing tax-load—since all taxes are ultimately paid out of PRODUCTION alone and not out of "money".
- (2) Industrial expansion is needed to absorb unemployed labor, which will increase mass buying-power and cut down relief taxation.

Blocked by Prevailing Set-up

But industrial expansion is blockaded by the prevailing economic set-up, which forces productive capital to operate between the upper millstone of heavy taxation and the lower millstone of recurrently inflating ground rent. The mere, initial cost of ground alone defeats not only government projects of slum clearance but also private initiative in the erection of badly needed new housing throughout the country—thus keeping a great deal of labor out of work, depressing mass-power to buy goods, and narrowing the fiscal base. The housing illustration is but one of hundreds to the same effect.

Like It or Not

The only way out is to shift the main burden of taxation from PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL to ground values, urban and rural, improved and vacant.

Productive Capital the Goat

Productive Capital, then, is overloaded with taxation and compelled to pay billions for the rental or purchase of ground; while at the same time further tax burdens are proposed by Townsendites, Bonusites, and Share-the-wealthites. Moreover, to cap the climax, the Marxites mistakenly identify productive capital as the central villain of the economic tragedy, and advocate its total confiscation. More and more people are studying the logic of the American economic situation in—

SAFEGUARD PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL,

by Louis Wallis

(Reading time only one hour)

Seventy-five cents at bookstores,
or direct from

DOUBLEDAY, DORAN & CO.
GARDEN CITY, LONG ISLAND, N. Y.

may be supposed to have accomplished their purpose. Palpable as is the motion of "The General," with its mass of tractarian writing, one will find it, depending on who one is, either too obvious or too obscure. The reader who believes in patriotism and "discipline" and consequently in war will nowhere be sentimentally disconcerted, as he must have been by "All Quiet," in reading this dry book; if he sees things by Curzon's lights he will continue to see them so at the end of the story, and will continue to regard Curzon as unexceptionable. For what is on trial here is not men who sin against the code and can be roundly berated as villains, but a code that sins against men; and it so happens that this is the very code which most people on this earth subscribe to. Behind it, moreover, stand two thousand years of the world's best literature: Horace with "Dulce et decorum est," Tennyson with "Theirs not to reason why," Lovelace with "Loved I not honor more," Shakespeare with "This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England." What chance has Mr. Forester against Shakespeare? We shall know better six months from now, if we take the trouble to ask Little, Brown and Company for figures on the sale of his book.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

How Social and How Secure?

SOCIAL SECURITY IN THE UNITED STATES. By

Paul H. Douglas. Whittlesey House. $3.

TOWARD SOCIAL SECURITY. By Eveline M. Burns.

Whittlesey House. $2.

DEFEENDERS of the present Social Security Act will derive little comfort from the two volumes listed above. The Administration spokesman who proudly boasted not so long ago that "in two years the United States worked out a system of job insurance that it took Europe fifteen years to accomplish" will find little approval of that handiwork. Both authors vigorously indict the chief provisions of the act, though neither can resist the pragmatic urge to extend their blessing to it. Professor Douglas consoles himself with the fact that "the American public has finally realized that it needs the greater protection against unemployment and old age which pooled social insurance gives." Professor Burns also, while regretting that "a great opportunity was missed for passing a more socially satisfactory" plan, believes nevertheless that "the act is a great achievement."

Professor Douglas presents a masterly summary of the background of the movement, the demands from the right and the left, and describes the manner in which the bill was passed. His chapter on the legislative history of the act will be of interest not only to those concerned with this particular problem but also to those interested in any New Deal legislation. Professor Douglas informs us that the bill as first introduced, prepared by the legal staff of the Department of Labor, embodied "little or no logic in the sequence of the topics covered," while "some of the language was ambiguous and, indeed, in places unintelligible." He gives an intimate account of the jockeying for the authority to administer the new act and an interesting résumé of the committee hearings and the difficulties encountered in the attempt to draft a more constructive program. He does not hesitate to delineate the role played by the Wisconsin school, which "occupied some powerful positions of vantage in the Washington scene," and served to cripple the unemployment-insurance features.

Professor Douglas devotes several chapters to an analysis of the provisions of the act. He gives an excellent description of the grants-in-aid schemes and indicates how these can be improved. He denounces the incorporation of the tax-offset scheme for unemployment insurance in place of the subsidy device recommended by the majority of the Advisory Council and all authoritative students of the problem. He criticizes the act's grant of autonomy to the states to enact individual reserve systems and employment-guaranty plans which cannot guarantee "the quality of benefits to the unemployed within any given state."

The accumulation of the contemplated reserves under the old-age insurance plan, Professor Douglas finds, "will beyond doubt greatly decrease the amount of purchasing power which otherwise would be spent upon consumers' goods." The withdrawal of such huge amounts from consumption, he points out further, "may well help to create a further state of unbalance in the future." He stresses the difficulties inhering in the present requirement that annuitants must leave gainful employment in order to qualify for their meager pensions. An entire chapter is devoted to the problems connected with the Clark amendment, which seeks to exempt private industrial old-age pension schemes from the compulsory insurance plan.

The reviewer has never seen a finer analysis of the constitutional problems involved in social-security legislation than that made by Professor Douglas. It sheds more light on the problem than most of the briefs devised by eminent legal authorities. A few years ago Professor Douglas published an exceptionally fine book under the title "Standards of Unemployment Insurance," in which he brought out the basic considerations underlying a practicable plan of unemployment insurance. That the framers of the Social Security Act did not pay the slightest attention to them has not daunted the courage of this indefatigable fighter for social justice. He emphasizes his points again in his present work. Despite the difficulty of the problem treated, no reader will find it either difficult to grasp or without genuine profit. The author has accomplished a masterly task.

Professor Burns's artillery is directed at the problems raised by the passage of the act. She is somewhat critical of the grants-in-aid provisions because of their inadequacy. This, however, is not an indelible defect since there is nothing in the provisions to prevent their future liberalization and improvement, which will undoubtedly come.

In discussing the compulsory old-age insurance system Professor Burns finds that the plan "is really a compulsory savings plan with insurance features for those who live long enough." The act, she points out, "places upon the shoulders of workers who are now young the burden arising from our failure to set up an annuity plan many years ago, instead of calling upon those who are better able to pay to share the cost." The author aptly asks: "If it is a good plan to ask the young or higher-paid wage-earners to pay for the unearned annuities of their old or lower-paid fellow-workers, why not extend the principle farther? Why draw the line at incomes of $3,000?"

Like Professor Douglas, Dr. Burns is most critical of the unemployment-insurance scheme adopted. Dwelling on the vulnerability of the present tax-offset scheme with its great administrative difficulties, the burden which it places upon employers in filing duplicating taxes, and the fact that complete protection of the rights of workers would require 1,222 voluntary agreements between the states, she too points her finger at the Wisconsin influence. According to Professor Burns, "it is an open secret that the less effective tax offset was favored in some quarters just because it obstructed federal efforts to secure uniform minimum standards. Those who treasure the rights of their states to experiment with devices for stabilizing employment were unwilling that the federal government should set standards which might prevent them from trying certain methods." Wisconsin was the only state so concerned.

The difficulties involved in the present unemployment-insurance provisions are splendidly brought out by Dr. Burns. Under the act, before unemployment protection can be obtained in the various states, pressure must be applied to thousands of employers instead of to the state legislature. The duplication of legislation in Congress and the states will hinder improvements and amendments. The lack of standards will create a miscellany of state laws without regard to the fundamental needs of the unemployed. Although the act requires that no state pay unemployment benefits for two years after it enacts a law, it fails to stipulate when a state must begin to pay such benefits. Under these provisions, the author points out, "a state might, if it wished, save up money year by year to pay benefits during the next ice age." Dr. Burns, as well as Professor Douglas, attacks the principle of individual reserves and the guaranty plans. "The mountainous labors of the Committee on Economic Security and of Congress," she concludes, "have produced a disappointingly small mouse." She joins with Professor Douglas in pleading for the substitution of the "more convenient and constitutional grant-in-aid method" for the "clumsy and roundabout tax-offset method."

Dr. Burns effectively punctures one of the most common misconceptions of social insurance held by many advocates of the subject, namely, the idea that social security can be accomplished through self-sustaining social insurance. This, she states, is not only impossible of accomplishment, but based upon the assumption that "the poor should be compelled to pay most of the cost of helping the poor." She also raises one of the most crucial questions now confronting social-insurance protagonists. Stating correctly that the Supreme Court is generally inclined to go along with public demand if it is vigorous enough, she emphasizes the fact that in the fight for social security there must be not only strong public support but also "something worth-while to fight for." But under the unwieldy and unnecessarily burdensome provisions which hedge the present act, "no one is likely to fight to preserve it." The act has been so written that "the American people will become aware of it first of all as taxpayers, since no benefits of any kind will be paid for at least two years after the taxes fall due." During this period "there will be thousands of angry taxpayers attacking the act and few to defend it because no one will receive any tangible benefits." Pointing out that only a program of social security which can commend itself to the masses of the community as being "just and fair and which disturbs the smooth running of the economic order as little as possible" can possibly arouse such support, she finds that the present act "hardly deserves its name." This, she says, explains why many of the enthusiastic promoters of the subject are fearful "lest the whole security program break down beneath the weight of its administrative machinery."

Dr. Burns's book raises extremely pertinent questions regarding the Social Security Act, questions which the Administration cannot afford to ignore. Indeed, no one interested in social security in America should fail to read it. The problem still lies before us.

ABRAHAM EPSTEIN

ART YOUNG SALUTES the LEAGUE for MUTUAL AID

ON ITS 16th ANNIVERSARY!

"Mutual aid is the only kind that's any good! Give aid today, you may need aid tomorrow—You never know which end of the see-saw you'll be on!"

—Art Young

Sixteen years ago the League was founded, bringing together radicals and liberals of all shades of opinion, for mutual helpfulness. The League's aim is to assist those in need who have in some small degree contributed to human progress. From a baker's dozen it has grown to a league of more than 700, with members from Maine to California. Every radical, liberal, or sympathizer, should be a member. If you are not active, assist those who are! Stand in a united front against need!

JOIN THE LEAGUE

You'll be in good company. Here's a partial list of our prominent Members:

FRANK PALMER Chairman
ELLEN KENNAN Vice Chairman
ADELAIDE SCHULKIND Executive Secretary
LEROY PETERSON Treasurer

Roger Baldwin
Murray Baron
John Beardsley
John Nicholas Boffel
Joseph Brodsky
Bishop Wm. M. Brown
Winifred Chappell
Albert Sprague Coolidge
Frank Crosswaith
Leigh Danenberg
Thomas Davin
Ben Davis, Jr.
Jerome Davis
Robert Dunn
Justus Ebert
Dr. Marie Equi
William Floyd
Elizabeth Gurley Flynn
Helen Fraenkel
Martha Gruening
Ida E. Guggenheimer
Abram L. Harris
Arthur Garfield Hays
John Haynes Holmes
Arthur Kallet
Harry Kelly
Carol King
Corliss Lamont
Robert Morris Lovett
Herbert Mahler
Clarina Michelson
Scott Nearing
Harvey O'Connor
Moissaye Olgin
Evelyn Preston
I. Radinowsky
Ruth Stout
Norman Thomas
Lily Turner
Oswald Garrison Villard
Harry Weinberger
Carle Whitehead

"From Each according to his ability.

- Send a check for $5 or more and you're a member!
- Deposit any sum, large or small in our Loan Fund. Your money will draw no interest, but it will do splendid work. Your loan is returnable on demand . . . when banks were crashing, no one lost a dollar in the League Loan Fund.
- Tell us about any job that is open, we'll fill it!

To each according to his need"

- We maintain a regular employment service, without fees of any kind.
- We lend to members, without interest or collateral, sums up to $100 for one year.
- Every transaction through the League is scrupulously confidential.
- League parties and dances furnish social contacts with worth-while people.

For further information, address Adelaide Schulkind, Executive Secretary or send check to Leroy Peterson, Treasurer, League for Mutual Aid, 104 Fifth Avenue, New York City

War and Profits

M-DAY, The First Day of War. By Rose M. Stein. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

MISS STEIN, according to her publishers, was "closely associated" with the Nye committee and prepared for it "an official summary of the testimony"; she acknowledges the aid and criticism of its counsel, Mr. Raushenbush, in the writing of this book, and makes extensive use not only of the committee hearings but of information which it did not place on public record. This will inevitably give to "M-Day" the character of at least a quasi-authorized popular distillation of the committee's work, and I am very much afraid that it is not going to do the Nye committee much good. For Miss Stein does not confine herself to what the committee proved, or even to what it attempted to prove. She sets out to roam the whole vast field of war in modern society, rationalizing our entry into the last war, the course of our war effort, the post-war activities of munitions makers, and the industrial and human mobilization plans now being stored up against the next one, all in the harsh, black-and-white terms of a greedy "capital" and a cheated and oppressed "labor" or "the public."

This is an enormous task, to be performed successfully only by one with a powerful historical imagination, a convincing exactitude in factual detail, and a clear basic philosophy of society. Miss Stein can scarcely be blamed for lacking these rare qualities, but in their absence her book becomes a rather confused hodge-podge, uncertain in its demonstrations and pointless in the end. She opens with a somewhat extreme statement of the thesis that the bankers got us into the war. "To save their own skins American bankers had to promote Allied victory. If that achievement required American participation in the war, then that was the next logical step." Our great industrial mobilization was primarily dictated by industrialists thirsting for profits; the draft act was passed not to provide men for a large-scale participation on the western front but to prevent "labor difficulties" within the machine supplying goods to the Allies; America, having been got into a war in which it had no interest, was kept in it (and this, I confess, seems to me a really extraordinary theory) by proclaiming "a crusade to crush bolshevism." The author then goes on to rehearse the sins of the munitions makers as they have been emphasized in the Nye hearings; she describes the proposed draft and propaganda acts which have been prepared for submission to Congress in the next "emergency," ultimately losing herself happily in the host of contradictions which have been created by the violent disparity between the necessities of modern war and the political and social rationalizations which Western democratic society continues to profess.

In the course of all this, Miss Stein makes more than one useful point. There is an interesting demonstration to show that "taking the profit out of war" is an idle dream; and it is a service to call attention to the fact that in addition to the problem of why the United States declared war on Germany there is the different problem of how what many imagined would be a mere financial contribution to victory was converted into a full-scale military participation on the western front. But the trouble with Miss Stein's solution for this, as for the many other problems with which she deals, is her heavy reliance, in common with other narrow economic determinists, upon inference, innuendo, and post hoc propter hoc argument. Some of the inferences I suspect are shrewd; others seem to me fantastic; and when this method is coupled with a lamentable carelessness in matters of chronology and detail—as a random example, at one point she puts in Mr. Baker's mouth the words of his biographer, and gives an unwarranted twist to the result by associating it with events happening months after the time referred to—she lays herself open to attack which can be devastating. It is to be feared that the book will damage rather than strengthen the real influence of the Nye committee's work.

WALTER MILLIS

The Townsend Fantasy

AGE BEFORE BOOTY. By Morgan J. Dorman. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN. By Nicholas Roosevelt. Doubleday, Doran and Company. 50 cents.

THE ECONOMIC MEANING OF THE TOWNSEND PLAN. By a University of Chicago Round Table, Harry D. Gideonse, Editor. University of Chicago Press. 25 cents.

THREE more different treatments of the same subject would be difficult to imagine than those contained in the booklets listed above on America's most popular controversial subject—the Townsend plan. The first is essentially an evangelical appeal. Objections are mentioned merely to ridicule the objectors. For example, the very pertinent criticism that the plan, if adopted, would require approximately 40 per cent of the national income is noted. But each time this objection is phrased, the author patiently points out that the pensions would be revolving, that the new purchasing power created by the payments would "suck up the stagnant pools of the nation's congealed life blood and whirl them along through a constantly functioning system." He does not attempt, however, to explain how the withdrawal of all persons over sixty years of age from productive activity would increase the supply of goods to meet this vastly expanded demand. Nor does he devote any attention to the effect of the decline in the purchasing power of the 90 per cent of the population which will bear the tax burden.

Mr. Roosevelt attempts to meet the Townsend cohorts on their own ground. He appears to be sympathetic with the motives which led to the development of the plan, is almost sentimental toward Dr. Townsend personally, but is bitterly vindictive in his attack on the movement. Although he is somewhat sounder in his economics, his picture of the effect of the plan is in many ways as distorted as that presented by Mr. Dorman. Instead of its ushering in a golden era in American economic life, Mr. Roosevelt declares that the Townsend plan would cripple business, close factories, intensify unemployment, and be the signal for the gravest nation-wide disaster we have experienced in the 147 years of our national existence. Mr. Roosevelt's very obvious predilection for laissez faire economics, however, tends to make his argument unconvincing to the millions of Americans who feel, rightly or wrongly, that some positive measures should be taken to stimulate the full use of America's immense productive resources.

The University of Chicago pamphlet is as balanced and objective as the others are extreme. While its economic analysis naturally bears some resemblance to that contained in Mr. Roosevelt's book, it predicts no great catastrophe for this country if the plan is adopted. On the contrary, it points out that the transactions tax proposed by the Townsend proponents, while large enough to be a crushing burden on the masses of the American people, "would scarcely yield enough to pay $75 per month to 7,000,000—much less $200 to 10,000,000 persons." It adds also a word of caution regarding the complicated mechanism which would be required to collect the transactions tax and supervise the lives of the pensioners lest one of them fail to spend his entire allotment within thirty days. Although tons of material have been written on the supposed beneficial or disastrous effect of the Townsend plan, this little pamphlet is, I believe, the only comprehensive economic analysis thus far to be presented. The plan's political implications still remain to be dealt with in as objective a manner.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

A Novel of Quality

THE HOUSE IN PARIS. By Elizabeth Bowen. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THIS is a puzzling book. Other reviewers have called it subtle, luminous, miraculous, exciting. Undoubtedly it is distinguished. The style is clear, pure, and exact. The characters—not much more than half a dozen in all—are sharp and various. Undoubtedly also they suffer. But these qualities, admirable as they are, do not quite add up to the moving story that they ought to.

The first and third parts of the book are laid in the present; the second part is in the past. Thus to the reader—as to the protagonist of the first part, a nine-year-old boy who is ignorant of his parentage—the first third of the book is veiled and mysterious. Leopold has come to Paris from his home in Italy to meet the mother he has never known. He knows that his father is dead and his mother is married to an Englishman; he knows that the Fishers, mother and daughter, in whose house he waits with anguished eagerness for the meeting, were friends of his mother. His American foster-parents he despises. For him the only reality is his mother, whom he has endowed with all possible beauty and virtue. And she does not come.

By a cut-back in the second part, the reader is made acquainted with what Leopold will never learn—the brief unhappy love affair from which he was born. Karen is a gently bred English girl; Max is a Jew without fortune; each is engaged to another person, Max to the Naomi Fisher whom Leopold knows as his mother's friend. The passionate feeling which brings Max and Karen together for so short a time leaves Naomi high and dry, for Max, unable to resolve the situation, commits suicide; and Karen, after her baby is born, marries the man to whom she was promised.

This, it will be seen, is easily the stuff of which novels are made. Passion, frustration, grief, despair all have their place. Yet there are curious elipses. The reader knows Max only as Karen's lover—and as a man subject to the powerful and evil Mme. Fisher, Naomi's mother, who really drives him to kill himself. Karen appears only in her brief relation to Max and to Max and Naomi together, and indirectly later to her husband, whom she does not love but whose generosity and forgiveness separate her psychologically from her child. Leopold could never know his father as his mother's lover; but he is no more in the dark than is the reader about what sort of man Max was. Each of the characters, in short, appears under a cloud, incomplete, muted. And this is perhaps the key to Miss Bowen's failure to make her book what it might have been. In the great and successful novels passion is expressed, everything is said somewhere and somehow, the reader feels a reassuring omniscience which unites him with the author, also omniscient. Whatever secrets the characters may have from one another are not secrets to the reader. The result is a sense of completeness

WILL HISTORY REPEAT?

The future course of world events is being shaped in Europe now. Judge its direction for yourself. Appraise the social forces at work in the human Europe . . . through one of the special travel-studies of EDUTRAVEL. The following are only a few of this year's important offerings:

CONTEMPORARY ART AND ARCHITECTURE

Featuring interviews with leading artists in 8 countries—auspices of The New School for Social Research.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT ABROAD

Study of delinquency and reform in 5 countries—under Joseph F. Fishman, sponsored by The New School for Social Research.

POPULAR EDUTOURS

Featuring a diversified selection of unusually attractive general European tours—with expert tour leadership guaranteed.

Write for booklets on these, or for the complete EDUTRAVEL program including "Summer Session in Sweden." Address Dept. NA-4.

EDUTRAVEL

An Institute for Educational Travel
535 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Land tours in Europe in conjunction with Amerop Travel Service, Inc. (in U.S.S.R., in cooperation with Intourist, Inc.).

BARGAINS IN BOOKS

UP TO 70% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail-Order Book House

These offerings by America's oldest Mail-Order Book House save you up to 75% of their regular retail price. Each book is brand-new in condition, stock-perfect, a permanent addition to your library. All orders promptly filled and covered by our 52-year-old MONEY BACK GUARANTEE.

1. HISTORY OF PROSTITUTION Among All The Peoples of the World, From the Most Remote Antiquity to the Present Day. By Paul Lacroix. In 2 large vols., containing 1481 pages. One of the most curious, human and readable books on a little known subject of vast significance. ($12.50) $3.98

2. SEXUAL ABERRATIONS. The Phenomena of Fetishism in Relation to Sex. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Translated by Dr. S. Parker, Senior Physician, Psychopathic Department, Bellevue Hospital. ($10.00) $2.98
Complete in 2 vols.,

3. SADISM AND MASOCHISM. The Psychology of Hatred and Cruelty. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Translated by Louise Brink, Ph.D. ($10.00) $2.98
Complete in 2 vols.,

4. PECULIARITIES OF BEHAVIOR. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Fascinating analysis of impulsive acts, disorders of instincts and emotions, etc. The textbook of psychoanalysis. ($10.00) $2.98
Complete in 2 vols.,

5. FRIGIDITY IN WOMAN. In Relation To Her Love Life. By Wilhelm Stekel. Translated by James S. Van Teslaar. ($10.00) $2.98
Complete in 2 vols.,

6. IMPOTENCE IN THE MALE. The Psychic Disorders of Sexual Functions in the Male. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Translated by Oswald H. Boltz, M.D. ($10.00) $2.98
Complete in 2 vols.,

7. RHYTHM OF LIFE. A Guide To Sexual Harmony. By Sofie Lazarsfeld. Translated by Karsten and E. Pelham Stapel. Fully illustrated. 329 pages. A sound, sensible, down-to-earth book about sex that every one can read and understand. Explains marital difficulties and suggests means for overcoming them. $2.98

8. THE ABUSES, ABERRATIONS AND CRIMES OF THE GENITAL SENSE. A Psychopathy of Love. Havelock Ellis calls this book "an unusual and valuable interpretation." The most detailed, elaborate work on sexual anthropology that has appeared in any language. 543 pages. Privately printed. $5.95

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

Established 1884

367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7
(Mark circle around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 268-N, just off the press!

Name

Address

City State

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

GROWING . . .

BECAUSE IT FILLS A VITAL NEED!

A HUNDRED PEOPLE A DAY are showing their approval of Consumers Union by becoming its first members. . . . They recognize the urgent need for a competent non-profit technical organization to protect them against inferior and sometimes harmful products and to help them make wise use of their incomes by providing simple, usable information about the brands of goods they buy.

They recognize, too, the need for a consumer organization which is:

PRO-LABOR—Fair in its relations with its own employees, and aiding labor generally by reporting wherever possible on the conditions under which products are manufactured.

DEMOCRATICALLY CONTROLLED—With every member having a vote in electing the board of directors.

CONSUMERS

UNION OF UNITED STATES, INC.

COLSTON WARNE, President; ARTHUR KALLET, Director; DEWEY PALMER, Technical Supervisor.

DIRECTORS: ROBERT BRADY, HEYWOOD BROWN, OSMOND K. FRAENKEL, JAMES GILMAN, A. J. ISSERMAN, ARTHUR KALLET, CHARLES A. MARLIES, DEWEY PALMER, FRANK PALMER, A. PHILIP RANDOLPH, BERNARD REIS, ROSE SCHNEIDERMAN, ADELAIDE SCHULKIND, HERMAN SOUTHWORTH, COLSTON WARNE.

Offers the following services:

$3 A full service giving reports on essential commodities and in addition, information and reports on a wide range of higher-priced goods, such as automobiles, mechanical refrigerators, radios, etc. This service consists of a monthly magazine and a yearly buying guide. Members who pay a fee of $3 a year will receive this service.

$1 A limited service primarily intended for persons whose income restricts their purchases to low-priced products. This service will concentrate on essential commodities. It consists of a monthly bulletin and a compact, available-when-shopping, yearly buying guide. Members paying a fee of $1 a year will receive this service.

Both of these services will rate commodities, wherever possible by brand names, on the basis of quality and price. Information and advice will also be provided on matters of general interest to consumers.

Both of these services are available to groups of 25 or more at special reduced rates.

THE FIRST ISSUE of each of the Consumers Union monthly publications, based on testing and research by the CU technical staff and numerous consultants, will be ready shortly. To insure receiving a copy, fill out and mail the coupon NOW!

CONSUMERS UNION OF U. S., INC.

22 East 17th Street, New York, N. Y.

I hereby apply for membership in CONSUMERS UNION. I enclose:

☐ $3 for one year's membership and subscription to the full service.

☐ $1 for one year's membership and subscription to the limited service.

☐ $5 for one year's membership and subscription to the full service plus a contribution to the promotion of the new organization.

..... ($10 to $25) for one year's membership and subscription to the full service plus a contribution toward a permanent consumers' laboratory.

I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

Signature Occupation.....
(Longhand—do not print)

Address 63

which Miss Bowen does not impart. Her people are cleverly contrived puppets moving through episodes expressive of emotion—but the emotion is not quite real. This Max and this Karen, even Leopold, the clever, desperate, over-wise child, have hearts but they do not beat, blood but it does not flow. This is not life, and neither by a strange paradox is it art.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Shorter Notices

ARTIFEX. By Richard Aldington. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Mr. Aldington calls the short pieces which compose this volume articles and not essays, "because the essay is only an article in a high hat"; others will prefer to call them sketches and not articles because the article is only a sketch in a crushed fedora. The result, at any rate, is a singularly indolent procession of "thoughts" on the subject of life, love, and the amenities of travel by sea. Characteristic of his tone in general is such a remark as, "Now, in my opinion, few human spectacles are so charming as two young people downright crazily in love with each other." Yet Mr. Aldington would not be disposed to contemplate with a like approval the Human Spectacle as such. "They seem to me like ants," he observes in a mood of "soul-crushing boredom," "but terribly noisy, destructive, and assertive ants; and the worst of it is they can't leave one alone." The most inclusive definition of them all is laid down solemnly in a piece on freedom of the press. "Music is music," we are here advised, "not noise; painting is painting, not poster-work or abstraction; sculpture is sculpture, not rock-drilling; architecture is architecture, not engineering; literature is literature, not writing ads; poetry is poetry, not word mosaics. . . . I want music, painting, sculpture, architecture, literature, poetry." Unfortunately Mr. Aldington wants also, as far as the present sketches go, a capacity for ordinary pains in the exercise of his craft and a critical arsenal of sufficient force to achieve something more than a purely petulant effect in the expression of his private grievances. However, counsel of this kind is very probably idly bestowed, since it seems to be another of Mr. Aldington's beliefs, urged somewhere among the present papers, that "no intelligent person pays the least attention to what reviewers say."

JESUS MANIFEST By Dmitri Merejkowski. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

For the second time the Russian poet and mystic, well-known for his life of Leonardo da Vinci, has sought to follow Papini, Middleton Murry, and other men of letters in attempting a life of Christ. His first book projected a mystic's vision of the Christ of faith. It earned and merited the praise of many critics. The second effort is less happy. A poetic embellishment of the simple gospel narratives is a difficult task at best. Merejkowski does not solve the difficulty. Sometimes his elaborations are distractions beside the quite sufficient though austere simple narratives. Sometimes he strains too obviously for effect. Thus the kiss of Judas prompts the observation, "The fetid breath of the unclean spirit is in the kiss of love—such was the last goodbye of man to the Son of God." The trial before the high priest is introduced with the words, "The heart of a spider experiences a pleasant thrill at the first buzz of a fly in its web. So also did a thrill of pleasure pass through the heart of the high priest Annas." There are naturally some genuinely beautiful and moving passages. But on the whole the simple fare of the King James version is preferable to this kind of raisin bread. The raisins are too thick, and they make the bread taste prematurely stale.

EPITAPH ON GEORGE MOORE. By Charles Morgan. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

The noisy publicity which stimulated the sales of "The Fountain" formed an ironic background to the sensitive, reticent character of Mr. Morgan's protagonist, the scholarly Lewis Alinson. This monograph on George Moore is precisely the kind of book Alinson might have written as an ultimate protest against vulgarity. It is distinguished by an imperturbable poise, a self-conscious reluctance to confuse literary values with journalistic chatter. During the last years of Moore's life Mr. Morgan was his close companion. Since their conversations indicate that both men were interested in life primarily as material for art, it is not surprising to find Mr. Morgan approaching Moore's life through his art rather than assuming, with the biographical critics, that art is comprehensible only as the reflection of a socially conditioned individual. Moore's "passion for self-renewal," which is here considered as the essence of his nature, seems to have its origin in artistic experience; what is implicit in his work is only secondarily suggested in his personal life. Just as he taught himself to write all over again in every book, so he taught himself to redraft his life in every stage of its growth. He would break as callously with an old friend as with an old habit of style. This artistic passion for recapitulation and rebirth explains the autobiographical nature of so many of Moore's works: "Confessions of a Young Man," "Memoirs of My Dead Life," "Hail and Farewell," and others. It explains, too, Moore's preoccupation with technique, the endless rediscovery of sensibility. The result of this continual self-creation, according to Mr. Morgan, was that Moore gave to English fiction a combination of unity and lucidity, based on a reconciliation of written and spoken language, which previous novels had achieved only haphazardly. Moore gave "liberty as well as discipline to the English novel." On the basis of his insight into the relation between style and the psychology of the artist, Mr. Morgan examines Moore's achievement in fiction from "Esther Waters" through "The Brook Kerith" to "Héloïse and Abélard." In view of his sympathetic appreciation of Moore as well as his critical understanding of the problems of the modern novel, it seems unfortunate that he was forced by circumstances beyond his control to abandon the task of a full biography, a task which Moore himself had assigned to his young friend.

DRAMA

Dreiser Simplified

A VERY pedestrian version of "An American Tragedy" flourished briefly on Broadway a few years ago. Like many dramatizations it was hardly more than a hurried synopsis, and it seemed, beside the novel, an impoverished thing. Obviously one cannot simply skeletonize a work of this kind without losing the rich profusion of realistic detail upon which its effect depends, and the least one can say of "The Case of Clyde Griffiths" (Ethel Barrymore Theater) is just that it does attempt in various ways to achieve some sort of intensity

Read what HAROLD J. LASKI says about the year's most exciting and informative book

INSIDE EUROPE

By JOHN GUNTHER

"On Germany and Italy and Austria its insights are remarkable. It gives pictures of Hitler, Goering, Mussolini, Dollfuss which are literally indispensable to an adequate understanding of them. He gets inside the mind of the dictators with a skill that is great journalism. With the discussion of Austria Mr. Gunther takes his place by the side of Walter Duranty as one of the best reporters now living."—Harold J. Laski. $3.50

HARPER & BROTHERS, 49 East 33rd Street, N. Y.

"Fascism is not a madman's dream of power.

It is a direct and natural outgrowth of our present society," warns MAX LERNER, in

Dictatorship IN THE MODERN WORLD

Edited by GUY STANTON FORD

*

CONTRIBUTORS

LERNER, The Nation, "The Pattern of Dictatorship"

LUTZ, Stanford, "European Dictatorships"

RIPPY, Duke, "Dictatorships in Spanish America"

SPENCER, Ohio State, "The Mussolini Regime"

DEUTSCH, Minnesota, "The Origins of Dictatorship in Germany"

KOHN, Smith, "Communist and Fascist Dictatorship: A Comparative Study"

BROGAN, Oxford, "The Prospects for Democracy"

*

"A remarkable volume . . . brilliant, brief, and to the point . . ."—Peter H. Odegard in The Nation.

$2.50

THE UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA PRESS
MINNEAPOLIS MINNESOTA

NEW!

THE April issue of The Fight in a new format. . . . Three-colored cover. . . . Thirty-two pages with many articles, feature stories, illustrations, cartoons, photographs. . . . Five colors. . . . A number of new departments including Books, Movies, Radio, Wall Street.

In the Current Issue

FIRST CASUALTYBy George Seldes

This is the nineteenth anniversary of the U. S. entrance into the World War. Do you remember what the newspapers told us about the War? Here a leading American foreign correspondent tells how both the Central Powers and the Allies ran their propaganda machines.

ALL QUIET ON THE POTOMAC. By Mauritz A. Hallgren

For almost two years the Senate Munitions Committee was front page news. Now its labor has ended. Did it bring forth mouse or lion?

EXILEBy Peter Jonas

Tens of thousands of Germans are exiles from their native land since Hitler and his party have taken charge of things—a long line of “voluntary” wanderers—small business men, trade unionists, writers, Democrats, Socialists, Communists, Protestants, Jews, Catholics. Here, one of them—a German Jew—is interviewed.

TOWN WITH A HISTORYBy Reid Robinson

Butte, Montana—“Bloody Butte”—they call it out west. Here the President of the miners’ union tells of the struggle of the workers for better conditions against dynamite and disaster, fires, frame-ups and gun fights.

CALL OUT THE MILITIA!By Morris Maken

Who backs the National Guard . . . What attracts young men to this branch of the service . . . What methods are used in recruiting . . . Where and how does the National Guard function?

HOLLYWOODBy Richard Watts, Jr.

THE LAST ACTBy Art Young

10 Cents a Copy

The Fight AGAINST WAR AND FASCISM

Published Monthly by the American League Against War and Fascism

THE FIGHT, 112 East 19th Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose $1 for a year's subscription to The Fight.

Name

Street

City State.....

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

calculated to compensate for the solidity which the dramatic form must sacrifice. Unfortunately, however, the least that one can say is also very nearly the most, for “The Case of Clyde Griffiths” is simplified into a mere exemplary fable and then delivered in a falsetto which soon ceases to be more than exasperatingly shrill.

The version is a translation of that made some time ago for Piscator’s “advanced” theater in Berlin, and the Group has staged it more or less in accordance with Piscator’s methods. There is a permanent set with two levels, upon which, with a minimum of properties, the company performs the scenes in a fashion halfway between realism and a sort of stylized make-believe. The more familiar the method becomes the less there is to recommend it, but the real reason for the relative ineffectiveness of the play lies less in the staging than in the obvious determination to simplify the whole story in the interests of a puerile didacticism. After all, Dreiser’s novel was impressive for two reasons: first, because the naturalistic documentation gave it a kind of factual authenticity which one could not dismiss; second, because one was made to feel the complexity of the forces which were driving Clyde to his fate, made to realize how the weakness of his character conspired with the cruelty of the dilemma in which he found himself to make that fate almost inevitable. But with the fanaticism of the moralist the adaptors have first stripped the novel of its factual realism and then schematized its moral until the intellect rebels against so child-like a simplification.

In it they have seen nothing except the lesson, and in their determination to leave no point unglossed they have supplied a redundancy of comment which begins by seeming an insult to the intelligence and ends, as over-explicitness usually does, by arousing all one’s impulses to dissent. When the omnipresent commentator emerges from the obscurity of the orchestra pit to remark of the heroine, “For her, love is only a dream as yet unrealized,” one feels merely that this yellow-backed language is hardly beautiful enough in itself to justify the intrusion of an unnecessary comment. When at the climax he emerges again to assure us that what we might be inclined to call fate has now been unmasked as “economic law,” one is moved perversely to reflect that since all twenty-five-dollar-a-week clerks who yearn for a more resplendent life do not commit murder, there is obviously some factor of which the “law” has not given a wholly satisfactory account.

In a sense, Dreiser’s novel was a protest against a somewhat similar simplification from an opposite point of view. He was never unaware that the conventional moralist would say that Clyde met his fate because he was a weak and wicked man. The whole point of the novel lay not only in presenting the hero as an object of pity but also in the clear indication that he was sinned against as well as sinning. It was convincing because it illustrated so clearly how a combination of forces are necessary before a thing so apparently incredible can actually take place. But to say that Clyde had to commit murder because his salary did not enable him to pay for his dress suit is hardly less inadequate than to say that he did so because the grace of God was not in him. Surely there is no society in which this particular callous weakling would have become a very noble specimen of the human race. It is even probable enough that he would have got into some sort of trouble in the best-regulated of worlds. All that can be said—all that Mr. Dreiser did say—was merely that the particular form which his downfall took was a form to the shaping of which economic injustice contributed its share. But to see in his story nothing more than an illustration of such economic injustice is to make it little more convincing than to see in it no more than a moral warning to apprentices who ought to be industrious and who ought to respect their masters.

Even the authors of this play wobble badly in their interpretation after they have stated the thesis in uncompromising terms. Obviously the story they have to tell is one from which the factor of moral weakness as well as of mere fecklessness cannot wholly be banished. They cannot make Clyde merely a victim, and so, from the orchestra pit, they admonish him for his sins and then, slightly shifting the point of view, reproach him as an enemy of his class who should have joined the other workers in a strike (non-existent in the novel and invented for the purpose) instead of accepting invitations from the boss or his friends. Unfortunately, however, these attempts to hedge appear rather as inconsistencies than as realistic representations of the complexity of life, and the fact will, indeed, serve very well to illustrate the weakness of the didactic method in works of the imagination. Dreiser could make dubiety and complexity contribute to the impressive realism of his work. The very impossibility of disentangling all the motives, of measuring the importance of all the factors, made his account seem real. It created the illusion of life because, like life, the story was not reducible to a geometrical demonstration. But a demonstration, on the other hand, must demonstrate conclusively or it is nothing, and until life can be reduced to conclusive demonstrations, the work of the imagination will still be able to teach one thing which the didactic fable cannot—namely, that life is too complex to be encompassed within any comfortable formulas, either moral or economic.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

Twenty Years After

THE series of old films which the Museum of Modern Art has been reviving this winter at the Dalton School reached one of its climaxes the other night when D. W. Griffith's "Intolerance" (1916) alternately amazed and amused an audience composed, it would seem, of people who did not know how or when to laugh—if laughter was in order at all. In my opinion it was not in order. Even when Griffith's own utter seriousness could not be accepted at its face value there was still the power of his directing hand to be felt, there was the integrity of a first-rate artist to be respected. "Intolerance" is probably bad; the public was right which rejected it twenty years ago, and Iris Barry confessed as much in her program notes. "Audiences," she said, "find it bewildering, exhausting. There is so much in it; there is too much of it; the pace increases so relentlessly; its abrupt hail of images—many of them only five frames long—cruelly hammers the sensibility; its climax is near hysteria. . . . As Pudovkin says, 'the abundance of matter forces the director to work the theme out quite generally . . . and consequently there is a strong discrepancy between the depth of the motif and the superficiality of its form.'" And of course there is the fact of Griffith's failure ever quite to justify his ambitious notion of telling four stories as one. Yet the talent displayed in the film is enormous, and on this particular night I found myself in radical disagreement with an audience which could stop to snicker at the women's hats of 1916 or at the gigantic blunders of a great director gone temporarily wrong. This was the film from which

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim
CALL IT A DAY
A Comedy by DODIE SMITH
with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE
MOROSCO THEA., 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thurs. and Sat. at 2:30
Extra Matinee Wednesdays

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
END OF SUMMER
A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN
with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 3:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
IDIOT'S DELIGHT
a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD
with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:30

FILM

INTOLERANCE
DAVID WARK GRIFFITH'S
Epic Film
Third in series of motion picture programs assembled by Film Library of Museum of Modern Art.
SUNDAY EVENING, MARCH 29, 8:45 P. M.
NEW SCHOOL, 66 WEST 12th STREET

Auspices of Film Group
NEW YORK ADULT EDUCATION COUNCIL
222 Fourth Avenue
Algonquin 4-7150
Membership subscription in advance from Council or at New School evening of performance.

BOOK

"Easily the best of the new dance books . . ."
Theatre Arts Monthly.

The DANCER'S QUEST

by Elizabeth Selden

With 26 line drawings and 33 photogravures.

Price—$6.00

At leading booksellers or from the publishers:

University of California Press

Berkeley, California

TRAVEL

Visit SOVIET RUSSIA

with
LOUIS FISCHER
PRINCESS SKARIATINA
JULIEN BRYAN
JOSHUA KUNITZ

COLSTON WARNE
MAXWELL STEWART
HENRY SHAPIRO

Trips which show you more than tourist sights at least cost of time and money. Circulars on request.

$372 roundtrip
New York with a month in the Soviet Union. Other tours
up to $850.

Tenth Season

The Open Road

12th Floor
8 West 40th Street, New York
Cooperating with Intourist

almost everything "modern" in the art was learned by Russia, by Germany, and by Hollywood; its intensity, particularly toward the close, is still not easy to endure; and the acting is superb. But the audience giggled at the acting too. They thought it was overacting; whereas the violence of Mae Marsh, for example, was strictly to scale and profoundly convincing—and showed up a great deal of what we see today as the affected understatement which it is.

Having gone again to look at Charlie Chaplin's "Modern Times" I must report how greatly it improves upon acquaintance. Not that it seemed capable of improvement before; indeed I was trying a month ago to be articulate about its perfection, and failing. Nor do I expect to succeed now, since it appears to me that words are perhaps the poorest medium through which Chaplin's effects can come. I may say, however, that the picture has grown in seriousness during the interval; that it is possibly not funny at all; that the peculiar importance of its subject matter removes it from the class of those spectacles which are simply and thinly ludicrous. This is to say no more, and no less, than that Chaplin is a great comedian whose instinct keeps him always at that depth where the absurd is difficult to disentangle from the essential. The figure he presents to us—the dauntlessly eager and innocent soul adventuring among the imperfect masterpieces of man's world—is the figure both of a fool and of an angel, a little Don Quixote of our worst side streets, a fellow who lets us understand, especially when we are looking at one of his pictures for the second or third time, that the jokes are quite as much on us as on him, and that the truth about most laughing matters is transcendental. Paulette Goddard, Charlie's faithful gamin friend, has understood this too; and indeed it is as if the film itself had understood it, for it proceeds to all appearances at its own perfect and effortless pace—a pace wonderfully appropriate to the theme, and never for a second abandoned.

A good deal of cinema cant is perpetrated on the subject of "timing," and yet it is plain that Griffith and Chaplin manifest their mastery through that virtue as much as through any other. This is the moment, therefore, to speak of another picture I have been revisiting. "The 39 Steps" might very well become a model for any director who still has something to learn about the art of continuousness, or shall I say elision. The fascination of the film lies chiefly, I think, in the fact that each episode begins before the last one has left off, or at any rate grows out of it so swiftly and naturally that the joining remains invisible. I have more in mind than the now famous business of the chambermaid's open mouth becoming the mouth of a tunnel out of which the hero's train rushes with a scream like that with which she has announced the murder he will be accused of committing; I have in mind the picture as a whole, and the illusion I had that its story was literally growing before my eyes like a vine of lightning whipped out of some soil not subject to time's slow weather. This is, I admit, a fancy way of talking about a spy story which is much like other spy stories. But I can think of no soberer way in which to suggest its clear superiority, its all but absolute success in a domain where the movies will always be wise to dwell. "The 39 Steps" is the thriller which all other thrillers, I suspect, have steadily tried to be.

It is perhaps evident by now that I found the past fortnight barren of films about which there is anything to say. I enjoyed "The Country Doctor" (Music Hall), "The Song and Dance Man" (Center), and "Klondike Annie" (Paramount), in their several ways, but I cannot imagine their being discussed.

MARK VAN DOREN

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

SAINT JOAN. Martin Beck Theater. Brilliant interpretation by Katharine Cornell of what may well be Shaw's most enduring play.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

ETHAN FROME. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon, and Raymond Massey.

LIBEL. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English courtroom play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

ANNIE OAKLEY. R.K.O. A minor American masterpiece based on the life of Buffalo Bill's best-loved sharpshooter. Barbara Stanwyck as Annie Oakley divides the honors with Sitting Bull.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE 39 STEPS. Alexander Korda. Months old, but should be seen wherever possible. A swift and beautiful thriller set in the Highlands, and one of several films which argue British leadership in the immediate future.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Alexander Korda. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

Letters to the Editors

"SOCIALISTS TO THE LEFT"

Dear Sirs: May I be permitted to comment on your editorial, Socialists to the Left, appearing in your issue of January 22. This editorial is as unjust to the Socialist Party of New York and to the Old Guard generally as it is inaccurate.

First, let me express my agreement with your statement that "a genuine united resistance to the growing offensive against civil liberties and living standards—despite 'recovery'—is of primary importance." But with whom are we to unite for such resistance? The Thomas-militant wing of the Socialist Party believes we ought to unite with the Communists. We, the party of New York and the Old Guard throughout the country, believe we should unite with organized labor and all progressive groups in the country. You can't have a united front with both; they are mutually exclusive. United front with the Communists, in our view, would place the Socialists in the same position of isolation and impotence as the Communists are in now. Moreover, it is hypocritical to speak of uniting to resist invasion of our civil liberties with those who by philosophy and practice are opposed to civil liberties and regard such basic rights as freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly as mere bourgeois virtues.

Your statement that "the most intelligent and vigorous Socialist Party members and sympathizers must necessarily be on the left in this controversy" is a wish not justified by the facts. The intelligence of a body of people represented by the Old Guard may not be thus flippanantly appraised. You yourself refer to Mayor McLevy of Bridgeport and James H. Maurer of Reading, leaders of two cities highly successful politically, who have long been regarded as intelligent and vigorous leaders of the Socialist and trade-union movement, as having denounced the Thomas wing of the party.

Your statement, "That the radical Declaration of Principles was adopted at the National Convention of 1934 by a two-thirds' vote indicates . . . that the left wing has a majority of the membership on its side," is utterly misleading. You must know that this "Declaration of Principles" was carried by a majority of only a few hundred. And since that referendum vote there has been a complete shift of sentiment to the Old Guard position. More than that, the states under militant domination have suffered such heavy losses in membership that the Old Guard has today a clear majority in the Socialist Party.

—LOUIS WALDMAN

New York, March 12

DIALECTICAL MATERIALISM AND NATURE

Dear Sirs: Thalheimer's lucid exposition of the elements of the Marxist world view fills a long-felt want for American readers, and it is indeed unfortunate that Sidney Hook, in his recent review of "Introduction to Dialectical Materialism" in The Nation of March 4 was so preoccupied with secondary terminological questions that he did not find space to commend the book warmly to his colleagues of the academic world who are prone to repeat strictures on dialectical materialism without first familiarizing themselves with it. I think Dr. Hook will agree with me that this short and simple work is an excellent book to do just what its title promises, that is, to serve as an introduction to dialectical materialism.

Dr. Hook writes: "Such a variety of antithetical elements enter into this philosophy that it is possible for Thalheimer to defend three mutually incompatible theories of truth at once—the Hegelian coherence theory, a crude form of the correspondence theory, and a still cruder form of the predictive theory." But are the theories of coherence, correspondence, and prediction as tests of truth necessarily incompatible?

Materialism insists on the objective existence of the outside world, independent of our judgments concerning it. If that is so, then a test of the truth of those judgments would be the degree of their correspondence with objective reality—the correspondence test of the truth.

If further, the objective world is not static but in a state of flux or change, subject to ascertainable laws, then, in proportion as our judgments or propositions concerning it correspond to objective reality, they will enable us to predict developments. Thus the predictive test is not incompatible with the correspondence test but a more complicated and rigorous form of the same test.

Finally, if the objective universe has sufficient regularity and interconnection in all its parts and aspects, so that discoveries and judgments concerning one aspect throw presumptive light on other aspects, then our propositions will correspondingly tend to have a certain mutual consistency. For example, a proposition which is inconsistent with the law of conservation of energy is suspect and requires further testing. Whether the further testing results in the rejection of the proposition, or its modification, or a refinement of the law of conservation of energy, it should be clear that in any event we are once more applying a special case of the correspondence test of truth.

I will not undertake to prove here the validity of this threefold correspondence test. That would be an abuse of the limits of a simple communication. Dr. Hook's whole difficulty lies in his denial, only partially formulated, of the applicability of dialectical materialism to nature, that is, the denial of the existence of an objective universe, changing according to ascertainable and hence predictable ways.

—BERTRAM D. WOLFE

New York, March 10

SOAP-BOXES ARE IN HOLLYWOOD

Dear Sirs: I am afraid that Morrie Ryskind's Hollywood is too close to the stars. There are soap-boxes in Hollywood, but Morrie, writing at a high salary for pictures and circulating among what might be called the upper bourgeoisie, if you want to get Marxian about it, doesn't know what he is talking about.

I spent three years in Hollywood. I'm going back there soon. New Yorkers talk about politics—yes. New Yorkers heckle Socialists—yes. But give me Californians for a real practical knowledge of political movements, a genuine mass development of social and class consciousness.

The New Yorker, living in a canyon of steel and concrete, feels sure of himself. No red squad will climb up the stairs of his apartment house and break down his door as he discusses politics and economics and revolution. He can drop in on hundreds of radical meetings, some in the open, some indoors, all undisturbed. He can buy his favorite radical newspaper in the subway and can get the latest from Moscow at any newsstand.

The Californian's soap-box is the sidewalk, the soil of the earth, the parlor floor. He hasn't time to climb up above his fellow-man. He can talk to him face to face. And if Morrie Ryskind looks closely, drops his pinochle hand, recalls that radicalism does not consist of saying, "I'm a Socialist," he will find that even in the studios the conflict is far more intense than he believes.

Perhaps, Morrie, you should get a soap-box for yourself. Climb up on it, say something, and see what happens to you. If they let you get away with it and you don't have to go to a hospital for repairs, find out where the local WPA or Unemployed League local is and pit yourself in debate against one of the poor jobless who can't get a contract in the studios.

In your spare moments visit James McShann at Lincoln Heights jail. Meet the jailer, too. He's a pleasant chap who hates political prisoners with a fine patriotic hate. McShann will tell you what it means to get up on a soap-box in Hollywood and demand more and better relief.

Look him up, Morrie. And then write another piece for The Nation.

LEW LEVENSON

New York, March 6

CONTRIBUTORS

CHARLES A. BEARD, formerly professor of politics at Columbia University, is a veteran student of constitutional law and a fighter for freedom.

JOHN GUNTHER has been foreign correspondent for the Chicago Daily News in the Balkans, Austria, and Germany, covering among other things the Reichstag-fire trial. He is the author of "Inside Europe," a survey of critical events and political personalities in current European history.

M. E. RAVAGE, The Nation's Paris correspondent, contributes to this issue the second of his articles on French politics.

KAREN DASH is the pseudonym of the director of a Detroit institute for social work.

ANITA MARBURG was a member of the delegation that investigated the Rutland strike. She is on the faculty of Sarah Lawrence College.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON is associate professor of romance languages at Columbia University. He has written "The Memoirs of Lorenzo da Ponte" and has translated many of Pirandello's plays and stories. His most extensive work was a brilliant translation of Pareto.

ABRAHAM EPSTEIN is executive secretary of the American Association for Social Security and author of "The Challenge of the Aged" and "Insecurity—A Challenge to America."

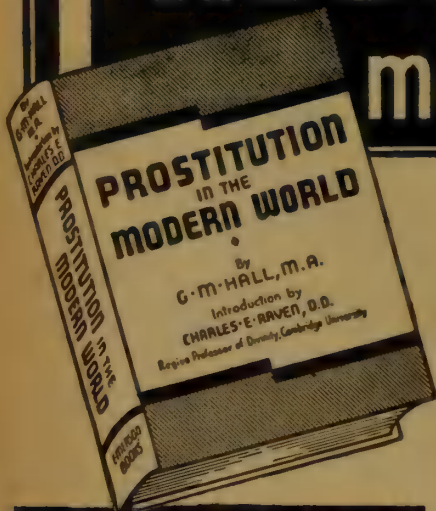

WALTER MILLIS, author of "The Martial Spirit" and "The Road to War," contributed two articles to The Nation last January on the problem of neutrality in the next war.

PEGGY BACON, well known as an etcher, has published two bitingly successful books of satirical drawings accompanied by critiques in prose or verse, entitled "Off with Their Heads" and "Cat-Calls."

LOW is the famous British cartoonist whose interpretations of the political scene have for years enlivened papers from Alaska to Australia.

PROSTITUTION

IN THE MODERN WORLD

By G. M. HALL, M.A.

Introduction by Prof. Charles E. Raven, D.D.

A SURVEY AND A CHALLENGE

INCLUDES:

Magistrate Kross's 7-Point Plan for Handling Prostitutes in New York City, result of a survey requested by Mayor F. H. LaGuardia.

"Before we can hope to eradicate the evil (of prostitution), we must first investigate and comprehend its extent, its varied phenomena, and above all its basic causes."—from the Foreword.

"This book is valuable because it supplies evidence based upon intimate and confidential knowledge—evidence the source of which cannot, on that account, always be quoted."—C. E. Raven, D.D.

FIRST HAND DATA

REVEALING actual case histories from first-hand investigations, the author supplements personal knowledge with official documents from government archives, confidential police reports, court and hospital records, and social welfare agencies—information much of which has never before been available to the public.

"We recommend the book to the attention of (the clergy) and social workers who have to deal at first hand with these pressing social evils."—Church Times.

"An important sociological work."
—New Statesman and Nation.

FREE OFFER

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to

EMERSON BOOKS, INC.

Dept. 387-N

333 Sixth Avenue, New York City

Send "Prostitution in the Modern World" in plain wrapper for free examination. I will deposit with postman $2.00 plus a few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied I may return it within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

☐ Check here if you wish to enclose only $2.00 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. Same money back guarantee.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

PARTIAL CONTENTS

School Girl Victims • Police Connivance • Night Clubs, Dance Halls, "Hostesses" • Stool Pigeons • Amateur vs. Professional Prostitutes • International Immoral Traffic: Four Main Sources of Victims • White Slavery • How Prostitutes Are Recruited.

Magistrate Kross's 7-Point Plan for Handling Prostitutes in New York City, result of a survey requested by Mayor F. H. LaGuardia • Prostitution in College Towns, Seaports • Taxis and Prostitution • Rural Prostitution.

Overcrowding and Prostitution • Contraceptives, Birth Control, Abortion • Houses of Prostitution: Legal and Illegal • The White Slave Mart of the World • Earnings of Prostitutes.

How Girls Become Prostitutes • The Psychology of Prostitution • Prostitution and Venereal Disease • The Prostitute and Abnormal Gratification • Types of Prostitutes.

Forcing Houses of Perversions • The Apartment House Prostitute • The Unsatisfied Husband • Prostitution • "Big Business" • Prostitution and Unmarried Adults • "Oversexedness" and Prostitution • Unemployment and Prostitution • The Pick-up • Motor Cars and Prostitution.

Laws Governing Prostitution • "Dives" • Narcotics and Prostitution • Drug-taking • Exacting Drugs • Accosting by Males • Medical Examination of Prostitutes • Feeble-minded Girls and Prostitution • Migration and Prostitution.

Sex Experience, Repressions and Prostitution • Belief in Male of Sex Relations and Prostitution • Compulsory Prostitution • Women Police • "Office Wives."

Poverty and Prostitution • Government Recognition and Regulation of Prostitution • Aftermaths of Promiscuity • Results of Sexual Abstinence • Classes of Society from Which Prostitutes Are Drawn • First Steps Toward Prostitution • Prostitution and Public Health • Attempts at Suppression • Traveling or Migratory Prostitutes • Six Factors That Make Prostitutes • Desertion and Prostitution • Prostitution in: Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, France, Germany, England, Ireland, U. S., N. Y., N. J., Mass., Iowa, Louisiana, Ala. • Parental Attitudes and Prostitution, and many other subjects.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · APRIL 8, 1936

NUMBER 3692

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

433

EDITORIALS:

AMERICA IS ARMING

436

BOMBING OUT THE MIDDLE CLASS

437

A HARD JOB—ILL DONE

438

IS MUSSOLINI MOVING TOWARD SOCIALISM?

438

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

440

THE SOVIETS FACE THE THREAT OF WAR

by Louis Fischer

442

RED CLAY IN ALABAMA by Carleton Beals

444

THE SECOND JOHNSTOWN FLOOD

by Maxwell S. Stewart

447

GENERAL STRIKE IN DAMASCUS

by Albert Viton

448

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

450

BROUN'S PAGE

451

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

CHARLES BEARD CONFRONTS HIMSELF

by Max Lerner

452

YESTERDAY'S PRODIGIES by Ben Belitt

454

THE ILLUSION OF NEUTRALITY

by Frederick L. Schuman

456

"TAKE WHAT YOU WANT" by Mark Van Doren

457

HIGHBROW SHOCKERS by Mary McCarthy

458

DRAMA: "THE HOLY BLISSFUL MARTYR"

by Joseph Wood Krutch

459

RECORDS: by Henry Simon

460

THE INTELLIGENT TRAVELER

by John Rothschild

462

DRAWINGS: by George Schreiber, LOW,
Gropper, and Stuyvesant Van Veen

The Shape of Things

*

ADOLF HITLER MUST BE GIVEN CREDIT FOR having eliminated the element of uncertainty from the German elections. It had been predicted that he would poll between 98 and 99 per cent of the votes in the national plebiscite on March 29; the "yes" vote was officially reported to be exactly 99 per cent of the total cast. Although the question was ostensibly that of approval of the Hitler regime after three years in office, the immediate issue, the remilitarization of the Rhineland, was one on which no "loyal" German could voice his disapproval. The campaign marked the high point in the Nazis' mastery of mob psychology. Two million people were packed into the streets of Cologne to catch a glimpse of the Führer, of whom 500,000 obtained entry to the Cathedral Square to hear the last of his thirteen speeches. On the previous day Hitler had stood on the chassis of a huge locomotive in the Krupp factory at Essen and addressed 120,000 persons. The few voters who failed to report to the polls by 1 p.m. of election day were visited hourly by loyal Nazis and openly threatened if they failed to cast their ballots. No one will ever know how many Germans were courageous enough, in the face of this overwhelming pressure, to register a protest against National Socialism. Jews were excluded from the polls, and the ballots gave but one choice—an affirmative vote. Yet 543,000 individuals mutilated their ballots in such a way that they were thrown out. Despite announcement that they would be considered invalid, thousands of blank ballots are known to have been counted for Hitler, as were ballots with the Nazi names crossed out. Fascists criticize elections under democracy as a sham and a fraud; if they are, we wonder how a Nazi plebiscite should be described.

*

THE FIRST IMPORTANT MOVE TOWARD A NATIONAL Farmer-Labor Party has been made by the most logical prime mover—the Minnesota party. Its biennial convention, which met in St. Paul on March 27-29, was more than a routine gathering met to put through a platform and steam-roller a state ticket. It was a fateful occasion, for without the indorsement of the powerful Minnesota party any move toward a national party this year would be hopeless from the start. The passage of the resolution indorsing a national movement and calling for further exploration of its possibilities this year was therefore an event of the first importance. No Rubicons have been crossed, however, for the resolution was worded cautiously, and any failure on the part of the national

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

movement to gather momentum would still leave it possible later for Governor Olson and Senator Benson to trade their support of Roosevelt in the national field for Democratic support of the state ticket. If enough farmer and labor groups throughout the country organize on state and local lines to follow Minnesota's example, the next step should be an informal gathering of leaders to plan a national convention. That convention would still confront two difficulties. One is how to handle the problem of red-baiting. In the dispute over the seating of the leftist delegates, the Minnesota group followed Senator Benson's advice: "We have been the victims of red-baiting; I appeal to Farmer-Laborites not to be red-baiters themselves." The other problem is one of platform. The Minnesota platform of ultimate nationalization of the basic industries, social insurance, a curb on the Supreme Court, and a constitutional amendment to allow for social control shows at once realism and discretion.

*

THE TOWNSEND MOVEMENT CONTINUES TO meet with tribulations. First, there is the Congressional investigation by a none too sympathetic House committee. Then there is the internal split in the directing group and the (probably forced) resignation of R. E. Clements, the "organizing genius" of the movement. Finally there is the cruel dilemma of Dr. Townsend as to whether he shall link himself with the uncertain fortunes of Mr. Borah's candidacy or strike out boldly for a third party. The newspapers have seized upon the more dramatic disclosures in Mr. Clements's testimony—his fat salary of $12,585 in addition to the perquisites of house, groceries, maid, and travel expenses, the profits of the Townsend Weekly, the million dollars that has already been collected from Townsend club members. But most of the talk about the "racket" elements in the movement seems in our kind of society a bit hollow. Mr. Clements borrowed from American corporate enterprise not only the secret of successful organization but also a proper respect for high salaries, and the capacity to recognize a good thing when he saw it. Moreover, there is something about the glee with which Democrats and Republicans alike have received the disclosures which suggests that Congressmen, worried by the membership of over 2,000,000 in the Townsend clubs, will use the inquiry to cloak the economic causes of the movement by playing up its racketeering aspects. The real tragedy of the Townsend episode is that Townsendism has genuine roots in the soil of the economic insecurity and economic despair of aged and young alike. These needs, instead of being met by the government, have been left to a few individuals to exploit. The needs remain. What will the government do?

*

AIDED BY THE DIVERSION OF PUBLIC ATTENTION to the more serious problems of European peace, Mussolini has been pushing his Ethiopian campaign with more than usual brutality. The bombardment of the open city of Harar, involving the destruction of an Egyptian and an Ethiopian hospital, was not only in direct violation of international law but was senseless from a military point of view. As in the aerial attack on the primitive village of Jijiga a few weeks ago, the Italians appear to be staking everything on the hope of demoralizing the Ethiopians by a show of superior power. While their armies have undoubtedly made progress in the Tembien region and in the vicinity of Mount Alaji, their claims of crushing victories appear to have been greatly exaggerated. In the south they have moved forward with comparative ease from their base at Ualual about ninety miles to Gorahai and Gerlogubi, but the territory between these points and Harar is believed to be impassable for an army burdened with modern equipment. In the north the situation is not much better. Captain B. H. Liddell Hart, British military expert, declares that after six months of the campaign the Italians have reached a point they could have gained in a few weeks as far as any Ethiopian resistance was concerned. The primary problem of overcoming climatic difficulties, of road building, and of the movement of supplies over an almost impassable terrain has been only partially solved for the short distance that they have advanced. Every additional mile adds complications to this problem. Barring a let-up in sanctions, Mussolini will have his hands full in Ethiopia for many months to come.

*

THE ELEVATOR LOCKOUT CONTINUES IN many buildings; and while the arbitration of wages has begun, the force which is most effective in winning union demands, namely, the crippling of service, is no longer available. Moreover, that force cannot be easily remobilized once it has been dispersed. The real-estate interests held the trump card from the beginning: the funds of the union were limited, while the owners, however bankrupt in the technical sense of the term, were nevertheless in a position to hold out indefinitely against giving building-service workers $8 more a month, even if it meant paying strike-breakers $9 a day. The owners not only won the strike but, having forced a compromise upon the union, proceeded to repudiate even the faint concessions they had made. Unless Ferdinand A. Silcox, the arbitrator, can force upon the owners better terms than Mr. Bambrick could, with thousands of strikers behind him, the elevator strike must be set down as merely another venture in education for workers, labor leaders, and the public.

*

ALTHOUGH THE HOUSE SUBCOMMITTEE WAS forced to make certain concessions to conservative business interests on the Administration's tax program, the amendments have not seriously weakened the measure. According to the new schedule the tax will be imposed on the total rather than on the undivided profits and will be low—4 per cent—as long as the undistributed net income is not over 10 per cent of the total, but will rise to 42½ per cent when more than 57½ per cent of the income is undistributed. While sound tax practice would not have permitted as large reserves as are likely to be accumulated under the subcommittee's schedule, the committee deserves praise for withstanding pressure from such organizations as the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and the National Association of Manufacturers for an even more lenient levy. It also should be given credit for dropping the processing tax in face of pressure from the Administration for its reenactment. Another promising Congressional revolt against Administration policy is reported brewing in connection with appropriations for the PWA. In submitting his budget for relief, the President deliberately ignored the PWA and asked for $1,500,000,000 for the far more dubious activities of the WPA. Supporters of Secretary Ickes are asking for an additional $700,000,000 for his agency. While we are not impressed with Mr. Ickes's record as an administrator, we can whole-heartedly indorse his present plea. Abandonment of the PWA at this juncture would not only be disastrous for recovery, but would mark the end of all slum-clearance and low-cost-housing projects.

*

THE RENEWAL OF JAPANESE ATTACKS against the outposts of the Mongolian People's Republic has interrupted the slow improvement in Soviet-Japanese relations which has been under way in the past few months. Prior to the recent outbreaks the Hirota government had accepted the Soviet plea for a border commission to investigate the cause of the disputes and, if necessary, to demarcate the frontier once again. But Hirota is apparently no better able to control the local militarists than was his predecessor. Between March 25, when the Soviet proposal was accepted, and March 30 five serious skirmishes occurred along the Soviet-Mongolian border, four of which appear to have been attacks upon Mongolia and the fifth a Japanese sortie into Siberia. Spurred by the new threat against its territory, the Mongolian Republic has ratified a mutual-assistance agreement with the Soviet Union which removes all uncertainty regarding Russia's attitude in the event of a Japanese invasion. Since during six months of the year no fighting can be done, the danger of war is greatest in the spring. Nevertheless, there is one factor, in addition to those discussed by Louis Fischer elsewhere in this issue, which makes such an outcome unlikely. The presence of a large portion of the Chinese Red Army in northern Shansi, only a short distance from the Peifing-Kalgan railway, makes it practically impossible for the Japanese to attack Ulan Butor from the south, and constitutes a reasonably good insurance against war.

*

IT IS DIFFICULT TO SEE HOW ANY ONE EXCEPT shipbuilders and armament manufacturers can derive any particular satisfaction from the naval treaty signed by the United States, Great Britain, France, and the British Dominions. Two great naval powers, which happen also to be among the chief threats to international peace—Italy and Japan—have refused to sign the agreement. The other powers are bound only so long as Rome and Tokyo make no attempt to expand their fleets beyond the limits prescribed in the pact. Both the United States and Britain are free to go ahead with their recently announced building programs. On the other hand, it may be argued that even a bad agreement is better than none, and that there is some value in the cordial understanding reached between the United States and the United Kingdom. Nor is it possible to ignore the financial savings to be gained from substituting 8,000-ton cruisers for the present costly 10,000-ton vessels. These gains are more than offset, however, by the conference's failure to establish a satisfactory balance of naval power either in Europe or the Far East. What stability exists at the moment rests entirely on the cooperation of the powerful American and British fleets. Such an arrangement comes far closer to a military alliance than the type of collective security which alone can promise protection against a perpetuation of the war system.

*

ON ITS WAY TO THE SUPREME COURT THE Labor Relations Act has been having as many adventures as Alice in a judicial wonderland. The lower federal courts have by now handed down 27 decisions on the act, 16 for the government and 11 against it. Of these, most have merely passed on the granting or denial of injunctions or restraining orders directed to the Labor Board. Five have tackled the question of the constitutionality of the act, three holding it valid and two invalid. The two most recent decisions—an unfavorable one by Judge Barnes in the Bendix Aviation case, and a favorable one by Judge Bondy in the Associated Press case—do not add to our clarity. Judge Barnes holds, as Judge Otis did in an earlier case, that for the federal government to guarantee collective bargaining means to strip employers of their liberty of contract and to deprive them of property without due process of law. Judge Bondy on the other hand sustains the statement of Congress that industrial unrest and chaos are a burden on interstate commerce, thus bringing collective bargaining within the scope of the federal power. Again the Supreme Court is presented with two plausible and contradictory lines of argument and precedent, and again the decision—which will probably be rendered in the Greyhound Bus case—will depend on how the judges feel about labor. The employers, as Paul Ward points out in this week's Washington dispatch, have made their own attitude toward labor plain enough for anyone to read. The members of the Labor Board are getting a first-rate education in the full extent of industrial tyranny wherever the employer, in addition to being profit-taker, also exercise a feudal power over his workers.

*

THE SYRIAN GENERAL STRIKE, DESCRIBED BY Mr. Viton elsewhere in this issue, has apparently ended in a victory for the Syrians. The strike lasted forty-two days, and in spite of the arrest of hundreds of participants, the wounding of other hundreds, and the death of twenty-six, it was firmly maintained until a satisfactory settlement was reached. On February 24 High Commissioner de Martel announced that France was ready to negotiate a treaty with Syria modeled on the treaty between Great Britain and Iraq. It is expected, perhaps too optimistically, that all the demands of the Syrian Nationalists will be granted and that a new status for Syria will commence by the end of 1936 or the beginning of 1937. There should be a lesson in this for oppressors and oppressed alike. It is impossible indefinitely to subdue a whole people against their will; and even machine-guns are not effective against mass resistance.

★

CARLETON BEALS, ON ANOTHER PAGE, PRESENTS the results of a first-hand investigation of the Administration's project to "rehabilitate" destitute farmers in the region of Birmingham, Alabama. In another connection Paul Ward reports a conference held in Washington by the National Committee on Rural Social Planning at which representatives of the submerged sections of our farm population, the share-cropper and the day laborer, gave graphic testimony about what the farm-relief program had done not for but to them. The tales of eviction, hunger, denial of relief, and persecution for union activities which have become familiar to Nation readers were spread before the Department of Agriculture itself. It is recorded in the Washington Merry-Go-Round that the evicted share-croppers have been denied help because the Arkansas relief officials are appointed through Senator Robinson. The Senator sees eye to eye with landlords, and the Administration does not care to oppose a politician as powerful as Joe Robinson. That may explain what is happening in Arkansas. But what explains the attitude of Rexford Tugwell, who is directly responsible for the so-called rehabilitation program which Carleton Beals describes? A few weeks ago Mr. Tugwell denied in the pages of The Nation similar charges made by Tom Burke. But the findings of Mr. Beals bear out the thesis of Tom Burke in every particular. Mr. Beals is willing to submit to Mr. Tugwell additional details if protection is assured to those from whom he obtained his data.

America Is Arming

QUIETLY, unobtrusively, without the fanfare that has accompanied its other acts, the Roosevelt Administration has been preparing for war. Last week the Senate passed the War Department appropriation bill, adding some $66,000,000 to the $545,000,000 bill that the House had passed, and bringing the total army appropriation to $611,362,604. The navy-appropriation bill runs now to $549,591,299. This means an appropriation for land and sea forces of $1,160,953,903. It represents a 60 per cent increase over last year's appropriation of $744,839,588, which in turn was a 50 per cent increase over the $533,597,243 appropriated for the preceding year. Nor is this all. The allotments made during the past year from federal public works and relief funds for the purposes of the military establishment, although difficult to estimate, run probably from a quarter to three-quarters of a billion dollars. If this continues, an estimate of a billion and a half to two billion dollars would be a fair measure of what we shall be spending during the coming year to keep the god of war in trim.

These are cold figures, and one does not need to add to their eloquence. Cold figures are as eloquent as cold steel, especially when the figures are such as will eventually turn into the steel of bayonets and battleships. But it is worth noting that America is now the proud possessor of the largest peace-time war budget that any country has or has had in the history of the world.

Mars is a costly god and bids fair to become the American god. But the war appropriations do not tell the whole story of how we are preparing for war. In terms of manpower the so-called small standing army is being brought to the highest level of peace-time strength. Oswald Garrison Villard has pointed out that there are already 485,500 regular and National Guard soldiers and sailors in service. To these he adds 209,900 reserves, bringing the total to 695,400 in uniform. We are now building more naval bases and air bases and armories, training more officers and reserves, building more ships and airplanes, making more war gases and gas masks than ever before. America is building—but what it is chiefly building is weapons of destruction for the war to come. We may not be expert at planning for plenty in our economic life and utilizing our peace-time resources to the full. But we are being fearfully efficient in laying elaborate plans for the fateful M-day, the day of mobilization. We have an elaborate army plan not only for the conscription of military manpower, but for economic conscription as well. The War Department has set up a complete system of industrial quotas, allocating to each industrial establishment the amount of war supplies that it will be expected to furnish according to a schedule. The contracts are as good as made. All that remains is for the war to break out.

There is a deadly meaning in all these plans and preparations, all these blueprints, all this building and spending. That meaning is war. But what pulls and pressures have been at work here can only be guessed at. Certainly it is not the needs of national defense. The purposes of national defense could be met with one-third the present expenditures. We have been swept up in the European war hysteria. The constant talk of an impending European war has undoubtedly given the American general staffs and American statesmen the military jitters. Much closer home is our fear of a Japanese war—a fear whose flames have been lit and are being persistently fanned by Mr. Hearst's newspaper campaign. To that must be added the pressure exerted here as in every country by the War Department and the general staffs—a pressure that is a compound of bureaucratic pride, professional jealousies, narrowness of world outlook, and the sheer desire to play with toys that you have gone to infinite trouble in making. One of the great dangers in having the whole industrial establishment of the country ready for conscription is that it gives the War Department the sense of security which makes its pressures on Congress and the President all the greater. Add the pressures from professional patrioteers and from the industrialists and lobbyists, whose puppets they are. One of the most active fields for lobbying is the field of war orders. The contracts are fat, the prices are generous, the turnover is great. Here, also, lies the greatest danger, for it is unthinkable that a group of industrialists with War Department contracts already made out would not in a period of industrial stringency feel highly tempted to get the benefit of those contracts. Finally, there is the recurring theme of the use to which an efficient military establishment could be put in any case of civil disturbance. The Japanese phantom is not the only one that our imagination has conjured up; there is also the red-scare phantom. The fact that the army and the National Guard, as the naked power of the state, can be turned against labor struggles is certainly not the least of what recommends the recent army appropriations to those who approve them.

America is arming—arming not for national defense but for a war that is far from the real purposes of the American people. In a period of our history in which militarism cannot help playing havoc with our national destiny, we are going in for militarism. The militaristic effect of all these preparations on our modes of thought is inevitable. And yet the problems which agitate American life and split American society are not problems that can be met by the mind of the soldier or the point of the bayonet. They are problems of economic organization and statecraft, of technological planning, of human understanding. They require cool wits and the large view. They require above all else keeping our civil liberties open. When the role of the War Department grows so monstrous in our expenditures and our activities, every one of these aims is defeated. There can be no doubt—and every observer who has traveled around the country testifies to it—that at heart the American people still desire peace more than they desire anything else. These war preparations are a defiant challenge to that wish for peace—an insult thrown straight at the faces of the people. The one thing that ought to be remembered by every American in and out of the national administration is not only that a war prepared for so thoroughly is a war whose coming is thereby facilitated. Even more than that the fatal fact is that at the moment of the outbreak of war America will be thrown into a state of virtual fascism with labor conscripted, collective bargaining outlawed, civil liberties suspended, thought and action regimented. From such a state of virtual fascism our culture may never recover.

Bombing Out the Middle Class

THE recent hearings on the bill to repeal the Teachers' Oath Law in Massachusetts have proved the efficacy of the oath in turning college professors into rebels—a result the reactionary legislators could hardly have intended. A veritable War of Independence was fought with all of Boston either taking part or looking on. Broad sides of passion, eloquence, logic, ridicule were all fired at the law by the biggest of academic shots. But despite this unanimous support of the repeal bill, it is still in committee, and both the temper of the hearings and the composition of the House make its adoption unlikely.

Viewed pragmatically, teachers' oaths may prove a most effective weapon in the current fight for human rights, bringing to the front several divisions which might have preferred to sit tight in academic dugouts in a hundred university towns. To many persons, especially students and teachers, the oaths have appeared as a startling symbol of repression, a warning that in small but menacing ways "it" is already happening here.

When a striker is beaten up by armed guards, when a Communist charged with sedition is imprisoned for twenty years, when vigilantes kidnap a union organizer or smash a radical meeting place, the echoes of these acts of terror die out quickly in the peaceful corridors of our schools and colleges. Indeed, to most middle-class persons, liberal as well as conservative, such events are at worst casualties inflicted on a remote battlefield. He who does not feel the chain when it works a brother's pain is the ordinary man in the street or on the university campus—and his name is Legion. He is prone to think that such outrages are isolated, infrequent, unrelated, without serious significance. He will not face the fact that every denial of civil right is a direct threat to his own personal liberty and to the guaranties on which it rests.

The teachers' oath laws in some twenty states have bombed out of their shelters thousands of such men and women. Led by a few who from the first have realized the dangers implicit in the law, teachers in schools and colleges are mobilizing a belated but sturdy and almost unanimous resistance. And everywhere they have won the support of the students in their institutions and the more sophisticated groups in their communities. The middle class begins to scent trouble.

Not that the protest against the oath implies any fundamental social choice or even a clear realization of the nature of the threat. On the contrary, the chief emotion of the majority of protestants is resentment at the "imputation of disloyalty" in the oath laws, the suggestion that teachers might also be radicals. And behind this sense of injured innocence lurks a further feeling of outrage that members of a learned calling should be held to account for their words and acts by politicians representing a noisy rabble of legionnaires, professional patriots, and the yellow press. Those who have taken the next step and identified themselves with the jailed Communist or the terrorized picket are relatively few. But the identity is there; and the protest is shaped out of the same sound impulse in both cases. After all, armies are never made up of altruists. Only a few men fought for woman suffrage; only a handful of Gentiles will work with genuine zeal for the rescue of the German Jews. As long as repression, however widespread, is aimed chiefly at workers and avowed radicals, the middle class will inevitably minimize its importance or deny its existence. But when the stink bombs begin to drop in the academic trenches the troops tumble out and become aware that a war is actually on. And in this particular war, whether either of them likes it or not, President Conant and Angelo Herndon are enlisted in the same service—along with all the rest of us whose right to speak or publish our undictated opinion has been challenged or abolished.

A Hard Job—Ill Done

THERE are roughly a million persons unemployed in New York City. About half of these are at present on the relief rolls, and this 500,000 is about equally divided between work relief and home relief. The average work-relief wage is $72.23 a month, which usually represents the total income of a family; the range is from $55 to $103, with most of the WPA workers falling in the lower brackets. The cost of living in New York is higher than in any other section of the country; rents are approximately 20 per cent higher. In other words, while New York's relief rates are $20 above the national average, they must be spread out just as thin to cover the necessities of life. And on top of these facts the WPA office has announced that 40,000 workers must be dropped from the rolls by July 1.

It is clear, then, that the administration of relief in a city of seven millions is an arduous and probably a thankless task. An ideal relief administrator would have to be a man of superhuman powers, of inordinate courage and wisdom, and completely disinterested. Such men do not grow on trees ready for the plucking. We must be content with a reasonable working compromise, but one may seriously doubt that Victor F. Ridder, the present incumbent, is even a compromise. Mr. Ridder does not appear to be in any way the man for the job.

Mr. Ridder suffers from "demonstration" troubles. His relief workers have grievances. Since they are paid less than a living wage, have no security of tenure, and are all too often performing work inferior to that for which they have skill and experience, their grievances are understandable enough. They are attempting to organize themselves into a union, which as workers they have every right to do. There is no law which forbids relief workers the recourse of collective bargaining. As union members they form committees; they make speeches, wave flags, picket the relief offices. Once in a while they get into a fracas with the police—which for union pickets is comparatively easy. One or two of them have gone so far as to bite a policeman. With the exception of the last named, which is, to say the least, unsanitary, there is nothing in their activities that is not perfectly legal and proper—or legal and unavoidable. But what does Mr. Ridder do? About twice a week he issues a statement denouncing all relief protestants as reds and agitators, declares that the committees seeking to interview him are not bona fide PWA workers, fills his offices with armed guards, and as a last spectacular gesture sends the Black Maria up to the tenth floor of the Port Authority building to arrest ten men and women who are committing the horrendous crime of singing the "Star Spangled Banner" in the corridors.

If this seems to be taking the New York relief situation more frivolously than is fitting, it should be said at once that Mr. Ridder himself has contributed the atmosphere of low comedy. The mass meeting of 25,000 persons in February at which Representative Marcantonio figured indicates that Mr. Ridder is the victim of a Communist psychosis; all he had to say about the violent dispersal of the meeting by policemen with clubs in their hands was again that "outside agitators" and "Communists" had caused the trouble. He is evidently incapable of realizing how much his own acts contribute to an unhappy situation. Relief workers are faced with a threat of a steady curtailment of the federal relief program. It is admitted that the states and cities are incapable of increasing their already heavy load. And it is illuminating to learn that in New York the total case load of all private charitable agencies is at present something less than 8,000. In the face of such bitter insecurity, both physical and psychological, relief workers are special cases, and it is obvious that Mr. Ridder is incapable of handling them. He is behaving like a typical fascist autocrat. The sooner he is removed the better.

Is Mussolini Moving Toward Socialism?

CONSERVATIVES in this country have been impressed, and not a little frightened, by Mussolini's recently announced intention of nationalizing many of Italy's key industries. Having been accustomed to look upon fascism as a bulwark against bolshevism, they have suddenly become obsessed by the fear that after all Mussolini may simply be a Comintern agent in disguise.

There is just enough basis for their anxiety to create considerable confusion on the subject among liberals as well as Tories. Italian fascism is not as completely reactionary as it is sometimes pictured in the émigré press; if it were, Mussolini would not have been able to hold popular support for as long as he has. Mussolini has renounced and apparently forgotten his old Socialist sympathies, yet he is too shrewd a politician to lose sight of the appeal of equalitarian catchwords. He has never ceased to speak of making the workers "collaborators with capital," and of the necessity of a "higher social justice." His program for a "corporative state," though hardly radical, has been bitterly opposed by employer groups on the ground that workers should have no influence in determining policy.

But in contrast to these fine phrases and the paper organizations guaranteeing labor "equality" with capital, it is significant that no real attempt has been made in the fourteen years of Fascist rule to correct the existing maldistribution of wealth or to improve working-class living standards. Even such an elementary reform measure as progressive taxation is virtually non-existent. The bulk of the government's revenue is obtained through heavy levies on consumption goods. The ordinary income tax is not graduated and it is paid by all groups in the population. There is a small surtax but it starts at 1 per cent on incomes of 3,000 lire ($240) and rises to a maximum of 10 per cent on incomes of 1,000,000 lire ($80,000) or over. Real wages have declined from 15 to 20 per cent since the March on Rome.

In the absence of specific information it is difficult to say to what degree Il Duce's latest step may be called "socialistic." No action has yet been taken, and it is not clear how or when Il Duce is planning to proceed. It has not even been suggested that the owners should be expropriated. If the procedure adopted in the recent seizure of the banks is any criterion, we may assume that the stockholders will be adequately compensated. Some losses may occur, but the heavy selling of war stocks three days before Mussolini's speech indicates that many of the big investors were tipped off in advance.

The real point of issue, however, is whether Il Duce's latest move represents considered policy or whether it was forced on him by desperate economic conditions at home. While the threat of a general European war may have hurried his decision, we may assume that this was not the primary motivating force. The domestic economic crisis is known to be extremely severe, although it has been impossible to obtain reliable economic statistics for Italy since the beginning of the Ethiopian campaign. No information is available on the cost of the war, or on the effect of sanctions on the national economy. We do know, however, that the gold reserve has continued to decline, and that the purchases of foreign goods have been reduced to a minimum. Wholesale prices have increased by 20 per cent in the past year, while agricultural wages have remained stationary and those of industrial workers have risen by less than 4 per cent. Despite the draft of men for the African war, there were over 600,000 unemployed at the last report. In the absence of glowing stories from the Italian press agents, we are justified in assuming that the rate of economic deterioration has been greatly accelerated in the past six months. Nationalization of industry would be the logical step in the face of a threatened breakdown of capitalist production.

The reactionary nature of Fascist economic policy stands out in full clarity when one considers Mussolini's speech as a whole. Though the attempt to establish greater self-sufficiency has been one of the primary causes of Italy's decline, Mussolini reaffirms his desire to make the country economically "independent." For some countries economic self-sufficiency might offer a degree of security, but for Italy it can only mean the direst economic stringency for the masses. The abolition of the Chamber of Deputies and the strengthening of the Council of Corporations indicate that the broad outlines of Fascist policy are unchanged. The state remains all-powerful, but it has made no attempt to curb the wealth or the power of the owning class. Nationalization of a few industries will mean a transfer of investment for a limited number of individuals, but it will not greatly affect the possibilities for exploitation by the capitalist class as a whole. Land ownership remains in private hands, as does the bulk of industry and agriculture. Capitalism in Italy has unquestionably been weakened by the cumulative effect of the depression, war preparations, sanctions, and a suicidal commercial policy, but there is a wide gap between collapse and socialism. If Italy is ever to throw off the shackles of capitalism, it will not be under the auspices of a political gangster whose sole ambition is to restore the glories of the Roman Empire—with himself as Caesar.

HITLER'S GOOD FAITH IS EVIDENT

From L'Humanité

Has he not executed the Treaty of Locarno?

His factories are busy working for peace.

He seeks to bring happiness to his people.

Thanks to him, order reigns in Germany.

The Rhineland occupation was only a symbolic gesture and when war comes, it will only be a symbolic war.

As for his friends of the French Right, are they ready to apply the methods he uses so successfully in Germany.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

THE LEARNED MR. SAPOSS

J WARREN MADDEN, the obscure Pittsburgh lawyer whom President Roosevelt selected a few months ago to head the National Labor Relations Board, is rapidly acquiring a liberal education at public expense. He started out to steer his bark into a judicial calm. In a speech he made on taking office he sought to reassure the nation's employers and so win their cooperation in the enforcement of the Wagner Labor Act, which the NLRB was set up to administer. He succeeded only in enraging labor leaders, who thought that Madden, by emphasizing the act's weaknesses, had nipped in the bud a new organizing campaign such as they had waged in 1933 under the temporary stimulus of Section 7-a. Then, having learned his first lesson, he made a more forceful speech before the National Association of Manufacturers, appealing to their sense of fair play. He discovered that they had none, and that their officers had taken advantage of his own sense of fair play to scan his manuscript in advance and prepare an immediate rebuttal, which was exploded in his face.

Next came the lesson that completed Madden's undergraduate training in industrial relations. He presided at the hearing of the Fruehauf Trailer Company case at Detroit and heard company officials testify that they had hired a Pinkerton agent, J. N. Wheeler, to pass as one of their employees, spy upon their men, become a member of the union and eventually its treasurer, and use that vantage point to prevent a strike. When Madden heard that "Treasurer" Wheeler was even then short in his union accounts, he lost his aloofness and boomed out that under the circumstances it was the company itself that actually owed the union money. The statement brought company counsel to their feet, protesting it was complete proof that the board was prejudiced. Their thunderings left Madden unimpressed, and from that day forward he has been what he should have been in the beginning—a man who never forgets that in the constant conflict between employer and employee the odds, already heavily weighted in the employer's favor, are made more so when Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce jurisprudence is substituted for the picket line, boycott, and brickbat. Day by day, as new reports by trial examiners reach his desk, he is learning more and more of the slimy tricks by which employers, large and small, thwart the efforts of their men to organize so that they may gain some control over the conditions under which they must work, eat, sleep, breed, and die.

Dave Saposs, that cathedral of labor learning, who has been retained as director of the board's research and statistical section, could have told Madden all these things in advance, but it is probably best that the chairman should learn them by personal experience. Saposs certainly could have prepared him for his latest lesson—the discovery that federal law is so completely without meaning in the sovereign state of Arkansas that hayseed county judges do not hesitate to enjoin its functions and civic leaders do not balk at running its agents out of town. The discovery was made in the first instance by Robert B. Watts, a former Wall Street lawyer, who is now a top-flight member of the NLRB's legal division. Watts has just filed with Madden and his fellow board members, Edwin S. Smith and John M. Carmody, a preliminary report on a case at Warren, Arkansas.

He told how the leading citizens of Warren joined in an attempt to prevent the board from investigating a complaint that the town's sole manufacturing industry, the Bradley Lumber Company, was violating the Wagner act; how the mayor, the sheriff, and the town marshal joined in that campaign; and how the company, failing in its attempt to get a federal District Court or the Circuit Court of Appeals to block the investigation, successfully got a County Court to enjoin the federal agency. Finally, he told how the County Court injunction, signed without notice to the government at the jurist's home Sunday night, March 15, was served upon Watts and his colleagues as the hearing began the next morning; how the wives of company straw bosses, packing the hearing room, jeered and hissed and laughed at the helplessness of the federal government's representatives; and how he had to charter a bus and secretly transport all the witnesses in the case to New Orleans, where the hearing was held a few days ago. It is to be resumed there in a few days to take testimony showing that immediately after the Supreme Court's NRA decision the Bradley Lumber Company so cut wages that it was able to quote prices that undermined the Northwest's lumber industry and led to the strikes there last year. The company, employing from 700 to 800 men, is one of the largest of its kind in the South.

A detailed résumé of Watts's report would have to take note of the difficulty he and his aides encountered in getting a place to stay in Warren; of the intimidation practiced by the company not only against witnesses who were its own employees but also against the local railroad freight agents, whose records were subpoenaed; of the fifty discharges resorted to by the company in order to smash the union which the men had organized without outside assistance or urging; and of the fact that, when foiled in their efforts to block the hearing, the company's representatives boycotted the proceedings. There would have to be a footnote to the effect that the NLRB's records contain numerous cases from which this one is distinguished only by the fact that intimidation was exerted against the board itself. The case also is distinguished by the fact that it represents the first instance in which the agents of a state have so forcefully taken sides with a private employer against the federal government as to drive the agents of the government into another state.

IT IS pertinent to note that the state to which the NLRB is obnoxious is likewise the state in which the campaign of vigilante terrorism against the share-cropper and tenant-farmer unions has been most virulent. It is also the state that has provided the New Deal with its Senate floor leader, Joseph T. Robinson, a hog-caller who missed his calling. These circumstances combine to suggest that Arkansas would make an excellent starting place for the impending Senatorial investigation of all the more acute manifestations of incipient fascism in this country. A resolution directing the Senate Education and Labor Committee to "make an investigation of violations of the right of free speech and assembly and undue interference with the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively" has been introduced by Senator La Follette and referred for consideration to a subcommittee which he heads.

Hearings are soon to be held on whether the resolution should be adopted by the Senate, and they will provide almost as large a field for the taking and publicizing of testimony on the question of violations of civil liberties as a full-fledged investigation. In fact, that is what the forces behind the resolution had in mind when they conspired with Senator La Follette to introduce it. Their plans have been laid carefully and if they are not upset by La Follette's colleagues on the subcommittee—Murphy of Iowa and Thomas of Utah—they will result in a mass of evidence compelling the Senate to authorize a real investigation by a committee empowered to sit during the recesses of Congress, subpoena witnesses and records, and draft remedial legislation. In the preparation of the case for such an investigation and in the prosecution of the investigation itself, La Follette will have his first major opportunity to prove himself a worthy son of his father and a man fit for national leadership.

The NLRB's records with their copious evidence of labor espionage are to be tapped first in the impending hearings. Then the church groups, Jew and Gentile, are to be heard, followed by the representatives of such organizations as the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Anti-Semitism, lynch law, Ku Kluxery, and the nicer forms of fascism practiced by the overlords of our universities and colleges against free-thinking students and faculty members are at last to have the sort of day in court that they deserve. In the process the federal government will not escape its rightful share of excommunication, according to present plans, for at the tail end of the hearings are to come the spokesmen for the cotton sharecroppers, the sugar-beet workers, the Ohio onion pickers, the Jersey vegetable and fruit workers, and all those other millions of agricultural laborers to whom the New Deal's farm-relief plans seem never to apply.

Representatives of those veritable New Deal phenomena, the farm-labor unions, have just completed a two-day conference here with officials of the AAA, WPA, and Resettlement Administration. The conference, arranged by the National Committee on Rural Social Planning, was singularly unproductive. It served only to place on public exhibit the almost psychopathic fear of the New Deal's luminaries that the nation's farm hands, tenant farmers, and share-croppers may by collective effort attain sufficient power to force the government to choose between them and their exploiters, the landlords of the South and West, to whom the Administration looks for the votes necessary to its reelection. They made no promises, and around the specific cases laid before them of AAA, WPA, and RA field agents conniving with the farm-belt Legrees against the croppers and farm hands they danced like dervishes, seeking only to avoid contact with the facts. The high pandrums of the WPA carried their tremors to the point of absenting themselves from the conference, and Secretary Wallace, when cornered on the question of the farm hand's and tenant farmer's right to live, could deliver himself of only a warning: "Frankly, that's dynamite," he said.

BRIEFER Mention. The Administration's anxiety to keep farm production curtailed and benefit checks pouring out to farmers has provided a ludicrous spectacle here. The AAA rushed out an announcement of the new farm program before its officials had agreed upon or understood clearly how the program was to work. Secretary Wallace and his aides blushed and joined in the laughter when they found their own explanations of the thirteen-page announcement in frequent conflict during an hour-long press conference at which they tried one explanation after another. Having to pretend that the "soil-conservation" program is not essentially the same as the outlawed "adjustment" program was the cause of all their difficulties. . . . Bilbo, who was expected to succeed Huey Long as the Senate's oratorical ball of fire, delivered his maiden speech a few days ago. The Kingfish's shoes are still empty. Bedecked in a gray suit, diamond horseshoe stickpin, green tie, purple pocket handkerchief, and white gardenia, Bilbo spoke for five and a half hours and succeeded only in emptying the galleries.

The Soviets Face the Threat of War

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, March 1

THE Soviet Union is the only country in Europe where intensive armament activity coincides with a sharp rise in the living standards of the nation. The tremendous sacrifices made by every Soviet citizen during the first Five-Year Plan (1929-32) today pay a dividend not only in the form of more consumption but also in security for Russia against attack. The Soviet Union, thanks to its new industries, has become a military giant. Yet the diversion of energy and materials to the making of expensive weapons of destruction is regrettable, and but for it the U. S. S. R. would be much farther along. However, there is a cardinal difference between the war preparations of the Soviets and of other countries. A considerable part of Russia's defense activities consists in building peace-time instruments which enhance its military might. Thus tractor factories are required to raise agricultural yield, mechanize farming, and foster collectivization; but they can also make tanks. Siberia must have railways to exploit its fabulous natural resources; those same railways are a bulwark against invasion. In Russia enlarged industrial capacity yields military strength as a by-product. Elsewhere countries whose difficulties arise from excess industrial capacity are forced to swell it solely for war purposes. The expense to their economies, accordingly, is heavier than appears in budgetary figures. The work of upbuilding, begun in Soviet Russia seven years ago, continues unabated, indeed, is being accelerated. It warrants the prediction that before many years Russia's value as a diplomatic partner and ally will be vastly higher than it is today. The realization of this is dawning in the West.

A strong Russia strengthens collective security and helps to avert war. The Bolsheviks do not need a war, would only be disturbed by a war. The proof of it is simple; they say to the nations, if we become aggressive you can all unite to stop us. Let us unite similarly against any government which attacks one of us. In such unity lies the greatest possible measure of war prevention.

Soviet acceptance of the collective-security principle has lent firmness to the League of Nations and encouraged the advocates of peace and the defenders of the status quo. To the Russians the unfortunate European status quo was formerly as repugnant as the League of Nations. The League was the symbol and tail of Versailles. It represented the humiliation of defeated Germany. But it ceased to do that when Hitler annulled Versailles. Hitler thus opened the door to Russia's entry into the League. Hitler's first step was negative—he erased the irksome discriminations imposed by the peace treaty. His next step was aggressive—he made Germany a threat to world tranquillity. Any attempt to revise the map of Europe means war. In such an event Germany—if internal social difficulties did not intervene—would be more than a match for any single European power. The safety of the European powers, therefore, lies in combinations which will offset Germany's superiority. This is the germ idea of collective security. This is the chief reason why the Nazis object to collective security.

The only practical alternative to collective security is madly intensified military preparations to meet any contingency. Moscow has earnestly endeavored to put iron into the League's blood and to cement its ties with London, Paris, and the Little Entente. But because it cannot fully trust in the aid the powers may give at a critical moment, it places final reliance on its own armed forces. (All League members which can afford it are pursuing a similar policy.)

The great defense problem of the U. S. S. R. is the 38,000 miles of its sea and land frontier and the 6,000 miles which separate its eastern from its western boundary. These tremendous distances preclude rapid and appreciable transfers of men or equipment from one front to another, and necessitate the maintenance of two huge army establishments, the first to cope with a possible Japanese offensive, the second to guard the Finnish-Estonian-Latvian-Polish-Rumanian line. Though all these matters are extremely difficult to gauge, it is almost certain that Japan will not dare to attack the formidable Soviet position in the Far East unless it is confident of cooperation against the Bolsheviks from a Western power. Despite the length of the Soviet-Manchurian frontier, steel-concrete fortifications and several hundred thousand soldiers supplied with the best modern arms would seriously impede a Japanese incursion. And any Soviet-Japanese war would be extremely expensive and menacing to Japan. Manchuria is still full of "bandits"; China is seething, impotently but seething nevertheless. A disaffected rear could easily create an ugly situation for a Japanese army bent on advancing into Siberia or Outer Mongolia. Moreover, Soviet aeroplanes can bomb the inflammable cities of Japan. Some experts dispute this. The Japanese, whose information is of the best, fear it.

In recent months numerous grave affrays have occurred on the Soviet-Manchurian and Mongolian-Manchurian frontiers. They could conceivably lead to war but probably will not. No Japanese national interest is involved in these disputed areas. The difficulty is adjustable through local commissions or diplomatic negotiations, and since both parties seem to be impressed with the seriousness of the situation there is reason to suppose that an open conflict can be averted. Certain Tokyo circles may have welcomed anti-Soviet action and foreign tension as a fitting accompaniment to parliamentary election and budget debate, but wiser counsels decry this playing with fire. A large body of public opinion in Japan and many prominent statesmen want peace with the U. S. S. R., because war might be national suicide and because Japan can get as much territory as it wants in China, where it has as yet met no Chinese resistance and surprisingly little Anglo-American opposition. Nevertheless, militant Japanese elements yearn for an opportunity to strike at Siberia or Outer Mongolia. These elements do not dominate today, but an unfortunate incident might be exploited by them to stimulate national hysteria and suddenly plunge the country into war.

Even an eventual settlement on the frontiers, however, would not eliminate the perpetual explosiveness of the Soviet-Japanese situation. Japanese moderates with whom I have had interviews in Europe admit that those persons in Japan and Manchoukuo who today are powerless to precipitate a Soviet war might quickly gain the upper hand if Germany and Poland took the offensive. In such a conjuncture the temptation for the Japanese to participate would be well-nigh irresistible. Just as the Japanese might readily avail themselves of the opportunity afforded by a Western invasion, so the Germans might be glad to follow if Japan struck first. That being the case, it would be much better for them to agree in advance on coordinated if not necessarily simultaneous action. Whether or not a German-Japanese alliance exists, this is the logic of German-Japanese collaboration. A Soviet-German war or a Soviet-Japanese war would inevitably become both, and then the powers wedded to the status quo would have to choose between intervention and a possible strengthening of two major revisionist nations. Faced by a mighty adversary on either flank, the U. S. S. R., if unaided, would obviously be hard put. Any weakening of Russia—and of course Russia's defeat—would result in a disastrous European situation for England and France and in a threatening Asiatic situation for England and America. Even the assumed setback to the world Communist movement would not counterbalance this great disadvantage. The U. S. S. R., France, England, and America therefore are natural partners. Indeed, despite the sensational nature of the Soviet-Japanese border engagements, the main direction of Japan's forward trend is into China, where British interests are more vitally involved than Soviet interests. It is not difficult to imagine a combination of circumstances in which Britain would be happy to enjoy Soviet cooperation in the Far East.

Relations between England and Russia have improved and will probably improve further. It has been the central aim of German diplomacy to prevent this evolution. Berlin has made no secret of it. Germany wants to win British friendship today that it may thereby deter England from entering a war against Germany tomorrow. With England neutral, France is weaker and Germany is master. And the more military strength Germany has and the nearer it draws to Italy, Japan, Poland, and Hungary, the more London and Paris will fear it and the more they will cultivate Moscow. Moscow, Paris, and London form a natural triangle, and if its legs are firm it can prevent war. In the intervening period—before it is ready to commit itself to this policy of war prevention—Britain will endeavor not to antagonize Germany and yet maintain good relations with the Kremlin. But any doubt as to Britain's ultimate attitude encourages warlike tendencies in Europe. To discourage them and to buttress the status quo the Kremlin is prepared to consider sympathetically any new scheme for European collective security and would even guarantee Austria's independence if the Austrians wanted it and if a suitable formula could be found. If Italy grows too weak or too bitter to participate in the Anglo-French front, Russia's role in Central European affairs will become a more active one.

LIFE IS JUST ONE DARNED JACK-IN-THE-BOX AFTER ANOTHER.

Collective-security arrangements, reinforced from above and below, make for peace. But they must be backed by armaments. This is sad yet true; nowadays the words and wishes of the weak are of no avail. Moscow has another weapon in the struggle for peace. Traveling through Europe one discovers considerable latent admiration and affection for the Soviet Union. Workingmen frequently have a special relationship to Bolshevik Russia—this despite all the Comintern's and Profintern's mistakes. In many places intellectuals, impoverished by the bourgeoisie's ideological bankruptcy, still waver because the bourgeoisie is not yet materially bankrupt. They vaguely, instinctively hope that inspiration and renewal will come from the red East. If the Soviet regime became a true popular democracy and granted its artists and writers the freedom indispensable to creative effort, the U. S. S. R. would win so many friends in foreign working and middle classes that its diplomatic position would improve and it would be more secure against invasion. A democratic Soviet Union would mobilize innumerable allies abroad. The Soviet Union is menaced by fascist and near-fascist states; the democracies of England, France, and Czechoslovakia are similarly threatened. Some of my cynical Bolshevik friends will ridicule this idealistic approach as a futile one; in the first World War, they will say, England and France were the allies of Czarist Russia. But the Soviets can be more than cannon-fodder reserves for the West. Moreover, the task today is still war prevention, and I believe that the democratization of the U. S. S. R. would weaken the enemies of peace.

Red Clay in Alabama

BY CARLETON BEALS

I. "Rehabilitation"

Birmingham, March

IT IS raining in Alabama—all through the black belt—sluices of it day after day. The unpainted tenant-farmer shacks totter forlornly on the steep sides of deeply eroded fields or in red mud on the edge of loblolly swamps beyond the ragged stalks of last year's cotton crop—the crop that during the pickers' strike brought murder to a dozen counties. We have come for miles along the slick cement highways, new but already cracking up in places—down from Birmingham past blue and tan company huts of smelter workers, on into share-cropper country. A half-decent cottage that shows signs of having been painted even five years ago or that has unbroken windows is so rare that we point and exclaim, like small boys counting white horses. All the way from Chattanooga to Birmingham it is the same dreary spectacle.

Now, farther south, we pass through wretched towns: frowzy brick buildings; dingy clapboard stores with ugly, high, peeling foreheads; a few blocks of smug little homes lifting clean chins above the surrounding welter of unpainted hovels and privies, of garbage, dead dogs, mud holes, and human degradation.

We turn off the main road. Cement gives way to gravel; gravel gives way to slippery red mud. Soon our car is painted with it. The shacks grow worse and worse. Some roads are impassable. We get stuck in the red mud. Sharecroppers haul us out. We pass abandoned farms. In this section of the Piedmont area 35 per cent of the farms have been abandoned. It is a long story of agricultural decay, of social collapse, of human degeneracy, "Tobacco Road" style, which began fifty years ago and has not yet ended.

Alabama is still in the grip of the old plantation system, with its barely camouflaged feudalism and serfdom; and the effect of the depression, the temporary collapse of monopoly capitalism, has been worse in this colonial fringe of the nation than in many a truly industrial region. Birmingham was one of the hardest-hit cities in the country. The breakdown of industrial feudalism has aggravated the earlier agricultural breakdown. Now the state faces a third and more serious blow, destruction of its cotton-growing industry. Already the cotton yield per acre in this state is lower than in worn-out Georgia; it is far below the national average; and with the introduction of new mechanical devices, such as the cotton-picker, which demand large flat areas, central and northern Alabama may see its one important cash crop wiped out. Already a large portion of Alabama's population has reached a Central American level in its living standards, with even less food available.

The present condition of the Alabama black belt is the product of a hundred years of agricultural rugged individualism. Because of the plantation system, slavery, and land monopolization, many farms were taken up which were incapable of yielding, under the most just of economic set-ups, a decent living. And under the plantation system even the good land has deteriorated. The tenant has no incentive to terrace his land against erosion, to guard against soil exhaustion, or in any way to improve the land he farms. He may even tear a board from the floor of his house and burn it to keep warm for the moment, because he does not know when he will be kicked out. The Federal Resettlement Administration states that at least 75,000,000 acres of existing farm lands in the nation are utterly unsuited to agriculture, despite the abandonment of farms and the increasing conversion of farmers into tenants and share-croppers. Perhaps the worst spots in the country are the submarginal cotton lands from Georgia to Arkansas.

Immediate remedies have been sought. Crop restriction helped to maintain prices and thus save the commission merchants and the banks. Farmers were compensated for reducing the acreage cultivated, though in the South, in divers ways, this compensation has all gone into the pockets of the owners of land, leaving the cropper and tenant in a more desperate plight than almost any other agricultural population in the world.

The Resettlement Administration has estimated that in the entire country at least 27,000,000 acres of submarginal lands must be taken out of cultivation immediately. At the same time 25,000,000 additional acres of crop lands must be found to supply the country's future food requirements—on the assumption that unemployment will cease and that purchasing power will be restored. Thus three major purposes motivate the "land-utilization" projects—the conservation and fullest use of land resources, assistance to poverty-stricken dependents on unproductive land to sell out and obtain more profitable locations, reorganization of local public finances which because of tax delinquencies are inadequate to maintain roads, schools, and other public services. This last is the soundest phase of the resettlement work.

There are four dots on the map of Alabama to show where resettlement projects are located. Two of these projects are purely agricultural. That at Tuskegee, largely for Negroes, is considered one of the most hopeful in the country. Some years back it was planned to acquire a hundred thousand acres. The acreage gradually shrank, and after a long delay option was finally taken on about 9,000 acres. But permission to buy even this reduced acreage has not yet been given. Meanwhile the men are engaged in erosion work, most of them for $19 a month. Even if this limited Hull House enterprise, excellent though it is, is finally carried to completion, it will benefit only 139 families!

This "fundamental" program was worked out because of general rural destitution in the country. In 1934—and in most places conditions have not appreciably improved since then—a total of at least 4,500,000 rural inhabitants were being kept from starvation by handouts of local, state, and federal agencies or by rural rehabilitation work. Many of these, particularly in the Alabama black belt, are still migrating from place to place, camping out, living in frightful economic and sanitary conditions.

Under the more temporary rehabilitation plan the government rented land from the owners, paying them good prices for what was often their worst land. The government then provided its tenant with food credits at the high-binder plantation stores, bought him a plow, seed, fertilizer, and a work animal. For Negroes this work animal was a steer; for whites, who refused to take steers, a mule was provided. These provisions of course are charged against the account of the tenant, and if they are at times excessive, he is, on the other hand, relieved from sharing his crop with the landlord, though he pays rent.

The Negro tenants are known as "steer farmers." According to the official report, the steer is "the orneriest of all work critters," and most of the rehabilitation steers are wild and too young to be of much use. One poor farmer's steer bolted through two fences, plow and all, and hasn't been heard of since. But the "acid test," declares the official report, "of the applicant's sincerity of purpose in his willingness to accept a steer." Just why the same "sincerity of purpose" is not demanded of whites the report does not explain.

"I'd rather be in the penitentiary than be a steer farmer," one Negro rehabilitation tenant told me.

I had walked through mud and rain to his miserable one-room shack with its gaping holes in floor, walls, and roof. Roy Robertson—I suppress his real name since I do not wish to expose him to lynching or to maltreatment and persecution by local or federal officials—is six feet tall and weighs two hundred pounds. He is from Chambers County. He cannot read or write, but he is intelligent and independent in spirit, qualities which are terrible handicaps for a Negro in the South. He is a hard worker who brought in bumper crops on the very inferior land the government temporarily provided for him.

During 1934, although Robertson received a very young steer, he made a go of things; and though the authorities took all his cotton and his government rent and parity checks, he managed to feed his brood of eight children. He was never able to get any exact statement, but he was told he had cleared his debt. In 1935 he got another, bigger steer, some fertilizer and seed, and for a few months a check for $6; he was given about eight acres of very inferior land for $15 rent, a conventional sum to be advanced to the landowner by the government. Robertson also worked sixty-six days on the government erosion project to pay his rent. During that time he claims that he drew only $2.40 for victuals for himself and family; the remainder due him, $82.02, was presumably paid against his indebtedness.

Presently, however, the landlord, though the government was the renter, demanded $24 more directly from Robertson for wood, water, pasturage, and house rent. These charges were unheard of before rehabilitation came. Now the owner steps in past the federal authorities and imposes imaginary debts and obligations. If the tenant becomes obstreperous, he is likely to be chased off his farm. Many "rehabilitated" farmers have merely exchanged one bad master for two worse ones.

Robertson, however, protested against the extra charge to the federal authorities in Auburn, Alabama. For his presumption he was "cussed out" and told that "a nigger who won't pay his water rent is no account." Robertson didn't have a cent because the government had taken all his cash crop, his wages, and his federal payments, but Negro neighbors as poor as himself gave him work so that he could make a payment of $9 and not be evicted.

Presently, Federal Field Foreman Jennings, the terror of the croppers of this county, demanded that Robertson sign a mortgage on all his possessions. Robertson, believing he had paid all his debts, refused. Jennings gave Robertson ten days to get off the land, but promised that he would make "a fair settlement" by taking everything he owned "except his 'taters." Robertson demanded a statement, which he never got.

Previously Robertson had sent various protests directly to Montgomery. Nothing came of them. One of his letters, he claims, never got out of Chambers County, for within an hour Jennings was "bawling him out," bragging to his neighbors that "niggers" who protested wouldn't even be left with bed and chairs. Jennings also pointed out that even the federal investigation of himself "by that sonnova bich of a Northern man who came down here" had come to nothing.

Ten days after Jennings's notice, the sheriff came in the dead of night and took Robertson's twin plow, two plow stocks, two steers, harness, two 50-gallon barrels full of syrup, a bale of cotton seed, 400 bales (pounds?) of fodder, 40 bushels of corn—this list is copied from the official order—and, as Robertson added, "even the children's braid." Ten bushels of corn were left to keep Robertson's family from starving.

With the thermometer at four degrees above zero Robertson moved his sick wife and eight children through snow and ice to a little shack owned by a Negro friend. All his supplies for the season are gone; his work animals are gone; he has nothing. Before he was "rehabilitated" he did have something. The authorities were generous enough to offer him an impossible job in Montgomery for $19 a month. But Montgomery is five hours away by car and Robertson has no car. He was called "no account" for refusing.

At a reasonable estimate the government took away from Roy Robertson at least $140 worth of goods; it has made no accounting on his three bales of cotton totaling 1,525 pounds, which at the guaranteed twelve-cent price would net him $183. It took his sixty-six days of labor. The government has taken from him at least $405, not including rent and parity checks.

The average cost of rehabilitating a farmer is officially put at slightly more than $90. In this figure is included the cost of equipping white farmers, which often runs to twice this amount or more. What Robertson actually received I don't know. He can't get a statement. I was given no access to his account. But the federal books are sure to balance nicely. Robertson's steers, as is common practice, were sold at the first crossroads "to them Wadley boys" for what they would bring; he does not know how much. Five truck loads of federal steers were recently sent into Montgomery and sold for meat. For the next batch of farmers, however, the government buys new steers and other goods at market prices, in some cases perhaps the very goods that have just been sold for a song. There are also ugly stories of how local white farmers bag the confiscated supplies of the "swept-clean" rehabilitated farmers, how oftentimes part of a consignment of supplies is dropped off by the wayside at a door where it does not belong.

I asked Robertson if others were in the same fix? He insisted that practically all the rehabilitated farmers in the county have been cleaned out. "Go ask Mrs. Otis Anders. She worked on the erosion project sixty-six days, she turned over three bales of cotton and half a bale of seed. Ask Ernest Holloway, who's got five children. Ask Johnny Robertson. The sheriffs come in the dead of night, and him with a sick wife and kids, and they had no place to go, and she had to sit out there in the cold for days. They took every single thing he owned and three bales of cotton. Ask Mr. Robins. He's been looking for a month for a roof to squat under. Ask Mrs. Mason. She'll tell you straight out what they done to her."

I talked to some of those he mentioned and to many others. In some counties the process has been less drastic, but essentially rehabilitation, even when it is honestly administered, is a snare and a tragic joke. It is a pouring of water into a sieve. The well-intentioned bureaucrats who administer it have no appreciation of spiritual and moral factors; they are relentless mechanisms concerned only with making the books balance and doing it even more ruthlessly than it was done under the old plantation owner, whose methods are slavishly copied.

[This is the first of two articles on rehabilitation by Carleton Beals. The second will appear next week.]

The Second Johnstown Flood

BY MAXWELL S STEWART

Johnstown, Pennsylvania, March 23

I THOUGHT that I had steeled myself against the shock of seeing my home town ravaged by disaster. As my train crawled cautiously up the Juniata valley, I had seen automobiles, stoves, bathtubs, beds, davenport, and the remnants of houses scattered along the stream bed. At one place near Tyrone I had even seen a huge gas tank tilted crazily against a bridge that restrained its further passage toward the Susquehanna. Coming down the Conemaugh I had noted disquieting evidences of the torrent which engulfed Johnstown. But despite this advance warning, despite all that I had read and the pictures I had seen, I was completely unprepared for the spectacle of devastation which confronted me.

The emotional shock which this produced was not allayed when I was set upon by a state trooper who peremptorily challenged my right to visit my own city. After being subjected to a series of rapid-fire questions, several of them repeated with the obvious intent of trapping me, I was released to proceed under guard through the city to my home. The bristling bayonets of the militia and the domineering attitude of omnipresent state police accentuated the feeling that I had suddenly dropped into a war zone. High banks of black mud, piles of timber and discarded furniture, and broken windows contributed to the atmosphere of the barricade.

In the heart of the city, where the flood had been eighteen feet deep, there was not a building which appeared habitable. Water was still standing in some of the streets. Merchants and householders had dumped the entire contents of their basements and ground floors into the gutters. Men were engaged in shoveling black muck out of stores, homes, and churches. On the streets the mud was being piled and hauled away as if it were snow from last winter's blizzards. Yet despite this intense activity, the long rows of empty houses created a never-to-be-forgotten air of desolation. It was as if the life had gone out of the city, leaving only an empty shell.

Comparisons between the St. Patrick's Day flood of 1936 and the famous deluge of May 31, 1889, are difficult because of the fundamental dissimilarity of the two catastrophes. The first Johnstown flood was essentially a man-made affair. There had been exceptionally heavy rains and the rivers had overflowed their banks, but the disaster itself, which claimed more than 2,200 lives, was the direct result of the bursting of a crude, earthen dam some ten miles above the city. Responsibility for the calamity could be placed entirely upon a group of wealthy Pittsburghers who had built the dam for recreational purposes. The huge loss of life was accounted for by the suddenness with which the torrent descended on the city.

This time the waters claimed less than a dozen lives, but because of the increased size of the city and because a larger section was inundated, the property loss, estimated at $30,000,000, has been far greater. In this case, however, man was in no way responsible for the disaster. The valleys leading into Johnstown are honeycombed with reservoirs but their usefulness for purposes of flood prevention was nullified by the fact that they were completely filled. Nor would reforestation have been of any aid as far as Johnstown is concerned. On the contrary, the fact that most of the hills are wooded probably prevented the snow from melting a week or two earlier. Though it rained steadily for over twenty-four hours, the rain alone would not have caused the river to overflow its banks. But the combination of heavy rains, an unprecedented amount of snow, ground that was frozen beneath the surface, and rivers that were already high provided conditions such as might not occur again for a century. Nothing that man could have done would have altered these circumstances appreciably.

The story of the flood and its immediate consequence has been so fully reported in the press that the details must be familiar to millions. The river rose so unexpectedly that hundreds of persons were trapped in the downtown department stores and office buildings. Thousands of families were separated and the members were unable to locate one another until long after the waters had subsided. In one family of my acquaintance the mother, father, and two children were trapped in four widely separated portions of the city, none able to get word to the others. Communications of every sort were paralyzed. It will be weeks before street-car service can be resumed. Travel by car from one section of town to another was out of the question during the flood, and is now only possible for those holding passes countersigned by the state police. One man had to drive seventy miles to get from one side of the city to the other.

Despite the suffering and discomfort of the city's 10,000 homeless, conversation centers chiefly on the multitude of peculiar pranks played by the waters. One woman tells, for example, of putting a chair on top of the piano before retreating to the upper stories. After the flood receded, the chair was still in place, but the top of the piano was missing. My uncle reports having sold an old green truck to a friend in a part of town about two miles distant, and finding the faithful old machine after the flood within a hundred yards of his house. One side of a double house was clogged with sand and dirt; the other was swept clean—of everything, including the side of the house.

As is always the case, the burden of the disaster has fallen upon those least able to bear it. It is true that the downtown business men have suffered heavily. Flood in-insurance was practically unknown despite the catastrophe of 1889. But where the well-to-do suffered business losses, the working class lost everything when their homes were gutted by the flood. A few wealthy families lived in the downtown section, but the vast majority of the middle- and upper-class families had their homes either in Southmont or Westmont—400 feet above the valley—or in higher sections of the residential suburbs. The districts where the water was the highest—Cambria City, Kernville, and parts of the downtown section—were distinctly working-class districts. Practically all of the loss of life occurred in these areas. A large proportion of the houses damaged in these sections were already unfit for human habitation, but unless the government takes advantage of the opportunity to launch a large-scale housing project, the old buildings will simply be scraped out, repapered, and rerented to the thousands who cannot afford, on steel-worker's wages, to pay rents in more desirable parts of town.

For those who escaped actual inundation, the prospects are fairly hopeful. Although the great steel plants which provide Johnstown's chief source of income are for the moment prostrate, they are employing more men for the process of cleaning up than they have had on their pay rolls since 1929. The immediate task of digging the city out of the mud has been carried out—and carried out brilliantly—by the WPA and CCC, but both business and labor are bound to benefit by the new construction which will be necessary in the coming months. Contractors, dealers in household furnishings, and automobile salesmen are doubtless looking forward to a period of unprecedented activity. It is one of the paradoxes of our economic system that a disaster is necessary to bring even an approximation of full employment.

Unfortunately, a catastrophe of this type tends to involve a redistribution of wealth from the bottom to the top. Some individuals will doubtless lose their jobs altogether; and for the vast majority of those who were washed out by the flood the reconstruction boom will only mean that money normally used for food and clothing will be diverted to household goods. Wages in the steel mills are fixed nationally, and will not be responsive to the inevitable rise in local prices. Government funds will probably be made available for the business man and home-owners either as outright gifts or as loans at low rates of interest, but it is extremely doubtful whether it will be possible for the average worker, who is unable to put up security of any kind, to take advantage of this kind of assistance. At the moment reasonably adequate relief is being granted those who lost everything in the flood, but the aid is on a chaotic basis. No assurance has been given that the destitute will continue to receive help until they are once more capable of full self-support. So far the Red Cross has done somewhat better than in the case of the Mississippi floods, but in view of the extent of the inundated areas it is evident that no private agency can hope to cope with the problem. The fact that none of the government's many alphabetical agencies were equipped to meet the relief problem dramatizes with peculiar effectiveness the need for a really comprehensive social-security program. Surely the cost of such disasters should be assumed by the country as a whole.

General Strike in Damascus

BY ALBERT VITON

Jerusalem, February 19

I WAS arrested by the French secret police on the Beirut-Damascus train before arriving in Damascus, and was shipped back, guarded by four black French-African soldiers under a French superior, to the Palestine frontier. I cannot, therefore, give a first-hand account of how Damascus looks after a general strike that has lasted thirty-two days. But I have spoken in Beirut and elsewhere with enough Damascenes to get a fairly complete picture.

For the last thirty-two days not a shop, not a restaurant, not a cafe, not a theater has been open in Damascus. Not a worker has been at his bench; not a clerk at his desk. At the Hejaz station I could not even get a porter to transfer my luggage from one train to another, and French-African troops, which have been pouring into Syria, are doing the work of porters for complaining foreigners. At least 2,000 persons have been arrested; every newspaper has been suppressed; martial law has been declared; people must not be seen walking more than two together; and Moroccan, Algerian, and Senegalese troops are in control.

So complete has been the strike, as I was informed by a French official in Beirut, that even the Damascene thieves have been striking! Not a single robbery or hold-up has occurred in Damascus since the strike began.

Of course, all the Damascene merchants are bankrupt. No notes have been paid for a month, and a Beirut lawyer told me that at least 50,000 notes have been protested. Syrian business life is at a standstill. Custom receipts for the first twenty-five days of the strike were a little less than 5,000 Syrian pounds, while for the same period last year they were more than 80,000 Syrian pounds.

A foreigner arriving in Damascus without any Arab friends is likely to starve. Food simply cannot be bought. The native population is supplied with corn, oil, olives, and leboni (a thick curdled milk which keeps better than butter), all of which are stored away by every Arab family each summer. Rich families with large food supplies have been distributing food to their less fortunate neighbors.

Damascus is not alone in the fight. All Syria is closed, and many cities in Lebanon. Beirut has come out in a sympathetic strike, as have Sidon, Tyre, and most other Lebanese villages. Homs, Aleppo, Hamma, Tripoli—the largest cities in Syria—have been striking with Damascus.

Why have almost three million persons imposed upon themselves the ordeal of hunger and bankruptcy? The answer is that Syria is determined to shake off the French yoke. In 1925-27 the Syrians fought the French with arms and inflicted heavy blows upon the mandatory power, but the French finally won by superior military force. At that time the Syrians still had ammunition from the World War. Today they have no ammunition at all. The French have seen to that. Peaceful striking is the only alternative.

The French have not always been so detested in Syria. The French mandate, indeed, was imposed after the Syrians had requested it. They then spoke of "our French cousins." Today I cannot find a single Syrian, Christian or Moslem, who has a good word for the French.

An illuminating explanation of this change was given me in an interview with Michel Beik Zakur. Michel Beik has been a member of the Lebanese Parliament for many years, has been in Syrian public life for more than a quarter of a century, and is the editor of the suppressed Maarad. "For one thing," he said, "the French have suppressed all the liberties of the people. I am not exaggerating when I say that today we are less free than we were under Turkish rule. The slightest criticism of the existing regime is sufficient to land a man in one of the innumerable new fortresses and prisons the French have built since the war. Do you know how many Syrians are locked up in them for nothing more terrible than a few words? No, you don't. Neither do I; but there are thousands. Do you know in how many homes the secret police have suddenly appeared and informed someone in the family that he must leave the country within twenty-four hours? In thousands. Our national parliament is no longer a democratic body. The members represent nobody but the French government. Since the present High Commissioner abolished our constitution by decree a few years ago, we have no other judicial basis than another decree of the Commissioner. Our parliament, furthermore, is composed of twenty-five members, a third directly appointed by the French, and the other two-thirds, with the exception of four or five, indirectly appointed. But even this French-picked body has no power. We are allowed to discuss only one subject, the budget, and that we can increase but not decrease. Duties, taxation, internal administration, foreign policy, trade, education—all these are outside our province. And even in this mockery of a Parliament sits a French vice-president who disciplines us as if we were school children."

After this interview, which described the political grievances of the Syrians against the French, I spoke to many merchants and persons who have made a study of Syrian economics. Before the war Syria was considered one of the wealthiest parts of the Ottoman Empire. Today it is starving. I have seen peasants eating bread made of corn husks. When I pointed out that if they had the husks, they must also have had the corn, I was told that heavy taxes levied to maintain a costly foreign government force them to sell the corn and make their bread from the husks.

To describe in detail the economics of imperialism would take us far afield. But the profits of imperialism are much greater than one would suspect from reading official reports and tables of statistics. Take the tariff, for example. France is prevented by the terms of the mandate from officially giving Syrian products any tariff preference. But the terms of the mandate cannot prevent France from manipulating the tariff in such a way as to give its own products the preference. In order to force the Syrians to import French woollens, the tariff was suddenly changed from a duty on measure to one on weight; to stop the importation of American cars, the tariff is no longer levied on horse-power, as it is almost everywhere else in the world, but—since French cars are much lighter than American cars—on weight. Less conspicuous measures, such as keeping goods in warehouses until their seasonal worth is destroyed, and unofficially advising importers that it would be "better" to buy French, are also employed.

The country itself does not benefit from the tariffs. Most of the proceeds from duties and other taxes go to maintain a huge military machine which would be superfluous if Syria were independent. Moreover, an army of Frenchmen, paupers at home and recruited mainly from the worst elements of the population, are living off the fat of the land. I made a list of the higher employees in the Ministry of Justice and found that forty-odd Frenchmen were paid four times as much as the 220 highest native employees.

Extensive public-works projects are undertaken either because a French company wants a contract or because the French government needs them for its own purposes, without the slightest reference to the good of the country. Vast sums are being spent at the moment on enlarging the Beirut harbor, although the present harbor facilities are more than sufficient for Syrian needs. Before the war the harbor was used to its full capacity, when all the commerce of Iraq, Arabia Saudia, Trans-Jordania, and a good deal of the commerce of Palestine flowed through Beirut. But today these countries have ceased sending goods through Syria because of the murderous duties; yet the harbor is being enlarged. Why? Because France might need it as a military port and because a French company, the Sercu del Port, saw in it a good source of profit. Even French engineers have been imported to do the work, although Syria has a number of highly qualified native engineers, most of them unemployed. Most of the roads built by the French were constructed in the same manner—that is, not because they were needed by the inhabitants but because they might be of military advantage. This is also the case with the Tripoli airport now being constructed. And all these vast expenditures of public funds are being made while scores of villages are without a doctor, without a pharmacy, without a school.

The outcome of the present strike is, of course, certain. It may last another week, perhaps even another month; then it must come to an end. But the struggle is not over. It will begin again before the year is out, and although it may take a different form it will express no less earnestly the widespread disaffection which French imperialism has brought to Syria.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

MY UNQUALIFIED admiration has been won by Lewis J. Gorin, Princeton, '36, who conceived the brilliant idea of founding the Veterans of Future Wars. Incorporated under the laws of the state of New Jersey, this organization has spread like wildfire. Three days after it was started there were no less than thirty "posts" in as many colleges, and by the time these lines appear in print there will probably be a hundred. Its sister organization, the Future Gold Star Mothers, is growing just as rapidly in the women's colleges. A national office has been opened in Princeton, where a thousand students attended the first rally. Congressman Maury Maverick, who spent a year and more in hospitals, has had part of five vertebrae removed, and is rarely free from pain because of the injury done him in France by a German bullet, has volunteered to introduce a bill in the House to pay a $1,000 bonus to every man under the age of thirty-six years who expects to be drafted in the next war and to pay the expenses of every woman under thirty-six for a trip to Europe to visit the probable site of her future sons' graves.

Well, I was at first inclined to consider this stroke of genius just a magnificent joke, a superb piece of youthful badinage, a most clever piercing by irony of the armor of our bonus grabbers. I thanked heaven that at last the war-makers were assailed by the deadliest of weapons—ridicule. But the more I ponder on it the more convinced I am that there is something more to Mr. Gorin's movement. Why should not the young men of America who are going to be drafted into the next war without being asked whether or not they wish to die in France or Manchuria get something out of it before their lives are snuffed out, or they are chosen to carry bullets in their spines for their remaining years, or they end their existence as hopeless cripples, without arms or legs, in some hidden hospital which no outsiders are permitted to visit? Certainly the government ought to give them $1,000 right now. Certainly the young women who are to give birth to the cannon fodder of the future ought to have a trip to Europe or Asia now before their parental anxiety and suffering begin. It does not matter that the day for the next war has not yet been set. The country is to spend $1,200,000,000 in the next fiscal year for armaments. That means war and nothing else.

Mr. Gorin has already drawn blood. James E. Van Zandt, National Commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, squealed with pain way out in Salt Lake City. To him Mr. Gorin and his aides are nothing but a "bunch of monkeys." These future veterans, the gallant Commander averred, "are too yellow to go to war. Therefore they will never be veterans of a future war." Mr. Van Zandt forgets, in his bitter hurt, that they will be drafted and have to go, whether they are yellow or blue or white. Mr. Gorin knew just the right answer to make to this. He properly called Mr. Van Zandt a "red" (in the pay of Moscow?) for thus deprecating the valor and patriotism of America's future soldiers. If that precious sedition bill which the army and navy have been trying to get Congress to pass were now a law, it might well be that Mr. Van Zandt could be proceeded against under its provisions; if its penalties should be merely limited to those creating disaffection in our present soldiers it would obviously be only half the safeguard of our militarism it ought to be. To give the youth of America its $1,000 bonus now will surely make it the more ready to enlist when war comes. Hence, in calling the Veterans of Future Wars yellow Mr. Van Zandt is so palpably dampening the martial spirit of our young men as to make it clear to me that the Army Intelligence Bureau should investigate him and see if he is not secretly a member of the Third International.

As for the Gold Star Mothers, the president of the New York branch, Mrs. Matilda Burling, declares that her chapter will demand "an apology and dissolution of the organization." "Any idea that involves making fun of Gold Star Mothers and their pilgrimage to France is bad taste, anyway," is her anti-climactic conclusion. Now there you have the eternal conflict between youth and age. The latter, unwilling to share its distinctions and emoluments with oncoming youth, seeks to regiment it, to tell it what it should think and do. Do the Gold Star Mothers wish to reserve for themselves the precious patriotic experience that is theirs of having given their sons at their country's behest in the most futile of wars, or are they willing to have others ennobled by this experience? I believe that when Mrs. Burling and her associates think it over they will see how a trip to France now will fill young women with ardor to have their future sons lie in those well-kept cemeteries beneath those white crosses.

But whether I am right or not in feeling that patriotism and the necessity of keeping alive militant manhood in America demand that we should all support the Veterans of Future Wars, I insist that Mr. Gorin has got hold of a most dangerous weapon. Heaven forbid that he should go farther and undertake to poke fun at our army and navy, their pretense of efficiency and their preposterous assertion that they are safeguarding the United States. If anybody should begin to laugh at our brass hats—but no, I forbear to go farther. Not my pen shall portray what would happen. I only want to add, to complete the picture, that Mr. Gorin has picked just the right salute for his society—the fascist salute but with the palm up in readiness for Treasury favors to come!

BROUN'S PAGE

IT ISN'T true that I like being arrested. In guild activities I have only once been taken into custody, and so far I've never been locked up except in the strike against Hearst's Wisconsin News. I am a nervous man and I have a touch of claustrophobia, as well as that other one about open spaces which I can't spell. Being locked up gives you that same uncomfortable sensation which you get when stuck between floors in an elevator. It is the sort of terror which assails a man when he knows that the thing which confines him is mechanical and without the usual human reactions. Cops and electric current have that machine-like rigidity.

One of the most curious things in the world is the manner in which a policeman becomes a cog instead of a cop under certain kinds of pressure. This is particularly true of labor pressure, and it arises in part, I believe, from a bad conscience. By every tradition of background, pay, and hours of employment the roundsman should be an ally of striking groups. And yet he will swing almost at a second's notice into a complete ruthlessness in contact with a picket line. The boys and girls of the Wisconsin News know the members of the force a good deal better than is the case in larger cities. In the early days of the strike against Hearst it was a sort of "Jack" and "Bill" and "Butch" greeting between the pickets and the police. And then almost overnight everything changed. Somehow it came to the members of the force and to the leaders of the police that this was actually a strike and not a lark. Newspaper men and women had dared to challenge that thing which the policeman fears, although he hardly understands it. Generally it goes by the name of "authority," and "authority" is a force which says, "Make the workers know their place. Slap them around. Give them a taste of 'due process of law.' Show them what happens to human rights when they begin to impinge on property rights. Show them that Mr. Hearst is mighty and must prevail."

So robot-like does the roundsman become after he has heard the voice of authority that even his sense of humor is frozen into a dull literalness. According to the Chicago Tribune, "police said that Broun stepped in front of the patrol wagon, thus obstructing traffic, and then jumped into the conveyance."

Now Milwaukee patrol wagons have only a single entrance and that in the rear—like all police wagons I have ever seen—and therefore the feat ascribed to me suggests an agility to which I must plead not guilty. It has been years since I could make a whirling leap from the front of a car and come clean in through the back. I doubt if I ever could. But it has been gravely so recorded by the Milwaukee police.

The fact of the matter is that I was never officially arrested at all. A picket line of some six hundred persons was parading quite peacefully around the plant. This mass picketing had been carried on every Saturday for a month without violence and without interference by the police. Indeed, there had been larger lines. But by now "authority" had become restive. The order came from somewhere to attack the line and break it up. The pickets were marching two and two. The police endeavored to drive a wedge between them, and without a word of warning began to push men and women all over the sidewalk. They did not use their clubs, but I wasn't pleased suddenly to get a cop's elbow in my middle for no reason which I could see except that it pleased him to do it.

And then three policemen went by roughing up a young fellow who was head office boy on the Wisconsin News before the strike. They had him by the collar and were shoving him over to the patrol wagon while he vainly inquired what it was all about. Since I was the ranking guild official I went over to the police captain—at least somebody in gold braid—and asked, "What's this all about?" He would make no answer. "If you want to make a test case of our right to picket," I suggested, "I think you ought to arrest me, since I'm a guild officer." Probably by this time I was getting a little mad, and it is quite likely that I repeated a couple of times, "Come on and arrest me." It is even possible that I threw in a "I dare you to arrest me."

But nobody arrested me. I just walked into the patrol wagon and sat down beside Al. When we got to the station house, the three policemen looked a little puzzled. Al was the only one who had been arrested, but Hymie Polinsky, the guild's photographer, had come along, too. I asked what the charges against us were, but nobody seemed to know, so they just locked us up to be on the safe side. We were searched for weapons, and a rather cursory glance was taken at the papers in our pockets. I think it was a sergeant who manifested quite an interest in a big wad of typewritten material which I had in my coat. "I'm sure you won't be interested in that," I told him. "That's a baseball short short that I tried to sell to Collier's." He put it back in my coat. Even the police didn't want it.

After each of us had been locked in a separate cell, along with a drunk the wagon had picked up on its way to the picket line, somebody thought of the fact that a prisoner is entitled to one telephone call. We tried to get it, but nobody would pay any attention. We banged on the walls of the cells, but the jailer would not come. "Let's all holler together 'Man dying!'" somebody suggested. That was discarded because we all agreed that probably the police wouldn't care. A lawyer came to see us, and they wouldn't let him in. Just to make it harder they suddenly jumped my bail from $35 to $125.

Now obviously three hours in a cell is a trivial thing, but even in so short a time an observing reporter can learn quite a lot about the police and labor. As far as I'm concerned the only true charge which lies against me is hitchhiking in the police patrol.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

CHARLES BEARD CONFRONTS HIMSELF

BY MAX LERNER

WHETHER you know Charles Beard or have heard his lusty sallies against Hearst may resent my going back to a book of his written in 1913. Any attempt to place a man's past work in perspective is always a more or less elaborate process of embalming. And if there is any question of embalming, remember those flashing eyes of his, the kindly yet pointed wit—recall what Randolph Bourne once called Beard's "Olympian anger"—watch him in action at some Senate hearing on railroad reorganization or hear him talk about the regime of the drill-sergeant in Nazi Germany. I had meant to call his great book on the Constitution a classic, and the appearance of a new edition* (which has received all too little notice) gave me, I thought, both occasion and excuse for it. But to speak of a man having written a classic may seem like saying of a French writer that he belongs in the Academy or of any writer that he has become a museum piece. So I shall say instead that Mr. Beard's book not only deals with history but has made history.

The book was an inquiry into the economic interests and pressures behind the framing and ratification of the Constitution. It was a tour de force of historical research. Into it Mr. Beard distilled the debates of the Constitutional Convention, the musty and neglected Treasury records, the yellowed files of contemporary journals. He piled up massive evidence to show that the Constitution was an "economic document"; that it was supported by "substantially all the merchants, money lenders, security holders, manufacturers, shippers, capitalists, and financiers, and their professional associates," while on the other side were "the non-slaveholding farmers and the debtors"; and that the political doctrines which shaped the Constitution were themselves shaped by the economic interests of the convention members. The very title of the book, thrust into the atmosphere of theology which covered the thinking of the day like a pall, showed that a new Higher Criticism had come into existence. For Mr. Beard dared defy all the myths and taboos of the historical scholarship of his day. He dared say that the Founding Fathers may have been business men as well as patriots.

Naturally the book made a stir. A campaign was on. Theodore Roosevelt, who as President had thwacked the trusts with a resonance intended to impress the common people and—incidentally—his own sense of rectitude, was now as candidate seeking to thwack the Supreme Court with similar intent. Mr. Taft, on the other hand, was making speeches in which he averred that there would always be a special niche in heaven for judges. Although on a historical subject, the book by the young Columbia professor of politics became of contemporary moment. Much of what supported the sanctity of the Supreme Court, at that time as today, was the sense of the sanctity of the Constitution. A shattering of constitutional mythologies might mean thus a shattering of judicial mythologies. The book caused a fluttering in the academic dovecotes. Albert Bushnell Hart called it little short of indecent, and other scholars called it Marxian—which served the same purpose. Mr. Beard in his new introduction insists it was neither.

The introduction is of importance, because it brings the Charles Beard of today face to face with the Charles Beard of 1913. Mr. Beard confronts himself and tries to explain his stand on the theory of history. In the process he almost explains it away.

Mr. Beard insists that his economic interpretation was not Marxian but Madisonian. There can be no quarrel with any label he may wish to choose. A number of thinkers from Aristotle to Bentley and Veblen had seen the power of economic interests in the province of government, and its most sensational expression in the American tradition was by James Madison in the famous passage in Number 10 of the Federalist Papers, where it was used to defend the system of checks in the Constitution. And yet, unless it be on purely tactical grounds in order to confound the professional patrioteers, I do not see the cogency of avoiding the Marxist stigma as if it were leprous. The economic interpretation is in Madison a set of brilliant aperçus, but in Marx an intellectual system.

What its place is in Mr. Beard's thinking is difficult to say with any definiteness. When his book was first published there was a tendency to regard it as the lustiest American blast for the economic interpretation of history. But Mr. Beard today evidently has a horror of being thought to dwell too exclusively on the economic aspect of history. "Since this aspect had been so long disregarded," he writes, "I sought to redress the balance by emphasis. . . . I simply sought to bring back into the mental picture of the Constitution those realistic features of economic conflict, stress, and strain which my masters had . . . left out of it, or thrust far into the background as incidental rather than fundamental." Mr. Beard seems to see his work, therefore, as part of a pendulum process in which an equilibrial correctness is achieved by going from excess to excess. He seems thus less in the tradition of the economic interpreters than in that of the "multiple-causation" school of American sociology, which sees history as the product of a vast variety of factors, none having priority over the others. He does not, to be sure, travel the whole road in that direction. "In the great transformations in society," he writes in his introduction, "such as was brought about by the formation and adoption of the Constitution, economic 'forces' are primordial or fundamental, and come nearer 'explaining' events than any other 'forces.'" But surely the whole historic process is one of social transformation. Taken with any precision, Mr. Beard's statement would mean that he restricts the economic interpretation to revolutionary periods, and that for normal periods he would adopt a "broader" interpretation.

*"An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States." By Charles A. Beard. With a New Introduction. The Macmillan Company. $2.

All these twistings and turnings may be explained by Mr. Beard's desire to escape any form of determinism in history. He says repeatedly that the economic factor cannot explain history, that all of history cannot explain life. He has a horror of the history writing that was drenched with spiritual unction. In fact, I suspect that much of the reason why Mr. Beard and many of his generation were once attracted by the economic emphasis in history was that it gave them a sweet and secret iconoclastic sense. Like the village atheist, they got a kick out of destroying the theological and pseudo-spiritual myths. Mr. Beard has, in the quarter-century that has elapsed, continued his economic emphasis, although with something of a diminuendo. More and more his economic interest, never strongly rooted in an economic philosophy of history, has become an interest in economic problems and economic policy, such as foreign trade. His basic philosophy has become, as perhaps it always was less explicitly, a philosophy of voluntarism and contingency. More and more he dwells upon the role that chance and human effort play in fashioning history. More and more he admonishes us to "walk lightly," lest with our crude and unthinking tread we destroy the fragile web that history weaves.

I can agree with Mr. Beard that chance (fortuna, he calls it, after a formula which he borrows from Machiavelli) plays an appreciable role in human affairs, and that the human will (virtù) may within limits be powerful. But what are those limits? And how can the human will ascertain the unyielding trends of history (necessità) so as to work with them rather than to spend itself against them? We do not want final explanations. What we want is an approach to the movement of history, a way of interpreting it. What we want above all else is an instrument of analysis. One asks not only how fundamental are the economic forces, but what dynamic is there that they use and that uses them in the processes of history? The Marxians have an answer—the materialist dialectic, the shifting technologies creating shifting class relations and class conflicts in such a way that each era and each social system, out of its own energies and tensions, fulfils itself and gives way to the next. It may be an incomplete answer, it may be too sweeping or dogmatic. That remains to be determined as serious attempts continue to be made to apply it to the task of historic interpretation. But it does give philosophic roots to the emphasis on economic factors. I fail to find in Mr. Beard's system of thought any relation between his economic emphasis and his basic philosophy. Instead, I find a curious sort of split which seems to have widened with time, and which serves to account for the earnest attempt he makes to confront his earlier self.

Moments

Bernard Shaw Okays a Few Saints

Mr. Beard's plight, if it is one, is the more illuminating because he is one of the few progressive thinkers active today who span the entire period since the pre-war days. He has lived through the American imperialist venture, a World War, revolutions and threats of revolution, the terrible reality of fascism. He is thoroughly alive to the dangers that surround the human spirit—fearful lest amid the barbarities that encompass us it may be snuffed out. He represents, in short, the linking of past progressivism with present agonies. Out of the past progressivism comes his realistic economic strain; out of our present agonies comes his tortured plea, as he expressed it in his article on the Constitution in last week's Nation, to "walk lightly. Things are not so simple." He is fearful lest our civil liberties and our entire social heritage be wiped out by hasty action, whether with respect to the Supreme Court or the deeper problems of our economic organization. He knows the evils we suffer, but he is unwilling to flee from them to evils he knows not of. The only positive program he has linked his name with is one for American economic isolationism, as a way of avoiding the struggles for foreign markets and the complications of foreign wars. He wants to escape the tensions and contradictions of an era of corporate capitalism by a concentration on the home market and an admonition to walk lightly.

We can learn a good deal from Charles Beard. We can learn, as he has himself no doubt learned since this book, that people do not act—as, all too mechanically, he made the members of the Constitutional Convention act—from direct economic pressures and interests. For we know that the subtlest way in which class interests influence the course of history is through affecting the climate of opinion: often the people who are most enslaved to the going ideas are those who have no direct economic interest in the maintenance of them. We can learn from Charles Beard what the Marxians have thus far not taught us sufficiently but what Veblen did emphasize—a sense of the play of these conscious and subconscious psychological factors in retarding and even distorting the play of economic factors. But we must also learn that the economic interpretation of history cannot be merely a vague emphasis on economic factors. It must be part of a deeply rooted philosophy which makes room within the framework of economic forces for chance, contingency, and human effort.

BOOKS

Yesterday's Prodigies

SWEAR BY THE NIGHT. By Nathalia Crane. Random House. $1.50.

BREAK THE HEART'S ANGER. By Paul Engle. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

THE predicament of a child prodigy turned adult is never an enviable one. We are advised of a pact whereby a pantheon of godparents who control the destiny of Miss Crane forbade any publication of the young poet's verses until the completion of her course at Barnard. In the light of the present volume the contract proves itself as salutary as it would appear in other respects Machiavellian. It has not, to be sure, spared Miss Crane the personal chagrin of finding herself a thoroughly negligible poet at twenty-two; yet it has precluded her exhibiting to the public eye the gradual erosion whereby a prodigy lays aside all that renders her prodigious.

"Swear by the Night" falls wide of distinction, whether one chooses to regard it as a first volume, or a fifth, or, if prose may qualify also, a seventh or eighth. Even Louis Untermeyer finds himself unconscionably hard put in his Foreword, and makes hurried mention of "dull jingles," "her lack of an even pitch and a balanced technique," "her contradictions," her elaborate obscurity "as if a child had turned pedant," and the like. "I said that when Nathalia was eleven years old she puzzled me," he concludes in some embarrassment. "She still does."

Yet the truth is as obvious as it is shattering: Nathalia Crane at twenty-two is no match for Nathalia Crane at eleven, and, as far as "Swear by the Night" is concerned, gives every evidence of having passed the last ten years of her life under a bell-jar. Lines like are revelatory; for they indicate, as does the group as a whole, that Miss Crane long ago reached a pause in time and space, and if she ever dreamed of new worlds to conquer, has ceased to sigh for them. At present she remains either incapable of further growth or, like any veteran with half a dozen titles to her name, entirely content with her achievement. The sententiousness so charming in a child of eleven is still current in a number of these poems, but an earlier pertness and gaiety are missing. There are present also the same fondness for ballads in jog-trot time, the same breezy affectation of foreign place-names to insure a flavor of drollery, the same girlish taste for fantasy and myth, for bees, silkworms, roses, azure, and garlands—but like certain forms of youthful naughtiness, they have forfeited their capacity to delight.

O Muse, why dost thou let anatomists

Creep to thy shrine and tabulate thy charms?

Paul Engle's transformation is of another sort. In point of craftsmanship Mr. Engle remains as deficient as ever, and, indeed, in the current volume employs the blank-verse medium with more than ordinary slovenliness. He has, moreover, developed a taste for colloquialisms which must have been cultivated for the express entertainment of an Oxford coterie, since they long ago ceased to recommend themselves to American ears. Their effect, in general, is bathos itself:

To you life says, Step on it, kid,

Or yesterday will be kickin' you in the pants.

Occasionally they achieve a kind of humorless absurdity, as in the case of an ungentelemanly reference to the Statue of Liberty as "you skirt." The lyric interpolations with which the sections regularly conclude are scarcely more successful; one would like, for example, to attribute doggerel such as the following to recklessness rather than to an atrocious ear:

But never have I known
A deeper grief by a deep
Ocean than here where the blown
Men of the wild foam creep
Over the clutching sand,
Over the gray, gull-flown
Beaches . . .

Yet when all Mr. Engle's damaging limitations have been pointed out—his fondness for personal oratory, his technical irresponsibility, his dependence on rhetorical afflatus and literary cant, his willingness to substitute easy generalities in place of considered dialectic—the book remains an astonishing one, in terms of its flat abnegation of the pioneer ideal for the Communist ideal. It would have been difficult even for the astute in such matters to foresee that the author of "American Song" would follow his celebration of the complete individual with a celebration of Lenin, Trotzky, Marx, and the Communist Manifesto. Yet the whole of "Break the Heart's Anger" is an inflamed protest against the forces of capital, fascism, and imperialist war, in which the chief nations of the world are taken in turn, declared ripe for revolution, and exhorted to present or eventual action.

The evocation of the Marxian ideal is, however, a highly romanticized one, even if it is a highly militant one. There will be many to question the validity of Mr. Engle's confused attempt to couple Lenin with Lincoln, and Trotzky with Washington, as kindred spirits. The fact that Mr. Engle has approached his task with the same evangelical fervor that he lent to his earlier apocalypse of the Wild West may serve to discredit to some extent the force of his present mood. Yet it must add an ironical flavor to the augury of an inspired supporter who in 1934 prominently advertised his contention that "Paul Engle is . . . a writer who will play his part in the resurgence of creative force that will mark this decade in our literary history." It would seem that Mr. Engle has again resurged, but, to borrow a valued Hearstian epithet, this time his song is strictly "un-American."

BEN BELITT

A revealing biography of the most misunderstood man in history

HAIL, CAESAR!

by FLETCHER PRATT. Julius Caesar's strange fate has been to go down in history as a military genius, but the commanding of an army was just a side-line with him. To understand what really made him great, and for the lively, straightforward story of his life as artist, builder and consummate politician, read this superbly entertaining new biography. Illustrated, $3.50.

The personal history of an unusual woman

THREESCORE

The Life of SARAH N. CLEGHORN, by Herself

With a foreword by ROBERT FROST. For forty years she has battled for the causes she believed in; she tells her own story and that of many others, from Julia Ward Howe to Gene Debs and Tom Mooney. "An important and valuable book because in a broad sense it is a preface to the present . . . directly in the American Protestant tradition, homely and sincere and devout . . . It will be read, slowly and earnestly, as a story from the heart."—RALPH THOMPSON, N. Y. Times. Illustrated, $3.00.

For sixty years, this has been going on . . .

THE RAPE OF AFRICA

by LAMAR MIDDLETON.

A newspaper man's behind-the-scenes story of the partition of Africa by seven European nations. A damning revelation of "horsetrading" in the chancellories of Europe, it tells how nine-tenths of Africa was stolen from the Negroes in less than twenty-five years, and why Mussolini's invasion of Ethiopia is merely the last phase of civilization's greatest land grab. Illustrated, $3.00.

RANDOM HOUSE • 20 E. 57TH STREET • N. Y. C.

Jews in America

by the Editors of FORTUNE

The Nazis have charged—partly as an excuse for their own terroristic regime—that even in America the Jews tend to dominate politics, industry, banking and the professions. The Editors of Fortune set out to discover the facts—and here they are. It will be read and widely quoted by everyone who wants to answer, authoritatively, the anti-Jewish canard. An appendix lists and describes 20 Anti-Semitic organizations in the United States. $1.00.

Bury the Dead

by IRWIN SHAW

To a world aghast at the imminence of another great war, this twenty-three-year-old author addresses a fiery protest in a one-act drama that is as original in its conception as it is stunning in its impact. "He stands in imminent danger of growing into one of the most powerful dramatists of this land and time. It is a long time since I have seen a large audience so moved, so hotly convulsed, so deeply shaken . . . Here is not only a strong and beautiful plea, but also a stunning and beautiful play."—GILBERT W. GABRIEL, New York American. $1.00.

Lenin

by WILLIAM C. WHITE

The story of his political life, told for Americans . . . LENIN is the first of a series of distinguished new biographies of leaders of the Russian revolution, to be published within the year, by the author of These Russians and Made in Russia. $1.50.

The Illusion of Neutrality

NEUTRALITY: ITS HISTORY, ECONOMICS, AND LAW. Columbia University Press.

VOL. II. THE NAPOLEONIC PERIOD. By W. Alison Phillips and Arthur H. Reede. $3.75.

VOL. III. THE WORLD WAR PERIOD. By Edgar Turlington. $3.75.

VOL. IV. TODAY AND TOMORROW. By Philip C. Jessup. $2.75.

THREE centuries ago Hugo Grotius, the "father of international law," wrote: "It is the duty of those who stand apart from a war to do nothing which may strengthen the side whose cause is unjust, or which may hinder the movements of him who is carrying on a just war; and in a doubtful case to act alike to both sides."

Diplomats and jurists of more recent times have been less capable of distinguishing between justice and injustice and have accordingly developed the concept of the neutral obligation of complete impartiality. Not until 1935, however, was this obligation made a basis for a national neutrality policy which, though impartial in form, does in fact strengthen the side whose cause is unjust and hinder the movements of the victim of injustice. This achievement of the American Congress appears the more remarkable when it is reflected that the United States furnished the world the moral impulse which today denounces all military aggression as unjust. Such judgments, moreover, have been translated into political and legal decisions, subscribed to by the overwhelming majority of mankind, on the basis of international instruments largely fashioned by American statesmen—for example, the League Covenant, the Kellogg pact, and the Stimson doctrine.

The amended neutrality act, which in effect ignores the Covenant, scraps the pact, and dumps the Stimson doctrine into the ash-can, was signed by President Roosevelt on February 29, 1936, the date of publication of the last three of the four volumes on neutrality edited by Professor Philip C. Jessup of Columbia. Had these invaluable historical and analytical studies been read and taken to heart by Congress, the present legislation would be less appalling. Under its terms the President is bound until May 1, 1937, to ban American arms and loans not only to aggressors, who seldom need them, but also to those who may need them desperately for self-defense or for the collective restraint of aggression. Mussolini has already expressed his satisfaction. Hitler and Araki should be equally gratified. The isolationist redefinition of American neutral obligations might well have for its slogan: "Make the world safe for aggression!"

This unforeseen and undesired result flows from the current illusion that the problem of peace for America is the problem of neutrality and that the abandonment of neutral rights insures peace. Messrs. Jessup, Phillips, Reede, and Turlington demonstrate brilliantly and conclusively in these pages that neutral "rights" are always simple rationalizations of greed. But the abandonment of these rights is no guaranty of peace unless those economic interests of the nation abroad which these "rights" symbolize are also abandoned. Peace can be had through the sacrifice of profits only by retreat into the cyclone cellar of complete economic isolation. The only alternative is the cooperative protection of interests abroad through a system of collective security and sanctions. "Liberal" isolationists who oppose the collective system would be more honest if they frankly advocated the complete junking of American foreign trade and investments. There is no habitable halfway house.

The confusion and frustration of American "neutrality" policy are consequences of a refusal to face these alternatives. The complete abandonment of the American economic stake abroad would mean the collapse of American economy in the event of a general war. Recognizing the impossibility of any such fantastic policy, Congress has barred only loans and trade in arms. Other trade will go on as before—subject to ineffective moral pressure by the President—and will create anew all the old controversies and all the old ties which make American prosperity dependent upon belligerent markets in war time. Flight to the cyclone cellar is unthinkable. But American cooperation in a system of collective security is also unthinkable to the irrational isolationists. Congress has repudiated the collective system and done much to wreck it without daring to embrace the impossible alternative of autarchy. The result is hopeless muddle.

In the concluding volume of this excellent series Professor Jessup unfortunately shows evidence of not having quite thought through the muddle himself. He proposes American cooperation with other neutrals to embargo all trade impartially with all belligerents on the basis of the Argentine anti-war pact of 1933. He believes that the choice is between profits and peace, that no line can be drawn between justice and injustice in war, and that neutrality (modified) can be preserved in this fashion. His scheme is ingenious but in the reviewer's opinion unworkable. In a general war it would mean economic disaster for the United States, as would any scheme of economic isolation. In a limited war it would have little effect. "Neutrals" which are members of the League cannot embargo victims of aggression as well as aggressors. And if this distinction cannot be made, if justice and injustice, treaty-observance and treaty-violation, attack and defense are indeed indistinguishable, then the law of nations and the conscience of mankind are both bankrupt and we may as well throw up the whole enterprise of keeping the peace and descend into savagery forthwith.

For the future there will either be collective security or no security. Peace will either be preserved by cooperation among all nations interested in preserving it or it will not be preserved. Whatever its policies may be, America will not escape involvement in general insecurity and conflict, for America is part of the world. It is not free, economically, politically, psychologically, or morally, to stand aside and till its own garden. War spreads like a prairie fire, even to gardens behind high fences. Isolationism is unworkable, and "neutrality" has become dangerous nonsense. An America desiring peace will cooperate with Geneva in penalizing aggressors and strengthening the collective system. The price of peace for the United States is the sacrifice not of profits but of prejudice, not of trade but of tradition, not of interests abroad but of isolationism at home. These truths are elementary. Those who insist upon them are not dogmatists, pretending to speak with the voice of God, as Charles A. Beard would have it (New Republic, March 18, 1936). They are merely taking cognizance of certain obvious propositions which have never been refuted by those, like Beard, who remain muddled by "the uncertainty, tragedy, and sadness of things." These truths may be learned before May 1, 1937. Or they may not be. Washington may use Geneva's weakness as an excuse for non-cooperation. Geneva may use Washington's isolationism as an excuse for inaction. In either case aggressors will benefit, a second world war will be made inevitable, and America will be dragged into a catastrophe caused by blindness, lunacy, and stupidity.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

"Take What You Want"

SOUTH RIDING. By Winifred Holtby. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

WINIFRED HOLTBY, who died before this novel could be published, had chosen for its motto a Spanish proverb: "'Take what you want,' said God. 'Take what you want—and pay for it.' " It was the perfect proverb for Miss Holtby's purpose, which was to reveal the fullness of life in one of its aspects. Life is always full in good fiction, but here it is full in a special way—a social way, in fact, though one must not leap to the conclusion that Miss Holtby has any more to say about society than that it is full. For her, or at any rate for the people in a mythical South Riding which she has set down somewhere in Yorkshire, society is absolutely full; it is a plenum. No individual can move in it without disturbing or displacing another individual; what is added to Smith is subtracted from Brown, and the multiplications of modernity produce a division in every soul. This is not what Emerson meant in "Compensation," nor is it what God meant, presumably, in the Spanish proverb. It has to do entirely with the vision of society which a sober and responsible person like Miss Holtby would have in days like ours—in days, that is to say, when society is assumed to be a machine running by itself, a machine with all of its parts exposed and with all of its mysteries waiting merely upon time to be explained.

Miss Holtby can be supposed, then, to have begun not so much with a vision of the people whose stories she wanted to tell as with a concept of the society which would contain and condition them. This is why she has to have so many people—there are 166—and why most of them have to be indistinct; the sum is Miss Holtby's theme, rather than any or even all of its parts. Each person is to be understood in the light of his relations, first to a few other persons and then to the whole of South Riding. Lydia Holly is more than a brown-legged girl who lives in a shack and loves Shakespeare; she is also the victim of a system which has not foreseen the likelihood of ambition in such waste places. The result is that Lydia makes a certain contribution to our knowledge of the Riding but in herself remains a sketch—a clear and delightful one as far as it goes, yet limited to a few strokes mechanically repeated. So down or up the entire list; Astell, Snaith, Huggins, Sawdon, Castle, and Mrs. Hubbard are suggested rather than created; no matter how many times we see them, and we see them many times, they mean exactly what they meant before, and make precisely the same gestures. So even with the three principals, Mrs. Beddows, Miss Burton, and Robert Carne. For all of Mrs. Beddows's reputed richness and depth she remains singularly empty of anything like personal force; and as for the other two, the lovers, Miss Holtby seems to have understood how necessary it was to borrow them from another literary tradition altogether. She borrows them from romance, and indeed from the Brontës—who also lived in Yorkshire, but who probably never knew that there is such a thing as society. They simply gave their people souls and dared them to save them; it was quite an individual matter, and intensely dramatic. Miss Holtby uses what she borrows only long enough to insure that her novel shall not be as dull as by definition it ought to be; then, true to her own tradition, she kills off Carne and reinstates the genius of local government.

If it is doubtful that a good novel can be written around an idea capable of statement in simpler terms, it is perhaps more doubtful that a good novel can be written around an idea as

CREATE THE WEALTH

By William Beard

Author of "Government and Technology," and Co-author with Charles Beard of "The American Leviathan."

A welcome relief from purely theoretical works, this important book has been written by an engineer who applies the experimental method to current problems, evolving a tested working plan which puts the unemployed back to work in factories and on farms (Illustrated). $3.00

PRACTICAL ASPECTS OF PSYCHOANALYSIS

By Dr. Lawrence S. Kubie. This volume offers a practical clarification of what psychoanalysis is, how the technique is applied, how long treatments last, how and when psychoanalysis does any good, and other information important to patients and their families. $2.00

PEACE OR WAR

The American Struggle—1636-1936

By Merle Curti, Professor of History, Smith College. This is the first full account, by a historian, of the struggle against War, in America. It enables the reader to appraise intelligently the proposed ways to keep the peace. $3.00

W. W. NORTON & CO., 70 Fifth Ave., New York

2 POPULAR MAGAZINE BARGAINS

The Nation and Harpers Magazine..... $6.50

The Nation and Readers Digest..... $6.00

One year subscriptions, sent to different addresses if you wish, new or renewals. Pay in 30 days if you prefer. To order write The Readers' Service Division, The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

dreary as Miss Holtby's was—the idea, in brief, that the world will grow steadily if slowly better under the ministrations of many brave, obscure persons who cannot be daunted by its obvious desire to stand still. To say the worst of "South Riding" at once, it is a social worker's novel; or rather, since I do not want to call Miss Holtby names, a novel for all those who like to be warmed by such sentiments as fill the final chapter to overflowing. But to say the worst of "South Riding" is to misrepresent it and its author.

I admire both—the book for its numerous sections wherein the purpose is forgotten and the idea transcended, and the author for the great native ability which she undoubtedly possessed. This ability, and the remarkable amount of character that went with it, saved Miss Holtby from being either dull or false beyond the degree made inescapable by her prescription. If she was condemned to sketchiness, her sketches nevertheless are brilliant; and she tells a dozen stories as well as they could have been told under the circumstances—under the prohibition, that is, to let any one of them become absorbing. She was most the artist, as often happens, when least aware of her program; when, for example, and here I make use of Vera Brittain's "Epitaph" at the close, the shadow of her own death deepened what she wrote. It was perhaps no paradox for her that Robert Carne became most lifelike as he faded from the world she had made for him, or that this world grew most credible and beautiful in proportion as it tended to hang stationary, a remote vision, in her mind. She paid, of course, the highest possible price for her success; and so did contemporary British letters, which boasted too few names of her distinction.

MARK VAN DOREN

Highbrow Shockers

GAUDY NIGHT. By Dorothy L. Sayers. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE CRIMSON PATCH. By Phoebe Atwood Taylor. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.

THIS mystery is also a novel. This novel is also a romance." So the blurb-writer for Messrs. Harcourt, Brace announces "Gaudy Night," a new detective story by Dorothy Sayers. This statement has a rather pathetic and desperate candor, the candor of the unregenerate bluffer who hopes by putting a bold face on it to convert a liability into an asset. The facts are that "Gaudy Night" as a romance is cloudy and long-winded; as a novel it has moments of atmospheric interest; but as a detective story it is a thoroughgoing, dismal flop. This tale of the terrorization of an Oxford woman's college commits at least three unforgivable detective-story sins. In the first place, there is no murder; and while some detective-story readers like few murders and some like many, all detective-story readers like one murder. In the second place, there is no action: almost 275 pages of the conversation of female dons must be leafed through before the Shrewsbury College Menace becomes anything more than mildly annoying. In the third place, there is no problem, and therefore, really, no mystery. It is true that the identity of the culprit is shielded until the last few pages of the novel, but more than this is needed to make a mystery story truly mysterious. The essence of the pure detective story is that it should present a central problem, or problems, which seems, on the face of it, impossible of solution: the mystery of the locked room and the mystery of the perfect alibi are the problems most frequently used and therefore most familiar to detective-story readers. In the perfect mystery the murderer avoids detection, not because the detective cannot physically lay his hand on him, but because the criminal has so cleverly distorted and thereby camouflaged his crime that it is impossible for the detective even to grasp its nature and meaning, let alone its perpetrator. Dorothy Sayers has, in the past, produced excellent examples of the pure detective story, but in the hybrid "Gaudy Night" she has given us a primer mystery in which the criminal escapes her pursuers only by being slightly fleet of foot.

The metamorphosis of Dorothy Sayers is interesting, even though a little unfortunate. It may be that from the very beginning Miss Sayers, the brilliant detective-story writer, was a frustrated novelist. Certain it is that in successive mysteries she has been edging, more and more boldly, into the novelist's territory, until with "Gaudy Night" she has flatly put her foot in it, in more senses than one. Miss Sayers as a detective-story writer was considered, quite rightly, a stylist, a wit, a psychologist, a scholar. Since the standards by which a novelist is measured are inevitably more severe, Miss Sayers as a novelist can now lay claim to scholarship alone. She can still quote aptly from Burton, Drayton, Sir John Harington, Sir Thomas Browne, Sir Philip Sidney, but laid bare in a full-length novel her style seems prosy, her wit over-prim and spinsterish, her psychology slightly antiquated and mechanical. Her venture into the novelist's field is exactly as regrettable and as awkward as the stage debut of a drawing-room mimic. The novel has gained no new Aldous Huxley, and the mystery story has, temporarily, at any rate, lost one of its most able practitioners.

The metamorphosis of Miss Sayers is perhaps significant. It is possible that the mystery story is even now in its death throes, and that mystery-story writers, powerless to invent new soluble-insoluble problems, will soon be obliged to follow Miss Sayers offers graduate professional curricula for the acquisition of the necessary knowledge and skills for social work, leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees.

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE SOCIAL WORK AGENCIES

increasingly require such knowledge and skill from candidates for positions.

May first is the last day for filing applications for fellowships. For full information, write to

DR. M. J. KARPf, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish
Social Work

71 West 47th Street, New York City

into "art" literature or else give up writing altogether. "The Crimson Patch" by Phoebe Atwood Taylor also foreshadows the death of its genre. The latest of Mrs. Taylor's Cape Cod stories is, as usual, loaded with local color, "picturesque" humor, and diehard political propaganda; but like "Gaudy Night" it is not very mysterious. Here again the unmasking of the villain comes as no shock to the reader. "The Crimson Patch" has action, and it has two murders; but it has no proper knotty central problem. It is a thin, conventional story, but, in its small way, symptomatic. Mrs. Taylor too, though more quietly and tentatively than Miss Sayers, has sauntered out of the detective-story preserves. By pinning the murders on a "parlor pink" who has a number of unkind and absurd things to say about capitalists, she has, in a ladylike manner, identified herself with the rostrum.

MARY MCCARTHY

DRAMA

"The Holy Blissful Martyr"

THE Federal Theater Project has undertaken plays of various sorts, from the simple entertainment to the revolutionary drama heavy with the problems of today. Being sensible persons, its directors have assumed that the audience for drama at popular prices was most likely to be attracted by either the one or the other, and "Triple A Plowed Under" did, indeed, achieve a sort of succès de scandale. But who—sensible or not sensible—would have supposed that its one real "hit" to date would be a drama in verse dealing with certain complicated events in twelfth-century England? T. S. Eliot, the author, is not an easy writer, and the question of the extent to which the character of Thomas à Becket was truly saintly is hardly a burning one today. The relevance to contemporary problems is indirect, to say the least, and it would be easy to prove that no one with a head on his shoulders or a heart in his breast could possibly concern himself with it just now. Yet "Murder in the Cathedral" (Manhattan Theater) is a hit. The fact proves nothing at all; but there are some things upon which it does, perhaps, cast certain doubts.

When the play was published here last fall, it was reviewed by Mark Van Doren in our issue for October 9. What chiefly remains to be said is that it acts extremely well and that Mr. Eliot, whom we thought of as a lyric and reflective poet of intense if constricted force, can write lines which are speakable and chantable with striking effect. To say this is not—as any prospective spectator unfamiliar with the text should be warned—to say that he writes in what we are accustomed to think of as the natural style of the poetic drama. He does not attempt to adapt the manner and moods of poetry to contemporary theatrical practice, as Maxwell Anderson, for example, does. Neither does he make any effort to achieve the Shakespearean effect, produced through the fact that the language and versification are so flexible, so varied in accordance with the situation and the character, that dramatic verse becomes something entirely different from lyrical or reflective poetry, and that in consequence one comes to be more aware of its richness and adaptability than of the fact that it is verse. Mr. Eliot has neither the vitality, the exuberance, nor the broad sympathetic understanding of men and tempers for anything of the sort. He is intense rather than (pardon the paradox), in this sense, cath-

Act I

"DIE WALKÜRE"

A new Victor recording by Lotte Lehmann

Lauritz Melchior and Emanuel List

with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under Bruno Walter

Out of a spontaneous and all-consuming love—doomed from the moment it flamed to life as Siegmund first saw Sieglinde in the house of her husband, Hunding—Wagner spun music whose like the world had never heard before... It is music that engulfs the emotions with its sheer, sensuous beauty, while it excites the intellect with the bold and unfettered creative imagination of its composer and with the cosmic implications underlying its theme. The complete First Act of this second great opera of the "Ring"—"Die Walküre"—has been preserved for all time by Victor in the voices and music of the top-rank Wagnerian artists of our day.

The cast:

Sieglinde Lotte Lehmann

Siegmund Lauritz Melchior

Hunding Emanuel List

with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under the great Bruno Walter

Here again Victor higher fidelity recording demonstrates its priceless gift to music lovers. Intonation, color, technique—the living quality of greatness in these Wagnerian artists—are perfectly reproduced. Hear this magnificent recording at your dealer's. Recorded on 8 12-in. Victor Red Seal Records, 16 sides. Album, complete with libretto in German and English, $16.

RCA Victor Division, RCA Manufacturing Co., Inc., Camden, N. J.
RCA Victor Co., Ltd., Montreal, Canada

olic. For all his critical studies in the field he is, for that reason, by no means Elizabethan. He is medieval instead, and what one thinks of is not "Hamlet" but "Everyman," the liturgical drama of the church not the popular if exalted entertainment of the sixteenth-century inn yard.

To some extent, of course, this effect is due to the fact that some of his characters are pure abstractions—the four "Tempters" for example; that other characters, like the Women of Canterbury, are symbols not persons; and that the action is conducted in a manner closer to that of the pageant and procession than to that of the more complexly evolved drama. But its medieval character goes deeper, pervading as it does the whole conception both of what is suitable expression and what is the nature of essential reality. The tone is uniform not varied, because the sense of the importance of personality as expressed in individual variations is foreign to the spirit of a drama dealing with conceptions not persons, and because, therefore, it is through formalization rather than through representational variety that the intended effect can be achieved. And unless I am very much mistaken, the point of view of the dramatist, the judgment which he finally makes upon the events with which he has been dealing, can also be grasped only in these essentially medieval terms.

Eliot begins when the people of Canterbury, cleric and lay alike, are awaiting the return of Thomas from his seven years of exile. He shows the Archbishop beset by four tempters, the last and most dangerous of whom whispers that the crown of martyrdom is the only crown really worth a great man's ambition. And he ends with the lamentations of the people, who, as he had told them in a sermon true Christians must often do, find themselves mourning and rejoicing at the same time over a Christian mystery, this time the mystery of martyrdom. At no time is there any attempt to hide the human and often unworthy forces at work. Just as Thomas is not only a saint but an ambitious man as well, so the conflict between Henry and the Pope is a struggle for power as well as a struggle between the idea of earthly sovereignty and the idea of the Divine Will, to which even kings should be subject. Yet the whole emotion of the play would be meaningless if these facts were interpreted in accord with the habit of post-Renaissance rationalism. Mr. Eliot is certainly not saying that Becket was a fraud and his martyrdom no more than an incident in a political struggle. After all, the Middle Ages knew as well as we know that men were fallible and their motives mixed. Mr. Eliot is saying, or rather putting us in the mood to feel, that it was, nevertheless, rather they than we who knew how to interpret that fact. The human and the unworthy are incidental, not central, and the mystery of martyrdom is more real than the circumstances amid which it occurs. It is we not they who mistake what seems to be for what really is.

Halsted Welles, who staged the present production, deserves great credit for the extremely effective grouping, and Tom Cracraft deserves equal credit for the fine stylized set. Most of the performances are also good, especially that of Harry Irvine, who gives Thomas fine dignity and fire. For obvious reasons the cast is miscellaneous and its members of varying degrees of suitability for their roles, but the direction has pulled things together in surprisingly effective fashion. The little comic interlude toward the end in which the four assassins address the audience is a superb piece of parody. The following note—doubtless not formulated with this production in mind—appears on the program: "The Federal Theater Project is part of the WPA program. However, the viewpoint expressed in this play is not necessarily that of the WPA or any other agency of the government." JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

OUT in Bridgeport, Connecticut, William Seltsam has for the past four years been quietly issuing to the members of his International Record Collectors' Club repressings of records by such artists as Adelina Patti, Edouard de Reszke, Lilli Lehmann, even Ellen Terry. The organization has members in places as distant as Denmark, Australia, and Manchuria. Occasionally Mr. Seltsam digs up an unpublished recording, such as the Caruso-Farrar duet from the end of the first act of "La Bohème." Some of the earlier versions have only piano accompaniment for operatic arias, like the 1903 recording of "Mi par d'udire ancora" from "The Pearl Fishers," by Caruso, found on the other side of the "Bohème" duet. But if the few I have heard are fair examples, the repressings are worth having, for more than mere historical interest. Prices range from $1.75 for double-sided ten-inch records to $2.50 for the more expensive twelve-inches. Mr. Seltsam's address is 318 Reservoir Avenue, Bridgeport.

One of the most gratifying of the recent Victor orchestral releases is a new version of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky (three records, $6.50). It is issued to replace an older recording by the Scala Orchestra under Ettore Panizza. Mr. Koussevitzky does not play little tricks with the tempi, as he did with the Mozart G minor, but gives a straightforward, direct, and therefore exciting performance. The Boston "Pops" Orchestra, directed by Arthur Fiedler, adds to its list of best-sellers Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march and the "Grand March" from "Aïda" (one record, $1.50). Here is a good present for your adolescent nephew who is just beginning to appreciate "good" music. It will gratify him to discover a symphony orchestra acting up like the Seventh Regiment Band.

An even louder recording, though not so likely to be appreciated by the nephew, is that of Arnold Zernak's Chorale and Fugue in D minor (two records, $4). It is played by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy, who is to conduct the Philadelphians next year. The composition sounds like one of Mr. Stokowski's transcriptions of Bach, only more so—ingenious and dramatic imitations of the pipe organ that try to go it one better and often succeed. The music is highly effective but recommended only for phonographs that can reproduce the maximum of sound without distortion. A good phonograph is also needed to do justice to the delicate orchestral colorings of Debussy's "Iberia" and "Soirée dans Grenade," re-recorded by the Paris Conservatory Orchestra under Piero Coppola (three records, $5).

The solidest musical fare of the month is offered in the first album of the Brandenburg concertos, played by the Busch Chamber Players under the direction of Adolf Busch (eight records, $11.50). Mr. Busch plays the solo violin parts himself and does them superbly. The album contains the first four concertos, and Columbia promises the other two next month. The only appreciable defect in the performance is that Marcel Moyse, the first flute, forces his instrument off pitch in one or two fortissimo passages; but this is more than compensated for by his accomplished playing of the softer passages, and by the beautiful performance of the solo oboe, Evelyn Rothwell.

In a less serious vein are Heifetz's album of the "Vieux-temps" concerto in D minor (Victor, three records, $6.50) and Robert Casadesu's two records of the Weber "Concertstück" (Columbia, $3).

HENRY SIMON

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

SAINT JOAN. Martin Beck Theater. Brilliant interpretation by Katharine Cornell of what may well be Shaw's most enduring play.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

ETHAN FROME. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon, and Raymond Massey.

THE CASE OF CLYDE GRIFFITHS. Ethel Barrymore Theater. A "Now, children" version of "An American Tragedy," showing how economics explains everything.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

ANNIE OAKLEY. R.K.O. A minor American masterpiece based on the life of Buffalo Bill's best-loved sharpshooter. Barbara Stanwyck as Annie Oakley divides the honors with Sitting Bull.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE 39 STEPS. Alexander Korda. Months old, but should be seen wherever possible. A swift and beautiful thriller set in the Highlands, and one of several films which argue British leadership in the immediate future.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Alexander Korda. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE
MOROSCO THEATRE, 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thurs. and Sat. at 2:30
Extra Matinee Wednesdays

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:40
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:40

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St., W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:40
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:40

SCHOOL

SPRING TERM REGISTRATION NOW GOING ON AT THE WORKERS SCHOOL

35 East 12 Street

Tel: ALgonquin 4-1199

Courses in:
Political Economy
Marxism—Leninism
Historical Materialism
History
Trade Union Problems
Russian

Dialectical Materialism
American Politics
Social and Political Geography
Literature
Science

Revolutionary Journalism, etc.
Descriptive Catalogue Obtainable Upon Request

TRAVEL

MAXWELL STEWART says:

"Open Road facilities enable you to get about 50% more out of a brief visit to Russia."

VISIT SOVIET RUSSIA

with

LOUIS FISCHER

PRINCESS SKARIATINA

JULIEN BRYAN

JOSHUA KUNITZ

COLSTON WARNE

MAXWELL STEWART

HENRY SHAPIRO

Trips which show you more than tourist sights at least cost of time and money. Circulars on request.

Independent arrangements for those who prefer to travel on their own.

Tenth Season

The Open Road

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street, New York
Cooperating with Intourist

$372 round trip New York with a month in the Soviet Union. Other tours up to $850.

The Intelligent Traveler

BY JOHN ROTHSCHILD

SOURCES OF INFORMATION

IT IS easy enough to get on a boat and go abroad, but I venture to guess that on the homeward voyage many a traveler tries to sift his jumbled impressions and wonders why he went. Generally speaking, the things that everybody does abroad are the things that nobody ought to do.

Certain agencies in this country are prepared to remedy this situation. Some are government information offices; others are cultural organizations whose function is the spread of knowledge about particular countries. The organizations suggested here are sometimes official and sometimes not. Most of them do not sell travel services. The railroad offices give details on costs, hotel accommodations, and the usual "tourist events"; the cultural organizations help you to decide what you want to see and where to find it.

The Soviet Union. All visitors to the Soviet Union make the acquaintance of Intourist; indeed it is almost impossible to travel there otherwise unless one has official business. Intourist is unique: it constitutes a complete monopoly of travel facilities—an administrative centralization of services, Soviet style, which has as its aim not the exploitation of the consumer but standardization of services, price uniformity, and elimination of waste motion. This does not mean regimentation of travelers. In such a vast country, strict control of what visitors see and do would be impossible, even if there were the will to exercise it, which there is not. Intourist acts as the coordinator, and is improving services for travelers with every season. In this country Intourist, 545 Fifth Avenue, is an information center; it does not sell travel services to the public direct.

Germany. Readers of The Nation who want to see what fascism means to the German people and have the sort of contacts that will enable them to do so will find the German Railroad Information Office, 665 Fifth Avenue, helpful in giving technical travel information. Since this is a government agency, its advice on what to see and how to see it naturally represents an official point of view. Anyone who wishes to approach Germany critically will do well to make contact with the various relief organizations for suggestions.

Italy. Italy, as well as Germany, attempts to counteract distrust of fascism by special discounts to travelers. The Italian State Railways, 626 Fifth Avenue, furnish technical information. The Italy-America Society, 301 Park Avenue, exists to foster good-will between the countries, and although it represents the government point of view it is prepared to give intelligent information on Italy's art, festivals, and other classic attractions.

England. The British Travel Association in Rockefeller Center furnishes lists of interesting events and places to see, as well as railroad and hotel information. For specific cultural or educational information the British Library of Information, 270 Madison Avenue, is useful. The English-Speaking Union, 19 West Forty-fourth Street, has branches in all parts of the British Empire. It performs many services for members in the way of introductions, the use of its clubroom facilities, and the like. Its travel department has available much helpful information.

Spain. "Revolution hunters" who want to see the barricades and have the courage to brave the more or less uncharted hotels and trains of Spain should communicate with the Spanish Official Chamber of Commerce, 501 Madison Avenue, for what little information exists in this country regarding Spain.

Scandinavia. The Scandinavian countries are among the few places in the world where early radical trends have resulted in a social and economic pattern which withstands the shocks of world depression. The cooperative movement and the adult-education movement are better developed and more consequential there than anywhere else in the world. The librarian at the American-Scandinavian Foundation, 116 East Sixty-fourth Street, can help visitors who want to do more than tourist sightseeing. The Swedish State Railways, 630 Fifth Avenue, are the source for technical travel facts.

Eastern Europe. Poland, Rumania, Hungary, Austria, Czecho-Slovakia are rich in peasant arts, in scenery, and in associations that go back to the beginnings of man's history. The great festivals are well advertised, but the charm of this region lies off the main routes. The following are enthusiasts who know one or another of these countries well and are willing to share their knowledge.

Elma Pratt, director of the International School of Art, 5 East Twenty-eighth Street. The school has representatives in all of the countries named—usually citizens distinguished in the arts. Miss Pratt can be especially helpful to travelers interested in peasant arts, but will give general advice to others.

Meda Lynn, at the Hungarian-American Society, Rockefeller Center, is particularly informed regarding peasant life.

Mme. Irina Piotrowska, of the Polish Cultural Center, 151 East Sixty-seventh Street, is an authority on Poland. The center is part of the Polish consulate but goes far beyond the usual governmental services in helpfulness to travelers.

Yugoslavia. What technical information there is can be had from the Consulate of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia, 745 Fifth Avenue. Miss Pratt, listed above, also knows Yugoslavia well.

France. The newly opened French Information Center, 610 Fifth Avenue, is a cultural institution prepared to dispense all sorts of general information, but travel questions will be answered by the Railways of France at the same address.

Other countries and localities are more or less covered by the following agencies:

Switzerland. Swiss Federal Railways, 475 Fifth Avenue.

China. The China Society of America, 570 Lexington Avenue.

Japan. The Japan Tourist Bureau, 551 Fifth Avenue; the Japan Society, 527 Fifth Avenue.

India. India State Railways Bureau, 38 East Fifty-seventh Street.

North Africa. North African Tour Department, French Line, 610 Fifth Avenue.

South Africa. South African Legation, 2125 Leroy Place, Washington, D. C.

Egypt. Egyptian Tourist Development Association, Rockefeller Center.

South America. Pan-American Airways, 135 East Forty-second Street, has just finished a thorough survey of all the South American countries.

Mexico. Committee for Cultural Relations with Latin America, 112 East Nineteenth Street; Aguirres Guest Tours, Cinco de Mayo, 16-C, Mexico City.

Summer Schools. About the cheapest and most satisfactory way of sizing up a country in a short time is to attend one of the many excellent summer sessions abroad. Complete information waits upon the publication of summer catalogues, which often arrive here late. The Institute of International Education, 2 West Forty-fifth Street, has the dates as soon as they are available.

Information regarding student gatherings may be obtained from the National Student Federation of America, 8 West Fortieth Street, and the American Student Union, 112 East Nineteenth Street.

Information regarding conferences and lecture series in the field of international relations may be obtained from the League of Nations Association, 8 West Fortieth Street, and the World Peace Foundation, 8 West Fortieth Street.

Conferences and events of interest to educators may be learned about from the Progressive Education Association, 310 West Ninetieth Street.

The Summer Theater Abroad. The April issue of Theater Arts Monthly, 40 East Forty-ninth Street, contains invaluable information on theatrical and musical events and festivals abroad during the coming summer. These schedules should be in the pocket of everyone who visits Europe or Mexico this summer.

All addresses in the foregoing article are in New York City unless otherwise stated.

Letters to the Editors

THE FORMAT AGAIN

Dear Sirs: I like everything about the new format, especially the typographic variations which personalize your departments. The old format was growing definitely stodgy. The new format makes you look years younger and more healthy.

LEIGH WHITE

New York, March 23

Dear Sirs: We don't like your new format. We liked better the old, thin, light Nation, easy to hold and turn over. We feel irritated and unhappy and wonder how other Nation subscribers feel about the change.

L. S. AND M. N. MORRISON

West Hartford, Conn., March 22

Dear Sirs: I am very much distressed over the new format of The Nation. We have taken the paper as long as I can remember, and I have always enjoyed—yes, taken pride in—not only the contents but its elegant, distinctive appearance, which I considered the essence of good taste. Without exception I hate every one of your innovations, especially the common drawings. The Nation's format was perfect before; why change it?

EMILY DEMBITZ

Louisville, Ky., March 21

Dear Sirs: I regret that I am no one in particular, merely a long-standing subscriber, but I am moved to tell you how much I enjoy and admire your new format.

I like it all, save possibly the cartoons, which I don't mind if others find them pleasing.

It is a real pleasure to read it in its new, cheerful type. I do think it was a bit stodgy before, though I never gave it much thought. Please accept my warmest congratulations.

HELEN LEIGHTON

Brookline, Mass., March 23

Dear Sirs: I rejoice to find in your March 25 issue companions to join me in my groans over the format of the new, blatant Nation. I have been a subscriber for so long a time that it seems it must be from my cradle (I am now seventy-one), and I feel as though I had lost an all-time friend.

AGNES GODFREY GAY

Washington, D. C., March 21

MORE SPACE FOR RECORDS

Dear Sirs: I have enjoyed Henry Simon's column on Records—it fills a long-felt want, at least in my own case. But may I offer a friendly criticism?

It seems to me the column is too short. Mr. Simon hardly does more than mention the new recordings. I should prefer to see him elaborate on some of the matters he now mentions and also to speak of some of the recordings he now omits, apparently for lack of space.

M. S. WEINSTEIN

Brooklyn, March 9

AND FOR CONSUMERS

Dear Sirs: I am glad to find Miss Brindze's articles on the consumer given a whole page in The Nation. Her articles are important and helpful and it is worth while to play them up. It is too bad you can't afford to give her more space.

New York, March 15

W. GLYN

MODERN PARIIAHS

Dear Sirs: My hearty thanks for Mr. Villard's article on the Jewish situation in Germany in The Nation of March 4. He has spoken the word which I hoped would come from some Christian friend of humanity and the Jews, because no statement however eloquent emanating from Jewish sources carries the conviction that such an article from a Gentile does.

Mr. Villard's approach to the question of anti-Semitism, that is, its effect on the soul of the anti-Semite, is the only one which will ultimately solve the problem. The world has been so full of horrors of which Armenians, Jews, Chinese, and so forth have been the victims that it has grown callous to the troubles of individual groups. The Hitler regime will be changed only when the best people of every land let it be known that the present leaders of the German people are the pariahs of civilization.

HUGO MOCK

New York, March 30

SALUTE TO MR. RAVAGE

Dear Sirs: I've just finished M. E. Ravage's article on French politics (The Nation, March 18) and I'm so overjoyed by his grasp of what seems to me the reality of the French situation. It does my heart good to see somebody writing on present-day France who knows what he is talking about and hasn't any ax to grind.

In general, The Nation is grand these days.

DOROTHY CANFIELD FISHER

Arlington, Vt., March 18

A DIFFERENCE OF OPINION

Dear Sirs: I was shocked to see in the pages of The Nation so shallow, superficial, and sentimental an editorial as that in the issue of March 18 dealing with the decision of the New York Court of Appeals which declared the minimum-wage law for women unconstitutional.

You say, "It happened to involve the laundry industry, which is notoriously ill-paid, long-houred, exploited. The workers are principally Negro women. Their work is unskilled; cutthroat competition abounds in the industry; the firms are small and many; union organization is weak."

Is The Nation, of all magazines, contending now that the rights and liberties of hundreds of thousands of intelligent, hard-working women in the state of New York must be sacrificed to protect a small group of oppressed and unfortunate Negro women who could be protected infinitely better if the same amount of money and effort were put into organizing them that has been put into the framing and passage of this unfair and unjust minimum-wage law?

For one woman who gains by legislation that applies unequally to men and women, thousands lose through undercutting by men and boys. Time and time again it has been proved that minimum-wage laws, applying to women only, result in lower wages for all.

MARION LOUISE KENNEY,
Delaware State Chairman,
National Woman's Party
Marshallton, Del., March 16

Dear Sirs: A summary of the January work of the Enforcement Bureau of the Division of Minimum Wage of the State Department of Labor shows that in January, 1936, there was collected $2591.88 for 1,046 women laundry workers in 134 wage adjustments. That certainly looks to me as if we needed a minimum-wage law.

Second, a study of wages and family responsibilities of employed women whose families are on relief shows that "6,674 gainfully employed women in New York City were on home relief (May to September, 1935) because their earnings were inadequate for the support of themselves and their families." It makes me indignant that taxpayers must thus subsidize the employers of these women in practically all industries and occupations.

In the face of this sort of situation, which could occur even while we had a minimum-wage law in effect, comes the majority decision of the Court of Appeals that this law is unconstitutional. Reading the two opinions, and seeing them side by side, one can have no doubt as to which shows more careful thought, social intelligence, and real appreciation of the entire subject of constitutionality as applied to minimum-wage legislation. Can we never hope for the use of plain common sense by a majority of our judicial officers? I am outraged by this latest example of their stupid, hazy legal technicalities and evasions, and a number of citizens join me in what we feel cannot be too strong a protest against this myopic decision.

W. WEBSTER

New York, March 18

SOVIET CENSORSHIP

Dear Sirs: During the last few months the stupid Soviet censor has been stopping my copies of The Nation. For thirteen years he allowed them to reach me. But now he has apparently suffered a new accession of imbecility. The Foreign Commissariat intervened on my behalf, but the censor's authority, it seems is higher. Will you please, therefore, mail The Nation to me in sealed envelopes. Perhaps these will escape his prying fingers.

LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, February 25

CORRECTION

In our issue of January 1, 1936, we published a letter signed by Helen Kay as secretary of the League of Women Shoppers about the activities of the League, which included a reflection upon Hyman Nemser and a Retail Clerks' Union of which he was then the head.

We are now informed by the League of Women Shoppers that that part of its communication was based on misinformation, and that in fairness to Mr. Nemser it desires to state that further investigation showed no basis of fact for the statement that the Retail Clerks' Union had no worker members or for the allegation that Mr. Nemser had extorted money from workers.

EDITORS OF THE NATION

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's Moscow correspondent, has spent most of the winter away from Moscow. He is now in Italy and presently will go to Spain. But in these days of interwoven international complications this is undoubtedly the best way to look at the Russian scene. Mr. Fischer will return to the U. S. S. R. in about a month.

CARLETON BEALS started his career as one of The Nation's star reporters when he followed Sandino around Nicaragua in 1928. Neither geographical, meteorological, nor temporal difficulties can prevent Mr. Beals from seeing all there is to see. His researches in Alabama, out of which he will write two articles, are no exception.

ALBERT VITON is the pseudonym of a young foreign correspondent formerly in Germany and Italy, now traveling in Palestine. Mr. Viton's article After Ethiopia—England? which appeared in The Nation for October 16, 1935, was quoted in scores of papers all over the country.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN is the author of "American Policy Toward Russia Since 1917" and "The Nazi Dictatorship." He is a member of the Department of Political Science of the University of Chicago.

MARY MCCARTHY'S articles on the critics, which she wrote last fall in collaboration with Margaret Marshall, caused a very hot tempest in the book-reviewing teapot.

HENRY SIMON, The Nation's reviewer of musical recordings, is an enthusiastic amateur musician, preferring string quartets. He is also professor of English at New College.

JOHN ROTHSCCHILD, whose useful information for the intelligent traveler has appeared for several years in The Nation, is director of the Open Road.

GEORGE SCHREIBER'S lively caricatures of Washington celebrities, which appear regularly in The Nation, are drawn from life and on the spot. Mr. Schreiber is accompanying PAUL W. WARD on his reportorial rounds.

STUYVESANT VAN VEEN'S cartoons of William Saroyan and Havelock Ellis have already appeared in The Nation. He will draw T. S. Eliot next week.

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

465

EDITORIALS:

THE COMING LABOR PARTY

468

IS CHILD LABOR ABOLISHED?

469

MULCTING THE AGED

470

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

471

OUR NUMBER ONE FASCISTS by Evelyn Seeley

473

RED CLAY IN ALABAMA by Carleton Beals

475

HITLER'S TOTALITARIAN THEATER

by Lilian T. Mowrer

477

"SOAKING THE RICH" by George Terborgh

479

THE CONSUMER FRONT by Ruth Brindze

481

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

482

BROUN'S PAGE

483

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

"WINTERSET"—CRITICS' PRIZE-WINNER

by Joseph Wood Krutch

484

THE MAINSPRINGS OF CAPITALISM

by Maxwell S. Stewart

485

LOVE IN CONNECTICUT by Louis Kronenberger

486

A QUARTET ON CRIME by Austin H. MacCormick

487

THE ECONOMY OF PLENTY by Frederic Dewhurst

488

JOURNEY FOR JOURNEY'S SAKE

by Melville J. Herskovits

489

DRAMA: THE DEVIL'S TUNES

by Joseph Wood Krutch

490

FILMS: BYRON IN THE U. S. S. R. by Mark Van Doren

492

DRAWINGS: by Edmund Duffy, Georges
Schreiber, and Refrégier

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

The Shape of Things

*

PROMOTERS WILL REJOICE, BUT INVESTORS should mourn at the Supreme Court decision on the Truth in Securities Act. The court majority of six, again voting in a solid phalanx, has been extremely clever in not declaring the act unconstitutional outright: that would have raised far too much of an outcry. Following the Brandeis technique of not deciding more than has to be decided by the facts of the immediate case, Justice Sutherland has turned the technique to his own uses. He has decided that J. Edward Jones, a New York promoter whose registration statement was believed to contain fraudulent items, could by withdrawing his statement avoid further investigation by the commission and prosecution by the courts. Having thereby very considerably crippled the effective administration of the act, Justice Sutherland goes on blithely to say that "it becomes unnecessary to consider the constitutional validity of the act." Indeed he is right, for as far as any effective check upon fraudulent and unscrupulous issuers of securities is concerned, the act might just as well have been declared unconstitutional. In the words of Justice Cardozo's dissenting opinion—with which Justice Brandeis and Justice Stone joined—"To permit an offending registrant to stifle an inquiry by precipitate retreat on the eve of his exposure is to give immunity to guilt, to encourage falsehood and evasion, to invite the cunning and unscrupulous to gamble with detection. If withdrawal without leave may check investigation before securities have been issued, it may do so thereafter. . . . The statute and its sanctions become the sport of clever knaves."

*

THESE ARE HARD AND CUTTING WORDS, AND they come from a judge who is not given to reckless statements. But the tone of Justice Cardozo's dissent, sharp as it is, was sufficiently justified by the enormous consequences that may follow upon the decision and by the nature of Justice Sutherland's opinion. It is by turns excessively legalistic and vaguely rhetorical. It takes the view, in effect, that Mr. Jones's registration of his securities was an isolated individual act with no implications for the public welfare; and that his decision to withdraw it ended the whole matter. It pays no attention to the social importance of the act—the needs that led to it and the purposes it was intended to serve. It strives to maintain a decent ignorance of what is known to everyone else—what, in Justice Cardozo's phrase, "a host of impoverished investors will be ready to attest, that there are dangers in untruths and half-truths when certificates masquerading as securities pass current in the market." For a problem that is primarily one of the technique of the control of corporate securities, the majority decision offers as solution a treatise on arbitrary power and autocracy. It conjures up phantoms of the young lawyers of the SEC trying to institute a new Stuart despotism over business. Justice Cardozo's answer will be remembered by future generations for its classic understatement. "A commission which is without coercive powers . . . is likened with denunciatory fervor to the Star Chamber of the Stuarts. Historians may find hyperbole in the sanguinary simile." Historians will also set this decision down as one in a long line by the Supreme Court which so crippled the attempts to regulate business that it led finally to the drastic curbing of the court's power.

*

AT FIRST SIGHT THE WAGNER-ELLENBOGEN Housing bill seems a poor substitute for the type of housing legislation which the Administration has promised on numerous occasions. The total expenditure contemplated under the bill during a four-year interval is only $976,000,000, or $98 for each of the 10,000,000 families which Senator Wagner himself estimates to be in need of new housing facilities. Nevertheless, the bill is sound in that it represents the first carefully planned program for providing housing for the low-income groups in our population. In order to make low rents possible, the bill would authorize outright grants not to exceed 45 per cent of the construction costs, coupled with a government loan for the balance at an interest to be fixed by the housing authority which is to be repayable over a period of sixty years. A significant innovation is the recognition of "public housing societies," whose members are low-income families, as the sponsors and lessees of projects. This should not only stimulate the organization of local labor and consumer groups for housing, but also take the curse off federal ownership and administration where there is no local housing authority. Nearly all the organizations interested in low-cost housing are behind the bill, not because it is adequate, but because it represents the only hope of achieving anything at this session of Congress. Its chances of passage at this session are dependent entirely on the President's attitude, which is to say, they depend on the speed with which public pressure can be mobilized behind it.

*

THE IMPORTANT CAMPAIGN DEVELOPMENTS last week took place in the ranks of labor (commented on elsewhere) and among the Socialists. The sweeping victory of the left-wing Socialist group in New York must be hailed as proof that the Socialist rank and file are ready to abandon the sectarian policy once followed with such fatal results by the radical parties of Europe. Compared with these developments the struggles in the Republican primaries seem just shadow-boxing. As was expected, Senator Borah was badly beaten in New York. But the Senator is probably reserving his best oratorical bolts to hurl at "the interests" in the presence of audiences in Illinois cities. The Institute of Public Opinion shows Landon leading the Republicans with 56 per cent of the sample vote, while Borah lags with 20 per cent. The Senator is showing courage, but it seems clear that he is waging a losing fight in his paradoxical attempt to clean "the interests" out of the Republican Party. It is a little difficult to understand what would be left if he succeeded. Meanwhile Mr. Hoover continues to thwack the New Deal in once-bright phrases that tarnish with every passing week. It is worth noting that in his Fort Wayne speech on April 4 his anxiety to prove that he did not leave the country in ruins was so great as to lead him to twist some figures. He cited the A. F. of L. figures which show 12,600,000 unemployed now, and compared them with the estimate of 11,600,000 at Mr. Roosevelt's election. Unfortunately he used the revised A. F. of L. estimate for today and the old estimate for 1932. According to the revised estimates there were 15,653,000 unemployed when Mr. Hoover left office in March, 1933.

*

AIDED BY THE USE OF POISON GAS AND THE aerial bombardment of unfortified towns, the Italian army appears to have dealt a crushing blow to the Ethiopians of the northern front. For the first time since the beginning of hostilities last October the Ethiopians were forced into an open conflict, to which there could be only one outcome. Granting that the Italian reports of the utter rout of Haile Selassie's Imperial Guard may have been touched up for home consumption, there can be little doubt that Mussolini has finally gained the upper hand. This does not mean, however, that the war is necessarily nearing its end. Hundreds of miles of mountainous territory lie between the advance guard of the Italian troops and the rich highland country surrounding Addis Ababa. Merely to penetrate this territory unharassed by opposing forces would require weeks of careful preparation. With the rainy season approaching, the chances are that the Ethiopian troops, though scattered, can still carry on an effective guerrilla campaign. Should the League suddenly rouse itself from its stupor and take its long-threatened action of prohibiting Italy from importing oil, coal, and steel, there would still be a chance that Mussolini might never enjoy the fruits of his mad adventure.

*

GERMANY'S REJECTION OF THE POWERS' peace proposals marks a complete victory for Nazi diplomacy. A month ago all the Nazi leaders, including Hitler himself, were extremely apprehensive regarding the reaction of the powers to the unilateral abrogation of the Locarno agreement, and they have been surprised and gratified by the failure of the League to adopt stronger measures. Primary responsibility for the collapse of collective security obviously rests with Great Britain. And behind Britain's weakness lies a serious factional struggle in the National Government. The pro-Nazi faction, which includes, among others, Sir John Simon, Viscount Hailsham, and Viscount Monsell, has not only prevented the Cabinet from supporting punitive action against Germany but is now opposing the consultation of the military staffs of the former Allies. Mr. Lloyd George has also come out violently against the staff talks on the ground that similar contact between the general staffs was largely responsible for drawing England into the World War. On the other hand, the dominant faction in the Cabinet, represented by Captain Eden, Alfred Duff Cooper, and the two Chamberlains, has supported the consultations as the one remaining means of curbing Nazi aggression. With the control of the government at stake, following the early retirement of Baldwin, the fate of Europe may be determined by wholly extraneous political maneuvers within the ranks of the Conservative Party.

*

THE REPORTED JAPANESE-GERMAN MILITARY agreement serves as further illustration of the danger of allowing Hitler to have his way in the Rhineland. While rumors of such an understanding have been afloat for many months, the story comes this time from a source which cannot be ignored—an informant close to the British Foreign Office. If it is true, and there is every reason to believe that it is, the German protestations of peace can only be interpreted as a temporary maneuver to divert attention from the plan for a concerted attack on the Soviet Union. In order to carry out this program with as little difficulty as possible, Germany has left no stone unturned in its effort to sabotage the principle of collective security. It has insisted on bilateral as against multilateral non-aggression pacts, and has consistently refused to enter into negotiations for a general treaty of mutual assistance against aggression. While the remilitarization of the Rhineland was prompted primarily by the pressure of Germany's internal crisis, its timing was very likely the result of Hitler's determination to prevent the League from being strengthened by the imposition of oil sanctions against Italy. Unlike certain British statesmen, he is aware that fascism and collective security are incompatible.

*

THE ROMAN HOLIDAY THAT THE LINDBERGH-Hauptmann case provided is familiar to persons not only in every part of the United States but in every quarter of the globe. Its first aspect was a sublimely hideous example of American hero-baiting. It went on through scene after scene of sadistic persecution, first of Colonel Lindbergh and his wife, and later of Hauptmann himself. Millions of words described the spectacle; millions of copies of newspapers were sold, in thousands of editions, to carry it on; millions of dollars were probably taken in by the newspaper exploiters of the greatest human-interest story ever sent to bless the yellow—and the not so yellow—press. An interesting sidelight is the suggestion that William Randolph Hearst bore a personal grudge against Colonel Lindbergh for the latter's efforts, along with those of his father-in-law, to bring peace in Mexico when Mr. Hearst wanted intervention to protect his holdings there. This, though it makes an American public which is avid for sensationalism a little less the villain of the piece, merely adds to the macabre fantasy. And not the least fantastic was the end, when the political ambitions of a Governor of New Jersey imposed upon a human being the torture of three times facing the electric chair before the final shock was administered. There must have been a great number of Americans to whom the spectacle of making news copy of human misery was thoroughly repugnant. Yet in spite of them, in spite of common decency, humanity, and civilization, the incredible drama went on. The only thing that emerges from it without question is the brutality and stupidity of capital punishment. Without the shadow that the electric chair cast over the case, a good deal of the play would never have taken place.

*

THE WAR-PROFITS BILL FACES DRASTIC REVISION at the hands of the Senate Finance Committee as a result of "privately delivered testimony" to the effect that war-time production might be stifled by too severe war taxation. Where it has been proposed to take 99 per cent of individual incomes over $10,000 and all but 3 per cent of corporate income, the committee has decided on a graduated schedule higher in the lower brackets and reaching a maximum of 70 or 80 per cent. At the same time the tax on incomes under $10,000 is to be increased. No device has so far been invented which is powerful enough to thwart the profit-making instinct of modern capital once it is turned into the arena of war. Price-fixing and the excess-profits tax, on the basis of their World War record, do not fulfil their purpose of "taking profits out of war." Nevertheless, any legislation which tends to dim the prospect of war profits has its uses in dampening the war spirit among our dividend patriots. And the average citizen whose own regimentation is so carefully mapped out in the War Department's industrial-mobilization plan could not put a penny to better use than in sending a postcard to his representatives in Congress urging passage of the war-profits bill in its original form.

*

WHILE FRANCE AND ENGLAND SIMMER IN AN atmosphere of mutual mistrust, French and British intellectuals have managed to maintain a united front. A joint manifesto has been issued by the Comité de Vigilance des Intellectuels Antifascistes and the Society for Intellectual Liberty, whose presidents are respectively Paul Langevin and Aldous Huxley, urging collective action along specific lines as the only way of dealing with the crisis. Beginning with a vigorous blast against the British peace-at-any-price attitude, it calls the unilateral denunciation of Locarno "politically, juridically, and morally indefensible," and concludes with proposals calling for general, simultaneous disarmament, a reconsideration of the economic difficulties of all countries, and the enactment of a universal treaty of peace recognizing "the absolute equality of rights and duties." Unfortunately these proposals will be dismissed by the diplomats as visionary and impractical; and, indeed, with the post-war experience of shattered pacts and broken pledges no one can blame the diplomats for being hard-boiled. But the real worth of the manifesto lies in its proof that in the realm of the mind a unity can still exist which cuts across political allegiances.

The Coming Labor Party

THE formation of Labor's Non-Partisan League, with Major Berry of NRA fame as its sponsor, John L. Lewis as one of its supporters, and Mr. Roosevelt's reelection as its goal, indicates that at least one more Presidential year must pass before labor assumes its full political responsibility. At the same time it is apparent that Mr. Lewis and some of his allies in the Committee for Industrial Organization are not entering the Roosevelt coalition with a faith as blind as Major Berry's that labor will find its salvation in a Democratic heaven. And the drift of events makes it compulsory for all progressives to reexamine the possibilities and block out a course for an effective radical party.

Traditionally, third parties have been born in the West. That most of them have also died there is not without its lesson. The West, with its regionalism, its economic naivete, and its frontier conditioning, has been the easy prey for the more innocent brands of demagoguery such as Townsendism, Utopianism, and Epic, as well as the home ground of the more solid agricultural and reform movements represented by the La Follettes and Olson. By the same token these movements have for the most part been turned to the uses of the old parties which control the local and state political machines. The faith that an effective radical party will spring full-fledged out of the West must be checked against the fact that the impulse to rebellion there is so strong, yet so untutored that it must be corraled and trained with the utmost realism.

The truth is that a genuine radical party will come out of a soil which runs much deeper than regionalism. Labor—farm and factory, organized and unorganized, employed and unemployed—alone can give such a party a nationwide mass base. A new party must be a labor and not a liberal party. Aside from the increasing difficulty of liberalism in maintaining itself over the widening chasm between economic groups, a liberal party can never hope to overcome the hazard of a Roosevelt whose words—and even a few of his deeds—will plague it at every crossroads.

Politically American labor is in the earliest stages of mobilization. The dead hand of craft unionism, which was never capable of political action if only for the reason that by its nature it can have no mass basis, has not yet been thrown off. The movement for industrial unionism in the mass-production industries is barely beginning. There is not the slightest doubt that this new movement will tap sources of strength and devotion in yet unorganized millions. Moreover, it must inevitably move into the political field, for the motive force of industrial unionism is the collective principle that the individual worker can hope for no permanent advancement except in so far as all workers advance. At present, however, the great body of labor is not even organized; economically and politically it is illiterate and untrained as far as its own interests are concerned. Therefore any attempt to lead this raw army into a national venture must be undertaken only with the greatest caution and after the most careful preparation.

This does not mean that the impulse toward political action which is operating more and more forcefully in every community should not be encouraged. On the contrary the new growth should be carefully nurtured, but on its own terms. A political party, like any other organism, is made up of small units. Those units must be first of all genuine living bodies indigenous to their communities, not bubbles of wishful thinking floating in a national ferment. This means that they must have a labor, that is, a trade-union base; it means also that they must conduct systematic and always difficult campaigns of education and organization. The raw regiments of labor, in a word, must learn to fight by capturing local objectives, both economic and political.

There are plenty of models available for the kind of hard work we have in mind. The share-croppers in Alabama and Arkansas are learning economics and politics in day-by-day lessons which they can never forget. Their unions are being shaped into fighting instruments literally under fire. "The raids," reads a letter from Birmingham, "sort of interrupt the work." Local 574 in Minneapolis is the center of a vigorous labor movement which long ago became an important factor in local and state politics and whose influence has spread far beyond its original limits. The Maritime Federation on the West Coast has steadily extended its influence until the Gulf ports are already lined up under a second maritime federation and the Atlantic Coast must eventually follow the same path. In a few communities labor parties have been formed which actually have a chance of electing local and state officials and of exercising genuine political power. The movement to form a labor party in Akron, where a notable labor battle has just been fought, is eminently sound. Such a line of specific advance offers the most constructive path toward a national farmer-labor party.

All this means that a new farmer-labor party must build solidly and realistically, and must not be betrayed into wishful thinking. We welcome the desire of the Minnesota convention to explore the whole problem of launching a national ticket this year. If the action of Minnesota meets with enough response from other local and state groups to force the calling of a national convention, that will be answer enough from the rank and file to the doubts that are being raised as to where they stand. But even when such a convention meets, its chief importance will still be the effect it will have on the Congressional and state elections. There can be no question of electing a President this year. But a national ticket and a national platform may easily form a rallying-point around which the local forces can gather. They may be able to return a bloc of Senators and Congressmen who will work more cohesively in Washington than any have done thus far, and they may be able also to send some state and local administrations to victory. But the most important consideration is that whatever local gains are made politically will help the struggle for economic organization and education, and thus aid in creating a long-run trade-union base for a really powerful farmer-labor party.

For the long run the situation looks more favorable than it does today. The depression stripped large sections of the population of their fondest economic illusions. The New Deal advanced the process of education by arousing hopes and then dashing them. The new depression now preparing may be expected to sharpen the divergent interests of economic groups to the point where they will be compelled to compete for political power in their own true guises. When that time comes—and it may be in 1940 or it may be in 1944—the minorities that benefit from the present economic chaos will be found arrayed against the large majority whose interests lie in the direction of a socialized state. Then, and only then, will labor and its allies among the farmer and other middle-class groups face a real test of their strength.

Is Child Labor Abolished?

A TELEGRAM from Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, was received on March 31 by the New York State Senate Judiciary Committee which is conducting hearings on the child-labor amendment. President Butler, like many other estimable persons, is opposed to the amendment, not because he believes children ought to work for hire, but because he fears undue "control" by Congress of "persons under eighteen"—whom Mr. Butler refuses to admit are children. One sentiment in his telegram of protest is worth quoting: "We have the word of the President of the United States, who three times publicly repeated that child labor is no longer to be found in this country. Let it lie in the graveyard where public opinion buried it many years ago."

President Butler of course is a busy man, and perhaps he does not get around much. It is possible that he forgets, first, that President Roosevelt's remarks about the abolition of child labor referred to the NIRA, under which it was practically abolished in coded industries; and, second, that Mr. Roosevelt has at least "three times publicly repeated" that he is in favor of the adoption of the child-labor amendment. A few figures from the Children's Bureau in Washington which apply to conditions since the NIRA was declared unconstitutional may help to unsettle Mr. Butler from his Olympian calm. Figures from 129 cities in 29 states for the seven-month period after the NIRA expired show an increase of 58 per cent in the number of employment certificates issued to children fourteen and fifteen years of age. In New York State the National Child Labor Committee finds that for the last four months of 1935 issuance of work permits rose 400 per cent over the corresponding period for 1934. The figures themselves are interesting: Certificates for fourteen-year-olds rose from 266 to 570; for fifteen-year-olds, from 1,139 to 4,659. During the same months permits for sixteen-year-olds declined from 8,730 to 8,424. The jobs are now being given to younger "persons" who presumably work for lower wages than either their older brothers and sisters or their fathers and mothers, who are consequently in large part unemployed.

There are many persons to whom statistics are always cold and unenlightening. Perhaps President Butler is one of these. For them the National Child Labor Committee presents in its bulletin each month some case histories which paint a more graphic picture. A few of them are as follows:

The girl at the machine. At fifteen, Mary had left school and was working in a drapery factory in New York City, eight hours a day and forty hours a week for $5.

Where sixty minutes make a nickel. "The most you can make in an hour is a nickel," says Florence, speaking of putting strings of woolen on cards. Florence is only twelve, but she . . . works on the cards of woolen strings every night until midnight.

Of forty children working on a single onion farm in Michigan in the summer of 1935, sixteen were thirteen years of age or younger. One of the boys drove them out to the farm every day and back again. . . . The boy driver had neither driver's nor chauffeur's license. Another of the boys "doubled" with a job in a local store on Saturday nights in addition to his sixty-hour week in the onion fields.

Shortly before Christmas an investigator for the National Child Labor Committee found Ellen, a youngster of ten and a half years, working on lampshades in her tenement home in New York. . . . She said she had been doing this work since she was seven years old, and that even her little sister, only four and half, sometimes helped. On Friday and Saturday nights, Ellen said, she worked until midnight; but on other nights only until 10 or 10:30.

It is not to be expected that President Butler will be impressed by this evidence that child labor is all too unhappily not abolished in this country. Nor will it impress other opponents of the amendment whose objections are not honestly legalistic, as are his, but all too practical. It is true that in New York State, at least, local laws prohibiting the labor of children are in effect—though perhaps not always enforced. But in many other states, particularly in the South, there are no such laws. And as a result manufacturers who are on the look-out for cheap labor—and the cheapest labor is that of children—move their mills and factories to localities where they will not be interfered with. This is the shameful background for the fight against adoption of a federal restriction.

The fight has now been going on for twelve years. Before 1933 only six states had ratified; in 1933, under the impetus of the NRA, fourteen were added; the total now is twenty-four, out of a necessary thirty-six. At this rate ratification may take years longer. But at the recent Albany hearing 90 per cent of the argument and the applause was on the side of adoption. For the first time, it is believed by those close to the movement, there is a chance not only for the amendment to be reported out of committee but for its passage in the Senate. While there is this much life and hope, all possible pressure should be exerted on the New York legislators. Favorable action in New York would go far to hearten and instruct other states in which a vote will be taken either this year or next.

Mulcting the Aged

IF THE purpose of the Townsend inquiry was to strip the movement of its political power, the House's strategy has apparently been successful. A movement of this type is practically immune to charges of corruption and fraud, but it is peculiarly susceptible to internal dissension such as the inquiry has provoked. The investigation has brought out little that was not already common knowledge, but it has put the Townsend leaders distinctly on the defensive. Previously they could simply deny all accusations brought against them. As early as last October The Nation published an article by Richard Neuberger pointing out that the movement was a veritable gold mine for its organizers. It cited charges of Frank Peterson, former national publicity director for Dr. Townsend, that Clements and Townsend were making $2,000 a week from the Townsend Weekly, and alleged that Dr. Townsend had received substantial sums which were not turned over to the treasury of the organization. All these charges were vigorously denied at the time by Dr. Townsend and Mr. Clements, and there were even veiled hints of a libel suit, which they subsequently proved "too busy" to prosecute.

In his testimony before the investigating committee Mr. Clements has made no effort to deny that the Townsend movement has proved extremely profitable for its founders. He has confessed to an income of $12,585 in 1935, and admitted that the organization also paid the rent of his $215-a-month apartment, his grocery and electric bills, the wages of his servants, and all traveling expenses. No one appears to know the total receipts of the organization, or what disposal has been made of them. Mr. Clements estimated the total income, excluding profits on the Townsend Weekly and the Prosperity Publishing Company, to be $952,000,000, but five auditors have been at work for a week on the books of the organization without being able to reconcile the cash books, the control ledgers, and the bank statements of the Old Age Revolving Pensions, Ltd. The profits of the Townsend Weekly have not yet been revealed, but Clements is known to have received $50,000 for his share in the paper. In addition there are other sums, like the $1,700 which Dr. Townsend obtained at a mass-meeting for his proposed third party, the present status of which is cloaked in mystery.

It is difficult to see how anyone can read the sordid details brought out by the investigation without indignation against the men who have taken advantage of millions of needy old men and women. Prior to this investigation there has been a tendency to place the blame for the financial chicanery exclusively on promoters such as Clements and Edward J. Margett, manager for northern California. But the recent disclosures seem to indicate that Dr. Townsend was not wholly unaware of the lucrative possibilities of the movement. Before passing too harsh judgment on these men as individuals, however, it might be wise to recognize that their activity has a parallel in more respectable quarters. The recently announced plan of the Republican Party to collect a million dollars from a million individuals to "save America from dictatorship" is very much on the same moral plane as the dime-a-month collected by the Townsend movement.

Moreover, we should not allow our indignation against Clements and Townsend to obscure the fact that the Townsend movement has rendered a great service to the country by dramatizing the insecurity of our aged persons. For years a few individuals have been vainly preaching the need of adequate old-age pensions. But it took the organizing genius of a Clements to translate this need into terms of political action. It is true that the Townsend plan as originally proposed was utterly fantastic. Payment of $200 a month to the 12,400,000 persons who are over sixty years of age at the present time would require nearly $30,000,000,000 annually—or approximately 60 per cent of our national income. A transaction tax sufficiently high to raise this amount would double the present cost of living. Yet the effect of the proposal has not been wholly bad. It may yet be possible to harness the enthusiasm behind the movement to a legitimate social-security program. Reduce the pension from $200 a month to $50, obtain the funds by a levy on incomes rather than by taxing the masses, eliminate the absurd necessity of spending the entire amount within thirty days, and the program becomes far more defensible than the old-age provisions of the Administration's Social Security Act. With all its absurdities the Townsend movement will have served a useful purpose if it forces a reconsideration of that act.

It's a Great Idea—for Some People

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Chairman Berry

Lewis, Berry, and Roosevelt

NONE of the "important" developments of the week seems to me so vitally related to the public's welfare as the formation here a few days ago of Labor's Non-Partisan League. This new organization, despite the fact that it has George L. Berry at its helm and was formed primarily to promote Roosevelt's reelection, contains the germ of the most promising third-party movement the country has yet seen. It contains that seed because its actual organizers are men of proved leadership, heads of large and powerful unions who, in addition to having imagination, humor, and boldness, speak the language of the great mass of Americans instead of the Marxian dialect, which to those masses is just so much frightening gibberish. They also have the patience, the hardness, and the talent for administrative detail so fatally lacking in those who to date have attempted to lead the third-party movements. I refer, of course, to John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, and Sidney Hillman, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, and in so speaking of them I do not canonize them but stop and wait with fingers crossed for them to produce the fruits of which they are capable.

Meanwhile let me note a few facts about the league and its origin. Its gestation—by Hillman out of Lewis—was remarkably brief and hurried. What brought it into being almost overnight and without advance notice was the fact that Dan Tobin, czar of the teamsters and one of the least admirable of American labor leaders, was all set to be handed by Jim Farley the chairmanship of a committee to direct Roosevelt's reelection campaign in labor circles.

Tobin's appointment, typical of Farley's talent for choosing the worst forces in every field with which to make campaign alliances, would have been a feather in the cap of the A. F. of L.'s reactionary high command. By the same token it would have been a blow to the Committee for Industrial Organization, in which Lewis and Hillman are the ringleaders, if for no other reason than that Tobin typifies the kind of labor leadership that the C. I. O. forces threaten far more than they threaten craft unionism. Tobin's acute realization of this fact has led him recently to circularize all teamsters' locals with an edict commanding them under threat of expulsion to shun the C. I. O. and all its friends as they would the plague.

To thwart Tobin and his henchmen, the Non-Partisan League was rushed into existence by Hillman and Lewis. To give it the guise of an Administration-created agency, they picked Berry as its chairman and let him announce the league's creation—with the aid of a government-employed press agent—less than twenty-four hours after Roosevelt had granted a zero-hour extension of Berry's term as Coordinator for Industrial Cooperation. The announcement surprised and chagrined the Democratic National Committee, which had not been consulted, stunned Bill Green, and infuriated Tobin and his pals. Berry lost no time in stating that the primary purpose of the league was to line up all organized labor's votes for Roosevelt's reelection. Berry's presence at its helm was a sufficient guaranty to the capital press corps that the league had no other purpose. He is known to the corps as a man who indubitably idolizes Roosevelt and, in addition, could not under any consideration be lured away from the Democratic Party. A Tennessean of slight literacy, some animal intelligence, and sufficient cunning to capture and hold the presidency of the printing pressmen's union, Berry will make an admirable foil for the Hillman-Lewis purposes so long as there is his loyalty to Roosevelt to hold him in line. Roosevelt, to be sure, is the immediate gainer by the combination, for it is one that will get votes.

Ultimately, however, Roosevelt may lose by the combination, for if he wins reelection, as seems certain, he will want to dictate the choice of his successor in 1940, and here Labor's Non-Partisan League, or its successor and assigns, promises to stand in the way. It was not for nothing that the word "non-partisan" was inserted in the league's name. It was the careful choice of Lewis and Hillman, and signals their determination to keep the league from being a mere adjunct of the Democratic machine. It was their way of serving notice that the league reserves the right, outside the Presidential race, to support Progressives, Socialists, Farmer-Laborites, or any other candidates in state and Congressional elections whom its members believe would best serve the interests of the working class.

It is no secret that neither Hillman nor Lewis believes in the divinity of Roosevelt. Once Roosevelt has served their purpose by getting a new lease on the White House so that Liberty Leaguers may be held at bay for another four years, Lewis and Hillman are prepared to use that breathing spell to build up labor's fortifications and organize a movement that will have chances of success in 1940.

MEANWHILE, all sorts of traditionally important things have been happening in the halls of government these last few days. The Supreme Court, in the Sugar Institute case, refused to rewrite the anti-trust laws to the taste of the trade-association boys, and though contributing nothing new to the implementing of those laws, kept alive the factor of uncertainty of prosecution, which is the sole functioning deterrent to the monopolists. . . . A House committee rushed through hearings on the new tax bill, with Republican members chuckling over the panic into which their Democratic colleagues were thrown when a Communist Party representative testified in favor of the major tax proposal of the Administration. . . . A Senate committee under the prodding of Michigan's Vandenberg—who seems increasingly to be the most likely Republican choice for President—voted to require publication of the names of all firms and persons who have received AAA benefit payments in excess of $1,000, together with the exact amounts they received and what they received them for. The list, while it will not erase the basic price-boosting tenet of the Administration's farm program, will destroy the emotional, help-the-poor-toiling-farmer appeal which made enactment of that program possible. . . . Preliminary plans were laid for a Senatorial investigation of the War and Navy departments, with the object of exposing the dunderheaded incompetence of the generals and admirals and thus lessening the effectiveness of their pleas as "experts" for bigger armies, bigger navies. . . . Secretary Hull imposed an embargo on tin-plate scrap exports under a recently enacted law aimed chiefly at Japan. . . . The Capitol heard that Italy to a significant if not considerable degree is circumventing this government's attempts to curtail its munitions supply by having its agents in this country encourage Italian-Americans to send Easter greetings to their relatives at home on paper-thin cards of solid copper, sold for five cents and mailed in ordinary envelopes. It is said that thousands of dollars' worth of copper has reached Italy in this fashion.

THE FCC, continuing its investigation of "the world's largest private enterprise," turned its searchlight on the far-flung lobbying activities of the A. T. and T., which, according to Walter Gifford, its $206,000-a-year "front," always puts the public interest ahead of its private ambitions out of respect for its own strength and the nation's generosity in permitting it the privileges of monopoly. The searchlight showed the company's agents using, with the knowledge and consent of their superiors, all the sordid tricks in the lobbyists' bag to defeat social and labor legislation, tax-reform measures, and resolutions for the investigation of the public-service commissions that fix the rates of the company's operating subsidaries. In Kansas, because it was "hard enough to get a hung jury now," the company's lobbyists fought a resolution for a public referendum to permit a two-thirds' jury vote to decide civil cases; in New York they fought a bill to require jury trial in labor-injunction cases because a single juror might "frustrate" justice. Finally, before recessing the hearings until April 14, the investigators disclosed Mr. Gifford, talking privately to fellow-officers of the Bell system, as saying that when he hears a business man vow that his concern puts the public interest ahead of its private interest, he says to himself, "Oh, bunk!"

SECRETARY WALLACE saw the Senate by a vote of thirty-two to eighteen take a step toward putting the Administration farm-relief thesis into actual operation. That thesis is that agriculture's current ills arise largely out of a lack of balance due to industrial prices being frozen while agricultural prices remain flexible to the point of liquidity. The New Deal has attempted to correct this by freezing farm prices too, whereas, if the thesis expounded by Wallace and his cohorts is correct, proper treatment would call for a thawing out on the industrial side of the scale. The Murphy amendment to the Packers and Stockyards Act, drafted by Wallace's lieutenants and adopted Thursday by the Senate, is a step in that direction. It would put the packers—who in recent years have doubled their share in the consumers' meat dollar, while the farmers' share has been halved—under stringent federal regulation, forcing them to keep books and accounts according to federal dictates. It is not so strong a measure as the

Secretary Wallace

Capper bill for which it was substituted under pressure by Connally of Texas, who speaks for the big cattlemen. The Capper bill, in addition to doing all the Murphy bill prescribes, would have given the Secretary of Agriculture jurisdiction over the 600 direct-buying stations the packers have set up throughout the country in the last few years. This direct-buying system, it is charged, results in a concentration of low-grade cattle at Chicago to make the market price-base on which the packers' agents then proceed to buy up high-grade stock at the field stations.

Our Number One Fascists

BY EVELYN SEELEY

LOCAL chambers of commerce rank second only to the American Legion as "agencies of repression and attacks upon minority movements," according to the last annual report of the American Civil Liberties Union. With the Legion apparently preparing to default, local chambers may step up and claim top honors. In New Jersey the Legion recently declared its opposition to teachers' oath laws sponsored by Hearst; in New York 100 Legion representatives voted to uphold freedom of speech even for those who espouse "dangerous" ideas. If this new attitude prevails, the field is clear for the local chambers, with the Daughters of the American Revolution trailing quite a stretch behind.

Local chambers show no signs of recanting. They stand firm in a pattern that varies only with local conditions—strike-breaking (open or secret), red-baiting, company-union promotion, fostering of "runaway shops" with their lowering of wage levels and working conditions, open-shop propaganda, keeping education "safe," checking "subversive activities" that cover as broad a field as Mrs. Dilling's network. Each local makes its own program according to its needs, but a plan found effective in one community quickly spreads to another. New devices catch on, but the pattern itself is old.

A high-pressure campaign for new armories is beginning in Montana and California, sponsored by local chambers. The armories will house military units and more modern equipment and will also be useful, chamber members explain, as "civic auditoriums." Labor growled so loudly in Great Falls, Montana, that the chamber there dropped the campaign like a hot potato, but in California the plan has met only enthusiasm. It is centered in Santa Rosa, where labor troubles have been plentiful and harshly dealt with and where last summer a radical labor leader was tarred and feathered.

"What we want to do," said L. L. Baleisen, industrial secretary of the Brooklyn, New York, chamber, "is to destroy the whole A. F. of L. It's a racket from top to bottom. . . . Oh, we're not against unions. In fact, we help to organize lots of them."

Baleisen has done his part. When the National Labor Relations Board, on December 27, 1935, held him guilty of coercion for promoting and cherishing a company union at the Atlas Bag and Burlap Company in Brooklyn, Baleisen admitted he had been active in some 200 labor disputes, and had made it a practice to bring about agreements under which strikes were prohibited. "I did my duty," he said, "to protect Brooklyn industry."

The New York Board of Trade, which functions as a local chamber of commerce and is affiliated with the United States Chamber of Commerce, last month launched a campaign to illegalize strikes, on the ground that "the time has come to protect the interests of workmen and employers alike." "Unions are rackets, the shame of our cities," the board stated in a letter calling the first meeting. "Let us stamp out this malignant growth!" It backed its declaration with the fantastic statement that eleven to fifteen billion dollars, half the national income, goes annually to racketeers.

Charles Mariner recently boasted to the Hi-Twelve Club of San José, California, that the California State Chamber of Commerce had spent $50,000 in labor disturbances, framing organizers when evidence was not sufficient to convict them, and using physical violence when necessary. Mariner, according to Alfred Aram, a San José attorney who wrote to Attorney General U. S. Webb demanding an investigation, "clearly implied that the purpose of such physical violence was to bring home to the persons involved the pressing necessity of choosing between physical safety and constitutional rights."

California locals have won a lot of credit for their anti-union, strike-breaking, red-baiting methods. The San José chamber has done its part in winning for Santa Clara County, of which it is the capital, the name of "cradle of American fascism." It helped whip up the terror that followed the general strike of 1934 by signing up a "committee of safety" in its offices, although it disclaimed connection with the vigilantes who attempted to enforce safety by means of night raids and pickax handles. In Los Angeles the chamber currently blesses and backs the barring of "vagrants" at the state border. Los Angeles's notorious red squad operated for a long time out of the Chamber of Commerce building. In both Los Angeles and San Francisco the sons of wealthy industrialists are flocking to join the Junior Chamber of Commerce under a program more frankly vicious than the senior chamber ever admitted.

In San Francisco the Industrial Association functioned as chief strike-breaking machine during the general strike of 1934, but when it was all over J. W. Mailliard, Jr., president of the San Francisco chamber, pledged his organization to the protection of "public and private rights." "We must realize," he said, "that the security of San Francisco can never be guaranteed until the clean-up of agitators in our community has been complete to the last man."

These incidents are typical of what happens in many places. Somebody else—vaguely called a "committee of safety," "committee of 500," or "citizens' committee"—does the dirty work of breaking the strike and promoting the post-strike terror; then the chamber, having kept its name pure, emerges to deliver resounding pats on the back.

In Oregon the chamber has been quite open about it. During the 1934 longshoremen's strike, the chamber upheld the mayor when two pickets were shot for throwing stones at a freight train. And during the lumber strike of last summer it upheld Governor Martin when he ordered state police to take pickets and "paddle 'em down the road."

Members of the chamber played an open role in labor difficulties in the state of Washington too, but, in Tacoma at least, their action has proved a boomerang. Keeping up membership is difficult, and the chamber's prestige has fallen so low that it dare not openly sponsor anything it wants put over. Two years ago the Tacoma chamber purchased submachine-guns and tear-gas and nausea-gas bombs and donated the supplies to the police department, ostensibly to use against gangsters. Nobody took this explanation seriously, however, since Tacoma boasts few gangsters who rate such heroic treatment. M. J. Muckey, a chamber employee and an army reserve captain, with the blessing of his superiors organized local reserve officers into flying squadrons for use at a moment's notice. These men are armed, and their mobilization plan is extremely efficient.

The chamber functioned during the longshoremen's strike of 1934 as the Citizens' Emergency Committee, headed by John Prins, then also president of the chamber. This committee organized the waterfront employers, furnished office workers, raised a slush fund for advertising and another for the purchase of weapons and the importation of "finks." It happened that local police drove the imported gunmen out of town, but they were used elsewhere—notably in Seattle, where a similar "committee" masked the activities of the chamber.

During last summer's lumber strike the Citizens' Emergency Committee blossomed out as the Committee of 200 in Tacoma and the Committee of 500 in Seattle, each a front for the respective chamber. They raised a large sum of money with which they launched extensive advertising campaigns, using the same copy throughout the Northwest and merely changing the name of the sponsor. Seattle's committee was headed by Alfred Lundin, then president of the chamber. He had a regular radio period in which he pointed out the dangers to American liberties in organized labor. Mr. Lundin is still active with the Seattle chamber, and his latest exploit was to organize the Washington Industrial Council, an employers' organization which seeks to use the same tactics as the National Manufacturers' Association.

Publicly owned utilities naturally are anathema to local chambers, whose duty it is to promote private business. In Portland, Oregon, the chamber is working with all its might and main to forestall a Columbia Valley Authority at the giant Grand Coulee and Bonneville power projects. The Brooklyn chamber was found to have received $21,250 from the Consolidated Gas Company, along with others in a Citizens' Committee of 500, to fight Mayor LaGuardia's "yardstick plan" for gas distribution.

Chambers in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts are taking a leading role in the "runaway-employer" picture. This activity of theirs particularly hits the strong garment workers' unions in the East. Chambers are offering financial aid, free rent, free power, sometimes outright gifts of factories to induce clothing manufacturers to flee from the cities' high business and labor standards. Mayors, police chiefs, and sheriffs back up the local chambers with guaranties of low wages and "no labor trouble." They restrict picketing, run organizers out of town, arouse the citizenry to undercut labor in the name of patriotism.

Open-shop agitation by chambers is widespread and an old story. The Dallas Open Shop Association, housed in the Chamber of Commerce building, is particularly militant and has prevented unions from gaining much of a foothold in a bad sweatshop center. In Des Moines, Iowa, the Business Men's Association, with which the chamber is unofficially connected, ran five advertisements of this nature:

Question: How would the "closed-shop" principle affect the welfare and prosperity of all citizens?

Answer: Firms considering locating in Des Moines would give this city a wide berth to locate in a community where men who are willing and want to work are permitted to work, regardless of whether or not they belong to and pay dues to some organization. Des Moines has many establishments that employ a large number of people and are important factors in the prosperity of the city. If the "closed-shop" principle were cracked down on them, isn't it probable that all, or a large number of such firms, would quickly seek locations elsewhere? Des Moines would be kept in the throes of constant bickerings and disputes. Thus all citizens would be forced to pay the price, in one way or another, if Des Moines should become a "closed-shop" town.

The Association of Commerce of New Orleans has a committee called the Subversive Activities Subcommittee of the National Defense Committee, the general committee headed by Colonel L. Kemper Williams, a military man and wealthy lumber dealer. Last year, although its activities are secret, it tried to bar from a high-school building the New Orleans Forum, a group which presented lectures on capitalism, fascism, socialism, and communism. It aided in the removal of a charity-organization official who had a liberal viewpoint. Two newspaper publishers connected with it last year were not reappointed lest their participation "embarrass" them.

Red-baiting agencies get a formidable background of information from the United States Chamber of Commerce, which sends out, to a select public, confidential pamphlets called "Safeguards Against Subversive Activities." These pamphlets are a pulse of professional patriotism. They report "red" activity broad enough to include Christian pacifists. They keep lists of red-baiting articles, books, lectures, mostly of the guttersnipe variety. They include, for instance, all the Hearst anti-Soviet series, but never a Walter Duranty. They list articles in Liberty and True Detective Stories. They wind up with a suggested legislative program for sedition bills, limiting the use of the mails, conditioning immigration and naturalization, and proposing a special Department of Justice agency to investigate subversive activities.

Otherwise the national chamber, busy with its legislative program, takes no hand in the direction of the locals, which, in accordance with local conditions and using local means, go the local lobbyists one better.

Red Clay in Alabama

BY CARLETON BEALS

II. Another Tobacco Road

TOWARD the end of 1934 R. K. Greene, plantation owner and federal rehabilitation administrator in Alabama, boasted that 80 per cent of the farmers' federal debts had been paid—this in about six months' time! Shortly afterward he declared that not a single rehabilitation farmer in the whole state owed a dime. This was probably true, because those still in debt had been cleaned out, lock, stock, and barrel. Everything they possessed having been taken to liquidate their accounts, these unfortunate farmers were written off as "rehabilitated," and a new batch of human misery was fed into the mill. Such methods make the statistical record in Washington look better.

In any case the showing is truly remarkable. The gross cash income per family rarely exceeds $150 a year; most families see not one red cent of this. One share-cropper to whom I talked was worried because in six months he had not been able to pay off his grocery bill of nine cents! A study of conditions in Gorgas in northern Tuscaloosa County, made by Dr. V. M. Sims and an associate of the state university for the Tennessee Valley Authority, shows that in this more favored hill setting the average gross income for white tenant families is $144 and for Negroes $148. Conditions are much worse in the black belt, and the rehabilitation farmers, almost without exception, have got the worst lands—exhausted, eroded, stony acres which the landlords otherwise would find it difficult to rent. The federal rehabilitation farmer has had to work his head off for the little food credited to him at plantation stores—in amount and quality "scarcely worth the trouble to go an' tote it home"—and lives mostly on coarse unleavened corn bread and syrup. In return he has the doubtful privilege of coming to own an "ornery" steer and a plow, which in most cases, especially in Chambers County, he has had to turn back to the federal authorities or, the year following, to the landlord.

R. K. Greene has described the rehabilitation policy as that of "learning to crawl before you walk." Most of his clients are crawling with their bellies closer to the ground than ever. He boasts of his record in inducing successful belly-crawling. One glowing story tells how a noble Negro farmer with nineteen in his family made a success by hitching himself to the plow and having one of his boys drive him. Another canned story concerns a poverty-stricken "rehabilitation" farmer who survived the first year and as a result will be able to have an evening meal of hot biscuits and syrup, after which he will "contentedly munch goobers" (peanuts). Hot biscuits, if not especially good for children, are a slight improvement over unleavened corn bread. But there is something wrong when many "rehabilitation" farmers, though they produce a good crop and take outside work at every opportunity, face the winter with a few bushels of corn and little chance of employment.

At the beginning of 1935 George Hawkins (that is not his real name), a Negro share-cropper in Talapoosa County in the Alabama black belt, was one of five tenants on a hundred-acre tract rented by the federal Resettlement Administration from an absentee landlord and sublet in small patches at $50 a year each, three times the ordinary rent. The land, moreover, is the worst in the vicinity, full of ruts, stumps, and stones. Mr. Hawkins had to work hard indeed to put it in shape for planting. But if the land was bad and the rent high, he was to have the benefit of federal assistance.

No one had ever been concerned about the share-croppers before except the Share-Croppers' Union, and that had caused bloodshed. But now the family received $14 a month and had a ton of fertilizer, a sack of soda, a plow stock, and actually a mule instead of a steer. Hope was spreading its golden wings. Unfortunately the mule turned out to be "just ready to get home and die," which it did. Hawkins was then given a steer, too young to do much work.

Nor was an ordered budget easy to manage, because after two months the payments from the government were cut to $10; after six months they abruptly ceased but were as abruptly renewed for October and November. Yet after all, $108 was probably more real cash than Hawkins had ever received before in his life in any single year. Out of it, it is true, he had to buy gin certificates from speculators in order to sell his two bales of cotton. On the other hand he grew sixty bushels of corn, which, if not taken away, would permit the family of fourteen to have its customary two-meals-a-day diet of corn bread and syrup.

The Hawkins family did not do so well, but the federal field foreman told them he wanted them to stay on another year. Then, out of a clear sky, Hawkins received from the landlord himself a notice to vacate. He found a very dilapidated shack where he could begin farming on shares. Momentarily he expected the federal authorities to "clean him out." Hawkins's neighbors said he was thrown off because he was suspected of belonging to the Share-Croppers' Union. The federal officials are bitter against the union. Fortunately, when he was finally evicted, he was generously provided with a temporary erosion job at $22 a month. Every day before dawn he has to walk eight miles in the mud and rain, and eight miles back in the dark. But fourteen mouths have to be fed. Hawkins doesn't feel very rehabilitated.

Drawing by Refrégier

Henry Mason, a Negro World War veteran in poor health, was also paying the excessive rent of $50 for a little piece of the same gullied land. He worked through 1934 under the rehabilitation plan, then the government cleaned him up, taking his corn, plow lines, some fertilizer, fodder, so he would "get straight." He was told—and Greene also publicly stated—that his debt was cleared, though later it seemed there was still pending a charge of $54.

In 1935 Mason received some new supplies and $2.40 a week for his wife and five children. This continued for part of May and until the end of August, when they were "chopped off." They had received fertilizer, four "scooters," or plow-holds, an "old fifty-cent bridle," garden seed, ash potatoes, and every two weeks three to four cans of meat, "any ol' kin' of meat," but "not enough to walk after." They had also received an old mule, for which they were charged $60, but which "wuzn't wo'th $5." The federal field foreman promised that he would see they got a better one, but when an animal was most needed during plowing, he told them just "to scratch along." Since Mason couldn't work, his wife Callie, who was expecting a new baby, pushed the plow as deep as she could. The mule died in June. Callie didn't die because she is a strong woman and has magnificent courage.

After a while Callie and her husband stopped getting their living checks. The county farm agent had asked them to indorse their checks over to Roy Patton, the field foreman, in payment for debts. When they refused, since they needed the money badly, they were simply informed that the checks had never come. Suspected of being members of the Share-Croppers' Union, Callie and her family were ordered to vacate in October. But Callie fought eviction so strenuously, declaring she had a right to stay on the place until the end of the year, that Patton was "afraid to come around" to see her. Thereupon the farm administrator for the absentee landlord ordered her off. Again she fought for her rights and stayed until January 1. The place was then turned over to Fred Harris, known to the Share-Croppers' Union as a stool pigeon.

Just before Callie was evicted, her husband was taken to the veterans' hospital near Tuskegee. Callie herself was offered work on the erosion project at $22. She refused, pointing out that she couldn't walk eight miles to work and back with a nursing baby to care for. Her new place stands in a puddle of red mud, and while she explained these things to me in a quiet but intense monotone, her baby lay on the edge of one of her two ancient beds on which the rain was beating through holes in the wall. Callie does not feel "rehabilitated" either, but she is as cheerful as she can be with her husband in the hospital and only a few bushels of corn on hand.

She had to move by herself on an icy day with the thermometer close to zero. That same day she received from F. N. Farrington, the federal county agent, with offices in Dadeville, a touching mimeographed circular. At the top was a picture of a sun rising over a hill and on either side were clusters of Christmas bells. It read:

Ring out the Old . . . Ring in the New . . . Happy New Year . . . Howdy and Happy New Year to Yours. . . .

This beautiful Christmas season has been made happier for us by the thoughts of the fine friendships we have enjoyed among the farm people of Tallapoosa County.

Mr. Farrington works hard to build up the landlords' organization, known as the Farm Bureau Federation. Since the Share-Croppers' Union came into being, the federation, amazingly enough, has made a drive for Negro members, and even pays their $2 initiation fee for them. In Lowndes County, right after the terrible lynchings of last year, it even held a joint meeting of blacks and whites, with a Negro speaker, a doctor from Tuskegee, who was asked to lead them in "Swing low, sweet chariot." However, usually in notices of the meetings of this organization the race is carefully designated. On January 23, 1936, Mr. Farrington sent out calls for meetings to discuss legislation pending in the national Congress and to send wires to the President, Secretary Wallace, and Senators and Congressmen. This smacks a bit of a grocer eating his own groceries. The invitation did not state what the legislation was. Callie received a call to a meeting of colored people at Camp Hill, a site famous for its lynchings of colored share-croppers. She did not go. At the meeting Mr. Farrington and the landlords made speeches. Nothing was discussed from the floor; everything was passed upon by viva voce vote. Appended to the call that Callie received was one of Mr. Farrington's touching sentiments: "Usually after the darkest cloud the sun shines brightest, but sometimes the cloud lingers too long." Typical of Farrington's meetings was one at which the farm-measurement committee was chosen to determine the acreages for cotton-crop production. The farmers and share-croppers were presented with the names of four leading plantation owners, which were railroaded through.

Drawing by Refréprier

Similar set-ups exist in all the black-belt counties. The pattern, with minor variations, is as follows: the landlords control the acreage allotments; the reduced acreage they have granted themselves is often far greater than any amount they ever cultivated. On the other hand, the acreage of the poor farmers and croppers has been cut to the bone. Naturally the landlords then have more tax-free federal gin certificates than they need; the poor folk do not have enough for a crop which will permit them to survive. Often the landlord has kept even the gin certificates allotted by the government for the cropper's minimum. The croppers must then go to the larger landlords and buy, for from three to six cents a pound of cotton, certificates which have cost the possessor nothing. Thus the planter often makes as much as eighteen cents on part of his cotton, the cropper only six cents.

The landlord has other advantages. The government has been giving a rental check of three and one-half cents per pound of lint cotton for the 40 per cent of production curtailed. These allotment checks went out at picking and selling times, and theoretically made it possible for the cropper to survive without exceeding his allotted acreage. At first the allotment checks were taken by the landlords; later when the checks were made out directly to the cropper, the landlord either forced him to indorse them over or simply forged his name. The government, of course, guaranteed twelve-cent cotton, and sent out parity checks for any difference. These checks went the same route as the rental checks—into the landlord's pocket.

Furthermore, the marketing of cotton is a white privilege and a landlord's privilege. The cropper has no say over the disposition of his crop, and only in recent years has he even dared be on hand to check up on the weighing of it. He has no means of knowing exactly when his cotton is sold, and he is charged fifty cents a month per bale for storage. The cropper rarely sees any cash, because the food and supplies he has been furnished at a 20 per cent interest charge usually eat up every cent.

With this arbitrary set-up the cropper has no chance to succeed. The land itself is nearly exhausted, eroded, and worthless. Still greater disaster for the cotton industry looms ahead so far as the black belt of Alabama is concerned. Even with the fairest economic set-up, even if the croppers received the full product of their labor, they could scarcely make more than a starvation living. The tragedy is that the federal government in its rehabilitation program has adhered to all the old vicious landlord practices, and has in fact strengthened them.

[This is the last of Mr. Beals's two articles on "rehabilitation" in Alabama.]

Hitler's Totalitarian Theater

BY LILIAN T. MOWRER

WHEN the National Socialists came into power in January, 1933, the German theater was the liveliest in Europe. For more than a century the reigning monarchs had subsidized playhouses and encouraged native and foreign plays, players, and music. Then came fourteen years of republican rule, during which state and municipal support replaced court patronage. During this period a bold experiment in popular art was undertaken in the creation of the People's Theater. This association, with its own theater in Berlin and affiliations and touring companies throughout the country, provided its half-million members with good drama and music for the trifling price of from one mark to two marks fifty a performance.

The Nazis were not interested in the theater for artistic experimentation, but recognized its possibilities as a megaphone for their ideas, and immediately set about to destroy in it everything connected with the hated republic. Not only Jews but Social Democrats, intellectuals, radicals, "Kultur-Bolsheviks," and of course all personal enemies were thrown out. Everyone who had contributed to the brilliance of the former regime was banned, not only actors and directors, but all the playwrights from Hauptmann to Hasenclever. It was a clean sweep in the world of art, and soon the stage was deluged with political tracts written by hitherto unknown young men. Goebbels's play "Michael," an amateurish bit of spite which had been refused by countless managers, was put on at twenty-six different theaters.

By the end of 1933, in spite of favored box-office treatment to Brown Shirts, the theaters were half empty. The Propaganda Minister was quick to realize the criticism of Nazi culture that this implied and the unfavorable conclusions that people would draw. He set about not to repair the damage but to cover up the traces. The Theater Act, passed in May, 1934, gave him the necessary power. He dissolved the three existing actors' and managers' unions and confiscated their funds. "Syndical chambers" for the professions of acting, playwrighting, stage design and direction, music, and so on were formed under leaders who were legally bound to carry out their task "in the spirit of national responsibility." This obligation means that a record of party activity is more important than artistic or technical ability. The entire personnel of each chamber is governed by the Führer Prinzip, blind obedience to a leader. The leader may be a storm trooper, former doorkeeper, or one of the "old gang" whom the Nazis wished to reward—or even a man competent at his job. But the theater audiences did not grow any larger. Subsidies to state theaters were doubled and tripled: private backers who had been rash enough to finance productions were "helped" in order to keep up appearances.

"The theater is no welfare institution," warned Minister Göring at the reopening of the Prussian State Playhouse, which has been very much enlarged and handsomely decorated with red silk brocade. "It is no place for niggling critics, and we will tolerate no dishwater internationalism"—which in Nazi diction means anything foreign or liberal. "As long as there exists in Germany any unpolitical, neutral, or individualistic art our task is not ended," declared the Völkischer Beobachter, Hitler's own sheet. So the Nazi aims are quite definite. But the results are nil. Not a single playwright of worth has emerged to put their ideas into dramatic form.

The handful of writers turning out new pieces are quite inadequate to the task of keeping the German stage supplied, although Goebbels offers prizes for plays, and Göring simply commissions them. Richard Billinger, a man of sixty, born of Austrian peasants, was hailed at first as the "poet of the New Age." His contact with the soil was to provide all those mystic qualities of Blut und Boden which were to regenerate German art under the Nazis. He has written three or four episodic sketches, not without a vague lyrical beauty, full of local color which skilful direction can turn into effective stage pictures. There have been some heavy back-to-the-soil dramas like "Mensch, Aus Erde Gemacht," by Friedrich Griese, of great brutality unrelieved by any poetry. The necessity of avoiding "dangerous" subjects has led to an outcrop of historical plays, little more than facile journalism. So much suppression is exercised that creative work has ceased.

When I visited Berlin during the past winter I found all the theaters full and hardly a Brown Shirt visible. The government is spending immense sums on building and decorating; there is a second state playhouse and a new popular opera house. To judge by appearances, everything is booming, and I wondered why, for the playbills offer no explanation. At the Grosses Schauspielhaus and at the once famous Volksbühne were two faded operettas from the early nineties. There were four plays by Shakespeare, including Hans Rothe's very freely translated "Two Gentlemen of Verona," which is delightfully produced but marred by two much buffoonery. At the Kurfürstendamm Theater a repertory of Ibsen, Grillparzer, Goethe, and Calderon was being played in the manner of Victorian melodrama. A popular actress had revived Sardou's "Madame Sans Gêne." I went to the première of "Thomas Paine," by Hanns Johst, marveling that this champion of the Rights of Man should figure on a Nazi stage. But the humanitarian Paine fades before the patriot who dared the Americans to fling off England's yoke. Paine is the "drummer" of the United States, just as Hitler (see "Mein Kampf") prides himself on being the drummer of the Third Reich. A brilliant production by Jurgen Fehling could not disguise the crude philosophy of this thin little play.

In all Berlin only four theaters remain in private hands, and their future is problematic. All the rest are on the dole. For although they are full they do not pay. Goebbels has organized the public as ruthlessly as he has critics and actors, but it is an expensive business. To fill the theaters he founded three Gemeinschaften, or leagues. Membership in the Culture League is open to all non-Masonic Aryans who pay one mark annually (unemployed twenty pfennigs) and pledge themselves to attend ten plays during the season. In return they get seats at half the box-office price. (The average cost of the best seats is nine marks.) They cannot choose their plays or the nights they visit the theater, but at least joining the league is not obligatory. The Workers' League and the famous Kraft Durch Freude Association circulate theater tickets throughout all shops, factories, and offices at prices varying from seventy-five pfennigs to one mark fifty. If these are not taken voluntarily they are simply charged up to recalcitrants, and the sum is deducted from their week's wages.

Two innovations in the German theater may be credited to the Nazis. Since Jews are not allowed to participate in any German cultural activity, they have founded their own cultural leagues and have theaters of their own in Hamburg, Frankfurt-am-Main, Gleiwitz, and Breslau. There is one in the east end of Berlin which many cultivated Jews refuse to visit as they consider it "ghetto." Hebbel's "Judith" has been given here, and friends tell me that the musical shows are distinctly good. It is strictly forbidden for any Aryan to attend a performance without very special permission from the Minister of Propaganda, and I had no time to apply for this.

Another more intentional Nazi contribution is the Thingspiele political mystery plays for the open-air theaters—Thingplätze—of which sixty are planned and twelve actually built. Summer festivals are held in them, and a rather hysterical self-glorification is celebrated with singing, marching, and flag-waving. One of the earliest of these mysteries, Richard Euringer's "German Passion, 1933," is a symbolic representation of Hitler as the Messiah; Kurt Heynicke's "Way into the Kingdom" is a loosely thought-out emotional approach to National Socialism; the "Eternal German Destiny" grapples with the "mythos" of the Nordic race. There are dozens of these tribal plays, and a certain amount of technical skill is shown in their staging (the Nazis have never lacked showmen). Their weakness lies in their simplification of ideas and vague sentimentality. The authors do not seem to realize that this emotional propaganda might equally well serve any political system. But the masses who are swept into the arenas to witness these exhibitions are usually extremely young and willing to believe almost anything.

For in spite of exhortations and commands that the theater serve the people as a political rostrum, its function in the Third Reich becomes daily more apparent. It is a vast social device for absorbing just so many workers who would otherwise be unemployed, and just so many spectators who might otherwise spend their spare time thinking of other days. From this point of view it functions well.

"Soaking the Rich"

BY GEORGE TERBORGH

THE inequality in the distribution of wealth and income in modern industrial countries provides a perennial theme for the prophets of discontent. This is not surprising when we consider the spectacular character of the statistics on this subject. In predepression America, for example (later estimates are not available), the richest 1 per cent of the population enjoyed as much income as the poorest 60 per cent and owned more wealth than the poorest 90 per cent.

Proposals to rectify these inequalities by abolishing private ownership of the means of production have at no time gained any great following in this country—even during the recent depression, when widespread distress and destitution created a favorable background for revolutionary propaganda. The proposals which have made real headway are, in appearance at least, less radical. They assume the continuance of private capitalism and rely on a further extension of an ancient and familiar device—taxation.

"Soaking the rich" may be of recent currency as a slogan, but as a fiscal practice it has long been well established. It began when the principle of "progressive" taxation was first applied. The departure from the rule of uniform tax rates for rich and poor opened the door to a gradual but persistent evolution in the direction of increasing the relative burden on the rich. While this evolution has thus far stopped short of the kind of "share-the-wealth" taxes sponsored by Huey Long, it is well advanced in the field of income, gift, and inheritance levies. Today the question is no longer whether the rich shall be "soaked," but merely how far the process shall be carried.

From the ethical standpoint the principle of progressive taxation has developed but one important rationalization. This is the claim that such taxation adjusts the burden to the "ability" of the taxpayer to pay. Thus, for example, Mr. Jones, with $100,000 a year, is supposed to be able to pay more than one hundred times the tax of Mr. Smith, whose income is $1,000.

The formula "taxation according to ability" is thought to provide a rule by which a fair and proper distribution of burdens may be made among incomes or estates of various sizes. Popular belief to the contrary, it does nothing of the kind. Who can say what tax rates equalize the burden for two incomes, one of which is one hundred times as large as the other? It is argued by one school of thought that the burden is equalized when the tax absorbs the same percentage of both incomes, and by another that it is equalized when the incomes remaining after the payment of the tax are themselves equal. Between these views is an area as wide as the sea, without chart or beacon. In practice, tax rates are fixed by the play of political forces, not by formula. The claim that a particular schedule, once arrived at, adapts the burden to the ability to pay must be put down as an effort to dignify a practical compromise by giving it an appearance of scientific precision.

What is really involved in soak-the-rich taxes is a conflict between different social groups. The fundamental ethical question is which of these interests should be favored. Someone has to provide the revenues of government: should it be the rich or the poor? The answer to this question depends largely on the social philosophy and sympathies of those who are doing the talking.

The classic economic argument in behalf of inequality in the distribution of wealth and income runs somewhat as follows. People in modest circumstances ordinarily spend the bulk of their incomes for current consumption, with a negligible amount of saving for outside investment. People of wealth, on the other hand, if for no other reason than that they have more than they can conveniently spend for consumption, save a large fraction of their incomes. In a highly mechanized and dynamic economy such as ours the optimum progress in production calls for a large and steady stream of investment funds for embodiment in new capital goods. If the national income were distributed with any approach to equality there would not be enough saving to supply these funds; hence material progress would be slowed down, and in the long run even the immediate beneficiaries of the redistribution would be worse off than they would have been if the incomes of the rich had been left undisturbed.

A recent study by the Brookings Institution indicates that as a whole families receiving less than $1,250 a year save virtually nothing, while those receiving $100,000 and over save more than half of their income. It is estimated that, in 1929, 67 per cent of the total family savings was accumulated by less than 2.3 per cent of all families at the top of the income scale, families whose incomes aggregated but 28 per cent of the total family income. There is no doubt, therefore, that anything which served to divert income from the top to the bottom of the scale would drastically reduce the proportion devoted to investment and increase the share going to current consumption.

This much one may concede without assenting to the proposition that any and every step toward income equalization through taxation is a blow to progress. It is by no means certain that it is always desirable to have the largest volume of saving attainable; indeed, there is a large and respectable body of opinion in support of the view that, despite the extensive use of progressive taxation characteristic of modern fiscal practice, the volume of saving has at times been excessive and has led to maladjustments in the economy which have retarded progress. The truth is that we do not know within wide limits what rate of saving represents the economic optimum in the long run, and since we have no clear criteria on this point we do not know how far soak-the-rich taxes can be carried without an undue curtailment of saving. It seems very probable, however, that unless some alternative source of savings should be developed, these taxes would have to stop far short of equalizing wealth or income throughout the nation. A very substantial degree of inequality appears on this ground to be economically useful, if not necessary.

While this time-honored arrangement certainly works, after a fashion, it cannot be considered, from the social standpoint, a highly economical method of obtaining a supply of savings. The price paid is measured by the amount of income which the rich dissipate in consumption before they begin to save. The Brookings Institution has estimated that in 1929 the "wealthy and well-to-do," comprising but 2.4 per cent of the population, accounted for about 20 per cent of the total national consumption. They consumed more, in fact, than the poorest 40 per cent of the population. What is equally to the point, they consumed more in the aggregate than they saved. It is quite evident that the cost to society of the savings secured through the maintenance of inequality is a heavy one.

There is another common economic argument against heavy taxes on the rich, namely, that these "destroy initiative." The first question this raises is whose initiative is destroyed—the initiative of those who are hoping to become rich or those who are already rich?

Even a very broad classification of the rich and well-to-do embraces only about 2 per cent of the population. The effect of soak-the-rich taxes on the initiative of the other 98 per cent may be considered negligible. Most of the individuals in the larger group are far below the lower limits of even the well-to-do category. It is more than doubtful if their acquisitive efforts would be seriously restrained by the knowledge that if and when they became wealthy they would have to pay higher taxes.

In this 98 per cent are found the owners of most of the nation's unincorporated business enterprises, the bulk of which consists of farms and retail trade establishments. These people would still be free to exercise their talents and enterprise to their hearts' content. The rest of the business enterprise of the country is in the hands of corporations. If heavy taxation of the rich and well-to-do has a seriously restraining influence on business initiative, it must be because it impairs the exercise of that quality by corporate enterprise.

It cannot be denied that there are many corporations, of which the Ford Motor Company is the outstanding example, whose activities are largely the reflection of the initiative of a wealthy individual owner. There are others, like the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, whose operations are quite independent of the fortunes and the efforts of the proprietors. It is only where wealthy stockholders are actively concerned with the management and control of corporate policies that soak-the-rich taxes could conceivably "destroy initiative" for the corporation as a whole. For a large proportion of the nation's corporate enterprise this effect would probably be negligible.

While a tax on the income from labor can be escaped by idleness, a tax on the income from property—if comprehensive and adequately enforced—can be escaped only by ceasing to own property. By far the largest component in the incomes of the rich consists of the return from ownership. It makes, for example, more than 75 per cent of the aggregate income of those receiving $50,000 and over annually. A great many rich individuals exercise no business initiative whatever beyond that involved in receiving interest, dividends, and the like. This form of initiative will continue as long as taxes leave anything to be received.

It is sometimes argued that heavy taxation will lead the rich to withhold their funds from investment in risky undertakings, from industrial pioneering, and to place them in government bonds and similar conservative commitments. This would be true if the latter enjoyed a partial or complete tax exemption, as government bonds unfortunately now do, but if the rates were the same on property income from all sources there would be no reason for the shift.

The social-security legislation, perhaps quite accidentally, constitutes a small first step in relieving society from its dependence on the rich for the function of saving. Whether the future will see other governmental action for the promotion of compulsory saving can only be conjectured. If carried farther, such developments might make possible a far heavier taxation of the rich and a greater equalization of wealth and income than are now advisable.

Courtesy of the Public Affairs Committee

The Consumer Front

BY RUTH BRINDZE

THERE is a two-minute scene in "Triple A Plowed Under," the first edition of the Federal Theater Project's Living Newspaper, which for effectiveness of presentation is head and shoulders above the second interim report of the Federal Trade Commission on the milk monopoly. At the desk sits the middleman, a humanized robot who controls the producer on one hand and the consumer on the other by repeating the simple rule of the monopolist, "Take it or leave it." They both take it: the producer takes three cents for a quart of milk which the consumer takes for fifteen cents.

The FTC report supplies explanatory details on the operation of the milk monopoly and shows how the milk trust maintains profits at the expense of producers and consumers. So far only the findings about the Pennsylvania and Connecticut milksheds have been published, but since the two all-powerful holding companies, the National Dairy Products Corporation and the Borden Company, control the milk supply in other parts of the country as well, the reports are a fair enough sample of what the final conclusions will be. Competition in the retail field has been largely eliminated by the simple expedient of buying out competitors and paying them with holding-company stock. The outward semblance of competition is, of course, maintained, even though this necessitates the continuation of the uneconomical system of sending half a dozen milk wagons along the same route, all delivering the same quality of milk at the same price. For the Connecticut companies delivery expense increased from 17.5 per cent of net sales in 1931 to 20.3 per cent in 1933. The Philadelphia companies checked off 21.4 per cent of net sales for delivery expenses in 1934. In both milksheds operating and administrative expenses steadily increased throughout the depression. But despite the high cost of doing business and the decrease in milk consumption, the dealers continued to make a handsome profit, the average for the Connecticut dealers being 14.14 per cent and for the Philadelphia companies 21 to 28 per cent.

Producers made even heavier contributions than consumers to the business success of the distributors. The companies collected these involuntary contributions from the producers by paying them the low "surplus" prices for millions of gallons sold by the distributors as fluid milk, by overcharging them for hauling the milk from the country receiving stations to the city processing plants, and by making them foot the bills for laboratory and field work done by employees of the distributors. The profits that accrue from these and other transactions are not necessarily reflected in the books of the milk distributors, for by complex intercompany sales the profits and losses of units of the operating companies are successfully hidden.

In addition to demonstrating the monopoly's control of price, the commission's investigators uncovered some particularly shabby tricks that had been played on the consumer. There was, for example, the postdating of caps on milk bottles. One of the offenders, it was alleged, was a producer of certified milk under contract to Scott-Powell Dairies of Philadelphia. The commission developed evidence that an official of the dairy had given instructions to date milk a day ahead.

The reported testimony of Milton T. George, formerly a Grade A producer for Supplee-Wills Jones, indicates that the chief difference between Grade A and Grade B milk may be the letter on the label. At the Red Hill station to which he delivered there was only one tank. All milk, without regard to the bacteria content, was dumped into it.

THERE has been a decided swing on the part of consumer groups from complete absorption in price and quality of goods to a concern for fair standards for labor. The contention that our luxuriously appointed emporiums are glorified sweatshops is now substantiated in the Robert committee report, recently sent to the President.

In its study of wage and hour changes in industry since the invalidation of the NRA, the Robert report lists the retail industry as among the five worst offenders. But this report, according to the refreshingly frank comments of the trade press, does not show how bad conditions actually are, since it was based on conditions existing before Labor Day, when winter schedules were not yet in effect. The United States Department of Labor states that for January of this year "average hours worked by employees in retail trade were 3.8 per cent higher than for the same month a year ago . . . average hourly earnings were 0.9 per cent lower." In commenting on this statement the trade journal Retailing says: "That so much pressure should have been exerted on wage and hour standards during 1935, the year in which retail trade generally showed a gain of 14 per cent and department stores 5 per cent, constitutes a general comment on the trade. . . . Is the present trend toward sweatshop conditions to be allowed to continue to the point where some outside authority will be forced to step in?"

The speed-up and the stretch-out have now been successfully applied to retail selling. The personnel managers' orders are to cut staffs and to increase the sales per day for each sales clerk. This system is condemned when it is practiced in the textile-manufacturing industries; if it is permitted to gain a strong foothold in retailing, it will be directly the fault of consumers, individually and as an organized group. This is the time for consumers who object to sweatshops to test the honest intentions of retailers who so persistently and so monotonously have repeated that the customer is always right.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

IT SEEMS to me that President Holt of Rollins College rather let his enthusiasm run away with him when he referred to Eleanor Roosevelt as the "first woman citizen of America." Isn't this a case where comparisons are extremely difficult, not to say odious? I am one of those who admire Mrs. Roosevelt not a little, who believe in her right to carry on her work and live her own life although a resident of the White House. I am grateful to her for breaking the tradition that the President's wife must always sit in the Executive Mansion and devote herself to giving tea and food to the diplomatic corps, army and navy officers, high civilian officials, and the hundreds of strays, foreign and American, who are entertained at the White House in the course of the year. She has rendered a great service to the nation by the simplicity and independence of her life, her refusal to put on airs as the "first lady of the land"—a revolting designation utterly out of place in a democracy, for which the snobbishness of our dailies is wholly to blame. Mrs. Roosevelt's refusal to be accompanied by a Secret Service man, her rebuke to the New York City police when they sought to assign to her a uniformed man who would have deprived her of all privacy and made her conspicuous, her insistence that the wife of the President should behave and be treated like other American women have been a real contribution to our political life. The average person does not realize how strong the tendency has been in Washington in the last twenty-five years to surround the occupants of the White House with the attributes of royalty. Hence it is a valuable precedent that Mrs. Roosevelt is setting when she travels in taxis or occupies an ordinary lower berth in trains.

Everybody ought to be grateful that we have in the White House a woman who thinks for herself, who has vision, and who is well aware that this country is not in a happy condition and needs a radical overhauling. I especially admire her serenity in carrying on her work as she sees fit despite the malicious gossip relating to herself and her husband, deliberately set afoot by the rich and prosperous who are so bitter against the New Deal and its author, even to the extent of believing, incredible as it sounds, that the President is a regularly enrolled member of the Communist Party. Because of Mrs. Roosevelt's sympathy for so many good causes, I am quite willing to overlook the banality and the intellectual poverty of her diary, now syndicated in many dailies, and to put aside my feeling of regret that she makes as many speeches as she does and talks so frequently over the radio, even if the latter is for charity. These regrets are impersonal—by which I mean that no one can write as much and talk as often as Eleanor Roosevelt and not run pretty thin. They do not counterbalance the usefulness of her example in the ways that I have already cited. She is of course bound to support her husband's policies and is indubitably limited by her relationship to him. I cannot but believe that if she were a free agent she would give us some extremely effective criticism of the whole vacillating and dangerous handling of the relief problem. I think she might also have something cogent to say about the failure of the housing program and other errors of the Administration.

But all this does not make her the feminine leader of the United States, and I am sure that she would be the first to say so. Who is the leading woman of the United States? To my mind there is none. Jane Addams merited that title. She left no successor. No other American woman today typifies in herself such glorious achievement or has made herself an international figure of Miss Addams's stature. Certainly Mrs. Roosevelt has failed to take Miss Addams's noble and uncompromising stand on peace—the greatest question before humanity today. Judging by some of her utterances, Eleanor Roosevelt has fallen for the old, stupid argument that because other countries have large armies and navies we must have them, too, without stopping to analyze just what that means. But waiving that, we have a number of distinguished women besides Mrs. Roosevelt. They are great in their respective fields, yet somehow I cannot think of one who really merits the designation of the first woman citizen of the United States.

The rest of this page I wish to devote to Theodor Wolff's remarkable new book "The Eve of 1914." I know that many people are fed up with the World War and what caused it. They do not wish to read anything further about it; indeed, more and more persons are so heartsick over the world today that they want to forget all about it and no longer even care to peruse the reports of Hitler's aggressions or of the dissensions and lack of a vigorous program among the former Allies. Still I feel that I must mention this great historical contribution of the man who was the foremost editor in Germany during and after the war. There should certainly be a clearer understanding of the machinations and intrigues which led the world into its present impasse. I do not mean that one must accept Wolff's interpretations as final truths. But here is one who was a key man in Germany, who risked a great deal by his outspoken criticism of his own government during the war. Now he is a victim of the horrible misgovernment of Germany for which the Allies and we ourselves are responsible. It seems to me that if any of us still wish to try to prevent a final disaster, we should profit by the present judgments of Theodor Wolff. Particularly enlightening are his conversations with Bethmann-Hollweg. But the whole book is a historical document of lasting worth.

BROUN'S PAGE

IT HAS always been my contention that virtue can best be maintained when access to vice is kept fairly open. We speak sternly of believing in liberty not license as if the latter mode of existence had been widely tried and found wanting. Frankly I am not prepared to say that life under license would be both beautiful and enjoyable, for I have never had a complete shot at any such dispensation. Who has? Even those cities which boast of being wide open set restrictions somewhere along the line and interfere with the wholly lawless state.

Henry Mencken used to speak with pride of the "free state of Maryland" and intimate that Baltimore was the logical successor to Gomorrah. But those were empty boasts. Recent years have exposed Mr. Mencken as a respectable burgher, and he meant no more than that it was possible to procure bootleg beer in the city of his choice. But that hardly set Baltimore apart among the metropolises of the nation. In my dream of an almost perfect United States I have thought of the establishment of regional cities of sin. The districts used by the Federal Reserve system might suit the purpose in the main. These selected spots would be beyond and above the law. Quite possibly we shall yet return to prohibition on account of the manifest evils of alcohol. But no restrictive legislation would be binding in the cities of sin. Naturally gambling and all behavior held to be immoral would be permitted in these special havens.

My aim, of course, is to promote morality. In other words, I believe in liberty not license. Or, to be more precise, I think license might be fine if we were all developed somewhat beyond our present natural timidity. The cities of sin would serve to keep the great majority of us in the straight and narrow path because we should know that escape from our chosen routine was always possible. The average man might say to himself, "I will abide by righteousness and good conduct for another year and then I'll get a round-trip ticket to the nearest C. of S. and cut loose for a fortnight."

But when the year ended, the expedition could go over for another six months. Human nature leans to procrastination, and even the sinners are inclined to say, "Next week will do. Depravity can wait." According to my theory men and women under this dispensation would live and die without fault simply because they never took advantage of their opportunities. They went along quite cheerfully in rectitude because high jinks were always just around the corner.

The city where I am now spending the last few days of my vacation has made a rather gallant try in the right direction. At its best Miami, Florida, is as wild as any mining camp and much more luxurious. Unfortunately the city possesses what is known as a "better element." My luck is so bad that I generally arrive just after the better element has come into power. Slaving away at various tasks in New York mid ice and snow each spring and winter, I read the newspapers and learn that the weather is clear and warm in Miami and that all the vicious gambling resorts are running wide open. A week later I put my affairs in order and show up in the city of sin prepared to relax and get the roses back into my cheeks. After a pleasant dinner I cash a check and inquire at the desk as to where I may go and lose my money. The clerk shakes his head dubiously. "Everything is closed, Mr. B," he says. "There's a reform wave on and all gambling has been outlawed."

"But," I object, "I read that this city was wide open all through the season."

"And so it was," explains the Miamian. "But now the season is over and the law-and-order crowd have stepped in."

I wish Miami would make up its mind whether it intends to be another Zion or a new Babylon. It annoys me to arrive invariably upon the up-wave of reform, and I want it distinctly understood that these sackcloth interludes are no part of my doing.

In all fairness to the resort which proclaims that it is "America's playground" I must report that puritanism has not won the citadel utterly. During the afternoon it is possible to bet upon the horses, and at night the greyhounds run. But at the stroke of midnight Miami becomes completely a city of law and order. Or is somebody fooling me? Again it is a town of strict Sabbath enforcement. The dogs and the horses go into retirement until the Lord's Day has ended. There is nothing to do but listen to sermons or try to catch sailfish. And both are tedious sports.

Still something should be said in compliment to the clergy of Miami. The Florida metropolis contains more churches than any city of its size in the entire nation. And yet the preachers give a surprisingly small amount of trouble. While the season is on they are never under foot. All their sermons against gambling are delivered in summer when there isn't any. During the good months of the year the men of the cloth content themselves with thundering at the Morbites and the Philistines. The children of darkness and the children of light lie down together much as the lions and lambs of the millennium. The men who run the gambling resorts even go to the length of paying for "Go to church on Sunday" advertisements. Miami at its best has a complete economic unity.

It is even possible that this town might hold its proper place as a city of sin throughout the year if it were not for local pride. Nobody here gets annoyed at Florida racketeers. Home-town talent is accorded free rein at all times. Unfortunately every once and so often gangsters from New York come down and shoot local boys who are making good. Miami resents that. It is still pretty parochial. But after all, one should be patient with a growing community. Even if Miami isn't the perfect city of sin it makes a perfectly elegant try.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

"WINTERSET"—CRITICS' PRIZE-WINNER

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THE Dramatic Critics' Circle, composed of seventeen metropolitan critics including The Nation's, gave its prize for the best play of the season by an American author to Maxwell Anderson's "Winterset." This is the first annual award; it was made with only three dissenting votes; and it augurs well for the future significance of the prize.

I happen to have concurred in the majority opinion, but nearly all who are familiar with the tragedy, either through the performance or the printed version, will probably agree that it is, at least, an easily defensible choice. Obviously, the selection was not, as too many of the Pulitzer Prize selections appear to have been, the result of a compromise upon some inoffensive mediocrity agreed upon as a last resort. The play has character; its virtues and defects are positive; and no one could well remain merely indifferent to so unusual and so passionate an appeal to deep emotions.

The official announcement of the award reads in part as follows:

The Circle's decision is based upon the conviction that in "Winterset" the author accomplished the notably difficult task of interpreting a valid and challenging contemporary theme dealing with the pursuit of human justice in terms of unusual poetic force, realizing a drama of rich meaning and combining high literary distinction with compelling theatrical force.

Speaking only for myself, I should like to particularize somewhat further and to say that there are at least two reasons why I believe "Winterset" a play of more than usual significance.

To begin with, it is verse drama of a very special kind. I do not mean to assume that a play in verse, even a commercially successful play in verse, would necessarily be noteworthy merely because it was at once "poetic" and successful. Mr. Anderson himself has written "poetic drama" before now, and despite the popularity of his "Mary of Scotland" I could never feel that that play, as a play, was more than respectable. Indeed, the very fact that its author, who had collaborated in "What Price Glory?" and independently written at least one excellent comedy, turned to a historical subject when he wished to write a play in verse was distinctly dispiriting. It seemed to confirm the almost universal if tacit assumption that only the past can be conceived in poetic terms, that the poetic drama has ceased to exist, not because we have left poetry, but because poetry has left us—because modern life and our conception of it are radically unsuited to that degree of elevation which makes verse a natural medium of sincere expression. To a considerable degree at least,

"Mary of Scotland" partook of the nature of a pastiche, and a pastiche is not merely the opposite of a work of art. It also usually amounts to a confession on the part of its maker that he was compelled to use fragments of other men's art because he found it impossible to transmute his experience into art of his own creation.

"Winterset," on the other hand, is a contemporary theme treated in connection with contemporary life. The important fact is not that its language is metered. Furthermore, when one stresses the fact that the scene is contemporary, one does not, of course, mean to assume that only in connection with contemporary events can anything significant be said. But verse is an outward sign that the author proposes to reach a certain degree of elevation. And the choice of the contemporary scene is an outward sign that he proposes to attack in the directest possible manner the problem of demonstrating that the life of today affords themes inviting treatment in the poetic form. The measure of his success is just the fact that the impressiveness of the drama is nowhere diminished by any sense on the spectator's part that the matter and manner are radically incongruous.

"Winterset" exhibits most of the usual technical characteristics of the poetic drama. Its personages not only speak verse but are endowed with that supernormal power of expression which sacrifices realistic representation to completeness of communication. The meanest of them takes on a dignity which belongs to him not as a person but as a necessary participant in an action the sum total of which is grand in its implications. The most important are capable of philosophic reflections which, as individuals, they would never be competent to formulate but which are permitted them by virtue of a convention endowing the chief figures in poetic drama with the power to understand the significance of their own character and actions. Yet to anyone not unduly disturbed by the mere unfamiliarity of such a play the fact that twentieth-century persons should speak in the form and manner of poetry soon becomes as readily acceptable as the fact that a twelfth-century Danish prince or a fourteen-year-old Italian girl of the Renaissance should do so. To say all this is not to say that "Winterset" is perfect or everywhere completely realized. For example, the deaths which constitute the catastrophe seem annoyingly fortuitous. But it does indicate why it demonstrates more successfully than any other American play that the poetic drama is not dead beyond hope of resurrection.

The second great virtue of "Winterset" lies in its illustration of the manner in which a "socially significant" theme may be treated in genuinely dramatic and genuinely poetic fashion. Obviously the situation was suggested by the Sacco-Vanzetti trial, but Mr. Anderson has realized that the attempt to use such a subject in imaginative literature is justifiable only if imaginative literature can produce an effect or reach a depth of understanding beyond the scope of the essay, the speech, or the polemic. There is no excuse for saying in the dramatic form what can be said in a simpler manner, and Mr. Anderson has justified himself, first, by his brilliant generalization of the subject and, secondly, by the success with which he has explored its deepest implications—the question of the nature of justice and the question of the effect upon various human beings of their success or failure in the search for it. By dealing not with the event itself but with the reverberations of that event in after years, he sacrificed journalistic immediacy but gained to an immeasurable degree in emotional and philosophic richness.

As I am not unaware, many persons would maintain the superior usefulness of the previous play on the same subject which he wrote with Harold Hickerson, and it is true, perhaps, that he would never have written "Winterset" at all had it not been for the social indignation which found direct expression in "Gods of the Lightning." But that play merely said what had been said with equal effectiveness in journalistic terms dozens of times before, and the most useful play is the play which contributes to the intellectual or emotional understanding of a subject something which only a playwright can contribute. Looking back to the review which I wrote when "Winterset" was first produced, I find myself remarking that if "Gods of the Lightning" represents what, as a citizen, Mr. Anderson had to say about Sacco and Vanzetti, then "Winterset" represents what, as poet and playwright, he had further to say upon the same subject. The distinction, I still think, is significant. And the artist serves society best when he serves it in ways of which only the artist is capable.

BOOKS

The Mainsprings of Capitalism

THE GENERAL THEORY OF EMPLOYMENT, INTEREST, AND MONEY. By John Maynard Keynes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

IN CONTRAST to the general run of orthodox economists, Mr. Keynes has distinguished himself throughout the depression by proposing concrete measures for alleviating the crisis. While neither his own government nor that of the United States can be said to have given his suggestions a fair trial, his views have unquestionably influenced policy in both countries, though in a markedly different manner. His was one of the strongest voices in support of the easy-money and re-funding policies of the British government, while his bold proposals for public-works expenditures, spurned in Britain, found favor with the Roosevelt Administration. Throughout this period Mr. Keynes has encountered vigorous opposition from his orthodox colleagues, who are patiently waiting for a reconstruction of economic life according to the copybook maxims of laissez faire theory.

It is these maxims, so firmly held by the majority of present-day economists, to which Mr. Keynes turns attention in the present book—his first important theoretical work since the "Treatise on Money" published five years ago. While accepting many of the postulates of orthodox dogma, he finds it necessary to modify certain of its basic assumptions. He starts by challenging the view—widely held by economists as well as business men—that reduction of real wages is the only known road to full employment. As against the contention of the classical theorists, Mr. Keynes maintains that there is often no way by which labor as a whole can reduce its real wage by means of voluntarily accepted cuts in money wages, and any attempt to do so only aggravates the fundamental difficulties. A reduction in wages may aid a single establishment to curtail its costs, and thereby make it possible for it to expand production and employment, but a general wage cut can only reduce consumption and accentuate the deflationary process. Although this conclusion is fully in line with everyday experience during the depression, Mr. Keynes is compelled to reconstruct a considerable portion of the classical theory in order to show why the traditional economists are wrong. His argument is so technical and detailed that it is impossible to do justice to it in the scope of a brief review, but at the risk of oversimplification it may be said to run somewhat as follows:

The national income, measured in terms of real wealth, is obviously dependent primarily on the level of employment. An increase in the number of persons engaged in productive activity should normally yield a larger aggregate product to be divided among the population. The volume of employment in turn tends to be fixed at a point where business yields the maximum profits. In determining the level of business activity which they believe will give the highest return, entrepreneurs are guided by the status of three variable factors: (1) the propensity of the population to consume; (2) the prospective yield of new capital investment; and (3) the current rate of interest.

A number of influences play upon the "propensity to consume," but the primary element is unquestionably the level of income. Most men will increase their expenditures for consumption as their income rises, though not to the full extent of their new income. Now a rise in employment and income can only come through an increase in investment. Any expansion in business activity requires capital. But investment cannot grow unless it is accompanied by a rise in consumption, for otherwise there would be no demand for the increased production. Nor can all of the new output be consumed, since there must be a margin of savings from which the capital can be drawn. It is possible to measure the effect of each new investment on the general level of employment, according to Mr. Keynes, by what he calls the "marginal propensity to consume." If the habits and psychology of a community are such that they consume, say, nine-tenths of each new unit of income, it follows that the total employment produced by increased public works, or any other new investment, will be ten times the amount of primary employment created by the new enterprise.

Business men will be inclined to invest in new capital equipment as long as the returns from such investment promise to be in excess of the current rate of interest. A rise in the interest rate discourages productive investment and reduces employment, while a lowering of the rate—within certain limits—tends to stimulate both. Thus while the orthodox economists assume that an increase in the interest rate would encourage savings and thereby promote investment, Mr. Keynes maintains that the only function of interest is to prevent people from hoarding; and if the public has confidence in the stability of economic conditions, 2 per cent may be fully as effective as 6 in accomplishing this result. He denies that the interest rate is affected under present conditions by fluctuations in either spending or investment, insisting that the rate is largely determined by tradition except where it is definitely controlled by the monetary authorities. Thus instead of being an automatic regulator of economic activity, as traditional theory has it, the rate of interest must be manipulated if it is to be helpful, and in the opposite direction from the change envisioned by orthodox theory. Thus a cut in real wages, instead of reducing the marginal demand for capital and thereby reducing the rate of interest and stimulating investment, would lower the "propensity to consume"—by redistributing income in favor of the rentier class—and probably lead to a postponement of investment and increased tendency to hoard.

Stripped of the technicalities which might baffle the lay reader, there is much similarity between Keynes's analysis and that of Moulton in the "Formation of Capital." Both find the key to our present economic difficulties in the tendency toward oversavings, which is accentuated by the maldistribution of income; both show that the new investment which is necessary to revive employment is dependent on consumption rather than on savings; and both would agree—in opposition to the orthodox school—that a reduction in wages is self-defeating in that it inevitably curtails consumption. But between a price-lowering and a wage-raising policy, Keynes chooses the latter on the ground that it is more likely to maintain full employment. And for some reason he does not follow out the logical trend of his thought by considering, in any detail, the effect of a redistribution of income as a means of increasing the "propensity to consume." Despite a considerable amount of evidence to the contrary, he clings to the view that low money rates together with public expenditures will stimulate investment sufficiently to offset the deficit purchasing power of the underprivileged. While admitting that governmental expenditures must do more than replace private expenditures if they are to be effective, he does not foresee the danger—as exhibited in the WPA—that government investment may have the effect of depressing wages and thereby accentuating the underlying disequilibrium.

It will be seen that the theoretical weakness of Mr. Keynes's position does not lie so much in the factors which he discusses as in those which he omits. He appears to assume, as do the orthodox economists whom he berates, a flexible or semi-flexible economic system which no longer exists, and he neglects the all-important phenomenon of an economy dominated by gigantic corporations and trade associations whose fundamental interests and policies are in conflict with the interests of society as a whole. Given the undeniable trend toward rigidity in our economic structure, the type of controls which he envisages are bound to become increasingly ineffective. This he tacitly admits in the final chapter when he suggests that it would be desirable ultimately to eliminate interest and advocates a more rigorous system of progressive taxation. Yet even these proposals, admirable though they are, seem to overlook the apparently irresistible counter-force exercised by monopolies and trusts, which utilize governmental power to strengthen their anti-social policies.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Love in Connecticut

AS THEY REVELED. By Philip Wylie. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

MR. WYLIE in "As They Reveled" has written about a group of people to whom sophistication is another word for sex. That very concept insures their being made a subject for satire; it also makes clear just how startling the satire is going to be. It also, I am afraid, makes clear how from time to time satire will take a back seat, and sex will be put on display as a diverting spectacle in its own right. Indeed, you need not be a passionate lover of satire in order to enjoy much of what goes on in these pages; for that matter, perhaps the less you love satire the better.

The people herein described did most of their reveling on a few jointly shared acres in Connecticut, but they also reveled now and then on Cape Cod, in Manhattan, and along the Jersey shore. There were four men and five women in all, and by the law of combinations and permutations nine people can be grouped and regrouped in a staggering number of ways. In "As They Reveled," what is more, they are. The two most interesting of Mr. Wylie's nine people are Alice, to whom all this open-shop philandering is new, but who learns, and

Moments

Mr. Eliot Wonders Why His Eaglets Have Flown in the Wrong Direction

Claudette, a Southern homebreaker in her teens who is punished for not having a shred of character by soon not having a shred of reputation. Mr. Wylie is merciless with Claudette, but somewhat indulgent toward all the others—except the lowborn Charley Everest—and at the end most of the husbands are again in possession of their wives.

Mr. Wylie shows almost no insight in dealing with these people. He shows a certain worldly knowledge, but that is a different thing. It would be hard to avoid, of course, exposing their moral illiteracy and the infantile complacency with which they tumble in the hay. But other things that would seem equally hard to avoid—their leisure-class frivolity, their suburban brand of taste, their bankrupt minds—he has somehow strangely ignored. He has been satisfied to confine himself to love: "Sweet love," as he puts it, "love whereof even the shadows are rose-tinted. Love illimitable. Love unfettered. Modern, civilized, biochemical, endocrinological, adept, expert, unemotional, functional, promiscuous, unbigoted, and enlightened love." As for social criticism, Mr. Wylie seems to admire the suave Mr. Larch, who plays golf and learned how to dress at his Eastern university, much more than he admires the coarse Mr. Everest, who visits bowling alleys and never learned how to dress at all. His book abounds in distinctions of this sort, and though I will not affirm that they ruin him as a satirist, I fear they do not quite exempt him from the satire.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

A Quartet on Crime

FIGHTING THE UNDERWORLD. By Philip S. Van Cise.

Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

CRIME'S NEMESIS. By Luke S. May. The Macmillan Company. $2.

FAREWELL, MR. GANGSTER! By Herbert Corey. D. Appleton-Century Company. $3.

CHEESE IT—THE COPS! By Emanuel H. Lavine. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

READING four books on crime in rapid succession has made me very nervous. Instead of going quietly to bed, I have taken to going down to the Tombs at night and looking anxiously under all the beds to make sure no burglars are there. To make matters worse, I found one a few nights ago. Apparently his telephone call to the professional bondsmen had gone astray. We fixed that up, you may be sure, and the bondsman and the lawyer came right over. As a matter of fact, they were already on their way, hanging on the tail-board of a patrol wagon full of crap-shooters that would need to be sprung. Within half an hour the burglar, tool kit in hand, was back in overalls and ready to go to work. That night, for once, I went to sleep happy, knowing that a couple of adjournments of the trial would give the good fellow time to earn his fees for lawyers and bail bonds. One thing I like about criminals is that they try to pay as they go; there is none of this business of running into debt when a little extra work—at night, if need be—will keep the business of beating the rap on a strictly cash basis.

For a person like myself, through whose nands—figuratively speaking—about 80,000 offenders pass each year, too many books on crime at once are always confusing. Take, for example, the four I have just gulped down. Mr. Lavine wants me to believe that the cops are crooked and incompetent and that crime flourishes unchecked. Mr. Corey, on the other hand, makes it clear that the G-men combine the qualities of Sherlock Holmes and the United States Marine Corps and have driven all the crooks into the nearest ocean. Mr. Lavine insists that the cops beat the crooks with rubber hose, but Mr. May says they beat them with microscopes, chemical analyses, moulage, and ballistics. Only Colonel Van Cise's theory leaves me unconfused and in accord. He says that the bunco men are always with us and always will be, so long as people try to get something for nothing and thereby label themselves suckers.

I started to skim through Colonel Van Cise's book because it seemed to me rather a thick tome to come out of a single prosecution, and that a Denver case now fifteen years old. But I read it avidly, page after page. Such a case carries no date line, is never localized. The con men are the one enduring group in crime: they never go out of date, never stop working, never confine themselves to one locality, never stop corrupting law-enforcement officials, and seldom reform, even on their death-beds. I think their idea of heaven is a place where everyone is an Oklahoma oil man and there are no cops, prosecutors, or sheriffs with whom you have to split.

Those of us who knew Denver in the gay twenties, when those amazing owners of the Denver Post, Bonfils and Tammen, were still in power, will read "Fighting the Underworld" with special interest. (Note to Editor: Their power is gone. No fear of libel suits.) Denver was the last of the great cities to lose its frontier qualities; probably it has not lost them yet. It was the Mecca for all the men in the mountain states who made money fast and stood ready to lose it with equal speed. Naturally, it was also the Mecca for all the con men who worked the Florida resorts in the winter, the Southwest all the year round out of Kansas City, and Denver in the summer-time.

Denver swigged its crime raw fifteen years ago. Pickings were easier and richer than in any other city of its size in the country. For the police, too, there was a pot of gold at the end of every policeman's rainbow in those days. I was out there quite often in 1924-25, just after Colonel Van Cise had sent Lou Blonger and his gang of steerers and spielers to the pen. Highly respectable citizens gave me some hint of the extent to which a large city can be dominated by known crooks. The essence of the frontier philosophy, however, was given me by an old friend, an ex-convict. His wife had left him for a dashing young rancher down-state. He was planning to go down and kill them both when I met him in the Brown Palace Hotel. We rode around in his car all night while I argued that it would be bad for his children if he did it. He didn't do it, finally, but this is the one thought I remember of all he said that night: "If I go down there to kill them, the deacon of my church will loan me his gun to do the job with. It's the law of the desert, and it will hold good as long as there's alkali in the water."

It is a mystery to me why Colonel Van Cise, a new district attorney with nothing much but a vague idea that Denver need not be dominated by grafters, should have thought he could beat the law of the desert, when Denver was still little more than a lawless frontier town. How he did it is fascinating reading. The chief man he got, Lou Blonger, virtual boss of Denver and fixer for Florida, makes Dutch Schultz look like a piker.

"Crime's Nemesis" deals with the scientific detection of crime. It loses entertainment value for the casual reader by contrast with an earlier and better-written book by Henry Morton Robinson called "Science vs. Crime." To the professional reader, however, it has greater value because Luke May is a highly competent scientific investigator who is writing about his own cases. A modest man writing about himself and his own work naturally tones everything down; Colonel Van Cise, by the way, evaded the issue by writing very effectively in the third person.

Similarly, "Farewell, Mr. Gangster!" deals with the same subject and drew on the same sources as Courtney Riley Cooper's "Ten Thousand Public Enemies." Corey's book is more informative on federal machinery and is good reading, but Cooper skimmed the cream off the J. Edgar Hoover milk a year ago.

Lavine, on the other hand, has the good fortune to have been preceded by an even worse book, written by a fellow-reporter employed by the same newspaper service—Martin Mooney's "Crime Incorporated." If two worse book have been written on the subject of crime in the last decade, I will gladly read them as a penance. I am not a loud booster for the police of our American cities. They often are dumb-bells and sometimes grafters. They usually have the physical courage of the Bull of Bashan and very often the brains also. But it is dirty and cheap business to write a book that leaves one with the impression that police officers are all dumb brutes, without quoting one single grand-jury report, one bit of documentary evidence, one line more authoritative than an undated newspaper paragraph. The police deserve to be spared loose denunciation without documentation.

There is good meat in the books by Van Cise, Corey, and May. They are worth-while reading for the professional and better-than-ordinary reading for the layman. But if there is any meat in Mr. Lavine's book, it is certainly tripe.

AUSTIN H. MACCORMICK

The Economy of Plenty

$2500 A YEAR. By Mordecai Ezekiel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

IN THIS interesting and readable volume Dr. Ezekiel proposes what his publishers describe as "a definite and practical means for accomplishing the change in our economic society from scarcity to abundance." The author's immediate goal, to be reached within a few years, is a minimum family income of $2,500 a year, or slightly less than the average family income in 1929. This would require a national income about $24,000,000,000 above the actual total in that year, if all of the increase were used to bring lower incomes up to the $2,500 level and higher incomes were left unchanged.

The author's contention that a family needs at least $2,500 a year—an income enjoyed by less than one-third of our families even in 1929—to maintain a comfortable standard of living can be accepted without question. And we have ample resources, technical facility, and labor supply to provide every family with at least $2,500 if the additional income were properly distributed. This would be possible even on the basis of the modest Brookings estimate of productive capacity, which takes full account of the limitations of weather and consumer-buying habits.

Dr. Ezekiel does not hold the individual business man responsible for this paradox of poverty in the midst of potential plenty. He attributes it to the malfunctioning of the profit system in an era of mammoth corporations, overhead costs, and "administered prices," and to a lack of "coordination between all segments within each industry and between different industries." Since the market for his product at a profitable price is limited, no single business man can expand his operations unless a general increase in buying power can be brought about. "What is needed is some method by which production, buying power, and markets for goods can thus be increased all at the same time." This explanation is undoubtedly sound as far as it goes, but it doesn't go far enough to explain how business ever recovers from a depression or why business operating under the modern profit system was able to produce more than twice as many goods and services in 1929 as it produced in 1932.

So much for the author's diagnosis of our present difficulties. His prescription for the malady is far less convincing. It is extremely doubtful, at least in the opinion of this reviewer, whether the patient could ever be made to swallow the medicine, or whether it would produce a cure. What Dr. Ezekiel proposes is an "industrial-adjustment" program whereby individual producers would be induced by the offer of cash benefit payments to enter into "voluntary" contracts with the government to increase output, to employ more labor, and, in most cases, to pay higher wages while charging lower prices. The money for benefit payments would be obtained from production taxes collected from all producers, similar to the AAA processing taxes. Production schedules and benefit and tax rates would vary from industry to industry with the aim of securing a planned and coordinated expansion of business and employment. The individual business man would be induced to cooperate by the tax-benefit device and by the hope that profits would increase, in spite of lower prices, as the result of larger sales volume.

Entirely aside from the question of constitutionality, of which the author is aware, and the tremendous administrative complexity of any such plan, which he greatly underestimates, Dr. Ezekiel has made no attempt to show what amount of tax and benefit would be sufficient to induce the individual producer to agree to enlarge his output, lower his prices, and increase his direct production costs by raising wages and hiring more men. The individual business man would still be under the yoke of the profit system. He would have to decide whether the benefit was large enough to be worth the risk of higher costs, lower prices, and perhaps the burden of an unsalable surplus on his hands. Of course if, as Dr. Ezekiel hints, the government stood ready to purchase surplus output, producers would be happy to operate at full capacity, and without benefit payments. If the "ever-normal-granary" idea were applied to manufactured goods, the rest of the Ezekiel plan could be scrapped forthwith, for the building boom resulting from the construction of government warehouses would soon end the depression. But then the government would be cursed by the profit system.

The administrative machinery for the industrial-adjustment program would be a blend of the AAA and the NRA. At the top would be the Industrial Adjustment Administration. Then would come Industry Authorities, much like NRA code authorities but with labor and consumer representatives and inter-industry and regional committees. Dr. Ezekiel thinks administration would be simpler than under the NRA, but it seems to me that it would be so difficult as to be wholly impossible. NRA code authorities in most industries were responsible only for enforcing minimum wages, which applied to only a small fraction of the working force, and maximum hours, and this they did badly in most cases. Industrial adjustment would call for insuring compliance with contracts involving fixing of prices, hours, wage rates, and production. If we are to have production for use instead of for profit, complete government ownership and operation of the nation's industries would appear an easier task of administration than Dr. Ezekiel's industrial-adjustment scheme.

FREDERIC DEWHURST

Journey for Journey's Sake

CROSSROADS OF THE CARIBBEAN SEA. By Hendrik de Leeuw. New York: Julian Messner. $3.

WHY are so many contemporary travel books banal and dull? A comparison of most of them with the accounts of voyagers who traveled in the days when to go to the remote parts of the world meant that a man was forced to stake his life against the risks of an unknown country and untamed natives reveals a difference that is startling. The reason for the quality of the earlier books, I have come to believe, is that their writing was incidental to the business in hand—the discovery of new territory, the assumption of the "white man's burden," the finding of treasure or of a new product to exploit. The travelers traveled for a purpose, and, their missions finished, they reported their successes or their failures. What has been said does not apply to all books of travel written today, for there are still those who go to the far corners of the earth with a purpose other than that of gathering material for a book. The volume of the late L. M. Nesbitt entitled "Hellhole of Creation" has the quality of the earlier books of travel; so have the books of Peter Freuchen.

The book under review is peculiarly undistinguished. There is nothing very bad about it, no particular distortion of truth, no special padding. One quite agrees with the author's claim concerning the distinctive character of his book: "Unless I am very much mistaken, this is the first work to treat of Netherlands Guiana, Venezuela, Curaçao, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic within the compass of one volume"; but this is no great justification for any volume. The territory he describes is interesting enough. But Mr. de Leeuw adds about as much to our knowledge of the places he visited as would the diary of someone who might take one of those "vacation trips" that carry people from New York back to New York by way of Haiti, Curaçao, Venezuelan ports, Trinidad, and, let us say, the Virgin Islands.

The book is not only dull; it is almost unbearably bright and cheerful. Mr. de Leeuw travels in the best of all possible worlds. Paramaribo is spotless and clean and the people are oh, so interestingly dressed. The Bush Negroes are nature's noblemen—even to the "naiveness" of their sex life, which as given is no more naive than the author's presentation of it. One never suspects that beneath the magnificence of Caracas lay the tension of the Gomez dictatorship, or that the "great man" himself, adulation of whom is thickly spread, had ever interfered with the happiness of anyone. The picturesqueness of Curaçao is well portrayed, but the manner of telling gives the island a sticky-sweet quality that repels rather than attracts. The accounts of Haiti and Santo Domingo are even more superficial. In one respect Mr. de Leeuw has made a mark as an innovator. Perhaps because he was so interested in presenting a picture that should be bright and full of good-will, he stresses the absence of filth in the streets of the Haitian capital. He happens to be entirely correct; one congratulates him on having been the first to record the fact.

The book is illustrated with sketches by the author. It is to be suspected that just as he has followed the writings of others who have described the places he visited, so he has been inspired by the drawings of his better-known countryman, Hendrik Willem van Loon. A bibliography is appended to the book, but it is carelessly made and consists of so miscellaneous a collection of titles that it can be of little use.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

His LATEST Book on the Sexual Life
Crystallizes the Findings of a Lifetime

COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME—389 PAGES

PARTIAL CONTENTS

The Nature of the Sexual Impulse	Preparation for Marriage	Positions in Coitus
The Sexual Zones	Fertility and Sterility	Sex Life and Nervous Disorders
The Sexual Impulse in Youth	Divorce	Sexual Difficulties
Masturbation	Monogamy; Polygamy	Freud's "Unconscious"; "Libido"
Frigidity	The Nature of Birth Control	Dreams; Their Significance
Impotence	The Question of Abortion	Sex Life of Unmarried Adults
First Intercourse	Frequency of Coitus	Sexual Fetishes and Symbols
Secondary Sexual Characters	The Sexual Athlete	The Art of Love
The "Under-sexed"; the "Over-sexed"	Satyrism; Nymphomania	Sexual Adjustments
Exhibitionism	Jealousy	Sex Happiness
The Sexual Criminal	Married Love	Age and the Sexual Impulse
Analysis of Courtship	Psychoanalytic Concepts of Sex	The Sexual Impulse and Love
Sadism and Masochism	Pre-marital Knowledge and Experience	Love Rights of Women; of Men
Woman's Change of Life	Modesty; Nudism	Esthetics of Coitus
The Dangerous Age in Men	Childbirth; Sex Life during Pregnancy; Immediately after	Expression and Repression
Cruelty and Pain in Relation to Sex	Sexual Feeling in Women	Substitutes for Sex
Homosexuality	Sex Practice in Marriage	Glossary of Sexual Terms
Hermaphroditism	Methods and Technique of Coitus	Index
Sexual Abstinence	Sexual Pleasure and Conception
Sex Intercourse and Health
The Choice of a Mate

AUTHORIZED • $3.00 POSTPAID • UNABRIDGED

CARL VAN DOREN, Ph.D., says:

"The best one-volume treatment of sex in the English language."

FREE OFFER

THE NATION says:

"There is probably no better introduction to contemporary knowledge and contemporary theories about the physiology, psychology and hygiene of sex."

BERTRAND RUSSELL says:

"Few books on the subject of sex can be so confidently recommended as this truly admirable volume."

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 406-N, 333 Sixth Ave., New York City.

Send me a copy of Havelock Ellis' Psychology of Sex for free examination. I will deposit $3.00 plus a few cents delivery charge when the book arrives. Full purchase price to be refunded, if returned within 5 days.

Name.....

Address.....

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $3, thus saving delivery charge. (Same money-back guarantee.)

CHILD PSYCHOLOGY and EDUCATION

GUIDING YOUR CHILD THROUGH THE FORMATIVE YEARS, by Winifred de Kok.....$2.00

PSYCHOANALYSIS FOR TEACHERS AND PARENTS, by Anna Freud.....$1.75

THE CREATIVE HOME, by Ivah Everett Deering.....$2.00

FREE OFFER: For free examination tear out, check title(s) desired, write name and address in margin and mail to your bookseller or to Emerson Books, Dept. 406-N, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York City. Pay postman correct amount plus few cents postage. Or send money with order and save postage. Money back if not satisfied.

JOHN DEWEY says:

"The Open Road's method helps the traveler to get behind the outward scene."

Seeing SOVIET RUSSIA

with
JULIEN BRYAN

Traveler, explorer, photographer and roving reporter for "March of Time"

For the fifth season Julien Bryan will guide a group of Americans through the Soviet Union. You touch Soviet life in a genuine, intimate way, for Mr. Bryan is at home among the Russian people. You go places off the beaten path.

Sailing from New York on the NORMANDIE July 1, you travel for eight weeks, five of them in the Soviet Union. $575.
Inclusive rate

Other group tours (at least a month in the U.S.S.R., with round trip passage) from $372.

Or you may travel on your own.

Tenth Season

THE OPEN ROAD

12th floor
8 West 40th St., New York
Cooperating with Intourist.

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE
MOROSCO THEA., 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30
Extra Matinee Wednesdays

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:40
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:40

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St., W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:40
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:40

SAT. APRIL 18th . . . DANCE TO

CAB CALLOWAY & his COTTON CLUB ORCHESTRA

"HI DE HO HOP"—feature of MIDNITE FLOOR SHOW

AUSPICES NEW THEATRE AND PEOPLE'S BOOKSHOPS

ST. NICHOLAS PALACE
69 W. 66th St.

$1.50 COUPLE
$1.00 SINGLE

CALL
NEW THEATRE
156 W. 44 ST.
BRyant 9-8378

Shorter Notices

MONOGRAM. By G. B. Stern. The Macmillan Company.
$2.50.

The author of "The Matriarch" has turned the solemn task of autobiography into something of a game. From three arbitrarily chosen objects, each long-possessed and dear, she follows a trail of association, winding and doubling on itself in an intricate curving pattern, until at the end she has spread out, like a map with pictures, a panorama of her mind. It is a detached and worldly mind, carrying its worldliness like a cockade, witty, malicious, exciting. It enjoys, among other things, the Marx brothers, Jane Austen, Elsie Dinsmore, the sense of being well dressed, the analysis of snobbery, the baiting of professors, pictures, wine, and revenge. Persuasive, unhurried, the thought travels along the glittering plain, and the reader goes gaily with it. We climb no mountains, but neither do we stumble over any molehills. There are no forbidding areas marked "unexplored." And the region of outer darkness, if it exists, is nowhere indicated on the map.

TO THE MOUNTAIN. By Bradford Smith. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

This is a first novel of less than first caliber which has certain definite and admirable virtues. It is a modern love story of Japan which includes the political and social unrest agitating the young people and at the same time admits the strength of the ancient tradition of filial obedience. Because of her parents' bitter poverty a young girl is sold into prostitution; after a year of training she is claimed by an elderly man who wishes to keep her for himself. Bought out of her trade by a benevolent philanthropist, she falls in love with the son of her first customer, who loves her in return. It is impossible for them to marry; the young man's father would forbid it, and the young lovers cannot quite free themselves from the old tradition. They commit suicide. All this is certainly not new or even particularly striking. But Mr. Smith has rendered an atmosphere and has portrayed character with commendable success. He tells us that his young girl is lovely, composed, dutiful, quiet; and so she is, as he depicts her. His young man is quiet, too, although he is torn between the old life and the new. The whole story, indeed, is imbued with gentleness, order, and peace. In other words, Mr. Smith has taken the rather too familiar material of fiction and transformed it into something of his own making. This is nothing less than creative writing.

DRAMA

The Devil's Tunes

LAST year Robert E. Sherwood's "The Petrified Forest" was a delight to its audiences, a godsend to its actors, a gilt-edged investment for its producers, and an embarrassment to no one except those of us whose business it is to break butterflies on wheels. Our problem was the problem of deciding whether or not it really was merely one of the lepidoptera safely to be treated as such, and to this day I am not quite sure just how seriously I ought to have taken the

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

SAINT JOAN. Martin Beck Theater. Brilliant interpretation by Katharine Cornell of what may well be Shaw's most enduring play.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

ETHAN FROME. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon, and Raymond Massey.

LIBEL. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English courtroom play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

ANNIE OAKLEY. R.K.O. A minor American masterpiece based on the life of Buffalo Bill's best-loved sharpshooter. Barbara Stanwyck as Annie Oakley divides the honors with Sitting Bull.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE 39 STEPS. Gaumont British. Months old, but should be seen wherever possible. A swift and beautiful thriller set in the Highlands, and one of several films which argue British leadership in the immediate future.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Gaumont British. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

The Nation and Harpers Magazine

The most popular combination offered Nation readers. Harpers regularly presents brilliant writers on significant topics concerning our rapidly shifting scene and noteworthy short stories. Next year, more than 180 brilliant features.

one year of both $6.50 value $9

ALL subscriptions are for one year. They may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Payment may be postponed thirty days. But order immediately on the coupon below.

The Nation and Guardian

The Manchester Guardian Weekly remains one of England's most outstanding liberal journals featuring news and interpretation of English politics and literature.

one year of both $7 value $8

The Nation and Readers Digest

The Readers Digest affords a delightful but inexpensive means of keeping well informed. Each issue of 112 pages condenses over 30 articles.

one year of both $6 value $8

The Nation and

Atlantic Monthly . . . $7.50	New Republic . . . $8.75
Common Sense . . . 7.25	New Yorker . . . 9.75
Current History . . . 6.50	Saturday Review . . . 7.75

ORDER COUPON

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City

Please enter one year subscriptions for the following magazines. ☐ I enclose ☐ payment in full OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Magazines

Send to

Name
Address

4-15-36

Letters to the Editors

"M-DAY"

Dear Sirs: In his review of "M-Day" in your issue of April 1 Mr. Walter Millis makes some serious charges. The fact that he violently disagrees with several parts of the thesis, even to the point of calling them "fantastic," is neither surprising nor alarming. Those who are familiar with Mr. Millis's interpretation of war causes will find his reaction in this instance perfectly normal. However, he makes two charges which are serious.

He charges the author with "lamentable carelessness," but offers no further proof of this charge than the statement that "at one point she puts into Mr. Baker's mouth the words of his biographer." This is simply not true. If Mr. Millis will take the pains to refer to Frederick Palmer's biography of Newton D. Baker (the volume and page numbers are given in the footnotes of "M-Day"), he will find that any words of Mr. Baker's quoted from that source are recorded in the biography as a direct quotation. Unless Mr. Millis knows of some rule which forbids quoting a quotation, he is wholly unjustified in his contention. His further remark that an "unwarranted twist" is given to Mr. Baker's statement by "associating it with events happening months after the time referred to" cannot be answered in the absence of specific details.

The second charge is even more serious. He says: "Miss Stein . . . makes extensive use not only of the committee hearings but of information which it did not place on public record." What is his authority for charging that material that is not yet on public record has been used? Mr. Millis was in no way connected with the Senate Munitions Committee, so that he could not have derived this bit of information from that source. As a matter of fact, Senator Nye had the complete manuscript and did not raise a single objection to it. Does Mr. Millis know the committee's record better than does Senator Nye?

It so happens that Thomas W. Lamont of J. P. Morgan and Company, in one of his several attempts to block the publication of "M-Day," made the same charge. However, when he wrote down his objections to the book in a memorandum addressed to the publishers, he not only failed to make this charge but emphasized that the book suffers because it does not include the evidence introduced into the committee's final hearings. Mr. Millis, unlike Mr. Lamont, does not hesitate to put the charge in writing. He owes it to the author, to the committee whose secretary's name he drags into the picture, and to his own readers to explain the source of the information which led him to make a charge both unfair and untrue.

ROSE M. STEIN

Pittsburgh, March 29

Dear Sirs: On page 107-8 of her book Miss Stein says: "Even the strongest advocates of preparedness, admits Secretary Baker, 'never breathed a word suggesting that a single soldier should ever be sent to Europe.'" The citation is to Palmer's "Newton D. Baker," Vol. I, p. 52, where the words clearly appear as those of Palmer, not Baker. They refer to the preparedness agitation of the early summer of 1916 but are introduced without explanation of this fact in support of the contention that up to "and after" the declaration of war in April, 1917, "no one admitted" the possibility of sending a great army to Europe—which seems to me unwarranted.

It was Miss Stein's own remark (page 296-97) that "information divulged to the Senate Munitions Committee, although not made part of that committee's record, indicates that similar action was taken . . . by the British government," as well as her occasional more general comments upon the committee's labors and researches, which gave me the impression that she had been able to utilize material not made part of the public record. Frankly, it never occurred to me that my remark to this effect could be regarded as a "charge"; certainly, I intended by it no accusation of bad faith or of any other sort and am, of course, happy to withdraw a remark which seems to have been open to such misinterpretation.

WALTER MILLIS

New York, April 2

Dear Sirs: You have sent us a copy of a letter by Rose M. Stein which, we understand, you plan to print. We must call your attention to an incorrect statement in Miss Stein's letter: "It so happens that Thomas W. Lamont of J. P. Morgan and Company, in one of his several attempts to block the publication of 'M-Day' . . ."

The publication of "M-Day" was delayed about four weeks because of questions raised concerning it by Mr. Lamont, but it would not be correct to say that Mr. Lamont attempted to block publication of the book. Through the editorial offices of a New York publication, one of whose staff turned to Mr. Lamont as to one well acquainted with this field of literature for advice concerning the book, Mr. Lamont saw a set of galley proofs of "M-Day." After two preliminary telephone calls, raising certain questions concerning the book, Mr. Lamont, at our request, sent us a memorandum outlining his findings in "M-Day." His memorandum did not deal with the questions raised over the telephone but called attention to facts and statements in the book which he considered inaccurate and misleading. His written communication was, of course, a private one, similar to communications we frequently receive which call attention to alleged inaccuracies in a publication. After consulting with Miss Stein we published "M-Day" on March 19.

CHARLES A. PEARCE,

Harcourt, Brace and Company
New York, April 3

MURDER, MARX, AND McCARTHY

Dear Sirs: I take pen in hand on the subject of murder and Mary McCarthy. To have her little Marxian holiday Miss McCarthy must needs exaggerate. The ideological detective story is hardly new. One of the earliest detective-story classics, Anna Katharine Green's "The Leavenworth Case," reeks with moral homiletics. The tales of M. P. Shiel are adorned with sociological disquisitions on progress. In one of them he even attempted to popularize the Nietzschean elimination of the unfit by means of a brotherhood especially devoted to this noble purpose. Chesterton's Father Brown stories are no more than allegories revealing the eternal verities of the Catholic faith. Our own Dashiell Hammett, in his best stories, has always seemed to me to be worth a whole pile of tracts of the American Civil Liberties Union, and I would earnestly recommend to professors of municipal administration his "Red Harvest," a beautiful and gory tale of how a private detective solved the problem of political corruption in a city of the second or third class by instigating feuds between the chief of police, the higher-ups, and the big shots, with the result that they exterminated each other.

Naturally some echoes of communism and fascism have crept into the contemporary detective story. But why does Miss McCarthy fail to mention that celebrated Marxist critic and detective-story writer, G. D. H. Cole? More than a decade ago he injected communism into the detective story. In his "The Death of a Millionaire," which pillories high finance, he has a Communist character lay down the correct party line on assassination. Thus: "I am a Communist—what you call Bolshevik. I avow it. I am proud of it. But do you not know that assassination is against the principles of my party? Mass action, yes: assassination, no—a thousand times no. Do you mistake me for a petty bourgeois conspirator?" And in a somewhat later story, "The International Socialist," Cole triumphantly proves that the suspected Communist most emphatically did not commit the murder.

I wish to inquire also why Sister McCarthy has elected not to mention one of the best of the recent American detective stories which is very much in point. I refer to Darwin L. Teilhet's "The Talking Sparrow Murders." Although the author is an American, the locale of the story is Nazi Germany. The principal murderer in the book turns out to be an American, but the whole spirit of the book is anti-Nazi.

May I ask Miss McCarthy as one addict to another: Is nothing to be sacred? Must we drag the shade of Marx into the world of the detective story? Are we never to relax? Her clarion call to the typewriter, "It remains for the writers of the left wing once again to borrow the methods of the bourgeoisie and to make murder the handmaiden not of Morgan but of Marx," leaves me cold. I doubt whether the subject will be on the agenda of the next Writers' Congress. After all murderers do bump off people with whose politics they are in entire agreement. And if the detective-story writer is to be allowed to have a Democrat murder a Republican, there is no good reason why he should not be allowed occasionally to make the murderer a Communist. As matters stand, the implications of the average detective story are all in favor of communism. It is a sad reflection on the owning classes when a captain of industry is removed by a nephew who is the chief beneficiary under his will.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

New York, March 30

SUPREME COURT JUSTICES

Dear Sirs: An error of fact appeared in the last of Max Lerner's articles on The Riddle of the Supreme Court in The Nation for March 25. While a correction has no effect on the conclusion, it is worth making to keep the record straight and for the light it throws on the part that fate plays in the composition of the Supreme Court. Calvin Coolidge did not appoint both Justices Stone and Sutherland as was stated. He did elevate Stone from the attorney-generalship after the latter had sat in the Cabinet for only nine months. But Justice Sutherland was appointed in 1922, three years earlier, by Warren G. Harding. Indeed, Justice Sutherland, as is not well enough remembered in these days of widespread discussion of the Supreme Court, was only one of Harding's four appointments to the supreme bench in his two years and five months in the Presidency. One other sitting member, Justice Butler (1922), and two late members, Chief Justice Taft (1921) and Justice Sanford (1923), were also Harding appointees. Yet it has been President Roosevelt's fate during a period of momentous constitutional decisions not to have had the opportunity to name a single Supreme Court member, notwithstanding the fact that his Administration is now in its fourth year. Granting that Presidents sometimes guess wrong on their Supreme Court choices, it is hard to believe that Roosevelt, given the opportunity of Harding, would not—in the exercise of one of his constitutional functions—have shaped a court which would have upheld the AAA or in any event would have sustained the Railroad Retirement Act, voided by a five-to-four decision.

IRVING D. HARD

St. Louis, March 25

MARBLE STRIKE

Dear Sirs: I have just read in your issue of April 1 the report of Anita Marburg on the Vermont marble strike against the Proctor Company. There was an error in indicating that "at last" the Department of Labor conciliator came to study the strike and made a report to the department under date of February 13.

I was in Rutland on December 12, immediately following the receipt of information by the department on the labor situation there, and my report was made on December 16, supplementing previous bulletins. It has since been followed by various other reports on two subsequent official trips to Barre and Rutland. The date given in the article in The Nation was in error by almost two months. I have also written Miss Marburg to this effect.

CHARLES J. POST,

Commissioner of Conciliation,
United States Department of Labor
Washington, March 28

A CHANCE FOR CONSUMERS

Dear Sirs: Many of your readers are probably unaware of the ominous labor situation which is developing in the Borden Company as the result of the company's refusal to renew its agreement with the drivers' union. If the company persists in its attitude, a strike is inevitable. Fortunately, a movement is spreading among Borden customers to help the employees by notifying the company to cease delivering milk until it has come to an agreement with the drivers' union.

It is seldom that we consumers have such a clean-cut opportunity to make our pressure felt. Even suburbanites are lending their aid, and the company is beginning to be disturbed at the loss of business. With prompt and widespread action a strike, with its attendant hardships, may yet be averted.

F. A. B.

New York, March 28

FASCISM IN BRAZIL

Dear Sirs: Brazil is potentially one of the greatest nations in the world, not chiefly because of its immense natural resources, which are probably greater than those of any other country except the Soviet Union, but because of the profoundly original and creative character of the Brazilian people. This people is beginning to rise. Its first movement of self-expression inevitably has brought it in collision with the small oligarchy, gathered largely in two or three of the southern Brazilian states, who for two generations have been exploiting Brazil under orders of British and American imperialism. In response to this first stirring of a great people, the government is having recourse to the most brutal repressive measures. Seventeen thousand Brazilians are today in jail, among them a host of intellectual leaders—economists, writers, engineers, liberal statesmen. American opinion has great influence on the Brazilian government. If our voice is now heard in protest against this fascist suppression in the largest republic of the American continents, the Brazilian people will receive the kind of support it deserves from us.

Victory for reaction in Brazil will strengthen reaction not only throughout South America but in the United States and Great Britain—the real “rulers” of Brazilian economics.

WALDO FRANK

New York, March 24

HONOR TO DR. LINVILLE

Dear Sirs: I am sure you will want to record in the columns of The Nation the testimonial luncheon accorded Dr. Henry Richardson Linville at the Hotel Astor in New York City on Saturday, March 28. At this luncheon more than 600 men and women, many of them outstanding leaders in the cause of improved social, economic, and political conditions, assembled in public recognition of Dr. Linville's distinguished service in behalf of education and in honor of his seventieth birthday.

His activities in the past twenty years have been summed up by John Dewey:

Both in war time and in peace Dr. Linville has been outspoken for the rights of teachers; more than any other individual he helped to bring about the repeal of the Lusk laws; he has aroused within the teaching ranks a determination to stand for academic freedom and intellectual integrity; he has given many faltering teachers the courage to stand by the dictates of their own conscience; through his efforts teachers enjoy higher salaries, fairer pensions, improved physical surroundings, a voice in curriculum making and administrative undertaking; always he has emphasized his unequivocal stand for identity of interest of all who worked with hand or brain, whether at desk or in factory, in classroom or in mill. Now as head of the New York Teachers' Guild, Dr. Linville is still valiantly leading the fight for better education, for social and civic welfare.

V. T. THAYER

New York, March 25

THE MONTJOY CASE

Dear Sirs: An indefinite stay in the execution of John Montjoy, Negro, of Covington, Kentucky, convicted for a criminal attack upon a white woman and sentenced to be hung early in April, has been won from the Kentucky Appeals Court by his attorney, William E. Wehrman. The case will now be taken to the United States Supreme Court. Alfred Bettman, Cincinnati attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, and a well-known constitutional lawyer, will appear for the defendant.

The bases on which this case will go up to the Supreme Court are as follows: (1) the alleged victim did not present testimony indicating an attack; (2) she failed to apply for proper medical examination; (3) Montjoy's confession was signed without a lawyer or friend of the accused present but in the presence of eight police officers; (4) Negroes were excluded from both the grand jury and trial jury; (5) the defendant was advised by counsel not to take the stand; and (6) the commonwealth attorney's plea aroused race prejudice.

MARY D. BRITE,

Secretary, Cincinnati Branch,
American Civil Liberties Union
Cincinnati, March 26

PROSTITUTION IN CHICAGO

Dear Sirs: The experience of New York City is similar with that of Chicago in regard to prostitution. However, the Chicago Department of Health attributes much of the city's prostitution to economic conditions. The Department of Health report says:

There has been an increase of unemployed working girls, waitresses, sales clerks, and factory girls, many of them apparently respectable, among the women arrested for moral offenses. Although most of these girls have had multiple sex experiences, it is hardly fair to call them prostitutes; nevertheless, they are quite as important a factor in the spread of venereal diseases as are the prostitutes. In this group are often found young women ranging from eighteen to twenty-five years of age who, unlike the prostitute, are not under medical supervision; nor do they understand the value of cleanliness and prophylaxis. Often the first knowledge of the fact that they are venereally infected is brought to them as a result of the examination following their first arrest. . . .

There is an urgent need for the establishment of quarters for the proper housing and care of indigent patients who are suffering from venereal diseases.

T. N. HALL

Chicago, March 20

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

EVELYN SEELEY first saw the activities of the chamber of commerce at close range when she covered the San Francisco general strike in 1934. She has been a newspaper woman in many parts of the country. Now she writes a column, "Free Press," in the Guild Reporter, the organ of the American Newspaper Guild.

CARLETON BEALS writes the second of two articles on the plight of the Alabama share-cropper and tenant farmer. Mr. Beals's impressions, as his articles plainly indicate, are always made at first hand. While he was in Alabama he slept in share-croppers' huts and shared with them their daily corn pone.

LILIAN T. MOWRER, wife of Edgar Ansel Mowrer, well-known foreign correspondent now in Paris, spent eight years as dramatic critic in Germany before Hitler came to power. Dramatic critics are probably as useless in the Third Reich today as good plays are scarce.

GEORGE TERBORGH is an economist on the staff of the Brookings Institution. He is the author of a Brookings pamphlet, "Price-Control Devices in NRA Codes," and with John H. Gray of "First Mortgages in Urban Real-Estate Finance."

RUTH BRINDZE, author of "How to Spend Money," is a lecturer on consumer buying and is active in the groups now seeking a new deal for the consumer.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER is a regular reviewer for The Nation and the New York Times. He is the editor of "An Eighteenth Century Miscellany."

AUSTIN MACCORMICK is the energetic Commissioner of Correction of New York City who began his term of office with a dramatic raid on Welfare Island and a disclosure of shocking conditions there.

FREDERIC DEWHURST, formerly economist on the staff of the Twentieth Century Fund, is now director of the Committee on Social Security of the Social Science Research Council in Washington.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is in the Department of Anthropology at Northwestern University. His researches have taken him into various parts of the world, notably to French West Africa and to Haiti, where he studied Negro culture.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · APRIL 22, 1936

NUMBER 3694

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

LIBERTY AND TEAR GAS	500
THE AIR DISASTERS	500
LABOR AT SEA	501
MONGOLIA—RED OR WHITE?	502
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	503
"GERMANY—A WINTER'S TALE" by Lion Feuchtwanger	505
CONFLICT IN OUTER MONGOLIA by T. A. Bisson	507
AFTER EPIC IN CALIFORNIA by Lillian Symes	509
ON BEING CONTEMPORARY by William Troy	511
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	513
BROUN'S PAGE	514
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
... BUT I DON'T KNOW WHAT I LIKE by Joseph Wood Krutch	517
THE FLOWERING by Charles Hudeburg	518
GOVERNMENT IN THE U. S. S. R. by Abram L. Harris	518
MARVELOUS BOY by Louis Kronenberger	520
CRITICISM BY EXCLAMATION by Mark Van Doren	520
POEMS—BY MACLEISH by Philip Blair Rice	522
THE RED AND THE WHITE by Ben Belitt	522
MR. SANTAYANA'S WISDOM by Eliseo Vivas	524
LITTLE SISTER FRANCIS by Dorothy Van Doren	525
MR. BROWDER STUDIES HISTORY by Louis M. Hacker	526
SHORTER NOTICES	528
RECORDS by Henry Simon	529

The Shape of Things

*

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S SPEECH AT BALTIMORE on April 13 to a throng of enthusiastic Young Democrats shows that he has one element of strength that may prove as valuable to him as all the Liberty Leagues and Hearst newspapers are likely to prove to his opponent. This is the fact that he seems to be retaining some of his hold on the imagination of the young people of the country. The polls of the Institute of Public Opinion show not only growing Roosevelt strength but an impressive proportion of that strength among the young voters. His most recent proposal to keep the working age within the limits of eighteen and sixty-five is calculated at once to gain votes and to decrease the vast army of the unemployed. No doubt it will do the first, although the recent hearings on the national youth bill (which the President forgot to mention) should qualify any over-great optimism about the real mood of the young people. The hopelessness of their situation is not greatly relieved by the knowledge that their school years will be lengthened a bit before they have to face a world without jobs. One may ask of what use it will be to be kept at school unless the relief appropriations will supply decent food and clothing at home, or what use to be retired at sixty-five unless we have an adequate program for old-age security. Nor shall we even begin to solve the problem of providing reemployment without a more drastic program of socialized control of industry than the Administration seems willing to commit itself to. Mr. Roosevelt's program resembles a meal that has all the trimmings but lacks the pièce de résistance.

*

AFTER A LONG LAPSE PARIS HAS ONCE MORE become the center of gravity in Europe. The British have shown their cards. They are determined to play for time in dealing with Hitler, while pushing for more drastic action against Mussolini. Nothing that France can do is likely to change British policy. France has the choice of throwing its support to Great Britain and the League or seeking a rapprochement with Italy as a step to building a general European alliance against Germany. Moreover, to complicate the situation further, the choice must be made on the eve of an all-important general election. At the moment public sentiment is aroused against Britain, and there is even widespread talk of abandoning the League. Without the League the French plan for a voluntary European sys-

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

tem of mutual assistance would merely be a general alliance against Hitler. The nationalist press is apparently ready to scrap collective security altogether. The left is torn between a desire for strong action against Hitler and anxiety to save the League in order to preserve a broad united front of the democratic nations against fascism. But with Herriot and Blum supporting collective security, it would appear that the League is not as dead as some of the correspondents have indicated.

*

WITH FRANCE HOLDING OUT FOR A BOYCOTT against Germany in the event Hitler seeks to fortify the Rhineland and Britain pressing for further sanctions against Italy, compromise should not be impossible. Logically the two countries could agree either to abandon sanctions and all thought of collective security or to impose penalties against both aggressors. The first course would seem the path of least resistance, but it would create a storm of disapproval in both France and England. The second would be unpopular only with the extreme right. Although Italy's recent victories in Ethiopia make action by the League at this time somewhat comparable to its belated strictures against Japan in March, 1933, the logical argument for sanctions will remain unassailable until the last Italian soldier is withdrawn from Ethiopian soil. Even at this late date a strong stand against Mussolini would do much to restore the prestige of the League, a development which would be as unwelcome in Berlin and Tokyo as in Rome.

*

SENATOR VANDENBERG'S BOTHER OVER THE big AAA payments turns out now to be much ado about nothing, as far as scaring up anti-New Deal ammunition is concerned. After some heartache Secretary Wallace finally was wise enough not to wait for the Senate to adopt Vandenberg's resolution calling for the publication of all payments over $10,000, which would have forced his hand, but released the figures of his own accord. By emphasizing a hitherto neglected aspect of the agricultural problem, these figures have served a more important purpose than that of partisan politics. What they show is the great extent to which American agriculture is concentrated in large-scale holdings. Amounts running to six figures which were paid to huge corporate enterprises in wheat, cotton, sugar, and hog farming have shocked many people who had thought of the AAA payments rather as relief for the poor than as subsidies for the rich. But it is obvious that payments had to be made to the large-scale producers, since without their cooperation it would have been futile to try to raise prices by having crops plowed under. Vandenberg's suggestion of adopting a sliding scale of payments, reducing the amount paid in inverse proportion to the amount of acreage taken out of cultivation, might have been an improvement. But it would not have eliminated disproportionate AAA payments or solved the problem of how to break up large-scale holdings. The need for a solution is all the more immediate under the new Soil Act than it was under the Triple-A, for under the new act the tenants' and croppers' share of the payments is increased from 15 to 25 per cent and therefore they are all the more likely to be evicted by the big planters, who will want to avoid paying them their share.

*

THERE IS MUCH TO BE SAID FOR REPRESENTATIVE Jones's proposed resolution calling upon the Tariff Commission to report the names of all corporations which benefit from the existing tariff to the extent of $100,000 a year or more. Few voters have the slightest conception of the amount of money which is extracted from the pockets of the American people each year to enrich the producers of protected commodities. Prior to the negotiation of the Cuban-American reciprocity agreement, the sugar tariff alone cost the public some $200,000,000 annually. Even today the consumer pays close to $100,000,000 for the doubtful privilege of supporting an uneconomic beet-sugar industry. On the basis of figures for 1929 and 1931 the duty on lead costs the American people $29,000,000 a year; that on ferro-manganese nearly $7,000,000; and that on watch movements approximately $7,000,000. In 1932 the tariff on dairy products added $105,000,000 to the nation's food bill. Although the total tariff bill paid by the consumer has never even been estimated, it has been found that on twenty-one products, the imports of which constituted less than 15 per cent of the total dutiable imports of the United States, the extra cost to the public was more than half a billion dollars. Not all of this vast sum finds its way into the pockets of American producers. In 1931, for example, consumers paid over $2,000,000 in duty on embroidered linen handkerchiefs, while the total American production was valued at only $90,000. The textile industry has been built under a high protective wall, yet it is bankrupt. Like all subsidies, tariffs must be constantly increased if they are to serve their purpose. The proponents of the AAA who are demanding these statistics would do well to ponder on this aspect of the problem.

*

GOOD MEN ARE OFTEN PROPOSED FOR PRIZES but prominent men generally receive them. This dictum applies with particular force to the Nobel peace prize, which, with a few honorable exceptions, has sought out the more conspicuous pillars of our society such as Charles Gates Dawes, Nicholas Murray Butler, and Theodore Roosevelt instead of the genuine heroes of the war against war. It is for this reason that we greet with more enthusiasm than hope the proposal that Carl von Ossietzky be given the peace prize in 1936. His nomination has been made by ninety-three British M. P.'s representing all parties and has been seconded by peace organizations and individuals in several other countries. No more suitable or less likely candidate could have been put forward. Von Ossietzky worked for peace from the time he emerged from the trenches of the World War until he disappeared into a Nazi concentration camp in 1933. There he remains today, broken by torture and the rigors of imprisonment.

A recent dispatch to the New York Times from Amsterdam, quoting the Netherlands labor paper, Het Volk, states that Ossietsky, who has been seriously ill for months, was recently discharged from the camp hospital and set at heavy labor in the fields. "He collapsed within a few hours, and since then has not left his bed," Het Volk reports. To give this man the Nobel peace prize, while it might not ease his sufferings, would magnificently dramatize the judgment of the civilized world on Hitler's Schrecklichkeit. But it is too much to expect. The greater likelihood is that von Ossietsky, honored only by those who knew his work, will die of his sufferings, or face execution. It was Ossietsky whom Goebbels meant when a few weeks ago he ominously remarked: "It is better that the head of one traitor should fall, in peace, than that later in war a hundred soldiers should lay down their lives for his sake."

*

THE DISMISSAL OF PRESIDENT ZAMORA HAS only served to heighten the political turmoil which has gripped Spain since the February elections. The fact that only five members of the Cortes voted against his dismissal is a sufficient indication of his extreme unpopularity. Although formerly a liberal, Zamora had incurred the hatred of the entire left because of his reactionary policies during the years in which the right was in power. The conservatives, on the other hand, could not forgive him for dissolving the Cortes and paving the way for the recent left triumph. No one concedes the right a chance in the Presidential election which will be held on May 17. Judging by the present trend of events, much may depend, however, on whether the new President is a Socialist or a representative of the republican left. With political bitterness deepening daily there can be no guaranty against a disintegration of the Popular Front or against an attempted seizure of power by the fascist clique under Robles. In either instance a strong Marxist President might avert disaster.

*

THE EXILE OF EX-PRESIDENT PLUTARCO ELIAS Calles and four of his reactionary aides brings to a climax the long struggle between President Cárdenas and the clique headed by the man who exercised undisputed mastery over Mexico for more than eleven years. To say that it was a struggle between radicalism and reaction would be to oversimplify the situation. Calles was usually regarded as a liberal until within the past year, while Cárdenas—like Calles, a very wealthy man—has never been more than a mild progressive. But sympathy with the labor movement is good politics in Mexico, and Cárdenas has been clever enough to recognize this in his struggle for mastery over Calles. With remarkable skill at playing both sides against the middle, Cárdenas also made a bid for Catholic support by lifting the restrictions against the church. Calles may not, as is charged, have been responsible for bombing the Vera Cruz express, but he unquestionably was engaged in anti-government activities. His elimination from the Mexican scene should at least simplify the fundamental political issues facing the country.

A SUCCESSFUL WORKERS' MOVEMENT IN THIS country will probably spring from the underprivileged—if they can ever be brought together. And there is surely no more fruitful ground than the ranks of the unemployed. The unification of unemployed organizations which was effected last week in Washington is therefore a significant step. Seven hundred delegates representing a membership of 150,000 from thirty-five states were present. Organizations taking part were the Workers' Alliance of America, which is in close touch with the left-wing Socialists, the National Unemployment Council, affiliated with the Communist Party, the National Unemployed League, sponsored by the "Trotzkyite" wing of the Communist movement, and several independent groups. The group as a whole picketed the WPA offices, attempted to interview somebody at the White House, from the President down—it was told that they had all "gone fishing"—and agreed to sponsor a comprehensive legislative program. The latter included passage of the Frazier-Lundeen social-insurance bill, the Marcantonio relief-standards bill, and the American youth bill. The National Executive Board urged the cooperation of liberals and trade unionists. If the united unemployed organizations could further unite with the embattled social workers who week after week are insisting—with impressive statistics—on the inadequacy of relief, they might even force Congress to pass a proper relief program.

*

MAYOR LA GUARDIA MADE PUBLIC ON APRIL 6 the report of his special committee to investigate the four-months-old strike at May's Department Store in Brooklyn. The report found that the strike was caused by the discharge of two employees for union activity, that wages at May's averaged from 20 to 33 per cent lower than city-wide averages for department-store and retail-trade employees, that during February, 1936, less than 22 per cent of the May employees worked full time, and that they were compelled to contribute fifty cents a week to a "benevolent" association. The committee also criticized Magistrates Folwell, Rudich, and Sabbatino for excessive bail or harsh sentences in cases of disorderly conduct arising out of picketing of the May store, and scored the office of the District Attorney of Kings County for attempting to obtain a charge of conspiracy against the strikers. Wage percentages are never as illuminating as the figures themselves. During the week of December 14 the pay of 349 employees averaged $13.47, the average for the forty lowest-paid workers being $7.76. The part-time average for 162 workers was $10.21, 27 in the lowest-paid part-time group averaging $5.73. The average weekly wage for the city as a whole was $19.78 for December. A lengthy answer to the committee's report from the officers of the May store evaded many of the charges, denied others, and bitterly attacked not the committee itself but Will Maslow, of the staff of the Commissioner of Accounts, who assisted in preparing the report. May's is not a healthful place to work. But the blame for conditions there rests partly on the consumers, who forget that excessively cheap merchandise can be sold only at the expense of the workers.

Liberty and Tear Gas

THERE is one thing at least for which historians to come will be grateful to Mr. Roosevelt and his allies in Washington. That is the work the various Congressional committees and other government agencies are performing in laying bare the ribbed structure of American industrial power and the methods the industrialists use in maintaining that power. The researches of Mr. Pecora and others into American financial and banking organization and the delvings of Senator Nye and his committee into the activities of munitioneers and the maintenance of war profits have taught us more about economics and government than all the institutions of higher learning have been able to teach us in a generation. Now, as Paul Ward reports elsewhere in this issue, there are three inquiries going on in Washington that reveal with an even more terrifying clarity the anatomy of power in America today. Senator La Follette's committee on labor and education is conducting hearings on the denial of civil liberties and the right of collective bargaining to workers; Senator Black's committee on lobbying is revealing the political organizations through which the industrialists are seeking to retain and increase their power over workers; and the National Labor Relations Board is holding hearings on the employers' organizations by which the anti-union campaigns are financed.

The disclosures are none too savory, although they should not surprise those who have had any intimate contact with the realities of the struggle for labor organization today or who know the history of American industry. An elaborate system of labor spies, operating through some 200 espionage agencies and employing an army of private detectives running somewhere in the region of 100,000; the purchase by the industrialists of guns, tear gas, and munitions of all sorts in preparation for industrial warfare; the pouring of money into every means to break up trade-union organizations, terrify the workers, and poison even their confidence in one another—we have known all this, but it has never been so clearly documented in official sources.

At any time methods and activities of this sort would be alarming. But today, in the context of world fascism, we have even more cause to ponder their meaning. Whenever fascism has appeared it has been preceded by a concerted threefold effort. One phase has been the campaign to destroy trade unions, deny collective bargaining, outlaw and cripple the strike weapon, and prevent the extension of labor organization. A second has been the stifling of whatever civil liberties existed, especially for the workers. A third has been the formation of private armies and terrorist squadrons directed against labor organizations.

The pattern is all too startlingly like the one being disclosed in the Washington hearings. This does not mean that what we are witnessing is an American fascism, nor even that it has conscious fascist intentions. It is difficult to dig into motive, but there can be little doubt that most of the industrialists feel only that they are trying to maintain their business and profits, and fighting a force—trade unionism—that they regard as threatening both. Yet this does not make their actions any the less disquieting. In the sequence of fascism, motives are trampled under foot in the onrush of events. If the big industrialists, in the attempt to maintain their power over their workers, wish actually to destroy the fabric of American liberty they are taking the swiftest road toward that goal.

Liberty and tear gas do not jibe. The quality of American life is not sweetened by the spies that infest factories and make their way into trade unions, or by the gorillas who smash strikes. The promise of American life is not fulfilled by the creation of private armies which arrogate to themselves the function of the law and become little governments in themselves. Everything we have learned from recent history in Europe shows that as soon as private armies of any sort begin to be set up, whether of Black Shirts or Brown Shirts or just Pinkertons or Bergoffs, the capacity of the state to protect the ordinary liberties of men crumbles.

Our generation of liberals and progressives is a sadder and perhaps wiser one than any that has gone before. We have seen whole civilizations crushed by the brute strength of reaction. We have no hopes of building overnight any of the gleaming heavenly cities that men have dreamed of. We are learning that the only prospect that offers any sort of light for the future is to protect the tradition of American civil liberties against its enemies as long as possible, and to build slowly the economic and political power of labor and its allies. That is why liberties for workers are not only the concern of workers but of every group in America that wants liberty of any sort to survive. That is why the maintenance and extension of the right of collective bargaining, and its defense against everyone who threatens it—whether it is the industrial tyrants, the Liberty Leagues, or the espionage agencies—is the principal task we must confront.

The Air Disasters

THE tragic crack-up of a TWA airliner on the hogback of the Alleghenies last week, with the death of eleven, stunned the country out of all proportion to the casualties. Perhaps it was because it was the fourth spectacular accident in recent American air passenger travel due to low flying with little or no visibility. More deeply considered, it shook people's confidence in what they had come to consider a newly but definitely conquered realm—the realm of the air. Here, where all the resources of science and construction combine with the most daring skills, we had prided ourselves upon having attained a measure of security. It has been only in the last two years, with the development of new mechanical aids such as the radio directional beam, that blind flying, whether at night or in fog, has been authorized. It is in that same period that all four crashes have occurred. Assuming that somewhere our system of air-navigation aids is at fault, we are all asking where the fault lies.

Three investigations have been started—one by the air line, one by the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce, and one by the Senate Committee on Air Safety. The results of the first two have thus far canceled out, for while the air line charges that the radio beam operated by the bureau was at fault, the bureau denies it and by implication charges the company with negligence. We place our own hope for light in the hearings of the Senate committee. Created to investigate the crash in Missouri last May when Senator Cutting and three others were killed, the committee has since been made a permanent body. Even before the recent disaster it had uncovered charges of a startling nature—charges of waste and inefficiency in the Bureau of Air Commerce which Secretary Roper ought not to let go unanswered. These charges were aired again recently in a debate in the House of Representatives.

In recounting them we do not vouch for their accuracy. It is all too easy for investigating committees to be turned to political purposes, especially with a campaign approaching. But the case of J. A. Mount is, if true, so flagrant as to require a clear answer from the department. Mr. Mount, upon being appointed Superintendent of Maintenance in the Bureau of Air Commerce in July, 1934, went on a tour of inspection of the country's airways. He found that of the radio signal systems in the twenty-six leading stations that he surveyed, not one was in perfect working order. He found wasted equipment rotting in unopened packing boxes, soot-blackened lamps through which beacon lights could shine for only a few feet. He reported these conditions and others to his superiors, with an utter lack of result except for his own demotion. Later he said in testimony that "he hoped it would not take a serious accident to awaken the bureau." Five days afterward came the Cutting airplane crash.

When the Senate committee met after the Cutting disaster it brought Mr. Mount back again to testify about maintenance standards. He told how half a million dollars appropriated for safety aids had been diverted to construction purposes "at the cost of serious deterioration in radio-beam plants and beacon lights." This was in August. In September the bureau woke up long enough to dismiss Mount outright, then went back to sleep. Meanwhile the committee found that the conditions which caused the Cutting crash "are by no means confined to the area where the crash occurred, but are general throughout the airways system . . . and unless corrected will most certainly take further toll of life and property." The bureau opened one eye, sleepily regarded the committee, and relaxed into its former somnolence. Four months later came the Arkansas disaster which killed seventeen. The committee resumed its hearings. Testimony showed that authority in the bureau was divided under three commands which conflicted in responsibility, that all except the lowest brackets of the bureau personnel had been exempted from civil-service examinations, thus allowing inspectorships to be filled by untrained political appointees, and that two other officials of the bureau besides Mount had been dismissed for complaining of faulty safety-aid maintenance. Between 1927 and 1935 the bureau investigated 101 crashes, for no single one of which it accepted responsibility or even collateral responsibility.

We are aware that bureaucracy, no matter how flagrant, does not account for the whole situation. What has happened is that the entire aviation industry has grown up so rapidly that no adequate system of control has yet been devised. Passenger miles flown in the United States have increased in four years (1931-35) from about 106,000,000 to about 314,000,000. Our advance in construction and in flying skill has been immense; there does not seem to have been a similar advance in the available flying aids. The figures of most of our commercial airlines show them operating at a loss, and continually demanding subsidies. With such a situation, obviously safety will also tend to show a deficit. In view of this a stringent governmental regulation of safety is not merely desirable; it is indispensable. Anything short of 100 per cent efficiency is criminal, given the consequences that flow from it.

If the Department of Commerce is unable to handle the situation adequately, it should release the job to someone else. The proposal now being discussed in Congress to transfer the responsibility to the Interstate Commerce Commission may prove a step in the right direction.

Labor at Sea

SAFETY at sea is a fairly simple concept. It means that ships should be so constructed as to be liable to the least possible danger from fire, leaks, and sudden emergencies; that they should be held to a rigid standard by frequent inspections; and that as a final guaranty of safety they should be manned by a trained and experienced crew of both officers and men, paid in proportion to their responsibility and decently housed. But safety at sea in the hands of Secretary Roper, like freedom of the press in the hands of Hearst, has become the slogan for a red-hunt and a device for obscuring and defeating the very methods by which safety at sea might be secured.

Secretary Roper has recommended augmenting the power of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, which is a part of the Department of Commerce. In his opinion the prevention of ship disasters will depend largely upon the extent to which the bureau has jurisdiction and control over ship personnel, ship operation, and the design and construction of vessels. On its face this seems reasonable enough. But the bureau's record, allowing for all its limitations, is not reassuring. Only a few weeks ago Secretary Roper discharged two officials of the bureau for "violent and explosive insubordination" in connection with the "unauthorized" release of a resolution of the board of steamboat inspectors. This document which Mr. Roper did not care to have passed on to the public called for more rigid inspection of American passenger vessels, and recommended changes in the administration of the bureau, declaring that at present serious hazards to life are tolerated on American vessels. On April 1 Representative Bacon revealed certain facts about the conduct of the bureau which arouse further question whether, under its present control, it can be trusted with additional powers. Mr. Bacon pointed out that "they have six boats in the inspection service which are used . . . in enforcing rules for safety of life at sea." But further revelations suggest that the bureau has scarcely made the best use of what little equipment it has. Of the five boats in the service before June, 1935, according to Representative Bacon, "three of them were so old and in such bad condition that they would not stand the inspection of their own service." Of the other two, the boat named Eala has been intensively used for the past year—but not to promote safety at sea. For five months and ten days in the winter of 1934-35 the Eala was used for "political joy rides" by several persons named Roper or by various officials of the Department of Commerce, their families, secretaries, and guests.

Secretary Roper's approach to the important problem of ship personnel casts further doubt on his competence and his genuine interest in promoting safety. A primary element in the many sea disasters of the past few years has been human failure. For the same reason that the ship-owners have blocked legislation which would have forced them to instal at their own expense more efficient safety devices, they have maintained a scandalously low scale of wages for both officers and men. We have the spectacle, as has been pointed out, of a great shipping line intrusting a five-million-dollar ship and the lives of a thousand people to a chief executive officer receiving a salary of forty dollars a week; in the lower brackets, because of the blacklist, inadequate pay, and inspection practices which are to say the least inefficient, government certificates for able-bodied seamen and lifeboat men are often carried by unqualified persons.

Considering that the United States government owns the greater share in all American shipping, it would seem to be in a position to enforce decent minima of pay and working conditions in the interest of safety. But Secretary Roper has a different answer. With the help of the ship-owners but not, so far as we know, of any labor representatives, he is now sponsoring a red-hunt among the underpaid workers of the seven seas. He has so far found some 500 cases of "interruption." At first the Department of Commerce laid emphasis on cases of sabotage aboard American vessels "manned largely by foreign crews." However, in the statement of Joseph B. Weaver on April 9 the emphasis had changed. "These interruptions," Mr. Weaver said, "were primarily confined to the West Coast but recently have extended to the Gulf and the East Coast ports and to the high seas." The course of the "interruptions" follows with amazing closeness the trail of the seafarers' revolt.

The Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection should have authority and equipment adequate to the important function it is expected to perform. It should not be subject to the influence of politicians or of shipowners more intent upon keeping sea labor in line than in making boats safe for passengers. The question is whether Secretary Roper, on the basis of his record, can be intrusted with this responsibility.

Mongolia—Red or White?

BY A strange coincidence the section of the earth which has come to be recognized as possibly the earliest home of man has today become one of the chief battle grounds of the struggle between the Old World—as exemplified by a feudal-fascist coalition—and the new gospel of Soviet communism. For the daily clashes along the Manchurian-Outer Mongolian frontier are merely symptoms of a far more fundamental conflict which has been raging for years in this primitive, remote section of the globe.

Elsewhere in this issue Mr. Bisson describes the fifteen-year struggle in Outer Mongolia between the revolutionary elements, drawn from the cattle breeders and serfs, and the reactionary hierarchy of princes and lamas. For the time being, at least, the revolutionary elements are completely in the ascendancy in Outer Mongolia. But only a few hundred miles away in Inner Mongolia and Manchuria other princes and lamas are still in power. The Japanese have sought to exploit the class struggle to further their own aims. The coronation of Kang Teh as Emperor of Manchoukuo was a step in a far-reaching campaign to gain the support of the Mongol princes who had long given allegiance to the Ching dynasty. Where this campaign has not been successful, Japan has resorted to bribery and military conquest to gain control. What is more natural than that it should turn its attention to Outer Mongolia as a final step in preparation for the expected war with the Soviet Union? If the Japanese should be able to occupy Urga, it would be almost impossible to prevent them from cutting the Trans-Siberian near Lake Baikal and isolating the Soviet Far East.

But while the Japanese have been taking up positions in Inner Mongolia with a view to outflanking the Soviet troops in Siberia, they have in turn been threatened by the brilliant strategy of the Chinese Red Army, which has suddenly appeared in Shansi after a 2,000-mile trek through the heart of China. Though the Chinese Communists are not strong from a military point of view, their mobility makes them a constant menace to the Japanese lines of communication, while their propaganda threatens to provoke an uprising among the Young Mongols. Moreover, by an irony of fate, Chiang Kai-shek has seized upon the presence of the Communists in Shansi as an excuse for sending five divisions of Nanking troops into the forbidden North China zone. The possibility that the strength of anti-Japanese feeling in China may yet force Chiang to enter a united front with the Communists leaves Tokyo in a most unenviable position. Driven by internal pressure, the Japanese are almost certain to advance farther. Chiang may not fight; in which case the Communists are likely to gain in power. But if he chooses to resist, the chances are that the Soviet Union, and possibly the whole of Europe, will ultimately be involved. Thus it may happen that the future pages of human history are being written today in the same region which locks the secrets of the past.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Young Bob La Follette

Washington, April 12

RAPIDLY there is being written into official records here a concrete, dollars-and-cents answer to the question: What is unionization worth to America's working men and women? It is being formulated on the conservative basis of determining what the big employing interests of the nation think it is worth to their own pocket-books to block effective organization of their employees in both the political and the economic fields. Three lines of investigation opened up here in the last few days are building up the collective answer.

One of these is the inquiry being followed by the Black lobby-investigating committee that swung into high gear on Wednesday following Chief Justice Wheat's conclusion in the District Supreme Court that no matter how much William Randolph Hearst and his attorney, Elisha Hanson, might desire it, he could not set himself above the people's representatives in Congress and by enjoining the Black committee try to tell the Senate how to run its business. The committee, only indirectly concerned in the question raised here, proceeded with its task of showing that the du Pont-General Motors interests and kindred groups consider it worth many thousands of dollars to themselves to keep in existence groups, such as the American Liberty League, that with constitutionalism as their shield and patriotism as their buckler wage war on the Wagner Labor Act, the TVA, and any other legislation in the interest of the wage-earners. The committee showed that the men who support the Liberty League are also the owners of the Crusaders, the Farmers' Independence Council, the Sentinels of the Republic, the American Veterans' Association, the Minute Men and Women of Today, the National Civic Federation, the Women Investors of America, and the League for Industrial Rights. A cross-indexed list of contributors to all these groups, offered in evidence, showed that Irénée and Lamot du Pont had doled out more than $125,000 to the support of this anti-social congeries. Other big donors were Alfred P. Sloan, E. F. Hutton, George H. Houston, J. Howard Pew, the Heinzes, Swifts, Stuarts, and Armours, and E. T. Weir, the steel magnate, who is known in Wall Street as a Rockefeller man.

The committee has not yet shown the total receipts of all the organizations mentioned, but what it has shown runs into millions. Add to this the sum that the same sources contribute to both the Republican and the Democratic national committees, and one has a good start toward answering what the nation's economic overlords consider a fair price for balking and bilking in the political field the millions of men and women from whose labor they live. To this aggregate there can then be added some comparable figures suggested by the testimony thus far taken by another Senate committee. This committee, which is headed by Senator La Follette and opened hearings Friday, has before it the question: Should the Senate vote an investigation of civil-liberties violations in the United States, including interference with the right of workers to organize for collective bargaining? It is more than likely that the answer will be no, unless Senator La Follette shows a more aggressive and sympathetic attitude than he has manifested in the two brief hearings held to date. He left the task of questioning the witnesses to the other members of the committee. These two Democrats, Murphy of Iowa and Thomas of Utah, indicated by their questions that they considered that the proposed investigation would be a useless undertaking, and it is their word, rather than La Follette's, that will carry weight with the Senate majority and with the reactionary Audit and Control Committee that holds the Senate purse-strings. Sitting through the hearings with a preoccupied air strikingly unlike that of his famous father under similar circumstances, Young Bob showed an astonishing reluctance to guide the witnesses into lines of testimony that would overcome the sense of futility obsessing Murphy and Thomas.

Even the eloquent opening statement of J. Warren Madden, NLRB chairman, could not counterbalance their lack of familiarity with the intricacies of labor relations. Madden, a lawyer himself, was particularly effective in arraigning such solicitors as Hal H. Smith, of the Michigan Manufacturers' Association and the Liberty League's lawyers' committee, who appeared on the employers' side in the Fruehauf Trailer Company case.

Madden and his aides went on to tell the committee that American employers value unionization so highly that they are willing to spend millions each year for its prevention. They testified that their preliminary investigations indicate that from 40,000 to 135,000 detectives are kept constantly employed in union espionage and sabotage, that more than 200 espionage agencies exist in the United States, and that their business is highly lucrative. Furthermore, Madden and his aides presented to the committee three steel workers—clean-cut young fellows impressively symbolizing the new generation of American labor leaders that is arising despite the depressing efforts of the A. F. of L. hierarchy. These three—J. J. Mullen of Pittsburgh, George A. Patterson of Chicago, and J. P. Harris of Portsmouth, Ohio—gave the committee some eyewitness testimony of how the steel industry's espionage system works. Incidentally, Mullen and Patterson, backed up by Heber Blankenhorn of the NLRB, offered damaging testimony in refutation of the claim of Arthur Young, vice-president of the United States Steel Corporation in charge of labor relations, that the gigantic Morgan combine has discharged its army of labor spies. According to the three witnesses, all that has happened is that headquarters have been shifted to a subsidiary, the H. C. Frick Coke Company, and the spy-in-chief is George F. Ruck, a former G-man and pal of J. Edgar Hoover. Ruck, assistant to the president of the Frick Company, was identified by Mullen as a man who under the name of "Mr. Macklin" treated with him after he had hired out at $50 a month to spy upon fellow-workers at the Clairton works of Carnegie Illinois Steel. Mullen took the job but turned over to the NLRB for use as evidence all but his last month's spy pay. He used that to pay his and Patterson's expenses to Washington to testify before the La Follette committee. That committee also learned before the week closed something of the sums that employers are paying for guns and gas for their own private armies and the local police departments they control in furtherance of their war against their workers.

More difficult to trace are the sums spent by employers for the support of nation-wide associations which integrate their anti-union campaigns, but a beginning toward this has been made in the third line of official inquiry that has been under way here. This is an NLRB inquiry in preparation for a major court test of the Wagner act. It has marked the board's adoption of the "Brandeis technique" of crushing legalistic arguments against social legislation under a mass of sociological and economic data. Brandeis originated the method in 1908 when he won from a Supreme Court no less reactionary than the present one a favorable decision on Oregon's ten-hour law for women. His brief of approximately a thousand pages devoted only a dozen of those pages to argument of principles of law; the rest were given over to a summation of the testimony of experts from all parts of the world. Taking "judicial notice" of the experts' unanimity, the Supreme Court decided that the Oregon legislature had been "reasonable." The NLRB hopes similarly to convince the present Supreme Court that Congress in enacting the Wagner bill was "reasonable," and to that end it spent the first eight days of this month in collective hearings on a group of steel cases, the sole purpose of which was to compile a mass of expert, non-partisan testimony in support of the Wagner act's purposes and principles.

One of the last witnesses to be heard was Glen A. Bowers, New York State Director of Placement and Unemployment Insurance. Testifying under subpoena, Bowers identified himself as a Harvard Business School alumnus who from 1917 until recently had been engaged continuously as an expert on labor policy by various chambers of commerce and manufacturers' associations. Al Wirin and Tom Emerson, NLRB attorneys, drew from him testimony to show how extensively and tightly the employers of the country are organized in a deliberate anti-union campaign, and in the process Wirin and Emerson demolished the claim of corporation lawyers that the relations between employer and employee are purely local, personal, and familial. They showed that the employers themselves regard that relationship as a cause for collective and nation-wide action. Bowers traced the ramifications of this anti-union network, beginning with the National Association of Manufacturers, which, he said, was organized "primarily against the growth of trade unionism among workers." He added that "the vast majority of the employers who have ten or more employees are affiliated with one or another of these . . . constituent bodies of the National Association of Manufacturers." Among the bodies he mentioned as constituents were the Associated Industries of Massachusetts and the National Industrial Council, which heads them up; Walter Gordon Merritt's League for Industrial Rights, which "is composed of those employers who have an interest in financing the adjudication of cases having to do with employer rights"; the American Plan Association and its adherent chamber-of-commerce labor committees; such research adjuncts of the anti-union pyramid as the National Industrial Conference Board; numerous trade associations, including the Iron and Steel Institute, the Automobile Manufacturers' Association, and the enormous National Metal Trades Association, which has agents out instructing employers in anti-union tactics. Bowers also told how Industrial Relations Councilors, Inc., grew out of the efforts of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., to direct and unify the labor policies of all the vast Rockefeller enterprises. He described espionage and blacklisting except by telephone as "antediluvian." His testimony blandly carried the suggestion that an employer who resorted to them was foolish; he could so much more easily and safely establish a company union.

Madden

"Germany—a Winter's Tale"

BY LION FEUCHTWANGER

HENRICH HEINE'S satirical narrative in verse which bears this title is still being widely read today; it is read in many languages and by many people who are deeply stirred by its present timeliness. This timeliness is truly amazing. Any number of Heine's sparkling verses strike at the heart of present conditions in Germany, and half the introduction could be used in its original form as the preface to a book by any of our German émigré authors.

Nevertheless, a grim thought obsesses the reader: how very different, how tranquil things used to be! How temperate the brutality of bygone Germany when compared with that of the present! What cultured despots those rulers were, what soft bedroom slippers they wore compared with the heavy boots with which the masters of the Third Reich trample to death those who displease them! The social relations of that era still permitted its reactionary rulers to observe certain rules of the game and show some degree of fair play. What a paragon of intellect and humanity was the man Metternich, the leader of the reactionary movement during Heine's time, as compared with the man whom the generals, great landowners, and big industrialists have set up to be the Führer of Germany!

Truly the German winter of 1935-36 is very different from the winter of 1843-44, whose darkness Heine deplored in his great epic. What a delightful twilight that darkness was, compared to the night in which the Third Reich lies! The struggle between the classes has finally reached the point where the old leaders have been obliged to drop their masks and to boast cynically of their ruthlessness. There is no room in Germany today for fine words or romantic notions. Brute force is the supreme deity. War is no longer a last resort but a primary end; brutality is glorified for its own sake; life has become nothing more than a preparation for death on the battlefield.

Heine could speak with the rulers of his time. They understood his language. Today we can do nothing but turn in disgust from the masters of our country, these ill-bred little men who allow their diseased instincts to run riot in an orgy of vile atrocities. We can almost pity the old leaders of our reactionary movement, the generals, the great landowners, the big industrialists, who could see no other way of safeguarding their privileges than by bringing to power the degenerates who today represent Germany. Goethe's remark—"The masses fear nothing so much as reason. If they knew what was really frightful, they would fear stupidity"—aptly applies to these puppet masters behind the scenes. Our generals and industrialists could see no way out of their difficulties; they appealed for help, not to reason, but to the grossest stupidity and brutality, and now they themselves suffer from the barbarity they evoked.

During its third winter of National Socialism what is the condition of this Germany which formerly possessed thriving industries, an orderly, productive life, science, and art, and which always stood high whenever civilization was discussed? A people which once had the means to be well housed, well fed, and well clothed from the resources provided by its ancestors is reduced to slim rations, inadequate living quarters, and insufficient clothing. The country which formerly believed "humanity" and "reason" to be words of the noblest significance now indulges in the barbarous execution of women; defenseless persons are hideously mistreated in public, and such acts are considered great national spectacles. The nation which coined the phrase about the equality of everything that bears a human shape has been forced to deny this equality and to accept an absurd doctrine—compiled from pseudo-zoology and bureaucracy—of the inequality of men as the basis of law and life. Men who have been legally certified by physicians as mentally incapable of looking after their own interests are in charge of public affairs. Countless Germans, the majority, are obliged to lie or keep silent. Day after day the leaders of the people demand of their subjects lies and more lies, countless sacrifices to reason. And this Germany has set up for its idol a man whose powers of judgment are greatly inferior to the intelligence of the average citizen. This great German people, which has acclaimed the works of its great thinkers by the millions of copies, is forced to accept as its new bible "Mein Kampf," in which this new god declares that the bolshevik Russian Jew has destroyed thirty million people. During the official celebration of his party, which he puts on a par with the state, this new god, der Führer, announced as the strongest argument against the Marxist teachings that the real name of Karl Marx was Mardochei.

Many Germans complain that our generals, our big industrialists, our great landowners have led us back to the Middle Ages through this man Hitler. That is not true. He has led us back to the savagery of the primeval forest, to the time when men banded together in hordes which fell upon each other because each horde considered itself the best. This Third Reich of our present "Winter's Tale" is one tremendous munitions factory, a breeding farm of slaves, whose entire hope hangs on the success of the great marauding expedition toward the East, in which all the resources of the nation are invested.

No, the sharp darts of Heine's wit cannot pierce the raw, clumsy structure of the Third Reich; they are futile in the face of this gigantic attempt to lead a great people from the paths of civilization back to the primeval forest. Despite the apparent timeliness of "A Winter's Tale," present-day Germany is mirrored even more clearly by Shakespeare's sixty-sixth sonnet:

Tir'd with all these, for restful death I cry
 As to behold desert ■ beggar born,
 And needy nothing trimm'd in jollity,
 And purest faith unhappily foresworn,
 And gilded honor shamefully misplac'd,
 And maiden virtue rudely strumpeted,
 And right perfection wrongfully disgraced,
 And strength by limping sway disabled,
 And art made tongue-tied by authority,
 And folly—doctor-like—controlling skill,
 And simple truth miscall'd simplicity,
 And captive good attending captain ill;
 Tired with all these, from these would I be gone. . . .

A living author, no matter how gifted, can scarcely hope to present as accurate an account of Germany today as Heine, in his "Winter's Tale," succeeded in giving of the Germany of a hundred years ago. Some may have visions of doing so—may dream of recording the grim drama of this decaying Germany in an epic as great and as moving as Dante's "Inferno." What a task it would be adequately to depict the three-headed Cerberus which stands guard over this Germany! What a triumvirate! The megalomaniac, the little deified man who, without knowing it, is a creature of the Reichswehr, the man without mind or culture who has been made a god and whose slightest utterances are considered emanations of the highest wisdom. At his right the empty adventurer and bully—brutish, bloated, hiding his nakedness in a thousand gaudy uniforms. At his left the littérateur, stunted in body and spirit, who stands on tiptoe ranting about heroes while he throws mud at everything great in the present epoch.

The members of this triumvirate consider themselves the representatives of a "sovereign people." Yet only a decade ago this people was to the highest degree civilized.

However, I do not believe that the final literary picture of this Germany will be a melancholy one. In spite of the fearful afflictions which this last attempt of the ruling powers to seek safety through barbarism has brought upon the people, there is in this Third Reich much grotesque stupidity and symbolic laughter. Odysseus and David are heroic figures; Polyphemus and Goliath—no matter how much mischief they cause—will always remain characters in a rough-and-tumble farce. The Third Reich has done me much harm. It has killed some of my friends, imprisoned many others, and deprived me of home and property. Nevertheless, when I think of the ridiculously bureaucratic manner in which these outrages were executed, I am moved to mirth. All the stupendous lies of National Socialist propaganda and the bible of the Führer will in the last analysis arouse more laughter than indignation, despite all the misery they are creating. To laughter at last will come the colossal self-exultation of National Socialism and its Führer, the babblings about ■ Reich which will continue for ■ thousand years. I remember in a comic journal a drawing of ■ tiny dog standing beside a huge puddle; the sentence beneath the drawing read, "And to think that it was I who did all this." Something of the sort will, I believe, be the picture the Third Reich will leave for history. The reign of the National Socialists will be immortalized in literature in the style not of Heine but of Aristophanes. In the not too distant future of the National Socialist Reich which is to last for ■ thousand years there will be nothing left but laughter.

"When, Germany, I think of thee, At night, all slumber flees from me."—Heinrich Heine

Conflict in Outer Mongolia

BY T. A. BISSON

FOR centuries Outer Mongolia has seemed as remote and inaccessible as any country of comparable size on the face of the earth. Yet this vast, relatively unsettled land threatens to become the focal point of a new world war which is maturing in the East. Military clashes of increasing severity have been occurring along the Mongolian-Manchurian frontier for more than a year. The conflict of March 31 was of a particularly alarming character. Several hundred Japanese-Manchurian troops, equipped with tanks, airplanes, heavy artillery, and machine-guns, penetrated nearly thirty miles into Outer Mongolian territory south of Lake Buir Nor. They were presumably opposed by equal or superior forces, which finally drove them out after some twenty-four hours of severe fighting. A struggle of such dimensions approaches perilously close to what is generally defined as a state of war, and the attempt to "play down" its significance becomes proportionately more difficult. This latest outbreak of hostilities took place against a diplomatic background which has been markedly altered by the recent stand of the Soviet Union with respect to the Mongolian People's Republic. Until lately there has been some reason for Japanese military circles to believe that Outer Mongolia might be "peacefully" absorbed without serious opposition from the U. S. S. R. But all illusions of this character were finally dissipated by Stalin's categorical statement to Roy W. Howard on March 4, which was later confirmed by the announcement that a mutual-assistance agreement between the Soviet Union and Outer Mongolia had been in effect since the end of 1934.

To find the clue to the Soviet Union's attitude toward Outer Mongolia, it is necessary to turn back the pages of history to the year 1921. In the spring of that year Baron Ungern von Sternberg, a White Russian adventurer exercising mastery over Outer Mongolia, launched an advance against Soviet Russian forces around Lake Baikal. Based on Urga, the army of the "Mad Baron" formed part of the network of White Russian forces utilized by Japan in the final phases of the Siberian interventionist campaign. From Japanese sources in Manchuria von Sternberg's army had been equipped with munitions and other supplies. His advance against Lake Baikal coincided with a monarchist coup at Vladivostok and renewed White Russian military operations against the Far Eastern Republic in Siberia.

At this time a revolutionary movement was spreading rapidly over Outer Mongolia. Rumblings of the approaching upheaval were heard in 1919-20 during the regime of the Chinese general, Hsü Shu-tseng, an unscrupulous agent of the Japanese-dominated Anfu clique at Peking. Bled white by its feudal-lama hierarchy and further impoverished by the tribute exacted by foreign commercial firms, the people of Outer Mongolia were finally driven to revolt by the ruthless oppression of General Hsü and his successor, Baron von Sternberg. After preliminary military successes a number of the revolutionary leaders met early in March, 1921, at Kiakhta in Soviet territory and formally constituted the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party and a provisional government, with a program for the overthrow of imperialism and feudalism in Outer Mongolia. Consolidating its forces under the new government, the Mongolian movement took the offensive in the north. Joint action of the Mongolian and Soviet Russian forces repulsed von Sternberg's advance on June 5-8. A month later, on July 5, the allied Mongolian-Soviet armies captured Urga. Baron von Sternberg was seized and executed in August. By the end of the year the country was united under the Mongolian People's Government at Urga.

On November 5, 1921, the Soviet government signed an agreement with the Urga authorities which repudiated the Czarist treaties with Outer Mongolia and recognized the Mongolian People's Government. Each party to it undertook, in Article 3 of this agreement, to prevent the formation or sojourn of hostile "governments, organizations, groups, or individuals" on its territory, as well as the importation or transportation of arms by "organizations struggling directly or indirectly" against either government. Nearly three years later, by a treaty with China signed on May 31, 1924, the Soviet Union recognized Outer Mongolia as "an integral part of the Republic of China," and agreed to "effect the complete withdrawal" of all Soviet troops from Outer Mongolia. This latter pledge was fulfilled in 1925. Nevertheless, the strict application of the 1921 agreement, intended to assure the preservation of the new Outer Mongolian regime and forestall any future attempts to invade the Soviet Union through Outer Mongolia, has in effect closed that country to diplomatic or consular representatives of third powers, including China. Since the end of 1921 the development of Outer Mongolia has taken place in close association with the Soviet Union.

The first phase of this development, from 1921 to 1924, consisted of a vigorous attack on the feudal elements of the old regime, particularly on the lama monks, who possessed great power. The prerogatives of the Living Buddha were constitutionally limited, the governing rights of the feudal lords in the local districts were abrogated, and the crushing taxes on the lower classes were abolished. Toward the close of 1924 the feudal-theocratic elements, allied with new capitalist forces led by Danzan, made a desperate effort to reestablish political control. The struggle against "Danzanism" culminated in August, 1924, at the Third Congress of the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party, which crushed the movement. This victory, and the death of the Living Buddha on May 20, 1924, laid the basis for a frontal assault on the political system of Mongolian feudalism. In June, 1924, Outer Mongolia was declared a republic, with supreme power vested in a Great Huruldan (People's Assembly). The first Great Huruldan met in November, 1924, and adopted a constitution which swept away the feudal political system. Feudal lords, lamas, merchants, and usurers were deprived of political rights, which were to be held by the laboring people only. Lands, mineral wealth, forests, and waters were nationalized. Church and state were separated, and religion was declared the private concern of every citizen. Political power was to be exercised through the Great Huruldan, which elects the government, through the Small Huruldan, an executive committee of thirty members meeting at least twice a year, and at other times through the latter's presiding committee of five members and the government.

Although the feudal political system was overthrown, the economic base of feudalism and the developing capitalism was not seriously affected. Capitalist relations grew as feudal economic restrictions were removed, and reached their peak during the years 1924-27. The feudal capitalist bloc was reestablished in 1925, quickly regained political influence, and carried out policies in trade, transportation, and industry which strengthened the trend toward capitalist development. A left-wing opposition formed in 1927 sought to mobilize mass support against the right-wing party leaders, and the political struggle was transformed into a broad anti-feudal agrarian revolution. The climax was reached at the end of 1928 in the Seventh Congress of the Mongolian Party, where the right-wing leadership was routed.

The program inaugurated in 1929 was later stigmatized as "forced socialist construction." Cattle estates of the lamas were confiscated, and a drive for collectivization was begun. With inadequate technique and transport the difficulties of managing the collectives soon became insuperable. The too rapid introduction of government-controlled trading led to a similar impasse. By the end of 1931 the population began to experience a "commodity hunger," which finally led to the repudiation of the 1929-31 policy.

In July, 1932, the Mongolian Party instituted a series of measures roughly analogous to the New Economic Policy of the Soviet Union from 1921 to 1928. Most of the collectives were voluntarily dissolved. Private enterprise was partially reestablished in the spheres of distribution, mining, and transportation, and was accommodated under certain conditions with bank credits. To counteract the effect of these concessions, annual contracts stipulating wages and hours of hired labor were enforced. This general policy, steadily adhered to since 1932, has markedly stimulated the output of cattle and agricultural products. Small-scale industrial enterprises for the processing of livestock products have been established, agriculture has been mechanized in the north and northwest, and the means of transportation have been improved. The number of lamas is declining, the network of new schools is weakening their religious hold, and their economic activities are being gradually curtailed. Expansion of the cooperative distributing apparatus has reached the point at which collective organization of production is making a new sound start.

Until 1935 the Mongolian People's Republic was free to concentrate on the problems of internal reconstruction. Except for occasional rumors of an overthrow of the new revolutionary regime Outer Mongolia was largely forgotten by the outside world. On January 24, 1935, however, the first of the long succession of "border incidents" occurred near Lake Buir Nor, on the Manchurian-

Outer Mongolian frontier. A conference to settle these disputes met on June 3 at Manchouli in northwestern Manchuria. At this conference Japanese officers attached to the Kwantung army shamelessly browbeat the Mongolian delegates. Their aims were bluntly expressed in a note handed to the Mongolian delegation on July 4, which demanded the right of permanent residence for Japanese military observers in Outer Mongolia and permission to run telegraph lines into Mongolia to facilitate contact with Manchoukuo. Border raids staged by the Kwantung army, designed to test the strength of the opposition, have been thrown back by the Mongolian guard detachments without ceremony.

These attacks are directly related to the inner political strife in Japan, which in turn derives from the financial and diplomatic crisis of Japanese imperialism. The assassinations of February 26 in Tokyo have not solved any problems. In the new Cabinet Premier Hirota and the Finance Minister, Eiichi Baba, continue to bar the immediate realization of the army's program. Despite the retirement of the firebrands, Araki and Mazaki, the army is still committed to continental expansion, which means it must have more funds to speed up the pace of rearmament. On the other hand, the Premier and the Finance Minister represent the conservative views of the major section of Japan's business interests, which is anxious to delay the plunge into a "big war" until adequate diplomatic and financial preparation has been made.

The most immediate issue revolves around Hirota's efforts to come to an agreement with the Soviet Union on a joint border commission to investigate disputes on the frontiers of Manchoukuo. On March 17 the U. S. S. R. conceded a point by agreeing that the proposed commission might delimit the boundary, interpreting this to mean "verifying the border as fixed by treaties" by setting up additional border posts, stretching barbed wire, and digging ditches between the posts. Negotiations then struck a snag over Tokyo's insistence that the commission's competence be restricted to one section of the Manchurian-Siberian border, while the Soviet authorities held that it should cover the whole of the Manchurian-Siberian as well as the Manchurian-Outer Mongolian frontier. This issue closely affects the Kwantung army—the Japanese force in Manchuria which has been the moving spirit behind Japan's continental expansion since September 18, 1931. The formation of a Soviet-Japanese border commission would tend to limit the Kwantung army's ability to resort to independent military action on the Manchurian frontiers. To this extent it would blunt the edge of a weapon which the army extremists have used to telling effect in the struggle against the moderates at Tokyo. Border clashes at this time thus constitute the Kwantung army's answer to Hirota's negotiations with the U. S. S. R. The Soviet Union pointedly alluded to this fact on March 31 by warning the Japanese government that it assumed grave responsibility if it permitted the actions of "subordinate organs" to intensify the existing causes of friction.

Responsible authorities in Japan continue to assert that there is no possibility of a Soviet-Japanese war. Hirota declared on March 25 that there would be no war while he was Premier, and ranking Japanese military officers have recently made statements deprecating war with the Soviet Union. The logic of this position is sound—for the moment. It would be suicidal for Japan to plunge into war against the Soviet Union unless it had a hard-and-fast military agreement with Germany, and assurance of financial support from Great Britain. The first of these is rapidly maturing, if, indeed, it has not already been consummated. But Germany is not yet ready to act, and Britain's stand is still uncertain. Meanwhile the Kwantung army consolidates its war base in Manchuria, North China, and Inner Mongolia, and the time for the ultimate showdown approaches.

After EPIC in California

BY LILLIAN SYMES

SIX years of continuous economic demoralization have produced only one major—though not quite successful—political revolt in the United States. It took place in 1934 when that prodigal Ariel of the social revolution, Upton Sinclair, startled the nation by capturing the Democratic nomination for governor. Though Sinclair was pledged at the moment to carry out his program under the Democratic banner, it seemed inevitable, after he had been double-crossed by Roosevelt and Farley and outsmarted by the McAdoo machine, that his movement if it survived at all would be driven into independent politics.

On February 23 of this year, having just publicly announced his complete withdrawal from politics, Sinclair permitted his name to appear at the head of the EPIC slate of delegates to the coming Democratic national convention, a slate pledged to Sinclair on the first ballot and to Roosevelt thereafter. Temporarily this gesture has galvanized and solidified—on the surface at least—his weakened forces and will probably inspire the extension of the EPIC Sinclair-for-President fight into other Western states. But when the second ballot is taken in Philadelphia this summer and the EPIC slate—if elected—lines up behind a national platform sans any mention of "production for use," the End Poverty movement in California or in civilization will have come to the end of a blind alley. If, as is much more probable, the EPIC slate is defeated in the California primaries, the question of a third party and, more important, of what kind of third party will confront not only the EPIC remnants but labor and radical forces generally in the state. It is because both insurgent and leftist political experience in California in the past two years has a direct bearing upon the labor and farmer-labor-party ferment throughout the country that a brief review of that experience is particularly pertinent at this time.

Any fad which takes root in southern California may be expected to assume Gargantuan size within a few weeks, but not even the shrewdest political observers were prepared for the EPIC-Utopian sweep of 1934. Within a few months both the End Poverty League and the Utopian Society became mass movements, religious crusades. Though organizationally quite separate, they overlapped, and probably 99 per cent of the Utopians supported the EPIC candidates. Neither movement made similar headway in northern California until after the general strike of July and particularly after Sinclair's capture of the Democratic nomination. As the Sinclair-Merriam fight progressed in bitterness and the issue became one of labor and liberalism versus big business and reaction, Socialist and Communist candidates were ignored. Thousands of Socialist and many Wobbly and even Communist "old-timers" were giving their all to the Sinclair cause. The August primary triumph also brought with it the support of certain "loyal" Democratic politicians who were quite willing to hop on the Sinclair band-wagon even though they considered the driver "slightly nuts."

Such a mushroom growth could never survive intact its first defeat. In spite of a nucleus of twenty-two state Assemblymen around which to rally, in spite of nominal control of the state Democratic machinery by the floor leader, Cuthbert Olsen, the EPIC movement, no longer an immediate threat, lost much of its leverage. Municipal elections in Los Angeles in the spring of 1935 revealed a loss of strength in that district, and the movement split into several factions. Sheridan Downey, Sinclair's running mate, deserted to the rapidly growing Townsend movement; several of the more clear-headed ex-Socialists had become disgruntled by Sinclair's apparent paralysis of will and his unfortunate choice of advisers; and Sinclair himself was unquestionably tired of politics. To the bulk of the EPIC followers, however, Sinclair was—and still is—the pivot of the movement, the one leader whose honesty and integrity outweigh his defects of judgment.

At this auspicious moment the Communists began a "united front" drive which split the EPICs still further. The drive was started after Earl Browder's return from Moscow with the "new line" on social fascism but before the recent Comintern Congress. It created pandemonium at the EPIC convention, but it was obvious that any attempt of the Communists to drive a wedge between Sinclair and his followers in southern California would not get very far. The invaders were ejected.

In San Francisco, however, where the EPIC boom had practically collapsed after the 1934 election, they were more successful. Two or three EPIC leaders, previously active radicals, were flirting with the Communists. It surprised no one, therefore, when one or two of the almost defunct EPIC and Utopian clubs suddenly bloomed with fellow-travelers, and a newly formed Democratic Council appeared upon the roster of all united-front gatherings. Shortly thereafter a United Labor Party was launched in San Francisco to participate in the municipal elections.

The Communist Party is probably stronger in California than in any other section of the country outside New York. In San Francisco, more than in any other city, it can boast of a labor base through well-organized fractions in certain powerful unions. It also has a large and articulate group of sympathizers in professional, literary, and other middle-class circles. In addition to this specific support, a United Labor Party, as opposed to the Communist Party or even the Socialist Party, might have been expected to attract a substantial share of the protest vote registered by Sinclair and to gain the support of certain progressive labor elements.

The new party was launched by a united-front nucleus originally based on the criminal-syndicalism issue, but its sponsors made vigorous and unquestionably sincere efforts to widen its base. The powerful Maritime Federation with 12,000 members in San Francisco indorsed it, as did some smaller unions. This indorsement brought with it the support of Harry Bridges, whose popularity in left-wing labor circles was the party's chief asset. Two EPIC and Utopian candidates were chosen from the affiliated clubs. The Socialist Party refused to join, but in the absence of Socialist candidates probably nine-tenths of the Socialist vote went to the U. L. P. The most subversive planks in the party platform were indorsements of the Patman bonus bill and the Lundeen insurance bill. In all its campaign literature the United Labor Party claimed a membership of 50,000 through its affiliated groups. Allowing for exaggeration, it did seem that with the support of the Maritime Federation and its sisters, cousins, and aunts, plus the regular Communist-Socialist vote, plus the EPIC-Utopian vote, plus the sympathizer-protest vote, it was safe to bet on a total of 30,000.

The vote received was something over 14,000, less than that polled by the Communist Party in the general election of 1932, slightly more than the combined Communist-Socialist vote in the average municipal election. In short, the campaign had been a flop.

Here was a situation which should have resulted in some quiet analysis and serious thinking among the more precipitous supporters of the "any kind of labor party" idea. The workers are more sophisticated in these matters than are many of the leftist liberals, pacifists, and divinity students, and it is obvious that no labor party is going to win their support if they believe that it is either the Communist or the Socialist Party in false-face.

With the approach of the Presidential campaign, the EPICs were faced squarely with the issue of production-for-use versus Roosevelt. They dodged it temporarily. A conciliatory faction led by Senator Olsen was willing to let the President pick the slate of Democratic delegates and to pledge that slate to him. But on the Presidential slate when announced were only ten EPICs in the forty-eight delegates. At an indignant state convention in February the more or less united factions decided to run an EPIC ticket against the President's hand-picked slate, a ticket pledged to support Sinclair on the first ballot and to write a production-for-use plank into the national Democratic platform. Sinclair, who had gone into silence many months before, emerged, and consented in this crisis to head the ticket.

Obviously this decision settles nothing. Barring some spectacular development the defeated EPICs will meet again in a conference called for May 10, ten days after the primaries, and will there find themselves under strong Communist pressure to organize another "farmer-labor party" made up of "all pro-labor groups," including the Townsendites. A party of this all-inclusive type would obviously be neither farmer nor labor but an amorphous "people's party" torn by factions without even a common immediate objective and without sufficient labor ballast to hold it down to earth.

At its recent state convention, dominated by the militants, the Socialist Party declared itself in favor of a farmer-labor party and made friendly gestures toward the EPICs. But it also defined carefully the type of farmer-labor party with which it would cooperate as "a federation of bona fide working-class and farmer organizations in the economic and political fields," to be initiated preferably by the progressive and radical forces in the labor movement itself. The Socialist Party will probably send delegates or observers to the May 10 conference.

Whether a farmer-labor party will come out of that conference, and if so, what kind it will be, depends upon the good judgment of the EPICs who are initiating it and the kind of propaganda played upon them from the left. The inclusion of the Townsendites—the largest and best-organized pressure group in the state—would mean the swamping of EPICs, Communists, and Socialists alike. It would automatically transfer the base of the party from labor to a group of elderly lower-middle-class persons pledged to "a balanced budget" and believing that the profit system is "the mainspring of civilized progress." Such a labor party would be a joke on its promoters.

In the meantime the End Poverty League is circulating an initiative measure to put California on a production-for-use basis which would in time guarantee $200 a month for everybody—a move calculated either to capture the Townsendites or put them out of business. It is also expected to usher in the Cooperative Commonwealth.

On Being Contemporary

BY WILLIAM TROY

WHEN Ben Jonson said of his friend Shakespeare that he was not of an age but for all time, he set the pattern for a kind of literary compliment that has caused much confusion from his time to our own. For as both Shakespeare and Jonson recede into the past, it becomes evident how distinctly "Nature's child" was also the child of that tempestuous misalliance between the Middle Ages and the Renaissance which gives its peculiar character to the Elizabethan Age. Shakespeare was also, as Jonson had apostrophized him a little earlier, "Soul of the Age." Undoubtedly a more accurate tribute would have been that Shakespeare gave such a profound expression to the dominant conflict of his time as it was rehearsed in his own personality that even his contemporaries could perceive the timeless quality of his work. He was for all time because he was so profoundly and completely of his own age. Nothing of the compliment is lost through the paradoxical restatement; in fact, we admire more the sensibility that could absorb so many diverse materials, the intelligence that could operate on them, and the imagination that could finally fuse them into a succession of enduring wholes.

One is reminded of the Jonsonian eulogy by the number of eloquent reassertions that we have had in recent months of the same belief in the extra-temporal nature of literature and the literary experience. Edmund Wilson, addressing a letter to the Russians on the subject of Ernest Hemingway, deplores the so-called decadent elements in this writer's work—the bullfighting, the lion-hunting, and the rest—at the same time that he points out the coexistence of certain moral values, like courage and integrity, which are represented as timeless and therefore capable of being used over and over again. André Gide, describing how he spent one whole day of his life recently, offers what is really an apology for having turned from his social and political preoccupations to a reading of the "Odes" of Ronsard. "Nothing could be less contemporary," he confesses. "Merely very beautiful verses, answering to no other need than that of filling the heart and mind with a species of dynamic and thoroughly wholesome joy." A little further on and this emotion is qualified by the phrase "extra-temporal." And then we have had in these pages Mr. Krutch's sharp reprimand to those reviewers and critics who are in the habit of referring to one living writer after another as belonging to the past. The objection to this habit, according to Mr. Krutch, is that it is "to render trivial the whole enterprise of literature by depriving it of one of its fundamental assumptions—the assumption, that is, that human intelligence and human feeling are characterized by a continuity in virtue of which it is possible for a man to say something which will continue to seem to the point some centuries, let alone some months, after it is said."

Certainly all three of these writers are justified in stressing at this time the essential continuity of those elements of a literary work which are capable of being detached from its content. The relevance of their defense will be appreciated by anyone who has been following the current trend of literary criticism all over the world. But also the uncomfortable impression must strike some readers that these absolute values, this extra-temporal emotion, and this intelligence and feeling are spoken of in a way to suggest that they float about, like platonic essences, in a kind of purified literary arcanum. Certain qualities and effects have been isolated and then reduced to their proper abstractions by the mind. Further discussion of these abstractions would almost certainly require the critic to build up intellectual structures that would soon become quite independent of the particular and concrete work. We should be asked to pass, in other words, from the contemplation of the individual work to the more general problems of morality, aesthetics, and human psychology. Unquestionably the value of such criticism would be very great, for it would prove to us how much these problems are involved in every literary work. But its danger perhaps is to make us forget that every worth-while work is in itself the solution of a problem, of a whole host of problems, all of which are embraced in the general problem of the writer's relationship to his experience. A more practical program for the critic in any time would therefore be to determine, in so far as he is able, how those qualities of literature which are indubitably perennial and universal may be recreated in terms of the materials and ruling conceptions of his own age.

The problem is upon us today with such urgency that unless we do something to clarify it we are going to have very little writing possessing "form, values, and intelligence" to bequeath to posterity. The most volatile and prolific movement in American poetry at the moment, for example, is operating on the theory that to be contemporary is to invoke the future. In fact, the general mass of revolutionary poetry turned out in the last few years provides an excellent example of just how much criticism can affect the writing of a period. This criticism has instructed the writer in the belief that he is most surely of his time when he gives expression to its aspirations for the future. It encourages him to mortgage his experience for an abstraction, with the result that his work falls into the didactic, the forensic, and the oratorical, all legitimate forms of discourse but none of them dependent for their effect on the kind of direct representation of experience that is essential to literature. Form is absent from most revolutionary poetry because form in literature arises from the conflict between intelligence and experience within the writer himself, and the conflict of the revolutionary poet is waged exclusively with society. As for "values," the rendition of these is projected, along with the experience which alone could give them any reality, into the abstract future. And the intelligence, when it is allowed to operate at all, is turned outward to ends beyond the work. The type of utopian revolutionary writer in every age offers such an unsatisfactory example of the contemporary because he offers us, in the first place, such an unsatisfactory example of the writer.

Yet the quality of his work is ultimately no worse perhaps than that of the more ubiquitous type of writer who for one reason or another is cut off from the vital currents of the life and thought of his time. Examples enough we have in the writer who persists in troubling ghosts that have already been laid, the writer who is too slow to recognize when a literary attitude or method has been at least temporarily exhausted, the writer who attempts to fan into life sentiments and beliefs that have perished with the social patterns to which they were attached, and the writer who disguises his timidity or distaste beneath a disingenuous archaism. If there are more examples of this type of writer than of any other, it is because the combination of courage and awareness that stimulated great literary energy is rare in any time and place. From the standpoint of the reader who looks for the "perennial and universal" the absence of this energy is felt not so much in any backwardness in ideas and theories as in the total quality of the experience revealed in the writing of those who remain behind or "outside" their time.

We are left then with the notion of the writer who is neither of the past nor of the future but quite simply of his own time. But it should be evident that it is never simple for the writer to be of his own time. It is much easier to stuff experience into the handy molds of the immediate past or to make statements about the future. Either evasion makes fewer demands on the energy than the attempt to render with precision a setting of experience that never has been, and never will be again, quite the same in all its features. To be contemporary in this sense is to maintain the kind of equilibrium that Ronsard was able to maintain in the fifteenth century, Shakespeare in the sixteenth, and every complete writer in the centuries that have followed. This equilibrium in the writer is of course between his consciousness of the changes going on in the social and intellectual life around him and his sense of duty to those things which we call the perennial and the universal. His awareness of the first is important because it is the measure of his energy, and while energy is not the sole measure of his merit it is an indispensable perquisite to everything in his work. But this awareness can never be allowed to carry him to the point where he is led from his own object to objects outside his proper sphere. The object with which he is concerned must remain the unique expression of a unique complex of experience.

It may be added that perhaps one of the greatest handicaps to being truly contemporary is a too self-conscious effort of awareness. Among current American writers, for example, Archibald MacLeish has been particularly distinguished by the nervous concern that he has betrayed throughout his career over the necessity of being contemporary. This has led him into a succession of different versions, including, more recently, the revolutionary. It has even pressed him to the extent of composing a revision of Matthew Arnold's "Dover Beach," a poem which might be considered a classic illustration of the wrong way of being contemporary. Like Arnold, Mr. MacLeish merely convinces us that it is not by talking about one's time that one best expresses it. The consciousness of being of one's time becomes an idea which, like any other idea carried beyond its limits, gets very much in the way of that deep saturation of experience which alone can render the "soul of an age."

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

AND so they killed him—after all that playing cat and mouse with him which led André Maurois to write in Paris that so much agony of suspense ought to entitle him to freedom. (The foremost law club in London felt that Sacco and Vanzetti should have been released as properly punished, if guilty, after having had the death sentence over them for seven years.) Fifty-five witnesses were invited to see this deliberate murder by the state. "A few of the witnesses," the Associated Press reports, "sickened at the sight of the execution and had to be helped out of the room." Colonel Mark O. Kimberling, veteran warden of the penitentiary, who gave the signal to the electrician by raising and lowering his arm, never once looked at the prisoner, alive or dead. Why did he not, if this is such an admirable procedure, vindicating the majesty of the law, and such a superb deterrent to private murder? The witnesses were carefully searched to see if they had cameras on them. Why? If this is a justifiable and necessary procedure to keep society intact, why not broadcast photographs of the event so that every boy and girl may be deterred by seeing just what happens when a man is accused and found guilty of killing a child? It would be nice, surely, to continue the good work by placing these pictures upon all the bulletin boards of our public schools. Then the warning of this dreadful example would have its full effect.

The state refrains from this simply because it knows that it is engaged in the most revolting business imaginable; it is stooping to the very crime for which it punishes. It knows equally well that ordinary human beings never get over their horror of witnessing such a scene, and that the more they see of it the more they are outraged by it, as are Warden Lawes and Warden Kimberling, or, in Mr. Lawes's case at least, utterly opposed to it. These men, like everyone familiar with the history of penology, are well aware that killing by the state is no deterrent whatever. When men were executed in Great Britain for stealing handkerchiefs, handkerchiefs were regularly stolen in the crowds surrounding the scaffolds. Highway robbery was not stopped in England by execution; it faded out for various reasons, but not at all because robbers were terrified into goodness by the spectacle of their pals hanging in chains at Newgate.

If execution by the state were a deterrent, the United States would today be one of the most law-abiding of nations instead of the most murderous of the allegedly civilized ones. Oh, yes, I know the statistics which show that only a small percentage of our murderers are executed. But there are still enough murders by the state to make the ordinary murderer—anyone except a woman killing in a "crime of passion"—know that he runs a mighty big risk of being shot down by a G-man or going to the scaffold. In England justice is swift and certain. There are many years when every murder in London is cleared up either by the suicide or the conviction of the murderer; yet murder goes on. Why is it that every humane man deeply versed in the psychology of crime and the handling of criminals is invariably in favor, not of increasing the length of sentences and making punishments more cruel, but of imposing milder penalties? It is because he knows that even burning alive is no deterrent but rather inflames certain types of degenerate minds, inspiring them to the very crime for which burning is so often the mob's penalty. I once walked over a spot in Alabama where a colored boy had been burned to death for an alleged rape. The law-abiding colored people there certified that he had been feeble-minded for a long time, and they doubted whether he had committed the crime which he confessed.

The truth of it all is that murders will surely go on just as long as states themselves commit this crime either on battlefields or in the death chambers. Just as long as they violate the Commandment "Thou shalt not kill," individuals will follow suit. Undoubtedly in states which have abolished capital punishment for murder, like Soviet Russia, murders will take place in fits of passion or because of mental degeneracy. For this there are different remedies. But if headway is to be made in the United States it will certainly not be before the state recognizes the sanctity of human life, declares it inviolable, and refuses to go into the killing business itself.

The worst of it is the finality of an execution. Suppose it appears some day that Hauptmann was not the killer but just a dastardly, scoundrelly profiteer by the dead? The one thing that human beings cannot replace is life. Unlikely that someone else will be found to be the Lindbergh murderer? Not wholly. Read Edwin M. Borchard's book "Convicting the Innocent." It is full of cases of the miscarriage of justice, of innocent men sent to prison or to death. Only a month ago a young man in the Tombs in New York was freed from a murder charge in the nick of time by the confession of a prisoner in the next cell. They were physically enough alike to be twins. In Kentucky a few years ago a young man was sent to prison for life for killing his sweetheart. The body was found, unrecognizable, where they were last seen together, and the father of the girl identified her clothing. After the "lifer" had served seven months, the girl walked into town alive and well. Had he been sentenced to death it would have been too late. No, what is needed is not more executions but preaching in every school and in every government office that human life is sacred and inviolable—and living up to that belief.

BROUN'S PAGE

ONE of the reasons why I am fond of business men, particularly the big ones, is that they possess such a charming naivete. To them politics is a fairyland where anything can happen. This accounts for the numerous services which supply Wall Street with the "inside news" of Washington. I have not the slightest doubt that the professional letter-writers are men of acumen and sincerity and that they guess right upon occasion. But the notion that any of these agencies has some private pipe-line into the White House is utter nonsense. The specialist merely gives a hard ride to the familiar newspaper practice of beginning, "It is learned on good authority," and then proceeding to guess.

On many occasions I have stated the opinion that American newspapers often omit a great deal of news well worth printing, but even so I am extremely doubtful whether the various Inside Ikes provide any useful information which is not contained in the run of the news. Just now one popular game is discussing the next Roosevelt Cabinet. I do not know whether the Wall Street guides have conceded the President's reelection as yet, but I will herewith furnish gratis to all clients of the Broun Burrowing Service, Inc., the information that a Democratic victory is in the bag. I will further inform my fortunate subscribers that it won't even be close.

How do I know all this? On what research work and private polls are my dicta based? The answer is none at all. It's just a hunch. But for the most part that is the only foundation for most of the plain tales from Capitol Hill which the business men buy. A recent "letter" sent out the information that George Creel was to be a member of the next Cabinet. Mr. Creel was very much annoyed. It was news to him and also embarrassing, since he holds a job with Collier's as commentator on national affairs. Picking cabinets for Presidents is always pleasant, and even if you get it wrong nobody can sue you for libel.

Broun's Burrowings, Inc., looks for few changes in the official family of the President. Roper ought to go, but since he was a monstrous choice even in the beginning there does not seem much likelihood that he will be let out. Frances Perkins has been the biggest disappointment of the official family. And the rock on which she has been wrecked is one which I would never have suspected. It seems to me that Miss Perkins has tripped herself up by standing on her dignity. Surely there must be more important things for her to do than write letters about her ancestry. But Frances Perkins will probably be in the Cabinet again. Hers is a difficult post to fill while the war between the crafts and the industrialists is on. Any change might seem to favor one side or the other.

The Secretary most severely under attack happens to be the Cabinet member who has come closest to doing what he was supposed to do. I refer, of course, to Jim Farley. Reformers, as well as Republicans, have had a lot to say about "Farleyism," but there is no warrant whatsoever in naming the present spoils policy after genial Jim. It is an extremely unfortunate practice that the Postmaster General should be the political debt payer and delegate collector in each administration. The system ought to be discarded and broken. But it is the most arrant hypocrisy to picture Farley as a sinister figure unique in the history of national politics.

Homer Cummings is the mystery man of the Cabinet. I have never heard any reasonable explanation for his original temporary appointment, and so there is every reason to believe that he will go on and on. While the predicting mood is with me I will venture another guess about Presidential appointments. Republicans have made a good deal of use of the fact that many members of the Supreme Court are advanced in years, and one of the arguments for the defeat of Mr. Roosevelt is the contention that he would have a chance to alter the character of the high bench. My inside information is that there is a grave possibility that President Roosevelt will find no vacancies occurring during his second term. Again I may be challenged as to the sources of my information. I do it all by the pricking of my thumbs. It is my experience that a watched judge never boils, resigns, or dies. Friends and advocates of such jurists as Justice Sutherland, Justice McReynolds, and Justice Pierce Butler could afford these gentlemen no more effective rejuvenating tonic than the reelection of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. The will to live is a powerful factor in survival, and if Mr. Roosevelt remained in the White House long enough, I fully believe that each one of the sages I have named would touch a hundred and never miss a decision day in court.

The service which I am prepared to render Wall Street subscribers seems to me in some respects more exciting than any of those now current. Not only would my weekly letter contain a mention of things likely to happen, but I should also name a few long shots for those who like something better than even money when they wager. There is no getting away from the fact that Alf M. Landon now seems a wholly possible Republican nominee. I should not care to quote more than two to one against him. Vandenberg I hold at fives, but my long-shot special is Jim Wadsworth. If the Republican convention goes into a deadlock, a highly conservative candidate will be chosen. After a good many hours or days of balloting somebody is certain to spy Wadsworth sitting somewhere about the place. Since he has made no tangible tie-ups he will be smooth, unruffled, and of pleasing appearance. It will be possible to distinguish Mr. Wadsworth from the other delegates by the fact that he is wearing a clean collar. Somebody will say, "What's the matter with Jim?" At that late hour nobody will be able to think up an answer, and James Wadsworth will be nominated on the twenty-first ballot.

HEYWOOD BROUN

THE SECOND

World War

IS JUST AROUND THE CORNER!

Here is a vital and timely book which will clear the way through the din and confusion of the days to come. Already banned in Holland and Germany, it exposes the sinister activities of the group fomenting the new world war.

THE BROWN NETWORK

by the author of The Brown Book of the Hitler Terror

Here's the book that frightened Europe! This intimate and revealing picture of the Nazi spies and terrorists at work is startling because it not only gives the facts, but also gives names and dates and places! Completely documented and illustrated. Sixth edition in France. "A terror-striking picture of a ruthless world-wide conspiracy."—Lewis Gannett, N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE. "Should stab the American public awake to the poisonous propaganda of Nazism."—James Waterman Wise. 309 pp., indexed, $3.00.

Other Knight publications of interest to Nation readers!

THOSE FATAL GENERALS

By E. V. WESTRATE

This book rattles a skeleton in the closet of American history. It's a lively and exciting account of those dread generals whose blunders in battle have cost America the lives of its best men in every generation . . . and may do so again. 302 pages, with a full bibliography and 9 halftone illustrations. $3.00.

CHINA'S MILLIONS

By ANNA LOUISE STRONG

In this thrilling book, the author of I Change Worlds tells of her experiences in China during the Revolutionary period from 1927 to 1935. "Deservedly the classic of the Chinese Revolution as Ten Days That Shook the World is the classic of the Russian Revolution."—John Cournos. "Informative, exciting, provocative and disturbing."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. 457 pages, $2.50.

GOYA

A Portrait of the Artist as a Man

By MANFRED SCHNEIDER

A brilliant and colorful biography of the great Spanish painter who was also the world's most eccentric genius. Cavalier, bull-fighter, rakehell, courtier, humanitarian, satirist and philanderer extraordinary—he was a heroic and picaresque figure whose life story reads like the memoirs of a Cellini or a Casanova. Illustrated with 6 paintings in halftone and color and reproductions of 20 etchings. 352 pages, $2.75. To be published in May.

D. H. LAWRENCE

A Personal Record by E. T.

With an introduction by J. MIDDLETON MURRY

The "Miriam" of Lawrence's Sons and Lovers reveals the intimate story of their youth together. A vital addition to Lawrenceana. $2.50.

KNIGHT PUBLICATIONS, INC. • 118 E. 28 ST., N. Y.

PAUL de KRUIF has written his most courageous and powerful book

WHY KEEP THEM ALIVE?

by the author of
"Microbe Hunters,"
"Men Against Death," etc.

"He has never, in our opinion, written a more passionate, honest, and bitter piece on a more worthy subject. If this chronicle of needless suffering of American children does not warm the ice water which flows in the average book critic's veins, then it is a sad day for our profession."—Sterling North, Chicago Daily News. $3.00

John Maynard Keynes's

THE GENERAL THEORY OF EMPLOYMENT, INTEREST, and MONEY

This new work by the author of "A Treatise on Money" constitutes a general assault on the adequacy of orthodox economic theory, and develops a fundamentally new treatment of the theories of marginal efficiency of capital, of interest, and of money. "One of the most important economic books written since the war."—Henry R. Mussey, N. Y. Herald Tribune. 403 pages. $2.00

NORRIS HOUGHTON'S MOSCOW REHEARSALS

With an Introduction by Lee Simonson

The first book in English in ten years on methods of production in the Soviet theatre, today the most stimulating theatre in the world. "Not only the best travel book on the Soviet stage, but also the best book about the theatre that has been published this year."—John Mason Brown, N. Y. Post. Illustrated with photographs. $2.75

Paul Rosenfeld's

DISCOVERIES OF A MUSIC CRITIC

The author of Musical Portraits comments on a wide range of music from the days of the Court Masques to Chavez. "This juicy and nourishing book is recommended to those thoughtful persons who believe that musical criticism should be as serious as the criticism of poetry and painting."—Peter Monro Jack, N. Y. Sun. 402 pages. $3.50

Now in revised and enlarged editions, completely reset, in new, large, handsome format

LOUIS UNTERMAYER'S

Modern American Poetry

From Walt Whitman to Nathalia Crane.

Fifth revised edition.
654 pages. $3.50

Modern British Poetry

From Christina Rossetti to Stephen Spender.

Fourth revised edition.
549 pages. $3.50

In both volumes the prefaces are expanded, the biographical and critical notes rewritten and enlarged, and the more important poets are more fully represented.

Daniel Hoan's

CITY GOVERNMENT

Mayor Hoan of Milwaukee, for twenty years in office in what has become generally recognized as the best governed city in the country, writes a book for everyone interested in decent, democratic government, showing how it can be, and has been achieved. It deals with elections, unemployment and relief, utility regulation, financial structure, public safety, housing, education, etc. $2.50

The most popular non-fiction book in America

NEGLEY FARSON'S THE WAY OF A TRANSGRESSOR

4th large printing. 602 pages.

$3.00

HARCOURT BRACE & CO.

383 MADISON AVENUE, N. Y.

BOOKS and the ARTS

... BUT I DON'T KNOW WHAT I LIKE

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THE individual who proclaims with a triumphant air "... but I know what I like" has been the butt of critical scorn for a long time. At his worst he can surely be a very exasperating fellow, but he has been told off so frequently that in these days he very seldom raises his voice in the sacred groves where the intelligentia gather; and it has, indeed, been a very long time since I last heard anyone confess (or boast), "I don't know anything about art."

On the contrary nearly everyone seems now to know nearly everything about it. Ever since "society" became the obligatory subject of every conversation, ever since the very tinker or piano-tuner became ashamed to discuss his craft except in connection with its "social implications," it has been necessary that everyone should at least profess to know nearly all there is to know about nearly everything.

And one result of this development is that tone-deaf unfortunates can discuss the function of music even though they cannot tell one note from another, and that both economists and political scientists, to say nothing of soap-box orators, now explain "where the novel is going" or "what our theater ought to be" even though they never willingly read any work of the imagination until that recent date when they discovered that such works were necessarily part of a "social plan." And to this day many of them attend performances at experimental theaters or read "proletarian" novels only with that same air of performing a civic duty which used to be remarked on the face of a certain distinguished American philosopher who was accustomed to sit sadly through symphony concerts because he was intellectually convinced that the aesthetic emotion had a place in the good life, and who would certainly append to his next book, as he always had to the others, a short chapter in which he stated all he knew about it—namely, that he was convinced it was very important.

For all of these reasons it seems to me that the man who knows nothing about art but who knows what he likes is, at this particular moment, a less conspicuous bore than an opposite type which has never, so far as I know, been defined—namely, the type of man who knows all there is to know about it, who can explain its functions and expound its laws, but who does not know what he likes, if indeed, as seems somewhat improbable, he really likes anything.

Perhaps this last suspicion is unjust. Such a man has been known to sneak off to a movie or a musical comedy after advising his friends not to miss the latest drama of social significance. But to watch him at the process of deciding what is good art and what is bad is to perceive that his liking counts for very little in the business. Instead of beginning with the simple fact that he was or was not interested, moved, exalted, or amused, he dismisses this fact as essentially irrelevant and drags out his theories. Does the work in question perform those functions which, according to his abstract theories, it ought to perform? Does it deal with a subject that is relevant to what he is convinced everybody ought to be interested in? Is it the kind of work which, as he can prove at some length, is the only kind of work an artist could possibly create at this particular moment in the world's history? And also, of course, are its conclusions sound? Does it give the right answers; does it observe what, a priori, ought to have been observable in that particular situation; does it represent people as behaving in the manner in which it has been scientifically demonstrated people of that particular class must behave?

The natural result is that he succeeds in proving by logic absolute not only the unimportance but the dulness of a work which everybody with the least appreciation of literary values insists upon reading, and demonstrates not only the importance but the flaming interest of another which is read only by those who, like himself, read what they ought to read instead of what they like to read. And of course he is merely repeating the folly of those who, in every generation, have been sure that artistic worth was something whose degree could be demonstrated on the basis of a priori principles, whether those principles happened to be largely rhetorical as they were in the eighteenth century, sentimentally moral as they were in the Victorian era, or largely social as they are today. The only play of its time which the great Augustan Age of English letters believed to be a conclusively demonstrable masterpiece was Addison's "Cato." It was indisputably great because it conveyed a useful moral at the same time that it was written in a manner strictly in accord with what was believed to be true classical principles. Yet "Cato" was attended in its own day chiefly from a sense of duty, and for more than a hundred years has been scarcely readable for any reason at all.

The great self-confidence of those theorists who do not know what it means to undergo an artistic experience arises in a curious way out of their very deficiency. Perhaps some still remember Anatole France's aesthete who could formulate with great completeness the laws of beauty because he was blessed with an eyesight so bad that he had never actually seen any of those works of art which he described so glibly; this fortunate myopia is a symbol of what is often the dogmatic critic's chief qualification. The more insensitive he is to artistic values the easier it becomes for him to believe that his theories fit the facts, and he is never confounded by dulness which ought to be beautiful or by beauty which ought to be ugliness because he has not real sensitiveness to either and judges only by a priori rules which he makes the pretense of having himself deduced.

Some readers may also remember the awful warning contained in the story of this same philosopher, who once discovered that he was surprisingly happy while hanging pictures in a new apartment and who began a process of introspection in order to discover why that was. He found the reason but he lost the happiness. He was happy because he was driving nails into the wall instead of trying to find out the reasons for things.

I am not unaware that Anatole France is a writer who very conspicuously "belongs to the past." Few great reputations ever collapsed so suddenly or so completely—among the intelligentsia at least. His heart had hardly ceased to beat before Paris bookstalls displayed attacks of an almost unparalleled ferocity, and the inheritor of his still warm chair among the official immortals so far disregarded the tradition that he should eulogize his predecessor as to deliver a speech which might have appropriately begun with a perversion of Shakespeare: "I come, not to praise Caesar, but to bury him—once and for all." Yet I am not, for all this, entirely convinced that some lesson is not to be learned from the example of his purblind assessor of the value of works of art, that the fable about him is not relevant to the case of those persons who, though quite frankly more interested in other things, can say with such positive conviction what literature ought to be.

I shall not go so far as to urge that criticism be given back to the critics. In the first place, to do so might be to invite the suspicion that I wished to protect my own vested interest or the retort that in that case I ought to stick closer to my own last than I sometimes do. In the second place, the professional critic of literature, like M. France's professional critic of the graphic and plastic arts, is not infrequently no less hag-ridden by theories which do not work than the social reformer who merely takes aesthetic theory in his stride.

But I do suggest that we may justifiably look with some suspicion on the artistic pronouncements of those who have never before shown any great interest in or susceptibility to the arts; that the man who never concerned himself much with books or the theater until he discovered the "artistic front" is probably not very sensitive to artistic values no matter how hard he may applaud at what he is convinced is the right moment. Molière makes one of the speakers in "The Critique of the School for Wives" remark: "When I am amused at a comedy I do not ask myself whether or not the rules of Aristotle forbid me to laugh." That saying involves a thoroughly sound aesthetic principle. It may not be the end of critical wisdom, but it is certainly the beginning. Aristotle is oftener wrong than are what Molière liked to call "honest fellows."

The Flowering

By CHARLES HUDEBURG

For us the hesitant flower:
not naming or knowing it, we grew it bigger from the hour the seed, and casually, lay free parted from older flowering—a mystery, clean and good to see.

The rented rooms and cheap hotels barrooms and nickleinthelot pianos took and nurtured well us with it, two and the flower until the husbanding was whole:
we knew and named it in that hour.

And perfecter than lust the seed that came to mate us as we met and perfecter than both the one we did with seed and flower get:
for if the seed at first was lust
parted from older flowering the flower's seed was more than both and more than love the flowering.

BOOKS

Government in the U. S. S. R.

SOVIET COMMUNISM: A NEW CIVILIZATION? By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. Charles Scribner's Sons. Two Volumes. $7.50.

THESE two volumes are the result of several years of investigation, comprising personal visits to the Soviet Union as well as the examination of practically the entire voluminous literature to which the new regime has given rise in the past nineteen years. They constitute, without question, the definitive account of the political and economic system of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The work stands also as a monumental climax to half a century of study of social and economic problems by two eminent English scholars.

The account of the Webbs differs from other appraisals of the Soviet Union in that it does not simply describe the mechanics of the system—its aims, successes, and failures—but demonstrates how the system operates in terms of its own logic and its guiding preconceptions. According to the Webbs' analysis the citizen of the Soviet state functions in four interrelated capacities—as a political citizen, as a producer, as a consumer, and as a super-citizen "engaged in the vocation of leadership" in the Communist Party. Whether it be as a purely political agent, or as a producer in the trade union or the industrial or agricultural cooperative, or as a consumer in one of the 45,000 consumer cooperatives, or, finally, as one of the 3,000,000 members of the Communist Party, the Soviet citizen participates in government through a vast hierarchy of councils beginning in the village, extending up through the city, the district, the province, and the constituent republic, and ending finally in the supreme bodies of the Union. In this multiformity of social organizations is to be found "the essence of the reality of democracy in the Soviet Union."

If it is asked how one can speak of democracy in a country where civil liberty and freedom of speech are suppressed, the Webbs would reply that Soviet democracy consists in the participation in administration and legislation of the greatest possible number of individuals above eighteen years of age, irrespective of sex or race. The authors admit that there is still a considerable number of persons in the deprived category, but contend that the number is steadily declining. They maintain that there is widespread and free discussion of policy in the factories and in the village and city soviets; as an example they cite the continuous discussion of the agricultural question from 1925 to 1928. As soon as policy has been agreed upon, however, all opposition must cease. Those who would argue that the continuance of opposition is the real test of freedom are reminded by the authors that to numerous classes in Great Britain, among other countries, freedom of expression of opinions displeasing to the government, or to the majority of the citizens, is denied, either formally by regulation or unofficially by taking away their means of livelihood. While granting that in Russia the fundamental teachings of Marxism are not open to criticism, the Webbs insist that the prevailing orthodoxies of capitalistic nations are likewise not to be questioned without penalties. They attempt no justification, however, of the extreme measures often employed by the Soviet government in the liquidation of class enemies and the punishment of political criminals. They do submit that if the human suffering and persecution during the past nineteen years of Russia's combined industrial, religious, and political revolution is inestimable, so also was that caused by similar changes in the Western world in the period beginning with the Protestant Revolution and ending with the triumph of the factory system and parliamentary government.

The phase of the Webbs' analysis most seriously open to question is their treatment of Stalin as dictator. They point out that Stalin, unlike Hitler and Mussolini, "is not invested by law with any authority over his fellow-citizens, and not even over the members of the party to which he belongs." They further note that it is the party, not Stalin, whose directives guide the administration of the Soviet Union, and that decrees are issued in the name of the party only after lengthy discussion and agreement among the members. Yet there is no denying that although Stalin is in no sense a personal dictator, his powers are far greater than those of the President of the United States, with whom the Webbs compare him. They themselves admit that he cannot be removed from his position of supreme leadership of the party and therefore of the government from which the party is inseparable.

In their criticism of the Communist Party and the Third International (Comintern) the Webbs are more realistic. As the vanguard of the proletariat the party performs the highly essential function of guiding the general will and infusing it with socialist ideals. But its fanatical zeal in shaping the mental environment of the Soviet Union breeds the "disease of orthodoxy," which strait-jackets scientific and intellectual work and leads to much witch-hunting of "left" and "right" deviationists. In its attempt to direct the world revolution from Moscow, the Comintern has virtually killed the Communist movement in other countries. The people of these countries, the Webbs declare, resent Moscow's interference and will not follow its chosen leaders, whose chief interest is "rebellion not social reconstruction."

Within the Soviet Union the solid achievements of the regime have been largely due to the self-sacrifice and religious enthusiasm of its leaders. The greatest feat has been definitely to establish a "planned economy for community consumption," in the teeth of hostility from without and resistance from within. This socialist-industrial transformation of an essentially agricultural country was continually hampered by the peasants' resistance to the collectivization of agriculture on which the program largely depended. To overcome this opposition, which culminated in the "man-made" famine of 1931-32, a series of reforms was instigated following Stalin's famous manifesto, "Dizziness with Success." Forceful collectivization gave way to voluntary membership in agricultural cooperatives. Successive requisitioning was discontinued. Henceforth only one official levy was to be made. This was to be fixed in advance and in proportion to the normal harvest. In addition to this normal tax, the cooperatives contracted to pay the state a definite amount for the use of tractors, machinery, and seeds. The remaining surplus could then be sold in the open market and the proceeds divided among the members in proportion to their varying contributions in stock and labor. Although the cooperatives rather than the individual members owned the land, each member retained the right to own a certain amount of stock and to cultivate his garden. These owner-producer cooperatives (kolkhozi), paralleling in agriculture the artel in handicraft industry and fishing, represent a decided retreat from forceful transformation of peasants into wage-earners on state farms (sovkhozi) or in agricultural communes. But judging from the superior harvests, they have eased the peasants' recalcitrance and are paving the way for complete socialization even though at a much slower pace.

In the past it was contended that socialism could never be established in Russia if for no other reason than that the peasant was too individualistic. This argument having been discredited, the doubt has found a new basis in theoretical economics. Orthodox economists like von Hayek, Brutzkus, and von Mises are now declaring that the planned economy is doomed to failure. In combating this view the Webbs unfortunately overlooked the essential point in the argument. These economists do not, as the Webbs seem to think, contend simply that in the absence of profits an economy is bereft of administrative guidance. They maintain rather that the whole market mechanism with which capitalist profits and risks are connected serves properly to allocate the productive resources of the community through the medium of the relation between costs of production and market prices. From their argument it follows that in a social economy where not simply profits but this entire mechanism is destroyed there is no way of determining the most economic employment of labor and capital. A planned socialist economy is therefore without administrative guidance and must ultimately bog down in hopeless confusion. Since these critics admit that Russia has at present no unemployment or business-cycle problem but contend that these will develop as soon as the country is sufficiently industrialized, it is rather futile to attempt to refute their argument, as the Webbs do, by pointing to the success of the Five-Year Plan. Yet on the basis of a theoretical analysis of the functioning of costs and prices in the Soviet economy, Gourevich, among others, has shown that no insoluble problems of this kind need arise.

It has been pointed out before that the real problems the Soviet Union faces are political rather than economic. They are problems of human nature. The Webbs believe that the Soviets have already disproved the old theory that human nature cannot be changed. In education, health, and sex relations, in the treatment of criminals and prostitutes, and in the care of the aged the Soviets have already effected a virtual revolution. According to the Webbs, they are well on the way toward the creation of a "classless" society in which every person will be free from exploitation and free to develop his capacities on terms of equality without regard to sex or race—in short, a new social environment for the remaking of man.

The problems remaining to be solved—notably housing, administration, and raising the standard of living—are manifold and difficult. But this new industrial civilization which functions without benefit of landlord or capitalist has manifestly established new industrial incentives and social ideals. And the authors conclude that it will not only endure but spread to other lands, in modified or unmodified form, by revolution or by peaceful means.

ABRAM L. HARRIS

Marvelous Boy

YOUNG MR. DISRAELI. By Elswyth Thane. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THE young Disraeli to whom Miss Thane limits herself must be regarded in a very different light from the statesman whose career unrolls itself in the four bulky volumes of Buckle and Monypenny. Thinking of the early years alone, we must place him with those other geniuses of his century who turned their youth into good theater—Byron, who so little antedated him, and Whistler and Wilde. The aspiring Jew who at his first meeting with Melbourne announced that he intended to be Prime Minister bears a marked resemblance to the poet who awoke one morning to find himself famous and to the other poet who had nothing to declare to the customs but his genius. There was in him much the same love of show and craving for the limelight, and much the same impudent wit to command them. Only the young Disraeli was less undisciplined and, it may be, less frivolous; his dandyism and showmanship were a mask as well as a costume, and what they masked was a strong desire to win fame not by glitter but by achievement. In the boy of twenty who captivated Sir Walter and fetched Lockhart to London were the seeds of the master strategist of the Congress of Berlin.

But it is the fledgling of whom Miss Thane writes—the boy speculator whose large debts were not to be discharged for thirty years, the debonair author of "Vivian Grey," the ecstatic visitor to Constantinople and Cairo, the diner-out at impressive London dinner tables, condescended to by Peel, patronized politically by Lyndhurst, taken up by Lady Blessington, squired round by D'Orsay; and we leave him, having already been the lover of one society woman, about to become the husband of another. Already he has conquered the town, entered Parliament, and sought to engage in a duel, and carries with him that faint breath of scandal and promise of fireworks by which unknown men become lions in society.

All this Disraeli had accomplished at thirty-five, during an era of momentous changes and imposing personalities, his wits somehow managing to keep pace with his enthusiasm; and we may agree with Miss Thane and with so many others before her that it rivals the most spectacular fiction. Indeed, it is almost of a piece with the trashiest novel ever composed; no self-respecting writer would care to sign his name to such a story, and perhaps no altogether self-respecting person would care to live it. It is not high comedy, but something badly balanced between romance and caricature, and only redeemed—or rather, only made ironic—by the sincerity with which Disraeli attempted a great career from the springboard of coxcombry. In those years he did not so much have personality as a staggering ingenuity, and his clever stunts are more amusing than his clever phrases.

In offering us Disraeli against the background of his age, Miss Thane has done nothing better than a picturesque job. She has not the wit to match his wit, or the suavity to match his suavity; he is allowed to participate in some intolerable imaginary dialogues, his relations with his sister and with Mrs. Lewis are dilated upon without taste or insight, and nowhere does one get a true understanding, or even a vigorous interpretation, of the man. It may be that Miss Thane counted so heavily on Disraeli's inherent glamor and appeal that she did too little in an artistic way to enhance them.

As for the background, she has plucked carelessly out of whatever she has read, and plumped things down wherever they seemed in keeping. There are fairly irrelevant bits about Louis XVIII, fairly hackneyed bits about Victoria and her uncles; but this sort of thing no more provides a really illuminating background than Miss Thane's addiction to famous names. Had she really wanted to make clear the world in which Disraeli spent his youth—that social transition from the Regency to Victorianism, that political transition from Whigs and Tories to Liberals and Conservatives—she would have given us a more considered picture of Wellington and Canning, Peel, Melbourne, and Stanley; she would have complemented the atmosphere of Lady Blessington's with the atmosphere of Holland House, and perhaps thrown in for contrast the early career of that so different literary M. P., Macaulay. As it is, what we are told of politics smacks of a raid on the encyclopedia, and what we are told of people is chiefly tittle-tattle. These, eked out by the third-rate invented conversations, add up to a pastiche in which Disraeli plays too ornamental and Byronic a role. It is quite true, of course, that the stagi Disraeli of those years was influenced by Byron. But it is worth remembering that he somewhere chose Bolingbroke for his model and that, though no scoundrel like his forbear, he forged his career in the same courtly school. Miss Thane might have employed her hindsight to show us that the Byronism was hardly skin-deep.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Criticism by Exclamation

SHAKESPEARE. By John Middleton Murry. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

I CANNOT understand what Edwin Muir, Harold Nicolson, and Rebecca West could have been thinking about when in the blurbs they wrote for this book they called it "patient," "scholarly," and "sensible," and praised Mr. Murry for "his return to 'pure' as distinct from sentimental criticism." Blurbs are seldom worth refuting, but these three persons are known for their shrewd wits and their sharp tongues; so it becomes necessary to warn the purchaser that Mr. Murry has written one of the breathiest of all books about Shakespeare. It contains the following master strokes of patient scholarship and sensible, pure commentary:

"Gentle" three times, and thrice-gentle. . . . How lovely! The difference between us and Shakespeare is that Shakespeare can express the kind of knowledge which remains unutterable and unuttered in the hearts of us ordinary folk.

There are moments—and this is one of them—when I think that the most marvelous speech in all Shakespeare. It is wonderful. There is nothing remotely like it in all the literature of the world. How should there be? It is Shakespeare's requiem over the darling of his imagination. There is no death like Falstaff's; therefore there is no description of a death like this.

What Englishman has not thrilled to it? It is the speech of an English king [Henry V.]. No English king ever spoke like this. But no matter. . . . He is king by right divine, and by right of nature: for these two rights are one.

We have seen what she [Ophelia] has seen—all and maybe more. It is one of the crowning privileges of being born an Englishman.

"This is a most sensible and sympathetic book," writes Rebecca West, "full of imagination properly governed by reverence for its subject." I don't know about reverence. I suppose Mr. Murry has a lot of it. But of the more relevant thing, respect, he lacks even the last decent shred. Somewhere he speaks with scorn of the critic who does not know how to "avoid ascending or descending into some private universe of his own and calling it Shakespeare." Yet that is what he has done, wantonly and wallowingly. He has used the ablest artist in English letters as an excuse for airing his personal views about Poetry and Life; views, furthermore, which he does not know how to keep from sounding like gibberish, and which I say are gibberish. It is time to quote again.

In the end there is nothing to do but to surrender to Shakespeare. . . . He is like life itself, he is life itself.

Behind and beyond the unfolding of his poetic genius is an upsurge in the blood: the spiritual happening is also physical. This is creation out of richness, the spontaneous overflow of the naturalness of human nature, expanding into utterance through genius.

We can tell the difference between the thoughts which he did entertain creatively, and to which his being was responsive, and these which were merely thoughts.

Into that shape, or this, Shakespeare's creative spontaneity could pour itself without constraint: this was a congenial incarnation of his impersonal self.

The ideal is the real.

The basis and root of poetry is spontaneous utterance of the undivided being. It is not the utterance of thought, neither is it the utterance of emotion: it is the utterance of the being before these faculties are differentiated.

It was not in his natural method to compose a drama as he composed "King Lear." The creative was not creating itself.

A day will come when the world of Experience itself will be transfused and transmuted by the Imagination, so that Innocence may grow to ripeness unbroken. I believe this, but it is from Shakespeare above all others that I have learned to believe it.

We are at the end of the resources of terminology: and we must take the plunge into meaningful nonsense. Shakespeare is Life, uttering itself, through the twofold Imagination: the spontaneous speech of the undivided, reunited Man, and that spontaneity provoked through his self-identification with the figures of his Imagination, in the more familiar sense—the figures of his Dream. It is the intensity of his self-identification with the figures of the Dream which breaks down, ever and again, the resistance of the continually reformed Self to the spontaneity of the Life within him.

He [Prospero] is the quintessence of a quintessence of a quintessence.

Shakespeare can stand this sort of thing, of course, better than Keats can; a few years ago, remember, Mr. Murry was

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

A great American classic in a handsome new format at less than half its former price

Mont-St.-Michel and Chartres

HENRY ADAMS

When we open this book, says Ralph Adams Cram, "seven centuries dissolve and vanish away, and the thirteenth century lives less for us than we live in it and are a part of its gaiety, its youthful ardour, its childlike simplicity and frankness.

"'Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres' is one of the most distinguished contributions to literature America thus far has produced." Illustrated, $3.00

By the author of
"The Texas Rangers"

The Great Plains

WALTER PRESCOTT WEBB

The most critical, thoughtful, provocative book on the West that has been written in this generation."—Henry Steel Commager. "Anyone who wishes to understand either the history or the present problems and state of mind of the Great Plains region will find this book indispensable."—New York Times. Illus. $5.00 ascending into Keats. Shakespeare, in fact, has been standing it a hundred and fifty years, for Mr. Murry represents romantic criticism in its latest phase; and I hope its most decadent. The very rottenness of this writing, and the appearance here of every romantic fallacy in its feeblest and most ridiculous form, encourages me to believe that the decadence is complete. What was well done by Coleridge needs never to be done again, or at any rate so badly. Who after reading Mr. Murry's book would want to write one like it? Who, even, would want to write about Shakespeare at all? Mr. Murry seems to have been haunted by similar questions. "Is it really necessary," he cries, "that some poor pedagogue like myself must stand at the blackboard to make a diagram of divinity? If only I were convinced that silence in others meant understanding, how gladly would I hold my peace and leave Shakespeare's enchantment to work its miracle upon the minds and hearts of men!" He has our sympathy, even more than he supposes. We want to believe as badly as he does that silence in others means understanding; the only difference is that we do indeed believe it. Shakespeare survives in the minds of his readers, the vast majority of whom, praise God, are inarticulate. Not that books, most of them bad, will cease to be written about the author of "Hamlet" and "Henry IV." And not that any of them need ever be entirely valueless, since the variety of possible truths about this author is very great. I should make it clear, for instance, that Mr. Murry has said some good and useful things about such specific matters as the loyalty of the Duke of York in "Richard II," the vitality of the Bastard in "King John," the language of "Othello," the sadness of "Twelfth Night," the concept of time in "Macbeth," and the significance of Desdemona's handkerchief. But the rest should have been silence.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

MARK VAN DOREN

Poems—by MacLeish

PUBLIC SPEECH. By Archibald MacLeish. Farrar and Rinehart. $1.

OF THE twenty poems in this volume half are, after a fashion, tracts for the times. Hence the title, "Public Speech," despite which the poems suggest not so much the orator swaying crowds as a man's colloquy with himself. Although they comment on matters of public import in a vein of gnomic wisdom, one is forced to discuss them in connection with their author's mental biography. The Proteus among contemporary poets, Mr. MacLeish has often changed both his style and his mind. To find a consistent attitude in his latest work would be difficult: his convictions seem to have been in flux even while he was writing this little book. The most significant fact is perhaps that Mr. MacLeish has come to feel the necessity of having convictions at all. Some years ago he wrote that "a poem should not mean but be"; now his work must be discussed largely in terms of its "meanings."

In politics he has continued to move steadily toward the left, at the same time weighing new values against old and attempting to bring them into some kind of synthesis. Certain of the old values, "liberty and pride and hope," he finds can no longer serve as guide marks. In their place is love, not a sentimental afflatus but a love that has seen faces "bloody from the slugger's blows" and has "heard the cold child cry for hunger":

Love that hardens into hate—
Love like hatred and as bright—

Speech to a Crowd urges the living to cease awaiting messages from the dead and to take the earth and enjoy its bounty.

Along with such calls to arms are other poems praising excellence "whether of earth or art" and warning "those who say Comrade" that brotherhood comes from living and suffering together and is "not to be had for a word or a week's wishing." Elsewhere the poet exults at living in a time of change, while professing himself unable to share in its impetus. He identifies himself with the dying order, the "outward wave that spills the inward forward," and yields to the young men with a kind of joyous stoicism:

Let them go over us all I say with the thunder of What's next to be in the world. It's we will be under it!

These poems are bare and direct; as with most good aphoristic verse their merit consists in eloquence, a grave wit, and the rush of passionate sincerity. The falling rhythms which MacLeish took over from Ezra Pound's "Cantos," and which he chose in order to express the nervous exhaustion of American speech, still predominate. A tautening of them, however, is noticeable, and he writes also in stronger trochees and iambs. Now, in his forties, he has served a long apprenticeship to various masters; there are signs that a personal style is at last beginning to crystallize.

Mr. MacLeish has not received the praise that he deserves for writing some of the best love poems of our time, poems that combine a physical need, simply stated, with a hunger for the loved one's total presence. The love poems that compose the second half of this volume contain some of his finest imagery:

They stare
Each in the other's face like those who feed
Delight in mirrors . . .

What keeps this from being poetry of the first order is that the scene is not wholly particularized; objects are too often mentioned rather than recreated. The Reconciliation starts as though it might achieve a massive and luminous immediacy:

Time like the repetitions of a child's piano
Brings me the room again the shallow lamp the love
The night the silence the slow bell the echoed answer

Just as the scene is about to assume bold relief, associations from the past crowd it out. There are reasons why this should occur sooner or later in the poem; in fact, it constitutes the point of the poem, for the reconciliation of the lovers is not complete. Before dispersing the effect, however, he could well have given it firmer shape, and he would have heightened the intensity of the whole by thus sharpening the contrast.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

The Red and the White

DARKNESS AND DAWN. By Alexei Tolstoi. Translated by Edith Bone and Emile Burns. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

WE THE LIVING. By Ayn Rand. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

MARKXISTS who have thus far preserved a united front of slogans, stencils, and steam rollers, would do well to examine Alexei Tolstoi's new novel. "Darkness and Dawn" is, on the face of it, ideally suited to propagandist treatment. Its theme is Bolshevik revolt; more significantly still, it is a work written by a revolutionary for revolutionaries. In our own country as elsewhere party parables have been called in to plead many a lesser cause; yet Alexei Tolstoi, working with the material of revolution itself, has written a novel whose general detachment and freedom from cant may well serve as a pattern for American zealots.

At first thought "Darkness and Dawn" strongly suggests Dostoevski's "The Possessed." Like that novel it is concerned with the clash of individual and revolutionary values, though to exactly opposite effect. However, Tolstoi's unit of measurement is neither so spacious nor so complex as Dostoevski's. The case has been made to rest—wisely perhaps—upon the fortunes of a single family group, with each member of the group carrying forward a more or less personalized problem in orientation. Thus Book One deals with the impact of a tottering order upon the two sisters, Katia and Dasha Bulovin, and upon those who touch the periphery of their lives. Despite her later conversion Katia, the eldest of the two, suggests the type of the declining regime, moving purposelessly in a formal void and courting vague talk of a coming "revolution of the spirit, the revolution of complete liberty." Dasha, on the other hand, is seen less clearly as an emblem of transition than as an individual in her own right—her strange blend of assertiveness and indecision is accountable, certainly, in terms of either.

The novel achieves full stature with the second of the two books, which treats of the outbreak of the World War and the Bolshevik uprisings of 1918. Here the theme takes leave of the drawing-room to cut a wide swath through battlefields and city streets, and evoke an unforgettable picture of a nation spilling its blood helplessly in two causes. The individual portraits are suspended or lost sight of: Dasha and Katia appear and reappear to little purpose, though their husbands, Telegin and Roshin, take on portent in the conflict. Unfortunately, it cannot be said that Tolstoi has in the end shown himself equal to his massive undertaking. Too much is left in limbo in the closing section, or is obscured by mass violence: yet what has been achieved has been achieved powerfully.

Miss Rand, who is described as young, Russian, and a former colonist of the U. S. S. R., is out to puncture a bubble—with a bludgeon. She has written a novel to make it finally plain that the Soviet state, as far as she has been able to discover, is not only a farce on the face of it but is likewise fostering a race of "crippled, creeping, crawling, broken monstrosities." Miss Rand is determined that her readers shall have nothing less than the whole truth. Kira Argounova, her protagonist, speaks for her on at least one occasion: "For one insane second Kira wondered if she could tear through the crowd, rush up to that woman [a visiting English trade-union delegate] and yell to her, to England's workers, to the world, the truth that they were seeking." We are left to assume that "We the Living" is the answer.

We first meet Kira as a girl of eighteen with the "fearfully expectant look of a warrior who is entering a strange city"; she enrolls in the Technological Institute soon after arriving, which presumably would make her an intellectual. From the very outset her attitude toward the experiment in which she shares is one of contempt and ridicule; she "loathes their ideals but admires their methods"—which would conceivably make her a mystic. Not many chapters on, she offers herself to one Leo Kovalensky, a total stranger, a few moments after first laying eyes on him, because she "liked his face"; which, one is left to ponder, might in some way account for her "individualism." The remainder of the novel shuttles about aimlessly from bedroom to rostrum, with Kira playing the role of a patient Griselda to Leo's Don Juan. Much love-making occurs in the interim, and considerable speech-making, and one is bound to confess that the former is managed to vastly greater effect. Leo in due course of time is revealed in his true colors as a counter-revolutionary, a cad,

"Since Henry James there has been no American novel so rich in thought and analysis."

Henry Hazlitt in The Nation

THE LAST PURITAN

A Memoir in the Form of a Novel

by George Santayana

Sixth Printing

138th Thousand. $2.75

A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection

Soviet Communism

A New Civilization?

by Beatrice and Sidney Webb

"No one is entitled to speak of Russia who has not read this book. It marks a definite epoch in the understanding of the greatest historical event since the French Revolution."

Harold J. Laski in

The Saturday Review of Literature

Two Volumes, Boxed, $7.50

Reactionary Essays on Poetry and Ideas

by Allen Tate

Among the poets considered are Emily Dickinson, Hart Crane, Ezra Pound and Archibald MacLeish. "The volume represents Mr. Tate at his best and represents contemporary criticism at its best."

Mark Van Doren in

The New York Herald Tribune. $2.50

Obiter Scripta

by George Santayana

edited by Justus Buchler and Benjamin Schwartz

Lectures, essays, and reviews not previously available in book form. "As good a conspectus of Santayana's thinking as is available in any volume."

Irwin Edman in

The New York Herald Tribune. $2.50

Four Plays by Lope De Vega

An English Version, with an introduction

by John Garrett Underhill

"An event which calls for the beating of drums and the blowing of trumpets, for its historical importance, for the skill and vigor of the translations and for the very modern temper of the genius thus tardily revealed."

The New York Times. $2.75

at all bookstores

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES FOR EARLY
PUBLICATION . . .

Maury Maverick on the South

When Congressman Maverick asks, "What is wrong with the South?" he does so as a Texan who knows and loves the South of today, not as a romancer who pines for "the sweet imaginary odor of the magnolia blossoms." Have Northerners caused the plight of the South? Absurd, asserts Mr. Maverick. Contrary to popular opinion he accuses factions which at this moment exploit the North and West as well as the South!

M. E. Ravage on the French Elections

The fate of France and to an extent that of the whole of Europe depend on the French elections this month. M. E. Ravage, The Nation's correspondent in France, discusses the frantic last-minute efforts of the fascists to utilize the Rhine-land crisis to prevent the expected left sweep, and appraises the balance of forces as they appear in the final days of the campaign.

Louis M. Lyons on Governor Curley of Massachusetts

The phenomenal rise of Jim Curley continues to astonish observers who have become accustomed to fantasies in American politics. His mastery of the Massachusetts Irish, his strange tactics, his amazing ambitions—all are discussed by Louis M. Lyons, a Boston newspaperman who has covered the unsavory story from its beginning. We present Governor Curley at this time because of his importance in the Presidential campaign, in which Massachusetts is regarded as a crucial state.

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ 1 year for $5 ☐ 2 years for $8 ☐ 3 years for $11. ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in thirty days.

Name _____

Address _____

4-22-36

and a gigolo; Kira dies in a snowdrift while attempting to cross the border; and, presumably, the myth of a communist state explodes to the sound of low, mocking laughter.

It is not the intention of this reviewer to quarrel with Miss Rand's politics except to point out in passing that her excessive theatricality invites suspicion. It may be, as we are asked to believe, that petty officials in Soviet Russia ride to the opera in foreign limousines while the worker goes wheatless and meatless; similarly it may be true that consumptives are denied asylum solely for the reason that they are not affiliated party members. Yet it must be said that if Miss Rand has indeed presented us with the facts, she has given us no reason to respect Kira as her spokesman.

BEN BELITT

Mr. Santayana's Wisdom

OBITER SCRIPTA. LECTURES, ESSAYS, AND REVIEWS. By George Santayana. Edited by Justus Buchler and Benjamin Schwartz. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THE editors of this volume deserve thanks for making easily available to the student of Mr. Santayana a number of his papers not easy to obtain. At least four of these papers—Philosophical Heresy, Literal and Symbolic Knowledge, The Unknowable, and Some Meanings of the Word "Is"—are an admirable introduction to Mr. Santayana's philosophy; and the paper on Ultimate Religion, read at the Spinoza tercentenary at The Hague, is a welcome postscript to the third volume of "The Life of Reason."

By far the best and the most important papers in this collection are the essentially technical ones, and this makes one wonder at the attitude which has sought to deny Mr. Santayana a place in the world of academic philosophy while granting him a "wisdom" for which he has become almost legendary. It is true that of late a willingness to admit that he has "paid his debt to the professors" has been expressed. And yet the truth would seem to be that his contribution to technical thought has been considerable and that it is his wisdom which needs to be questioned. For in what does this wisdom consist, and from what sources does it spring?

It springs, I will be told, from detachment, and consists in a "sweet reasonableness" which has generously sought to understand the inward bent of things and the perfection of which each is capable after its kind, in order to celebrate as the supreme value a measured life, free from sweat, malice, and unseemly excess. And isn't this what we all in our hearts want? The answer is familiar but not convincing. For even the most sympathetic reader can never quite free himself from the sense of the fundamental irrelevance, the underlying frivolity, of Mr. Santayana's work, even that done before the war.

The irrelevance will appear if we consider in what consists that "pure philosophy" of which he speaks in the author's preface to this book, and to which he has been wedded, he says, by nature. Pure philosophy is achieved when one attains to a "radical clearness" and to "an ultimate courage." These virtues will enable us to keep our gaze steadfastly on a realm of perfection and eschew the market-place and the fetid air of the crooked alleys which lead to it. This realm of perfection—of which he gets a better glimpse, it seems, from Mussolini's Rome than from Harvard or from Oxford—is a realm in which the "actuality of spirit" burns without combustion, and loves essences without animal urge; solves, in short, the difficulties of experience by ignoring the conditions of existence, while asserting with sweet reasonableness that ideals must have natural bases.

Thus envisaged, Mr. Santayana's wisdom turns out to consist of affirmations which one soon discovers to be denials, of a pretended detachment which turns out to be indifference, and of a scorn of "partisan heat" and an avoidance of "resolution," not because they are blind, as it claims, but because the need for them is never felt, and they are not therefore the expression of a disciplined effort—as in Spinoza, for instance—but the drift of a mind without passion or without animal urge. Is it any wonder, then, that we have always vaguely felt that under Mr. Santayana's richly embroidered wisdom lurked the frivolity of a mind engaged by "the hypnotic charm of identity or [by] the dialectic pattern of essences," which, in a phrase in one of these papers, "soon wearies a restive animal and seems to him idiotic"?

But when we have said this we have not said all. For this philosopher-poet still taunts us with his cadences and his ironic smile, and in spite of our dissatisfaction we turn to his fabled realm of essence and to his dream of a life of reason for the coolness and the serenity which those who stand close to their fellows often need, and find, in our day, more readily and satisfactorily in his pages than anywhere else.

ELISEO VIVAS

Little Sister Francis

THRESCORE. THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF SARAH N. CLEGHORN. With an Introduction by Robert Frost. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $3.

MR. FROST, in his sharp, wise, and witty introduction to Miss Cleghorn's book, calls her by her right name—a saint. He points out also that saintliness is only a glorified way of minding other people's business. When she was a girl, Sarah Cleghorn could go up to a man on the street and ask him not to spit on the sidewalk. When she was a woman, marching in the great Socialist peace parade that filled Fifth Avenue a couple of days after Armistice Day, she saw the attempts of "a little body of men in uniform" to break the lines of marchers. Let her tell it: "I saw two more khaki uniforms coming toward us, and ran over to them and seized one of them by the sleeve, without premeditation, saying in ladylike tones, 'Please don't!'"

Anyone to whom this episode sounds ridiculous does not like saints. Such a person would have been amused—or disgusted—by St. Francis when he gave his cloak and his coat to the beggar. But there are others who are eternally moved by the force of pacific non-resistance; who are touched when they hear "Please don't," in ladylike tones; who respond when someone courteously says to them, "I am your brother." These persons will be touched by Sarah Cleghorn.

She spent the greater part of her girlhood and early womanhood in Manchester, Vermont. Her life was orderly, quiet, pleasant, and secure. She and her brother Carl lived with two elderly aunts. Young Sarah was not very different from her companions except that occasionally she "burned." Vivisection fired her first. She loved animals; she could not bear to know they were being hurt. Such simplifications were always possible to her. She was steadily writing poetry which the Atlantic Monthly almost as steadily published. Although she knew nothing of the labor movement or the Socialist struggle, she began, several years before the war, to "burn" in those directions. She had long since become the champion of the Negro. It was only a step to what are probably her most famous four lines, published by F. P. A. in the New York Tribune in 1914:

New OXFORD Books

ENGLAND: 1870-1914

By R. C. K. ENSOR

A unified and completely modern history of England during the critical period that culminated in the Great War. Beginning with Gladstone, the administration of Disraeli and the ascendancy of Parnell, it continues down to the momentous summer of 1914. Economics, social and intellectual aspects of the time are fully treated. The work will be Vol. 14 in the great Oxford History of England, which is to be published in as many volumes. "A work of quite outstanding merit. It deserves the widest possible audience for the high qualities it reveals on every page."—Harold Laski in the New Statesman.....$6.00

ANARCHY OR WORLD ORDER

This, the tenth series of Problems of Peace, is the collection of lectures delivered at the Geneva Institute of International Relations, 1935. Occupying prominent positions are Is American Neutrality Possible? by John B. Whittin, Assoc. Prof. of International Law at Princeton, and World Organization Through Democracy by Clarence K. Streit, Geneva Correspondent of the New York Times. 300 pages....$3.00

NEW VOLUMES IN THE

World's Classics

THE WAY OF ALL FLESH

By Samuel Butler

With a Prefatory Essay

By BERNARD SHAW

JACOB FAITHFUL

By Captain Marryat

One of this author's most unusual novels, distinguished for its amusing theme and old-fashioned romance.

HE-WHO-CAME?

By Constance Holme

The eighth novel by this important writer to be included in this series.

Nearly 450 of the World's Great Books in a size to fit your pocket and a price to fit your purse.

80 CENTS EACH

ANNALS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

The Principal Publications of Each Year Together with an Alphabetical Index of Authors

Compiled by J. C. Ghosh and Miss E. G. Withycombe. A unique and indispensable volume for all students of literature. It shows at a glance the main literary output of any year or series of years for the past four and a half centuries; what books people were likely to be reading at any one time, and with what rivals a candidate for literary fame had to reckon. "A reference volume that increasingly stirs the reader as he turns its pages. Invaluable."—New York Times. 340 pages.....$3.00

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

114 Fifth Avenue, New York

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD*in N. Y. Herald Tribune "Books":*

"He has set forth a devastating record . . . a most valuable book. It will be a textbook in every decent school of journalism, and no future biographer or historian of our times will dare write without building on it. Nowhere else can as many documented facts be found and nowhere else as true a measure of this man."

*The UNauthorized biography!Imperial HearstA Social BiographyBy FERDINAND LUNDBERGWith an Introduction byCHARLES A. BEARD

The first exhaustive analysis of every phase of Hearst's political, financial and journalistic career.

406 pages; 160,000 words; $2.75

THE EQUINOX CO-OPERATIVE PRESS

444 Madison Avenue, New York City

RULERS of AMERICAby Anna RochesterThe Facts on Finance
Capital*

The first comprehensive study of the financial monarchs of the United States and the extent of their control. A Book Union Selection.

$3.50 at bookstores. Send for complete catalog.

International Publishers, 381 4th Ave., N. Y. C.

MEETINGTHE FUTURE of the PROFESSIONS in AMERICA*Saturday, April 25th—Hotel Astor—12:30 p.m.ARTHUR E. MORGAN
PAUL BLANSHARDMARY VAN KLEECK
ROBERT D. KOHN

The Second Institute on Human Relations.
New York Society for Ethical Culture.

Luncheon Tickets—$1.25; Round Tables—50c (Students—25c).

Send reservations to 2 West 64th Street

The golf links lie so near the mill
That almost every day
The laboring children can look out
And see the men at play.

She was a thoroughgoing pacifist during the war and has remained so ever since. Of the "necessity" of war she speaks eloquently:

I saw its "necessity" exactly like the "necessity," 300 years ago, to burn Protestants and rack Catholics in order to defend their respective religions. I saw it just as I saw the "necessity" to fight duels, the "necessity" to kidnap slaves, the "necessity" to hunt out witches, the "necessity" to flog children.

Sarah Cleghorn, in short, has never known the meaning of the word compromise. Her principles are firm and unassailable. She thinks she could not endure physical suffering for them, but I have a notion she is wrong. Saints can also be martyrs.

At a time when the virtues which Miss Cleghorn so persuasively manifests are being for the moment passed over, her book is very warm and refreshing. Young revolutionists to whom the world is a flame, a peak to be scaled, a long march in which the strong will reach the goal and the weak will fall, unmourned, by the way, do not often remember poverty, charity, a pure heart, and a cheerful countenance. But they should be warned. For these things have power. The people who weep over "Little Women" and "King Lear" are in a sense crying over the same thing—the struggle between good and evil. It is a great theme, for a book or for a life.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Mr. Browder Studies History

WHAT IS COMMUNISM? By Earl Browder. The Vanguard Press. $2.

HIS present book, says the secretary of the Communist Party, is "the authoritative answer . . . to the question 'What is communism?'" One has every reason to expect that the spokesman for the American Communists will talk up boldly on ideological and tactical problems. Mr. Browder does not do so. Indeed, so confused and obscure is he on almost every fundamental question that the reader quits these pages wondering whether he is not witnessing the disintegration of one of the two radical political parties of the country.

Mr. Browder, in search of a broad political platform, has somehow lost his political principles; and having been prevailed upon to relinquish his earlier ultra-leftist tendencies, has also somewhere in the process left behind his Marxism. Increasingly isolated as a result of its former dual-unionist and social-fascist lines, the Communist Party has been compelled to start out on a hunt for new, notably middle-class, allies. For inspiration it has gone back to the pages of American history.

Mr. Browder, this book shows, has been reading American history. That he has read it hastily is perhaps unimportant; nevertheless, it is a little difficult to accept even upon his authority such statements as the following: the task of 1776 was to "free a rising capitalism from the fetters of a dying feudal system"; and "the men who wrote the Declaration of Independence had been nurtured upon the French Encyclopedists and the British classical political economists." These errors could easily be forgiven him if the secretary of the Communist Party did not, at the conclusion of his adventure, bring out with him a knapsack full of new heroes. That they are the heroes of yesterday's petty bourgeoisie and not of the working classes Mr. Browder does not seem to have realized.

The study of the past for the Marxist has an important theoretical and political significance. In the broader sense, the history of mankind's struggles indicates that progress has been achieved dialectically: we have gone ahead, compelled at crucial moments to utilize the instrument of revolution, because we have succeeded in transforming decaying social organisms into new ones healthy and fresh with young life. In our own past the War of Independence and the Civil War were such turning-points; and in each instance a suppressed class seized power, gave the economic life a changed direction, and molded the political and legal institutions to fit its own purposes. This is our revolutionary tradition.

But the triumphant leaders of the revolutionary crises of the past are not the heroes of those who will be in the van of tomorrow's struggles. In the first American revolution the upper and lower middle classes were compelled to smash the chains that bound them to English mercantilism; in the second, the stranglehold of the slave system had to be broken before capitalism was completely free to perform its historical mission. In both these movements the working classes as such participated obscurely. True, the workers of today and tomorrow must learn from example. But their heroes and their slogans are their own and not those of another class; their inspiration springs from the lives and deeds of the Sylvises, Debses, and Haywoods who fought against capitalist oppression even before their challenge for power had any hope for success.

Mr. Browder, it would seem, wants to forget this. For in an effort to win new friends to the cause of communism to take the place of those he seems irretrievably to have lost he appeals for guidance to the petty-bourgeois leaders of a past in American history that is completely closed. Mr. Browder quotes with approval Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, Walt Whitman, and Milo Reno! Even his vocabulary has become lower middle class. Thus: the new fascists are "carrying on a campaign against everything that is liberal or progressive in the country"; and "it is high time the progressive forces of the United States . . ."; and "the nine gray-bearded vestal virgins who guard the altar of private property slammed the door of constitutional law against social legislation and government intervention in economic questions." (Italics mine.)

The hand of friendship is held out beseechingly to the Townsendites, the Longites, and the Epic Planners; these are to be welcomed into the ranks, as Father Divine, Milo Reno, and Governor Olson already have been made welcome. Party work for the purpose of radicalizing the workers and the submerged lower middle classes apparently is to be abandoned: the Trade Union Unity League is gone, but the Trade Union Educational League is not to be revived; the Agricultural and Cannery Workers' Industrial Union may die; the United Farmers' League is to be liquidated. Communists are to forget about the workers, the agricultural laborers, the bankrupt small farmers, and that communism has been a revolutionary faith, that power can be won only through the workers, that the middle classes are their enemies, that the road to socialist victory is through the dictatorship of the proletariat, and that imperialist war must be converted into civil war.

There is a dimly conceived plan behind all this bewilderment, obviously. The immediate enemies are fascism and war, and therefore all of us are first to rally to the defense of democratic institutions; the class struggle can wait. Mr. Browder, however, never defines fascism in any exact sense. Last year the New Deal was fascist; a half-year ago the Longs and the Coughlins were the fascists; today the fascists are the Repub-

MAURICE WERTHEIM says:

"My trip to the Soviet Union was under Louis Fischer's guidance, without which I am sure it would not have been half as delightful or informative."

THE OUTSTANDING RUSSIAN TOUR OF 1936

Third Soviet Union Travel Seminar

under leadership of

LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow correspondent of The Nation who has spent 13 years in Soviet Russia.

For a few serious students . . . 5 weeks of travel and observation in the Soviet Union, illuminated by informal meetings with leaders and rank and file workers. An unusually comprehensive survey of activities in city and country. High standards of comfort. Sailing July 7.

ROUND TRIP WITH TOURIST PASSAGE:

$850

Other group tours (at least a month in the U.S.S.R. with roundtrip passage from $372). Or you may travel on your own.

Booklet on request

THE OPEN ROAD

12th floor

8 West 40th Street, New York

Cooperating with Intourist

A stimulating book for those who like to "think things through"

THREE GODS GIVE AN EVENING TO POLITICS

by Richard Rothschild

author of Reality and Illusion and Paradox: The Destiny of Modern Thought

RANDOM HOUSE
20 E. 57th St., New York.

WHATEVER your political faith may be, you will enjoy sitting in on this imagined, after-dinner conversation between three of the most influential men the world has known.

SOCRATES, LENIN, and JEFFERSON are the three gods. They talk about the state of affairs in the United States today and about their probable lines of future development. Each approaches the problem in his own way, but always with an objective, far-seeing eye.

The result is a book which makes most discussions seem futile and short-sighted. It presents conclusions that are entirely overlooked by average economic or political commentators; it clarifies the political muddle of our day by observing it from a fresh and unprejudiced viewpoint . . . It will really help you to "think things through." Just published. $1.50 at all bookstores.

lican Party and the American Liberty League. And we are to prepare ourselves for immediate mortal combat by creating a farmer-labor party which flies Populist banners and is captained by the owning commercial farmers of the Middle West and Northwest!

But if this is the worst kind of confusion, what are we to think of Mr. Browder on the war question? Communists are to take leadership in fighting the imminent peril of war in this way:

We must explain that the only way to fight seriously against war is by the independent action of the toilers against the war-makers, using this action at the same time for pressure on the League of Nations and Roosevelt government, in favor of measures for peace and for cooperation with the Soviet Union.

What can this mean? Mr. Browder is opposed to isolation and regards the League of Nations with suspicion; he is contemptuous of the neutrality legislation of the Roosevelt Administration. He will have nothing to do with governments and super-governments. How, then, are we going to achieve a militant peace program that will not be pacifist on the one hand and that, if war does break out, will still make realizable the conversion of the imperialist war into civil war? We are to cooperate with the Soviet Union. But does Mr. Browder mean a formal defensive and offensive pact? And if we enter into war on the side of the U. S. S. R. what shall be done about the American civil war that will free the workers from their class chains? Mr. Browder does not say, as he does not about so many other vexing questions. It is difficult to see how the secretary of the Communist Party has been helped by his recent study of American history.

LOUIS M. HACKER

Shorter Notices

THE YANKEE BODLEYS. By Naomi Lane Babson. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

Novelists have often enough been told by helpful critics that the great novels are of large scope, include many characters, and cover a considerable period of time. It does not follow, of course, that a novelist who is faithful to this description necessarily writes a great novel. Miss Babson, who has covered three generations in time and has occupied herself with the doings of a family of seven with their sons and grandsons, has written merely a pleasant and sensible one. The seven Bodley children and their parents live in Massachusetts; they experience the usual emotions of mankind—love, hate, jealousy, grief, joy, and despair. They grow up, marry, and some of them have children; the husband of one sister dies and leaves her desolate; the husband of another dies and leaves her happily free. Certain of the earlier situations are moving and tender; toward the end the second and third generations get to seem like strangers. The great pattern is not here, although this is more than an amiable first novel.

UNCOMMON PEOPLE. By Helen Hull. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

The "uncommon people" depicted in this volume of short stories are not at all uncommon except in the special sense in which Miss Hull has used the term. D. H. Lawrence once, when accused of picturing abnormal types in his novels, people who were not "true to life," replied that it was astounding when you stopped to think about it how many queer and extraordinary human beings there were in England. One would not draw that conclusion concerning the people of America from reading this volume. In fact, the characters in it are the very unretouched tintypes of our recognizable neighbors and ourselves, from the small-town family to the city commuter. What Miss Hull has done is to penetrate beneath the surface of commonplace lives to discover the drama which is often hidden there. Nevertheless, one cannot but feel at times that the talents of the writer are cramped by the requirements of the magazine story. Her ability to enter into a point of view and an experience not her own appears to admirable advantage in Waiting and in Mainstay, but in neither of these stories is the ending quite convincing.

THE MANCHU ABDICATION AND THE POWERS, 1908-1912. By John Gilbert Reid. University of California Press. $5.

This thoroughly documented study of the international rivalries in China which preceded the Manchu abdication in 1912 is significant for its detailed revelation of pre-war diplomatic alignments in the Far East. Then as now China was the pawn in the game, but the ultimate stakes were much larger, more ramified and far-reaching. The last Manchu emperor, reigning from 1908 to 1912 as Hsüan-T'ung but better known today as P'u-Yi, was historically doomed to be a puppet pulled by foreign strings. At that time he was an international puppet; today he is a Japanese puppet, used to serve Japan's continental ambitions. His present role of titular Emperor of Manchoukuo and the diplomatic possibilities for future Japanese expansion in China connected with it acquire new meaning in the light of this historical analysis of his "boy-emperor" days.

VIGILS. By Siegfried Sassoon. The Viking Press. $1.50.

If at fifty Mr. Sassoon regards his first childhood with a kind of nostalgia, the poems he has assembled in "Vigils" have for the most part an economy of phrase sufficient to redeem them from the worst pitfalls of the subject matter. But individually they have no unity and no variations of rhythm, so that it is impossible from internal evidence to distinguish where one ends and another begins. "Allow me now much musing-space to shape my secrecies alone," the poet says, and his musings take the shape of mildly sorrowful memories plus an occasional cosmic gem in language strongly reminiscent of the rugged philosophizing in Thomas Hardy's poetry: "Degrees of groping thought have taught me to conclude . . ."; "having grown world-wise through harshly unlearned illusion." The best poems are those with least "message," like The Gains of Good and An Emblem. The rest read like poems about poems; the reader feels that Mr. Sassoon has described his emotions rather than given them expression in words. Of simple feeling newly expressed or of subtle feeling simply expressed there is none. Poetry so plainly devoid of felt rhythms must be considered platitudinous, and it is fortunate that Mr. Sassoon deals in platitudes that bear repetition.

THE LOST GENERATION. By Maxine Davis. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The tragic plight of the depression generation and the necessity of a comprehensive youth-assistance program are made abundantly evident by this study based upon four months of travel and investigation. Unfortunately, however, Miss Davis seems to have made no great effort to gauge the magnitude of youth's problems, to get the facts, to get them accurately, or to view the scene with scientific objectivity. For some inexplicable reason—possibly her connection with the Republican Washington ington Post is explanation enough—she minimizes matters, stating, for example, that there are only three million jobless young people; this though she is aware that Aubrey Williams, executive director of the National Youth Administration, has authoritatively put the figure at between five and eight million. Some three million young people between sixteen and twenty-five years of age have been on relief according to widely publicized FERA figures, but this fact Miss Davis disregards. She emphatically insists that the present generation is basically true-blue American old style, and goes so far from the facts as to aver that "even at Columbia University . . . we find no influential radical group." The innumerable instances of contrary evidence, including the revolt of youth on the campus, in the church, and in the factory, are blandly ignored. To Miss Davis one of the happy signs on the American campus is the fact that the sons of the rich no longer publicly display their Rolls Royces and Pierce Arrows. The CCC camps are not in the least bit militaristic, let Assistant Secretary of War Woodring indiscreetly say what he will to the contrary. The NYA isn't any good because, among other complaints, "youth doesn't want to serve youth in this country." Inaccuracies are not infrequent; George Soule, for example, is referred to as George Soule, Jr., and as George H. Soule. Yet for all its faults the book will serve a splendid purpose if it helps to focus public attention on the young casualties of America Incorporated.

RECORDS

ON ALL sides organizations are springing up to give recitals of phonograph music. The American Gramophonic Society, 50 West Sixty-seventh Street, New York, will complete a three months' cycle of thirty-six concerts when they give the Bach B minor Mass complete on April 25. Their programs have been divided into three series, twelve concerts each, devoted to orchestral works, chamber music, and Bach. The concerts provide music, especially chamber music, under the most favorable conditions, the studio seating not more than thirty. Prices are kept at thirty-five cents a concert, with reductions for subscriptions. Apparently the series has been a success, for another is planned for the fall. I. Katell, of 44 Bennett Avenue, New York, who is engaged in a similar enterprise, gives concerts once a week and is planning a more ambitious program for the Mohegan Colony this summer and again for New York in the fall; and a group headed by Philip Glaberman, 1450 Broadway, is projecting concerts of gramophone music for towns that have no concert series of their own.

Meanwhile the Richard Wagner Society, 54 West 104th Street, is also featuring recorded programs. The latest addition is, of course, the much-heralded Act I of "Die Walküre," recorded by Victor with Lotte Lehmann, Lauritz Melchior, Emanuel List, and the Vienna Philharmonic under Bruno Walter (eight records, $16). It is the finest of the more ambitious grand-opera undertakings, and the set leaves little to be desired. Exception might be taken to some slight echoes that sound as if the recording had been done in an empty auditorium of some size; to certain cuts, probably inevitable if the set was to be kept at a reasonable price; to Mme. Lehmann's failure to rise to the intense dramatic heights achieved by Göta Ljungberg in an earlier but on the whole less successful

TRAVEL

Personally Conducted Tours

A. SOVIET SEMINAR

England, Denmark, Sweden, 32 days in RUSSIA and Armenia, Poland, France. Sail July 1

63 days all inclusive $425^{Up}
Leader: DR. MARK GRAUBARD
Columbia University

C. PALESTINE SEMINAR

Including visits to Italy, Egypt, France. Sail July 3

57 days all inclusive $495^{Up}
Leader: LEO W. SCHWARZ
Author "Jewish Caravan"

E. NORTH. EUROPE and THE EAST

England, Denmark, Sweden, RUSSIA, PERSIA, IRAQ, SYRIA, PALESTINE, Italy, France. Sail July 8

62 days all inclusive $575^{Up}
Leader: GEORGE S. WISE

B. NORTH CAPE—MIDNIGHT SUN

England, Norway, North Cape, Lapland, Finland, RUSSIA, Poland, France. Sail July 2

57 days all inclusive $465^{Up}
Leader: GEORGE A. CONNOR

D. SOCIAL CHANGES in EUROPE

England, Denmark, Finland, RUSSIA (18 days), Poland, Czechoslovakia, Switzerland, France. Sail July 11

50 days all inclusive $420^{Up}
Leader: DR. CLINTON J. TAFT

F. THE NEW WORLD and THE OLD

England, Denmark, Finland, RUSSIA, PALESTINE, Italy, France. Sail July 3

63 days all inclusive $755
Leader: DR. B. MYERS, N.Y.U.

For descriptive pamphlets and details apply

COMPASS TRAVEL BUREAU
55 West 42nd St. LO-5-3070 New York City

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE
MOROSCO THEATRE, 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30
Extra Matinee Wednesdays

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:45

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St., W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:40
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:40
300 Seats at $1.10

TESTIMONIAL DINNER

THE HENRI BARBUSSE MEMORIAL COMMITTEE
cordially invites you to join in a

TESTIMONIAL DINNER TO

HEYWOOD BROUN

FRIDAY EVENING, at seven-thirty

APRIL 24th, 1936

ALDINE CLUB, 200 Fifth Avenue

SPEAKERS

Dr. HARRY F. WARD
Chairman, American League
Against War and Fascism

MAURICE SUGAR
Labor attorney and Farmer-Labor Party Candidate, Detroit.

JOHN L. LEWIS
President, United Mine Workers of America

ROY WILKINS
Assistant Secretary, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

MARY VAN KLEECK
Director, Industrial Studies,
Russell Sage Foundation

HEYWOOD BROUN

The Couvert is Two Dollars. Reservations may be made by addressing the committee, Suite 411, 45 E. 17th St., Phone: ALgonquin 4-9290. Make checks payable to Osmond K. Fraenkel, Treas.

Victor recording of "Die Walküre" (fourteen records, $21); and to a lack of brilliance in the closing orchestral passages. But the singing of Mr. Melchior, especially in the narrative, of Mme. Lehmann in the quieter sections, and of Mr. List throughout is so dramatically conceived, so well articulated with the dynamics of the orchestra, that the above considerations should deter no one from adding the album to his collection. For once the singers do not shout it out in a death grapple with the eloquent accompaniment.

To replace an older recording by the Leners, Columbia has issued Beethoven's opus 95 Quartet in F minor played by the Roth String Quartet (three records, $5). For Mozart and Haydn there is perhaps no better quartet than the Roths—see, for example, their recent recordings of the Haydn F minor, opus 20, no. 5, and the Mozart A major, K-464 (each, three records, $5). Their performance of the later Beethoven, however, is not so heroic as that of the Leners, though better recorded and, as always, played with perfect balance and exquisite phrasing. You will find no better example of string-quartet virtuosity than the Roths' rendition of the ticklish coda of the last movement.

Victor's contribution to chamber music this month is the Pro Arte Quartet's impeccable rendition of the Schubert C major Quintet with the assistance of Anthony Pini (five records, $10). It is so impeccable, in fact, that one feels that the gentlemen sat down to the first movement with the comment, "Now we will give you the definitive version." The result is a loss of some of the careless verve that marked the playing of this composition by the London String Quartet some years ago for Columbia (six records, $9). In every other respect, however, the Pro Arte album is the better. And as for the recording—you can hear the pages being turned toward the end of the fifth side.

Among the finer single discs the following vocal records are recommended: Alexander Kipnis's two Mozart arias, one each from "Die Zauberflöte" and "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" (Victor, $1.50); John McCormack's two Hugo Wolff Lieder, "Herr, was trägt der Boden hier" and "Auch kleine Dinge können" (Victor, $1.50); five Russian numbers by the Don Cossack Choir (Columbia, $1.50); and three Negro spirituals by Marian Anderson (Victor, $2). We trust that Victor will see its way to letting Miss Anderson record Lieder as well as spirituals—which is not a complaint, but just greed. And just to show that we are not pleased by everything, let us warn you away from Albert Spalding's two inconsequential encore bits, "Burlesca" by Suk and "Cortège" by Lili Boulanger (Victor, $1.50), and from Efrem Zimbalist's "Zigeunerweisen" by Sarasate, which is not Zimbalist at his best (Columbia, $1.50).

HENRY SIMON

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

IDIOT'S DELIGHT. Shubert Theater. Robert Sherwood manages somehow to make a smashing theatrical success out of an anti-war play. With the Lunts and many other entertaining trimmings.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

SAINT JOAN. Martin Beck Theater. Brilliant interpretation by Katharine Cornell of what may well be Shaw's most enduring play.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

ETHAN FROME. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon, and Raymond Massey.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Gaumont British. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

DUBROVSKY. Amkino. As romantic as Pushkin, on whose unfinished novel it is based. Not wholly successful, but interesting as a variation on the orthodox Russian theme.

THE STORY OF LOUIS PASTEUR. Warner Brothers. With Paul Muni as Pasteur this film makes "science" exciting, or at any rate uses the life of its hero to excellent dramatic advantage.

TO THE HIGHEST BIDDER—THE CHILD!

Which Society Offers the Most to Its Children?

ITALY—Dr. Howard R. Marraro, Columbia University.

U.S.—Dr. Goodwin Watson, Teachers College.

U.S.S.R.—Dr. Frankwood E. Williams, Psychiatrist.

At PYTHIAN TEMPLE, 135 West 70th St.

FRIDAY, APRIL 24th—8:30 P.M.

ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS, Chairman

Tickets on sale at Federation of Children's Organizations, 175 Fifth Ave.; Columbia Bookshop, 2960 Bwy.; Pand Book Store, 7 E. 15th St.; New York University Bookshop, Washington Sq.; Chelsea Bookshop, 58 W. 8th St.; Bookshop, 50 E. 13th St., and all other People's Bookshops.

Letters to the Editors

A TEST OF LIBERALISM

Dear Sirs: Are dictatorships always bad and the maintenance of civil liberties and the rights of individuals always good? Or does it depend on the circumstances in each case?

There are still a considerable number of people who maintain that dictatorship is always bad. But Roger N. Baldwin, director of the American Civil Liberties Union and staunch defender of the rights of minorities, startled the world in 1928 by making a distinction. There are dictatorships and dictatorships, said he in Liberty Under the Soviets, and the Russian Soviet dictatorship, in contrast to all others, is "a moving, progressive organism," exercising a control "responsive to pressure from the forces at its base."

There are also people who maintain that invasion of the supposed rights of private individuals and groups is always bad. An excellent test of this position is furnished by the recent seizure of telegraphic records by the Black committee of the United States Senate. Roger Baldwin and the American Civil Liberties Union viewed with alarm the committee's actions, as did also the American Liberty League. But The Nation in its issue of this date commends the committee. "The essential question to ask is what the temper of the investigating committee is, and what objectives it is aiming at."

Isn't it time that we had a restatement of the liberal position (if there is such a thing) in terms a little more related to the actual forces at work in the world today?

HORACE B. DAVIS

Bradford, Mass., April 1

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL POLICY

Dear Sirs: Your comments in The Nation for March 25 about the report of the Committee on National Industrial Policy were, I hope, made after reading one or more of the characteristically poor summaries in the New York daily papers and not after a study of the report itself.

I wish to quote briefly from the report which you say introduces necessary proposals with "fear and trembling" and shows that "our business executives seem to have forgotten nothing and learned nothing since the beginning of the depression."

It must be clear that our present economic ills are attributable to the maldistribution and unwise use of the national income; that surplus production and unemployment arise chiefly, if not solely, from the diversion of too great a portion of the national income from the consuming market into the investment field, working injury to capital, to labor, to management and to the general public by depriving people of buying power, by depriving workers of the opportunity to produce needed goods, by depriving management of production and marketing opportunities, and by causing production facilities to become unusable, destroying their capital value almost in exact proportion to their non-use.

Is this concise statement of our present predicament, as you have suggested, "proof of the bankruptcy of economic thought on the part of our business leaders"?

What you have termed "a dangerous tendency toward a semi-fascist set-up" was a proposal for the establishment of a permanent advisory council with a "purely advisory function." It was the expressed conviction of the committee that "as an intelligent and representative adviser such a council will have more influence and find more general acceptance than in any other role."

PAUL GARRISON

Scarsdale, N. Y., March 29

PROSTITUTION—"IN A NICE WAY"

Dear Sirs: I often wonder what naive persons write such editorials for you as the one on Prostitution in New York City. Certainly they appear to write from second- or third-hand information. To a certain limited extent it is perhaps true that prostitution is an economic problem and to that extent it should have such regulation and treatment as is accorded it in Soviet Russia. On the other hand, I think you will agree that the most recent general raid in New York City, which your editorial so signally neglects to mention, was the most interesting to date because it was predicated upon strict economic doctrine. No effort was made to convict anyone of moral turpitude. The point that bothered the authorities was the fact that an organized big-business ring was exploiting the girls economically in such manner as to prevent them from collecting the due fruits of their conscientious industry. Girls who were taking in from $150 to $300 weekly—and such a take is far more common than the low scab prices you mention in your editorial—were being paid but $35 to $50 weekly for their industrious application to their chosen profession. That the authorities held was altogether wrong and should be amended.

But the point you overlook is that great numbers of interesting, attractive, and highly intelligent women voluntarily enter this profession even when other avenues of artistic expression and economic reward are open to them. A few of them, it is true, are nymphomaniacs, but only a rare few. You will always have quite a number of women who are perfectly intelligent and of full mental stature, but who simply prefer to prostitute themselves, in a nice way of course, and it is too much to expect men to resist their ethical complacency. It is simply naive to place prostitution entirely upon an economic basis. It is more than naive for anyone to write an editorial like yours on the assumption that New York prostitutes are weak, idiotic, filthy, infected, and degraded. Some of them are. They would be, regardless of what profession they followed. But this general indictment is an insult to the professional standing of a very considerable number of fine women in the oldest profession, who fill a social need, and who are in a position to resent this stigma upon their excellent characters.

T. SWANN HARDING

Washington, March 20

A LETTER FROM WALTER BAER

Dear Sirs: Thank you very much for your publicizing of my case. The results thereof have been and are still making themselves felt. I just now received a letter from a woman who used to go to a little country school with me, and from whom I've never heard for some twenty years. She too has sent a protest to Secretary Perkins, and expressed her disgust with the unjust application of the law.

For your information, the Supreme Court of the state of Oregon has just rendered a decision validating the $6,000,000 bond issue which was voted by the citizens of Portland on the plans I submitted gratis to the City Council, and has stipulated that the construction of the proposed sewage-treatment works must "substantially" follow "the Baer plan." This action, which was entirely unexpected by any of us, certainly vindicates me to the last degree, and makes me very happy indeed. However, actual construction will be hampered by the continued activities of the reactionary elements for a long time. These same elements have, I suspect, already intervened in my appeal to the extent of prevailing on the United States District Attorney to demand an exorbitant bail for my release pending our filed appeal.

I want to thank you, too, for your kindness in helping to brighten my incarceration with a free subscription for The Nation. I appreciate it, as do my confreres, Alfred Miller, Fred Werrmann, Domenick Sallitto, and Vincent Ferrero. The last two boys expect to leave here on bail of $1,000 each tonight or tomorrow. Miller may go out as soon as his $1,000 bond is raised, and Werrmann is awaiting the outcome of an application to enter Mexico, under the right of political asylum, a right evidently unknown in this country, more's the pity.

WALTER E. BAER

Ellis Island, New York, April 3

U. S. S. R. AND WPA

Dear Sirs: The Massachusetts WPA Adult Recreation Project recently scheduled two talks in Boston upon the U. S. S. R. The speaker, who was serving without compensation, is a descendant of Revolutionary soldiers, of a major general in the United States army, and of a member of Congress, and is not a Communist. The first meeting, one of an international-relations series, upon the topic "Russia's Contribution to Civilization," was canceled because in that entire section of the city, strangely, not a single available hall could be discovered. The second talk, upon "Glimpsing Russia in Forty Days," was canceled because the WPA found itself unable to provide automobile transportation from one section of Boston to another—in spite of the fact that the speaker offered to provide the automobile.

The United States government may have recognized Russia, but the WPA of Massachusetts has not.

MARY ELIZABETH SANGER

Boston, March 31

A FREE PRESS

Dear Sirs: There is general approval of the decision of the United States Supreme Court on the freedom of the press. Contrast this with the complete muzzling of the press in India under British rule. Every Indian newspaper must deposit with the government a large sum of money, to be forfeited if it publishes anything that the government regards as objectionable. At first this was represented as merely temporary, an emergency measure. Lately the government has sought to incorporate it in the permanent law. The legislative assembly refused to make it permanent. Then the British viceroy enacted it into a permanent law, over their heads.

ALICE STONE BLACKWELL

Boston, March 6

VETERANS OF FUTURE BONUSES

Dear Sirs: We write to correct some widespread misapprehensions about the Veterans of Future Wars. It seems to be generally believed that this great cause enlists only college students. Since war does not discriminate in choosing its victims, why should we? We welcome into our ranks all men between the ages of eighteen and thirty-six; the Home Fire Auxiliary for future wives and mothers of future veterans is open to all women between the ages of one and 115.

More serious, perhaps, is the unworthy imputation that our chief purpose is to tweak the guilty consciences of veterans of past wars. Emphatically, we insist that their guilty consciences have nothing to fear from us. On the contrary, it is because we believe with them that dead men enjoy no bonuses that we want ours before most of us are killed.

CHARLES BERLINRUT,

Commander, Washington-Jefferson-
Lincoln-Roosevelt Post

Newark, April 2

CORRECTION

[The letter entitled Supreme Court Justices, which appeared in last week's Letters to the Editors and which was signed Irving D. Hard, was from Irving Dilliard.—Editors The Nation.]

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

LION FEUCHTWANGER, one of the company of distinguished German writers exiled from their fatherland, is now living in France. He has written many novels, the best known of which are probably "Jew Süss," "Josephus," "The Oppermanns," and "The Jew of Rome."

LILLIAN SYMES, with her husband, Travers Clement, is the author of "Rebel America." Miss Symes carried on the Consumers' League investigation of candy factories in 1926, in the course of which she worked in sixteen different factories. Out of the investigation grew the manufacturers' "white list," which was widely publicized. Miss Symes's article on California politics will be followed by a study of the Northwest, with particular reference to the Townsend movement and to Senator Borah, by Richard Neuberger, whose earlier Townsend article in The Nation was quoted all over the country.

T. A. BISSON, expert on the Far East on the staff of the Foreign Policy Association, lived in China for four years. He has lately written an F. P. A. pamphlet, "Outer Mongolia, A New Danger Zone in the Far East."

WILLIAM TROY, formerly film critic for The Nation, is in the English Department at Bennington College.

CHARLES HUDEBURG was a contributor to "Trial Balances," Ann Winslow's admirable anthology of the work of young poets.

ABRAM L. HARRIS, professor of economics at Howard University, is coauthor with Sterling Spero of "The Black Worker," and author of "The Negro as Capitalist," soon to be published. He has just received a Guggenheim fellowship for a continuation of his studies of the economic systems of Karl Marx and Veblen.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE regularly reviews poetry for The Nation.

ELISEO VIVAS, member of the Department of Philosophy of the University of Wisconsin, has been closely connected with the work of the Experimental College there.

LOUIS M. HACKER, author of "A Short History of the New Deal," was a member of the editorial staff of the Encyclopedia of Social Sciences. He is now lecturer in economics at Columbia.

GEORGES SCHREIBER continues his disconcerting portraits of our statesmen drawn from life and on the spot.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · APRIL 29, 1936

NUMBER 3695

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

FRANCE AT THE POLLS	536
ROOSEVELT SPEAKS OF SECURITY!	536
HANDING DOWN JUSTICE	537
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	538
JIM CURLEY AND HIS GANG by Louis M. Lyons	540
IS IT SAFE TO GO TO SEA? by M. R. Bendiner	542
JESUS LOPEZ by Erskine Caldwell	545
SPAIN MOBILIZES FOR REVOLUTION by Anita Brenner	546
FRANCE VOTES FOR THE FUTURE by M. E. Ravage	549
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	550
BROUN'S PAGE	551
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
JOHN REED: NO LEGEND by Max Lerner	552
PLANNING AND SLUMS by Alvin Johnson	553
ESKIMO BY CHOICE by Shepard Stone	554
BACK TO HUTCHINS! by Donald Slesinger	556
THE COMIC VIEW by William Troy	556
INTERNATIONAL GANGSTERS by Benjamin Stolberg	557
SHORTER NOTICES	558
DRAMA: POLITE REVUE by Joseph Wood Krutch	559
FILMS: AFTER THE NEXT WAR by Mark Van Doren	560
THE INTELLIGENT TRAVELER by John Rothschild	562
DRAWINGS: by Georges Schreiber, Gropper, and Stuyvesant Van Veen

The Shape of Things

*

ITALY'S SPECTACULAR VICTORIES IN AFRICA have precipitated what may prove to be the gravest of all the recent crises in Europe. Emboldened by the belief that his armies have definitely broken the long stalemate in the north, Mussolini has abruptly spurned all efforts at conciliation and informed the League that he will be satisfied with nothing less than complete mastery over Ethiopia. On the surface the situation appears to be extremely favorable for him. His armies are advancing on Addis Ababa and Harar, while the League is immobilized by the French elections. Civilian morale has been greatly improved by the reported victories. There is, however, at least a suspicion that the Black Shirt triumphs have not been as final as official Italian dispatches would lead us to believe. The road between Dessye and Addis Ababa is long and tortuous; the Italians have apparently not reached Jijiga, much less Harar. An early beginning of the rainy season would render the present Italian positions untenable. Moreover, Mussolini's intransigence and brazen disregard for the rules of "civilized" warfare have brought new pressure from Geneva. Sanctions have already cut Italian trade in half, and further penalties are not yet impossible. Captain Eden's warning that London may relapse into a Gladstonian isolation in the event the League fails dramatizes the gravest danger in the situation. If war comes it will not be as a result of the imposition of sanctions, but because certain of the powers, notably France, have turned their backs on the fundamental principles of collective security.

*

THE COUNTRY IS MOBILIZING FOR PEACE. IN rapid succession we have had the Nye report, the launching of the Emergency Peace Campaign, and the observance of Peace Day. The Nye report is an event of the first importance. If we may be allowed a play on the word, there is dynamite in it. It indicts the munitions makers of bribery, obstructing peace efforts and jettisoning disarmament conferences, playing one country off against another, making the War, Navy, and Commerce departments adjuncts of their profit-seeking, manufacturing poison gases and high explosives irresponsibly, and placing their own advantage ahead of the national interest. The recommendations of the majority (Senators Nye, Clark, Pope, and Bone) for nationalization of munitions making and naval construction follow from this indictment with a relentless logic. An industry as ruthless as

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

this will find a way of avoiding any degree of government regulation. Only by government ownership can the profit economy be kept from running wild at its most irresponsible and nationally dangerous point—war profits. After joining with the majority in the indictment, the minority (Senators Vandenberg, Barbour, and George) lamely contents itself with "rigid and conclusive munitions control"—without even suggesting how such control can be effective. Too much destruction has been wrought by the munitioneers and too much has been revealed as to their methods to make question-begging of this sort anything but a mockery of the committee's efforts. What remains is for the committee to apply equal realism and courage in dealing with neutrality legislation, conscription, and industrial mobilization.

*

THE BLACK LOBBY COMMITTEE'S HEARINGS day by day reveal the kind of democracy that the American Liberty League and allied organizations are seeking to preserve in the United States. The various "grass roots" conventions, for example, were hailed as an expression of the American democratic tradition. Here were a group of men who did not like the Administration, and were expressing their dislike in the usual democratic manner. It now develops, however, that at least one of these spontaneous expressions of the popular will was made possible by generous contributions from such disinterested citizens as John J. Raskob, Pierre and Lammot du Pont, Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., and Ogden Mills. Other organizations "to defend the Constitution," such as the Farmers' Independence Council and the Sentinels of the Republic, have been shown to be tarred by the same brush. Much of the committee's time was spent in a vain effort to find a "dirt farmer" who was in any way connected with the Farmers' Independence Council. Lammot du Pont was revealed to be one of its chief contributors, and Stanley Morse, "consulting agricultural engineer" of the Liberty League, served as its secretary-treasurer. No one would deny the right of these men or any men to organize opposition movements hostile to the Administration. But the rest of us have also the right to know who is behind the movements and where the money comes from.

*

SHIPPING ACTIVITY ON THE SAN FRANCISCO waterfront has almost ceased as this is written. In this latest crisis Harry Bridges and his Maritime Federation are fighting the battle of the East Coast rank and file. The immediate cause of the San Francisco shippers' decision to suspend relations with the stevedores' local, of which Bridges is president, was the refusal of dock workers to handle cargo of the Grace liner Santa Rosa when it arrived from New York. The Santa Rosa's crew was supplied by the old guard of the International Seamen's Union, which is using every means both fair and foul to break the strike now in progress in New York, even going so far as to send inexperienced crews through picket lines to man "hot" ships. The whole American waterfront, West Coast, Gulf, and East Coast, is seething with unrest which deeply concerns the average American, whether he is merely a taxpayer who helps subsidize shipowners or a traveler who does not want to be drowned at sea. On another page of this issue M. R. Bendiner examines in devastating detail the kind of service given by Secretary Roper's Bureau of Inspection. An early issue will contain a first-hand account of the San Francisco deadlock by Louis Adamic, a story of the newly formed maritime federation in the Gulf ports by George N. Coad, and an account by Margaret Marshall of the rank-and-file revolt of the seamen in New York.

*

THE IMPEACHMENT AND CONVICTION OF District Judge Ritter for "high crimes and misdemeanors in office" calls attention once more to our lower federal courts. A successful impeachment is a rare thing in American history, only four having been carried through, and all of them in the case of federal judges. There were six counts against Judge Ritter all involving offenses punishable under statutory law. Yet he was acquitted on all and convicted only on a final indictment finding him guilty of general misbehavior and of having brought his court into "scandal and disrepute." When it is considered that the temptations to minor malpractice which proved Ritter's undoing must beset every other judge on the bench, it is difficult to assume that Ritter was the only black sheep and that his colleagues are all of unimpeachable rectitude. Yet it is these men, many of whom are doubtless no better than Ritter, who are today, through the exercise of judicial review, assuming the power to pass on acts of Congress and by their decisions are affecting the life of the entire nation. Another flaw in our political system emphasized by the Ritter verdict is the inability of Congress to shed its partisan character when acting as a judicial body. In the balloting the Senate divided almost entirely on party lines. Ritter is a Republican, and it is not surprising to discover that only five Republican Senators were willing to find him guilty.

*

JUDGE CRANE'S DECISION UPHOLDING THE constitutionality of the New York unemployment-insurance act not only shows humanity. What is even more important, it makes sense, both common and judicial. The decision is of considerable importance, being the first handed down by a state court of final appeal on the state laws now being passed to supplement the federal social-insurance program. A shocked editorial writer on the New York Herald Tribune has called it "a surprising decision." In the light of some of the recent decisions of the same court, especially in the Tipaldo minimum-wage case, we are inclined to agree. But our surprise is pleasant rather than Republican. Judge Crane's decision is noteworthy for three reasons. First, it does not start from an arbitrary conception of "due process of law" and work from that to an austere and catastrophic social conclusion outlawing a necessary piece of social legislation; it starts from social need and asks to be shown that a statute meeting that need is unconstitutional. Second, it states flatly that "it would be a strange sort of government, in fact no government at all, that could not give help in such trouble" as our present unemployment mess. It is refreshing to find a judge who is not an anarchist. Third, it sweeps away all sorts of cobwebs about whether an individual employer can be made to contribute to a common insurance pool, by pointing out that the whole problem of unemployment is a general problem. We await with considerable suspense an assurance from the United States Supreme Court that it can write as sensible a decision as this.

*

THE ARABS AND THE POLES WERE ADEPTS AT anti-Semitic terror before Hitler perfected the technique, and the current outbreaks in Palestine, as in Poland, have local causes. In neither case are they mere by-products of Hitlerism. In Palestine the causes are buried deep in the nationalist emotions of the Arabs—emotions fed by economic jealousy as well as primitive racial pride. But even here the hand of Hitler can be detected. During the past two years the precarious inter-racial peace in Palestine has been strained to breaking by the greatly increased immigration of Jews; and most of this increase has been made up of refugees from Nazi Germany. Arab leaders have violently opposed the influx and have protested against the further sale of land to Jews. An outbreak of violence was the almost inevitable sequel. It may be significant that in the course of the recent murderous attacks a German is said to have been stopped by a mob which thought him a Jew. He shouted, "I am a German Christian," to which the crowd replied, "Go ahead, for Hitler's sake," and set him free. Whether this little legend is true, we don't know; but it is true in spirit if not in fact. The spirit of Hitler walks with the anti-Semites in Palestine.

*

HITLER'S SPIRIT SIMILARLY PRESIDES OVER the continuing terror in Poland. There, for months, the forms of fascism have been clearly taking shape. Official raids on workers' organizations, wholesale charges of red propaganda, riots and the killing of protesting workers—all these have occurred at the same time that mob attacks on Jews have multiplied under the eye of a government which verbally deprecates violence while it does little to prevent or punish it. Anti-Semitism is an old disease in Poland; but the present epidemic, in form and violence, suggests that the source of the infection is its next-door neighbor. Germany should be forced to post on its door a sign reading, "Unclean."

*

INFORMATION BY MAIL FROM CHINA INDICATES the extent to which our newspapers and press associations are cooperating, under duress or otherwise, in the suppression of all news revealing Chiang Kai-shek's subservience to Japan. Most illuminating is the failure of a newspaper like the New York Times to carry any report of the recent spectacular military raid on Tsinghua University, an institution at Peiping maintained by the American Boxer Indemnity Fund. At 3 a.m. on February 29 the university was attacked by more than five hundred soldiers, police, and plain-clothes men who broke down the campus gates and scaled the protecting wall. After beating off the university police, the troops surrounded the dormitories and produced a list of between one and two hundred student leaders whom they intended to arrest. Warned by similar raids on other Peiping educational institutions, the student body counter-attacked, destroyed several of the motor trucks brought to carry them to prison, and forced the release of three arrested students. That afternoon the troops returned, five thousand strong, and conducted a thorough search of the premises without finding anything of an incriminating nature—one report asserts that they found a picture of Karl Marx! Attempts to search the students led to another tussle, but as the students were greatly outnumbered they agreed to a compromise by which twenty-two, not including the ringleaders, were arrested. The blundering tactics of the military brought vigorous protests in North China, which led General Sung Cheh-yuan, Japanese-appointed commandant of the Peiping-Tientsin garrison, to place the blame on Nanking. While it may be said that this is the only instance in which he is known to have obeyed Nanking, it is not without significance that the raids followed the issuance of a sweeping Nanking decree—similarly unreported in the Times—calling for the complete suppression of the student movement and placing the task in the hands of the army.

*

CHIEF FORESTER FERDINAND A. SILCOX HAS handed down a wage award in the dispute between the Realty Advisory Board and the building-service union in New York City which suggests that arbitrators in general and Walter Gordon Merritt in particular should spend more time in the woods. It virtually coincides with the demands the union fought for in a desperate three weeks' siege which cost the workers thousands of dollars and ended in defeat on other important issues such as reinstatement of strikers and the closed shop. The Silcox award, which deals only with wages, is informed by a simple logic. In making it, says Mr. Silcox, the first consideration was a recognition of the principle of the living wage as fundamental in any sound approach to the problem of reasonable minimum-wage standards. Six of the nine schedules of minimum wages set in the award are, as Mr. Silcox points out, below the lowest budget standard, but like the union he apparently felt that they were as good as could be obtained or enforced at this time. As for the continuous plaint of the owners that their financial situation makes it impossible to pay decent wages, Mr. Silcox states in firm language that the industry's first obligation is to make the financial adjustments necessary to meet its labor costs on a reasonable basis. The next problem is to enforce the Silcox award. The strike, after all, was essentially an attempt to enforce the modest terms of the earlier Curran award. We hope the Silcox decision will at least strengthen the morale of the building-service union. Only by holding its lines firm can it hope to compel Walter Gordon Merritt and his friends to observe even the lowest minimums of fair play.

France at the Polls

IT WOULD be difficult to overemphasize the importance of the French elections, discussed elsewhere in this issue by our Paris correspondent. Not only the immediate future of France but to a lesser extent the direction of events in the whole of Europe depends on the political complexion of the new Chamber of Deputies. A weak, unstable left majority such as exists at present would condemn France to four more years of political chaos; a strong disciplined majority might make France once more the dominant power of Europe.

At present there are no less than nineteen political groups with representatives in the Chamber. Most of these are loose aggregations which can scarcely be called political parties. There are, however, four which outrank the others in importance. On the extreme right is the Republican Federation headed by Louis Marin, which draws its support chiefly from the big industrial interests. This group had forty-two seats in the old Chamber and obtained 13 per cent of the vote in the 1932 election. The Democratic Alliance, headed by ex-Premier Flandin, occupies a position at the center and may be described as the party of commerce and industry. On the left are to be found the two most powerful parties of France—the Radical Socialists and the Socialists. The Radical Socialists are by tradition a moderate party representing the interests of the lower middle class. Recently, however, as a result of the open challenge of the Croix de Feu and other fascist organizations, they have actively cooperated in the Front Populaire. In 1932 the Radical Socialists polled approximately 20 per cent of the total vote and elected 152 representatives. The Socialist Party polled a somewhat larger vote, but obtained a somewhat smaller representation. The Front Populaire, comprising the Radical Socialists, Socialists, and Communists, together with certain of the minor left parties, actually possessed a slight majority in the old Chamber, but this majority has been rendered useless by the refusal of the Socialists and Communists to participate in a Cabinet dominated by a bourgeois party. If the present elections result in a marked increase in the left majority, a Front Populaire government is confidently predicted.

The election is being fought primarily on the issue of fascism. Economic issues have been deliberately subordinated by the Front Populaire in the interest of unity. Nevertheless, there is agreement regarding the necessity for nationalizing the arms industry, the railways, and the Bank of France. The left as a whole is opposed to further deflation and advocates economic planning as a means of escaping the paralyzing effect of the depression. Hitler's reoccupation of the Rhineland has brought an element of uncertainty into the political picture. While one might expect that the threat of a German invasion would strengthen the hands of the left as the chief supporters of the League, this has not necessarily followed. The very existence of the League of Nations probably depends on a left victory. Angered by the Franco-Soviet agreement and the imposition of sanctions against Italy, the right is in a mood to abandon Geneva altogether. A substantial victory for the Front Populaire, on the other hand, would not only seal the doom of fascism at home but, through its support of collective action, impose a serious setback to fascism throughout the world.

Roosevelt Speaks of Security!

THE President's speech at Baltimore a few days ago indicates that he intends to make social security one of the dominant issues of the campaign. From the standpoint of popular appeal, we can think of no better issue. The unprecedented growth of the Townsend movement, despite the patent absurdity of the plan which it indorses, is but one of many indications that the desire for security is perhaps the most dynamic force in America today. Not everyone suffered from unemployment or bankruptcy in the depression, but there are few who did not fear them. It is safe to say that no one can be elected President of the United States in 1936 who does not offer at least a hope of abolishing this nightmare of insecurity. The question is whether Mr. Roosevelt can succeed in persuading the voters that the federal Social Security Act is an adequate step in this direction.

It is difficult to imagine what Mr. Roosevelt will say to the twelve million persons who are now without jobs, although not, fortunately, without votes. Almost two years have passed since he declared that "the security of the men, women, and children of the nation" was the primary objective of his Administration. Since that date economic conditions have improved measurably, but there has been an increase rather than a decrease in unemployment and there has been a serious weakening in the whole relief structure. The WPA has been a godsend for some, but many of the neediest families are even worse off than they were on direct relief. As a result of the inducements offered by the federal Social Security Act, twelve states have adopted unemployment-insurance laws, but not a single benefit can be paid until 1939. Pay-roll taxes for old-age insurance start next year, but no payments will be available until 1942. Even if all the remaining thirty-six states adopt unemployment-insurance legislation—and there is no certainty that they will—the exemptions are so numerous that only about half of the employed population will be covered. And it is estimated that at most one-half of the employed workers and one-third of the adult population will be benefited by the federal old-age program. For those aged persons who can establish genuine need there are state pensions—still few in number—or relief!

Practically nothing has been done, moreover, to make provision for one of the primary causes of insecurity—ill health. The President's Committee on Economic Security pointed out that the money loss attributable to sickness for families with less than $2,500 income per year was approximately $2,400,000,000 annually, of which $1,500,000,000 represented the cost of medical care. The bulk of this burden falls on a very small portion of the population at any one time. Fifty persons out of a hundred suffer no illness in an ordinary year, 7 per cent have three or more illnesses, and four families out of a thousand spend more than half their incomes for medical bills. The Committee on Economic Security was emphatic in urging that the United States follow the example of all the other important civilized nations and establish a compulsory system of health insurance for industrial workers. Definite action was postponed, however, pending the submission of recommendations by the professional advisory groups. Possibly Mr. Roosevelt can tell us what has become of these recommendations.

Experts testifying at the hearings on the Frazier-Lundeen bill before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor have stressed these and other deficiencies in the Social Security Act. Criticism has been directed particularly at the underlying principle on which that act rests—the establishment of an actuarial basis for unemployment and old-age insurance. Only a mind steeped in Puritan admonitions regarding the virtue of thrift for thrift's sake could countenance an old-age "security" program which accumulated nearly $3,000,000,000 before any payments were made and piled up $46,000,000,000 in receipts over and above all benefit payments within a period of forty years. The Frazier-Lundeen bill, though it is hardly an immediate alternative to the Administration's Social Security Act, rests on much sounder principles. It assumes that the established economic system can produce the resources required by the unemployed, and would obtain funds for benefit payments from taxes levied on high incomes, corporate surpluses, and accumulated wealth. It also assumes that, quite as much as the employed worker, the average unemployed or aged worker must eat, clothe himself respectably, and maintain and educate his children. Consequently, it provides that unemployment, old-age, health, and maternity benefits shall be equal to the average weekly wage payable in a worker's occupation or profession, with a minimum of $10 per week plus $3 for each dependent and a maximum of $20 a week plus $5 for each dependent. Self-employed workers whose income falls below the minimum specified in the bill are to be entitled to compensation sufficient to raise their income to the minimum. Unlike the Social Security Act, the Frazier-Lundeen bill covers the whole population.

It may be argued that a capitalist United States cannot afford to pay the cost of genuine security such as is envisioned under this bill. But the difference between the negligibly small sums to be paid under the Security Act and those projected under the Frazier-Lundeen bill constitutes an accurate measure of the amount by which the Administration act falls short of security. Moreover, there is every reason to believe that the Social Security Act, with its tremendous reserves accumulated by regressive taxation, will have an unstabilizing effect on the national economy. Consumer purchasing power will be impaired, which will further curtail the investment opportunities for the existing surplus of capital. A genuine security program, on the other hand, should increase and stabilize consumer buying power and lay the groundwork for the fullest use of the country's productive capacity.

Handing Down Justice

FIFTY years ago on May 4 sixty-seven policemen and three times that many workers were killed and wounded in Haymarket Square, Chicago, by an exploding bomb. Eighteen months later the state hanged four of the eight radicals hastily indicted for the crime. One of the convicted men committed suicide to escape execution; the others were given life sentences. Seven years later Governor Altgeld, a man of conscience, in a pardon message which cost him his political career, denounced the trial and convictions for what they were, the end-product of a witches' brew of hysteria, red-baiting, and plain lying. His pardon message opened the prison gates for those still living. The names of the others passed into the roster of working-class martyrs, and a familiar pattern in the fabric of democratic justice was once more filled out in all its dramatic and tragic detail.

It is a pattern that has repeated itself again and again. In the great Homestead lockout of 1892 unionization in the steel mills was deliberately and systematically crushed by the Carnegie Steel Corporation. Andrew Carnegie turned over to his manager, H. C. Frick, the job of eliminating the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers. Through false propaganda, control of officials, trickery, and brute force Frick performed his task so well that the union has never revived. In 1893 a Congressional investigating committee duly rebuked the company for using Pinkerton detectives and in general supported the workers' contentions. Invariably investigating committees are set up to satisfy a shocked and regretful public. Usually their reports find for the under-dog—and after a brief airing in the news that arouses and then quiets the public conscience, are filed away in archives that might well be labeled Atonement by Exposure.

In recent weeks we have had another exposure of the methods by which the steel industry continues to defeat union organization. Once again the job has been handed over to an agent bearing the name of H. C. Frick. The original Frick imported an army of Pinkerton detectives more or less openly. His successors in the H. C. Frick Coke Company employ the more subtle means of spies and company unions. Outraged public opinion has accomplished that much. But the issue is the same—working-class right against ruling-class might; and steel remains unorganized. We do not mean by these remarks to belittle the work of men of conscience. But the rank-and-file American must not be deflected into the easy faith that a wrong exposed in Washington is a wrong set right in Aliquippa.

Until the economic force exercised by workers matches and exceeds that which now rests in the hands of their employers, democratic justice, well-meaning and breathless, will continue to arrive on the field after the strike is lost, after the martyrs have been hanged. For the anniversary of Haymarket there could be no more suitable slogan than the parting words of another working-class hero, Joe Hill. "Don't waste any time in mourning," he wired Bill Haywood. "Organize."

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

The Republican Agony

Washington, April 19

DAN HASTINGS, who represents the State of du Pont in the United States Senate, told a convention of American newspaper editors here Friday night that he and his fellow-leaders of the Republican Party know the 1936 Presidential race is a hopeless one and are preparing to put a candidate in the field merely to keep in practice for 1940. He pretended to be jesting when he said it, but Dan knew he was speaking the gospel truth. Dan knows that any nominee the G. O. P. conceivably may put forward will be a pushover for Roosevelt. He also knows that any suspense in the 1936 campaign will be trumped-up suspense, blown into the campaign (1) by journalists hoping thereby to make their columns more enticing, (2) by Congressional and local candidates prayerfully bent on riding into office on Mr. Roosevelt's slip stream, and (3) by professional politicians seeking both to keep down the third-party vote and to shake down the fat cows from whose pockets party coffers get their fillings. Dan knows these things because thirty-four years of playing squat-tag with the electorate have made him a realist, if nothing else. He knows them, too, because he has been reading the latest registration and primary-election returns.

Mr. Roosevelt also has been reading those returns, and one may safely assume that, as a result of them, he will make a campaign as dull and uneventful as was his speech last Monday night before the Young Democrats at Baltimore, a speech that Herbert Hoover in his 1929 prime could as easily have made. The returns are accepted at the White House as evidence that a safe majority of the voters love the Roosevelt of the moment and that no changes need be made. The voters, of course, are in love with the picture of Mr. Roosevelt that his most violent enemies in the Liberty League have painted, and there is no chance of his Republican opponent in the campaign doing anything to mar that picture. Mr. Roosevelt, as much a realist as Dan Hastings, may be counted on therefore to adhere to the old political axiom that in an election year the wise candidate strives to pacify his foes, knowing that his friends will vote for him anyway.

The returns to date show that he has better than 1,250,000 such friends in Illinois, or 400,000 more than Borah and Knox could poll by combining their friends in that pivotal state; that in traditionally Republican California he has 1,676,267 Democrats ready to vote for him, exclusive of those among the 1,156,696 registered Republicans in that state who are prepared to mark their ballots in his favor; and that in Pittsburgh, the Mellon stronghold, Democratic registrations have increased nearly 700 per cent since 1932, so that his party for the first time in history is the majority party there. Reports from other sections of the country show comparable trends.

The two most amusing developments of the year here have occurred within the past fortnight, and one of them has happened within the past week. The first was the hiring by the Republican National Committee of a "brain trust." Its sequel was the disclosure that the G. O. P. "brain trust" and its employers are already at odds. The party of the first part quarreled with the party of the second part when Chairman Fletcher gave a very private little affair at his home here Thursday night to introduce his professorial troupe to a select group of Republican stalwarts, including Senators Vandenberg and Austin and Representatives Bacon, Snell, Taber, Ditter, Martin, Mapes, and Bolton. The quarrel broke out when Hired Brains No. 1, Professor O. G. Saxon of Yale, turned the meeting over to another member of the G. O. P. Cerebral Nine, Professor Niles W. Carpenter of the University of Buffalo. The latter proceeded to tell the assembled politicians exactly what sort of platform they ought to adopt at Cleveland in June. As one of his indignant listeners later blurted out, "Why, it was worse than the New Deal!" Another expressed his reaction thus: "Wotinell's come over Fletcher? That guy Carpenter's a damn' radical! Talks like a Communist. Got hair like one, too." It may be, of course, that Professor Carpenter's audience was guided in its reaction less by what he said than by what its members had read about him as the author of a volume on guild socialism. At any rate, it seems perfectly established that they proceeded—quite roughly, too—to set him right and kept at it until Chairman Fletcher intervened as mediator and pacified his guests.

Such a contretemps of course never would have happened had Professor Saxon kept the chair, for nothing he is likely to say would be found exceptional by the men Mr. Fletcher is trying to help get elected or reelected. Saxon stands only half a centimeter to the left of Thomas Nixon Carver, another member of the Cerebral Nine, and Carver, a Harvard professor emeritus of economics, represents the extreme right in his profession. Saxon's views on at least a few of the subjects he has been hired to grapple with were made known to the public at an NRA hearing held in January, 1935, at which he spoke at length in opposition to higher wages and shorter hours; what this country needs, says Professor Saxon, is more work and less money. How Carpenter came to be hired as a G. O. P. brain truster is a mystery, but no more so than the hiring of Archer Hobson of Wisconsin, a free trader and until recently an Administration economist in the Department of Agriculture, whose heads regard him respectfully as one of their own kind.

Costigan and Lesser Men

THE danger in the situation nationally is that too much attention will be concentrated on the Presidential contest and not enough on the House and Senate campaigns. A whole new House must be elected, and thirty-two Senators. Among the Senators whose terms expire this year are Robinson, Harrison, Glass, Couzens, Norris, Gore, McNary, Metcalf, Lewis, Borah, Dickinson, Capper, and Bailey. Another whose term expires this year is the invaluable Costigan of Colorado. The unfortunate and serious failure of his health which has just forced Costigan's withdrawal from the Senate and public life has been insufficiently deplored. One of the few first-rate men in the Senate and a member of the even more select group of true liberals, Costigan was also one of the most courageous and straight-shooting men in American public life. As such he is well-nigh irreplaceable and as such his case helps to illustrate my point, for it now seems altogether likely that Farley will attempt to transfer Costigan's toga to Governor Johnson. It belongs, instead, to Oscar Chapman, a veritable New Dealer who managed Costigan's campaign in 1930 and several months ago was furloughed from his post as Assistant Secretary of the Interior so that he might return to Colorado and repeat the performance. Chapman is an energetic and thoroughly competent young man with sound instincts. Johnson, who already has announced his candidacy, is a reactionary who has fought the New Deal at every turn.

It might seem strange to suggest that Farley would appoint such a consistent foe as Johnson, if it were to be the first time. But the record shows he has been making just such alliances in all parts of the country. A case in point is that of Governor Brann of Maine. Brann, who has crossed the Roosevelt Administration at every turn—and double-crossed it relative to the Passamaquoddy project—literally was begged by Farley to announce his candidacy for the Senate. Representative Moran at last report was so disgusted with this turn of events in his home state that he was preparing to return to private life. Out in Nebraska the Democratic Senatorial nomination has gone to a filling-station owner and former Congressman, Terry Carpenter, who made a ludicrous campaign on the Townsend plan. Meanwhile, the impeccable Norris continues to hold out against the urgings of his friends that he ask the people of Nebraska to give him a fifth term.

The Inexcusable Woodring

OCCUPANCY of even a relatively high post in the Roosevelt Administration is no guaranty that one is a veritable New Dealer. There is, for example, the case of Assistant Secretary of War Woodring. He has just committed the inexcusable offense of addressing an American Legion convention at Sarasota, Florida, in language that could not have been better calculated further to arouse the already inflamed feeling in that area, which also contains Bartow, the scene of the Tampa flogging trials. He delivered himself there Friday night of a fascist assault on virtually all the church, labor, pacifist, and student groups of the nation, dubbing them "atheistic" and "communistic" and referring to 8,900 clergymen as "traitors" for declaring their unqualified opposition to war. Klan leaders must have rejoiced when they heard him bellow that "the pacifist seeks a leveling of races and creeds, sees national boundaries swept away, sees the brotherhood of the white, yellow, and black man an accomplished fact."

Woodring's address was devoted in the main to a defense of the New Deal's huge military appropriations, and to make that defense he had also to defend the munitioneers, who are the chief instigators and beneficiaries of those appropriations. This defense, coming at a time when the Nye committee is about to make public its report, included argument from Woodring's "personal knowledge" that the makers of gas, bullets, guns, and ships are not the chief beneficiaries of "preparedness." He should know, according to a report by the House Military Affairs Committee which has just been made public. This report shows that some Boston merchants paid $30,000 in fees to Ralph O'Neill, former national commander of the Legion, and Robert Jackson, former treasurer of the Democratic National Committee, to intercede with Woodring and get him to make an illegal alteration in contracts between the merchants and the War Department for the purchase and sale of surplus army supplies. The merchants, according to documentary evidence in the report, made more than $300,000 profit out of selling the surplus goods under the contract as altered by Woodring to permit them to market the stuff in this country; the original contract had required them to export the goods as a condition precedent to their obtaining them at bargain prices.

Senator Costigan

Jim Curley and His Gang

BY LOUIS M. LYONS

INVITED to speak at a state principals' convention in Massachusetts, Fulton Oursler announced as his subject, "Let Us Be Free," but the supervisor in charge of the program in the state Department of Education wrote him that the subject would not do because "of its controversial nature." Not long ago Massachusetts would have laughed at such an item of news from some hill-billy community, but times have changed in the commonwealth that Mr. Mencken recently found "the most civilized."

Times have changed since James Michael Curley floated into the governorship of Massachusetts on the strong Roosevelt tide. So ancient an issue as civil liberties has become a more controversial subject than at any time since Massachusetts won her emancipation from the Puritan theocracy of her first century. Civil marriage was brought to New England from old England as one of the sacraments of a free people. Curley had hardly become governor before he flouted the Massachusetts tradition of civil liberties with a threat to all justices of the peace that he would refuse to reappoint any justice who performed a civil marriage. Under him the Boston city machine has occupied the State House. The intolerance of the Irish politician in Boston for any sharing of political power or political liberties can be compared only to that of the early church magistrates of New England. Curley's regime is frankly racial beyond anything known elsewhere in America. In those great departments of government through which the state touches the lives of the people—education, welfare, civil service—the racial revolution has been complete. Such names as Dana, Conant, Payson Smith, which stood for the kind of departmental administration Massachusetts had boasted, have given way to Reardon, McCarthy, Murphy, which suggest the only qualification required of their bearers. "No man is indispensable," says Curley. That portion of Massachusetts which so recently rejoiced in Calvin Coolidge now squirms under Curleyism. The last Brahmin has been expelled from the Bulfinch front of the State House.

Of course this is only returning tit for tat. The new racial domination of Curleyism may be only a reflex of the intolerant, unyielding snobbishness of the older Boston that refused the Irish any place at all when they were the weaker race, still denies them social recognition, and still keeps them out of the commercial leadership of the most class-bound city in America. What has happened is that one set of intolerances has been replaced by another.

The average citizen is worse off under Curley than he ever was under the Massachusetts aristocracy. During the three hundred years of Brahmin rule a certain hard-mouthed idealism had come to leaven the administration of the human-welfare functions of government. Republican state administrations had pioneered in education and in public welfare, had effected such reforms as parole and probation, the extension of the civil service, the first departure from institutional relief, and the financing of public expenditures on the pay-as-you-go basis. True, Republican government meant banker control. But it proved generally pretty decent and broad-gauge until State Street began to run downhill in the present generation with the comfortable decay of Boston's old families, and to carry the leadership of the Republican Party down with it. From the earlier Republican administrations it is a crude transition to the reign of Curley, who controls the commonwealth by means of the smallest and cheapest political heelers that ever shined their trousers in the seats of public office in Massachusetts.

A glance at the outstanding Curley appointments suggests the kind of government the commonwealth is getting under him. At the head of the state civil service Curley has placed Thomas H. Green, member of a family that combines ward politics with real estate, which Curley himself once referred to as "the James brothers." For Public Welfare Commissioner he replaced a proved executive with an insignificant politician whose removal from the city welfare administration had been a necessary preliminary to reorganizing that service for meeting the relief crisis. The new commissioner's first act was to dismiss a corps of case workers and put in their places a group of unemployed, who, he said, were entitled to have their turn at the jobs. As Commissioner of Agriculture Curley appointed the grocery salesman who had had the genius to have him initiated into the Grange in the heat of the campaign for governor and who also engineered his adoption by the Mashpee Indians. For Commissioner of Education Curley replaced the nationally known Payson Smith, who was instantly snapped up by Harvard University, with an inconsequential, small-town superintendent, who had changed his name from Reardon to the fancier Reardan, but whose greater claim to distinction was that he was almost the only school superintendent who had not publicly held his nose at the Curley-supported teachers' oath law. Incidentally the treatment of witnesses against the teachers' oath law was something new under the golden dome of Beacon Hill.

Responsible Catholics shiver at the sort of homage Curley pays his church in politics. The distinguished Catholic head of the Boston schools, and after him the competent Fall River superintendent, refused Curley's proffer of the appointment as Commissioner of Education, knowing Curley and what he would expect of a man. The rise of Curleyism is by no means the equivalent of a Catholic party in Massachusetts. Though he nurses the church vote with worshipful care, Curley is not its spokesman. All Irish politicians in Massachusetts, whether radical or conservative, highbrow or guttersnipe, accept the Catholic ethic as decisive in those aspects of government in which the church chooses to concern itself. They censor the Boston stage and book business. They limit the schools to guard the church's jealous role as the child's first tutor. They annually overwhelm the child-labor amendment, with private apologies to their labor friends. But the most effective resistance to Curley has come from his coreligionists. The Catholic cardinal of Boston has gone out of his way to cheer the Catholic Mayor Mansfield in his attacks upon Curley. Mansfield is Curley's most tireless foe.

As his most formidable political ally Curley has in the Governor's Council Daniel J. Coakley, who was disbarred from the practice of law after the notorious Mishawum blackmail cases that ended in the removal of two district attorneys from office. Coakley and Curley were long enemies. But they have joined forces to undo the painful progress that penal reform has made in Massachusetts, and to put pardons once more at the disposal of politics.

Sixty-one years old now, Curley has been in politics since he was twenty-six. He has been alderman, common councilman, legislative representative, Congressman, three times mayor of Boston; now he is governor. And he says that this fall he is going to take the Senate seat occupied by his nominal party colleague, Marcus A. Coolidge. Curley found long ago a suitable companion career to politics in the real-estate and bonding business. He is associated in that with his brother, who runs it for him when James Michael is occupied with the public business.

Curley's opponents have never been able to pin anything on him since, in his neophyte days, he was sent to jail for falsifying another's signature in a civil-service examination for mail carriers. This was an organized piece of business. Curley in the city council and his cousin Tom in the legislature operated the Tammany Club, a ward organization that took care of its own in return for favors at the polls. "In two years the Tammany Club has found employment for 700 men," Curley boasted after his conviction. In this particular instance Curley impersonated one Bartholomew Fahey, while Cousin Tom impersonated one James Hughes. The charge was "conspiracy to defraud the United States." The sentence was sixty days. Judge James Lowell of the older Boston, in passing sentence, denounced the effrontery of the Curleys in running for office after their conviction. But both Curleys were reelected before they entered the city jail.

When he graduated from West End gang politics to big-league stuff, Curley carried two fists with him, and he has known how to swing them. He felled an editor on State Street one day during his mayoralty campaign. A fist fight with a radio critic enlivened a broadcast in a more recent campaign. But even with his hands in his pockets he is always able to hit harder and to move faster than any opposition the sputtering G. O. P. offers him. Ruthless, adroit, self-dramatizing, he misses no tricks and seldom forgoes the chance for front-page publicity. While he still plays the game of politics in the same tough way he learned in the old Tammany Club, he has developed a most disarming personality. He has more blarney than any other Boston Irishman, and he administers it with an exaggerated Boston accent that has been known to hypnotize the highbrows. His marvelously cultivated voice is one of the wonders of Massachusetts. Vocal-culture lessons have smoothed off the rasping edge of his early rowdy days. He sneers at such opponents as Bacon Saltonstall as being of the "royal purple," but the lavish ostentation he displayed at his daughter's wedding last year offered the closest imitation of royalty that Massachusetts has seen in this generation. The trappings and ceremonial of the governor's office have doubled in expense under Curley.

He has never failed in his instinct for the dramatic moment or in his capacity to place his opponent at a disadvantage. During the recent flood he was everywhere, showing himself, calling attention to the need, proclaiming the emergency. When his demands upon the legislature proved double what they were willing to give him, he called upon the flood victims to witness the niggardly treatment accorded them by his opponents. When a reporter suggested that a flying night trip to the disaster center smacked of a gallery play, Curley retorted, "Well, they won't have as much trouble finding me as they had finding Coolidge the night of the police strike."

Riding the tide is a Curley specialty. The loudest for Smith in 1928, he was the first to leave him in 1932 and to join Roosevelt. Senator Walsh, long leader of the state Democrats, had been the chief obstacle in the path of the earlier advance of Curleyism. Walsh had been the first Catholic governor of the state and had given it the most constructive government that the present generation remembers. He was a rural politician, a companion of the old Yankee Democrats who had from the beginning fought State Street control of Massachusetts. Walsh shied off from Roosevelt before the Chicago convention when he found that Curley had jumped on the band-wagon first. Curley thus enjoyed the place of New Deal sponsor in the state by default of the party leadership. He has been Mr. Roosevelt's chief embarrassment in Massachusetts. He spent immense energy all his first year as governor trying to get control of the 150,000 jobs under the federal WPA administrator. In this, as in other ways, the New Deal disappointed him. The Administration ignored his grandiose schemes for remaking the face of New England with federal projects.

When Republicans said in the contest for the governorship, "Curley will steal the gold off the State House dome," the answer generally given by independents who were bent on repudiating Republican Bourbonism was, "He can't. The council won't let him." The drama of the Curley revolution has therefore been the capture of the council. This archaic appendage of Massachusetts government is a survival from colonial times, intended originally as a check upon the royal governors. For 150 years its power was nominal. Then the Republicans, secure in the gerrymandered council and legislative districts, found that the council was useful as a check on the power of Democratic governors. All appointments and pardons must be "with the advice and consent of the council."

Curley found the council five to four against him. But he maneuvered with Machiavellian skill. He needed one Republican vote to remove the chairman of the Boston Finance Commission, which was already launched on an investigation of Curley's last administration as mayor of Boston. It happened that just at this time there was a vacancy in the nice job of chairman of the Fall River Finance Commission. Curley got his vote, the Republican councilor from Fall River going with him; the helpful councilor got the fat Fall River chairmanship. There was now a vacancy on the council, and to fill it with a Democrat Curley was still short one vote. The Republicans felt safe until they learned with a shock that J. Arthur Baker, councilor from the rock-ribbed G. O. P. stronghold of Berkshire, was going to vote with Curley, and in return would be made a judge. Indignant denials were issued by Mr. Curley and Mr. Baker. When the vote came all depended on Baker. He refrained from voting and took a column in the afternoon papers to explain his abstinence. That left the vote four to three for Curley's man. Almost immediately Curley made Baker a judge of the Superior Court. The Boston Bar Association formally protested, "If our government is to survive, the people must have confidence in the courts." "An unwarranted and gratuitous impertinence," observed Curley, as he proceeded to pack the Boston Finance Commission safely with his own camp followers. He did this just in time to cut off the investigation of his former City Treasurer, who was now able to return from Florida. Mansfield has now taken up the task laid down by the commission and has brought civil suit for recovery of $250,000 from the City Treasurer. Many believe that the greatest threat to a continuance of Curleyism in Massachusetts lies in the evidence this suit will bring to light.

Curley has always played for labor support. Of all his appointees, only Robert Watt, secretary of the state Federation of Labor, is able and independent. Watt has proved the most outspoken critic of Curley's appointment of Reardon and of the teachers' oath law. He is the only qualified member of the new unemployment-insurance board, where he has to serve under the chairmanship of Judge Emil Fuchs, who demonstrated his executive capacity as owner of the Boston Braves by running that once great ball club right off the map of baseball. The other labor appointees of Curley's do not compare with Watt. A politician who had served a sentence for perjury became the employment secretary of the administration. Every department has been filled to bulging with Curley placements. One efficient department head has segregated the Curley appointees from his regular personnel and set one of his deputies to find some kind of work for them that will keep them from bungling the regular work of his office.

As for the "work and wages" program on which Curley campaigned, it degenerated into a few hundred jobs handed out at election time to the Curley candidates in local contests. The candidate for mayor of Chelsea was found to have had 1,500 jobs placed at his disposal to fill in the week before election. Job tickets were handed out at Curley's campaign headquarters for work on state projects in cities that had failed to give him their support for governor.

The state's likeliest chance of relief from Curley is that the national Democratic tide which washed him up on Beacon Hill may run out far enough to leave him stranded. The record of the Curley administration is the great liability that the New Deal carries into the 1936 campaign in Massachusetts.

Is It Safe to Go to Sea?

BY M. R. BENDINER

SAILORS of the Panama-Pacific steamer California went out on strike a few weeks ago in an effort to get their monthly wage raised from $57.50 to $62.50. The walkout, which delayed for three days the sailing of the vessel from San Pedro, California, to New York, was an orderly affair, and as the boat was safely tied up at the dock no lives were endangered.

On the third day of the strike Secretary Perkins induced the men to return to their posts, promising to see that their demands were placed before a conference between the International Seamen's Union and the shippers, and also to use her "good offices" to prevent discrimination against them. The company seemed agreeable, and to all appearances the dispute was ended, with a minor victory chalked up for labor.

When the boat reached New York harbor some two weeks later, the complexion of things had been vastly altered. For several hours the line officials unaccountably delayed signing the men off. They were waiting, it later developed, for agents of the Department of Justice to board the ship and arrest the former strikers for mutiny—the gravest charge that can be brought against men of the sea. Since no G-men showed up, the disgruntled officials were forced to content themselves with logging the men from two to six days' pay and signing them off with discharge cards marked "D. R.," meaning "declined to report," the equivalent of being blacklisted for a seaman.

The Panama-Pacific officials had good reason to believe that government agents would be on hand when the boat docked at New York. For while the California was steaming up the coast, Secretary of Commerce Roper was begging the Department of Justice to prosecute the strike leaders for mutiny, a crime that carries a punishment of ten years' imprisonment. Roper said he had no concern at all with the demands of the men or the attitude of the line. Only one consideration had weight with him, and that was "the safety of passengers at sea." So fantastic and ruthless a move as a prosecution for mutiny was too much both for Secretary Perkins and for the Attorney General, and the men of the California were not clapped in irons. But the ferocity of "Uncle Dan" in fighting for sea safety was so remarkable that a review of his previous record in this connection is in order.

The licensing and periodic inspection of vessels of all sorts is the prime function of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, a subdivision of the Department of Commerce. Violations of maritime regulations ranging all the way from running a motor boat at night without lights to operating an ocean-going firetrap without inspection are handled by this arm of the government, and the opportunities for favoritism, graft, and politics are boundless. More than 10,000 appeals from penalties assessed for such violations pass through the Commerce Department in a year, and in a vast majority of cases the penalties are reduced more than 50 per cent, many of them being completely voided. Former Assistant Secretary of Commerce Mitchell once issued an order that except in unusual cases penalties were not to be reduced more than 90 per cent by bureau officials, but the order was overruled as too drastic.

First offenses are excused as a matter of principle. Second, third, and even tenth offenses, when the offender is a shipping corporation, are excused for other reasons. Usually appeals coming from the larger offenders are accompanied by a note from a Senator or Representative, and the remission of fines in such cases forms a major routine task of the department. Mitchell told the writer that during his tenure of office he received on his desk for signature scores of letters, prepared by subordinates, instructing collectors to remit fines, and scores more to Congressmen informing them that such action would be taken in accordance with their request. Mitchell's refusal to play ball with Congressmen in the cases of more flagrant violation unquestionably weighed heavily against him when he sought to convince a Senate investigating committee that he had been fired for fighting the graft and abuses which went on at a furious clip under the encouraging eye of Mr. Roper.

Far more serious than the petty corruption of this maritime traffic court is the Commerce Department's active cooperation with the shipping interests in frustrating every real attempt to introduce more stringent safety regulations in ship construction. The policy of the department under Roper has been characterized by the National Committee on Safety at Sea as one which "stifles information, conceals truth, warns against publicity, and discourages every effort looking toward a bettering of conditions." Roper has done nothing whatever to alter the chief principle of ship construction observed under his predecessors, including Herbert Hoover, to wit: Jam the greatest number of people into the least amount of space at the lowest possible cost.

The natural outcome of this greedy policy has been a series of sea disasters in recent years which were anything but acts of God. When the newly launched Segovia took fire in 1930, the ship had to be sunk to put out the fire. The Morro Castle in September, 1934, burned to a scorched mass with a loss of 122 lives. The Mohawk, a few months later, went down just outside New York harbor with a toll of 45 lives.

The Morro Castle, designed by Theodore F. Ferris for the Agwi Navigation Company, was built along lines which received the complete approval of the Bureau of Navigation—this despite the fact that even a cursory Senate investigation found it clear that "escapes should be provided on the port and on the starboard side of the vessel so that there would be an emergency escape in each section even though all fire-screen and watertight doors were closed." It was also clear to the committee that "had the Morro Castle been built and operated in full compliance with the Convention for Promoting Safety of Life at Sea . . . a very different result might have been expected." Concerning the Mohawk, this same committee found it "alarming to consider the laxity in requirements governing ship construction," and recorded its belief that "the government is at fault in failing to modernize its laws and to take its place with other powers in the promotion of safety of life at sea."

The Segovia fire was traced directly to the wooden insulation in the holds, designed to keep out the warmth of tropical waters. This same hazard is present in almost all the combination fruit and passenger vessels sailing between the United States and Latin American ports. All that would be needed to eliminate the fire menace would be a fire-proof lining laid on over the wood. Last February, in the course of a hearing before the House Merchant Marine Committee, Representative Ramspeck of Georgia asked Joseph B. Weaver, director of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, how many vessels under the American flag were fireproof. Weaver replied that the Manhattan and the Washington were "fire resisting," the "four aces of the Export Line" were "practically fireproof," and the four or five reconstructed freighters of the Scantic Line were "very good in that respect." Concerning the dozens of other vessels in the American merchant marine—silence.

A further point for Mr. Roper in connection with his concern for safety at sea is the fact, established by the Federal Communications Commission, that 1,500 non-passenger ships are without radio equipment. Another is the revelation made by Senator Copeland last June that 160 boats on inland waterways, on the Great Lakes, and in coastwise traffic are firetraps. And perhaps the unkindest cut of all is the charge brought by the National Committee on Safety at Sea that five of the six inspection boats operated by the Commerce Department itself are ancient, unsafe, constructed of wood, and run by gasoline engines.

If seamen who strike when a ship is in port endanger the safety of passengers at sea, what is to be said of manning vessels with crews picked up along the waterfront, men who can be had for a pittance because they are untrained in a seaman's duties? No small share of responsibility for the Morro Castle disaster was traced to this practice. Captain P. J. Williams, formerly master of an ocean vessel, in testifying before the Senate Commerce Committee, revealed a few tricks of the shipping trade in the field of labor. Captain Williams said:

In some ship lines operating on nearby foreign services, where they touch a number of ports outside of the United States, as soon as they arrive at a foreign port . . . they will hire natives to do sailors' work, and possibly they hire them at one port and they will carry them on what I call inter-port work . . . and then on the way back they will discharge those men. . . . We will say the certificate of the inspection service calls for 100 men in that crew, it is a full crew, and her total passenger accommodations are, say, 250. There are 350 souls altogether. The life-saving equipment is for that number of people, with a slight percentage over for the safety margin. When we come down and put 15 or 20 extra men on board there, the men have no lifeboat assignments, they have no fire stations, they are not required to attend fire or boat drill. . . . In the case of any emergency, where are those extra men going to go? They are going to chase the women out of the lifeboats; you are going to have confusion.

While Roper was using the full weight of his office to prevent inconveniences to the big ship lines and was in general acting as their errand boy in Washington, a few of his subordinates were taking their sworn duties more seriously. There was Ewing Y. Mitchell, for example, who charged that improper inspections contributed to the Morro Castle fire and who spoke of his "bitter conflict with the racketeers who are now boring from within the department." Mr. Mitchell embarrassed Roper with requests that the Steamboat Inspection Service be investigated by the Department of Justice. He succeeded, moreover, in having indictments brought against two steamboat inspectors whose names appeared regularly in the cash account of the master of a Lykes Brothers-Ripley ship with such notations as "To inspectors, $80" and "Gratuity, inspectors, $80." Undiscouraged by the fact that the inspectors were acquitted and transferred by the department to another port, Mitchell filed twenty-three separate charges against Admiral H. I. Cone, vice-president of the Shipping Board's merchant fleet. The Admiral subsequently resigned, but nothing was ever done about the charges. Then there was Thomas M. Woodward, who, like Mitchell, objected strenuously to Roper's order laying up the Leviathan without suspending the fat subsidy to its owners for the ship's operation.

More recently, Frederick L. Adams and Commander A. McCoy Jones were added to the list of protesting Commerce Department officials. Adams, who was chief investigator of the Bureau of Navigation, and Jones, who was the bureau's chief navigation officer, complained that their efforts to bring about increased safety at sea were being nullified by "higher-ups." The two officials were rash enough to release a report by supervising inspectors in which existing safety devices were condemned as inadequate. The Commerce Department, they contended, had deliberately attempted to prevent publication of the report.

Not one of these four guardians of safety at sea remains in the Department of Commerce. In June, 1935, Mitchell's services were terminated by Roosevelt, at Roper's request, in order to obtain "more effective supervision of certain bureaus of the Department of Commerce." When he announced his intention of staying in Washington to carry on his fight against shipping interests, Mitchell declares, he laid himself open to a prolonged campaign of persecution at the hands of the Administration. Not until the writer had gone to considerable trouble to prove he was not a government agent would Mr. Mitchell consent to talk. Ever since his dismissal, Mitchell charges, he has been shadowed by government men, and his telephone wires have frequently been tapped.

Mr. Woodward last October was quietly relieved of his post on the Shipping Board and given the harmless job of consumer's counsel to the National Bituminous Coal Commission.

Jones and Adams, who later accused their superiors of "successfully blocking efforts of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection to promote greater safety of life and property at sea," were subjected to shadowing and questioning in their own homes by Department of Justice detectives even while they were still in office. They were suspended on February 13 for talking out of turn and for refusing to answer questions, and despite an understanding that they would be reinstated after a temporary suspension, they were summarily discharged by Roper a few days later without so much as a hearing. Washington veterans could not recall a single previous instance of a federal employee accused of insubordination being denied a chance to defend himself.

Sea safety, it appears, is a subject reserved in the Commerce Department to the Secretary himself. And as long as Roper holds that post, no passenger on the high seas will be endangered, if Uncle Dan can help it, by sailors striking for $15 a week when their ships are in port.

Jesus Lopez

BY ERSKINE CALDWELL

JESUS LOPEZ was irrigating his half-acre onion crop on the ten-acre San Fernando Valley vegetable farm which he had under lease when a warrant for his arrest was served on him. His onions were finger-sized and full-topped. They were at the stage when a lot of care has to be taken with them. They have to be weeded, cultivated, and irrigated constantly in order to develop into profitable produce for the Southern California market.

The paper was thrust at him again. Jesus looked at his onions, at the warrant, and back at the onions. He stooped down and pulled up a plant, shaking the soil from its roots and pressing the stem between thumb and forefinger to feel the firmness of the young onion. The warrant had to be thrust at him a third time before he could believe there was anything in the world more important than a fine stand of spring onions.

In the middle of the ten-acre truck farm stood his house. Behind it was a shed, sheltering his two mules. Inside the house were his mother and father, on the outside were five brothers and five sisters. The twelve members of his family were watching him when he accepted the paper for his arrest and read it three times before raising his eyes.

Jesus Lopez had been ordered to appear at the police court in Burbank and defend himself against a complaint charging him with maintaining a public nuisance. The owner of a subdivision across the street, who happened to be a member of the City of Burbank Planning Commission, had signed the complaint. The real-estate dealer had bought the vacant, weed-grown tract across the street and intended to place the subdivision on the market.

When Jesus appeared for trial, he learned that the owner of the lots objected to the appearance of the Lopez home and to the outside toilet on the premises. Jesus himself objected to the appearance of the dwelling and to the outside toilet, but he had to live there until he could afford a better home. He told the court it was the best he could afford; he offered no other defense. He was convicted of the charge, sentenced, and fined, but both sentence and fine were suspended. Immediately afterward the City of Burbank, which had now become the unwilling prosecutor of one of its citizens, instituted civil proceedings in the Superior Court in a further effort to evict the Lopez family.

The dwelling in which the thirteen members of the Lopez family live is an unpainted but substantial frame house of five rooms, the interior of which is neat and clean. The City of Burbank issued Jesus Lopez a permit to move the building on to the farm more than a year ago. In issuing the permit for the dwelling, the city was certainly aware of the absence of sewerage facilities. Scattered throughout the city are similar residences, inhabited, which have the same type of outdoor toilet. The City of Burbank, like thousands of towns in every state in America, has built and installed with SERA and other public relief funds the same type of sanitary outhouse.

At the time the Lopez permit was issued, there was no objection from any quarter. The ten-acre tract of land was covered with weeds and brush, and the owner then, as now, was eager to have the tract cleared and cultivated. The family transformed an eyesore into an eye-pleasing square of growing vegetables. The fact that two mules and a cow were stabled on the premises was not unusual, since hundreds of these animals are kept on small farms throughout the city and valley. Two City Council members who inspected the place stated that not only could they find no reason for the nuisance charge, but on the contrary they found it in a far more sanitary condition than most of the farms in the vicinity.

Two years ago the Lopez family of thirteen was on relief. Jesus Lopez had a job with the SERA. He saved three dollars, gave up his job, and began raising vegetables for the local market. His crop turned out well, and he signed a two-year lease for the ten-acre tract from which he is now threatened with eviction. He bought two mules on credit, and paid for them. He has kept his rent paid up. He bought a two-ton truck on credit, and is paying for it with monthly instalments. He has supported his parents and ten brothers and sisters. The owner of the land on which he lives refused to evict the family, and he was made a codefendant on the public-nuisance charge filed by the real-estate owner and the City of Burbank.

If efforts to evict the family are successful, Jesus will have to move and pay rent on a second dwelling. But perhaps his greatest loss will be his growing crop of vegetables. If forced from the farm, he will run the risk of having his entire crop destroyed and stolen by the prevalent truck-garden thieves, who could wipe out his onions, lettuce, carrots, beets, celery, and peas in one night. Jesus, who has no money to employ lawyers for his defense, is not able to hire guards to protect his ten acres of vegetables while living somewhere else in the valley.

Jesus Lopez, twenty-three years old, of Mexican descent, was raised within a quarter of a mile of his present home. He is well educated, and above the average American in intelligence. He sees clearly that the action against him is directed by one man, the real-estate owner who wishes to raise the prices of his building lots by running all the agricultural workers out of the vicinity. Lopez does not accept the situation without protest. He resents the implication that his family is no better than a pen of cows.

In a larger sense there is kinship between the case of Jesus Lopez and the Los Angeles Police Border Patrol. The kinship exists in the California trend toward a certain kind of treatment of what it is pleased to call undesirable citizens. The undesirable citizen, especially in Southern California, is one who does not report an income in the higher brackets. It is not absolutely necessary for a transient to spend $90 a day at a Palm Springs hotel, or for a Hollywood executive to spend $500 a day at the Santa Anita racetrack, but it helps. What does not help, as almost any local money-grabber will tell you, is the increasing numbers of little fellows in Southern California. He will tell you that a man who makes a bare living, whether working a ten-acre truck farm or running a five-cow dairy, is not profitable. What he means to say is that the real-estate dealer cannot class the worker-who-is-just-getting-by as a prospect, and without prospects the subdivider cannot raise his prices.

The outcome of the action against Jesus Lopez will directly affect the welfare of several thousand working-class families in San Fernando Valley. If the real-estate interests are successful in their efforts to run the Lopez family out of its home, it means that every family of truck farmers from Glendale to San Fernando will be at the mercy of land-boom experts who think they see more dollars for their lots with the workers out of sight.

The entire valley is at present afflicted with a mild real-estate boom, and no one who lives on the earth and tills it for a living will be safe from the subdividers. If the agricultural workers are driven out of San Fernando Valley, the only direction in which they can turn is toward the ragged, half-fed army of California's migratory agricultural workers. These are the homeless men, women, and children who follow the maturing crops from Imperial Valley down the San Joaquin Valley to the Sacramento fruit lands. This army already numbers many thousands, far too many to gather the crops. The recent stranding of two thousand migratory workers in the vicinity of Santa Maria, where they lived for three weeks in tents and huts on the verge of starvation because rains had washed out the pea crop they were called to pick, is ample proof that the evicted San Fernando Valley agricultural worker will find his condition going from bad to worse.

Spain Mobilizes for Revolution

BY ANITA BRENNER

WHEN a people is in the process of shifting its entire social and economic structure; when that process, as in Russia in 1917 and in Spain in 1936, is expressed in a great number and variety of small daily struggles, accumulating and deepening as part of a major transformation and in preparation for the definitive wrench, history needs reporters who can read and write its dynamic language.

But the young men hired to send us cables about riots and fires and Cabinet changes in Spain do not seem to know that an extraordinary spectacle is unrolling itself before their eyes. The world of labor, in which the cumulative rhythm of approaching revolution beats ever louder, is an unknown hinterland to them. They disapprove of it; therefore they ignore it, and get their news about it from deliberately blurred reports picked out of the anti-labor press. And this news, which is more important than any other for a knowledge of what is happening and what is going to happen in Spain, we receive in reports made up of rumor, panic, and outright Hearstiana.

Yet even the scared correspondent of the New York Times, whose candidate for Spanish messiah is the clerico-fascist Gil Robles and whose recipe for salvation is the cross and sword in "a strong dictatorship that will put down and control the unruly masses," lets through items whose basic significance no one can misunderstand. Item: mass intervention, immediately after the left-front electoral victory, to free the 30,000 political prisoners jailed in connection with the uprising of October, 1934. Item: mass action, again independent of parliamentary machinery, on the land—seizure of estates by landworkers and peasants. Item: seizure by miners, railway workers, and factory workers of a number of enterprises threatening shut-downs. Item: strikes to force the reinstatement of workers fired at the time of the October revolt (promised, like amnesty and agrarian reform, in the electoral program).

Mass interference, mass action, for its own ends and indifferent to the functioning of parliament and authorities, friendly as they are supposed to be, is the most remarkable thing now to be observed in Spain. It is not a direct attack on the government; the government is simply shelved. Nor does this action follow any special program. It breaks out in all sorts of incidents, in response to local events and conditions. What is important about it now is not what it does, sporadically and haphazardly, but the mood of increasing impatience and increasing self-confidence it indicates and nourishes.

The pervading sense of it, its quality like a high wind or a flood, more than any other thing shapes daily political history; fear of it on the one hand, and on the other the emotion of power. Censorship notwithstanding, there is almost nothing else but reflections of it in the Spanish press. It is expressed in street scenes, cafe conversations; it echoes over and over in scrawled excited letters that carry details like this: Barcelona—demonstration fired on by Assault Guards, several workers wounded, one, member of the Nin-Maurin Partido Obrero, killed. The funeral announcement is suppressed. But an enormous contingent turns out, swarms in the main streets, and police up to several thousand are massed quietly parallel. All the workers' organizations send delegations. The coffin is carried in the arms of Socialist, Communist, and Workers' Party youth. The Catalan authorities send representatives, who are put at the tail of the line, feel insulted, leave, nobody notices. As the procession marches, hundred of people fall into line. It is saluted from the sidewalks, doors, windows, with the clenched fist. It turns into the workers' quarter, goes down the Paralelo toward the port, and at the edge of the water the coffin is halted and all afternoon the mourners pass. They say goodbye to Pujol, heads bared, singing the "Internationale" in a low, monotonous voice.

The overflow of revolutionary energy began with the January elections that placed the "Men of the Republic" in parliament and in power. This campaign was understood not as a fight for something, but against something; against fascism. And, politically, fascism was crippled, perhaps crushed. But the victory was not won in the pre-election campaign; it was determined by the October revolt of a year before.

There is more to see in these elections than the immediate political fact—a somewhat rapid republican-labor coalition, urged by Azaña and right-wing Socialist leaders and accepted by all labor organizations in order to insure the defeat of the parties allied in what they themselves call the "counter-revolutionary front." Owing to Spain's complicated electoral laws an organized minority coalition can defeat a disunited majority, as happened in 1933. At that time the "anti-Marxist" Lerroux-Gil Robles alliance put the government into the hands of a weak and fabulously corrupt gang of republicans, designed, by Gil Robles's plan, to wear out the republic and do for Gil Robles what von Papen did for Hitler. At that time also, the Azaña-Socialist government had lost all sympathy. It had done a great deal for the land and city workers on paper, but in fact had not hesitated to suppress demands for land and labor reform, even with arms. It had shot workers down, had passed laws jeopardizing and in some cases canceling civil liberties, had organized a special police corps for "labor duty."

In the elections of 1933 the left republicans were split into a number of factions, all of which ran separate tickets. The labor parties ran separate tickets, too; and a large number of workers, Anarcho-Syndicalists, either refrained from voting or voted the Lerroux ticket as a blow against the Socialists. The result was a prelude for fascism. Feudal machinery was moved back in, municipal governments—the majority in left-republican and labor hands—were arbitrarily dismantled, land and labor laws were revoked or simply ignored, labor organizations were dissolved and persecuted, civil liberties were suspended, and martial law became the customary form of rule.

It was the intention of Gil Robles to finish the job overtly by taking power in October, 1934, with President Alcalá Zamora in the Hindenburg role. The republicans did exactly as much to stop him as the German Social Democrats did to stop Hitler. Even in the critical days when his triumph seemed inevitable and imminent, they spent most of their time and energy trying to persuade the workers to take things quietly. In Barcelona Azaña begged the left-republican Catalanist government not to do anything rash, and the government in turn asked the same of the workers. Moreover, when the republicans finally made a big gesture of defiance, they took care to disarm the workers and at the same time held the enraged peasantry outside Barcelona.

Wherever labor organizations were controlled by right-wing Socialists and closely allied to the republicans, the fascists moved in with nothing to stop them but oratory. But wherever labor had broken with the republicans, and had begun to cohere into workers' councils representing all labor organizations and led only by labor, the fascists had to fight for whatever they could get, and some liberty and labor strength were salvaged. In Asturias, where the workers' councils had developed most completely, the miners easily took over the entire region and held it for many days. Lerroux and Gil Robles had to get Moors and foreign legionaries from Morocco to suppress them. It was the most appallingly brutal chapter in the history of Spain. Hundreds of workers were shot; thousands were jailed. Yet this worst of all defeats was the beginning of a victory, because the narrow margin by which the government saved itself kept Gil Robles out of power. Neither he nor Lerroux dared take the risk implicit in the Asturias warning.

The ingredients of the present situation are conditioned therefore by three records: first, the record of the Socialist-republican coalition government in power during the first two and a half years of the republic—its failure to solve any of the urgent national problems—land, unemployment, civil liberties, regional and municipal self-government; second, the record of the 1933 elections—the electoral defeat of labor through disunity, opening the door to fascist dictatorship; third, the record of October—the defeat of fascism through militant united-front labor action, independent of the republicans.

From these elements derives the conflict now going on in every labor and peasant organization, which is reflected in the struggle within the government itself. It is the struggle to determine whether labor is to act again, as in 1931-33, as the strength behind a republican, bourgeois government to solidify a bourgeois, liberal democracy; or whether, as in October, it is to act as a united force for social revolution and to put its own government in power. This struggle is expressed in the formation of two organizations. One is the "Popular Front," which now exists chiefly in the electoral pact that guaranteed a labor-republican coalition for the purpose of winning the elections on a strictly bourgeois, immediate program. The pact, too long to be quoted here, is an important document, the cornerstone of the present government.

The strongest supporters of the "Popular Front" are, first, the liberal republicans, of whom Azaña is the outstanding leader. Their reasons are life-and-death reasons. Without labor support they cannot possibly remain in power unless they scrap their liberal program and ally themselves with the right, as the right hopes they will do, repeating the pattern of Lerroux. But to retain labor support they have to be prepared to go beyond their electoral program, beyond even the most liberal of bourgeois ideas. They must solve the emergency problem of some six million peasants and landworkers, and this can be done only by expropriations that would split the entire capitalist structure. They cannot buy the land—the government is bankrupt.

Moreover, they must somehow satisfy the security and wage demands of the urban proletariat. This also they cannot do within the present system, without money. At the same time they are committed to the meticulous protection of all property rights, and that position compels them to do as they did in 1931-33—worry first and always about how to prevent revolution rather than about how to carry out reforms. That, again, they put this first is evident in a number of significant measures: censorship, martial law, and especially the postponement of municipal elections, which would have resulted in an overwhelming labor majority in the key machinery of Spanish government, the local powers. A further indication of this anxiety is the dismissal of Zamora and the substitution of a relatively unimportant presidential election for municipal elections.

The Azaña government is committed to the repression of revolution, as the right press recognizes with rejoicing, and as Azaña himself has repeated in a number of speeches. Its labor supporters, the believers in the Popular Front, either have to indorse that position implicitly or break with Azaña and precipitate a class battle. These supporters are, most prominently, the right-wing Socialist leaders, such as Indalecio Prieto, who like Azaña are much more interested in preventing proletarian revolution than in any other single problem. They cannot act on their own doctrines because at heart, like Social Democrats of their sort the world over, they have no confidence in the capacities and intelligence of the working class. These people are the bureaucratic backbone of the Socialist organizations, which are the most powerful labor organizations in Spain. They are the ones who saw to it that the coalition tickets carried a majority of republicans, in spite of the fact that the majority of the votes were unquestionably labor.

The most unreserved supporters of the Popular Front policy are the leaders of the Communist Party. Like the right-wing Socialists, they oppose independent labor action and believe, or say they believe, that the Azaña government is basically labor's friend.

The opposing side crystallizes around the Alianza Obrera (workers' councils) movement, which springs primarily from the labor and peasant rank and file. All the labor organizations have to indorse it, but the Nin-Maurin Partido Obrero, leading labor party in Catalonia, is actually the only one that recognizes the two—the Popular Front coalition and the Alianza Obrera—as antagonistic alternatives. The Anarcho-Syndicalist workers, numerically second in power to the Socialists, are in general sympathetic to the Alianza Obrera and opposed to the coalition, but their leaders are split on the question of Alianza Obrera support because there is nothing in the world they hate so much as cooperation with Socialists. They have much to forgive, it is true. Yet in Asturias they gave full support to the Alianza, and they now recognize that because they did give it, and everybody else did likewise, the workers won their battle.

The Alianza Obrera movement is reflected in a number of other tendencies: movements for trade-union unity on a bargained democratic basis; movements to organize workers' militias, as is being done very quietly throughout Spain; movements, even, to organize military nuclei within the army and certain police corps, which is also being done but how extensively no one can be quite sure; and, finally, slogans and policies aimed at direct action of the sort described at the beginning of this article, with which the enormous majority of the Spanish peasants and workers are in complete sympathy.

The object of the Alianza Obrera movement and of all the related activities is nothing less than organization and preparation for Socialist revolution in the immediate future, which may mean in weeks or in months. It is largely spontaneous and so powerful that the fascists, to head it off, are engaging in a terrorist campaign in order to provoke so much fear and instability that the generals will be pushed into a coup d'état. It is very likely that some such attempt, comparable to the Russian "July days," will be made in the immediate future, the date depending on the rapidity with which the organization of labor for revolution progresses.

There is one chance in a thousand that the Azaña government will be able to consolidate a liberal-republican democracy. There are perhaps two chances in ten that the right will crush labor and the liberals and instal its dictatorship. The other eight chances are in favor of a victorious Socialist revolution.

France Votes for the Future

By M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, April 21, by Cable

NEXT Sunday the French people will go to the polls to choose a new Parliament. Whatever the outcome, the day will mark an epoch in European history. Not since the spring of 1789 has the political atmosphere, despite outward calm, been so electrical. For this is no ordinary election. The issue is whether the country shall progress toward unraveling the problems created by the Industrial Revolution or slide back to a new feudalism, a new dark age, by conferring despotic powers on a decadent economic regime.

The voters understand this well. For them there are only two parties in the contest. Whether the citizen marks a ballot for the Radical Socialists, the Socialists, or the Communists he will really vote for the reforms outlined in the program of the Front Populaire published in January. Doubtless from force of habit he will designate an individual; actually his vote will be less for a candidate or a party than for principles. Similarly if he is supporting the right it is immaterial whether his choice falls upon the moderates, the so-called left republicans, or the Republican Federation. In any case his vote will record his sovereign will to sit tight or take chances with fascism.

Unfortunately the leaders on both sides of the battle-line manifest less clear-cut realism. Of the right it is wasting words to speak at all. To begin with, until a month ago the nationalists had not one idea to offer to the country. Hitler having on March 7 providentially supplied them with an issue, they echo the Communist menace and unsmilingly pretend that the Soviets and the Front Populaire are plotting a European conflagration. Never before were reactionaries so profoundly interested in a foreign country as the French Tories are in Spain today. Lurid tales in the yellow press interpret Azaña's efforts to repress the fascists as revolutionary disorders. But all attempts to build a national front against the Front Populaire have ended in failure, even in riots. Their sole hope as far as the election is concerned consists in detaching the Radical Socialists from the Front Populaire. Le Temps prints daily appeals to their traditions and sheds tears over their unnatural alliance with subversive elements. Meanwhile Laval labors underground urging his friends to give a plurality to the Communists or Socialists; he hopes to defeat the left by these tactics, the assumption being that Radicals will not vote for Marxists on the second ballot.

The Front Populaire sets out for the fray with at least a semblance of unity. The members of its component parties not only share memories of common struggles and the consciousness of common dangers; the masses behind them not only fraternize in demonstrations and inter-party groupings throughout the country; their leaders have succeeded in forging a central body as well as in drawing up a common program approved by all the member organizations. It is around this program that confusion reigns.

Two questions of vital importance remain unanswered and a third has been decided negatively to the regret of all left voters. To dispose of the latter first: earlier it was proposed to run common candidates. This was actually done in a recent senatorial by-election. In a popular election for the Chamber of Deputies the plan was doubtless unreliable for constitutional and other reasons. Anyhow the Radicals, Socialists, and Communists are going before the country each with a full list of candidates. The balloting of April 26 is looked upon as a sort of primary. On May 3 the Front Populaire will return to its original idea when the parties will withdraw their separate candidates in favor of the left rival who has received the highest vote. In view of the great number of Laval Radicals the question arises whether party discipline will in all cases prevail.

More important, only a week before the election the question of the future ministry remains unsettled. The Radicals have repeatedly warned that they will not take power alone as in 1932. Although the Socialists declare themselves ready to enter a ministry, the attitude of the Communists is still uncertain. While opposed in principle to collaboration with bourgeois parties under a capitalist regime, they will accept portfolios if "the government is something other than the usual log-rolling parliamentary combination and relies for support in executing its pledges on the great masses of the people assembled under the banner of the Front Populaire." Events alone can determine whether this condition will be met.

But it is over the program that polemics continue to rage. It is worth noting that the achievement of the program was chiefly due to the persistence and moderation of the Communists, whose formula "Difference of opinion, unity of action" has prevailed. They were determined to win the adherence of the Radicals, the largest party. Thus it is that in the contest each party goes before the voters with its own platform, the common program becoming obligatory only in the ballot of May 3. A few weeks ago a Socialist member of the Front Populaire committee suggested that each candidate be requested to pledge his approval of the program and his support of the government formed to execute it. Surprisingly enough, the Communists, eager not to alienate the Radicals by seeming to dictate to them, rejected the proposal.

Despite these controversies the victory of the left, thanks to popular enthusiasm, is generally believed certain on May 3 if not next Sunday. The reactionaries show by their agitation, their solemn warnings, their mobilization of fascist gangs that they expect a beating. But the real question, assuming a left victory, is what will the leaders do with it. To this a second article will attempt to reply.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

AT LAST we have a clearing-house and coordinator for the many peace organizations of the country. The National Peace Conference, which is holding its first meeting in Washington in the week of April 21, represents some thirty-five national anti-war societies or associations which are especially interested in improving international relations before the world is finally wrecked by war and the armament madness. The purpose of the conference is to avoid duplication of effort, to bring about a united peace front as far as that is possible, to develop a unity of program, and above all to make the peace movement more realistic and much harder hitting than ever before. This conference has been in an experimental stage for some three years. Now, as a result of impetus given to it at a meeting called by Nicholas Murray Butler, it is well on the way to accomplishing its purpose. It is emphatically not another peace organization. It is the agency of the bodies which comprise its membership, each of which has two representatives in the conference. It makes suggestions and offers programs. It informs its member societies what the different organizations are doing so that they may cooperate if they desire. It will probably publish soon a bulletin of information. It will, of course, sponsor mass-meetings, and it is already carrying on a radio campaign. It will voice its opinions and issue the usual press releases and engage in the usual open and above-board peace propaganda—activities which have already caused that noble, honorable, and high-minded American William Randolph Hearst to go into spasms.

The conference has appointed a number of committees and doubtless will appoint more. It is getting in touch with sympathetic persons who are distinguished in the fields of international law and international relations in order to have the benefit of their advice. It is especially interested in matters of national defense, and recently published the protest of more than 700 prominent men and women against the mad rush in Congress to militarize the country by voting billion-dollar appropriations for army and navy. To list the organizations which have thus far joined would take most of my remaining space, but it is worth while to point out that conservative and radical peace organizations are at last under the same banner, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, for example, together with the Fellowship of Reconciliation and the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, the National Council for the Prevention of War, the League of Nations Association, the World Peace Foundation, the National Council of the Y. M. C. A., and many others equally well known. Frankly, nothing has given me greater hope for the peace movement except the extraordinary turning to it of youth in the universities and colleges of the land—the National Student Federation is naturally a member of the Peace Conference.

Indeed, the more I travel around the country the more I am impressed by the great strength of the peace sentiment. The insistence upon new neutrality legislation, the determination that this country shall not take part in the next European war, the clear understanding on the part of the people that our going into the last war was an unmitigated calamity—all these things convince me that if this sentiment could only be organized it would exert a tremendous influence and bring Washington to book—especially that astute politician in the White House who has been so rapidly militarizing the country without in the least taking the country into his confidence about it. It was especially gratifying to read that a strong delegation from the People's Mandate Against War has followed the Peace Conference's lead and has demanded of the Democrats in Congress that they return to the platform of 1932 in this matter of large military expenditures; it has also asked the Republican leaders who are crying out so vociferously for economy and a balanced budget why they have not demanded economy in the matter of armaments.

All this merely reinforces the point that the time had more than come for a coordination of the peace forces. And it is not merely the money side of it of which I am thinking. I am far more concerned with our building up the professional military and naval group than with the billions we are squandering. Dorothy Bromley in the World-Telegram has just reported a conversation with a naval officer in Washington who told her that this country ought to have a dictator, that Mussolini was the greatest living man, and that the final word on all American foreign affairs should be in the hands of the military branches of the government! There is loyalty to the Republic for you. Nor is this an exceptional opinion. Anybody who knows how military opinion is running in Washington can tell of other officers who talk in this way. Secretary Ickes has said that the spearhead of fascism in this country is appearing in the effort to muzzle and control college and school teachers. I think a much more dangerous spearhead is to be found in Washington in military and naval circles.

Finally I must not fail to add that the National Peace Conference has been extremely fortunate in getting Dr. Walter W. Van Kirk as director. Long associated with the Federal Council of Churches and an admirable interpreter of religious news over the radio, he has established the national office of the conference at 8 West Fortieth Street, New York, where full information as to the work may be obtained. It deserves to grow into the most important and influential body of all those seeking to preserve our peace, our institutions, and our very civilization.

BROUN'S PAGE

WHEN one has lost a case in court it is customary to cuss the judge and take an appeal. A jury trial is different. Twelve good men and true can be just as wrong as one and readily twice as stupid. And yet the wronged defendant who protests may seem to be attacking that citadel of our liberties known as trial by jury.

It is the best we have and it can be pretty terrible. I have in mind twelve men and women of assorted sizes resident in the city of Milwaukee. Somebody may think that he has known a dumber jury, but I challenge him to prove it. But what does it avail me to carry on in this fashion? Even if any portion of this attack came to the eyes of any member of the benighted twelve, my revenge would not be furthered since this article is not illustrated with pictures.

Illiteracy in regard to labor cases is not uncommon among juries, but it was strange to find twelve persons in Milwaukee who seemed to be wholly ignorant in regard to the matter of mass picketing. And yet they were sensitive enough to mass testimony. Three newspapermen were on trial. The other guild members were accused of disorderly conduct, and I was charged with interfering with an officer. The case of the prosecution consisted simply of producing one policeman after another who told precisely the same story down to the last detail. But not a single juror tumbled to the fact that no such united front of testimony can be achieved except by careful rehearsal. Judge, prosecutor, and all the court attendants were startled when the jury returned with a verdict of guilty.

The portion of the hostile testimony which irked me most was the repeated assertion of the police that I had exclaimed in a loud voice, "What in hell do you have to do to get pinched in this town?" I would much rather invent my wisecracks myself than leave that task to the police of any city. And Milwaukee isn't even in the big leagues.

Of course we of the defense made some serious mistakes in strategy. We had no right to assume that there was any intelligence in that jury. I never did like the woman in the purple hat. I think we should have used one of our challenges against her. She looked more hostile and less alert than the others in the panel, which is a pretty severe indictment. It is interesting to watch people when your fate is more or less in their hands. Probably lawyers may become expert at guessing, but it seemed to me a sheer gamble. You can't get the element of chance out of trial by jury. Given the most progressive community in the world, and it may be the hard luck of some defendant to find himself looking into twenty-four imbecilic eyes. Jurors, like dice, can run against you.

It is second guessing, of course, but I now believe we made a mistake to sum up. Our lawyer called me "a nationally known newspaperman" and indulged in other compliments. I think that was bad for this particular jury. After all, they had seen me sitting in front of them all morning, and they probably said to themselves, "He may, bad cess to him, be a nationally known newspaperman, but we'll show him where he gets off in tangling with the cop-pers of Milwaukee."

Still these are superficial things. The judge probably hurt us most of all. He kept insisting that it was not a labor case and that picketing was not the issue. Sharply he shut off most of the testimony about the manner in which the police attacked the line and tried to smash it. He would have the jury believe that arguments and clashes occurred in a vacuum without any rhyme or reason, and of course he had a jury fit to save Tinker Bell from dying. This was a jury ready to believe anything.

His Honor was very cranky at the morning session and quite a bit more affable in the afternoon. That frequently happens with judges. I have almost come to believe that there should not be any morning sessions where labor cases are concerned. I met the old judge while the jury was out deliberating. He comes from Beaverdam, Wisconsin, and he thinks that labor unions are terrible things. I think the name is Davies. That may not be right, but it doesn't matter. In fact, I intend to make no effort to check up. All through the trial he kept calling me "Brown."

I wouldn't say that Judge David was actually prejudiced against urban communities. On the contrary, Beaverdam's most noted jurist presented himself to me as more or less a cosmopolite. Once he had sat in a case concerning Gilda Grey, the shimmy dancer. He granted her a divorce. When he went to New York a whole year later Miss Grey found out about it and sent the judge two tickets for her show. These tickets were absolutely free and had little holes in them as if pierced with birdshot. They were in the seventh row on an aisle. Judge Duffy thinks that Gilda Grey is quite a dancer. There's something mysterious and primitive about her, he says. Unfortunately, I didn't have the privilege of hearing any more because right at that point our primitive jury came strolling in with their mysterious verdict.

But granted that juries are often stupid, I think the blame lies elsewhere. When a judge says, "Now stick to the case," he really means ignore the essentials. From a technical point of view I suppose he had the right to tell the jury that the merits of the guild strike against Hearst were not relevant, but from the point of view of ordinary common sense even an intelligent juror cannot pass on a labor case without knowing the issues and the background. Those are the true fundamentals. Indeed, sometimes I think there is a subtle recognition of that. It well may be that guild members are being tried not for "interfering with an officer" but for interfering with William Randolph Hearst.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

BOOKS and the ARTS

JOHN REED: NO LEGEND

BY MAX LERNER

ONE of the best ways to damn a man, if you can't ignore him or vilify him outright, is to build a legend around him. That makes him a hazy and unreal figure and takes the edge off whatever sharp meaning his life might otherwise have. John Reed was a dangerous man. His life traced a pattern which, if it were followed by other middle-class lives, would burst the bounds of our entire present social system. And so those who have feared him, unable to fight his influence in any other way, have welcomed the chance to make him incredible. They have called him wild, irresponsible, reckless; dubbed him—and the name has stuck—a playboy; underscored his pranks and amours; mocked the bewildering succession of his plans and projects; damned him not with faint but with exaggerated praise for his versatility, so that the versatile passed by innuendo into the superficial; marveled at his all-seeing reporter's eye, the implication being that what was all eye could scarcely be much brain; endowed him with seven-league boots for bestriding all the roads and oceans of the world; condescended to his Faustian thirst for life. Thus they have made of him an unreal mythical figure instead of a lusty life-sized man. Walter Lippmann set the pattern as early as 1914, four years after they were both out of college, in his article on "Legendary John Reed," and Reed's enemies have followed the pattern, as his friends have often stumbled into it.

Granville Hicks has now written a biography of Reed* which has, among many merits, that of making him credible. It required restraint to do this, for the legend is deeply rooted, and Reed's life was indeed fertile soil for such a growth. An Oregon boy of good family and considerable means, one of the possessors of the earth, educated at the fashionable private schools and at Harvard—such a boy becomes a rough-and-tumble war correspondent, labor journalist, radical poet, war resister; and after witnessing and describing the "ten days that shook the world" in the October revolution, he stands trial for sedition in America, helps organize an underground American revolutionary party, and finally at thirty-three dies of typhus in Moscow and is buried with honors in the Kremlin.

What made it an important as well as an exciting life? Not merely Reed's unquenchable desire for experience. Through all its apparent gyrations it had order, sequence, an inner logic. Actually it was one of the most deadly serious attempts ever made by an American to organize his experience into something that had meaning and stature. If Reed's story is seen that way—the story of a middle-class boy and of how he is educated by events, how he is led by an unswerving instinct to break with his class and his past, how he explores every channel of rebellion and innovation until finally he throws his lot in with a workers' collectivism—it takes on a meaning that places it high in the history of the American consciousness.

Reed had to an enormous degree a life-affirming quality. He was a long time in discovering it, as he was in finding himself at all. He had first to pass through the phase of negative rebellions against the culture around him. Then came a period of crisis and uncertainty, precipitated by the war. And finally, in his last and revolutionary phase, came a sense of peace and discipline. But throughout his life the pattern that we may trace is the growing affirmation of joyous, human values. Prodigal in his own talents and resources and prodigal in spending himself, he felt stifled in a world where the sort of freedom and experience he wanted was not accessible to all.

It was probably at Harvard, at once the citadel of social orthodoxy and the breeding-ground of intellectual dissenters, that Reed first became restlessly aware of the cleavage which it would take the rest of his life to heal. And yet he left college essentially unscarred, and his cattleboat trip to Europe, his adventures in Paris and Spain brought him back to New York determined to make a million and get married. His discovery of New York was what every Western boy and every Harvard poet has reenacted—the warm polyglot life of the city, the sweet sense of personal freedom, the reckless spending of oneself in its pursuit. But he discovered also social misery and oppression, and his energies took the form of an increasingly bitter indictment of middle-class culture because it stifled life. It was this that led him inevitably to break with the successful New York literary groups, join the staff of the Masses, turn with sympathy to the Mexican peons whom he learned to know as a war correspondent. But the more nomadically he wandered about the world, the more restlessly he explored the possibilities of love and adventure the more doubtful his solutions and successes seemed to him.

Contact with the labor movement was not enough. He was still, even as master of ceremonies at the Paterson pageant in Madison Square Garden, essentially the John Reed who was cheer leader at Harvard the year when Hamilton Fish was captain of the football team. He had got a sense of the possibilities of the common man from his experiences with Villa's jacquerie. He had been labor journalist as well as war correspondent, and the Ludlow massacre had left its mark on him. But it was not enough. The American entrance into war found him troubled, indecisive, discouraged—world weary at twenty-nine.

*"John Reed: The Making of a Revolutionary." By Granville Hicks. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

To a considerable extent the Russian Revolution resolved his personal crisis. What had been troubling him was that, despite his clear recognition that capitalist culture was life-denying rather than life-affirming, he could not get any conviction that the workers were any better or different. He ate his heart out at their lack of courage and spirit, at the docility with which they allowed themselves in every country to be herded into the war-pens and butchered there, at the bewildered way in which they accepted conscription in America; at their fear of finding out how hard a policeman's club could really hit. But in Russia he found that it was the workers and the soldiers and the peasants who stood fast in the great emergencies of those ten days and who won the revolution.

Thus through all his wanderings and explorations Reed was led, by some hard and uncanny inner sense, to discover truths and solutions that remained hidden from wiser minds than his, like Lincoln Steffens's, and from subtler minds, like Walter Lippmann's. He often got the right answers on the basis of the wrong reasons. Part of his genius lay in his being so terribly unfooled. "This is not our war," he kept saying, when everyone else was getting lost in a maze of sophistry and propaganda. He was no thinker but a man of action. But it was his good fortune to be led to the most desirable of all fates for a man of action who is also a writer and a poet—the chance at once to write history and to make it.

It is this emphasis on freedom and action and joyousness—almost this obsession of Reed's with them—that gives his life its importance for us and makes the incidents of it credible. Reed died thinking he had found in communism a solution not only for himself but for the workers and the creative everywhere. How deep his communism was is a question that is difficult to answer. He probably understood communism only as he understood everything else—as a verifiable part of his own experience. Whether he would have stayed with communism is an even more difficult question. Could his restless spirit have disciplined itself to withstand the weariness and the bitter disappointments of the years that have elapsed since his death? That question need not be answered. His experience went deeper than communism. It raised, without answering in any final way, the basic question of how to secure the generous and expansive values of life for all men—a problem in solving which communism may prove, as individualism has proved, a historical episode.

John Reed was a great journalist and, when he could be genuinely a part of all that he met, a first-rate writer. Already he has become for the thinking minority of our young people in and out of the colleges the most evocative figure we have produced—terribly close to them, moved by their impulses, confronted by their dilemmas. Mr. Hicks's book should get the Pulitzer prize for biography; for its theme and for the moving yet scholarly and restrained way in which it is handled, for the mastery with which the author shows Reed coming to maturity amid the attractions and tensions of life in a bewildering era. It should get the prize, but it will not. That, too, is part of John Reed's story.

Moments

Ezra Pound Is Interrupted in His Daily Devotions

BOOKS

Planning and Slums

CITY PLANNING: HOUSING. Vol. I. HISTORICAL AND SOCIOLOGICAL. By Werner Hegemann. Architectural Book Publishing Company. $3.75.

WHAT the reader expects when he opens a book on city planning and housing is a succession of idealized plans, contrasted with the ugliness and inconveniences of the haphazard actualities; charts and graphs and statistics of disease, crime, accidents; calculations of cost and benefit. In his earlier works Dr. Hegemann has given us much excellent material of this kind. But in the present volume he has devoted himself wholly to the historical, sociological, and economic background of planning in America. Long and bitter experience had taught him that even the best-conceived and most workable city-planning projects are destined to remain on paper.

The city planner proposes, but the realtor disposes. For behind the real-estate operator stands the financial institution; behind the financial institution, an economic system dominated exclusively by the profit motive and a political system abjectly subservient to business. Until the obstructive power of these forces has been broken, rational city planning must remain a vain hope. Effective city planning must follow upon successful national planning.

But national planning, it is commonly assumed, is out of harmony with American tradition. Dr. Hegemann brings forward abundant evidence to prove that the founders of the republic hoped to build a nation which should be rationally ordered, liberated from the hampering traditions, privileges, and disabilities of the Old World. The Constitution itself was a rationally planned document, not an adaptation of any existing scheme of government supposed to embody the wisdom of age-old experience. The capital of the nation was to be carefully planned; by systematic planning of transportation the western country was to be developed and connected indissolubly with the capital and the seaboard cities. All the great statesmen of the early republic—Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, Gallatin—were essentially national planners. They looked with friendly eyes upon private initiative merely as a force which good policy would utilize for the work of state building. But if private interests stood in the way of a public purpose the "Fathers" would not have hesitated to destroy them.

In the upheaval of the Civil War and the decades immediately following, American statecraft was pushed into the background by the rising power of the great corporations, which built, destroyed, won out, or failed without the least concern for the nation over whose body they were fighting. We have had Presidents of the old school like Wilson and the two Roosevelts who have wished to subordinate big business to plans for the national welfare, but their struggle with private interests has been on the whole a losing one. In consequence we have an economic system characterized by a maximum of insecurity for the working class, a vast, disorderly growth of cities, one-third of our population inadequately, even indecently housed. And it is a dictum accepted by conservatives and radicals alike that nowhere in the field of private interests can we find the motives and resources capable of rehousing the working class.

In this situation Dr. Hegemann sees a serious danger to American institutions. This third of our population that must live under degrading conditions in the slums or on barren hill farms is exactly the material required by a Hitler or a Lenin. People who see their children languishing in a sunless slum tenement, or being drawn irresistibly toward vice or crime, are not likely to stand up against the temptations of a demagogue who promises everything. Dr. Hegemann recurs again and again to the analogy between the slum dweller and the slave. When slaves are too numerous a servile insurrection is in the offing.

By the same analogy the owner of slum property is a slave driver. We emancipated the slaves without compensation to the owners, on the ground that property in slaves is essentially immoral. Property in disease-breeding tenements is equally immoral, according to Dr. Hegemann's view. Society would be justified in seizing such property and destroying it. But just as it would have been better to buy off the slave owner than to crush him by war, so Dr. Hegemann would offer a modest compensation to the owner of the houses that plainly ought to be condemned. Ten per cent of the appraised value seems to him a fair figure.

This is the point to which a sincere and essentially conservative scholar like Dr. Hegemann is forced by the present housing impasse. One who has not centered his interest so definitely in the housing problem may question the fairness and expediency of the virtual confiscation of one particular type of property. If slum tenements are occupied, it is because industry and commerce pay wages too low to permit the worker to cover rent on decent quarters. If industry and commerce pay indecently low wages, we, the general public, buy goods at less than a decent price. We are all accomplices in the crime of slum housing, and the cost of abolishing the slum ought to be distributed widely among us.

Yet it is seldom possible to effect a far-reaching reform by methods that are scrupulously fair and just. Both North and South had benefited by the wealth produced by slavery. It would have been fair to buy out the slave owners at national expense; but it would not have been practicable. The moment the buying operation began, the price of slaves would have soared. If we set out seriously to buy up slum property, the values would rise to bankrupt us. Strategically Dr. Hegemann is probably right in urging the abolition of slum values with only nominal compensation if any. We shall have very little real housing reform until, justly or unjustly, we excommunicate the owner of slum property and exhibit a determination to brush aside what we now let him conceive of as his sacred rights. Perhaps we shall then be able to buy him out on terms that are within reason.

ALVIN JOHNSON

Eskimo by Choice

ARCTIC ADVENTURE. By Peter Freuchen. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.50.

WHEN Lincoln Ellsworth came back to town the other day after making a magnificent flight across Antarctica the New York Times put the story on page 16. Arctic and Antarctic adventure, it seems, is no longer front-page news. Politics and European war scares have taken the place of polar exploration.

Until Peter Freuchen's "Arctic Adventure" came along one could almost have been thankful for Democrats, Republicans, and European crises. Peter Freuchen, however, has changed all that. "Arctic Adventure" is front-page literary news. It puts Greenland into the headlines along with the Rhineland. It throws a bright light on a cold corner of the earth where men fight for food instead of prestige. After reading a chapter or two you feel like asking Captain Bob Bartlett—"the greatest ice navigator in the world," says Freuchen—to take you with him the next time he sails for Thule.

Freuchen, let it be said immediately, doesn't pretend to be a scientist or a patriot. In fact, the giant Dane, six feet five and red-headed, hurls a few harpoons into some of the men who say they go to the bottom and top of the world for the sake of science. As for patriotism, the King of Denmark, supposedly interested in polar exploration, probably won't like "Arctic Adventure." It is rather rough on him.

For twenty years Peter Freuchen fought, sledged, lived, and loved in the Arctic. He first went to Greenland in 1907. After that short trip life in Copenhagen was dull, and tragic. He was a young medical student. One day he stood proudly at the hospital window watching a discharged patient take his first steps across the street. The patient had been carried into the hospital, a bloody mess on a stretcher. Doctors had said there was no hope. By a miracle of medical science he had been fully restored, and young Peter saw meaning in life. His eyes followed the patient as he crossed the street. Suddenly one of Copenhagen's first automobiles hit the man and killed him. That was medicine enough for Freuchen. Knud Rasmussen, then an ambitious young fellow asked him to go to Greenland to establish a trading post. He went, and Thule, far up on the west coast, became his home.

Winter, spring, summer, winter, Freuchen and his Eskimos fight nature and seek food. The smell of food is on every page; and frequently the smell is bad. For most of the time Freuchen and his Eskimos are starving for food, hunting for food, saving food, or gorging themselves with it when the precious stuff is in their hands. Men must eat, and in the Arctic men eat dog meat and mice, as well as such "delicacies" as whale, seal, and walrus.

The Northland, that region from Greenland across Baffin Bay to Hudson Bay, is unrelenting. A man, says Freuchen, must be sure of himself before he takes chances with it. There were many men who didn't know their limits. Dr. Wulff, a Swedish scientist, was one; the Eskimos and a white man had to leave him behind to die.

The Arctic gets the dogs too, those dogs which make Arctic adventure possible. Freuchen, Rasmussen, and their Eskimos crossed the northern ice cap of Greenland. They stood on the spot where many years before Peary—of him Peter Freuchen speaks with reverence—had built a cairn. The trip out and back was a living death. They started with more than forty dogs; only seven returned. They had to kill many for food. A bitch whelped during the journey. One after another the puppies dropped from her; one after another the starving dogs which remained snatched up the pups as soon as they were born. The mother tried to prevent this cannibalism and finally did. When pup number nine was born she whirled around and devoured it herself.

Freuchen's Eskimos are a humble, indirect people. The Eskimo doesn't ask you for food. That would be bad manners. He puts it this way: "It is not impossible that someone in this area is lacking food." The Eskimo shares his wealth. There is much room in the Arctic, but no room, among the natives, for distinction between the man who owns meat and the man who doesn't.

Peter Freuchen tells more about the life, habits, morals, superstitions of the Eskimos than do exploring scientists who have written the "authoritative" books. Instead of giving a dissertation on Eskimo morals he tells you how Aloquisaq lost her pants. Instead of a chapter on Eskimo habits he describes Arnarak's way of shampooing her hair.

Where others observed the Eskimo, Freuchen became one of them. He married Navarana, an Eskimo girl. She told him much about her people that he would not have known otherwise. Once he took Navarana to Copenhagen, but she was impressed neither with the city nor with the King, who granted Freuchen and his wife an audience. Navarana bore her husband two children, a boy and a girl. "The boy," writes Freuchen, was "born at 3 a.m., June 16, 1916. At eight o'clock that morning Navarana got up again, straightened her house, and walked out with the boy on her back. At five o'clock that night she led the ball with Knud and danced with abandon. She went to bed, however, before all the guests had departed, complaining of being tired."

Peter Freuchen cared little for the white man after he came to know the "uncivilized" Eskimo. He has some harsh words for many Danish, American, and other explorers, and he isn't afraid to mention their names. As for events at home he didn't bother much to read the newspapers when they came once a year. His indifference is almost inhuman. "Arctic

A stimulating book for those who like to "think things through"

THREE GODS GIVE AN EVENING TO POLITICS

WHATEVER your political faith may be, you will enjoy sitting in on this imagined, after-dinner conversation between three of the most influential men the world has known.

SOCRATES, LENIN, and JEFFERSON are the three gods. They talk about the state of affairs in the United States today and about their probable lines of future development. Each approaches the problem in his own way, but always with an objective, far-seeing eye.

The result is a book which presents conclusions that are entirely overlooked by average economic or political commentators. It will really help you to "think things through." Just published, $1.50 at all bookstores.

by Richard
Rothschild

author of Reality and Illusion and Paradoxy: The Destiny of Modern Thought

RANDOM HOUSE
20 E. 57th St., New York.

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

offers graduate professional curricula for the acquisition of the necessary knowledge and skills for social work, leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE SOCIAL WORK AGENCIES

increasingly require such knowledge and skill from candidates for positions.

May first is the last day for filing applications for fellowships.
For full information, write to

DR. M. J. KARPFF, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish
Social Work

71 West 47th Street, New York City

Adventure" reveals the Eskimo world admirably, but it doesn't always reveal Peter Freuchen.

Navarana died of influenza, the white man's disease. Today Peter Freuchen is back in Denmark; he has returned to the fold. He writes books; he lectures; he has even gone to Hollywood to make a picture. It doesn't matter. Pick up "Arctic Adventure" and be careful lest the hands of the clock sneak around to the tiny hours of the morning.

SHEPARD STONE

Back to Hutchins!

NO FRIENDLY VOICE. By Robert Maynard Hutchins. University of Chicago Press. $2

ROBERT HUTCHINS'S prose, like his mind, is clean, forceful, and direct. There are no dangling participles, no inchoate ideas, no uncertainties. His faith is as simple as it is absolute. All questions, he believes, can be answered, and each problem admits of but one solution. There is only one method—the use of reason; and with it the philosopher or university president can determine the age for entering college, the function of the Y. M. C. A., the proper radio policy, and what a general education ought to be. With calm assurance he says all things to all people; to the physician, back to Galen; to the educator, back to Aristotle; to the Y. M. C. A. secretary, back to Christ.

It may be unfortunate to have the speeches collected in a book which can be read at one sitting. For it turns out that he has really been saying the same thing in almost the same words to all of his audiences. He has been preaching against anti-intellectualism, whatever that may mean, and proclaiming rational thought as violently as though a party had been formed to make it irrational. There had to be a villain in the piece, and as Mr. Hearst has his red, Mr. Hutchins has his "fact." Immutable ideas, "fundamental principles which may be established by rational thought," unity—these are the things that universities, through their professors and students, should be seeking. Facts change, they are confusing and stubborn, and they cannot be learned in four years. Therefore, though he grudgingly admits their usefulness, it is theory that he emphatically stresses. To the student, eager to see the new light, he points backward again. "These ideas may chiefly be discovered [italics, the reviewer's] in the books of those who clarified and developed them."

If one is inclined to skepticism at authoritative statements on science, education, history, philosophy, religion coming from a former law professor, an examination of Mr. Hutchins's philosophy of learning dispels it. Immutable ideas being the end of the learning process and being found in a few books, it is possible to be expert in any subject matter without having had experience with it, or feeling for it. In fact, the less experience the better, because facts obscure principles. The plausible and persuasive can be accepted and defended against all the fumbling experiments of the practitioners of a craft. It is the reaction of a clean mind that is uncomfortable before the chaos of creation, and prefers Indian summer with the struggle for existence decided to stormy, uncertain spring. The psychoanalysts have a name for it.

While, as Mr. Hutchins constantly reiterates, it may not be the function of a university to develop character, the ones he has attended and administered have done their share toward making his a great one. There are no more stirring utterances in the book than those on academic freedom, and his speeches have been backed by action. He has never let a professor down, never budged an inch from his position that what is legal in the state and the nation is appropriate on a college campus, and that what is illegal should be handled by the proper authorities, not the university administration. The same character made him a leader in the fight to maintain public educational budgets during the depression, and the status of his profession at all times. In the face of that it would be ungracious to suggest that academic freedom is as out of place in his rational world as poets were in Plato's Republic. The whole democratic process becomes silly when the only right answers are discovered by reading the classics.

A long time has elapsed since the realistic dean of the Yale Law School was appointed president of the University of Chicago. In the Yale days he was the leader of a revolutionary movement; now he has become the spearhead of a reaction. Swings from accumulation to analysis are not unusual in the history of science, and the time for one is now ripe. But what is needed is thought, not exhortation. In view of that need it is a pity that the forward-looking dean became the backward-looking president; that he assumes not that truth is to be discovered but that it has been forgotten.

The humor, the sarcasm, the half-smile with which many of the speeches were delivered cover a fundamental shyness, a slight sense of insecurity that is perhaps the basis of Mr. Hutchins's quest for certainty. Those qualities disappear when, because he is speaking from his own experience, he is most genuinely himself. Out of that experience come the remarks on academic freedom, the speech on morals and non-conformity to the graduating class of 1935, and the wholly charming address entitled "The Sentimental Alumnus," delivered at Oberlin, his boyhood home and first college. The fact—if not the idea—that he has chosen those speeches for inclusion in the volume gives rise to the hope that before too long he may adopt as his advice to himself: Back to Hutchins.

DONALD SLESINGER

The Comic View

BONES OF CONTENTION. By Frank O'Connor. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

IT IS too bad that Frank O'Connor's books are not better known in this country, because they illustrate qualities likely to be forgotten in a period like the present. It is not only their humor, or their peculiar variety of humor, but also the qualities of sympathy and detachment. Sympathy is something that we have had in abundance both as expansive self-pity and as aggressive championship of the lowly. But it is rarely to be found as a function of the writer's whole vision of experience—a vision so complete as to include the writer along with his characters. Mr. O'Connor is detached in the sense that he allows the observed experience to carry its own moral. And the moral is that anything less than a profound and all inclusive charity is madness and death.

This is to put it very strongly, but such is actually the moral of the title story of Mr. O'Connor's first collection, "Guests of the Nation," in which a group of Irish revolutionists are forced by political necessity to entice a friendly English hostage into a forest and shoot him. Mr. O'Connor's characteristic stories, to be sure, are not so harrowing, but there is always a burden of potential disaster. In his novel "The Saint and Mary Kate," a realistic chronicle of calf-love in the Cork slums becomes a hilarious parody of the Temptation of Saint Anthony. In the present collection most of the tales are demonstrations of the triumph of nature over circumstance, and are therefore comic: the theft of musical instruments by a disreputable street band (Orpheus and His Lute), an old peasant's preference of imprisonment to paying a fine for the sake of humiliating a neighbor (The Majesty of the Law), and the communal loyalty of a whole village in protecting its own against the law (Tears, Idle Tears and Peasants). There is also the uproarious fantasy of the man who is literally paralyzed by life: he "stops" in the street one day and has to be removed by the police. Beneath all this rich humor and light-hearted fantasy there is undoubtedly much suffering; but to those who would object to his acquiescence Mr. O'Connor would probably reply that the comic writer is concerned, not with the separate elements, but with one possible pattern of experience.

The comic pattern demands objectivity, and the technical success of these stories arises out of the strict adherence to dialogue and situation. (When the attempt is to present character from the inside, as in two or three instances, the result is less distinguished.) The language is a realization of the improbable flights of Irish speech of a sort to make the more famous passages of Synge seem like the insincerities of a tired littérateur. It grows on the page, sprouting into lush foliage out of the materials of the situation. As for the situations themselves, they are rarely more than the commonplace crises of living in the Irish town and countryside. What Mr. O'Connor does with them, of course, is a result of his gift and his vision. But he reminds us again how much the deepest values of narrative spring from an intensely perceived objective experience. Perception alone is not enough; but perception, in an age given over to one mode of abstraction after another in its fiction, is necessary for the revival of such important things as wit, poetry, and understanding.

WILLIAM TROY

International Gangsters

THE BROWN NETWORK. THE ACTIVITIES OF THE NAZIS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES. With an Introduction by the Earl of Listowel. Knight Publications. $3.

THERE is at least one rule without exception. Unexceptionally all governments at all times maintain espionage services, both at home and abroad. In fact, a silent international convention tolerates this supposedly necessary horror. But usually such espionage in foreign countries confines itself to accepted military spy standards. The Hitler terror differs in being an essentially social terror in alien countries. It murders the heads of overtly friendly states. Directly and indisputably it murdered Chancellor Dollfuss of Austria and Premier Duca of Rumania; it subsidized the organization which sent out the assassins of King Alexander and the French Foreign Minister Barthou. It spends over $108,000,000 annually on foreign propaganda. It employs literally thousands of full-time stool pigeons and provocative agents in émigré circles in Paris, London, Prague, and other centers from which émigrés are lured to the German frontier and kidnapped. The anonymous but responsibly sponsored authors of "The Brown Network" list the number of German refugees murdered in the countries to which they had fled. Hitler ambassadors are under the forced supervision of Gestapo agents, usually former gangsters, smuggled in as "diplomats." But, above all, the Hitler terror maintains in other lands widespread but coordinated Nazi parties. In contiguous territories these Nazi organizations work day and night, often within the parliament of the friendly country, to prepare the capture of German or allegedly German populations; in patently uncapturable countries, as in Great Britain, the United States, Latin America, and elsewhere,

SEE THE OLD AND NEW in SOVIET RUSSIA with IRINA SKARIATINA

Author of

"THE FIRST TO GO BACK"

Princess Skariatina's knowledge spans Russian life from the Czar through the Revolution to the latest Soviet developments. She understands the relations of events. Her dominant interest is the life of her native land.

Sailing July 1, the group spends a month in the Soviet Union.

ROUNDTrip WITH $798
TOURIST PASSAGE

Other group tours (at least a month in the U.S.S.R.) with roundtrip passage from $372

Or you may travel on your own.

BOOKLET ON REQUEST.

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street, New York
Cooperating with Intourist

ROBERT MAYNARD HUTCHINS

IN this book are collected for the first time twenty-four addresses by ROBERT MAYNARD HUTCHINS, President of the University of Chicago, which command attention for their logic and sanity, and captivate for the forcefulness and brilliance of their style. With such challenging titles as What It Means to Go to College, Thomas Jefferson and the Intellectual Love of God, Education as a National Enterprise, The Professor Is Sometimes Right, Radio and Public Policy . . . These addresses are "must" reading for everyone interested in current problems in educating youth in such a way that they will be better citizens tomorrow.

"What Mr. Hutchins has besides ideals and convictions is the fighting spirit," says Harry Hansen in the N. Y. World-Telegram. And L. D. Coffman, President of the University of Minnesota, calls it "a fine antidote to much of the loose thinking in this field."

$2.00; postpaid $2.10

NO FRIENDLY VOICE

By Robert Maynard Hutchins

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

these Nazi organizations both carry on individual acts of terror and try hard to break down democratic "illusions" by fostering anti-Semitism, red-baiting, Negrophobia, and obsessions of Nordic grandeur.

"The Brown Network," a companion volume to the famous "The Brown Terror," is necessarily a gruesome performance. But it must always be appreciated by the student of contemporary German affairs that the Nazi government is not a government in the conventional sense but a professional terror. This terror was let loose by men most of whom before they came to power were members of the underworld, convicted forgers, pimps, murderers, asylum inmates, or medically diagnosed sexual perverts and psychopaths. "The Brown Network" is really the international list of a criminal gang in power in Berlin. This fact, of course, does not explain the cause and nature of fascism as a historic phenomenon. But it does explain its methods.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

Shorter Notices

FREEDOM, FAREWELL. By Phyllis Bentley. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

A prefatory quotation from Mommsen's "History of Rome" suggests the material, scope, and intention of Miss Bentley's novel: "The history of Caesar and of Roman imperialism is in truth a more bitter censure of modern autocracy than could be written by the hand of man." As a plea for republicanism against fascism the novel is not especially impressive; the familiar arguments have been stated more cogently by social critics. As a historical cocktail the novel is quite palatable. A lump of Plutarch, a few dashes of Shakespeare's "Julius Caesar," and a copious barspoon of Miss Bentley's carelessly ironic imagination provide the formula for a giddy evening. Several of the scenes are memorable: Caesar's matutinal flirtation with Mucia, who made a cuckold of Great Pompey; the salacious Catiline taking time out between conspiracies to eye the naked dance girls of the Flora troupe; idealistic Brutus eloquently paraphrasing the "Phaedo"; and ancient Cicero pompously parading his inexhaustible supply of unstained Latinity. Miss Bentley moves up to the first seat front row in the private-life school of historical fiction.

THE ABANDONED WOOD. By Monique Saint-Hélier. Translated by James Whitall. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

The jacket of this book states that it is the America-France Award novel but gives no further information on the meaning of this award, and the story itself suggests no reason for the internationalism in the honor. Strictly speaking, it is not a novel at all but a fairly interesting description, written with nervous feeling and perception, of some dozen characters and their peculiar relations to one another. The book reads like a fragment of an unfinished whole, of a work whose themes are announced and left suspended. The conflict so carefully prepared at first between the girl Carolle, who is determined to save what is left of her grandfather's lands, and the upstart Graew, who holds the mortgage, never occurs. Nor is the secondary problem of Carolle's happiness ever solved. It is as if the author had grown tired suddenly or had changed her mind and decided to let the first impressions of the people whose lives are all conditioned by Carolle's illegitimate birth and Graew's scheming stand alone, not as agents in a plot but as symbols of a mood, of an attitude toward such things as dignity and pride, honor and faithfulness, vulgarity and hardness of heart. The effect is of mild sentimentality mingled with a genteel acknowledgment of certain disagreeable realities. The translation is good.

ELIZABETHAN WOMEN. By Gamaliel Bradford. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $3.

These essays contain neither information nor opinion but read like lectures to a class of young schoolgirls. We are told, for instance, that the Renaissance "was by no means confined to England," that Henry VII was "crafty and cold," Henry VIII "coarse and licentious," Charles I "haughty and imperious." Such snippets combine with cosmic utterances to form the setting, and after having been thus familiarized with the age and the literature ("from the divine sweetness of Spenser to the vigorous toughness of Donne, from the affluent grace of Daniel to the gay sprightliness of Herrick"), the reader is led to a detailed examination of the title's subject—contemporary record interleaved with platitudes, plus such items as the flower scene from "The Winter's Tale" to prove that Tudor ladies loved their gardens. Even more pointless, at this date, is the commentary on the women in the plays of Dekker, Massinger, and the like, plays treated always as Victorian novels, without any effort to achieve a conception of the dramatist's purposes. Like the ruling sovereigns they are summarized in twin epithets, as, "Jonson is coarse and cynical," "Tournear is gory and horrible." The female characters are paraded as living figures on whose private qualities we are invited to speculate. Happily ignorant of Elizabethan dramatic conventions, the author lauds only the "human" elements, while reserving the right to inquire, characteristically, "What is real life, after all, but a poor dull parody on fancy's realm?" To critics jealous of a post-mortem reputation, this

NEW FEATURES

Don't miss the NEW

MODERN MONTHLY

In the April Issue

Public Menace No. 1

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES and OLIVER CARLSON

THIRD WIFE: A Sonnet Series

WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD

SHALL THE WORKING CLASS SUPPORT SANCTIONS? A Debate

Yes!

LUDWIG LORE

No!

SIDNEY HOOK

—vs.—

THE SECRET OF IRONY

MAX EASTMAN

MARK TWAIN: Revolutionist

V. F. CALVERTON

15c a copy

$1.50 yearly

Now—8 Months for $1

The MODERN MONTHLY, 46 Morton St., New York City

Enclosed.....for.....months subscription.

Name

Address

collection will stress the advisability of a deathbed destruction of all outmoded and unpublished papers. The essays herein contained were written between 1890 and 1910, and have no claim whatever for present publication.

DRAMA

Polite Revue

ONE remarkable fact about the current theatrical season has been the comparative scarcity and the comparative ill-success of the musical show. The drama has prospered; but for some reason or other those splendiferous concoctions of girls, tunes, and costumes which are generally taken for granted have been neither so numerous nor so successful as usual. The latest attempt to remedy this deficiency is called "On Your Toes" (Imperial Theater), and my guess would be that, despite almost deliriously enthusiastic reviews in the daily press, it will achieve a respectable success without quite restoring the good old days when such entertainments were expected to go on for eight months or so almost as a matter of course.

"On Your Toes" has a plot which is never entirely lost sight of, some pleasant Cole Porterish lyrics set to pleasant Cole Porterish tunes, and it rejoices in the presence of that solemnly agile dancer Ray Bolger, as well as in the languid participation of that weary, faintly disdainful, and generally depreciatory comedienne Luella Gear, who seems always expecting the worst and always ready to greet it with a certain resigned droop of the lips and elevation of the eyebrows which I can only describe as a shrug of the face. Tamara Geva appears as the prima ballerina in a troupe of Russian dancers, and one of the big scenes is a burlesque ballet in which Mr. Bolger is compelled to participate on over-short notice. It is funny enough, and it is said to be even funnier for those in a position to appreciate the subtleties of the parody, but I must confess that I found myself laboring under a disadvantage which I am sure a good many spectators must share—the disadvantage, that is to say, of not always being able to tell when a ballet is burlesque and when it is serious.

If a certain meandering casualness seems to have crept into my account of the piece, I acquired it by contagion, for "On Your Toes," like so many of the most modish revues of the past few years, is itself meandering and casual to the last degree. Gone are the days when such entertainments made it their first object to be breath-taking in speed, dazzling in color, and deafening in noise. The newer pace is a sort of polite saunter, the newer musical mode a confidential, insinuating, almost indolent melody which has lost the crispness as well as the blatancy of jazz. All this, I suspect, represents the influence of the kind of entertainer who flourishes in the politer night clubs, the diseuse in particular, and the result of it is that the revue which was born of burlesque and vaudeville is tending more and more in the direction of a much more intimate kind of entertainment. It is significant that the best song in "On Your Toes" is a hesitant and plaintive melody called "A Little Hotel," and that, aside from the ballet scenes, the stage is often abandoned to one or two performers who might as well be standing beside a drawing-room piano. I am not suggesting that the new style is better or worse than the old one, but it probably has a more limited appeal and may have

THE TIMES

OF LONDON

LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

The Times (of London) Literary Supplement is the foremost authority on books, new and old, written in the English tongue. It provides the widest variety of reading, from the newest thriller to the latest work of scholarship. Those who consider books an essential part of life rely on its impartial and expert judgment and delight in its eloquent and exact diction.

Annual subscription: $4.15 (post free). Full particulars from The Times Office, 280 Broadway, New York City.

His LATEST Book on the Sexual Life
Crystallizes the Findings of a Lifetime
COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME—389 PAGES

PARTIAL CONTENTS

The Nature of the Sexual Impulse	Preparation for Marriage	Positions in Coitus
The Sexual Zones	Fertility and Sterility	Sex Life and Nervous Disorders
The Sexual Impulse in Youth	Divorce	Sexual Difficulties
Masturbation	Monogamy; Polygamy	Freud's "Unconscious"; "Libido"
Frigidity	The Nature of Birth Control	Dreams; Their Significance
Impotence	The Question of Abortion	Sex Life of Unmarried Adults
First Intercourse	Frequency of Coitus	Sexual Fetishes and Symbols
Secondary Sexual Characters	The Sexual Athlete:	The Art of Love
The "Under-sexed"; the "Over-sexed"	Satyrism; Nymphomania	Sexual Adjustments
Exhibitionism	Jealousy	Sex Happiness
The Sexual Criminal	Married Love	Age and the Sexual Impulse
Analysis of Courtship	Psychoanalytic Concepts of Sex	The Sexual Impulse and Love
Sadism and Masochism	Pro-marital Knowledge and Experience	Love Rights of Women; of Men
Woman's Change of Life	Modesty; Nudism	Esthetics of Coitus
The Dangerous Age in Men	Childbirth: Sex Life during Pregnancy; Immediately after	Expression and Repression
Cruelty and Pain in Relation to Sex	Sexual Feeling in Women	Substitutes for Sex
Homosexuality	Sex Practice in Marriage	Glossary Sexual Terms
Hermaphroditism	Methods and Technique of Coitus	Index
Sexual Abstinence	Sexual Pleasure and Conception
Sex Intercourse and Health
The Choice of a Mate

AUTHORIZED • $3.00 POSTPAID • UNABRIDGED

CARL VAN DOREN, Ph.D., says:

"The best one-volume treatment of sex in the English language."

BERTRAND RUSSELL says:

"Few books on the subject of sex be confidently recommended as this truly admirable volume."

FREE OFFER

THE NATION says:

"There is probably better introduction to contemporary knowledge and contemporary theories about the physiology, psychology and hygiene of sex."

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 416-N, 333 Sixth Ave., New York City. Send me a copy of Havelock Ellis' Psychology of Sex for free examination. I will deposit $3.00 plus a few cents delivery charge when the book arrives. Full purchase price to be refunded, if returned within 5 days.

Name.....

Address.....

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $3, thus saving delivery charge. (Same money-back guarantee.)

something to do with the fact that out-of-town buyers and other country cousins do not keep revues alive as long as they did in the days when minor subtleties were not so assiduously cultivated.

The streak of bad luck into which the Theater Union seems to have run continues with "Bitter Stream" (Civic Repertory Theater), a well-meaning but rather feeble dramatization of the anti-Fascist novel "Fontamara." If I am not very much mistaken, neither the dramatist nor the actors knew exactly what to make of the bitter humor which dominated the novel, and the stage version languishes badly except when it arrives at moments of blood and thunder like that in which the Fascist officer shoots the peasant standing at a table before him. What the Union needs if it cannot find another play as good as "The Sailors of Cattaro" is another melodrama like "Stevedore" with lots of excitement and no nonsense.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

After the Next War

ACCORDING to H. G. Wells, whose vision of the future has at last been photographed, the next war is to begin on Christmas Eve, 1940. "Things to Come" (Rivoli), produced in London by Alexander Korda and directed by William Cameron Menzies, begins with a sky full of aeroplanes over Everytown, most of whose citizens have refused to believe in the imminent catastrophe. The catastrophe is complete. The war lasts a quarter of a century, at the end of which dreadful period only a remnant of our civilization remains, and none of our buildings. Here and there among the ruins a few barbarians live under the leadership of primitive and vulgarian landlords, but it looks as if there were no hope for the human race. Down by the Mediterranean Sea, however, Science is holding its own, and—yes, it is doing more than that. Even as we despair a fleet of vast, imperturbable sky-machines can be heard droning above the clouds, and all at once an army of muscular, intelligent men in black tights drops anaesthetizing gas on Everytown so that the barbarians, falling promptly to sleep, can be captured and set to work building the civilization of the future on scientific principles.

This civilization is what we have come to see, and what Alexander Korda has spent I don't know how many thousands of pounds to create on celluloid. The first thing to notice is that the head man in 2036, when things seem to be going about as they always will thenceforth, is the grandson of the man who saved us back in 1966. The reason may be that Raymond Massey can therefore play both parts, as he agreeably does. But it looks like hereditarianism, and in the absence of any reference to eugenics I don't know how scientific that is supposed to be. At any rate here is the civilization. It consists of beehive cities built in monster excavations—whether underground or in the sides of mountains I cannot say, since the photography at this point becomes very trick. The point is that the cities lie somewhere out of the sun, which according to one of the wise men is a poor thing at best, shining as it does intermittently through contaminated air. Down there or in there, wherever it is, the people of the future manufacture their own light rays as we do our central heat; and bask athletically in glass houses. Everything is made either of metal in white sheets or of angular plate glass; the chairs and tables are glass, the casings of elevators are transparent, and indeed the whole of Everytown has begun to look like one of those modernistic chandeliers—layered, prismatic, and by some miracle dustproof. Of course there is no dust in Everytown, come to think of it, just as there are no windows, and apparently no fashions in clothing; for the twenty thousand inhabitants whom we see are dressed all alike in white costumes which drop from their winged shoulders in swift folds. Most locomotion is vertical, though there is a fine network of curving ramps and suspended roadways.

Try as I did to think otherwise, I could only think that living there would be like living in an electric ice box, you on your tray and I on mine. The whole picture was for me intolerably prosy and grotesquely unconvincing. I was confirmed in a former suspicion, namely, that the future is the dullest subject on earth. The imagination can do nothing with it. When there is nothing to limit the imagination there is perhaps no imagination; one man's guess is as good as another, and indeed the best men will not guess. The actors seemed to know this better than Mr. Wells or Mr. Korda did, for they were unable to say their lines as if they meant them; they stared into the abominable blankness around them and said their pieces like children on parents' day. But perhaps the men behind the picture knew it too. They must, for instance, have wondered why they couldn't after all escape the present moment; why they couldn't furnish Everytown with anything beyond the period furniture of 1936, and why the great space gun at the end couldn't somehow be made to suggest a little less of Buck Rogers and Lieutenant Wilma. It was all very unsatisfactory, like the chimeras of the ancients. And obviously the people of Everytown had nothing to do in their beehive once they had built it. The fancy can construct a future earth, but it cannot set its inhabitants in motion.

Speaking of actors who cannot believe what they must say, there is William Powell in "The Great Ziegfeld" (Astor), a super-film which glorifies the man who glorified the American girl. Mr. Powell manages well enough as the great Ziegfeld until he has to pose as an Immortal and to make speeches about Beauty and Art; then he drops his eyes, even though he is supposed to be gazing into those of Billie Burke (Myrna Loy), and secretly remembers that he was once the dry, wry detective of "The Thin Man." Few films have been more lavish than this one, which lasts three hours and must have cost millions of dollars, but since it can be doubted that Ziegfeld was either the Shakespeare or the Leonardo he is represented to have been it can also be doubted that the money was well spent. Luise Rainer as Anna Held, however, has done a first-rate piece of acting—the best, I think, by any woman this year, including Marlene Dietrich in "Desire" (Paramount), a clever film which is not of the first order.

When movie children are convincing, as they seldom are, I confess that I find them irresistible. Freddie Bartholomew is both things in the sublimely sentimental "Little Lord Fauntleroy" (Music Hall); and it happens also that I have seen during the fortnight a number of specimens from Russia. "Children of the Revolution" (Cameo) is interesting because its Pioneers have not been overdirected—even, perhaps, because they have been at times so poorly directed. Their very awkwardness is stamped with truth, as on another level the unconscious antics of infants necessarily are. The best thing, for example, in Julien Bryan's two-hour newsreel of contemporary Russia (Carnegie Hall) was a day nursery; its habitués were so absolutely convincing that the audience grew hysterical with recognition and laughter.

MARK VAN DOREN

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

IDIOT'S DELIGHT. Shubert Theater. Robert Sherwood manages somehow to make a smashing theatrical success out of an anti-war play. With the Lunts and many other entertaining trimmings.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

SAINT JOAN. Martin Beck Theater. Brilliant interpretation by Katharine Cornell of what may well be Shaw's most enduring play.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

ETHAN FROME. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon, and Raymond Massey.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Gaumont British. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

DUBROVSKY. Amkino. As romantic as Pushkin, on whose unfinished novel it is based. Not wholly successful, but interesting as a variation on the orthodox Russian theme.

THE STORY OF LOUIS PASTEUR. Warner Brothers. With Paul Muni as Pasteur this film makes "science" exciting, or at any rate uses the life of its hero to excellent dramatic advantage.

TRAVEL

VACATION TOURS TO Soviet RUSSIA

(CONDUCTED OR INDEPENDENT)

MEDICAL TOUR FOR PHYSICIANS AND DENTISTS

JULY 1, 1936

Conducted by
DR. EDWARD COHEN

Including Spain,
Palestine and
Western Europe

SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT FOR TEACHERS

Consult about your travel, our service free. Ask for literature.

AMALGAMATED BANK OF NEW YORK

11 Union Square

(ALgonquin 4-1500)

New York

SPECIAL ■ EUROPEAN STUDY GROUPS

Under direction of AMERICAN PEOPLES COLLEGE IN EUROPE

SPECIAL STUDY OF COOPERATIVES..... June 17-Sept. 4—$462
YOUTH AND YOUTH MOVEMENTS..... July 2-Sept. 4—$458
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS..... June 27-Aug. 30—$468
ADULT EDUCATION AND SOCIAL PROGRESS..... June 27-Sept. 4—$458
SOCIAL AND CULTURAL DEVELOPMENTS..... Several groups—$359-$458

Costs Based on Modern Third Class . . . Ninth Season

SPECIFY WHICH TOURS INTEREST YOU WHEN WRITING.

POCONO STUDY TOURS, 545 Fifth Ave., (45th), N. Y. City

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE
MOROSCO THEATRE, 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30
Extra Matinee Wednesdays

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:45

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

■ new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St., W. of B'way. Eve's, 8:40
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:40
300 Seats at $1.10

SYMPOSIUM

The American Russian Institute presents

THE SOVIET THEATRE A SYMPOSIUM

■ the New School for Social Research
66 West 12th St., Tuesday, May 5 ■ 8:30 P.M.

Speakers

Prof. H. W. L. Dana, Outstanding authority on the Soviet theatre
(who will speak with slides).

Norris Houghton
Author of "Moscow
Rehearsals."

Lee Simonson
A director of the Theatre Guild.

Admission 50c and 75c, tax included

Advance sale by The American Russian Institute, Inc.

56 West 45th St., New York

Telephone: MUrray Hill 2-0313

The Intelligent Traveler

BY JOHN ROTHSCCHILD

TRIPS TO THE SOVIET UNION

ACCORDING to Intourist, the official coordinating agency for travel in the Soviet Union, 25 per cent of those who visit Russia go there in organized tours. Group travel has distinct advantages in a land where the social unit is the group.

The number of tours announced for this summer is greater than ever before. The tours mentioned in this article are selected from a choice of ninety. With one or two exceptions they are being arranged by travel organizations specializing in Russian tours. Leaderless tours and tours which spend only a few days in the Soviet Union have been omitted. In every case there is sufficient reason for presenting information on the trip, but this does not imply indorsement.

In choosing his tour the traveler should bear in mind that travel is a service, not a commodity. A longer and cheaper tour may be a poorer buy than one which employs no better travel standards, covers less ground, and costs more. The price difference may be justified by superiority of management, for a tour is likely to be no better than the organization which runs it. Wherever possible, a person considering a tour should visit the office and get a direct impression of the relative integrity and ability of its personnel. Willingness to go into detail, fully and specifically, is evidence of reliability. Where dealings must be by letter, the same standards of judgment apply. Before signing for a tour, one should find out how many persons will be on it and who they are; who the leader is and what are his qualifications—experience in the Soviet Union, speaking knowledge of Russian, intellectual equipment, and so on.

The stabilization of the ruble, which has worried some prospective travelers, actually affects Soviet travel costs very little, since the tour price is paid in dollars as heretofore and covers all major expenditures. The fact that the visitor can now freely change dollars into rubles and make small purchases with rubles is a great convenience. Some prices are lower in rubles, others are higher. The chances are that the aggregate financial disadvantage, if any, will be negligible.

Louis Fischer, Russian correspondent of The Nation, has lived in the Soviet Union for thirteen years, and is acknowledged to be one of the most authoritative and brilliant commentators on the Russian scene. For the third time he will conduct a travel seminar of thirty-four days. The rate is $850, tourist class on the ocean, second-class rail in Europe, international sleepers, and second-class hotels in the Soviet Union. Address The Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

Professor George M. Day, of Occidental College, will conduct the fourth Russian seminar, which spends twenty-eight days in the Soviet Union. He lived in Russia for ten years before and during the World War and has revisited it frequently since the revolution. Of two rates quoted, the lower is $635, third-class steamer and rail except in the Soviet Union, where rail travel will be second class; second-class hotels in the Soviet Union, and first-class in Europe. Address Bureau of University Travel, Newton, Massachusetts.

Albert K. Dawson, head of the Russian Travel Division of the American Express Company, will conduct a tour spending thirty days in the Soviet Union and visiting Soviet Armenia. A shorter itinerary of twenty-one days, omitting Armenia, is also planned. The groups will be combined most of the way. The rate for the longer tour is $885, with tourist-class passage and second class in the Soviet Union. The fifty-two-day trip is $792, with the same services. Address American Express Company, 605 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Dr. Joshua Kunitz is the author of "Dawn over Samarkand" and "Russian Literature and the Jew." He has visited the Soviet Union several times, and has been living there for the past year. His group will spend thirty-two days in the country. The rate is $469, third class throughout except rail transportation in the Soviet Union, which will be second class. Address The Open Road.

In connection with the third International Conference on Social Work which meets in London in July, Frankwood E. Williams and Harry L. Lurie will conduct a travel seminar on social work of twenty days in the Soviet Union. Mr. Lurie is executive director of the Bureau of Jewish Social Research. Dr. Williams's writings on mental hygiene in the Soviet Union are well known. The rate of $421, third class throughout, includes no meals, except breakfast, for the two weeks in London. Rail transportation in the Soviet Union will be second class. Address Edutrael, 535 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Dr. Mark Graubard, research geneticist at Columbia University, will lead a travel seminar of thirty-one days in the Soviet Union for the study of national minorities. Dr. Graubard has studied in the Soviet Union and his works have been translated into Russian. Of two rates quoted the lower is $495, third class throughout. Address Compass Travel Bureau, 55 West Forty-second Street, New York.

Those who want to "go Russian" can do so by joining Julien Bryan, the roving camera reporter. He will lead his fifth travel group through the Soviet Union on a thirty-four-day trek. Informality and digressions from the beaten path distinguish this trip. The rate is $575, third class throughout. Address The Open Road.

Union Tours announces a trip under the leadership of Philip Brown. It spends thirty-one days in the Soviet Union and costs $495, third class throughout. Address Union Tours, 261 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Henry Shapiro, a young American lawyer who has lived in Moscow for the past two years and who is the only American admitted to the Soviet bar, will conduct a group for the third time. The rate is $372, third class throughout, twenty-eight days in the U. S. S. R. Address The Open Road.

General Victor A. Yakhontoff, an officer under the Czar, a member of the Kerensky government, and now an authority on revolutionary Russia and China, will conduct an eighteen-day trip in the Soviet Union. The party will spend three weeks in European cities. The rate is $855, tourist-class passage, second class abroad. Address Marsh Tours, 724 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Princess Irina Skariatina is another pre-revolutionary Russian who has accepted the new regime, as attested by her books, "The First to Go Back" and "A World Can End." Her group will spend thirty-two days in the U. S. S. R. The rate is $798, tourist class on the ocean, and second class in the Soviet Union. Address The Open Road.

A tour for writers and those interested in writing will be conducted by Lester Cohen, novelist and screen writer. The plans include meetings and discussions with Soviet writers through the courtesy of the Union of Revolutionary Writers. The inclusive rate, third class throughout, is $399, twenty-six days in the Soviet Union. Address Edutavel.

The society of American Friends of the Soviet Union sponsors a twenty-three-day tour for its members, led by Dr. J. Covington Coleman, a Los Angeles pastor who is chairman of its Southern California branch. The rate is $369, third class except second-class rail in Soviet Russia. Address Friends of the Soviet Union, 824 Broadway, New York.

A tour viewing the Soviets in the light of the cooperative movement and the American labor movement will be led by Colston Warne of Amherst College. It will spend a month in the Soviet Union. The rate is $495, third class throughout except for second-class rail travel in the Soviet Union. Address The Open Road.

The New School for Social Research sponsors a European field course in penology which will spend two weeks in the Soviet Union. Joseph Fulling Fishman, well-known criminologist, will conduct the group, which is limited to persons interested in the field. The tour makes brief stops en route in England, Finland, Switzerland, and France. The rate is $652, tourist class on the ocean, second class in Europe and the Soviet Union. Address Edutavel.

The Soviet Union occupies twenty days of a far-flung itinerary under the leadership of Maxwell and Marguerite Stewart. The return is through the Balkans. The Stewarts have lived in the Soviet Union and are conducting their third group this summer. Maxwell Stewart is an associate editor of The Nation. The rate is $470, third class throughout. Address The Open Road.

Under the caption, Circle Tour of Europe, World Tourists announces a thirty-one-day trip in the Soviet Union. It will be under the direction of Mrs. Flora E. Roberts, teacher and social worker. The rate is $401.50, third class throughout. Address World Tourists, 175 Fifth Avenue, New York.

A tour for those interested in studying the new education in the Soviet Union is entitled Seminar on the Reconstruction of Human Nature. Dr. I. V. Sollins, formerly of New York University, and Mrs. Lila Pargment, of the University of Michigan, will conduct the group, which spends thirty-two days in Soviet Russia. The program will include informal meetings and discussions with Soviet educators. Of several rates quoted the lowest is $483, third class. Address Edutavel.

Dr. F. Tredwell Smith will conduct a study tour for the ninth time. The itinerary of thirty-one days in the Soviet Union includes Soviet Armenia. The rate is $595, third-class rail and steamer, first-class hotel accommodations in Europe and third-class in the U. S. S. R. There are sailings from both New York and Boston. Address Bureau of University Travel.

A group of physicians and dentists and a group of teachers will travel together in Palestine and the Soviet Union under the leadership of Dr. Edward Cohen, of the Travel Department of the Amalgamated Bank, and Dr. George M. Price. Although organized as two separate groups, they will go together for the convenience of professional men whose families wish to accompany them. While the doctors visit clinics and hospitals, the teachers and non-medical people will do less specialized sightseeing. The rate for the medical tour is $452, third class, with second-class rail in the Soviet Union. The rate for the teachers' tour is $432, same services. The itinerary allows ten days in Palestine and two weeks in the Soviet Union. Address Amalgamated Bank, 11 Union Square, New York.

A tour for "intellectuals and proletarians," which is described as a United Front group, will be led by Rose and Bob Brown, who formerly taught at Commonwealth College. The group spends thirty-one days in the Soviet Union. The rate is $398, third class throughout. Address Compass Travel Bureau.

Two groups have been announced for the Moscow Theater Festival in September. The Drama League Travel Bureau, Essex House, New York, has appointed Harold Ehrensperger, formerly its executive secretary, to conduct its party. The rate is $545, tourist class on the ocean, second class elsewhere, twelve days in Leningrad and Moscow.

Herbert Kline, editor of New Theater Magazine, will conduct a party of writers, actors, directors, and other theater workers. For particulars address Herbert Kline, New Theater Magazine, 156 West Forty-fourth Street, New York.

Vivienne France, an American Negro, has been living for the past two years in Moscow, where she is consultant and research fellow at the Laboratory of Anthropo-Physics. Miss France will lead a thirty-three-day tour in the Soviet Union with particular reference to minority cultures. The rate is $494, third class. Address The Open Road.

Professor Lucy Textor of Vassar, an established authority on Russia, will lead a Soviet Forum tour which spends twenty five days in the Soviet Union, returning via the Balkans. The rate is $445, third class, except for second-class rail in the U. S. S. R. Address William M. Barber, Babson Park, Massachusetts.

A twelve-day trip in the Soviet Union is offered to delegates at the World's Sunday School Convention in Oslo. Dr. R. H. Crossfield, of Birmingham, Alabama, will lead the group. The lower of two rates quoted is $635, tourist-class steamship passage, second class abroad. The rate does not include the period spent at the convention. Ten days of sightseeing in Europe follow the Russian trip. Address World's Sunday School Association, 51 Madison Avenue, New York.

VISIT SOVIET

RUSSIA

THIS SUMMER

Wide choice of tours. Sailings to suit your own convenience.

Visit Denmark, Sweden and Finland en route to the U.S.S.R. and Poland, Austria, Switzerland and France on return . . . or have tour arranged in accordance with your own plans. Lowest rates assured.

COMPREHENSIVE TOUR

of the Soviet Union and Europe for educators and students

Leader: PHILIP BROWN

Pioneer in educational group travel in the Soviet Union. Sailing from New York July 1.

SPECIAL TOUR

Join our Grand Tour for general visit to any part of the Soviet Union. Sailing on the

S.S. NORMANDIE, June 30th

Conducted by

M. B. HORTON

President, Union Tours

Mr. Horton has conducted 25 tourist parties to the Soviet Union since 1927

AROUND THE WORLD

via the Transsiberian

A life adventure within the limits of an ordinary vacation.

From Portland around the world to New York

'350

Top Class on Steamers

Union Tours Leads the Way to the Soviet Union

Information upon request

UNION TOURS

261 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK

Letter to the Editors

COAL, CONVICTS, AND THE SUPREME COURT

Dear Sirs: The federal government has been blocked by the United States Supreme Court in many attempts to regulate industry. Specifically, of course, the question is whether the commerce clause of the Constitution can be construed broadly enough to uphold the attempted regulation. In the child-labor, the NRA, and the AAA cases, the Supreme Court has declared that manufacture and agriculture are matters primarily for state concern. And the court has now under advisement the Guffey Coal Act, which presents the same problem in somewhat more unusual form.

The issue in the coal case is perhaps unique in that, at the hearing in the lower court, there was a mass of testimony to the effect that federal action alone could prevent demoralization of the industry. Owners of mines gave this testimony; so did union organizers and members and various local officials. In support of it we have the unprecedented action whereby nearly all the states in which mining is an important industry filed briefs with the Supreme Court of the United States, asking that court to uphold the law.

Perhaps the court has shown a way by which federal regulation can be significantly expanded. Many states have enacted laws which make illegal the sale within their borders of convict-made goods. In aid of these laws Congress prohibited the interstate shipment of such goods into states the laws of which forbade their sale. In this respect Congress was following the old-established precedent in the liquor trade. The Supreme Court of the United States had upheld its right to enact such a law, mainly on the ground that the liquor trade had always been subject to regulation, owing to the inherently harmful nature of alcohol. In the child-labor case, however, the majority of the court had limited this doctrine to merchandise harmful to the user. Since the mere fact that goods were manufactured by child labor did not affect their usefulness as goods, the court declared Congress without power to regulate the interstate shipment of such goods.

However, in the convict-labor case, contentions of the State of Alabama, based largely on the child-labor case, were overruled by a unanimous court. Justice Sutherland pointed out that many states had enacted laws prohibiting the sale of goods made by convict labor on the ground that their sale in competition with that of goods manufactured by free labor was bound to affect employment. Here, for the first time, the court recognized the concept of economic harm, as distinguished from harm due to some character inherent in the goods themselves, as a ground for interference with interstate commerce.

Let us suppose that a number of states were to enact laws prohibiting the sale within their borders of goods made by child labor and that, in support of these laws, Congress were to prohibit the shipment into such states of goods thus manufactured. Under the convict-labor decision it would seem that such laws, both of the states and of Congress, would be upheld by the court. And it is interesting to speculate on the fate of laws proceeding along converse lines. Suppose the various states in which coal is an important industry were to prohibit the sale of coal, unless it was manufactured in accordance with certain principles of fair dealing between employer and employee and between competing producers, and suppose that Congress, in aid of these laws, were to prohibit the shipment of coal manufactured in violation of these laws, both out of and into such states. Would not such laws come also within the decision in the convict-labor case? That, in effect, would be the Guffey Coal Act, buttressed by state legislation instead of merely by state briefs. The lead would then have to be taken by the states, perhaps as the result of an interstate conference culminating in a compact to be approved by Congress, and supplemented by a federal law of the character outlined.

And if this could be successfully done for coal (hurdling, perhaps, the obstacle of the Fourteenth Amendment), it could be done for cotton, wheat, or any other product. For the convict-labor case is an entering wedge for the introduction of the doctrine of economic harm as distinguished from physical harm. To this extent the case marks a great advance in realistic thinking in the United States Supreme Court. It is to be hoped the decision will not in the future be whittled away by subtle distinctions.

OSMOND K. FRAENKEL
New York, April 15

LOUIS M. LYONS has been for fifteen years a versatile member of the staff of the Boston Globe, serving as reporter, feature writer, columnist, and editorial writer. He knows Massachusetts!

ERSKINE CALDWELL, whose play "Tobacco Road" has had a longer run in New York than any other play except "Lightnin'" and the redoubtable "Abie's Irish Rose," is generally accepted by critics as one of the most important novelists now writing in the United States.

M. R. BENDINER, formerly assistant editor of the World Tomorrow, is on the staff of Editorial Research Reports in Washington. He has written for the American Mercury and other magazines.

ANITA BRENNER grew up in Mexico. She is familiar to Nation readers as an expert on that country and on Spain, which she has several times visited to study political and economic conditions. Her books are "Idols Behind Altars" and "Your Mexican Holiday," a distinguished and complete guidebook.

M. E. RAVAGE, The Nation's regular correspondent in France, is the author of many articles and several books on Europe.

ALVIN JOHNSON was associate editor of the Encyclopedia of Social Sciences. He is director of the New School for Social Research and founder of the University in Exile. This year he was elected president of the American Economic Association, and his first novel, "Spring Storm," has just been published.

SHEPARD STONE is in the Sunday Department of the New York Times, for which he regularly writes on foreign affairs.

DONALD SLESINGER was formerly assistant dean of social sciences at the University of Chicago and chairman of the Social Science Research Council. At present he is training housing administrators in Washington under the Federal Housing Department.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 60 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · MAY 6, 1936

NUMBER 3696

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

HOBSON'S CHOICE FOR PUERTO RICO	567
TAXING SURPLUSES	568
RELIEF CIRCUS IN JERSEY	569
PAROLE AND MURDER	570
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	571
A FRENCH LEFT VICTORY by M. E. Ravage	573
THE BRITISH CABINET—A HOUSE DIVIDED by Harold J. Laski	575
HARRY BRIDGES: RANK-AND-FILE LEADER by Louis Adamic	576
THE HOLLYWOOD TEA PARTY by Morrie Ryskind	581
WILL NEUTRALITY KEEP US OUT OF WAR? by Marion Donnelly	582
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	583
BROUN'S PAGE	584
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
THE NOT SO HOPELESS MOVIES by Joseph Wood Krutch	585
FORM AND MATERIAL by Mark Van Doren	586
BRYAN: A FRIENDLY PORTRAIT by George Fort Milton	587
HUXLEY EVALUATED by Leigh White	588
POET IN SEARCH OF A PUBLIC by Philip Blair Rice	589
THE CULTURAL IMPACT by Margaret Mead	590
THE NIJINSKY LEGEND by John Martin	590
SHORTER NOTICES	591
DRAMA: "DULCE ET DECORUM" by Joseph Wood Krutch	592
RECORDS: by Henry Simon	593
DRAWINGS: by Georges Schreiber, Fritz Eichen- berg, and Howard Cook.

The Shape of Things

★

ON MAY DAY AGAIN THE MASSED FORCES OF the workers, marching the world over except where the labor and liberal elements have been crushed by fascism, reenact a ritual and a demonstration that have become historic and that have immense emotional meaning. Happily the May Day celebration in American cities this year is being conducted under a United Labor May Day Committee, which only the Old Guard Socialists have refused to enter. The manifesto drawn up by the cooperating groups—on fascism, war, unemployment, trade-union organization, civil liberties, the Supreme Court, and a Farmer-Labor Party—is an impressive commentary on how basic and extensive are the interests which all workers, regardless of political views, have in common. In Spain and France the people have forged out of these common interests a political unity that has thus far come away with a clean and notable success. It remains to determine whether the same can be done in America. This year's observance marks the fiftieth anniversary of the inauguration of May Day by the American Federation of Labor in 1886, as part of the fight for an eight-hour day. But this May marks another important anniversary—of the British general strike, which ran its brief but exciting course ten years ago and which was the most significant proof the world has witnessed of labor's power in an industrial society. We have been going over the files of The Nation, and the change from the editorial position of fifty years ago, when The Nation of Godkin called for the use of military force against the emerging labor movement, to the militant letters from England contributed on the British general strike by Harold Laski measures the change in the liberal attitude toward workers' rights and workers' power. But every step of the way has been won by organization and struggle.

★

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

MR. ROOSEVELT MADE A SPEECH IN NEW YORK at the Jefferson Day dinner and rejoiced because he could see no grass growing in the city streets. If he had looked across the river at Trenton he would have seen something to pierce the front of professional optimism at the Commodore. He would have seen unemployed and reliefless workers in possession of the State House, holding a tragicomic session while the confused legislators were nowhere to be found. In the face of this abdication of government Mr. Roosevelt's insistence that "the strong arm of the nation is needed not in immediate relief alone—we grant that. . . It is equally needed in taking measures to prevent economic disasters" sounded a bit hollow. Mr. Roosevelt is a masterful broker of ideas. His speech was a smooth exposition of the truisms about the economic unity of the country and the organic pattern formed by the New York garment workers and the Nebraska corn and hog farmers. It was also a plea for higher wages, which is all to the good. It is worth noting, however, that in the matter of economic theory the President has learned nothing and has forgotten nothing since the early days of his Administration when the purchasing-power theory was first officially adopted. Mr. Roosevelt is obviously making a strong bid for the labor vote. But it is notable that while his bid, and that of Governor Lehman, was to the workers and small tradesmen, the figures they cited to prove that "we are on our way" out of the depression were figures about corporate profits, dividends, farm prices, but not figures about wages, employment, relief. The workers and their leaders should remember that while Mr. Roosevelt stands against reaction he does not stand for labor and the common man. Between those two positions there is a chasm which his most urbane phrases will not bridge.

*

HITLER'S APPOINTMENT OF GENERAL GÖRING to supersede Dr. Schacht as dictator of German economic policies was doubtless forced on him as a means of offsetting the growing discontent with Schacht's deflationary program. No one has ever credited Göring with superior ability in handling economic problems, but his appointment should quiet the radicals within the Nazi Party who have long been restless under Schacht's restrictive policies. Actually, however, there is little that Göring or anyone else can do to improve living standards as long as the Third Reich continues to rearm at the present feverish pace. This being the case, popular support will continue to be whipped up, as at present, by demonstrations directed against foreign countries. Already rumors are afloat that German military detachments are being concentrated along the Austrian frontier. While it is agreed that Germany will not intervene unless requested to do so by a powerful Austrian group, preparations are apparently being made to precipitate such a demand. The collapse of the Jewish-owned Austrian Phoenix Insurance Company is believed to have been deliberately brought about in order to foster anti-Semitism in Austria. The present controversy over the disarmament of the Heimwehr might also furnish Hitler with the pretext for which he is waiting. Whether the expected Austrian coup will materialize depends not only on internal conditions in Germany but also on the support which Britain gives to Europe's anti-Nazi front.

*

THE AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' Association spent its annual convention in a hysteria over the Black committee's threats to the freedom of the press. Colonel McCormick of the Chicago Tribune acted Cassandra and prophesied that if the committee got away with seizing private correspondence "they would come back later and take your watch and then come back later and take your daughter." Simultaneously in Washington David Lawrence, publisher of the United States News, got into a panic about what he felt was the President's attempt to gag newspapermen. In some off-the-record remarks Mr. Roosevelt was said to have made at the Gridiron dinner, and in the charge made by the Democratic publicity director that the G. O. P. had taken over Mark Sullivan, David Lawrence, and Frank Kent as official propagandists, Mr. Lawrence saw "the first signs of a real dictatorship." But what is it that our publishers and editors really fear? Is it the threat to the peoples' liberties or the threat to the unlimited exercise of their own power? At a meeting of the Associated Press held two days before the publishers' convention, Sir Wilmott Lewis, Washington correspondent for the London Times, made a speech which some of the A. N. P. A. members must have heard, though it seems doubtful that they listened. "The danger which confronts freedom of the press," he said, "is not chiefly from without but from within. It is the danger . . . that the freedom which makes us great and useful may make some of us too great, that individuals may acquire a power which they cannot be prevented from harnessing in the service of personal ambition rather than of the community from which their strength flows."

*

AFTER FIFTEEN MONTHS OF CAREFUL WORK, Mayor LaGuardia's City Charter Commission has produced a document that will certainly not set New York afire. The new city charter, as presented by Chairman Thacher and his colleagues, is a sober, conservative, middle-of-the-road plan, the main feature of which is the substitution of a City Council of twenty-nine members for the thoroughly discredited Board of Aldermen. The body will have local legislative power and will leave the Board of Estimate as an executive body in control solely of the business affairs of the city. Other important features of the new charter are a City Planning Commission, which will coordinate the work of improvements to New York's local geography, and a central Department of Housing and Buildings instead of a department for each borough as at present. The several boroughs will be empowered to initiate only local improvements, with a strict limit to expenditures. For the rest, things remain pretty much as they are. The Mayor will still have power to appoint and remove heads of departments; the proposal to regularize city finances, putting the city gradually on a "cash basis," is in line with the procedure of the present Fusion administration. The success of the City Council plan, of course, depends largely on the adoption of proportional representation, which with the new charter will be voted on next November. For without proportional representation, a determined Tammany would probably find it not much harder to elect twenty-nine councilmen than sixty-five aldermen. And New York will find itself, if it adopts the charter without changing the mode of selecting candidates, with a more orderly arrangement of the same sort of government it now has, subject to the same irresponsible controls and the hazards of machine politics.

May 6, 1936

THIS WEEK WE PRINT THE EDITORIAL WHICH was awarded first prize in the contest for college students sponsored by The Nation and the Foreign Policy Association. One's first reaction on reading the 241 manuscripts submitted was to bewail the limitations of present-day academic training. Few of the papers could by any stretch of the imagination be called editorials. They included historical essays, written debates, a somewhat clever parable, and even an attempted drama. A number of the contestants never got far beyond the War of 1812. Despite these limitations, the results of the contest were more encouraging than otherwise. All the students were deeply in earnest about peace, and only two favored armaments as a means of achieving that end. An overwhelming majority stood for greater international cooperation, although perhaps they somewhat minimized the obstacles to such action. Most striking of all was the fact that less than a dozen of the participants were in sympathy either with the present neutrality law or the more drastic measures proposed in the Nye-Maverick bill. By inference or by explicit statement the majority leaned toward American participation in the League of Nations. On more fundamental issues the showing was somewhat less encouraging. While nearly all of the students showed a healthy appreciation of the important role of economic forces in making for war, few seemed to realize how deeply the seeds of conflict are imbedded in the capitalist system. In other words, the opinions of the students of today are definitely conditioned by the prejudices of their elders.

*

THE STRENGTH EXHIBITED BY THE FRENCH Front Populaire in the preliminary elections of April 26 makes a large left majority in the new Chamber of Deputies almost a foregone conclusion. Although most of the contests will not be decided until after the May 3 run-off elections, there is an excellent chance that the left will obtain substantially more than the 330 seats held in the old Chamber. The left coalition has also made possible a sharp increase in the relative number of seats held by the Communists and Socialists, since these parties have traditionally knifed each other in the second vote. The final result hinges on the attitude of the more conservative wing of the Radical Socialist Party. While that party has not shown any signs of wavering in its anti-fascist stand, a substantial portion of its middle-class following is likely to have qualms at voting for Socialists or Communists in the run-off election. Nevertheless, the left-wing Radical Socialists, who have been most active in supporting the Front Populaire, came off better in the first vote than men like Herriot who had been lukewarm toward the coalition. Left victories have become almost a habit in France since the war, but the left parties have never been able to maintain sufficient unity to set up a stable government. On another page of this issue Mr. Ravage, our Paris correspondent, outlines reasons for hoping that the 1936 Front Populaire will have more stability than the cartels of 1924 and 1932. In any case France has shown, as did Spain a few weeks earlier, the tremendous mass support which the left can obtain in the struggle against fascism.

NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN HAS GIVEN GREAT Britain an elementary lesson in economics for which it should be profoundly grateful. Instead of concealing the cost of the armament program in a vast government deficit, as most political leaders have done, he has dramatized it for the entire population by increasing taxation in such a way as to make the largest number of persons aware of the added burden. The normal income tax, already more than five times as high as in the United States, is to be increased threepence a pound to $23\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. And to make certain that the millions who do not pay an income tax will share in the lesson, the tax on tea—the one British indispensable—has been boosted twopence a pound. In explaining his action Mr. Chamberlain declared that only a few weeks ago he had hoped to reduce taxes instead of raising them, but that an increase of \$100,000,000 in the cost of the fighting services demanded new "sacrifices" from the country. The full extent of these "sacrifices" has not yet been revealed. The government is known to be planning a large bond issue to cover part of the costs of armament, and further tax increases are expected in the next and succeeding budgets. As if to add point to Mr. Chamberlain's lesson, the Italian Official Gazette has published figures showing Italy's tribute to Mars since the outbreak of hostilities to be \$800,000,000.

Hobson's Choice for Puerto Rico

OUTWARDLY the move of the Administration in offering independence to Puerto Rico within four years seems, to the uncritical eye, the generous act of a liberty-loving people. Actually it is no such thing. The bill introduced by Senator Tydings came without a word of warning, either to the Puerto Rican or the American people. There was no attempt to enlist the counsel or support of the Puerto Rican leaders, no impartial investigation of conditions on the island and its relations with America, no open consideration of the grounds of policy. We have seen the lords and rulers of the Puerto Ricans since we conquered the island at the end of the last century, and that fact may seem to warrant our dealing out the sort of justice we please. But by any other criterion this move is as shabby a bit of ethical dealing as it is a sorry piece of statesmanship.

The actual motives behind this move of the Administration are not very difficult to penetrate. We added Puerto Rico to our empire at a time when it seemed glamorous for the United States to build up a set of colonial possessions. We were following the example of England and the other European countries, and here was a jewel in what we hoped would be a dazzling imperial crown. But the hard fact is that Puerto Rico has proved no jewel of any kind, but a decided economic liability. The costs of administration are so much loss, unless we count the compensating profits to the American absentee owners of Puerto Rican sugar and tobacco fields. We are now paying out something like a million a month as a relief bill, and we had laid down a reconstruction program involving some $25,000,000. At a time when even the relief bill at home is a staggering load to bear, this may seem an unnecessary burden—especially when the behavior of the Puerto Ricans themselves appears ungrateful to the highest degree. The murder of the American chief of police, Colonel E. F. Riggs, by two members of the Nationalist Party and the program of further terrorism that the party has committed itself to were probably of immense importance in influencing our decision. Childish as it may seem, our attitude is that if the Puerto Ricans are not going to play fair, we won't play at all. It would be impossible to get a Puerto Rican jury to convict the assassins, and no one would relish the proclamation of martial law, especially since the Administration is already considerably embarrassed by the repercussions of the Puerto Rican situation on the proposed pan-American peace conference. But behind these immediate factors, behind the relief bill and the recent terrorism, there is the political advantage of a move of this sort from the standpoint of domestic policy. As in the case of Philippine independence, there are groups in America that stand to gain by setting Puerto Rico adrift. Those groups, principally the beet-sugar growers, would prefer to have the island products put on a tariff basis rather than admitted free. And it happens that those groups are politically influential with the present Administration.

Thus we have a set of factors which, in varying proportions, have contributed toward this new policy of imperialism in reverse. But the actual consequences of such a policy for Puerto Rico are bound to prove disastrous. Conditions in the island are worse than in our worst slums or the darkest areas of our own South. There are over a million and a half people in all, and their fate is tied to the sugar crops in the bottom lands and the coffee and tobacco crops in the hills. There is practically no independent farming, most of the population being in a state of virtual peonage to the big plantations. Unemployment runs from 60 per cent during the sugar season to 80 per cent at other times. The middle class is weak, the trade unions are poorly organized, the professions are scanty, illiteracy is high, public health work is practically non-existent. These are the people toward whom we are now adopting an attitude of injured innocence and unappreciated virtue.

What is the choice that we are offering the Puerto Ricans? It is not the glittering choice it seems between independence on the one hand and a beneficent American administration on the other. It is a Hobson's choice between domination by American absentee interests, whose representatives are deeply entrenched on the island, and the certain economic catastrophe that the independence measure would bring. Independence would mean at best a tariff on Puerto Rican sugar, which would thus be placed on the same basis as Cuban sugar. But the fact is that Puerto Rico has poorer sugar soil than Cuba and a higher production cost. Nor is the choice of diversifying its farming and making itself economically self-sufficient—however desirable that might eventually be from a social standpoint—a real or immediate choice for Puerto Rico. Right now sugar offers the highest yield for the total national income, although not enough of that total goes to the Puerto Rican workers and too much of it goes to the American companies.

The one outstanding fact we must keep in mind is that we are not dealing here with a fresh situation, which we can dispose of at will. We have responsibilities toward the Puerto Ricans—responsibilities both for what we have done and what we can do. The economic state they are in is largely the result of the absentee ownership we have imposed on them. The political state they are in, confused as it is, is intelligible only in terms of the impact of American political ideas and ideals upon a semi-feudal social system. The Liberal-Labor coalition now in control does not really want independence, though it may find it desirable to talk about independence, in view of the economic hegemony exercised by the American companies. The Nationalist group which has been responsible for the recent terrorism is small and under any other conditions would be unimportant. It is made up largely of impoverished students and middle-class intellectuals, is fiercely anti-labor, and is reactionary in every sense except the fierce idealism that inspires its demands. We believe independence for Puerto Rico is the only final basis on which the United States can handle this problem with dignity. But it should be talked about only when the economic and political problem is on the road toward solution, and it should be talked about only on terms that would make for solution. Under the terms the Tydings bill proposes it would mean economic ruin, political turmoil, and the shattering of whatever framework of civil liberties the island is now enjoying.

The statesmanlike course would be to base a program upon the expressed needs of the Puerto Rican people as well as ours, and upon a thorough and open study of the economic and political condition of the island. The statesmanlike course would be to forget all notions of pique and revenge: American colonial policy cannot be carried on in fits of spleen. The statesmanlike course would be to chart a program of economic reconstruction for the island which would be closely tied to the developing labor organizations that must form the framework of a new Puerto Rican society. Once the phrase "Carthaginian peace" went down in history applied to peace terms so drastic that they became synonymous with ruthless destruction. Let us avoid the danger that the same will be true of the phrase "Puerto Rican independence."

Taxing Surpluses

THE changes made in the Administration's tax bill since its introduction in the House two months ago have been so many and so technical that the voter is left somewhat bewildered regarding the present status of the measure. Fortunately, there has been no fundamental change in principle. The revision has been prompted primarily by two considerations: (1) a desire to perpetuate the differential in the existing law in favor of small corporations; and (2) an attempt to give relief to corporations that are deeply in debt. By some curious quirk in thinking, Congress has become imbued with the idea that bigness is necessarily undesirable and should be penalized. Consequently it has drawn up a schedule of taxation for corporations having incomes of less than $10,000 which is very much lighter than the rates applied to those with incomes of over $40,000. Establishments having incomes of over $10,000 and less than $40,000 are to be assessed under a complicated intermediate schedule which varies with the size of the income as well as the size of the reserve. The bill has also been revised to allow corporations to pay a flat rate of 22½ per cent on earnings set aside for the amortization of debts.

The minority report on the bill is a refreshing illustration of the depths to which the Republicans have descended in their efforts to stem the popularity of the New Deal. It intimates that the measure is directly in line with "Professor Tugwell's" nefarious scheme to turn the American government over to Moscow, and makes much of the fact that a representative of the Communist Party was one of the three non-Administration witnesses to testify in favor of the bill. With remarkable agility it shifts from the position that the bill will force corporations to pay out practically all of their earnings, thus leaving them with no protection against a "rainy day" and depriving the government of much-needed revenue, to the position that the small stockholders will suffer from the extremely high rate of taxation on corporations which retain a large proportion of their income in reserve.

Following the cue given by the Republicans in the House, the conservative press has tried desperately to make it appear that the bill constitutes a threat to the existing economic system. Actually the tax is extremely moderate in its provisions. While it is intended to discourage the accumulation of huge surpluses, it should not prevent corporations from setting aside the necessary reserves for expanding and modernizing their plant. Even with liberal allowances for reserves, the corporation tax will in many instances be less than under the present law. A corporation earning $10,000 a year, for example—and 86 per cent of American corporations earn less than $10,000—may set aside 30 per cent of its income as surplus and yet pay a tax of only 7½ per cent as compared with 10 per cent under the existing law. If a corporation has a net income of $10,000,000, it may apportion $1,000,000 for surplus, and pay only a 4 per cent tax as against 15 per cent at present. Only when the retained portion reaches $3,000,000 will the tax be as high as it is now. The gain for the government arises solely out of the fact that distributed earnings will be subject to the graduated personal-income tax, whereas at present corporations may defeat the purpose of the income tax by plowing under virtually their entire earnings. Even in its weakened form the bill should force corporations to distribute most of their current profits. Such action is bound to have a considerable effect on our economic structure, but one that would scarcely be opposed by the staunchest conservatives if they understood its implications. Keynes and others have repeatedly warned against the loss of consumer purchasing power resulting from over-saving by corporations. Any measure which would force them to utilize their profits would contribute substantially to economic stability.

Relief Circus in Jersey

THERE is something profoundly disturbing in the spectacle of workless men and women occupying the seats of the legislators of a sovereign state which is incapable of giving them work and has now even declared itself powerless to give them bread. It calls to mind the grass that grows in the mighty amphitheaters of the Roman Empire; but it has none of the majestic significance of those relics of a superseded past. Instead it wears the sinister look of man-made decadence, of a stupidity in the midst of plenty, in which only the revolutionist can find cause for hope.

The direct assault of relief clients upon their duly elected representatives is not new. In New Jersey the demonstration was organized after 270,000 people had been consigned to the mercies of local agencies by the failure of the legislature to make any provision for continuing state relief. A few weeks ago 200 WPA workers camped for ten days in the Assembly Chamber of the Wisconsin State Capitol in an attempt to get higher wages. The federal government, by withdrawing direct relief to states, has set the stage for increasingly serious and widespread demonstrations on the part of the hundreds of thousands of people who must wander between WPA jobs and state and local relief, which is reserved for "unemployables" and is totally inadequate even for them.

The increasing misery out of which demonstrations, protests, and "riots" may be expected to grow is hidden in the serried figures of an FERA report on the amount of obligations for emergency relief incurred respectively by federal, state, and local agencies for 1933, 1934, and 1935. The most eloquent figures are those for the four quarters of 1935. In Alabama the federal contribution to direct relief during the second quarter was $6,606,043; the state contributed $26,152. In the fourth quarter the federal figure had been reduced to $1,419,998 but the state's contribution had only increased to $148,470. The local funds meanwhile had fallen from $424,879 in the second quarter to $101,007 in the fourth. The figures for Arizona are equally discouraging. Federal relief was cut from $2,017,384 in the second quarter to $875,451 in the fourth; state funds decreased from $365,808 to $157,122. The amount spent by local agencies in Arizona remained stationary—it was zero in both quarters. While the figures for Alabama and Arizona are among the blackest, they represent a tendency which runs through the statistics for the whole country. Presumably direct federal relief for "employables" was replaced by WPA jobs. But the WPA has not taken up more than three-fifths of the burden.

There is little reason to believe that state and local relief will expand quickly enough to cope with the demand upon it. Local finances, like the rate of reemployment and wage scales, have not the same resiliency as speculative stocks. What is needed is the direct use of the national power and resources to meet the national problem of relief. Mr. Roosevelt in his Jefferson Day speech said that all Americans are part of one economic pattern. He and Mr. Hopkins should get together.

Parole and Murder

EXCELLENT police work! Failure of the parole system! These are the two conclusions that crop up in almost every editorial comment on the solution of the Titterton case. The first is loose thinking, the second is dangerous thinking. Both of them reach beyond the case itself to the nature of our press and the sources of the mass-hysterias that come over us periodically.

The murder itself was a cruel and deeply tragic affair, scarcely credible except as the act of a sick mind. It is not hard to see why it should have stirred people, especially since it made them acutely aware of how, even in the midst of a highly refined and complicated civilization, the individual may be unprotected against a sudden and crude onslaught. But there are many cases that might call equally for our horror and condemnation. What happened here was that the murder came during a lull in the procession of newspaper sensationalism. The Hauptmann case was over, and the papers were looking for something to take its place. They paraded the private affairs of the victim and her family, welcomed the suspense that was built up around the case day after day, and fell into an ecstasy over the miracle that the police were supposed to have wrought in solving it. Actually, of course the case was not as tangled as we are led to believe. There was nothing to be ecstatic about except that everyone loves to track down a criminal, and the primitive revenge-responses are more marketable commodities in the newspaper field than are logic and restraint.

But a more disturbing part of the same emotional fabric was the press campaign against the parole system. We are reprinting on this page an exhibit that the New York press should not be proud of—excerpts from editorials blaming the murder on the fact that Fiorenza was out on parole. They illustrate the hysteria that the American press fell into—a hysteria tied up with the need we seem to feel for rationalizing our interest in crime and death. The feature writer can play up the gory details: the editorial writer has to draw from them some noble moral or some significant social deduction.

The social deduction drawn here was untrue as fact and vicious in its possible consequences. The record of paroled prisoners is strikingly good when we consider the difficult social conditions under which they must try to rebuild their lives. While some of the writers pointed out that there were relatively few cases of recidivism, there was little chance for restraint amid the torrent of indignation. None defended parole with any vigor; none pointed out the absurdity of keeping a man in jail for the rest of his life for stealing. Everything we know about the effects of prison experience indicates that if Fiorenza had served out his term in prison he would scarcely have been a better person on release. In fact, the whole Fiorenza incident, so far from being an argument against parole, illustrates the soundness of its basic idea. It is an argument for the extension of the parole idea—that a criminal needs a decent chance to find himself—to include the protection and treatment of psychopathic criminals. The report on Fiorenza years ago as one who might get into a true hysterical neurosis should have been enough to send him to a hospital for observation and psychiatric treatment.

Let us agree that parole as it stands now is an imperfect instrument, chiefly because of the imperfections of administration. But the institution of parole is the result of more than a century of difficult thought and effort on the part of a succession of great criminologists. To attack it now so irresponsibly is to turn our backs upon that century of development. Especially dangerous are the political implications of such an attack. We need not wonder that the Hearst papers are using the double human tragedy represented by the Titterton case not only to build sales but also to strengthen their reactionary program, to arouse in readers the cheap and irrational impulses so useful to the demagogue.

The campaign against a rational criminology is everywhere part of the campaign against rational political institutions and against rational and humane methods of settling our social difficulties. The tragic thing is to find the liberal and progressive papers unwittingly swelling the Hearst chorus. They do not see that the attack on the science of criminology as exemplified in the parole system is part of a general pattern of political thought and a general social outlook with which they can have no traffic.

"Will his life be spared to be safeguarded by society perhaps under detention, perhaps again under probation?" New York Sun, April 23

"The whole case becomes a challenge to courts which hand out suspended sentences."

New York World-Telegram, April 22

"Yet so long as parole turns murderous monsters out of prison before their time, the failures of the system are bound to be of greater public concern than its successes."

New York American, April 22

"The sentimental who say 'give the poor criminal another chance' will note that the murderer was a convict, on parole, when he killed the woman. He had 'another chance' and made use of it."

Arthur Brisbane

"Are other lives menaced by slipshod methods on parole? Is sufficient care being exercised in granting paroles and in fixing indeterminate sentences?"

New York Post, April 22

"The other murderer of Mrs. Titterton—the parole system. The real and most dangerous criminal actually responsible for the horrible crime is our parole system, that makes a mockery of justice and makes itself the murderer's friend and ally. . . ."

New York Daily Mirror, April 22

"When will America wake up? Will the lesson of Mrs. Nancy Titterton's brutal killing be as futile as those before it . . . in which criminals on parole or probation walk the streets until they take a human life, and even then may beat the rap?"

New York Evening Journal, April 23

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Face-Saving in WPA

Washington, April 26

ALMOST every day something happens to give Harry Hopkins a firmer claim to the title of Unhappiest Man in Washington. As if his days and nights were not sufficiently horrendous with thoughts of the inadequacy of the program he is administering and of the still more callous inadequacy of the program his White House boss proposes to have him run after July, Hopkins's dunder-headed subordinates are everlastingly busy concocting new tortures for him. Their latest invention has been the arrest of ten pickets in a Pennsylvania WPA strike on charges of violating Section 9 of the Emergency Relief Act of 1935, which Hopkins publicly had promised never would be used to break strikes or otherwise curtail the collective-bargaining rights of workers under the WPA.

The section in question says: "Any person . . . who knowingly, by means of fraud, force, threat, intimidation, or boycott, deprives any person of any of the benefits [of this act] . . . shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both." When the act was pending before Congress last year this section drew protests not only from officials of the building-trades unions but also from Hopkins's own labor advisers. Those protests were withdrawn when assurances were given that Section 9 was aimed only at crooked administrative officials, political leeches, and grafting contractors. Nevertheless, on April 13 and 16 ten WPA strikers in Jefferson County, Pennsylvania, including the county chairman of the Workers' Federation, an unemployed organization affiliated with Steve Raushenbush's Pennsylvania Security League, were arrested under Section 9 on complaints issued by two federal agents, Thomas E. Stakem, Jr., and William B. Glendenning, working out of the WPA's offices here. The excuse for the arrests was a fight on one of the struck projects which resulted in the beating up of a "loyal" foreman, but only a few of the men arrested were involved in the fight; the others were miles away from the scene.

The arrested men were hustled before the United States Commissioner at Clearfield, a New Deal appointee, who only a few days earlier had appeared as defense counsel for a hosiery mill arraigned before the NLRB for violation of the Wagner act. The Commissioner, John C. Forsyth, fixed bail for the men at $1,500 each, a figure well beyond the reach of the strikers, and then bound them over for action of the federal grand jury meeting at Pittsburgh May 4. They were taken immediately to Pittsburgh, more than a hundred miles away, and clapped into jail there. And there they remained until a delegation of strikers came to Washington this week and after three days of haggling with Hopkins's subordinates finally forced their release some time Friday night.

The Unhappiest Man in Washington

The important thing in the situation is not that the men were arrested and held in jail for from eight to eleven days. Nor is it the fact that the WPA has in its employ men stupid enough to order the arrests. The important thing is that responsible lieutenants of Hopkins, including in particular Aubrey

Williams, assistant federal administrator, and Edward N. Jones, WPA administrator for Pennsylvania, had to be forced to act. More important still is the fact that Hopkins's headquarters staff was concerned primarily with saving the WPA's face rather than with righting the wrong that had been done. Face-saving has come to be a major occupation in the fraternity. In this case it delayed the release of the men and resulted in a covering-up explanation that they would be tried for simple assault in the state court in Jefferson County.

In another recent case there was an even more blatant attempt at face-saving. That was the case involving the discovery that the WPA had been financing construction of a group of private garment factories in Mississippi disguised as "vocational training schools." John Edelman, of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers, who with a publicity threat forced Hopkins's lieutenants to report the facts to their boss and thus got the projects canceled, said he found them concerned solely with keeping the facts from the public. He added that one of them proposed that, as a way out, the WPA should withdraw its funds from the projects and let the state use the left-over FERA funds to complete the factories. The suggestion may or may not have been passed on to the state authorities, but a few weeks later, following the withdrawal of WPA funds, it was found that FERA funds were being used precisely as suggested, and Hopkins had to order a second cancellation.

Still further evidence of the way of thinking of men occupying responsible WPA posts would have been found in a recent conference here of its "labor adjusters," a group of men employed to see that the rights of WPA workers are observed throughout the country. I am informed by an impeccable authority that a substantial portion of the conference's time was taken up in search for a euphemism with which to cover up discharges for union activity, and that there was a prolonged and serious discussion of whether "vocal activity" would not fill the bill. With such a coterie of field agents at work, it is no wonder that such instances are cropping up as the recent discharge of two WPA foremen in Beaver County, Pennsylvania. One is named Phillips, the other Volpe. Both were officers of the Beaver Valley lodge of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, and both, the NLRB recently ruled, were fired last fall by the Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation at Aliquippa for union activity. A few days before they were to appear before the NLRB to testify against the steel company they were fired from their WPA jobs because of "pay-roll irregularity," according to their identical letters of dismissal.

There is at least a suggestion that the steel company had something to do with these WPA dismissals in the fact that its counsel called the attention of an NLRB aide to the dismissals in an attempt to discredit Phillips and Volpe as witnesses just before they were called to the stand. The fact that the company controls both the Republican and the Democratic machines in the area does not lessen the suspicion; nor does the fact that the incidents given as the reason for the dismissals in March occurred several weeks before Christmas. Pointing in the same direction is the report of the district WPA director, J. V. Downey, who held a hearing on Volpe's and Phillips's appeal from their dismissals. His report is a labored attempt to sustain the dismissals without sustaining the grounds alleged therefor. In his report the dismissals become "indefinite suspensions," the "pay-roll irregularities" charged against Phillips become "some confusion," and the charges against Volpe vanish entirely. There is a reference to "incompetence" and one to "pressure groups," which appears to be Mr. Downey's gentle way of conveying to his superiors that Volpe and Phillips were what America's Daughters and their friends like to call "agitators."

In the final paragraph of his report he abandons his effort at justifying the dismissals, suggests that since WPA workers are having to be laid off in Jefferson County it would be "impracticable" to rehire Volpe and Phillips, and that, anyway, he understands the NLRB has ordered Jones and Laughlin to take them back. So saying, he washes his hands of the case, and so apparently does the WPA, for officials here, though confessedly aware that the steel company has defied the NLRB's order, say they plan to take no action in the case—unless the Pennsylvania Security League wants to press it. Volpe and Phillips were officers of an unemployed organization affiliated with the league. It is doubtful that Hopkins himself would do anything in the case, for to do anything would mean running up against State Administrator Jones; and behind Jones, a Pennsylvania Democratic leader and former Republican police chief of Pittsburgh, stands Senator Guffey, who has persuaded Roosevelt and Farley that the services of such men as Jones are essential to Democratic success at the polls in November.

Two Secretaries Face Facts

THE chronic unhappiness which such conditions as these induce in Mr. Hopkins is as nothing when compared with the acute unhappiness suffered by Secretary of Labor Perkins and Secretary of Commerce Roper for a few hours one day this week when, individually, they faced a delegation from the seamen on strike at New York. It is probable that no Cabinet officer ever before was talked to as Miss Perkins and Uncle Dan were talked to by these sailors, made desperate by their position between the cross fire of the shipowners and the double-cross fire of the international officers of their union. Wearing medals received for valor at sea, they came to push down Roper's throat his Hearst-inspired references to current maritime-labor disputes as "insubordination," "mutiny," and a threat to "safety at sea." I think they succeeded, though no choking sounds were heard from the Secretary, who sat silent while man after man faced him with a first-hand account of the conditions which Roper's own department permits to exist with respect to lifeboats and other safety equipment on ocean-going ships, including some of the most luxurious and popular liners of the American merchant marine. With all their hammering they failed, however, to get Roper to say he would demand an immediate federal investigation by a disinterested commission.

They were an impressive group, and there has been nothing to equal them in that respect since the rank-and-file steel workers came to Washington with their strike threats in 1934. Beside them the unemployed groups, the youth delegations, and the farm delegations forever marching on Washington are about as impressive as the bloodhounds in a Bible-belt Tom show. These were plainly competent men. They wasted no time on theories, professed no altruistic motives. They talked from their bellies and, shunning diplomatic niceties, used two-fisted words, with the result, of course, that federal officialdom had no answers for them. They were most impressive when, finishing with Roper, they called on Miss Perkins and insisted on seeing her, though it meant waiting more than an hour and having openly to scorn Assistant Secretary McGrady's offer to serve as a substitute. They were rough with the Secretary of Labor, especially their leader, Joe Curran, who more than once interrupted her long narration of her part in the California incident by saying: "I just can't stand here and listen to that. It just isn't so."

They said the Secretary had not fulfilled her promise to the California strikers at San Diego that if they would sail their ship back to New York she would use her "good offices" to see that they were not punished for striking. As a matter of fact, when the ship docked at New York sixty-four of the strikers were fined two days' pay, fired, and blacklisted; the Labor Department's agents had not even come near the crew; and as a result of the firing of the sixty-four, the crews of more than thirty ships had gone on strike. Their call had one result: Miss Perkins probably will never again be so ready to save the Administration embarrassment by breaking a strike with a promise of her "good offices" unless she makes certain in advance that her good offices will amount to something.

A French Left Victory

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, April 22

TO BELIEVE the posters and the orators, both sides should emerge triumphant on May 3, if not on April 26. Nationalist spellbinders announce confidently that they will capture such workers' districts as Belleville; the Communists are sure of carrying such a bourgeois stronghold as the suburb of Neuilly. Without accepting the campaign optimism of either side, it is safe to prophesy that unless new international developments arise to confuse the issues, the combined parties of the left will have at least as comfortable a majority in the next Chamber as they had in the last one. Within the Front Populaire substantial shifts in weight are likely to occur; for in the run-off ballot the alliance will operate for the candidates of the bloc as a sort of proportional-representation device. The Communists, whose popular vote in 1932 should have given them three times as many seats as they actually got, are generally conceded thirty or forty deputies to their present ten, their added strength being acquired at the expense of both Radicals and Socialists. Whether their allies will bring off similar gains, or even make good their losses, by a general displacement toward the left is more doubtful. But upon this much all are agreed: although the victory of the Front Populaire may be less decisive than was expected before March 7, the right has no more chance of winning this election than it had that of four years ago.

The nationalists themselves, whatever they may write in their press or say at their meetings, freely admit in private that they expect to be beaten at the polls. But, they add at once, what of that? The left cartel triumphed in '32, didn't it, and also in '24? Much good it did them. Electoral contests in France are sham battles. One side rakes in the votes; the other takes office. The reds, exploiting popular naivete, can arouse the sentimental memories of the great revolution and thus get themselves elected; they may even, by tricky combinations, obtain a parliamentary majority. But they cannot govern. The spurious alliance of Radicals and Socialists gave them control of the Chamber twelve years ago and again four years ago. What followed? No sooner were they in than they fell out. From the start Herriot and after him his successors were obliged to rely on the moderates and the right to carry on at all, since their Socialist campaign partners, paralyzed by rigid doctrine, declined not only to take their responsibilities in the common enterprise for which the people had obviously chosen them, but even to support consistently the cabinets formed by their allies single-handed. The cartel was from the outset an imposture. It made believe to be a governmental coalition; in reality it was nothing but a vote-getting alliance. The Radicals accused their friends of leaving them in the lurch; the Socialists retorted that their partners had not kept the faith. But both knew quite well in advance that their alliance, formed purely for the campaign—not with any constructive object but merely to defeat the common enemy—could only last as long as the campaign. The result was what everyone expected. The cartel having disintegrated, the Radicals, who possessed neither a fixed line of policy nor a solid majority to uphold them, sought favor now with the moderates and the right, now with the extreme left, succeeded in alienating both, and were forced in the end to abandon the ungrateful task in despair. After an avalanche of ministries, each more ephemeral and more impotent than the last, a disillusioned and demoralized country welcomed the National Union—in other words, the right—back to power with a sigh of relief. The cartel of 1924 lasted just two years, that of 1932 barely more than eighteen months.

That is what the Tories put their trust in—the likelihood that 1936 will be a repetition of 1924 and 1932. They have no illusion about obtaining a majority in the "mummery" of popular suffrage. They take part in the campaign largely for propaganda purposes. They are quite prepared to be beaten at the polls. But, relying on analogies, they are confident that the left, having been returned to power, will again discredit itself.

Their calculations may not impossibly

From La Lumière (Paris)

The March of the French Right

be justified by the event. It is all very well for the Radicals and Socialists to recall that Poincaré was able to come back in 1926 and pose as "the savior of the franc" because the financial oligarchy, which is the real government of France, paved the way for him by provoking a panic on the exchange. It is all very well for them to say that Daladier in 1934 was driven from office because the same sinister powers trumped up a political-financial scandal, with which Daladier had nothing to do, and then, when this was not effective enough, loosed the fascist hordes upon the streets. If all this is the truth, it is not the whole truth. The fact remains that the campaign partners in both cartels, after raising the hopes of the voting masses and defeating their foes at the polls, presented a spectacle of discord and incapacity, thereby giving those whom the country had rejected their chance. That is not the way to save democracy and bar the road to fascist dictatorship. It is the surest way to ruin democracy and open the door to adventurers. The events of February 6, when the republic came within a hair's breadth of succumbing, have made that clear enough. Daladier in a recent speech stressed the danger that lies in a repetition of "cartelism." "Another failure of the left," he warned, "another betrayal of the people's faith in us, and the masses will turn in despair to the demagogues and adventurers. Nothing this time will save the regime."

But the reactionaries perhaps rely too confidently on parallels with the past. Nothing can be more misleading than the comparison of the Front Populaire of 1936 with the cartels of 1924 and 1932. The cartel was an electoral bargain between politicians and party machines. The Front Populaire is a mass movement in which the principal role is played, not by leaders, not even by political parties, but by the people themselves. The partnership in '24 and '32 was confined to the Socialists and the Radicals. This year it comprises in addition not only the Communists and the Socialist Union, along with some other political groups; of the ninety-odd affiliated organizations the vast majority are non-political, like the reunited General Confederation of Labor, the youth associations, the women, the intellectuals, and scores of other bodies aggregating, at a conservative estimate, between two-thirds and four-fifths of the population of France. Judging by the temper of this vast movement, it would surprise no one if the rank and file, should the leaders again fail to agree, took matters into their own hands.

Whether or not the party chiefs have learned anything from experience, the people of France seem to have digested the lesson of 1926 and more particularly that of February, 1934. They have identified the enemy. They no longer talk vaguely of reaction, of masters, of capitalists. They have put their finger squarely on the source of their ills. They have learned a few things about what happened on that famous night of February 6-7 two years ago. They have it from the surest source that Daladier was resolved to hold on, until the governor of the Bank of France came and told him that unless he yielded the reins of office there would not be a sou with which to run the state; that thereupon the Premier telephoned to the Communist Party to ask whether it would uphold him, saying, "If you do, I stay anyhow"; and that the Communists refused. This is why the rank and file are concentrating their fire and their hatred against the Bank of France, against the financial and industrial oligarchy, against "the two hundred families, who own, exploit, and ruin the country." That is one of the reasons why the Communists, regretting their errors of 1934, have become "the animators of the Front Populaire." And that is why, should the party chiefs again fail to rid the country of this incubus by parliamentary processes, the masses are determined upon revolution. The tang in the air of France in this year, 1936, resembles nothing so much as the atmosphere of July, 1789.

Finally, the cartels did not for an instant look beyond the campaign period. The Front Populaire has a program—a contract, Léon Blum called it the other day—which not only has set down in black and white the reforms to be carried out by the next government but which has been, in one form or another, approved by all the affiliated parties and enthusiastically indorsed by labor and the other non-political organizations of the people. There will be no excuse this time for mutual recriminations. Radicals, Socialists, and Communists have laid the precise bases of their collaboration. In these last days of the campaign the understanding has been made even more definite. Léon Blum has revealed that an agreement has been reached about the portfolios which are to be assumed by the Socialists in the Front Populaire government.

The peril of discord, then, seems to have been largely exorcised. But there is danger enough elsewhere. It must not be imagined that the Tories and the oligarchs behind them are sitting with their hands folded waiting for annihilation to overtake them. In the last week or two the right's line of action has become fairly plain. First of all, they are reverting to the methods which have served them so well in the past. As this article is being written, reports from every part of the country tell of a flight of capital accompanied by a growing loss of confidence in the national credit and currency. This time, apparently, devaluation of the franc has become inevitable—though it has been said to be inescapable half a dozen times at least in the last two years. The banks, it is said, are only taking care that the moment of its occurrence should be so chosen as to cast discredit on the "revolutionaries" of the Front Populaire. If the Front makes a good showing on April 26, then (so run the reports) the ax will fall before May 3. Meanwhile the fascist groups are almost openly increasing their armaments and rehearsing their mobilizations. The right press, indeed, is announcing these preparations with much emphasis, as warning of what the nation may expect in the event of a left victory at the polls. Lastly, in reactionary quarters much trust is being placed in Hitler. Flandin is said to have declared that the Germans will march into Vienna before the month is over.

In these circumstances, and considering that a whole month elapses between the election and the convening of the Chambers, the left will have to act with vigor and dispatch if its victory is not to turn to defeat and if France is not to be delivered to civil war.

The British Cabinet—a House Divided

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

SINCE the Hoare-Laval incident of last December it has been obvious enough that unity in the Baldwin Cabinet is maintained with considerable difficulty. Mr. Baldwin himself has lost prestige. Mr. Eden preserves the Geneva accent, but internal opposition has proved fatal to his power to act forthrightly. There is division over Italy; there is division over Germany, not least over the military commitments which Hitler's policy involves. The nearer war approaches, the less clear is the mind of the Cabinet about its direction. And there can be little doubt that the differences within the Cabinet reflect a grave divergence of opinion within the Conservative Party itself.

Its basis is the place of the League of Nations in the making of foreign policy. The peace ballot of last June swept the Cabinet into moral commitments far beyond anything in which its members, Mr. Eden apart, really believed. To make the Eden policy successful, it was essential that Italian ambitions should be rendered abortive. Otherwise, all the suspicions of collective security which all but a handful of the Tory members share would be bound to come into operation. Sanctions have failed; and their failure means that the party is anxious to end the risks attached to their application. They jeopardize the friendship of Italy. They make at least possible a Mediterranean war. They may involve an Italian-German alliance which would influence decisively the balance of power. The Tories are no longer willing to take the risks a League policy involves. They prefer to return to the old game of maneuver in which an attitude of semi-isolation combined with rearmament makes Great Britain the contingent arbiter in the power politics of Western Europe.

It is clear that the majority of the Cabinet shares this view. Mr. Eden can count on a small group of his colleagues, Mr. Ormsby-Gore, Mr. Duff-Cooper, Mr. Elliott; but the Prime Minister is on the fence, and the attitude of the rest varies from doubt to downright hostility. An Italian victory, as things are, would not only be a defeat for Mr. Eden; it would gravely compromise the reputation of the whole Cabinet. It might mean war; it may well mean an end of Great Britain's free hand in other fields of action.

That is why the Tories have no longer their old confidence in Mr. Baldwin. He lost a third of his reputation last December. He has lost more since by his curious indecisiveness. The Tories turn increasingly to Mr. Chamberlain, with his hard, clear, narrow mind, as a man who will save them from the moral idealism of Mr. Eden. Under his leadership, they think, with realists like Sir Samuel Hoare and Sir Robert Horne back in office, the Geneva epoch can be ended. And if that means the disappearance of Mr. MacDonald, Sir John Simon, and their followers, so much the better for the Tory party. The time has come to end the period of liberal Toryism. The intrigue is afoot, and it may well prove successful.

Not, indeed, easily successful. Mr. Baldwin's standing in the country is still high; the disappearance of Mr. Eden would be a profound shock to public opinion, which is still faithful to the League; and straight Tory government might well mean a general election in which, in the present temper, Labor would win a good number of seats. But its success, both in the domestic and in the international field, would make possible the "realism" a long departure from which always makes for mental discomfort in the inner Tory mind. Geneva and social reform are not their métier, especially when they involve a threat to peace, a heavy bill of costs, and a flirtation with Russia which goes against the grain. If a general election could be avoided, the loss of Mr. Baldwin would not be too heavy a price to pay, for men like Mr. Amery, in return for the freedom to maneuver that would thus be acquired.

The contradictions of capitalism in its present phase are, in short, reflected in the British Cabinet. Collective security means commitments from which most of its members shrink. They see in the League an instrument which may well, if applied, destroy the countries which they regard as bulwarks against communism. They regret the ambitions of Italy and Germany. But they think their satisfaction a lesser evil than a policy in which England becomes an instrument of anti-fascism. They think Mr. Eden unrealistic. The mind of Europe, in their view, is unprepared for the high principles he attempts to put into action. They do not think them workable; they do not know where they will lead. A strongly armed Britain, free to follow its own interests, is in their view

Drawing by Eichenberg

Mr. Baldwin Straddling

the one path of safety. They understand the methods that conception involves. Geneva, for them, is a strange and dangerous technique involving postulates wholly alien to their temper and purposes. They feel that they can do a deal with the dissatisfied powers if the Covenant is out of the way. They want to get rid of a policy which continually implicates them in its consequences. That means the resignation of Mr. Eden, or his reduction to nullity. It may mean the resignation of Mr. Baldwin, who, so far, has tended to stand by him.

I doubt whether this effort will have any rapid outcome. Any big change in the government, especially in a diehard direction, will not be welcome in the country; and it may well impair the unity of the Tory party. Mr. Baldwin, too, is a good fighter in a corner; and he will not go at the dictation of diehards whose outlook he despises. If he does go, the idea of a Chamberlain-Hoare government may well prove far less desirable than its friends imagine. It would be pro-Italian, pro-German, pro-Japanese. It would reduce the League to a post office. While it would go on arming, it would do nothing to appease the international crisis. Domestically, it might well awaken the same feelings in the unemployed which nearly destroyed the MacDonald government in 1934. It would mean more tariffs; and it would intensify such imperial experiments as Ottawa.

The change would, in a word, end any hope of real collective security against an aggressor Germany without removing the sources of trouble in Europe and the Far East. It would encourage the fascist powers as no other change in European government would do. It would represent an effort to find accommodations for British economic interests without regard to any larger international obligations. It might postpone the issue raised by German and other fascist policies by buying them off. But its true result would be to encourage the fascist appetite by revealing an eagerness to accommodate its claims. On any view, I doubt whether that appetite can now be balked without conflict. I believe also, however, that the replacement of Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Eden by a Chamberlain government would be a victory for the darkest forces in Europe today.

Harry Bridges: Rank-and-File Leader

BY LOUIS ADAMIC

San Francisco, April 23

EARLY in April, en route to Southern California, I stopped off in San Francisco and looked up Harry Bridges, the militant president of the International Longshoremen's Association Local 38-79. I had made an appointment with him three days earlier by long distance from Sacramento.

In response to my knock Bridges opened the door in the thin partition that separates his dingy, windowless, four-by-six office from the rest of the vast and teeming I. L. A. headquarters on Clay Street, a stone's throw from the Embarcadero. "Sorry," he said quickly, "I've no time. I shouldn't be here now. I waited for you only because I promised you I'd be here and didn't know where to call you to cancel the appointment." None the less, sliding into the rickety chair at his small roll-top desk, he invited me to sit down; then we talked rapidly for ten, fifteen minutes.

He is a slight, lanky fellow in his early forties, with a narrow, longish head, receding dark hair, a good straight brow, an aggressive hook nose, and a tense-lipped mouth. He wears cheap clothes and is indifferent about his appearance. His salary as head of the union is less than the average wage of the union members.

The San Francisco headlines that morning told of a "plot" on the part of a member of the conservative element in the marine unions to kill one of the left-wing leaders, and Bridges—probably the hardest-working man in San Francisco—evidently was under great mental and nervous strain. His 'phone rang every few minutes, and in the middle of our interview a man came in from the outer office to inform him that a worker had just been found slugged unconscious on a dock.

Bridges's replies to my questions were swift, brief, evasive; later I learned that on first meeting he is that way with everybody. Talking, he makes quick, irrelevant gestures with his hands, like a soda-jerker away from his counter. He looks anything but a longshoreman or labor leader. At first he doesn't strike one as a leader of any kind. He doesn't look at one directly, but takes short, sudden squints from under his brows. These squints gradually lengthen into glances, which then spread into a shrewd, scrutinizing look. Talk spurts out of him in a low, tensely controlled voice, suggesting that he is not a good platform speaker.

For a minute or two I wondered: Can this man possibly be a strong leader? Then I couldn't help feeling that behind that jittery exterior, in that seemingly frail person, was a lot of calm, deliberate power, which probably was less part of his essential make-up as a person than of the militant-labor-union idea he had embraced and decided to serve, and of the tense and dramatic situation on the West Coast of which he was the storm center. He excited all my interest and I did my best to persuade him to explain himself, either then or later, in terms of his background and the influences that have played on his life. I said I would be in San Francisco again in ten days: would he have more time then and be willing to talk about himself? "No, no—sorry—it isn't only that I'm busy. I prefer not to be publicized as an individual. My personal background and life are unimportant. The movement is important, the situation; but just now I don't want to talk about anything. Whatever I'd say might be twisted by our enemies and used to the detriment of the union." I knew the situation was inchoate, full of cross-currents and fluctuating possibilities, on the verge of new developments.

Having heard of efforts to get him deported as an "alien red plotting to sovietize industry and overthrow the government of the United States by force and violence," I asked him about his status as an immigrant. (He is an Australian, here twelve years.) He said he was not worried about that: he had taken out his first papers and expected to get the full citizenship in due course. I had a feeling he did not consider himself indispensable or think that his deportation would be fatal to maritime unions; later I met some of his associates who obviously are fit to fill his place. Also, should the authorities move to deport him or deny him his citizenship when his time comes, I believe the whole Coast would blaze up from San Pedro to Seattle. He is a hero, perhaps to his annoyance, to hundreds of thousands of workers, most of them native Americans, both in the marine unions and outside them.

We parted and Bridges hurried somewhere; and I, going on to Los Angeles, sent word to The Nation that Bridges did not want to be written up, and that the waterfront situation on the Coast momentarily was so unclear and so lacking in significant incidents that for the present we might better postpone writing and printing anything about it.

But ten days later, when an engagement required me to return to San Francisco, the Santa Rosa affair flared up there, abruptly illuminating several important phases of the situation. To understand that affair, however, one must glance back over the last two years of the Pacific Coast waterfront history and be aware also of what is now going on in the East.

The 1934 strike began over wages and working conditions, but the paramount issue was the employers' "slave market" versus the union hiring hall. That conflict developed political implications in the general strike. When the strike ended—seemingly in the workers' defeat—the marine unions, under Bridges's consistently shrewd leadership, staged the so-called "strategic retreat," agreeing to submit their demands to arbitration. Week after week, as the arbitration dragged on, the shipowners and other waterfront employers lost ground; the unions, organized along the old craft lines, remained solid; and the final National Longshore Award granted the men nearly all their demands.

The whole spirit of the waterfront changed. Competition for jobs at pierheads gave way to cooperation and solidarity. The I. L. A. union membership increased from below two thousand to over four thousand, and the hiring halls distributed the work so evenly that all at once there were no unemployed longshoremen and the average wage became $37 a week, with opportunities to make, under greatly improved working conditions, as much as $200 a month. As one of the longshoremen put it to me the other day, "We experienced the unaccustomed luxury of being men."

This stimulated labor in other crafts, and in many places it organized 100 per cent; after which these and some of the old unions up and down the Coast under the leadership of Bridges and his associates formed the Maritime Federation of the Pacific Coast, which swiftly became a great and growing power. The federation spread to Canada and Hawaii, and its idea—that of industrial as opposed to craft organization for all sea and shoreside workers—commenced to excite the men in the Gulf ports. Committees called on federation officials for aid in setting up locals, and the organization spread to warehouse men, bargemen, and other workers on the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, while its prestige penetrated even to the agricultural areas. Rank-and-file leaders of rural migratory labor hit upon the notion that, since many agricultural products were shipped by sea and rivers, the agricultural workers' union should also be affiliated with the Maritime Federation. They looked forward to the time when organized maritime workers would refuse to handle or transport agricultural products not grown by organized field or orchard labor.

Nervous before, employers now—about a year ago—experienced panic, and their first thought naturally was: This man Bridges and his federation must be stopped! But how? Not a few people concerned with sea-shipping have interests also in river boats and ports and in vast ranch corporations; but while some of them unquestionably are nice enough fellows personally, few have overmuch intelligence or any long-range imagination. Functionally, in the business world, most of them are ignorant pushers, dog-eat-dog opportunists, and fear-torn stuffed shirts, distrusting one another; throughout 1935, secretly admitting that Bridges was one smart so-and-so, they had a hard time in agreeing on any sort of plan by which they could get at him.

Meanwhile, the I. L. A. had developed subtly aggressive dock tactics, designed partly to keep the employers groggy and confused, but mainly to continue improving the men's job conditions. Bridges and other officials of the union believe in giving a fair day's work for a fair wage (they are satisfied that the wages now are good), and soldiering on the job is discouraged by them. On the other hand, they do not want men to overwork. So about a year ago they instituted a system whereby every dock gang elected from among themselves a so-called gang or dock steward to look after their interests and act as their spokesman on the job. These stewards, always wanting something or protesting against this or that, became a great annoyance to the bosses. Some of their demands and protests probably were "unreasonable" from the employers' point of view. There were endless disputes, some resulting in "job action" on the part of workers or quick strikes ("quickies") localized to one dock. Suddenly, in the midst of unloading a ship, the longshore gang would walk off, causing the stubborn employer sailing delay, considerable additional expense, and general irritation.

The federal arbitrator ruled that while workers were obliged under the 1934 agreement to obey the employers, they could quit their jobs at any time, and that "quickies" were not breaches of the award. Required by the award to employ only I. L. A. men, the employer called the hiring hall for another gang, which came promptly enough but as likely as not pulled another "quicky" an hour later; and so on, till the employer yielded to, say, a demand that the slingload be made 2,500 instead of 4,000 pounds. There were also, in the last year, numerous outbursts of violence and frequent questions whether or not the ship to be unloaded was "hot," that is, had been loaded with cargo in another port by non-union men or was manned by scabs. These fights were bitterest on docks operated by companies with strong banking and agricultural ties—the Matson Company, the American-Hawaiian Lines, and the Dollar Steamship Company—which were particularly antagonistic to the "Bridges union."

But the prestige of the Maritime Federation and Bridges only increased. The newspapers called Bridges a red, a Communist, a subversive alien, but the men only laughed at these appellations: "What the hell do we care what he is!"

Last November the big companies, led by the Matson and Dollar officials, determined to have a "showdown" and managed to create a loose united front among the employers, who promptly disagreed as to procedure. One faction was for cracking down on the I. L. A. with vigilante terror and, if necessary, the National Guard. Another group felt such tactics would be unwise; there was too much sympathy with the men among the public. Finally, getting nowhere locally, they decided that this should not be merely a Coast fight but a national one.

On December 9 there met in the San Francisco office of the Waterfront Employers' Association representatives of all important shipping interests in the country, but no definite decision was made then. Their conferences were transferred to New York and Washington. The United States Department of Justice was requested to investigate the waterfront unions, and newspapers in all big port cities began to harp on the communistic and subversive character of some of the seamen's and longshoremen's leaders. In these efforts the employers had the eager cooperation of numerous conservative labor skates, including the biggest of the big shots in the I. L. A. and the International Seamen's Union, both affiliated with the A. F. of L.

On December 31 Louis Stark, the best-informed and most careful labor journalist in the country, reported from Washington in the New York Times that "employers on the Pacific Coast virtually have completed a coastwise 'vigilante' organization to protect their interests in the event that they find themselves unable to obtain redress from the government should the international unions continue to be unable to discipline their Pacific Coast local unions. . . . The Pacific Coast owners are said to be in constant contact with the Atlantic operators . . . and well-informed sources indicate the employers are ready for a 'showdown.' "

On January 7 the representatives of all the important shipping interests reconvened in San Francisco and decided, at a date to be set later, to (1) repudiate publicly all agreements with the unions on the Coast on account of their "irresponsible leadership," (2) deal with workers only as individuals, and (3) give this action a peaceful appearance by laying up for a while some of the ships, ostensibly because operation was financially impossible. In fine, the plan was to make the action a kind of semi-lockout.

Still they were not ready. Thomas Plant, spokesman for the Waterfront Employers, and numerous representatives of shipping companies spent most of January and part of February in New York and Washington, and they probably had a hand in engineering the attack on the Maritime Federation by the national convention of the International Seamen's Union, which directed the Sailors' Union of the Pacific to withdraw from the federation and, when the latter failed to obey, took away its charter. At the same time reports reached the rank-and-file unions on the Coast that in New York City President Ryan of the I. L. A. had entered the united front of the employers.

On January 22 shippers, importers, and exporters were notified that the long-planned semi-lockout would begin on January 26. They were warned to clear up their business. But the Maritime Federation got wind of this and promptly exposed the plan. It called on the federal government to prevent "civil war" on the Pacific Coast waterfronts and charged that a nation-wide conspiracy existed among "waterfront employers, shippers, and allied financial interests to wipe out the Pacific Coast maritime unions," which, the statement continued,

. . . are run by their members, not by "Communists." It is a peculiarity of Pacific Coast maritime unions that officials must submit every action of the slightest importance to a majority vote of the membership. And that is precisely what the owners object to. They do not like democracy. They profess to admire Atlantic Coast maritime unions, where the members have absolutely nothing to say as to the functions of their own organizations. Obviously, this is the core of the whole matter: it is democracy the shipowners dislike; it is autocracy they desire. Because they do not like democracy they call it communism in an effort to obscure the real issue.

Owners do not run the ships at a loss if they pay decent wages. Under mail-contract subsidies alone, shipowners received approximately $28,850,000 in 1935. This is more than the combined annual wages, subsistence, maintenance, and repair costs of the operation of all American-flag vessels on ocean mail routes, these costs amounting to $28,460,000 a year, according to the operators' own estimates.

This clever exposé, executed in the best Bridges manner, received considerable publicity in the few liberal newspapers on the coast; and the public's, but especially organized labor's, reaction to the planned lockout was against the employers. The plan was thus frustrated; whereupon, save for the "mutiny" on the California at San Pedro in March, peace prevailed all along the Pacific front until April 3, when eighteen ship companies, led by Matson and Dollar, moved to break the sailors' hiring-hall system in San Francisco by a federal injunction. Bridges declared before the San Francisco Labor Council: "I don't want to appear an alarmist, but this looks like the start of another fight. We've tried to avoid it, but we're ready." The council strongly condemned the shipowners' action, public opinion preponderantly opposed a renewal of warfare, and the owners again pulled in their horns.

Then the Santa Rosa.

On the East Coast there have occurred in recent weeks numerous rank-and-file "quickies," or small outlaw strikes which had the sympathy of the Maritime Federation of the Pacific, for they were, in the main, efforts to discredit the A. F. of L. "fascists" running the I. L. A. and the I. S. U. Early in April the Maritime Federation received word from New York that the Santa Rosa, a Grace Line freight-passenger ship, had left for Los Angeles and San Francisco in a "hot" condition. It seemed that the ship had been picketed in New York as "unfair to organized labor" and that she had signed on some scabs, whom the I. S. U. officials supplied with union books just before sailing. This was all the information Bridges and his group had. Naturally, they suspected a plot, although heretofore the Grace Line had had a comparatively good record. They had heard rumors of "tricks" about to be played on the San Francisco I. L. A. The Santa Rosa was tensely awaited by the men. When she arrived, the federation had a picket line at the pier. Everybody believed she was "hot." Crowds of men who were not authorized pickets came to the pier. The company called the hiring hall for stevedores. The gangs came but refused to go through the crowd, which by then had begun to consider itself the picket line. Meanwhile the Maritime Federation officials were trying to find out the facts about the ship's temperature, but were not allowed aboard. A few of the crew came off, and one or two of them confirmed the report that there had been some irregularity in signing up the men in New York.

The federation officials, including Bridges, held a conference and, deciding that their information was too slender to justify creating an issue in the already tense situation, called off the pickets and told the gangs to go and work the ship. But meanwhile—in fact, almost immediately after the gangs stopped at the federation's picket line—the Waterfront Employers, as though prepared beforehand, issued an announcement suspending all relations with the I. L. A. Local 38-79 and ordering employers all along the front to (1) call for no more gangs from the hiring hall, (2) summon back men then employed on uncompleted jobs, and (3) employ in the future only those registered longshoremen eligible to work under the award who reported directly to the job.

A lockout, but badly messed up from the start. The union immediately denied that the men refused to work the ship. The hiring hall again sent the gangs and was willing to send more. In fact, more gangs were sent, but the Grace Line superintendent turned them away. In brief, the owners found themselves fighting mad in a ring empty of opponents—a ridiculous situation which “drew the berry” from 4,300 longshoremen and tens of thousands of their sympathizers in and outside the labor movement. In their excitement and embarrassment the pugnacious geniuses in charge of the lockout forgot they were fighting communism and said they were the sworn enemies of the hiring hall. Then they discovered that was a “bum issue.” The public at large was not against the hiring hall. Longshoremen were fanatically in love with it. Expressions of solidarity on the issue came from up and down the Coast, even from conservative I. L. A. district officials who hate Bridges no less than the employers hate him. So, still more confused, the employers’ leaders claimed they had been misunderstood: the hiring hall was not the issue. “We are opposed to its abolition,” read one of their statements. “We likewise are opposed to any change of the provisions of the arbitration award. We insist that every provision of the award be strictly observed.”

In short, there was no issue. Then they recalled that Bridges was a red and blamed the situation on him. He had ordered out the Maritime Federation picket line. Which wasn’t true, for Bridges doesn’t order anyone to do anything. All decisions in the Maritime Federation as well as in the I. L. A. local are made by the membership or by elected committees. So the men laughed still more.

Meantime the lockout was an actuality. The Santa Rosa was not worked. The same was true of the majority of other ships in port when the lockout began. Scores of San Francisco-bound vessels were diverted to San Pedro and Portland, and, according to various estimates, the great port beyond the Golden Gate lost between a quarter of a million and a million dollars a day in wages and wharfage fees; for eight days, while Mayor Rossi issued frantic statements, the Embarcadero was quiet as a graveyard.

As I write this, the lockout mess has been more or less cleared up. Today the great port is beginning to get slowly back to normal operations. The basic labor-employer situation, however, is where it was ten days ago—except that the prestige of Bridges’s leadership, the essence of which is intelligently directed mass-democracy, has gone up many notches during the past week; while the employers feel groggy and foolish, and probably are wondering what they can do next.

I don’t know what they can or will do, but the probability is they will get more and more desperate. However, they may not make their next move, whatever it will be, for some time—unless they decide to attempt to frame Bridges, which also will not be easy. Bridges is the most careful of men.

The Hollywood Tea Party

BY MORRIE RYSKIND

Hollywood, April 18

I DON'T know why Boston should get all the publicity. Hollywood threw a tea party of its own last night, and some two hundred of the movie colony's leading lights attended; yet there is not a mention of it this morning in the Los Angeles Times. There is a notice that "the Los Angeles Art Noon Club will hold its April meeting Tuesday in the Women's Athletic Club at noon." A previous engagement will not permit me to attend this meeting, so you boys and girls will have to be content with hearing about what happened last night.

It seems news finally got to Hollywood about the Kramer sedition bill and what it meant—a little late, it is true, but after all Paul Revere doesn't do as much riding these days as he used to. Anyhow, the news came and the embattled freemen of Hollywood said, "Let's do something about it." They took the stand that the Alien and Sedition Laws of 1798 hadn't been good enough for their fathers and that the Kramer sedition bill wasn't good enough for them. They really got mad one night and formed a committee to put Mr. Kramer's sedition bill out of business.

Their first mistake was in getting a judge to head the committee: Judge Lester W. Roth. Now Mr. Hearst, if I read his local papers correctly, likes the Kramer bill, and Mr. Hearst has a lot of influence in this town: most judges would have spent several years in calm, cool, judicial deliberation and then would have decided that they couldn't head a committee Mr. Hearst might not approve of. But this judge—I don't know what he could have been thinking of, unless it was the Bill of Rights—said he would be glad to head the group.

Of course that should have been the end of the whole matter, but a second mistake was made: women were put on the committee. The women immediately opened headquarters and began a house-to-house canvass of Kramer's constituency, armed with petitions asking Kramer to withdraw the bill. Well, it seems that an awful lot of people who voted for Mr. Kramer under the impression that he was a liberal are signing these petitions with their names and addresses, so that Mr. Kramer can see they really are constituents. And since Mr. Kramer faces a primary fight this year, he is going to be interested in what his constituents think. I mean he will be before the primary anyhow.

Just to make sure, the committee intends to make photostatic copies of the petitions and send them to Mr. Kramer and his allies. All of this is going to take a little money, so the committee decided to throw a sedition party and get the Hollywood people to come and contribute to the cause.

Well, they came last night and they contributed. I saw loads and loads of writers from Metro, which even contributed two supervisors; the Paramount attorney was there, as were several Paramount scribes including Clifford Odets; United Artists was represented by an art director. Louis Adamic was there, and Dorothy Parker, but there were also some Los Angeles business men and a corporation lawyer. And Sidney Skolsky. A mixed crowd, but certainly a well-to-do one. Not Liberty Leaguers in wealth maybe, but a prosperous crew nevertheless.

Now some of these people, unquestionably, think that Mr. Roosevelt is too conservative; but a good many of them think he is far too radical. Some of them are Old Guard Republicans who would welcome Mr. Hoover back; and at least one of them (you might as well know where I stand) is an Old Guard Socialist who thinks that Louis Waldman's letter in a recent issue of The Nation was a magnificent declaration of principles.

And that's what made the party important to me. It seems to me that as long as groups of Americans, regardless of party, are willing to get together to fight for the preservation of their civil rights, fascism can't win. For, mind you, this was no gathering of the dispossessed, meeting in some secret place; this was a gathering of respectable citizens, meeting openly. And while that can happen, fascism hasn't a chance.

There's a corollary: if fascism can't win, then we aren't confronted with the choice the Communists insist we must make—fascism or communism. I have always thought that would be a horrible dilemma, because I really like my civil liberties and I don't want anybody to take them away from me—whether his name is Kramer or Hitler or Mussolini or even Stalin. Besides, I just read in my favorite weekly that the Soviet censor won't let Louis Fischer get The Nation. Well, what does that mean? Let the Communists get into power here, and pretty soon there's no Nation at all. And what do I do then? Write just for moving pictures? A fine prospect, indeed! No, sir, I'll take Franklin Roosevelt or Alf Landon—as long as I can't get Louis Waldman.

P. S.—Although the news of the tea party was not printed in the Times, my spies report to me that the news reached Washington. Just before the party last night Congressman Kramer called up several of the Democrats on the committee and wanted to know why the boys were attacking him. They must have told him, because my information is that he was on the wire twenty minutes. When a Congressman spends that much of his own money in long-distance calls, he is worried. Don't be surprised if Kramer withdraws the bill: from what I hear of him, he would rather withdraw any bill than withdraw Congressman Kramer.

Will Neutrality Keep Us Out of War?

[The following editorial, by Marion Donnelly of the University of California, has been awarded first prize in the student editorial contest sponsored jointly by The Nation and the Foreign Policy Association.]

IF, WHEN the next world war flares, the President's neutrality proclamation keeps the United States from being involved, such circumstance will constitute an event without precedent in our national history. In two previous European wars, during which the continental balance of power was temporarily settled, the United States tried to go about its business in its customary way, and on both occasions was drawn into the war.

The parallels offered by our encounters with France and England during the Napoleonic wars and our more recent plying between the Scylla and Charybdis of Allies and Central Powers in the years before 1917 are enlightening and portentous. The reasons we had for going to war with England in 1812 were not Napoleon's reasons, nor, a century later, were our grievances against Germany the same as England's, at least initially. Nevertheless, once war broke out, our tortuous road from neutral to combatant spread inescapably before us. Is this always to be?

In trying to reach any valid conclusion about the probable course of American neutrality in the event of future war, it is well to remember that twice before the United States went to war to protect its neutral rights, after vain attempts to resolve the contradiction inherent in trying to carry on normally in an altogether abnormal situation. In spite of these two futile affrays, no one dreams of saying that the issue is a settled one, or cares to deny that the same circumstances, whether fortuitous or fateful, may engulf the country in war again, to no better purpose.

Nations at war, rendered unscrupulous through desperation, infringed the neutral rights of the United States. Ironically, the alternatives which faced the peace-loving but frustrated republic were military retaliation or abridgment of national sovereignty imposed from without. Probably the most important single development in the world since 1917 is that this horrible choice is no longer inevitable for any country willing to make concerted use with other countries of the instruments now in existence for collective security and collective restraint of aggressors.

Before it becomes possible to apply this principle of collective security and collective restraint, a principle which is perfectly understood and everywhere accepted in dealings with individual lawbreakers, it is necessary to face the implications of the whole subject of neutrality, its possibilities and limitations. Encouraging indications of this tendency are to be found everywhere, particularly in the average American's acceptance of the current neutrality legislation, which clearly limits rights heretofore strenuously insisted upon in our relations with belligerents.

Unfortunately, because of the continuing crisis abroad, this legislation is still unformed and unfinished. This has dealt a crushing blow to the hopes of all who had counted on sufficient awareness of reality by Congress to assure some sort of permanent neutrality law which would embody the principle of cooperation with the forces of peace. By giving the President discretionary powers in the matter of declaring embargoes, the door would have been open for constructive cooperation with the League of Nations, if not positively through support of sanctions—impossible politically just now—then negatively through a willingness not to obstruct the League's efforts to impose sanctions.

Congress has refused to authorize this discretionary power. Its sorry action, whether due to surrender to pressure groups, isolationist propaganda, or sheer obtuseness, is indefensible. Any real contribution to world peace on our part is at present impossible, unless our apparent readiness to get off the earth in so far as we are physically able to do so is considered helpful. That, at least, Congress seems amply willing to try; no doubt to give the future belligerents plenty of room to fight in.

It is difficult to gauge the repercussions of this blunder immediately, though one can say that the temper of the American people at the present time indicates a desire to leave no stone unturned in the search for a solution to the problem of maintaining peace. Most of us, it is true, do not take the trouble to familiarize ourselves with intricate questions of foreign policy. This does not mean, however, that we are the "international illiterates" our hundred percenters and isolationists wish us to be.

If a majority can be made to see that American peace is a snare and a delusion in a world in which there is no peace, if we can see clearly the indivisible character of our economic environment, then, inevitably, we must admit the necessity for organizing our world for peace.

The responsibility of our national leaders in making us see this, in forcing us to realize that no puny device of "maintaining a strict neutrality" will save us from the storm when it breaks, is almost incalculable. Let them exercise their leadership with some perceptible diminution of slipshod thinking and muddled premises. Let them explain, again and again, as often as they can commandeer microphone or platform, that neutrality is not enough. Americans are not morons or idiots. They are able to understand that the policies of the past do not always work and that the sane thing to do when something doesn't work is to scrap it or make it over. This is a good, traditional, American way of approaching problems, Mr. Hearst and his minions notwithstanding.

For our own sakes, in order to save our own country and all it stands for at its best, we must come forth and align ourselves with the forces of peace. America wields a mighty power. That she would use it cravenly, ignominiously is unthinkable. That she shall use it intelligently, purposefully, and generously is yet within our power to decide.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

HOW pitiful and yet how inspiring is the plight of our rich men! They give us their word that they are being taxed to death, that they are down to their last yachts and last half-dozen automobiles. Some have even been compelled to abandon those delightful places in the Carolinas at which they were wont to sojourn for a few weeks on the way from their Palm Beach or Miami homes to their city houses, which are such pleasant stopping places on the road to Newport or Europe. Yet I note with regret that some uncomprehending persons are a bit puzzled. For side by side with the complaints of these once prosperous men, who were so invaluable to the country because of the savings with which they bought into many companies and created new ones, there are constant press references to the fact that these gentlemen are spending considerable amounts to extinguish the further political aspirations of Franklin Roosevelt. Wherever Senator Black's committee of investigation has dug into the finances of our militant, pro-liberty organizations, the same generous names recur. Lammot du Pont, Irénée du Pont, Pierre du Pont, and all the other du Ponts big and little, John J. Raskob, Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., Thomas L. Chadbourne, William T. Geist, the Pitcairn family, which put up a trifling $103,000 for the Sentinels of the Republic—some of these impoverished people are always to be found donating from $5,000 to $50,000 to some fine anti-Roosevelt organization such as the Liberty League, the Farmers' Independence Council, the Sentinels, or the convention called by the precious governor of Georgia, Eugene Talmadge, to denounce the Washington Administration. Some scoffers and cynics are so mistaken as to declare that the complaints and the gifts are incompatible.

Now the real truth about this seeming inconsistency is that there is no inconsistency at all and that we have never witnessed nobler patriotism or greater self-sacrifice. I declare this because, according to their own statements, these men and women no longer have income enough to live well and therefore they must be dipping into their capital in order to let the American people know just what is being done to our beloved country by the Communists and Socialists now in charge of the government in Washington. These patriots are digging into their jeans with greater disregard of their own interests than they displayed in buying Liberty Bonds during the World War. For Liberty Bonds gave a handsome return, and Liberty Leagues do not produce dividends except in heaven. Contributions to them may not even be deducted from one's income-tax returns. Yet these noble souls who are literally being taxed out of existence must be throwing stocks and bonds overboard no matter what their losses.

If one goes to Florida—I have just returned from there —one is more than ever struck by the public spirit of these much-abused people. I was taken over one of the most important clubs, one which has room for 450 people to whose comfort and pleasure 475 managers, servants, and workmen cater. It is as luxurious a place as I have ever seen on this continent. The initiation fee is reported to be $5,000 and the annual dues $1,000. Yet this club was crowded to the doors throughout the season and is rejoicing that it made money and a lot of it. The minimum rate for a room was quoted at $20 a day without meals. When I entered this garish palace with its wonderful flowers, exotic landscaping, and exquisite beach club on the ocean, I supposed that all of this was merely to give the patrons a good time. Nothing of the kind. It appears that those 450 guests went down there and sacrificed themselves just in order that those 475 workers might have well-paid jobs from January 1 to April 1 and not be obliged to go on the dole. With this information it was easy for me to realize that the enormous amount of building going on at Miami and Palm Beach does not mean that the rich are richer and are saving large sums above their taxes and living expenses. No, indeed! Those superb houses are being built solely in order that the building trades in Florida may flourish and that the local communities and the federal government will not have to support in idleness thousands of bricklayers, cement mixers, steel workers, and others. So with the gambling hells, the racetracks for dogs and horses, and the other institutions of pleasure against which, in Jacksonville, a group of benighted and prudish ministers has just publicly protested. They do not understand that the patrons of these brothels and gambling houses, for example, are determined that the owners and the attendants shall not be a burden upon the communities. These priests had much better show the cooperative spirit of certain members of the Coast Guard service in Florida who obligingly receive over the government telephone and forward innumerable orders for reservations for dinner and supper at a most prosperous, open, and aboveboard gambling institution of the highest quality.

Unquestionably Florida has cleared its skirts of the panic and depression. It is back now not to 1929, when the great boom had already burst, but to the year 1926, when everything was in full swing and there were suckers in plenty to buy every lot, however deep under water or remote in the swamps. Now if our embattled rich can do all this for a single state in their present straitened circumstances, what would they not do if the crazy man in the White House, as they call him, would give them a free hand? Isn't it obvious that through their self-sacrifice and patriotism they would exorcise the rest of the depression from every part of this land of the free—and the equal?

BROUN'S PAGE

THE effrontery of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association becomes so amazing that any critic must stop and take a deep breath before he tries to answer. An argument may be made that Senatorial investigating committees might actually harm individual liberties by punitive fishing expeditions, but I fail to see any action on the part of the Black committee which impairs in any way the right of William Randolph Hearst to continue to print those things which seem to him helpful to his interests. In any strict sense of the phrase the publisher's quarrel with Black has nothing on earth to do with "the freedom of the press."

Nor do I believe that the attempt to look into Mr. Hearst's correspondence with his editors may justly be called an aimless fishing expedition. The black backs of shark and barracuda have been plainly seen leaping in the waters around San Simeon. It is palpable that the Hearst papers gave great aid and comfort to the Talmadge movement, and while the publisher now disclaims any interest in the Liberty League and its satellites, the Hearst drive made the formation of all these organizations possible. Let me see, just how long ago was it that William Randolph Hearst offered the Presidency on a platter to Al Smith?

The Black committee has already dug up correspondence indicating a desire on the part of so-called patriotic groups to lead an anti-Semitic movement. One supporter of "our American traditions" has expressed the belief that the country needs a Hitler. With this promising beginning there surely should be no effort to check the further activities of the committee. And where should it look? The cowboy found his missing pinto by trying to think of what he would do if he were a horse. Anybody who is interested in finding the prime source of the Nazi movement in America might well consider just what he would do if he were a Hearst.

It is strange and tragic that the lord of San Simeon can muster to his support the newspaper owners of America as a gang of chestnut pullers. I am not the most friendly critic of the American press. I accept the dictum that newspapers do not speak for big business but rather constitute big business. And yet I know men in leading positions in the newspaper industry who genuinely fear fascism in this country and who honestly want to fight against it. Just why they consent to become catspaws for William Randolph Hearst is to me mysterious. Perhaps they are believers in that ancient and unfortunate adage that consistency is a jewel. Believing that some Senate committee some day might go too far, they leap in now to defend the privacy of that great defender of American privacy William Randolph Hearst. People who live by slogans should be reminded that there is a better adage than the one about the gem-like quality of consistency. It runs, "Circumstances alter cases."

Intelligent publishers should divorce their interests from those of Hearst. It is true that the American public grows increasingly skeptical of the fairness and accuracy of our press. Some editors who thoroughly hate Hearst still refrain from criticizing him on the ground that "anything said about one editor reflects on all editors." But they lose sight of the fact that even if no criticism of Hearst came to the eyes and ears of the public the protest against his kind of propaganda would grow. Mr. Hearst is his own severest critic. He prints and flaunts the case against himself in every edition of every one of his papers every day. What he screams so loudly from above his head that what he says hardly matters.

Recently Mr. Hearst engaged Harvey J. Kelly to act as his labor-relations adviser. I believe Mr. Kelly does not actually take up his new job for another few months, but he tried his hand in Milwaukee and killed, or at least failed to keep alive, a basis of settlement which had been agreed to by both sides. The management withdrew its offer in spite of having made a definite promise. Speaking at the American Newspaper Publishers' Association on the subject of "new organizations," Mr. Kelly dealt with the guild, although not by name, by referring to "newly organized, inexperienced groups, with more zeal than judgment, pulling minority walkouts without first consulting experienced union leaders, and then clamoring for sympathetic walkouts."

This is somewhat ironical because it was Mr. Kelly, acting as agent of Hearst, who upset the settlement of the guild strike in Milwaukee. And the basis of that settlement, to which Mr. Black, the publisher, had agreed, was that the working conditions agreed on should be witnessed by the leaders of the A. F. of L. in the city of Milwaukee. It had been openly said by guild leaders that we were not only willing but eager to accept the role of wards of the A. F. of L. since we felt certain that our application for membership would be before that body in June. The very same publishers who talk of the guild's not seeking counsel from experienced labor leaders are the very ones who say, "Don't you realize that it would be fatal for you boys to go into the American Federation of Labor?"

From the very beginning the guild has sought counsel. At our first appearance in public we asked Charles Howard of the I. T. U. to speak for us, as he did, and so did Vice-President Morrison. John L. Lewis has been generous in support and counsel, and in every guild difficulty William Green has asked labor to support us. President Green has given constant help during the Milwaukee strike.

Mr. Kelly hardly has the good of the guild in mind when he tries to drive a wedge between organized labor and the guild. Still it must be admitted that William Randolph Hearst has done much to unify labor. He has provided in himself the full and perfect symbol for the anti-labor movement.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE NOT SO HOPELESS MOVIES

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ONE of the best—and I fear one of the best-known—of modern literary anecdotes is that which concerns the conversation alleged to have occurred between Bernard Shaw and Mr. Goldwyn of Hollywood, who had come to explain why the sage of Adelphi should assign to Mr. Goldwyn the movie rights to his plays. After listening patiently to a discourse upon the Mission of the Films, Shaw is said to have concluded the interview thus: "I'm afraid, Mr. Goldwyn, that we shall never get together. So far as I can see, you are interested in nothing except art while I, of course, am interested in nothing but money."

Cant of the sort here attributed to the semi-legendary Mr. Goldwyn has been so persistent in the movie industry that even cynicism is a relief, and one's first impulse after reading the address "Popular Art and Profit in Motion Pictures" recently delivered at New York University by Howard S. Cullman, trustee in bankruptcy and manager of the Roxy Theater, is to thank God for at least one honest man at last. With suave candor Mr. Cullman takes the Shavian position, and though I believe that he is only half right at best, he deserves the floor.

The Roxy Theater has 6,200 seats, and that, according to Mr. Cullman, is the crucial fact. It means that what it has to offer must appeal to the whole cross-section of the city's population, and this fact in turn means something else. The film that in one week must entertain some hundred thousand New Yorkers must be understood by the lowest as well as the highest intelligence in the audience, for "that which is difficult to grasp is, by its very nature, not amusing." Moreover, "although mass entertainment should not necessitate thought, it must cause emotional excitation of some kind. . . . Endless reiteration on the screen, unlike life, does not appear in any way to dull the potency of these sensations. Like a really comfortable shoe, a really first-rate emotion seems to have an enduring appeal." It follows therefore that the efficient manager will take care that the same simple, easily grasped emotions shall be repeated endlessly. And of course any manager who is not efficient will soon find the necessity of choosing another vocation.

On the other hand, the great public does appreciate technical skill. It wants the simple ingredients utilized as elaborately and as adroitly as possible. For this reason the efficiency of the movies is constantly increasing, and the manager is quick to recognize what the public will recognize also. In a sense "David Copperfield" is a far better picture than "The Birth of a Nation," but it is better only as an industrial product is better after years of mechanical experimentation.

As a business, the motion-picture industry has, to a very large extent, learned its lesson. It has discovered that good merchandise must be built to sound ingredients. . . . The prospect is encouraging to those of us who are interested in an adequate supply of salable popular entertainment. For those who cherish hopes of a cinematographic art acceptable to aesthetes and intellectuals the situation appears less promising. They can expect to find on the screen a progressively improved brand of amusement, utilizing each year the talents of an increasing number of gifted individuals. They will find plenty of hearty laughs and abundance of breath-taking thrills; but for their moments of true mental and spiritual stimulation I fear they will have to hie themselves to the concert halls, theaters, and museums, wherein flourish the true arts.

Whatever one may think of Mr. Cullman's dismal conclusions, it will hardly be denied that he has described with admirable force and clarity two of the chief obstacles to the aesthetic development of the moving picture. It is subject to whatever limitations are inherent in the nature of any art having a mass appeal, and these limitations are made unusually rigid because the unparalleled costliness of motion-picture production makes it well-nigh impossible for the best-intentioned of producers to indulge any quixotic impulses. But does that mean, as Mr. Cullman seems to imply, that an aesthetically admirable motion picture cannot possibly be produced under present conditions? Does it mean that no such motion picture ever has been produced? And if it does not mean that, then where is the flaw in the argument? Through what loophole have a few admirable pictures slipped, even, perhaps, into the Roxy itself?

The answer to these questions is almost distressingly simple, and I must apologize in advance for any lack of ingenuity in proposing a solution so devoid of complexity. It is simply this: the aesthetic limitations imposed by the necessity of mass appeal are not quite so absolute as Mr. Cullman implies. There is no doubt that the great public has an insatiable appetite for the second-rate and worse. There is no doubt about the fact that the popular in art is, nine times out of ten, mere trash. But the whole history of literature and drama, to say nothing of the short history of the motion picture itself, cries out against the assumption that only trash is ever popular. Does it really need to be pointed out once more that all the evidence we have seems to indicate that, in his role of manager at least, Shakespeare was at one with Mr. Cullman and Mr. Shaw and against the resplendent idealism of Mr. Goldwyn and his kind?

Let me be sure, however, that I am making myself perfectly clear. I am by no means indulging the romantic notion that "the people always appreciate the best" or misapplying in the usual fashion the dictum that "one touch of nature makes the whole world kin." The necessity of achieving a mass appeal does impose tremendous limitations upon the artist. At any given moment there are more kinds of excellence which the great public will not accept than there are kinds which it will. This great public is both stubborn and capricious, often appallingly unwilling or incapable of transcending the prejudices of the moment. But the artist does not always find it impossible to achieve great work within the limitations which are at the instant inexorable. What popular prejudice do the films of Charlie Chaplin or the animated cartoons of Walt Disney outrage? In what way do they fail to meet the requirements set by Mr. Cullman? As a matter of fact, they fit the common denominator of the mass mind to perfection. But to me, at least, they are obviously art and possessed of a genuine aesthetic value.

I am aware, of course, that a more usual reply to Mr. Cullman would take the form of a temporary agreement with his argument followed by the remark that the condition which he describes "is inevitable under the capitalist system." Under collectivism, on the contrary, the necessity for mass appeal would constitute an assurance of artistic health, and through the projection machines of a hundred thousand movie palaces would run mile after mile of masterpieces in uninterrupted succession. For the moment, however, I am not dreaming of Utopia but striving only for a less completely dismal view of the cinema's future, and I think that the prospect is not quite so unrelieved as Mr. Cullman imagines. Its greatest achievements, like the films of Chaplin and Disney, will be unpredictable miracles—the work of artists who, probably more by instinct than by design, manage somehow to achieve art while respecting the limitations of the audience. Meanwhile most moving pictures will continue to be, for the present at least, distressing affairs. But can much more be said of most plays or most novels or most poems or most pictures?

BOOKS

Form and Material

SPRING STORM. By Alvin Johnson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

MR. JOHNSON raises a question of great interest in his note to the publisher of this novel. "Perhaps," he says, "I ought to offer an apology to the craft of novelists for my apparent presumption in breaking into their mystery. I was once an ardent classical scholar; then an economic theorist; then an editor of a liberal journal; then an encyclopedist; then an educational administrator: what training could such a career offer for serious fiction? The history of literature has, however, reserved a modest place to the outsider. At least he has from time to time brought into literature

Moments

Granville Hicks Gets Them All Under the Same Robe

additional material. The craft itself is the guardian of form; but form takes on life only when abundant and appropriate material is at hand."

Mr. Johnson probably does not mean by form a sort of mold kept somewhere in hiding—a fragile shell around which members of the craft huddle their bodies so that no breath of outdoor air will blow in and shatter it. By recognizing that form can take on life he makes his bow to the difficulty which any serious critic encounters as soon as he tries to consider form and material as separate things. Mr. Johnson knows that they are not separate things. Yet a vestige of the distinction remains in what he says, and this residuum of respect for the form of fiction is a key to the very interesting quality of his novel. It explains why "Spring Storm" is less unlike other novels than one might suppose; for it suggests that there was a form in Mr. Johnson's mind which he was trying to make his material fit.

Of novels written by novelists, whoever those ladies and gentlemen may be, it is seldom or never possible to speak in such fashion. Far from guarding the form, they seem bent upon its destruction. Extensions of the mold have usually occurred within the craft; an artist is a person who has at the same time the greatest respect for tradition and no respect for it whatever. Defoe, Richardson, Fielding, Sterne, Jane Austen, Scott, Balzac, Dickens, Meredith, Tolstoy, Dostoevski, Proust, Mann, Joyce, Dreiser, Lewis—what were their forms before they wrote, and what are their forms now? It is hard to say, for it is hard to see anything in their books beyond the contents. It is the contents that have life, just as it is the contents of Shakespeare's "Henry IV" that we continue to be interested in; but Shakespeare destroyed a form in order to write "Henry IV." The chronicle play was never the same again; Falstaff had blown in and shattered the shell beyond recovery. "Outsiders," to use Mr. Johnson's too modest term, almost never have this kind of courage; they seldom know enough about form to know that it exists merely to be destroyed. They are like the unlettered layman who takes pen in hand. We think he will write interestingly because he is interesting. But the chances are that his awe of the craft will prevent him from saying very much, and that what he does say will be stilted or trivial.

But I have been arguing with Mr. Johnson instead of describing his novel, which if stilted is not trivial. It is stilted, I think, whenever it is romantic—whenever Mr. Johnson, remembering some form of fiction from his earlier reading, has felt that it should be so. There is nothing the matter with being romantic, but "Spring Storm" is probably not the place. All that portion of Mr. Johnson's story which deals with the Benders—idyllic outcasts who live down by the river in a perpetual haze of pure-heartedness, and one of whom, Dut Bates, is a convenient Horatio to the hero's Hamlet—is unconvincing; and certainly it lacks the air of being material brought in from the veritable world by an outsider to the craft. It has its attractions, but they are not pertinent to the real business of the book, which is to tell the story of a Nebraska farm and of the boy who grows up on it, both as farmer and as lover, until a train takes him away in the last chapter to college. Julian Howard's gradual discovery of what his father never knows, namely, that an American farm is not something for a man to play with but rather something that plays with men, is pursued by Mr. Johnson with a patient and accurate eye; and the sayings of Henry Millsbaugh, Julian's tough old neighbor, are appropriately the best single things in the book.

It is through Henry again, if indirectly, that Julian learns about love; for it is his young wife with whom the boy gets lost in the storms of spring. Here Mr. Johnson is both convincing and expert. We never know more about Elizabeth than Julian knows, but that is right; for he suffers quite as much from her limitations as he does from the disturbance within. It is one of the best love stories in recent fiction, and it does not need any support at all from the improbable Benders. They are the form. It is the material.

MARK VAN DOREN

Bryan: A Friendly Portrait

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN. By Wayne C. Williams.
G. P. Putnam's Sons. $4.

WHILE William Jennings Bryan was at home in the Chautauqua tent or on the convention platform, he was awkward in a top hat, and never mastered the minor graces of drawing-room diplomacy or tea-cup politics; hence for forty years the haut monde sneered at him. Nor was he more fortunate in his early biographers. Paxton Hibben, who had followed John Reed into communism, had no basic sympathy for an old-style progressive Democrat who wanted to amend the old order but not to destroy it. Suppressing some facts and distorting others, Hibben gave the picture of an amiable failure who never knew what the shooting was all

THE MARCH IS ON!

To the SOVIET UNION

● The achievements of the U. S. S. R. in the past year . . . the fact that it opens up a new field for travel experience. . . have made it the goal for the intelligent traveler to Europe. Fast train, boat and air connections with more Western Continental cities place Moscow, Leningrad, Kharkov, Kiev and Odessa within easy reach. Your travel agent will add the Soviet Union to a planned European itinerary or book you directly for a trip through Sovietland. Rates are moderate on Intourist's plan for payment in advance in dollars for all-inclusive tours ranging from five to thirty-one days: $15 per day first class, $8 tourist and $5 third. These include meals, hotels, transportation on tour, sightseeing by car, the services of trained guide-interpreters. Spend five days in Moscow and get the feel of the new life in the U. S. S. R. or add time to sail down the Volga, cross the Caucasus, cruise the Black Sea and sojourn in Crimea. Intourist will be glad to send you its 22" x 16" map of the Soviet Union and illustrated Booklet No. NA-5.

THEATRE FESTIVAL MOSCOW and LENINGRAD

September 1 to 10, 1936

Fourth annual theatre festival . . . staged by foremost artists and directors such as Stanislavsky, Meyerhold, Moskvina and others internationally famous. Prices are moderate for the ten-day stay. They include meals, hotel, transportation between Moscow and Leningrad, sightseeing, guide-interpreters and theatre tickets for 12 brilliant presentations of drama, opera and ballet.

APPLY TO YOUR TRAVEL AGENT

INTOURIST, INC.

545 Fifth Avenue, New York

Monadnock Bldg., 681 Market St., San Francisco

TRAVEL IN THE U. S. S. R.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

about. To M. R. Werner, who used Bryan as a sequel to his Barnum book, the significant things about him were vaudevillian—his slovenliness in dress, his gargantuan appetite, his memory for names and faces, his tricks of speech and platform presentation. His Bryan was the politician on the flying trapeze.

This new volume by Wayne C. Williams gives a much more valid picture of America's "Great Commoner." Williams, like Bryan, was born in rural Illinois, studied law there, and went West to carve out a career. In Colorado he became a Democratic progressive and was in the thick of the struggle against Denver's Tammany. To him farmers' revolts, the menace of Wall Street, the rights of the people were all real and important. This background and understanding have illumined his book.

Historians seeking a central character on whose career to focus the American political mood and movement from 1896 to 1916 will find Bryan an appropriate selection. One merit of this book is that it puts him in proper focus as the characteristic figure of his times—this despite the fact that it is not the book of an objective historian but that of a warm personal friend, armed with intimate knowledge, presenting a personal brief. The book is furthermore marred by clumsiness of construction, and the author's proofreaders have served him badly. But for all this, it is the best volume yet on Bryan.

Those whose personal knowledge of Bryan was gained in his last ten years will have their estimate of him altered by Mr. Williams's picture of the "Peerless Leader" of 1890-1905. I myself first saw Bryan at the Baltimore convention of 1912, when he seemed a weather-beaten giant. I last saw him at Dayton in 1925, responding to Clarence Darrow's savage thrusts by an irritated insistence upon the Bible's syllabic inspiration; in this tragic anti-climax his strength and persuasiveness could not conceal the erosions of time and disappointment. But the Bryan of 1896—there was a man! Mr. Williams describes his mien as that of a young Greek god; his health and strength were equal to any effort; his personality powerfully attracted the few who sat in conferences and the thousands who heard and cheered; his voice was a magnificent speaking instrument, ranking above that of Fisher Ames, Daniel Webster, Stephen A. Douglas, or Robert Ingersoll. Furthermore, the people who heard him speak responded at the ballot box, and the change of 19,436 votes in six states would have given him an electoral-college majority. It has been suggested that had the radio been invented thirty years earlier all America would have heard his voice and he would have been elected President.

And yet, while Bryan never won the Presidency, he had a more profound influence upon our national development than did three-fourths of our White House occupants. For a while he seemed destined to be an American William Pitt; and then for a while he seemed hopelessly repudiated. In 1912 he renounced an active personal ambition and created a convention crisis to effect the nomination of one theretofore none too friendly to him. Bryan loved power; and yet two years after becoming Secretary of State he resigned his office because he had become convinced that Wilson's policy was leading the nation into war.

Until this time Bryan was in his proper orbit. From 1896 to 1912 the Democratic Party was a Bryan party, and even after Wilson's election hundreds of thousands continued to look to the Commoner as the fount of political grace. But after the outbreak of the war Bryan's title as one of the national guides was negated by the logic of events. Those who remember Bryan only in eclipse should examine the impressive list of reforms in which he led the way. In 1890 he began advocating the direct election of United States Senators; in his first year as Secretary of State he proclaimed it a part of the federal Constitution. When the Supreme Court voided the income-tax law of 1894, which Bryan had helped to frame, he led the successful fight for an income-tax amendment. His efforts paved the way for pre-election publicity for campaign contributions. He framed the provision restoring to the government the sole right to issue money, and championed the guaranty of bank deposits. Thirty-six years after his Presidential race against imperialism, a program for Philippine independence is being carried into effect. His was a voice crying in the wilderness against prohibitive tariffs; now the country is turning toward restored international trade.

Bryan had four major failures: free silver, world peace, prohibition, and anti-evolution. Bimetallism would have remained a major issue had not new discoveries of gold greatly increased the world stock. The World War destroyed the fabric of his peace plans, but modern critics are coming to the conclusion that Bryan saw more clearly than Wilson how to keep America out of war. From the start national prohibition was sabotaged by indifferent or corrupt administration, and by the time of Bryan's death the people were withdrawing their consent. The new science and the new doubt disturbed him immensely, and in the twilight of his life he entered the battle against evolution. Dayton was as significant of the man as were the Cross of Gold speech at Chicago or the Morgan-Belmont-Bryan-Murphy resolution at Baltimore. For Bryan's greatness was in feeling. While his mind was in many ways keen and competent, he employed it to implement his emotional reactions, and his ability to reflect and champion the feelings of the masses gives him his chief significance.

GEORGE FORT MILTON

Huxley Evaluated

ALDOUS HUXLEY. By Alexander Henderson. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THE problem of Aldous Huxley remains essentially one of integration. Today his literary personality is as unacceptable to well-integrated Marxists as it has always been to well-integrated bourgeois. When Huxley in his satire demolishes the world about him, they ask—and not without a certain justice—"Yes, but what then?" Instead of a thoroughgoing answer they get an ironic, almost Dostoevskian dualism, tinged morality with mockery and comedy with fundamental earnestness. They are not satisfied, and in toto they reject him; he is to them "confused."

But to Mr. Henderson it is they who are confused and not Huxley, and in this study he attempts to set them straight. "Intellectually he was a Voltairean, emotionally a Bunyanite." That description of a character in the story "Happily Ever After" seems to him also to fit Huxley—at least at an earlier stage of his development. How otherwise account for his esteem for D. H. Lawrence and his willingness to join Lawrence in his naive plans for founding a Utopia in Florida? The plan, of course, fell through, but later they both found Taos, and even as late as in "Brave New World" Huxley concocts a Noble Savage out of Taos to confound the scientific "barbarians of the intellect" who are replacing the Christian "barbarians of the soul."

This brings us to what Mr. Henderson accepts as Huxley's expressed philosophy, "life-worship"—that is, the humbling of the intellect to admit the claims of the viscera. A feeble palliative, to say the least, for the "Jesus's disease and Newton's disease and Henry Ford's disease" from which, according to Huxley, we now are suffering. And I think Mr. Henderson feels this himself, for he later writes that in the last few years Huxley has shown "such an acute concern for . . . social organization and such a disgust at existing methods" that it will not be surprising if he eventually follows the example of Gide and Malraux and espouses communism.

As a critical biographer Mr. Henderson has done his work surprisingly well, though he is by no means convincing as an exponent of the consistency of Huxley's philosophy. He would have done better, I think, to have stifled his own psychology in parts of his book, for he has a tendency to make unwarranted generalizations with which I doubt that Huxley would agree. ("The man desires to express his dominance by inflicting a measure of pain, and the woman equally desires to feel pain, desires to be dominated, to be a sacrifice . . ." This, in spite of his talk of communism!) But in the main he has produced an objective, keenly analytical study. If he is blind to the defects of Huxley's slight and frequently overdistilled poetry and tends to overestimate the worth of his lesser novels—especially "Brave New World"—he compensates for his lack by a brilliant dissection of "Point Counter Point" and a full appreciation of Huxley's richly felicitous style.

LEIGH WHITE

Poet in Search of a Public

A TIME TO DANCE. By C. Day Lewis. Random House. $1.75.

"THE contemporary writer," says Day Lewis in one of the three essays that accompany the poems in this volume, "has the opportunity of a more widespread influence than the writer of any other period." On the face of it this statement appears, to put it mildly, sanguine. Day Lewis himself makes some important qualifications; he recognizes that the writer today has to compete with other entertainers, such as the newspapers, the movies and the radio, in greater variety and stridency than before, and that these rivals have a head start on him. The writer's "opportunity," then, consists in the fact that he is needed rather than wanted. He is needed not only, as always, to provide refreshment for the emotional life but because now the other agencies, such as those of religion, which traditionally have shown people how to live can no longer exert leadership; and also because the serious writer, being relatively freer from domination by reactionary interests than other leaders of opinion, can help to guide the masses toward a new society. How, then, can this need be shaped into a desire for his services?

Until fundamental social changes occur, Day Lewis intimates, the answer to this question rests with the writers themselves. They must make their potential large audiences want them, and this will not be the work of a day. If his own poems in this volume be taken as experiments toward that end, they must be pronounced inept. The two long poems are written in forms suggested by types of art that have appealed to large groups. Noah and the Waters, its author says, was begun as the book for a choral ballet; it developed into something like a medieval morality play, but is not, he confesses, suited to the modern stage. The title piece, A Time to Dance, which is billed as a symphonic poem, is like a symphony only in that it is composed of movements without thematic connection; it could hardly be orchestrated for the concert hall. Under present circumstances the only solution for Day Lewis's —Are you stirred by—

MARQUIS W. CHILDS'
excellent book on Sweden's cooperatives?
—and do you realize that it's happening here !

Read

CONSUMER COOPERATION IN AMERICA

Democracy's Way Out

By BERTRAM B. FOWLER

Introduction by MARQUIS W. CHILDS, author of
"Sweden: The Middle Way"

SSweden has found a "middle way" by organizing its consumers. This book shows what has been done and what is being done today on these lines in America.

- ▶ In 1929 an oil concern refused to sell to the cooperative wholesale organization in North Kansas City because the latter's business was "too small to bother with." In September of last year the cooperative bought the oil concern's plant at a bankruptcy sale and moved in.
- ▶ In 1935 the Eastern States Farmers' Exchange did a business of $14,000,000—selling feed to its own members.
- ▶ In 88 North Dakota towns in which there are cooperative oil stations the average sales of "co-op" stations is 195,000 gallons a year. The yearly average of privately owned stations in those same towns is 98,000 gallons.
- ▶ The Freeborn Co. Cooperative Oil Co. of Albert Lea, Minn., was formed in 1925 with a capital of $500. During ten years it has increased its capital by less than $12,000, BUT its assets are now $125,000, and it has paid back to its members $250,000 in patronage refunds.
- ▶ In Cloquet, Minn., a cooperative society did a business last year of approximately a million dollars. Also, it drove two "chains" out of town.
- ▶ In Amarillo, Tex., the Consumers' Cooperatives, Associated, operating in the Texas Panhandle, New Mexico and Oklahoma, did a business in 1934 of $4,000,000.
- ▶ The nation's first cooperative college will be opened in Kansas City in the fall of 1936.
- ▶ In New York the Consumers' Cooperative Services began with $3,100 of borrowed capital. Last year its cafeterias did a business of $395,000 and returned net earnings of $18,000 to the consumer members. These cafeterias paid higher wages than those fixed in the recent NRA code.
- ▶ In Elk City, Okla., a cooperative hospital will, for an annual fee of $25, provide for a family of four, periodic medical examinations, treatments, surgical operations, dental care—plus room, board and nursing when needed.
- ▶ The Farm Bureau Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. has in ten years built up assets of $4,000,000 with a cash surplus of $550,000 and a membership of 160,000.
- ▶ A capital of $20 started the Credit Union in the New England Telephone and Telegraph Co. seventeen years ago. In 1934 the eight credit unions within the company made loans of more than $1,500,000.

There are 2,000,000 American families enrolled today in the consumer cooperative movement. This book shows what they are doing.

$2. At All Bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS • 424 Madison Ave., New York

problem, if there be one, is for the poet to master the technique of the existing popular arts and to seek to transform them. In its flourishing times poetry as a public representation has always grown out of something else.

Preoccupied with such matters, Day Lewis has produced a volume that is not up to the standard of his previous work. It contains a few splendid passages and poems that are interesting in conception, but the vigor and the sustained lyricism of his Magnetic Mountain are absent. He has succeeded most consistently with satire, as in these lines from his bitter parody on "Come live with me and be my love":

I'll handle dainties on the docks
And thou shalt read of summer frocks:
At evening by the sour canals
We'll hope to hear some madrigals.

Care on thy maiden brow shall put
A wreath of wrinkles, and thy foot
Be shod with pain: not silken dress
But toil shall tire thy loveliness.

Where he seems to be condescending anxiously to the popular taste, as in the saga on the Parer-M'Intosh flight and in the radio ballads of the title poem, he produces merely a diluted imitation of his best verse.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

The Cultural Impact

CRITERIA FOR THE LIFE HISTORY: WITH AN ANALYSIS OF SIX NOTABLE DOCUMENTS. By John Dollard. Yale University Press. $2.50.

"CRITERIA FOR THE LIFE HISTORY" is a landmark in the study of personality and culture, a field of social research which has been slowly emerging since 1927. In the social sciences and on their articulate and intelligent periphery there have been rumblings of a more inclusive and systematic attack upon the relationship of human personality to its biological determinants on the one hand, and to the social environment on the other. The biologists, the psychologists, the psychiatrists, the sociologists, and the social anthropologists have been enlisted in an attempt to solve the problem: How does personality grow in culture?

In 1932 a group of distinguished foreign students representing different countries and different disciplines were gathered at Yale University in a seminar to discuss this problem. Dr. Dollard was assistant director of the seminar, and the present book is the fruit of these discussions and of subsequent research work. It represents a well-disciplined attempt to make a new subject completely intelligible to minds accustomed to thinking along diverse and even antagonistic lines.

The book represents primarily a way of thinking, a flexible and consistent frame of reference within which all who are in any way interested in how life-history materials may increase our understanding of human personality can orient themselves. Dr. Dollard takes six famous case histories: "Miss R," from Adler; "31 Contacts with a Seven-Year-Old Boy," by Taft; "Little Hans," from Freud; "The Life Record of an Immigrant," from Thomas Znaniecki; "The Jack Roller," by Shaw; and Wells's "Autobiography." He subjects each of these to a set of criteria: (1) "The subject must be viewed as a specimen in a cultural series." (2) "The organic motives of action ascribed must be socially relevant." (3) "The peculiar role of the family group in transmitting the culture must be recognized." (4) "The specific method of elaboration of organic materials in the social behavior must be shown." (5) "The continuous related character of experience from childhood through adulthood must be stressed." (6) "The social situation must be carefully and continuously specified as a factor." (7) "The life-history material itself must be organized and conceptualized."

Within as carefully integrated a frame as this, a great deal of first-class thinking can be done about the life-history materials which are daily presented to us as social documents, and about the premises of the various psychological and socio-economic schools, each of which habitually presents a one-sided approach to human beings, with at the most lip-service to the others. The recent flair for biography and socio-psychological interpretation of the lives of the great can also be informed and deepened by attention to Dr. Dollard's criteria. If the reader wishes to consider the significance of the reported decrease of manic-depressive psychoses in Russia, or the relationship between unemployment, housing shortage, and subsequent character formation, or the reason why a famous family of actors has boasted so many distinguished names—here are the tools with which to approach these problems.

The book is unique in that it is not a pronouncement about social phenomena but an invitation to think courageously and incisively about them. It does not say: This is the answer; and then deal out a series of platitudes which will lose their significance in a year. Instead, it says: We think that the life history is an excellent way of attacking our problem. What are the requirements of a good life history? How have the great attempts to date to use this kind of material succeeded or failed? What can we learn from their successes or failures?

Dr. Dollard has neither reprinted nor summarized the life-history material which he criticizes. It is implicit in his treatment that the reader will have read all or some of the famous documents. And this is the method that should be followed. The book is a manual to place beside one's book shelf for continuous reference, and conversely it should be read with that book shelf at hand. The importance of this approach consists in the fact that with the illumination gained from criticizing one assorted set of "notable documents" one comes to no dead end but rather to a fascinating, still unexplored country, armed with a first-class compass.

Dr. Dollard has focused his discussion on the importance of the cultural impact upon the organism. He has dealt somewhat cursorily with the idiosyncratic aspects of personality. The reader may feel the need of taking into consideration specific traits that can be attributed to heredity, such as physique, and also the factor of accident in an individual human life. But this is easily done, for here is no pompous ex cathedra statement but an honest working tool, shaped to the mind of the socially inquiring. No one among the socially inquiring can afford to be without it.

MARGARET MEAD

The Nijinsky Legend

THE TRAGEDY OF NIJINSKY. By Anatole Bourman and D. Lyman. Whittlesey House. $3.

THE Nijinsky myth continues to grow. Now his old friend and schoolmate, Anatole Bourman, has pronounced him "the greatest dancer who ever lived, perhaps the greatest who ever will live." Once the tentative shadow of doubt is lifted from this ultimate superlative, there will be nothing left to do but canonize him.

It is nineteen years since Nijinsky's career came to an end. It covered in all a period of only nine years, and two of these were spent in internment during the war. Of his total achievement as a creator, two ballets won a succès de scandale, one was a mild fiasco, and the other was something of a catastrophe. Only one managed to survive its first season, and none has outlived its generation. Of his brilliant dancing, obviously nothing remains. All this supplies scant material for a legend, and doubtless none would ever have arisen but for his romantic personal story with its perverted sex aspects and its grotesque end.

The Bourman memoir, however, steers clear of sensationalism; its accent is rather threnodic and tends to make its subject a kind of choreographic Chatterton. Its chief interest lies in the picturesque anecdotes of student life in "Theater Street"; after the two boys have been graduated and Nijinsky begins to have a career, he passes more and more out of Bourman's sphere, and out of his own biography.

In an afterword Bourman explains that he has written the book "because no other living person can clear the life I know so well of the unjust criticisms I have read." In the light of the results one wonders what unjust criticisms the author could have had in mind, for he certainly does nothing to soften the final picture. He makes his hero slow, dull-witted, erratic, susceptible to flattery and outside influences of all sorts. Though he touches very lightly on the subject of abnormal sex relations, he makes no effort to deny them. Certainly no one has ever been unjustly critical of Nijinsky's dancing; of his compositions, Bourman disparages two and omits all mention of the other two. He has no opinion to express of the strange marriage. In matters that did not involve him personally he has apparently done no research. The book as a whole, therefore, turns out to be rather a protestation of his friendship than a defense of his friend.

Occasionally the author's accuracy is not beyond reproach. For example, speaking of the revolution of 1905, he says that the agitation within the ballet was "conducted by the least attractive members of the company, who went about wearing serious faces and dirty linen." This seems a singular description of Fokine, Pavlova, and Karsavina, who, according to Karsavina's memoirs, were active in the movement. Again, he claims that Nijinsky was the only dancer to achieve the entrechat-dix, though as a matter of fact Paul Haakon has also managed this bit of technical virtuosity. But the most extraordinary technical claim made for Nijinsky is that "he used to lie on his back, prone on the floor," which assuredly is a trick without precedent.

The book has been written with the collaboration of D. Lyman. It is readable, sentimental, and, except for the two hitherto unpublished photographs it contains, altogether unimportant.

JOHN MARTIN

Shorter Notices

AMERICA GOES TO PRESS. By Laurence Greene. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.75.

Amusement, excitement, and considerable raw food for thought are supplied by Laurence Greene's "America Goes to Press," a scrapbook of the big news stories from the time a few radical subjects of a foreign king threw tea into a harbor rather than pay an unjust tax until a complacent people heard about a shot at Sarajevo and were told (by the old New York Sun) that the murder of the Archduke Ferdinand was "calculated to diminish the tenseness of the situation and to make for peace." Between these events appear most of the streamer items in our history, such as the Battle of Lexington, the discovery of gold,

LINCOLN STEFFENS says:
"I would only go to Russia on an Open Road tour."

A Month in SOVIET RUSSIA

with Third Class passage

$372

under leadership of

HENRY SHAPIRO

First American member of the Soviet Bar

A comprehensive view of the Russian land and Soviet life, under guidance of one who knows. Sailing June 27; optional sailing July 1.

Other trips under leadership of Louis Fischer, Princess Skariatina, Joshua Kunitz, Julien Bryan, Colston Warne, Maxwell Stewart, Vivienne France.

Independent arrangements for those who prefer to travel on their own.

Booklets on request

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street, New York

Cooperating with Intourist

A PROGRAM FOR MODERN AMERICA

By

HARRY W. LAIDLER

Executive Director

League for Industrial Democracy

An indispensable handbook of economic and political facts and a program of action.

Dr. Laidler here presents, clearly and forcefully, the next steps for America in the fields of child labor, social insurance, electricity, banking, railroads, natural resources, public works, housing, taxation, civil liberties, labor legislation, international affairs and social planning.

A book no one—conservative, liberal, radical—can afford to miss!

528 pages

$2.50

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY
393 Fourth Avenue New York

John Brown's raid, the Monitor and the Virginia (née Merri-mac), Lee's surrender, the Chicago fire, the Custer massacre, the blizzard of 1888, the Johnstown flood of 1889, the Maine, the Titanic. History in the making is served hot off the griddle, and although the reader may frequently burn himself with such dishes, no more exciting fare has been offered the American public in years. If the lay reader gets one-tenth the amusement which this reviewer got out of it he will be more than repaid. Of the four absolutes of journalism, three—conflict, money, and blood (or violence)—dominate the book, the fourth, sex, being only slightly represented, notably in the story of Stanford White, which coincides with the heyday of yellow journalism and prepares us for tabloids. Since the author disarms reviewers in his preface, one cannot attack him for the omission of footnotes correcting the numerous errors which the contemporary reporters made, or for not showing the proper relationship of this news to history. But 375 pages is not enough: if Mr. Greene produces several more volumes and edits them critically he will give us a work as valuable as the present volume is thrilling.

SYCAMORE SHORES. By Clark B. Firestone. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.

This is a book about the Ohio River and its many tributaries; about the water in these rivers, the boats that go slowly up and down between Pittsburgh and Cairo, the life along the shores, and the history of the valley. Mr. Firestone is that attractive and enthusiastic thing, an amateur historian. He has seen all that packet boats could show him of eighteen rivers;

he has saturated himself with the lore of their present life; and he has studied their past. The result is an entertaining and informing book, and one which stimulates a desire in the reader to do something of what Mr. Firestone has done—to float down at least a portion of the Ohio on one of the steamboats which still blow their melodious whistles and turn in to shore at the wave of a lantern on a dark night. To do such a thing would be to understand at once a great deal of American history; particularly if "Sycamore Shores" were taken on board in the capacity of the reference work which it so delightfully is.

DRAMA

"Dulce et Decorum"

"BURY THE DEAD," a new play against war at the Ethel Barrymore Theater, is based on a conceit of originality and power. Six men just laid in their new dug graves by a weary detachment of fellow-soldiers rise slowly to their feet and with quiet persistence refuse to submit to the final indignity—dirt on their faces. They are dead all right. There is no doubt about that. But they won't be buried and they won't lie still no matter how anxious the living may be to have them covered, and forgotten, and quiet at last.

The men ordered to bury the rebellious corpses are struck with terror. So, too, are the captain who comes to investigate, the general who appeals to their sense of duty, and the six women who are brought as a last resort to give their various reasons why the dead, once they are dead, should cease from troubling those living to whom alone the earth belongs. But terrified though they all are, they are not really surprised. Something of the sort, they knew, was bound to happen. Too many people have been killed and too many have been buried. Earth herself has rebelled. She will not receive any more of her children dead before their time, and dead men will submit no longer even to death itself. One of the six has a vision of a better world. The other five merely know that they have never seen nor heard nor felt what they were destined to see and to hear and to feel. They are dead and it can't be helped. But the living must not be permitted to forget them or to suppose that they found it sweet and proper to die. "De profundis clamavi."

If only the play as a whole were as original and arresting as this central conceit, if only the author's macabre imagination had sustained him to the end, then "Bury the Dead" would be as impressive a work as its many enthusiastic admirers have already proclaimed it to be. Even as it stands it is incomparably the best of the left-wing dramas seen this year, and the unknown author, one Irwin Shaw, quite legitimately inspires hopes at least as high as those aroused by Mr. Odets when he was known only as the author of "Waiting for Lefty." Indeed, "Bury the Dead" is much less merely a journalistic tour de force than the latter piece, but the unfortunate fact nevertheless remains that the first twenty minutes of Mr. Shaw's play are the best twenty minutes of the evening and that the writing goes steadily downhill as the symbol is developed in more and more obvious directions.

It is not that the author is not capable of powerful and genuinely dramatic presentation. The solid matter-of-factness of the opening scenes is, for example, right. So, too, are the grotesque grave-digger humor of the private soldiers and the whole air of inevitability about the miracle once it has occurred.

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE

MOROSCO THEATRE, 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30
Extra Matinee Wednesdays

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:45

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St., W. of B'way. Eve'gs, 8:40
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:40

"The most tormenting war play of the year has come from a new man . . . Mr. Shaw's grimly imaginative rebellion against warfare is a shattering bit of theatre magic that burrows under the skin of argument into the raw flesh of sensation."

—BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times

BURY THE DEAD

The Drama That Startled the World

By IRWIN SHAW

BARRYMORE Thea. 47 St. W. of B'y | Prices: Evgs. 50c to $2.00
Eves. 8:50. Mats. 2:40 | Mats. Wed. & Sat. 50c to $1.50

Moreover, in these earlier scenes the translation of the idea into concrete terms is fully achieved. No explanations or interpretations are given and none are needed. The symbol and its meaning are not two things but one—which is another way of saying that allegory has ceased to be allegory and become poetry instead.

Perhaps the progressive enfeeblement of the play indicates merely that it was actually over in half an hour, that any further development is necessarily merely the addition of excrescences, because the conception was complete at least by the time that the rebellious dead men had refused the last cruel plea of the mothers and wives and sweethearts that they lie quietly down and be forgotten. But in any event the method of development which the author adopts is almost the worst. He grows more prosaic, more explicit, and more vociferous as he proceeds. The lesson—surely clear enough—is explained and reiterated in progressively shriller terms until the play ends in one of those noisy near-riots to which the imagination of so many peace-lovers seems habitually to lead.

If the author, having affirmed that dying of shrapnel wounds is neither sweet nor proper, wishes to add "that is, of course, unless the war really is a righteous one," he has a perfect right to do so. I am not blaming him as a playwright for not agreeing with me that there is not much hope of avoiding war until it is generally realized that torn faces and bloody guts are neither dulce nor decorum even though they happen to be the by-products of the newest conviction that a way to end war has been discovered at last. But I do blame him as a playwright for not discovering some way of presenting his amendment in terms as truly dramatic and as truly poetic as he found for the original proposition. A good play is not improved by the addition of supplementary discourses however fiery or however true. A symbol as complete and adequate as the one he invented is not improved by being progressively diluted with explicit interpretations.

"Bury the Dead" has been very effectively directed by Worthington Minor, and it is well acted.

The same company which usually appears about this time each year in the Gilbert and Sullivan repertory is holding forth again at the Majestic. The hypercritical complain of the obvious fact that its productions are considerably more casual than those of the D'Oyly Carte company, but William Danforth is as good as the best and Vivian Hart has a very agreeable voice as well as a very agreeable presence. Perhaps the most telling thing I could say is that I find myself attending the performances year after year. By the time this notice appears "The Pirates of Penzance" will have given way to "Pinafore" with "Trial by Jury" as a curtain-raiser.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

"HILL and dale" recording is not yet available for the ordinary phonograph owner: only radio and a few specially constructed machines for school can now use the process. It consists in cutting records vertically instead of laterally, as is done now by the large commercial companies. Its superiority was demonstrated by Grace Moore's motion picture "One Night of Love," the first to use "hill and dale." An otherwise ordinary film, it became an overnight success by virtue of its recording—and, of course, Miss Moore's singing. When the problems of marketing the process have been solved, there

The American Russian Institute presents THE SOVIET THEATRE A SYMPOSIUM

at the New School for Social Research
66 West 12th St., Tuesday, May 5 at 8:30 P.M.

Speakers

Prof. H. W. L. Dana, Outstanding authority on the Soviet theatre
(who will speak with slides).

Norris Houghton
Author of "Moscow
Rehearsals."

Sidney Kingsley
Author of "Men in White" and "Dead End."

Lee Simonson, A director of the Theatre Guild.

Admission 50c and 75c, tax included

Advance sale by The American Russian Institute, Inc.
56 West 45th St., New York
Telephone: MUrray Hill 2-0313

EUROPEAN STUDY TOUR SOCIAL AND CULTURAL DEVELOPMENTS ABROAD

Leadership—Miss Betty Youngstrand, League of Nations Association, Chicago
VISITING: ENGLAND—DENMARK—SWEDEN—FINLAND—
GERMANY—CZECHOSLOVAKIA—HUNGARY—AUSTRIA—FRANCE
July 2-Sept. 4—Third Class—$158
Optional Trips to Soviet Union & International Youth Congress, Geneva.
Write for detailed itinerary "RR"

POCONO STUDY TOURS, 545 Fifth Ave., New York City

SEX PRACTICE IN MARRIAGE

by
C. B. S. Evans,
M.D., F.A.M.A.,
Member White
House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by R. W. Holmes,
M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haile, Ch.M., M.B., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecologist and Sexolo-gist, London, England.

including charts of sex organs with detailed explanations

By ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M.D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital

3-WAY GUIDE:

CONTENTS

- Section I. Bride and Groom
- Section II. The Cold Wife—Frigidity
- Section III. The Unsatisfied Wife
- Section IV. Married Courtship
- Section V. The Perfect Physical Expression of Love
- Section VI. Illustrative Charts and Explanations

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View • The Internal Sex Organs • The External Sex Organs • Female Sex Organs, Front View • Entrance to Female Genital Parts • Male Sex Organs, Side View • Male Sex Organs, Front View • Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views.

(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."
—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."
—Lancet (leading Eng. medical journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."
—General Practitioner

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."
—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."
—*Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n

*The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 438-N
333 Sixth Ave., New York

Send ☐ in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 plus few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded.

Name.....

Address.....

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee.)

should be a new wave of interest in phonograph records. Meantime the Electrical Research Products, Inc., has shown admirable foresight in getting—through the good offices of Dr. Greet and Dr. Hibbett of Columbia University—Robert Frost and Gertrude Stein to make recordings of their works by both processes. Even the lateral-cut recordings of these poets are remarkably faithful. No student of American poetry will want to miss Mr. Frost's readings of "The Death of the Hired Man" or his "Two Tramps in Mud-Time"; while Miss Stein's reading from "The Making of Americans" assumes an almost deceptive lucidity. Seven records, priced at $2.50 each, are available at Electrical Research Products, 250 West Fifty-seventh Street, New York, or at the Gramophone Shop, 18 East Forty-eighth Street, New York.

You may also want to know about some recordings made by Vachel Lindsay for the Columbia University Press about a year before he died (three records, 75 cents each or $2 for the set). They include, of course, "The Congo," and give a graphic idea of Lindsay's conception of the poem's rhythms. The recording process, unfortunately, was so inferior, that one virtually needs to follow the records with a libretto to understand what the poet was saying.

In the field of the humorous monologue the last pronouncedly successful records were the "Cohen on the Telephone" series of some ten or more years ago. Stanley Holloway, however, is staging a small come-back for this type of entertainment, and the latest addition to his list is worthy of his earlier efforts. In "Albert Comes Back," a sequel to "Albert and the Lion," you will be glad to learn that though our hero was swallowed by Wallace, King of Beasts, he made such a fuss inside the tenderhearted animal, that he was coughed up again in time to run home and prevent his parents' being completely solaced with nine pounds four and two of insurance money. Mr. Holloway speaks a Lancashire English with a taint of cockney—or might it be vice versa? The dialect, the amiable savagery, and the folk quality of the monologues are making them a mild sensation among the intelligentsia (Columbia, one record, $1.50).

The Busch Chamber Players have now completed the recordings of the six Bach Brandenburg Concertos. Columbia deserves high praise for this undertaking. If the discs lack the brilliance of the Cortot and Stokowski versions of individual concertos, that is because Mr. Busch has devoutly adhered to the size of orchestra for which the music was written. The fussy musicologist may sigh and say that a cembalo should have been used, but let him listen to Rudolf Serkin's beautiful performance of the solo piano in the fifth concerto. The complete set, in two albums, costs $20.50. If that is too expensive, you are advised to invest in the two records of the second concerto ($3) or at least in the second movement of the sixth (one record, $1.50). This is one of Bach's most deeply serene and exquisitely woven adagios for strings and cembalo.

On a Victor importation you may hear the Philadelphian Dusolina Giannina and the German Marcel Wittrisch sing the love duet from "Madame Butterfly." It is well recorded, but the Wagnerian attacks of Herr Wittrisch and the German translation to "Frau Schmetterling" sound strange in this familiar Italian music (one record, $2). Another fine recording of familiar music in a strange setting is the clever Ravel two-piano transcription of Debussy's "Fêtes," brilliantly played by Josef and Rosina Lhevinne (one record, $1.50). But if you want to hear Debussy's own ideas on the subject, there are three orchestral recordings of this composition which may be profitably consulted—by Stokowski, Gaubert, and Coppola.

HENRY SIMON

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

IDIOT'S DELIGHT. Shubert Theater. Robert Sherwood manages somehow to make a smashing theatrical success out of an anti-war play. With the Lunts and many other entertaining trimmings.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

SAINT JOAN. Martin Beck Theater. Brilliant interpretation by Katharine Cornell of what may well be Shaw's most enduring play.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

ETHAN FROME. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon, and Raymond Massey.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Gaumont British. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

DUBROVSKY. Amkino. As romantic as Pushkin, on whose unfinished novel it is based. Not wholly successful, but interesting as a variation on the orthodox Russian theme.

THE STORY OF LOUIS PASTEUR. Warner Brothers. With Paul Muni as Pasteur this film makes "science" exciting, or at any rate uses the life of its hero to excellent dramatic advantage.

Letters to the Editors

WASHINGTON PROTESTS

Dear Sirs: My attention has been called to a recent article in The Nation, entitled The Slum Clearance Farce. This story was based on a few isolated cases, which I assume to be authentic, and some personal observations by the author, "Karen Dash." Although the Housing Division of the Public Works Administration was not mentioned in this article we handled most of the removal of tenants from the project site, along with the Detroit Housing Commission. To correct the erroneous impression conveyed by this fragmentary account, you will, no doubt, be interested in knowing the facts with respect to those families removed and relocated to date.

Of 471 families one was evicted by process of law. This family was moved without cost, a new home was found, and one month's advance rent was paid by the Wayne County Relief Administration. Thirty days' notice was given to every resident in the project area, which meant at least one month's free rent. In a majority of cases this notice was extended to forty or sixty days. No tenant was asked to move until suitable quarters at equivalent rent had been offered by the relocation office.

Of 471 families approximately 50 per cent were moved to homes equal or superior to those vacated at no increase in rental; 25 per cent were moved to similar dwellings with a slight increase; and 25 per cent were moved into considerably better dwellings with a considerable increase in rental.

At the information office on the site, listings of quarters considerably better than dwellings vacated and at equivalent rentals were made available to all who sought aid in relocation. Those who did not call were assumed able to care for themselves. Since the neighborhood of the project site was a slum, it was difficult to find sufficient decent quarters in the immediate vicinity to house those displaced. Those who preferred the neighborhood to decent housing suffered to some extent from exploitation but to a greater extent from a general rise in rents throughout the city, which they would have been obliged to pay had they remained in their original homes. On the whole, new quarters in the neighborhood were no worse and no better than those vacated. Doubling up existed before relocation; and it exists today, but relocation has had no discernible effect on the amount.

Relocation is not yet finished, but this report summarizes complete, statistical records of 471 families moved to date. I regard it as somewhat more authoritative than a story based on the cases of approximately 1½ per cent of those already handled.

A. R. CLAS,

Director of Housing

Washington, April 8

SLUM CLEARANCE FOR WHOM?

Dear Sirs: I do not see that the letter of Mr. A. R. Clas controverts the main assertions made in my article The Slum Clearance Farce. I have claimed, and I still claim, that any slum-clearance project which does not improve the condition of those who suffer from filthy, unsanitary housing is a fake.

Mr. Clas has nothing to say about the new houses to be constructed—when they are to be built, or who will be permitted to live in them when they are completed. He contents himself with contradicting me on several minor points in connection with the relocation of evicted families.

Sitting somewhere in Washington (I presume) with a typewritten report sent him by the Detroit Housing Commission, Mr. Clas raises a cynical eyebrow at my "personal observations." He says that "thirty days' notice was given to every resident." Yet practically every one of the fifty families I interviewed in their homes told me of receiving a verbal warning to get out within ten days or two weeks. Men from the Relocation Office came around two or three times a day, these people said, to hurry them along.

Mr. Clas states also that no evicted person was asked to move until suitable quarters at equivalent rent had been found. Yet I was told, both at the Relocation Office and at the Alfred Street welfare office, that suitable quarters at equally low rent "simply could not be found for these families, and they would have to double up or pay more."

Mr. Clas admits that 50 per cent of the ousted families have been forced to pay higher rentals in their new dwellings. The other 50 per cent, he says, were moved into homes "equal or superior to those vacated, with no increase in rental." In other words, 50 per cent of the evicted families have moved into houses which are "equal to" those dilapidated shacks, now torn down, which were condemned by the Board of Health as absolutely unfit for human habitation!

Negro welfare families occupy the worst hovels in Detroit. Negro welfare families, lacking adequate food and decent housing, suffer the ravages of pneumonia, rheumatic fever, and tuberculosis. Negro welfare families swell the lists of crime, infant mortality, juvenile delinquency, and disease. Any slum-clearance project which cannot be adapted to the needs of these people is a farce.

KAREN DASH

Detroit, April 14

BULLETIN ON JESUS LOPEZ

Dear Sirs: Since the article about the Jesus Lopez family was written the threat of further legal action against Lopez has subsided at least temporarily. The City of Burbank has agreed to let the family remain in its home until the truck-garden produce can be sold, with the further stipulation that the family must move after that time unless standard sanitary facilities are installed. Since the cost of plumbing is beyond the reach of Lopez, he intends to move as soon as he can harvest his crops.

Because of the cost of defending himself against the charge of being an undesirable resident, Lopez has been unable to meet his payments on his truck and to pay his water bill. More than that, it has been necessary for his parents and twelve brothers and sisters to return to the relief rolls. Finally, he received fifty-five cents a crate for the first load of onions he sold this season, and that, he figures, returns a profit of two or three cents a crate over the cost of production.

ERSKINE CALDWELL

Burbank, Cal., April 26

MR. STOLBERG DEMURS

Dear Sirs: Long experience with the editorial mind has taught me that the contributors' box and the advance announcement are really locker rooms where the editorial censor may relax and kid the help. In the course of years I have been described by editors or their associates who knew me well as a Harvard professor, a lieutenant commander who is a leading authority on naval strategy and history, a Zionist, a Communist leader, the editor of the New York Times, and a lineal descendant of two brothers, the Counts von und zu Stolberg, two minor poets, one of whom was among the eligible bachelors of his day. As yet I have never been the bearded lady who is also a specialist in industrial unionism. But in time, I'm sure, I'll make it.

So when The Nation not long ago announced in a house ad that I was a "caricaturist," I let it go at that. But when The Nation advertises elsewhere that my prospective stories on John L. Lewis and the La Follettes are to be "satirical character sketches," I must protest. I lack the talent, temper, and intention of a satirist. And even if I didn't, I certainly would not pick public characters whom I take seriously, respectfully, and hopefully—in an age of ominous chaos and growing barbarism.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

New York, April 15

PAVLOV

Dear Sirs: The following letter was written by Professor I. P. Pavlov in the early part of February, that is, shortly before his death. It may therefore be considered his last testament to young Russian scientists. It was written in answer to a request of the Central Committee of the Young Communist League, and was published in the Moscow Pravda of February 28, 1936. The translation is mine.

ALEXANDER MASLOW

Berkeley, Cal., April 16

What shall I wish for the youth of my motherland who are devoting themselves to science?

Before everything else I wish them consecutiveness. I can never speak without emotion about this most important condition of fruitful work. Consecutiveness, consecutiveness, and more consecutiveness. From the very beginning of your work train yourselves to be strictly consecutive in gathering knowledge.

Grasp well the A B C of science before attempting to climb to its summits. Never attempt to deal with subsequents without first mastering antecedents. Never attempt to cover your lack of knowledge by guesses and hypotheses no matter how bold. No matter how this soap bubble may delight you by its iridescence, it will inevitably burst and lead you nowhere.

Accustom yourselves to restraint and patience. Learn to do the spade work in science. Study, compare, accumulate facts!

No matter how perfect the wing of a bird may be, it would never lift the bird without the support of the air. Facts—they are the air of the scientist. Without them you can never fly. Without them the "theories" you evolve are but fruitless efforts.

But while studying, experimenting, observing, try not to remain on the surface of the facts. Do not become archivists of facts. Try to penetrate into the secrets of their origin, search persistently for the laws which govern them.

Second—modesty. Don't ever think that you already know everything. And no matter how highly you may be estimated by others, always have courage to say to yourself, "I am an ignoramus."

Do not let pride possess you. Pride will make you dissent where you should agree. Pride will make you reject useful advice and friendly help. Pride will make you lose objectivity.

In the collective which I happen to direct everything is a matter of atmosphere. We are all harnessed to one common work, and everyone moves it according to his strength and circumstances. Very often we cannot even tell what is "mine" and what is "yours," but the common work only gains from that.

Third—passion. Remember that science asks of a man his whole life, and if you had two lives, even that would not be sufficient for you. Science demands from man much effort and a great passion. Be passionate in your work and in your seeking.

Our motherland opens a great field before scientists, and one must give credit where credit is due—science is being generously introduced into our country. Generously to the limit!

And what is to be said about the position of a young scientist with us? Here everything is clear without saying. Much is given to him, but much also will be asked of him. And for the youth, as well as for us, it is a matter of honor to justify the great trust which our motherland has placed in our science.

I. P. PAVLOV

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

M. E. RAVAGE, The Nation's Paris correspondent, is a native of Central Europe but was educated in this country. Among the books he has published are "The Making of an American" and "The Malady of Europe." In this issue Mr. Ravage carries on from last week his analysis of the rival forces in and the probable results of the French elections.

HAROLD J. LASKI, author of "The State in Theory and Practice," has made the London School of Economics, where he is professor, a mecca for students of political science. He has just ended a visit to this country during which he gave a course on contemporary British politics at the New School for Social Research in New York.

LOUIS ADAMIC flew from Los Angeles to San Francisco to cover the waterfront story for this issue. Through his striking accounts of labor crises which have made him familiar to readers of The Nation and other periodicals, Mr. Adamic has built up a reputation as an outstanding labor reporter. He is also the author of "Dynamite," a study of class violence in America, two autobiographical books, and a novel.

MORRIE RYSKIND is now in Hollywood as a scenarist for M-G-M, in which capacity he collaborated with George S. Kaufman on the story for the Marx brothers' "A Night at the Opera." He was coauthor of "Of Thee I Sing," and author of the hilarious "Diary of an Ex-President," excerpts from which appeared originally in The Nation.

GEORGE FORT MILTON, editor of the Chattanooga News and author of "The Eve of Conflict," a study of Stephen A. Douglas, is outstanding in the South as a liberal publicist and historian.

LEIGH WHITE, of the editorial staff of Tide, is a journalist in the process of becoming a novelist.

MARGARET MEAD is an anthropologist, widely known as the author of "Sex and Temperament in Three Primitive Societies" and other studies of primitive peoples in Samoa and New Guinea.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE has contributed many reviews of poetry to The Nation and other periodicals.

JOHN MARTIN is dance critic for The New York Times.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK WEDNESDAY · MAY 13, 1936

NUMBER 3697

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

597

EDITORIALS:

ETHIOPIA'S COLLAPSE—EUROPE'S PERIL

599

OUR NEW PROSPERITY

600

A DEMOCRATIC LANDSLIDE

601

AUTOMOBILE LABOR HITS ITS STRIDE

602

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

603

MEXICO'S BLOODLESS REVOLUTION

By George Stern

605

NEW JERSEY'S ARMY OF UNOCCUPATION

by Suzanne La Follette

608

POLITICAL NOTES FROM THE NORTHWEST

by Richard L. Neuberger

610

HOLLYWOOD FIGHTS BACK by Herbert Kline

612

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

614

BROWN'S PAGE

615

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

TACTICS AND THE CLERK by Joseph Wood Krutch

616

PROLOGUE TO "SERGEANT GRISCHA"

by Lionel Trilling

617

"THE SAVAGE WARS OF PEACE"

by Barbara Wertheim

617

THE SPIRIT KILLETH by R. P. Blackmur

618

MUSEUM PIECES by Ben Belitt

619

GERMAN IMPERIALISM by Hans Kohn

620

WHAT GALS WORTHY WAS LIKE

by Leslie A. Marchand

620

ORACLE OF JACKSONIAN DEMOCRACY

by William Seagle

621

FILMS: SECOND COMINGS by Mark Van Doren

623

THE INTELLIGENT TRAVELER

by John Rothschild

626

DRAWINGS: by Georges Schrieber, J. C. Orozco,

Don Freeman, and A. Birnbaum

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROWN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,

Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

The Shape of Things

*

THE CURRENT PULITZER AWARDS, AS WE ARE coming to expect them to be, are in general either safely mediocre or downright bad. Two escape from this unfortunate category: Mr. Sherwood's "Idiot's Delight" is brilliant satire; Mr. Perry's "Thought and Character of William James" is sound and readable biography. The rest are pretty sad. There was a difference of critical opinion on "Honey in the Horn," the prize novel, but in a year in which James T. Farrell published "Judgment Day," not only one of the most distinguished of modern novels but the last in a trilogy equally admirable, Mr. Davis may be imagined to have received the award because the Pulitzer judges did not favor "painful" novels. Mr. Coffin, the prize poet, is at least one step ahead of last year's winner, but he is a windy writer none the less. Professor McLaughlin's "A Constitutional History of the United States," able enough in its way, represents the constitutional thinking of a past generation, and there is small question that Mr. Millis's "Road to War," also published in 1935, was more worthy of the award. Felix Morley of the Washington Post, who with George B. Parker of the Scripps-Howard newspapers divided the prize for the best editorial writing, is an admirable news commentator, but the Post is safely Republican, and its editorials at their best could never have reached the heights of public service attained in almost any week by the courageous editorial page of the New York Post. Our most publicized awards in literature and journalism continue to do small service to either.

*

THE VICTORY OF THE FRONT POPULAIRE IN the French elections was far more decisive than had generally been anticipated. The left parties as a whole scored a gain of more than 40 seats and will have a majority, if present alignments hold, of 130 in the new Chamber. The success of the Communists was particularly notable. It had been predicted that they would obtain from 40 to 50 seats as against 10 in the old Chamber; they won 72 seats and now have the third largest representation of any of the political parties. The Socialists gained 50 seats and have emerged as the largest party in the Chamber. Part of the gains made by the groups on the extreme left were obtained at the expense of the more conservative wing of the Radical Socialists, but the heaviest losses were suffered by the parties of the center. Since the right also gained at the expense of the center, we may expect a much sharper cleavage on fundamental policies than has hitherto been the case. The small vote obtained by the fascist-supported candidates suggests that the strength of the Croix de Feu and other fascist groups has been considerably exaggerated. This in itself may prove a danger to the left coalition since many of the more moderate Radical Socialists have supported the Front Populaire only out of fear of an immediate fascist uprising. Thus far, however, no sign of dissension has appeared, and the chances are that June 1, or an earlier day, will see France with a government really representative of public opinion.

*

THE BIG-NAVY BOYS ARE WINNING OUT again. With President Roosevelt's none too reluctant help they are jamming through Congress the biggest peace-time naval-appropriation bill in American history. The House has already passed the recommendation of its Naval Affairs Committee, appropriating $531,068,707 in the naval-supplies bill, and calling in addition for new airplane construction, new destroyer and submarine construction, and the starting of two new super-battleships at a cost of $51,000,000 each, if, as seems certain, another treaty power (Great Britain) does the same. In all, navy funds for the fiscal year are estimated in excess of $600,000,000. It is worth noting that the initial navy appropriation this year is as large as the combined appropriations for army and navy two years ago. It is also worth noting that the starting of construction on new battleships and airplanes means committing ourselves to expenditures far beyond the appropriations for the coming fiscal year. It means mortgaging ourselves to equally heavy if not heavier expenditures for the coming years. Of course this entire program will be rationalized as a reluctant concession on the part of a peace-loving Administration to the needs of national defense. Every militaristic program that has ever been launched has been rationalized in the same terms. It is a little difficult to take this seriously in the face of the committee's proud statement about a navy "second to none," and the evident intention of the Administration to "match any battleship construction that may be undertaken by any other of the signatory powers." The needs of national defense are one thing and can be estimated by expert study; but statements like the above can mean only an armament race.

*

THE SUPREME COURT, IN THE INTERVAL OF our suspense over the delayed Guffey coal decision, has handed down a decision which deserves more attention than it has received—the decision in the St. Joseph's Stockyards case. The court unanimously upheld the order of Secretary Wallace reducing the rates charged. But the judges divided on their reasoning. Chief Justice Hughes went out of his way to discourse on issues that might eventually be involved in other cases of this sort, but were not involved in this one. In the process he revealed, more nakedly than ever before, the intent of the court majority not to let any administrative act with which it disagrees go unchallenged. What was at stake in the issue he raised was the power of the Supreme Court to review the factual findings, as well as the procedural fairness, of an administrative agency. While Chief Justice Hughes held that the court's power extended to both, Justice Brandeis insisted that the usual rule was for the court to review only the legality of procedure, and that there was no reason for "making special exception of issues of fact bearing on a constitutional right." Four justices held with Hughes, two with Brandeis; Justice Roberts steered—very wisely—clear of the whole controversy. The immediate reflection one makes is that this may expose public-utility regulation even further to the mercies of the Supreme Court majority and the holding companies whose social vision they express. The second reflection is that it is a dangerous practice for the court to hand down obiter dicta, as it has been doing, and discuss contingent possibilities. But perhaps the most vital meaning of the decision is reached in the passage in which Justice Hughes serves warning that the court will not allow its power to be "circumscribed by any legislative arrangement designed to give effect to administrative action going beyond the limits of constitutional authority." This can be aimed only at the bills now in Congress to curb the court's power.

*

GRADUALLY THE WAY IS BEING CLEARED FOR a campaign to organize industrial labor which will, within a very few years, shift the whole emphasis of political and social development in this country. By the time this comment is in print, the convention of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers in session at Canonsburg, Pennsylvania, will have decided whether or not to accept the offer of the Committee for Industrial Organization to contribute $500,000 to an organizing campaign—an offer made with the proviso that the C. I. O. shall have a great deal to say about how and by whom that campaign is conducted. It seems inevitable that the offer will be accepted. But even if William Green and Mike Tighe succeed, by some unforeseen move, in holding back the tide, it will not be for long. The will to organize steel is too strong not only in the industry itself but among the other industries represented in the C. I. O., which realizes that steel is the key to a mighty labor movement. Meanwhile a charter with full autonomy has been granted by the American Federation of Labor to the International Union of United Automobile Workers. The proceedings of its recent convention at South Bend are discussed on another page of this issue. All along the line the obstacles to a unified advance are being pushed aside. For the unorganized millions of workers, as well as for those who welcome the advent of a great revivifying force in American life, there are stirring days ahead.

*

DEFENDERS OF FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND OF the press have recently been turning up in the oddest places. The latest is the New York County Americanism Committee of the American Legion, whose sponsorship of a booklet called "Americanism—What Is It?" has aroused no mean tempest in Legion circles. Presenting a calm, cool, and eminently sane exposition of the American attitude—or what should be the American attitude—on freedom of speech, the author of the booklet, Cyrus Leroy Baldridge, has had unqualified support from his own district but violent opposition from other members of the Legion. What his critics like least of all is the statement of Mr. Baldridge's opinion that freedom of speech means, ipso facto, freedom for all. "Some . . . ideas may be new to us," he says. "Some may seem dangerous. Nevertheless, believing in freedom of speech for others as well as for ourselves, we must not attempt to abuse or silence them." This won't do at all for the Legion conservatives who believe that free speech may be allowed to exist "only up to the point where it is used by any person or group to promote the overthrow by force of the government." When, in their judgment, that point is reached, in goes the gag.

*

AFTER HARDLY MORE THAN A FEW MOMENTS of serious thinking, the new Republican Brain Trust has discovered a Scheme for Saving the Country. A year ago Thomas Nixon Carver, professor emeritus of political economy at Harvard, put out a booklet entitled "What Must We Do to Save Our Economic System?" He began with a tribute to Mussolini and Hitler, who are helping to fight off "the hungry hordes of the East," meaning Russia, and proceeded to proposals for "drastic curtailment of unemployment relief," "sterilization of the palpably unfit," "exclusion of all immigrants in order to reduce the labor supply," and organization of the well-to-do and propertied classes to put over this program. Professor Carver reached really lyric heights, however, when he suggested "limitation of marriage to those who can afford an automobile." This is pretty nearly the last word on How to Save Our Economic System from the Hungry Hordes. There is, however, another word to be said, and another man has already said it. His name was Jonathan Swift; he, too, wrote a booklet. It was entitled "A Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of Poor People from Being a Burden to Their Parents or the Country." Dean Swift's proposal was that, since the poor have too many children and too little to eat, the children should be fattened, slaughtered, and eaten. With all due respect to the Republican Party and professors emeriti in general, we rather think that the Swift proposal is neater.

*

THE MOST STRIKING PARADOX IN THE LIFE and character of A. E. Housman was not the fact that his great fame rested solely upon two small volumes published twenty-six years apart. Neither was it that a poet whose verse is almost as simply emotional as Burns's should have been personally even more reserved than the usual Englishman of his class. The real paradox is that a professor of Latin whose whole temperament was fastidious and aloof should have been the only English or American poet of his generation—except possibly Kipling—whose work was read and admired not only by habitual readers of poetry but also by persons to whom nearly all verse is alien. One could count on the fingers of one hand the names of great poets who have written poems, like Gray's "Elegy" or Fitzgerald's "Rubaiyat," which appeal even to the unpoetical, but Housman composed half a dozen such. No one could have been further removed than he from the intellectualizing tradition of modern poetry. His only extended commentary on his own craft, the lecture called "On the Name and Nature of Poetry," was an amiable defense of precisely the sort of romantic aesthetic most infuriating to many contemporary poets. Much of his verse was so far from timely that both the subjects and the attitudes were those which might have appealed as much to the contemporaries of Horace as they did to him. Yet when he died on May 1 at the age of seventy-seven there was not another serious poet writing in English who was known to so large an audience.

Ethiopia's Collapse and Europe's Peril

HAILE SELASSIE'S precipitate flight has come as a rude shock to the millions of people throughout the world who had been hoping against hope that Ethiopia would be able to hold out until sanctions had blunted the edge of Mussolini's zeal for conquest. Although no one really expected the ill-equipped Ethiopian troops to stand up against poison gas, heavy artillery, tanks, aerial bombings, and the overwhelming force which Italy put into the field, it was generally believed that the Emperor could carry on an effective guerrilla campaign long after the chief cities had been captured. It is not impossible that such resistance may yet develop, but the Emperor's flight removes all hope of opposition from an organized Ethiopian government.

This leaves Geneva very much out on a limb. Nationalists the world over will seize upon Mussolini's victory as an indication of the final collapse of the League. It will be said that the principles of collective security have been tried and found wanting. Critics will point out with a considerable measure of justice that none of the great powers, with the exception of the Soviet Union, have shown any sign of subordinating their immediate national interests to the long-range objective of preserving world peace. France must be held particularly responsible for undermining the effect of collective action. While it voted for the mild sanctions that were imposed last fall and has carried them out faithfully, it has repeatedly blocked consideration of an embargo on coal, oil, and steel, which would have seriously crippled if not terminated Mussolini's African campaign. But England must also bear an important share of the blame. The contrast between Britain's passionate denunciation of Italian imperialism and its previous indifference to the Japanese invasion of Manchuria created more than a suspicion that its new-found enthusiasm for collective security was not wholly sincere. This suspicion was reinforced by its unilateral action in sending its fleet to the Mediterranean, by its rearmament program, by the ill-fated Hoare-Laval proposals, and finally by its refusal to support collective action in the face of Hitler's insolent breach of treaties. Nor can the United States escape all responsibility. While it is impossible to say what might have happened had this country been prepared to support the League's proposed oil embargo, our inability to cooperate was unquestionably an important factor in preventing the imposition of this sanction last December.

But is it accurate to say that the League has failed merely because Ethiopian resistance has been shattered? Few persons thought six or eight months ago that the imposition of the mild penalties now in force would prevent Mussolini from overrunning the African kingdom. Sanctions can prevent war only if the potential aggressor knows in advance that penalties of such a stringent nature will be imposed that it cannot hope to enjoy the fruits of its aggression. Such a situation obviously did not exist last October. With the Manchurian affair as a criterion, Mussolini did not expect the League to adopt strenuous measures. The war had been going on several weeks before sanctions were actually imposed. By that time no one really believed that it was possible to save Ethiopia from invasion and conquest. In fact few persons were really deeply concerned about Ethiopia. Attention was centered rather upon the task of shaping a weapon for preventing Nazi aggression. To achieve this, it was not so necessary to stop Mussolini immediately as to show the world that a nation could not resort to unwarranted aggression with impunity and that it could not hope to gain from its aggression.

This being the case, the real test of sanctions obviously could not come until after Mussolini's victory in Ethiopia. The fact that Italy has triumphed more quickly than was anticipated does not alter the situation. It is too late to prevent the Italian armies from taking over an ancient empire that never before had felt the conqueror's heel, but it is still possible to save the League and establish a precedent which will make potential aggressors hesitate before plunging the world into war.

The issues confronting the Council at its regular meeting on May 11 are clear-cut. The League can admit defeat and follow the course which it adopted after the invasion of Manchuria: that is, prepare a stinging resolution rebuking the aggressor, refuse to recognize Italian sovereignty over Ethiopian territory, and appoint a committee to recommend further action. No one would suggest that this procedure has been effective in checking Japan, nor does it offer hope of dissuading nations from resorting to war to promote their national interests. With Germany poised for a blow against Austria or Memel, any weakness on the part of the League would be an invitation for Nazi aggression. The alternative is to maintain or strengthen sanctions, not only as a warning to Hitler, but as a means of preserving the League for more difficult trials to come.

Admittedly this will be a difficult task. The prestige of the League is once more at ebb tide. Eden appears to have given up the unequal struggle against the reactionary elements in his party, and cannot be counted on to furnish the dynamic leadership which is needed in the present crisis. The new Chamber of Deputies in France, on the other hand, should be far more interested in preserving the League than the one that it supersedes. Laval's commitments to Mussolini will mean little to the Front Populaire.

And though the present British government appears unable to pursue a consistent policy toward collective security, it may be argued that the very existence of the British Empire depends on preserving the League. This is not only because Britain is one of the chief beneficiaries of the status quo and would suffer heavily if it were disturbed, but because the British Empire can only exist in a world in which effective international organization is possible. As was pointed out in a recent issue of the Economist, the choice before the empire is between a common League policy and a parting of company in which each unit—Britain, Canada, Australia, and the Irish Free State—would follow its own national interests. Thus if British public opinion is sufficiently quick to recognize where the true interests of empire lie, there is reason to hope that the League may yet be saved from oblivion.

Our New Prosperity

FINANCIAL writers throughout the country have been busily engaged during the past two weeks explaining why the recent stock-market crash is unlikely to usher in a depression comparable to that of 1929. If on the whole their arguments have been inconclusive, it does not necessarily follow that another crisis is already on the way. For despite the action of the stock market, there is abundant evidence that the United States is in the midst of an upsurge of business such as the country has not seen since 1929. The steel industry has been operating at a higher rate in the last few weeks than at any time for six years. If the present rate of activity were maintained throughout the year, steel-ingot production would reach 50,000,000 tons, or approximately the amount turned out in 1928. Retail automobile and truck sales in April were close to the 1929 level. General Motors, the largest unit in the industry, sold more cars in the first quarter of this year than in any similar period in its history.

While the present boom has not equally affected all industries, business improvement has been more widespread than at any time since 1929. Industrial production has been running at about 96 per cent of the 1923-25 average. Cash farm income for the first three months of 1936 was approximately 7 per cent higher than in the same period of 1935. Consumers' purchasing power as revealed by department stores' sales has increased by 9 per cent. And though the building industry as a whole remains seriously depressed, residential construction is up 75 per cent from last year.

Three years of more or less steady recovery having passed, speculation naturally turns to the proximity of the next collapse. Even apologists for the New Deal cannot fail to observe elements of weakness in the present situation. It is difficult to believe in the stability of near-boom production when employment is only 85 and pay rolls are less than 75 per cent of normal. Even in March, when production was nearly at its seasonal peak, the A. F. of L. estimated that there were nearly 12,200,000 unemployed. Factory pay rolls are running about 5 per cent above last year, but real wages in the manufacturing and non-manufacturing industries are only about 3 per cent over the 1932 average and nearly 15 per cent below 1929.

Nevertheless, viewing the situation as a whole one cannot fail to be impressed by the strength of the short-term factors working for further recovery. Consumer purchasing power is certain to be stimulated by the payment of the two-billion-dollar soldiers' bonus. Government expenditures show no sign of an early decline; in fact, the PWA is just beginning to be effective as an agency of recovery. The two most retarded sectors of our national economy—the steel and building industries—are beginning to stir. Most important of all, the primary motive-force of recovery—the prospect of profits—is daily becoming more effective. Last year, for the first time since the depression, all the leading industrial groups with the exception of the railways reported a profit. The total net earnings of the 909 large business enterprises included in the report of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York rose 44 per cent over 1934 and were 11 times as large as in 1932. A preliminary estimate covering 101 corporations shows an additional gain of 38 per cent in the first quarter of 1936.

The fact that the prospects for earnings are better than at any time in the past six years is especially significant in view of the existence of surplus member-bank reserves aggregating $2,700,000,000—enough to permit a credit expansion of $27,000,000,000. Until recently there has been little tendency to make use of this tremendous reservoir of potential purchasing power. In April, however, the banks of New York City reported that loans and investments had increased to a greater extent than in any other comparable period except during a short interval in the fall of 1929. Moreover, in contrast to the recent pattern, only about 15 per cent of the expansion in total loans and investments throughout the country may be accounted for by increased holdings of government securities. Thus we are apparently obtaining at long last that new investment upon which continued business expansion depends. With interest rates at the lowest point in history, there is every reason to believe that this expansion should continue.

Judged by almost any criterion, however, the present status of business is far more unstable than that of the early days of the 1929 boom. With 12,000,000 unemployed and over 20,000,000 on relief, consumer purchasing power is pegged at a subnormal level. The huge reserves accumulated under the Social Security Act may be counted on to diminish buying power still further. The rapid rise of profits will only accentuate that disproportion in the distribution of income which the Brookings Institution found to lie at the root of the last depression. An increase in surplus capital is bound to be far more serious than in 1929 because of the disappearance of foreign lending. Experience has shown that some artificial stimulus is necessary to keep the wheels of industry moving. Thus far the discrepancy between the aggregate income of the working class and the price of their product which is at the basis of our difficulty has been offset by government spending. Let that spending stop, as it ultimately must if the federal government is to maintain solvency, and the country will face a graver crisis than that of 1929.

A Democratic Landslide

THE astonishing Roosevelt vote in Massachusetts and the still more impressive turning out of 1,300,000 Democratic voters in Illinois, where there was also no contest in the primary, is merely another proof of the extraordinary way the President has been coming back into popular favor. The pro-Administration tide is running so strongly that the Republicans themselves privately admit the hopelessness of their cause. A prominent Midwestern Republican states that after two weeks in Washington and New York he has yet to find a Republican who believes that his party has a fighting chance. When asked if the leaders he had talked with all laid this to the so-called "buying" of the election by the great relief funds, the AAA payments, and so on, he replied, "Not at all." They admitted, he said, that it was primarily due to the split in the Republican Party, the absence of any alternative platform, the continuing improvement in business conditions under Roosevelt, the lack of a strong candidate, and the President's own popularity and extraordinary political skill. A newspaper writer in Washington who hates Mr. Roosevelt and all his works admitted recently that he thought Farley was right in his predictions of a greater Roosevelt success than in 1932. What is even more surprising is that one of the prominent business men of Chicago, on arriving in New York the other day, declared that the feeling among the business men and bankers in Chicago had suddenly become much more favorable to the President. Little has happened in the last three or four months, as far as the President is concerned, to account for the change. The two speeches he has made since his return from his vacation have by no means been of his best, and the tax bill has certainly not added to his popularity.

The President is amazingly blessed by the absence of an important Republican candidate. Colonel Knox seems eliminated. While Borah has made a good showing, he has not achieved anything beyond the certainty that his wishes will receive favorable consideration in the convention. Governor Landon is so far in the lead since his great run in Massachusetts that he can only be headed off by a combination of all the anti-Landon forces, if then. There is an amusing story going around in journalistic circles in Washington that Landon was asked by a well-known correspondent how he accounted for his being so far in front in the race for the nomination when he had never been prominent in national life, was practically unknown in Washington, and was the governor of a small agricultural state. The tale runs that he replied, "Perhaps it is due to the complete bankruptcy of the Republican Party." Amazing though it may seem, this great historic party, backed even in its last defeat by 15,000,000 votes, cannot find a candidate really equipped for the office.

Even more important is the bankruptcy of the Republican policy. The maneuvers of the Republican National Committee and the Liberty League have been, if anything, stupider than was expected. It is enough to point out that their campaign began with Mr. Smith's fatal speech at the Liberty League dinner, and that the latest move has been the appointment of a Republican Brain Trust including the precious Professor Carver. At every turn they have concentrated the attention of the country upon their own reactionary character and have thrown the waverers over into the Roosevelt camp. Mr. Roosevelt's victory will therefore be the country's answer to Republican stupidity. It will also be the country's answer to a program for running a vast industrial system like the American on the basis of a laissez faire policy relieved only by various subsidies to Big Ownership.

What effect an overwhelming victory will have upon the President has begun to worry both his friends and his critics. Frank R. Kent has recently written on this subject, and the Scripps-Howard newspapers have begun to stress the fact that "too much power is a hazardous thing." But more important is the effect that impending victory will have upon the Democratic platform. Mr. Roosevelt will have a long enough whip to crack over the industrialists—if he chooses to do the cracking. What is more likely is that, relieved of pressure from the left by his prospects of an easy victory, he will shape both his platform and his policy on the indecisive lines of the past year. The only hope of even a moderately liberal Administration policy is the building up of a genuine progressive and radical opposition in Congress. To this all the efforts of the progressive groups should be turned in the campaign.

Automobile Labor Hits Its Stride

PRESIDENT GREEN of the American Federation of Labor sprang a surprise at last week's convention of the International Union of United Automobile Workers in South Bend, Indiana, when he announced on the very first day the termination of the "probationary period" of the union and called for the immediate democratic election of officers. According to a correspondent who has sent us a first-hand account of the proceedings, Mr. Green has obviously given up any further attempt to control an organization which has consistently opposed his policies. Francis J. Dillon, whom Green appointed as president at the August convention, against the expressed will of the majority, seemed taken aback by Green's action. But he relinquished his office without delay, leaving behind only a handful of his former associates, who did their best to disrupt the procedure of the convention thereafter but disappeared one by one as they found their tactics ineffectual. Incidentally, President Green's announcement drew from the convention the only genuine applause he received during his meteoric appearance. The rest of the applause was reserved for the Committee for Industrial Organization, which was very much in evidence.

Unity, in one way or another, was the keynote of the convention, and one of its brightest manifestations was the unprecedented appearance of representatives of the three major independent unions in the industry, all pledging amalgamation. One place on the incoming international executive board was left open for this eventuality, and the general officers were instructed to start immediate negotiations to this end. Since the independent group is a good deal stronger than the A. F. of L. union in the Detroit area, it should provide a great impetus to organization in the center of the industry.

The first test of strength on the convention floor came on the question of admitting the powerful Toledo local with full representation. The charter of the Toledo union, nationally renowned for its two great strikes against the Auto-Lite and Chevrolet companies, had been withheld by Dillon, who had insisted upon splitting this federal local into its ten component plant groups, for the ultimate benefit of craft unions claiming jurisdiction over various sections of the Toledo organization. The vote of the convention was overwhelmingly in favor of seating all the Toledo delegates and continuing their single charter.

An incredibly crude forged letter, purporting to have come from "The Communist Party," mimeographed and unsigned, calling for the election of Homer Martin and Wyndham Mortimer, outstanding progressive leaders, was put into the hands of each delegate before the elections in an attempt to discredit these men, who were candidates for the two leading offices of the union. Both men were elected, the former by acclamation, the latter by a substantial majority. A more open attempt at red-baiting came in the form of a resolution calling for the expulsion of Communists. It was beaten down as one delegate after another got to his feet and told how he had been marked as a red because of his militant conduct in a strike or in some other union activity. An amendment calling for the exclusion from office of all "known and proven" Communists was likewise suppressed. A resolution setting down the convention as unalterably opposed to fascism, Nazism, communism, "and all other isms," was adopted out of politic concern lest the rejection of the anti-red resolutions be considered an indorsement of communism. On the last day a resolution indorsing Roosevelt was defeated; however, an appeal for reconsideration because of the possible repercussions of this action among the industrial-union group brought a change in the vote. At the same time the convention indorsed the formation of a Farmer-Labor Party, and the local, district, and national branches of the union were instructed to take the initiative in pressing this movement. An exciting moment occurred when a delegate read on the floor a headline from Hearst's Herald and Examiner falsely announcing the automobile union's secession from the A. F. of L. The delegates yelled for the expulsion of the reporter. A telegram of protest was sent; as a result a retraction was printed the next day.

Last August restraint and anger dominated the automobile workers' convention. This May the atmosphere is one of buoyancy and hope. Frank Grillo of the Rubber International told the convention that the membership of his union had increased 400 per cent since it obtained autonomy last September. There is no reason to believe that the automobile union will not have a like success, and the intense enthusiasm of the delegates in South Bend gave fresh evidence of the rising spirit of American labor.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Secretary Morgenthau

Roosevelt Cracks the Whip

THE last push of the Seventy-fourth Congress's closing session has begun. With the White House cracking the whip, the gallused boys on Capitol Hill are plunging to the task of cleaning up the legislative calendar in order to rebuild their political fences back home. The most important bill of all, the $1,500,000,000 relief measure, is being given less attention than the Congress accorded to the $50,000,000 seed-loan bill. Apparently it is to be passed without major change; Roosevelt had only to snap his fingers last week to put an end to the plans of a House faction, led by Beiter of New York, to earmark a portion of the appropriation for the use of Ickes's PWA. The Administration's tax bill, second to the relief bill in importance, also is sliding along on politically greased ways. The fact that the bill is so badly drawn that it is certain to delight the hearts of tax-dodgers, while falling far short of its social and fiscal objectives, gives November-eyed Senators and Representatives no concern. It has even provided Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Secretary of the Treasury, with one of his happiest moments in public office. Morgenthau, who approaches a Congressional committee like one about to be tossed to the lions, found to his great joy when he testified before a Senate committee a few days ago that none knew or cared enough about this drastic revision of the tax structure to ask him an intelligent question. As a result, for the first time in his experience with this sort of thing he was able to testify without embarrassing resort to assistance by his staff. Also in the rush is the maneuvering over ship-subsidy legislation. The week ended with Senator Guffey preparing to introduce another "compromise" bill, which, according to the forecasts, will be his original bill amended to prolong the ship operators' enjoyment of their present subsidies until next March.

Running counter to the trend is the official shelving of the Puerto Rican independence bill five days after its introduction by Senator Tydings—after all Puerto Rican parties except the insignificant Nationalist faction had violently attacked the measure. Also running counter to the trend is the maneuvering in the House to forestall a vote for repeal of the "red rider," which forces a monthly loyalty oath on all District of Columbia school-department employees. Speaker Byrns can give the repealer right of way on any District day in the House, but he is paying off an old political debt to Blanton, the measure's chief foe, by blocking its path at each turn with some major piece of legislation.

Mr. Gifford "Denies"

THE portrait of Walter S. Gifford and his colleagues that the Federal Communications Commission is painting with its investigation of the A. T. and T. has begun to show more than faint resemblance to those latter-day robber barons, the Insulls and Hopsons. Samuel Becker as chief investigator has got in a number of definite strokes in the last few days. Chief among them was one showing that the A. T. and T., most demure of holding companies, after making enormous profits for many years from renting telephone sets to its operating subsidiaries, suddenly reversed its policy in 1927 and made its subsidiaries buy the instruments at a price which netted the A. T. and T. an additional profit of $14,000,000. Becker showed that the holding company decided to sell the equipment to its subsidiaries just as the introduction of the hand set threatened the instruments sold with obsolescence. In this fashion, he pointed out, the A. T. and T. not only transferred to its subsidiaries the obsolescence risk but also put the old instruments into their rate bases at a figure to justify continuance of the existing rates charged the public for telephone service. In addition, he showed that the operating companies, to protect themselves against loss on the transaction, tried to discourage use of the new hand sets and to that end levied against the consumer an extra charge if he insisted on having one.

The evidence was so telling that A. T. and T. officialdom resorted to a desperate dodge to hide it from the public. Just as the morning session at which the evidence was presented closed, and reporters were hurrying to get the gist of it on the news wires, G. F. Hurd, company counsel, issued a statement challenging the testimony of the commission's experts as "grossly inaccurate and inadequate." His remarks successfully diverted reportorial attention from the evidence and fixed it on the drama of conflict he had created for the afternoon editions. When Becker challenged him later in the day to cite wherein the record was inaccurate either specifically or "in general," Hurd said he could not answer because he had not yet examined the record. Becker similarly squelched Gifford when the president of the A. T. and T. insisted that he was prepared to testify that the company had not made $14,000,000 on the deal in question. When Becker shot back, "Are you prepared to testify from your personal knowledge and an examination of the books?" Gifford subsided meekly into his chair, saying, "Well, now that you ask it that way—no." The books showed that the company reported in its federal income-tax return for 1927 the $14,000,000 profit Mr. Gifford was "prepared" to deny.

Poisoning the Consumer

THAT vaudeville act Lester Jesse Dickinson put on in the Senate Monday would have been funnier if the Iowan had not blown up in his lines. As written for him by the G. O. P.'s encyclopedists, the part was supposed to be an assault on the New Deal for replacing with canned dogfood the chickens Hoover left in every pot. Dickinson clumsily turned the role into an attack on the Food and Drug Administration for failing to make sure that humans reduced to eating dogfood get good, pure dogfood. For his pains Lester got himself literally laughed off the Senate floor. His speech, however, turns out to have had one unfortunate consequence for the Democrats at whom it was aimed. It irked W. G. Campbell, chief of the Food and Drug Administration, into revealing the lengths to which Democratic House spokesmen for farm interests have gone in their efforts to throttle the bureau's activities in behalf of the farmers' customers. Their resistance to the bureau's efforts to obtain adequate funds for controlling poisonous spray residues on fruits and vegetables had extended, he said, to the deliberate suppression of evidence on the dangers of acute poisoning and death to consumers. Refusing to believe that there is any danger, members of the House Appropriations Subcommittee handling the agriculture-appropriation bill in which his bureau's budget is imbedded challenged Campbell both last year and again this year to prove his case. He had replied at length, he said, citing case reports by physicians in medical journals and by other competent, impartial authorities, only to find his testimony deleted from the record of the hearings, which were secret, and to hear his challengers go on asserting that no proof had been offered when it was requested.

He specifically blamed Representative Cannon of Missouri for the suppressions. Cannon, who in his own words represents "a great fruit-growing district," is acting chairman of the subcommittee, the members of which are all farm representatives. He denied the charge of censorship in the name of his committee as well as of himself. It was not an effective denial. Campbell had said that a large part of his testimony last year and two-thirds of his testimony this year before the committee in executive session was devoted to arguing the spray-residue issue. The printed transcripts of the hearings which Cannon's committee caused to be issued in customary fashion contain no testimony whatever by Campbell or any member of his bureau concerning spray residues. Campbell further said that forty pages of his testimony on this point were eliminated from the 1935 transcript after it had been sent to the printer and proofed. This year, he added, his testimony on spray residues was not even sent to the printer but was struck from the stenographic transcript.

Acting on the theory that the farmers who elect them must be allowed a few pennies' extra profit even at the risk to their consumer-customers of acute poisoning and such less readily traceable disorders as Raynaud's disease, nephritis, painter's palsy, cancer, arterio-sclerosis, cardiac hypertrophy, anemia, abortion, blindness, and insanity, Cannon's committee this year did more than suppress the most vital part of Campbell's testimony. It also denied his bureau the $525,000 budgetary increase recommended for it by the President. Coming on top of this, Dickinson's speech was too much for Campbell, Harvey Wiley's protege and chosen successor. Campbell proposed to Secretary Wallace that his bureau be taken out of the Department of Agriculture and put where its budget would not come within the purview of Congressional committees monopolized by farmers' agents.

Incidentally, there has opened within the last few days a new drive, seemingly White House-inspired, to get the long-pending Copeland food-and-drug bill through Congress at this session. A House committee has renewed work on the measure, passed by the Senate last year, and expects to report it to the floor for action in the next week or ten days. Chapman of Kentucky, who distinguished himself last year by subjecting the drug lobby to an investigation such as it had never before experienced, heads the committee revising the Copeland bill so as to strip it of all the emasculating amendments tacked on in the Senate by Bailey from the Vicks Vaporub country, Clark from the Listerine country, and Vandenberg from the Parke, Davis domain. For those who imagine that the impediments in the path of the legislation are wholly the creation of predatory commercial interests outside the government, let it be added that some of the fight comes from Federal Trade Commission bureaucrats desperately anxious to keep all advertising regulation in the hands of the commission. That is where the profit boys also would prefer to have it, since the commission is concerned chiefly with seeing that they play fair with one another and is not so concerned as Campbell's bureau with seeing that they play fair with the public. The latest move of the drug lobby on its own hook has been the beginning of an undercover campaign for a Congressional "investigation" of the Food and Drug Administration, aimed at forcing the dismissal of Ruth deForest Lamb, its "chief educational officer," for offending the ghouls and con men of the patent-medicine, cosmetics, and adulterated-foods rackets by telling the truth about them and their silk-stocking lawyers in her recent book "American Chamber of Horrors." The volume sets a new high in public service of its kind, and the fact that Miss Lamb was permitted to speak her piece freely and remain a federal employee must stand to the everlasting credit of Campbell, Tugwell, Wallace, and Roosevelt, who in the order named are her superiors.

Mexico's Bloodless Revolution

BY GEORGE STERN

Mexico City, April 30

THE current political drama in Mexico reached its third-act curtain when Plutarco Elías Calles and his closest henchmen were recently exiled from the country without warning. So far the government has not attempted to justify its action on other grounds than that Calles's presence within the national territory constituted a menace to "public health." A semi-official attempt has been made to link the Calles group to the criminal dynamiting of the Vera Cruz train on April 6, in which several persons lost their lives and many more were badly injured. There has been a rash of terrorism in Mexico of late. Bombs have exploded at labor meetings, the home of Vicente Lombardo Toledano was attacked and bombed several weeks ago, and other sporadic outrages have occurred. Taken in conjunction with the depredations of religious fanatics in various parts of the country and the playful pranks of the fascist Gold Shirts, these seemingly unconnected happenings appear to the government to be all a by-product of the Calles group's plotting against the present regime.

Naturally, there is no direct proof that Calles was personally implicated in blowing up the Vera Cruz train. Had any such existed, the government could scarcely have contented itself with a mere deportation order. But there is abundant justification for its claim that Calles was the natural rallying-point of all existing disaffection with the regime and that his presence in Mexico, along with that of his lieutenants, was bound to cause continual violence. From this point of view his exile is more than merited, even though the measure itself may be of dubious legality.

The present intermission provides a good opportunity for reviewing the political and social conflict which has supplied the motivation of the play thus far. It has now been going on for more than two years and in order properly to understand the scenes still to come, one should keep past events clearly in mind.

Prologue: Late in 1933 Calles's stall-fed National Revolutionary Party nominated General Lázaro Cárdenas for the Presidency, somewhat against the dictator's own better judgment but in response to the growing demand within the party ranks for a "left" candidate to still the ominous rumblings of popular discontent. Cárdenas made a truly heroic campaign tour, penetrating into the most remote regions of the country, making friends with simple Indians and peasants, carrying everywhere the time-worn slogans of the revolution—though the election was a foregone conclusion whether he made speeches or not.

Act One: After the inauguration it gradually began to appear that the new President would not be content to remain a Calles puppet. For a brief period the political sophisticates continued to be amused by this provincial hick who seemed to have swallowed whole the revolutionary guff which the official party had been mechanically grinding out for years, but their smiles soon froze as they realized that Cárdenas's ardent oratory was finding dangerous response. Calles's position was being undermined. Congress divided itself into Callistas and left-wingers. By the time Calles awoke to the fact that his President was getting out of hand, it was already too late. In June, 1935, he called for a showdown, only to find that Cárdenas held all the aces. He announced his retirement from politics and left the country for a "vacation." Curtain.

Act Two: The six months of Act Two were mainly a period of suspense and rallying of forces for the decisive battle to come. While the administration moved energetically to consolidate its preliminary victory, the country began slowly to recover its breath after the unlooked-for defeat of the supposedly invulnerable dictator. The labor united front formed in the June crisis was solidly behind the President; so were the agrarians, with whom the government was working out a large-scale organization of the rural masses. Big capital, the church, and the middle classes began to look on Cárdenas as their common enemy, linking themselves with the Callista faction, which still held strong positions in the provinces. What had begun as a political quarrel between two groups of the official family was turned by the action of underlying social forces into a clear-cut class conflict. It was during this period that the red scare began to be raised in the hope that the application of the red brush and the cry of "Moscow gold" would bring diplomatic representations from the United States to halt the madman in the National Palace. However, the forces of reaction were still bewildered by the suddenness of their defeat, and the acts of sabotage, slander, and misrepresentation were as yet uncoordinated.

In this atmosphere of expectancy and mounting tension the preliminary climax arrived on November 20, when workers and fascist Gold Shirts fought a pitched battle in the streets. But the real climax occurred on December 13 when Calles suddenly descended from an airplane in Mexico City, accompanied by Luis N. Morones. The moment was well chosen. The reaction had closed its ranks. The very people who only yesterday had shuddered at Calles's name were now ready to hail him as a savior. The patriots and their hired scribblers who were saving the country from bolshevism had done a fair job; Mexico was being reported, particularly in the United States, as hovering on the brink of anarchy and chaos. These were the forces ready to support Calles, and Morones, still leader of the C.R.O.M., could be expected to bring along a sector of the workers and thus give the semblance of popular sanction to the coup that unquestionably was being planned. As for the army, had not

General Obregón himself (and who should know better?) once said that no Mexican general could withstand a cañonazo of fifty thousand pesos?

But Calles had been sadly misinformed by his friends as to the true mood and temper of the people. His arrival was met by a nation-wide storm of protest that strengthened Cárdenas's hand for the admirably energetic measures he immediately took to circumvent any possibility of a coup d'état. Suspected Callista generals, senators, congressmen, and governors were removed. A temporary censorship prevented Calles from making statements in the press. A week of feverish excitement wound up with a demonstration in which fifty thousand workers marched to the National Palace to demand prison or expulsion for the ex-Maximus of the revolution. The attempted comeback had been an inglorious failure. Curtain to Act Two.

Act Three: If Calles's personal political fortunes had thus again struck a snag, the social forces he represented were by no means content to accept the new defeat lying down. The anti-government campaign was redoubled. Act Three is divided into three scenes, the first of which, a burlesque interlude, was staged in Monterrey, capital of the state of Nuevo León, the Mexican Pittsburgh, center of heavy industry. Here are smelters, foundries, and steel mills, breweries, glass factories, food-preserving plants, and other lesser industries. Monterrey's bourgeoisie is better organized than any other in the republic; its Junta Patronal, an employers' association, is a close-knit body which presents a smooth, unbroken front to the assaults of labor. Moreover, Monterrey is the headquarters of the Calles business clique, of Aarón Sáenz, former governor of the state and one of the reputed fathers of the Gold Shirts; and until recently Nuevo León's political boss was Calles's son, Plutarco junior. Labor troubles had been unknown since 1922; the thousands of factory workers were safely herded into company unions. Wages averaged two pesos (55 cents) a day in a city whose proximity to the American border makes its living costs considerably higher than those of most other parts of the country, including the capital itself. Employers had forgotten what a strike was like.

In January the workers of a glass factory walked out demanding a collective contract, as was legally guaranteed them by the constitution and the labor laws. Mexico thought it had seen red scares before, but the performance worked up over this simple event far outshone previous efforts. The strike was denounced as open revolution; its leaders were accused of operating with Moscow gold; and a campaign of vilification, paid for and directed, it was said, by Aarón Sáenz, filled the Mexico City press. Then came the culminating blow. The bourgeoisie came out into the streets in a mass demonstration! It sounds incredible, but it happened. By joint agreement all the Monterrey factories and business establishments closed their doors in a political lock-out. Headed by the Junta Patronal, the good burghers solemnly marched with placards and banners to the State Capitol, in a procession made up of capitalists, bankers, industrialists, shopkeepers, Catholic dames, religious societies, and the cowed workers of the company unions, to demand justice of the Governor —also accused of communism—against the several hundred striking workers. Just as gravely the Mexico City papers reported that all social classes in Monterrey, including the workers, had patriotically rejected the latest Communist threat to Mexican sovereignty.

This was the first capitalist strike in Mexican history. The novelty of the maneuver created something of a sensation, and the situation became serious enough to cause the President to investigate for himself. After two days of listening to testimony from both sides, he told the nervous gentlemen of the Junta Patronal that the strike was legal according to the requirements of the labor code; that a simple strike for legal rights was not communism and certainly not revolution; that strikes were an inevitable part of the existing economic and social system; that if the Monterrey employers were too exhausted by the industrial struggle to deal with a strike they could always demonstrate their patriotism by turning their factories over to the government and retiring from the fray; and that the lock-out was neither patriotic nor very intelligent. After this cold shower the embattled patriots called off the war and reopened their factories.

As a matter of fact, business has suffered far less than its anguished wails would lead one to suppose. The most recent statistics of the Department of Economics indicate that agricultural, mining, industrial, commercial, and foreign-trade activities have been steadily on the upgrade since 1930; in 1935 Mexican business enjoyed its best year since the crash. If some wages have risen as a result of strikes, prices have risen still higher and real wages have probably fallen. In spite of temporary losses due to strikes, profits are being satisfactorily maintained. It is only the inordinate greed of men accustomed to swollen profits which prompts the effort to make the present industrial unrest look like revolution.

Act Three, Scene Two: On the heels of the Monterrey farce came the congress for unification of the working class into a single national organization. Out of the congress grew the Confederación de Trabajadores de México, a central body to which the electric-power and railroad unions, the metal workers, the powerful C. G. O. C., (Confederación General de Obreros y Campesinos de México) and a great number of smaller independent unions adhered. It was the June united front, strengthened by many later accretions and forged into a solid body in which the overwhelming majority of Mexican labor was at last united under militant leadership. Vicente Lombardo Toledano was elected general secretary of the C. T. M., which numbers 350,000 industrial workers and more than 100,000 peasants. The oldest labor organization in Mexico, the Confederación General de Trabajadores, and Morones's old C. R. O. M., now greatly reduced in strength, remained outside the unified federation.

Act Three, Scene Three: Under Morones's guidance these two groups, together with other scattered unions, now began a slander campaign of their own directed against the C. T. M. They held meetings at which the familiar charges of "Moscow gold" were again aired and at one of which, it is sad to report, Diego Rivera spoke to denounce the Soviet Union, Stalin, and his Mexican emissaries. The Gold Shirts, who had lent strong-arm service to the Monterrey employers during the strike, now entered into an understanding with the Morones unions for joint anti-Communist action.

It was at this stage that terrorism began to grow. For months the rural Catholics had been amusing themselves by such activities as cutting off the ears of village teachers in protest against the government's "socialist" education. Bands of rebels and bandits grew more active. Bombs began to explode in Mexico and other cities. Two Americans were kidnaped. Each day brought news of fresh casualties in the class war. Rumors spread of C. R. O. M. conspiracies, of coming uprisings. Public nervousness was growing. The motive behind all these acts, obviously, was to discredit the government abroad, to give the impression that Mexico was on the road to perdition under Cárdenas's bolshevist rule. Finally came the callous dynamiting of the Vera Cruz train, and the government's answer in the deportation of Calles and the others. And with this the third-act curtain has come down.

What will be the results? Calles will probably win a good deal of sympathy in the United States. He will have more freedom of action than he enjoyed in Mexico; his attacks on the Cárdenas government will be given publicity and credence in interested quarters. In this sense the government's move may be considered something of a mistake. But the Mexican authorities have good reason to believe that the activities of the Calles group were creating an atmosphere in which, given the traditional nature of Mexican political struggles, violent outrages were inevitable. The removal of Calles thus became a measure of imperative necessity. Calles himself is nothing—a discredited political gangster without popular following. Indeed, it is a tribute to the extraordinary hold he once had over the country that he is still able to attract any adherents at all. His present strength is derived solely from the organized reaction whose tool he is. The revolution, as a social movement, has grown out of its bourgeois adolescence and is approaching its new, working-class phase. The basic objective achievement of the Cárdenas administration so far has been to restore the conditions under which the people may again register their will in national affairs.

But the true crisis of the Cárdenas adventure in government has not yet arrived. It is still a nice question how far Cárdenas has led and how far he has been pushed along the road he has followed. The crucial test of his regime will come when his policies directly clash with American interests. The whole course of Mexican history, particularly recent revolutionary history, indicates that radical Presidents have a tendency to go soft when the full heat of foreign pressure is turned on: Calles himself is the best illustration of that general rule. On the other hand, the Mexican workers are learning fast, and the deceptions and betrayals practiced upon them in the past become progressively more difficult as they gain in political wisdom and experience. Ultimately it lies with them and with the public opinion they can mobilize in their support abroad to stiffen the backbone of the government and defend the notable advances they have made in the past year.

Courtesy of the Delphic Studios

Leaders

Drawing by J. C. Orozco

New Jersey's Army of Unoccupation

BY SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE

YOU would never have known from the unperturbed quiet of the Trenton streets that in the very heart of the town and the administrative center of the state the unemployed, under the able leadership of the Workers' Alliance, were making front-page news with their burlesque of a state Assembly which had gone home after a three months' session without acting on the problem of relief. You wouldn't even have suspected it if you had passed right by the state Capitol, or even if you had gone in unless you had inquired the way to the Assembly Chamber.

But in the chamber things were happening. The "insurgent" assembly was surrounded by a crowd of spectators, and newspaper photographers were everywhere. Ray Cooke, national secretary-treasurer of the alliance, was just announcing an agreement with the Speaker of the regular Assembly whereby the insurgents would temporarily adjourn to the gallery in order that the chamber might be put in order for its regular occupants. The insurgents adopted a resolution to that effect and filed out. The spectators followed. Fortunately there was plenty of room in that side of the gallery which was thrown open. We followed the crowd and found places in the midst of the "army of unoccupation." And there we sat and waited, our numbers steadily augmented by the delegations of employed and unemployed arriving from out of town to back up the group which had held the chamber for six days and nights.

There was ample time—four hours of it—before the regular Assembly convened to gauge the quality and temper of this group of insurgents. Their appearance was impressive. Nothing dull or stolid about this crowd. Their faces were keen, sensitive, worried. They were fine American faces. I knew these people; they had been my friends and neighbors in my childhood out West. One gathered from their own statements that they represented the more intelligent among the victims of depression. They were the delegates of the various groups of the Workers' Alliance, and the leaders of their groups. They admitted frankly that they had to cope with inertia among the rank and file. "A lot of people down our way," said a man from Riverdale, "don't do anything until they get into trouble. Then they join the alliance. We bring their cases before the board and get them on the relief rolls again, and then they stop coming to meetings and forget to pay their dues." A Trenton house-painter had a different view. It was true, he said, that one could count on about two members in every hundred who were willing to lead. "But I'd rather sit here day and night myself than get our rank and file excited. They'd be for direct action, and the time for direct action is past," he announced in a tone of unwarranted optimism.

Certainly there seemed to be no thought of direct action in the minds of this crowd. They were in no ugly mood. On the contrary, they were pleased with their demonstration, and in spite of their fatigue even those who had kept the daily and nightly vigil were good-humored, chaffing one another in a spirit of comradeship born of a common need and a common effort.

"We'll be down there in the insurrectionary camp again tonight," said a cheerful elderly man who had been there since the insurgents moved in.

"Yeah, they got nice soft beds down there," remarked a gay bleached-blond housewife with ten-cent-store diamonds on her fingers and a red celluloid bracelet.

"The Legislature ain't gonna do anything tonight," remarked another delegate.

"What are you kickin' about?" asked the blonde. "Ain't we supposed to be gettin' four-fifty a day? Didn't Bogle say so? Wonder if we'll get overtime? That'll mean a lot of money for me—six days and six nights overtime."

Our gallery was crowded to suffocation. I remarked that the other gallery should be opened.

"They don't open that," said the blonde. "That's for the members' friends. The women came in in evening dress at the last session. One of 'em was wearing a long white evening dress trailing behind her right along the floor. Wonder how it must feel to be pretty and well fed."

One heard serious discussion, too; comparing of notes by people from different communities, speculation on their chances with the Legislature, weighing of policy. They were friendly, and ready to answer questions about their condition. The man from Riverdale had been a silk cutter employed on piece rates by the same factory for fourteen years, earning never less than $35 and often $50 a week. The factory had failed in 1931, and since then he had knocked around on temporary jobs, CWA work, PWA work, anything he could get. He was on state relief when that was discontinued on April 5. Since then he had had a $12-order from his community with the announcement that it was the first, last, and only help he need expect. His father and mother had been getting $2 a week from the state. A housewife had been drawing $19.54 each fortnight for her family of eight. Since April 5 her family had had no relief. The cheerful elderly man in front of me had been drawing $2 for himself and wife. Did he pay his rent out of that? "No. I owe so much rent I practically own the house by this time." A Negro cook sitting beside me had had no job in his own line since 1931; only odd jobs and relief. An agricultural worker from Bridgeton lived out of town just far enough to be denied state relief. He had been referred to the overseer of the poor and told there were no funds, so he was forced to support his wife and three children by panhandling—the state of New Jersey grants the unemployed permits to beg.

The delegates of the Agricultural Workers' Union of South Jersey had much to tell about conditions in the farming section; and what they told was not pretty. Wages range from 7½ to 35 cents an hour when there is work to be had, the average being around 20 cents. The local overseers of the poor are local landowners, and the landowners like having relief turned back to the communities. For the relief offices are used as hiring halls, and workers who refuse starvation wages are cut off the relief rolls. One of these local overseers is C. F. Seabrook, owner of the big farm where the workers struck two years ago against starvation wages and intolerable conditions. The owners are fighting the WPA wage of $48.50 a month because, low as it is, it is still higher than the going wage for farm workers in that section.

The session began with a prayer by a local pastor, who thanked God that the Legislature of New Jersey had never failed in its duty to the people of New Jersey, and expressed faith that He would not let them fail this time. After which the Legislature proceeded to demand that the Governor defend its dignity by clearing out the insurgent assembly, tabled a resolution calling for an investigation of the Workers' Alliance, listened to two representatives of the Protestant churches who pleaded for immediate action on relief, and refused to listen to Ray Cooke after he had called Assemblyman Thomas a liar for saying that the insurgents were Communist agitators. It then passed a bill to help certain business interests of New Jersey by authorizing the establishment of a free port, and slapped the workers of New Jersey in the face by adjourning. The only reference to the problem of relief was a remark by one of the members that the state of New Jersey owed nobody a living.

It was a dramatic scene, and one not pleasant to witness. Here were some hundreds of American citizens, weary, tense, hopeful, representing many thousands who like themselves had been waiting for months while their duly constituted representatives did nothing about their difficulties. And their duly constituted representatives could find nothing better to do than insult them. What made the thing more significant was the conviction forced home by a comparison of the two assemblies that the only class line in America is the income line. The members of the regular Assembly differed from those of the insurgent assembly in being better clothed and fed and less worried. They were the more prosperous and successful members of their communities; but with that difference removed the two bodies might have changed places without one's marking the difference. And the very fact emphasized the importance of the income line. It reduced all class differences to their fundamental basis—the distinction between those who have and those who have not.

The unemployed are being forced to realize this distinction, and such object lessons as the behavior of the New Jersey Assembly are helping to teach them. Indeed, after that session some of the leaders of the Workers' Alliance became a bit over-zealous in drawing the moral of need for political action by the workers. They tried to adjourn the insurgent assembly and send the members home to organize a Farmer-Labor Party for the purpose of defeating the Assemblymen at the polls. To the dogged delegates who had been carrying on in behalf of an immediate and pressing issue, this seemed rather like a promise of pie in the sky. "We didn't come here to organize a Farmer-Labor Party," one heard. "We came here to get relief—now." Fortunately wiser counsels prevailed; other leaders pointed out that the two objectives were not mutually exclusive; and the insurgents settled down again to their grim wait.

The Army Encamped

At the moment of writing the Assembly has met again and placed the supervision of state relief in the hands of a group of Republican politicians, headed by Governor Hoffman, but without providing funds. And they have locked out the insurgents. No one doubts that funds will be provided—after the primaries on May 19. Until then the unemployed will have to starve along as best they can, for the legislators are apparently more afraid of taxpayers than of jobless workers. And when action is taken, it will leave relief in the hands of the communities, aided by state funds. This is the program Assemblyman Bogle outlined to me, saying that relief should be in the hands of the communities because there would be "less chiseling." He did not mention that there would also be less relief—that community relief is from one-half to three-quarters of the bare subsistence formerly provided by the state. But he gave point to a remark I overheard later, during a belated dinner, from a prosperous-looking elderly gentleman who was saying to an Assemblyman in his party: "You fellows are acting like a lot of ostriches. Don't deny that the Republican program is to throw relief back on to the communities in order to force down wages."

There is no question that relief in New Jersey is a tool of party politics, as it will continue to be in every state unless it is placed on an insurance basis and removed from the category of vote-catching devices. Nor is there any question that the unemployed are getting a good deal of political education out of the sorry mess. But it is ignorant and foolish for radicals or reactionaries to assume that they are either political theorists or political agitators. They think of themselves simply as good Americans in hard luck, and they want something done about it. Like a good many generations of Americans before them they resent the inexorable working of the profit system, but they are as ignorant as their forbears about what the profit system really is. They resent being called Communists, too, but they are as confused about the meaning of the term as are the politicians who hurl it at them as an epithet of opprobrium. To be sure the Communists among their leaders, being the most articulate among them, wield an influence which the rank and file don't even suspect. It is a dangerous influence, but not for the reasons that the reactionaries would give. The attempt to adjourn the insurgent assembly proved the folly of the one tactic to which the Communist Party consistently adheres—that of sacrificing immediate issues to the current party slogan. The party's past record makes it seem probable that the present "Farmer-Labor Party" slogan may be abandoned as suddenly as it was adopted, leaving the workers more confused than before.

Political Notes from the Northwest

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Boise, Idaho, April 30

A SWING around the Oregon-Washington-Idaho circuit demonstrates the fact that Landon, Knox, Vandenberg, and Dickinson are just so many names to the predominantly rural population of the region. Unless Senator Borah is the Republican nominee, the Far Northwest will again support President Roosevelt.

Heading westward, our train was delayed six or seven hours by an avalanche in the Columbia River canyon. Discussion in the dining-car and pullmans at once turned to politics. The traveling salesmen, lawyers, and business men comprising the bulk of the travelers declared that Roosevelt was slipping and that the Republicans could beat him with anyone except "that damned inflationist Borah." But more people ride in day coaches than sleep in pullmans or eat in dining-cars, and up ahead it was a different story. Most of the occupants of the coaches said that the only Republican they would vote for was Senator Borah. A number of travelers nodded approvingly when a young farmer in a denim shirt said, "I'm for anyone Hoover's against."

Curiously enough, in the year in which he makes his first actual appearance on the Presidential firing-line, Borah faces his most difficult fight for reelection as United States Senator from Idaho. C. Ben Ross, the only man ever to be Governor of Idaho for more than two terms, is a formidable threat of which Borah himself is sharply aware. As the G. O. P. Presidential nominee, Borah would sweep through the Northwest like a conquering army, carrying Idaho by a landslide vote. But local pride will not help him in the Senatorial contest. In fact, it may be the other way around. Ross is expected to make political capital of the fact that he is a native-born product, whereas Borah migrated westward from Illinois and Kansas.

Ben Ross is a shrewd and canny politician. He has been eyeing Borah's post for nearly ten years. He was once a cowboy on the Oregon range and knows the language of the farmers who control Idaho's vote. His first term as governor was in 1930. He was reelected in 1932 and again in 1934. In capturing a second term he carried every county in the state and received more votes than were ever before cast for a candidate in Idaho. Ross's public utterances drip with protestations of his solicitude for the common people, although the principal act of his three administrations has been the passage of a sales tax. Through the judicious use of relief, welfare, and liquor patronage, he has built up an efficient political machine.

Ross is the first public figure of considerable political skill to apply even a modified Long-Bilbo-Talmadge technique to the Pacific seaboard. He resorts to Scriptural quotations and frequently hints that a mysterious destiny is guiding his political career. But whereas the Southern shouters have made love of the Constitution their stock in trade, Ross has intimated that Supreme Court interpretation of the sacred document is incompatible with present needs. He fortified his battle lines by sharply criticizing the majority ruling in the AAA case. The crop-reduction hand-outs were not unwelcome among Idaho's harassed ranchers and fruit growers, a fact known to Borah as well as Ross. The delight with which the Senator greeted the decision nullifying the NRA was noticeably absent when the AAA was sent down the river.

The worst obstacle to Borah's sixth successive Senatorial term is the manner in which he has handled the Townsend question. Had Borah declared himself against the Townsend Plan originally, as did Senator Norris of Nebraska, he would not now find himself in an embarrassing political predicament. The Idaho Townsendites are not aroused because Borah is opposed to their plan per se. They are furious because they had been boasting to the world at large that he was in favor of it—even going so far as to distribute stickers on the streets of Boise last fall proclaiming, "Get the Townsend Plan with Borah." It is a matter of record that Senator Borah never indorsed Dr. Townsend's fantasy. But the hysteria of the pension enthusiasts permits no splitting of hairs. When a year ago Borah declared that he favored the principle underlying the Townsend Plan, the Idaho Townsendites concluded he had accepted the scheme lock, stock, and barrel.

There is no doubt that the disclosures of the Bell committee investigating the Townsend movement have been a lifebuoy to Borah. Idaho is a strong Townsend state, the pension adherents holding the balance of power between Borah and the Governor. As the wrappings have gradually been peeled from "Cofounder" Clements and the other Townsend leaders, Borah's position has been strengthened. In most of his recent public statements challenging the practicability of the plan, Borah has emphasized his opposition to its sales-tax feature. For several months he and his supporters have been jockeying to get the sales tax into the political arena as the paramount issue of the campaign.

The sales tax is Governor Ross's vulnerable point. His vigorous advocacy of such a levy—despite his claim that the revenue was desperately needed for relief and old-age pensions—gave rise to the report that he was "in with the 'railroad.'" What the Anaconda copper interests are to Montana, the Oregon Short Line of the Union Pacific is to Idaho. In Montana it is the "company"; in Idaho it is the "railroad." One of Ross's principal arguments for the sales tax is that it has drastically reduced the ad valorem levy. Grange and labor leaders contend that the Union Pacific is the state's heaviest ad valorem contributor, but that it pays no sales tax. Ross hopes to win Townsend support by using sales-tax funds to match old-age security appropriations from the federal government, but the fact that he has eased the Union Pacific's tax burden is the vulnerable point in a program which claims to be a bulwark for the common people of Idaho.

The Governor plans to charge that Borah has neglected the interests of his own constituents to dabble in international questions half a world removed from the great state of Idaho. Ross knows how to make capital of the Main Street delusion that United States Senators are sent to Washington to get new electric bulbs for the post office or a can of paint for the grade-crossing sign in Bear Creek and not to meddle in dangerous questions of national and foreign policy.

As a result of this threat one circumstance is certain: in all his Presidential campaign activities Borah keeps a weather-eye cocked toward Idaho. The stronger the bid he makes for the Republican nomination, the greater will be his chance of reelection to the Senate. Although the Ross forces fear the effective campaign in the state which Borah is capable of making, they hope the senior Senator will not be removed from the Idaho wars to bear the G. O. P. banner. They realize that Borah as a Presidential candidate would sweep Idaho and carry into office his friend Ray McKaig, who already has entered his name for the Republican Senatorial nomination. McKaig is a former Non-Partisan League chairman and Progressive Party leader. A thoroughgoing liberal, he was a delegate last year to the third-party conference of the American Commonwealth Political Federation.

McKaig is a close friend of Borah's, and two explanations are offered for his candidacy. One is that Borah has crossed the Rubicon and intends to default his Senate seat. The other is that McKaig is merely keeping the place warm for Borah while he makes a bid for the White House. The only other entrant to date in the Republican Senatorial primaries is State Senator Ralph Whitten, who is said to be running with the blessing of Borah's arch-enemy, Herbert Hoover. Whitten probably will conduct a sort of Fabian warfare against Borah. McKaig's candidacy would tend to speed Whitten's maneuvers. Then if Borah failed to get the Presidential nomination, McKaig could retire from the primary race, throwing his support to Borah. (The Idaho primaries are on August 11, more than a month after the Republican national convention.)

One of the minor political tragedies of this region is that James Pinckney Pope, the junior Senator from Idaho, will probably be defeated for reelection in 1938 because of a few careless remarks he dropped in Europe last summer. On the whole Pope has been a far more capable official than anyone expected. He has followed Senator Norris's lead in urging curtailment of the veto powers of the Supreme Court. He has insisted that the giant Grand Coulee and Bonneville dams be placed under a Columbia Valley Authority similar to the TVA in the South. He supported the Frazier amendment to abolish compulsory military drill in the colleges. He was one of nine Senators —Borah was another—to vote against confirmation of the appointment of Lamar Hardy as a federal attorney. Several weeks ago he issued a scathing denunciation of Hearst and backed the demands of the Newspaper Guild members who were picketing Hearst's Wisconsin News.

However, Senator Pope is an ardent internationalist and World Court enthusiast, and in London last summer he made so many rash remarks that Senator La Follette rebuked him from the floor of Congress. When Borah came back to Boise last August and was questioned about his colleague, he replied, "If Senator Pope can avert war in Europe, he certainly deserves a great deal of credit." Borah's quip has aroused guffaws in every hamlet in the state. It is used against Pope on all conceivable occasions—even in Boise, where he was an efficient but colorless mayor. He has been humorously referred to as "Ambassador to Europe from Idaho."

This is exceedingly bad for a man in public life, and despite a courageous and enlightened voting record in the Senate, Pope probably faces oblivion in 1938. His closest friends are worried over his chances for reelection. He may not even get the nomination if a formidable Democrat opposes him in the primaries. Several of Governor Ross's advisers are known to be urging him to avoid the Borah buzz-saw this year, and to try for Pope's job in 1938.

Just as a side issue is weakening Senator Pope in Idaho, increasingly frequent social missteps will probably defeat Congressman Marion A. Zioncheck if he seeks reelection from the Seattle district this year. Until he embarked upon his escapades with the police of several states Zioncheck was considered a possible governor of Washington. Elected to Congress in 1932 with the backing of progressive groups, his voting record has been as liberal as Pope's. Reactionary Democrats in King and Kitsap counties, angered because he refuses to play ball with Jim Farley's patronage club, have issued unctuous statements condemning Marion's "disgraceful conduct." Of course, it is political apple-sauce of the thinnest sort for Democratic moguls to condemn him for over-indulgence in liquor, but their play to the church and dry vote may result in his defeat.

Hollywood Fights Back

BY HERBERT KLINE

IN his article No Soap Boxes in Hollywood in The Nation for March 4 Morrie Ryskind indicted the entire film colony on two major charges: first, "its colossal ignorance of current political happenings," and, second, "the shocking cowardice to be found in high places." According to Mr. Ryskind, Hollywood is hopeless, most film people are ignoramuses, and the few intelligent ones are too cowardly to stand by their private opinions. In a later article, in the May 6 issue, Mr. Ryskind gave Hollywood people credit for participating in a mass-meeting to raise funds to combat the reactionary Russell-Kramer bill, but he overlooked many happenings that took place both before and after his charges of "ignorance" and "cowardice" were preferred against Hollywood.

Three weeks before his first article appeared almost a thousand prominent members of the Hollywood community paid $10 a ticket to hear Lord Listowell deliver a lecture on Nazi Germany. The proceeds went to help suffering anti-fascists. The majority of the audience were disappointed with the unexpected mildness of the Englishman's criticism of the Nazis. Hollywood was far ahead of this particular soap-boxer in its feelings about current political happenings in Germany.

And for the past three years, despite Mr. Ryskind's charges, a struggle between the screen workers and the producers has been taking place that tops any other trade-union activity in the theatrical profession since the 1919 strike. Ernest Pascal, Ralph Block, O. H. P. Garrett, James Cagney, Edward G. Robinson, Dudley Nichols, Frances Faragoh, Sidney Howard, Kenneth Thompson, John Howard Lawson, and Fredric March, among others, took the lead in a successful movement to pull the majority of screen writers and actors out of the producer-controlled Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences. Today the screen workers have their own actors', writers', and directors' guilds to protect them against unscrupulous practices and to gain every possible fair concession for their members. Since the leaders of these guilds have been subjected to every kind of producer pressure, including of course the usual charges of radicalism, I trust Mr. Ryskind will be willing to add guild activities to his future listings of important Hollywood events.

Most New Yorkers think of Hollywood as the Land of Boy Meets Girl. But three weeks before "Bury the Dead" opened on Broadway twelve hundred members of the film colony crowded into the Hollywood Women's Club auditorium to hear Fredric March, Florence Eldridge, and John Cromwell give a public reading of Irwin Shaw's macabre anti-war play for the benefit of the local Contemporary Theater and the magazine New Theater. Basil Rathbone, James Cagney, Groucho Marx, Donald Ogden Stewart, and Lewis Milestone sponsored the performance, signifying their interest in seeing this blast against war staged in the heart of the community that specializes in grinding out such messages as "No Greater Glory" and "Professional Soldier."

According to Hollywood reports, there never was a more unusual or more stirring opening in this town of colossal world premières. Not only did Shaw's play about "the war that is to begin tomorrow night" receive an ovation from the nation's leading entertainment specialists, but many of them used the discussion period that followed to declare publicly their sentiments about war, fascism, working conditions in the industry, Scottsboro,

Hearst, and other current political issues that concern Hollywood's high-salaried screen workers.

In his introductory speech as chairman of the reading Donald Ogden Stewart said:

As I remember it we writers were very, very bitter, we were very, very disillusioned, and we were above all determined to tell the truth about life. That was twelve years ago. I don't know whether or not any of you have seen my two latest contributions to the screen. One was a vehicle for Marion Davies entitled "Going Hollywood" and the other was Miss Crawford's "No More Ladies." That isn't exactly what I meant twelve years ago. It isn't as funny as that . . . and I am not really blaming the movies for my downfall. Nobody came to me with a revolver and said, "You've got to take this big salary and have three automobiles and live in this goddam sunshine." It's my fault and I simply want to say a few words about my present situation and particularly why I am here tonight.

I am here simply and directly because the movies aren't good enough. And this Hollywood happiness isn't good enough in the face of the misery that there is in the world today. . . . You know what Hollywood's answer is to that. Entertainment . . . pictures are made for entertainment. That's a lot like seeing a man who is starving to death and saying, "Maybe if we make funny faces he won't notice it." We are making funny faces while people are starving to death . . . ten million men are out of work, but the movies say nothing about that. Five innocent colored boys are going to be sent to the electric chair in Alabama, but the movies are concerned only with whether Dick Powell gets his girl.

Now I say that isn't good enough. And I am here on behalf of the Contemporary Theater and the New Theater League because they offer something better than Hollywood. They don't want people to go into the theater to get away from life . . . but to have them realize that there is a way out of their troubles that they can take part in themselves. It is not charity they want—it is hope . . . and the New Theater can give them hope. I think that even with the small productions . . . that one flash of hope and truth against a plain white canvas wall is more important than all the entertainment that Hollywood and its million- and two-million-dollar productions can ever give.

Mr. Ryskind wrote, "You can't get talk in Hollywood, people are afraid," but Mr. Stewart and Arthur Kober got up after the reading had ended and spoke openly against Hearst's jingoism and against both the Russell-Kramer bill, "which makes meetings such as this a horrible thing," and the Tydings-McCormack bill, "which makes any talk against the military an offense"; while Dudley Nichols, speaking "as an ex-officer in the United States army," declared himself in favor of strong anti-war plays like "Bury the Dead." At the same session Lionel Stander, the young comedian, wasn't being funny when he spoke of "the significance of this play to those of us who are against war but who are puzzled as to just what we as individuals can do about it." And James Cagney, Onslow Stevens, Egon Brecher, John Cromwell, Dorothy Tree, J. M. Kerrigan, Clifford Odets, and others offered their services as actors and directors for the pending Hollywood production of "Bury the Dead."

It is certainly true that there are a great many people

Morrie Ryskind and Donald Ogden Stewart
Look at Hollywood

in Hollywood as there are in every American community who are indifferent to current political happenings. I fully sympathize with Mr. Ryskind when he declares, "The thing I cannot understand is the cringing and cowardice of people who have more than enough." But when he says, "They are not only cowardly but stupid in their fear of a fascism that doesn't exist," he simply isn't talking about the movie-company town controlled by the Warner Brothers, Hearst, Louis B. Mayer, and so on, or the reactionary state machinery that has turned loose its propaganda and political power against every manifestation of progressive thought or action from Upton Sinclair's Epic movement to the strike activities of the Imperial Valley agricultural workers and the Pacific Coast seamen and longshoremen. He isn't talking about the studio set-up that was powerful enough to force 99 per cent of the Hollywood screen employees to contribute to Governor Merriam's campaign chest regardless of their political opinions. He isn't talking about the Hollywood where the Hines "red squad" was used to terrorize film stars "communistic" enough to believe in the innocence of Tom Mooney. He isn't talking about the monopoly-controlled movie center which has produced reactionary "Riff-Raffs" and "Red Salutes" but never a single progressive picture such as "It Can't Happen Here" might have been. He isn't talking about the town where liberals like the leaders of the screen guilds are labeled dangerous radicals, and where anybody who treads on the toes of Louella Parsons or Marion Davies or Norma Shearer or Will Hays is liable to get it where the chicken got the ax.

Is there any hope that the brave but sporadic activity recorded in this article indicates a definite break with the popular conception of Hollywood as an intellectual Sahara? I think there is. One hope. The screen guilds. They have the power to stand up for the right of their individual members to free speech and free assemblage whether William Randolph Hearst, Governor Merriam, and Louis B. Mayer like it or not. Personally, I think Mr. Mayer, Mr. Thalberg, Mr. Warner, and others should consider the plight of the former heads of the German film industry before giving further support to the type of fascism that greets every progressive thought or action in the great state of California.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

HAROLD LASKI in his article in our issue of last week set forth the facts of the division in the British Cabinet and Stanley Baldwin's own personal loss of prestige. That is grave enough, but it is more serious that as a consequence of the indecisive policies which have been followed since Mr. Baldwin became Prime Minister British prestige on the Continent stands lower today than at any time in the memory of the present generation. This is the deliberate opinion of one of the most competent of European observers, now in this country. And his opinion is shared by many. The result is a loss of hope in Southwestern Europe, in Austria and Czecho-Slovakia, which cannot be overestimated. People there who have been working for a sane and rational settlement of European problems feel that their last anchor has gone. They have thought of France as torn by party dissensions, of the League as being too weak to help very much, but they have looked to Great Britain as to a Rock of Gibraltar. Today they are dazed by the sight of an England making incredible diplomatic blunders like the signing of the naval treaty with Germany and the Hoare-Laval agreement, and by its inability to stop the Italian conquest of Ethiopia, and they are prepared for any outcome. English diplomacy has, of course, blundered before—often enough; but the government has usually had a consistent policy and has presented a united front to the outside world.

Now what do we see? A Cabinet that cannot conceal its division, vacillating, hesitating, compromising, with the result that Hitler may well believe that he can do whatever he pleases; a Foreign Minister known to be out of sympathy with the orders given him. However, responsibility for the collapse of British foreign policy rests primarily with Mr. Baldwin himself. In his speech of April 18 he practically said that the issue of war and peace in Europe rested in Hitler's hands, and he prayed that this dictator might have the will to preserve peace, since he had it in his power to "do more at this moment to lift the black shadow of fear from Europe than any other man living." He also expressed alarm at the use of poison gas by Italy in Ethiopia, not because of Ethiopia's sufferings, but for fear that dictators would turn their poison gas into the cities of England and Europe. What could strengthen Hitler's hands more? To have the Prime Minister of Great Britain admitting fear and asserting that Hitler today is the arbiter of peace or war in Europe is to raise the prestige of Hitler among his own people still farther, for he can now quote these words and say: "Three years ago I was nothing and Germany was enslaved. Today the Prime Minister of England declares that the fate of Europe is in my hands."

I am well aware that the will of the English people today is not for war but for peace. I am not, of course, advocating war, nor do I believe that it is necessary for Mr. Baldwin to rattle the sword in its scabbard. But it is clear that the policy of weakness and indecision which Great Britain is following is far more likely to provoke hostilities and to encourage Göring and Hitler to attempt to impose their will on all Europe by force than would the sharp and vigorous moral opposition of a united British Cabinet. If Ethiopia is given to Italy, Mr. Baldwin must not expect Mussolini to be content with that empty conquest or to be daunted by the presence of British ships in the Mediterranean. Nor need Mr. Baldwin feel that a collapse of the League boycott of Italy will weaken Hitler's desire to include the German-speaking peoples in the Italian Tyrol, in Austria, and in Czecho-Slovakia within the Reich. The one hope of heading this off has been determined British leadership.

Undoubtedly the defenders of Mr. Baldwin will wish to put the blame upon the vacillations and insincerities of the French government and its apparent determination to hold on to Italy's friendship at any cost, and it cannot be denied that the weakness of French policy is largely responsible for the collapse of collective security. But the fact remains that after Hitler's coup in the Rhineland an alert and determined British government could and should have adopted a much firmer attitude toward the Third Reich. It was not the time to butter parsnips with soft words, but to say to Hitler that the British government was ready for its part to negotiate for the changing of the former Rhineland status, to warn him that if the troops were not withdrawn during the negotiations an economic boycott on the part of Great Britain would be immediately imposed. The cutting off of trade with Germany would undoubtedly offend a large section of the Conservative Party, but it is the task of leadership in a situation like that to convince its entire following that the policy pursued is a better one than drifting into another world war. As a result of the present policy Europe and the League are confused as never before; the democratic forces of Europe are drifting toward chaos; the prestige and power of Hitler are rising by leaps and bounds. Hitler doubtless feels already licensed to do as he wishes, to strike at Czecho-Slovakia or Austria next in the confident belief that the British government will continue to pay him compliments, to vacillate, and to express its profound regret that things are as they are. And at the same time that Germany's little man is growing more powerful, and all Europe is in imminent danger of world conflict, Great Britain and its statesmen will continue to lose prestige in every country on the Continent.

BROUN'S PAGE

IN DISCUSSING Toscanini's farewell the Herald Tribune said on its editorial page: "Not even the shameless conduct of the news photographer who exploded the flashlight in Mr. Toscanini's face dimmed the spontaneity of the ovation accorded to him. The audience sensed—without definite knowledge—that Mr. Toscanini's sensitive eyes could not stand such a sudden strain. It did not know that the photographer broke an agreement made with other news photographers not to take flashlights of Mr. Toscanini on the stand. Had it also realized that this man represented the same organization that behaved so shockingly in the matter of the Lindbergh baby, the violence of its indignation against the photographer would have been even greater."

Obviously the Herald Tribune is against violence. It will not run the risk of provoking it even after the audience has left Carnegie Hall to go home. It suffices to say, "the same organization that behaved so shockingly in the matter of the Lindbergh baby." Possibly the Herald Tribune believes that its readers, like the listeners at the concert, can "sense without definite knowledge." But just to cinch it, Mr. Herald Tribune Editor, don't you think it might have been a good idea to add so short and simple a sentence as, "The name is Hearst"?

Moreover, the Herald Tribune is attempting to reap where it has not sown. The writer of the editorial makes the assumption that the public is familiar with the fact that Hearst photographers forced Mrs. Lindbergh's car to the side of the road in order to take a picture of the baby Jon. But as a matter of fact, the Herald Tribune never printed a line concerning that occurrence. It came to public attention only because J. David Stern broke the story in his New York Post. The facts of the matter were familiar to newspapermen and editors, but out of courtesy to Mr. Hearst all except Stern passed it up. "The same organization," says the Herald Tribune, smugly missing a couple of birds with one stone.

It all seems very strange to me because I worked on the old Tribune in the days before its marriage to the Herald. In those days at the beginning of the World War the Tribune ran a series called "Coiled in the Flag." It was aimed at pro-Germans. I might add that the Tribune's definition of a pro-German was about as catholic as Mr. Hearst's conception of a Communist. For the sake of the record I might add that in my mind Hearst's opposition to our entry into the war constitutes the only service he has rendered to this country. It is a pity that he didn't have the courage to stick to his convictions. By the time Debs went to jail William Randolph Hearst was at least 175 per cent patriotic.

Still, I bring the matter up less to castigate Hearst than to indulge in reminiscences about the days when the Tribune had not become too polite to point. When it meant Hearst it said Hearst, and in fact threw in the picture of a serpent for good measure. And now there is amity. Howard Davis, vice-president of the Herald Tribune, led the forces of the publishers when Hearst was under attack by the Labor Board in the Jennings case. There was a united front among all publishers when a trade-union issue was at stake. Mr. Davis has ceded his place as president of the publishers' association to a man named Barnum from Syracuse, but the Herald Tribune has been valiant in Mr. Hearst's fight against the investigations of the Black committee. As you have probably read, Mr. Hearst is defending the right of every American citizen to privacy. I wonder whether he ventures a smile at such times as he reads the columns of his extremely gifted employee, Mr. Walter Winchell.

Obviously the Herald Tribune is doing its bit to help Hearst's right of privacy when it refers to "the same organization." It would be illogical, I suppose, to hail a man as the whited plumed fighter for the Freedom of the Press and at the same time stress the fact that nothing is sacred to a Hearst camera man. The individual camera man is not at fault. He is as decent a person as all his fellow newspaper workers, but he is under the orders of an organization which says in effect, "Damn the proprieties and get the picture."

The time has come when the leaders of American thought can no longer dodge the issue of naming Hearst. Even the publishers' union should not distort the integrity of the news by making Hearst a sacred cow. It seems to me that it is incumbent upon President Roosevelt to say what he thinks of Hearst. The country also has a right to hear from Landon on this issue. And in no uncertain terms. "Name him! Name him!" should be a concerted slogan.

Once upon a time a stranger came to a cave in which there was housed a sinister idol. An old man of the village stopped the stranger and gave him counsel. "You may look at the idol with impunity," he said. "You may even regard him with manifest disapproval. Nor is it forbidden to say 'You are an ugly idol,' or 'I do not like your size or color.' Some have even thumbed their nose at Kla and gone unharmed. But one thing is certain. Whoever dares to point a finger at the god and call him Kla by name, upon him will fall death and destruction."

"Has this truly occurred?" asked the stranger.

"That I do not know," replied the old man, "but it is an ancient legend."

Forthwith the stranger strode to the far end of the cave where the huge idol sat and said, "I do not like you." Nothing happened. The stranger thrust out a stubby forefinger and pointed directly at the figure. "I do not like you," he continued with rising voice, "and what's more I call you by your name Kla! Kla!" All but the stranger fled the cave. The idol trembled and fell. The stranger reached down to the floor and picked up a handful of dust. It was all that remained of Kla.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

TACTICS AND THE CLERK

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

DURING the last few months I have heard the word "tactics" more often than I had heard it in twenty years before. Until recently, at least, most of the persons with whom I was naturally thrown rather prided themselves upon leaving the word (as well as the thing) to those whose business required them to use it, and if we had a weakness, it was for boasting rather too much and too often our determination to let the chips from our hewing fall where they might. We were "intellectuals" first of all, or if you prefer, as I do, M. Benda's fine old word, we were "clerks" with a function peculiarly our own, and the one luxury we cherished as a compensation for the many luxuries which clerks must forgo was the luxury of speaking our mind without asking whether or not the truth we thought we had discovered was or was not one "meet to be thus set down."

Perhaps we were rather more superior than we ought to have been in our attitude toward those whose professions required them to consider the practical effect of this idea or that fact. Perhaps we had less sympathy than we ought to have had with the priest who was alarmed lest some one of his less mature parishioners might rise from the reading of Westermarck's "Development of Moral Ideas" with the conviction that, all morality being merely a matter of custom, there was no real reason why he should not murder his grandmother in accordance with a long-cherished desire; or even with the politician who, convinced that his party was right in the main, saw it as his obvious duty to suppress a few facts which might prove damaging to his chance of triumphing at the polls and consequently of serving his country as only he could serve it. Thus Secretary Swanson is said to have once remarked: "I always get reelected because I am always right—and because I have a machine which sees to it that righteousness shall prevail."

Perhaps such well-working machines are necessary in the world, but we clerks rather prided ourselves on not being "in the world," and since we were compelled to forgo many of the privileges of those who are, we thought we might claim at least one peculiar to ourselves—the privilege of not asking what was tactically advisable and what was not. For it was a privilege, and it did seem to us a very fine thing—this right to disregard everything except the immediate fact or the isolated aperçu which we seemed to have got hold of, and to set it down for what it was worth without asking, even, whether or not it happened to point in the general direction we hoped to go.

We felt something of what the scientist feels when he proclaims not only that he is not immediately concerned with the utility of what he has discovered but that he is as anxious to find out what may damage his pet theory as he is to discover a confirming fact. And I suppose that our somewhat similar attitude was based on a somewhat similar—perhaps sentimental—faith in the ultimate value of all truth and every truth, on the unquestioned premise that in the very longest run the best tactic was to disregard tactics, and on the unproved assumption that when everything had been finally added up it would be found that there was no truth not good to know or to make known. Certainly we pitied those writers who somehow found themselves required to follow the "policy" of a newspaper, just as we pitied those clergymen who were almost afraid to keep abreast of the best scholarship in their profession lest they should come across something which might "destroy the faith" of their charges if not of themselves. They seemed to us unfortunate clerks who had given up the one privilege which made it most worth while to be a clerk at all.

And when I speak of the frequency with which I have recently heard the word "tactics" from the lips of my fellow-clerks I am not thinking primarily of those who have definitely and consciously adopted some "party line." Those who have actually done that have of course consciously abandoned the critical and exploratory function. They have proclaimed their belief that they have discovered some body of truth sufficiently complete to make the enforcement of it as a whole so urgent a matter that independence of judgment in details is folly, and they feel, I suppose, that they have the same duty that any other politician has to make the best possible use of a machine for making righteousness prevail. I am speaking, rather, of those who still think of themselves as clerks, who feel in general that there is still some place for the clerk's restless analysis and speculation, but who have, nevertheless, come by imperceptible degrees to a point where they think more often than of anything else of "what the effect will be."

If they are students of social or economic affairs they wonder whether or not this particular fact really ought to be stressed; if they are critics of literature or the drama they wonder if it would not be just as well not to say too much in favor of this work or to give the benefit of the doubt to this other. And I am afraid that, whatever practical good may come of it, the "united front" on the left rather tends to encourage this development. Before its emergence the nine and twenty warring sects could at least be trusted to spend no small amount of their time in discovering the motes as well as the beams in one another's eyes. The new fellowship, on the other hand, makes one and all so tender of so many toes that even a left-wing Trotskyite oppositionist sometimes wonders whether or not, all things considered, it would not be as well—from the standpoint of tactics—to say a good word for the bad novel just published by a slightly right-center Socialist of the Old Guard. In other words it seems to me that there is some tendency to be so concerned lest general righteousness should not prevail that the clerk forgets his first duty, which is to leave tactics to those who have never been able to rise above them.

Nolo episcopari they used to say in the Middle Ages, and there was wisdom in the thought behind the saying. The bishops take care of the visible church and see that its tithes are collected. The clerks look after God or truth. And when the artist carves his decoration over the cathedral door he usually sees to it—as one may observe if he cares to look—that at least one mitred head is among those who are being pitchforked down the mouth of hell. The road thither, I suspect, was paved not only with good intentions but also with something which often goes with them. We call it "tactics" when we are being tactical. At other times we use rather uglier words.

BOOKS

Prologue to "Sergeant Grischa"

EDUCATION BEFORE VERDUN. By Arnold Zweig. Translated by Eric Sutton. The Viking Press. $2.50.

IT IS twenty years since Arnold Zweig first heard of and meditated on the actual events of the case of Sergeant Grischa, and it is ten years since his novel appeared and was received as one of the most moving and intelligent books the war had inspired. In the intervening decade, still goaded by his passion against organized injustice and cruelty, Zweig has occupied himself with constructing outworks to that book. He has now produced two novels to lead up to "The Case of Sergeant Grischa," and he projects a fourth to follow it, the tetralogy to be called "The Great War of the White Peoples."

"Grischa" was so admirable that it is distressing to have to say that its companions are inferior—so much so that one doubts "Grischa" itself and returns to test it. But "Grischa" reread is as fine as we had first thought it. It marches forward in splendid dramatic order, foraging its philosophy as it goes. The two later books, however, are never quite sure of their goal or their organization, and their supplies of ideas are always straggling up from the rear. "Young Woman of 1914" had its moments and its point, but the total effect was merely sentimental. "Education Before Verdun" has a heavier impact, but it is always indecisive and confused.

There are, of course, few such stories as that of Grischa; history only rarely makes a gift of them to the novelist. But it is not merely that the stories of Zweig's later novels are less dramatic and less revealing; the novels in their execution do not have the grasp of reality that "Grischa" has; they seem always to slip from the center of the matter to the periphery. Perhaps we may in part account for this by the events of late years. For when "Grischa" was being written Germany was still a democracy, the values were not all transvaluated, and the German writer still had firm ground under his feet.

In "Young Woman of 1914," the young Jewish novelist, Werner Bertin, abandoned himself almost voluptuously to the unconscious mass life of the army, leaving his mistress Lenore to face the difficulties of the conscious and individual life at home. In "Education Before Verdun," Bertin learns to see the war as it really is, and by the end of the book he is the conscious and rebellious man who is to fight for Sergeant Grischa. The impetus to his education is a miscarriage of justice. (How the "case," the legal tampering with right, obsesses the German Jewish novelists with their memory of the tradition of the Talmud, their frequent training in jurisprudence as a prelude to literature, their childhood recollections of the Belyis and Dreyfus trials!) A young sergeant, an idealistic poet, has complained that his fellow-officers are appropriating the best rations for themselves and depriving their men. He has thus violated the code of caste, and it is not against the speculators but against the protestant that the army takes steps. While he awaits court martial he is transferred to a dangerous position in the hope that he will be killed, and he is killed, but not before he has made an ally of Bertin. That naive and puzzled intellectual, while the Germans are being thrust back from Verdun, tries to clear his young friend's name. He is not entirely alone in this effort, and one of his associates is the young sergeant's brother, who will be content not with justice but with revenge. And so, while men are being killed by thousands, the brother invokes the archaic code of family honor and personal vengeance and Bertin invokes the forgotten code of abstract justice—because in the sergeant's impeachment and death motives could be seen not recognized by the articles of war.

It is a magnificent irony, not unlike the irony of "Grischa," but the novel does not do it justice. It is submerged under the details of battle, in themselves often effective but as often confused. And the education of Bertin is similarly obscured. In the simplest terms of technical construction the novel fails to hold us. One would like to say that over and above this literary failure the novel has so much passionate intention on the side of the angels that it derives strength and interest from this alone. Unfortunately, failures in art betray the angels. One remembers, for instance, that in "The Case of Sergeant Grischa" many fine things were said about justice and virtue and that, because they sprang from very real people and events, they were hard and bitter and acceptable. In "Education Before Verdun" the reality of the people and events is blurred, and the ideas and sentiments that spring from them seem merely humanitarian, a little soft, a little mealy, and quite inadequate to the matter.

LIONEL TRILLING

"The Savage Wars of Peace"

THE RAPE OF AFRICA. By Lamar Middleton. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $3.

WHEN Kipling exhorted England to "take up the white man's burden," he pictured the undertaking as a duty, imperious and noble. That the work of spreading civilization among the heathen would have to be carried out by warlike methods he was quite aware. But the wars which would necessarily be involved in the process of bringing light to darkest Africa he called "the savage wars of peace." They were justified by their end. It is the attitude expressed in "The White Man's Burden" that enrages Mr. Middleton as he follows the course of European imperialism in Africa. To him, all the talk which the practitioners of expansion indulged in about bringing to the natives the benefits of civilization in the shape of cotton pants and the Christian religion was purest hypocrisy. Mr. Middleton believes it to have been a conscious and deliberate hypocrisy and that makes him wild. As a result "The Rape of Africa" is an angry book, and history, when seen through a screen of anger, is not always seen clearly.

In describing the British occupation of Egypt Mr. Middleton says this: "Any ethical consideration of what right England had at all . . . in Africa was of course irrelevant, and in the middle-class mind at home a thought both disloyal and impertinent." Elsewhere he says the English regarded the process of expansion as a "whimsical adventure." No statements could more thoroughly misinterpret the average nineteenth-century Englishman's attitude toward imperialism. Not only did the English take imperialism with the utmost seriousness, but thoughts concerning the moral justification of expansion, far from being "irrelevant" or "disloyal," were so inextricably mixed with the political and economic motives that in no single instance did the British ever set about acquiring new territory without first conjuring up for themselves a good ethical reason as a point of departure. This is not to say that the ethical was the only, or even the true reason. Clothing the heathen was a Christian duty, but no one forgot that it also made the wheels of Manchester's cotton mills turn. However, Mr. Middleton's statement that the ethical motive was never even considered presents a false picture.

For instance, when the British occupied Afghanistan in 1878 they did it with the practical motive of acquiring for their Indian possessions a defensible frontier against Russia. But the moral justification was not forgotten. As Queen Victoria explained in her immortal italics, "It is not for aggrandizement, but to prevent war and bloodshed that we must do this. The Ameer cannot manage his own people." Or again, when England embarked on the reconquest of the Sudan in 1896, it was to prevent the French from getting there first, which would have put an end forever to the British dream of securing an unbroken path of territory from the Cape to Cairo. But the reconquest was not urged so much on those grounds as on the grounds of avenging the death of Gordon at Khartum and, in the words of Lord Cromer, of "the solemn and responsible duty of introducing the light of Western civilization amongst the sorely tried people of the Sudan." As these examples show, British imperialism was a sort of boomerang. It went out as duty and came back as profit.

It is by no means my purpose to try to prove that the Englishman was invariably convinced by the moral excuses he created to justify his imperial urge. The profit motive came first and the moral motive was but an accessory after the fact. But it was nevertheless a very necessary adjunct to any imperialist venture and cannot be called "irrelevant." "Listen to me," says Bernard Shaw in his play "The Man of Destiny." "I will explain the English to you. Every Englishman is born with a certain miraculous power that makes him master of the world. When he wants a thing he never tells himself that he wants it. He waits patiently until there comes into his head, no one knows how, the burning conviction that it is his moral and religious duty to conquer those who have the thing he wants . . . He is never at a loss for an effective moral attitude . . . There is nothing so bad or so good that you will not find an Englishman doing it, but you will never find an Englishman in the wrong."

It is not of course altogether fair to Mr. Middleton to ask that he should have made more of a study of British political psychology before presenting his case, for his book is admittedly a study of the how rather than of the why of imperialism, and furthermore it is as much a history of French, German,

Belgian, and Italian imperialism as of British. Their story Mr. Middleton tells with gusto and with much fascinating detail concerning the diplomatic intrigues that agitated the chancelleries of Europe while the rivalry for African possessions was at its most intense. He does not attempt to discuss the economic causes of European expansion but limits himself to a description of the methods through which that expansion was achieved. There are passages in which one deplores the rather heavily sarcastic tone that the author's righteous indignation leads him to adopt, but there are other passages of fine, dramatic narrative which make up for that fault. Among the latter is the story of the British and French race to Fashoda on the upper Nile, from which point both hoped to control the Sudan. The incident was a crucial one in the history of nineteenth-century African campaigns, and Mr. Middleton makes vivid reading of it, as he does also of the Battle of Adowa, in which the Abyssinians utterly routed the Italians forty years ago. Bringing his history to an end with a chapter on the present Ethiopian war, Mr. Middleton concludes that European rivalries on the Dark Continent are as pregnant of war in Europe today as ever they were before 1914.

BARBARA WERTHEIM

The Spirit Killeth

SPARKENBROKE. By Charles Morgan. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

MR. MORGAN'S new book, like the two preceding it, represents the effort to transcend experience, and thereby grasp its oneness and reality, through the mode of Christian Platonism. The vocation of life is to transcend it through love and death, and the best life to transcend is found in the medium of art or contemplation.

In each book the leading character is shown in the struggle to realize that vocation. Adultery and both spiritual dying and physical death are the agents of realization. In "The Fountain" the husband of the adulteress is shown as actually transcending experience by literally dying twice. In "Sparkenbroke" the adultery is itself transcendent, and death is almost the medium as well as the crown of experience. Piers Tenniel, Lord Sparkenbroke, a great poet, begins life as a small boy by spiritually dying in the tomb of his ancestors, an experience which consecrates him to the pursuit of perfection in art and absolutism in love. Perfection in art he achieves; but his equal need of absolute love is never satisfied. Woman after woman fails him. Although he is a saint in his work it is at the expense of being a blackguard in life. This novel records his final attempt to find through the body of his friend's wife the sanction of death in love or of love in death. The consummation, or the adultery, never occurs, and at the moment of his last failure he dies—his aspiration enacted in death.

Mr. Morgan's work is thus meant to buttress a view of the spiritual life based, as I think, upon conflicting insights and therefore ending, however vital the process, in a barren conceptualism. Here, however, not the views but their dramatization in a novel is the question. The theme is legitimate and has major implications. Moreover, the structural form of the narrative is adequate. But on the representational plane Mr. Morgan is hardly successful, and we may mention two respects in which he has come short of his own purpose.

Mr. Morgan tells us that Lord Sparkenbroke was a great poet, and his greatness, since it is that quality in him in its different forms which affects other people most, is integral to the effect of the book. The conventional statement of great beauty in a woman is perhaps enough for conviction; but no amount of statement alone convinces the reader of poetic greatness. Yet Mr. Morgan would have done better to stick to the platitude of the simplest statement; for what he did was worse—he quotes the poems and summarizes a novel—because he merely extends the platitude. His examples merely weaken the magnitude he meant to strengthen.

Secondly, and this is one reason why Sparkenbroke's greatness could not have been represented, there is no normal sensibility anywhere so centered in the book as to grasp and incorporate the experience presented. Greatness is abnormal and, as a subject for art, so too are the phenomena of mystic experience; and to represent either requires the intervention of a normal sensibility formed by and concentrated upon the experience. Here there is only the reader, who, since he is not forced to see specifically, in effect sees nothing but what he brings with him.

The explanation, if it is one, lies in the inability of art to transcend experience. It can stretch but it can never transcend. The spirit of transcendence kills the experience by passing beyond it. What survives in a book of words will be in the letter from which the spirit sprang. The letter fills "Sparkenbroke" with observation, image, and fragmentary insight; but the spirit, whether of intention or of prose style, prevents it from being a novel.

R. P. BLACKMUR

Museum Pieces

AN EIGHTEENTH CENTURY MISCELLANY. Edited by Louis Kronenberger. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

ONE of Mr. Kronenberger's most characteristic merits as a critic has been his disenchanted self-reliance in the matter of passing judgment on his contemporaries. His introduction to the present volume of eighteenth-century pieces proves him no less irreverent even though it finds him less consistently persuasive. The title-page promises a selection from "the classics of the eighteenth century which typify and reveal an era," but Mr. Kronenberger's concern has been at least twofold: he has endeavored to furnish the layman with "the key to an age" and to lay the ghost of that age's "dullness."

For Mr. Kronenberger the entire century is "in some respects . . . the greatest of all museums," and its great personalities are museum pieces; he is consequently disposed at times to make use of the license and showmanship of the barker. In the light of his editorial intentions, there is something to be said for the informal vein of his Introduction. There is criticism as well as laughter in his remark that for Lord Chesterfield the "meat of life seemed so worthless . . . that he concentrated untiringly on the sauce," that "nothing less than marble, one feels, will do for Gibbon describing his gout," that, as a whole, the men of the eighteenth century were so frightened of artistic excess that "without knowing it they sometimes cultivated privation" and went about emotionally "in clothes a size too small for them." Yet Mr. Kronenberger is also of the mind—how seriously it is difficult to judge—that "in the eighteenth century (except the very numerous poor) almost everybody was a glutton and (including the very numerous poor) a drunkard and a lecher." Nor is he beneath referring to that age's writers as "the eternal foes of the dada, the ha ha, the blah-blah of the human race."

It is hardly likely that the absence of a scholarly method in the present volume proceeds from any easy contempt for scholarship in its proper domain. Certainly Mr. Kronenberger

A Victor Recording of the BRAHMS

B Flat Major Concerto—Played by ARTUR SCHNABEL

And the BBC Symphony Orchestra
directed by Adrian Boult

To those who are building libraries of the music that has thrilled the world, Victor offers one of Brahms' great piano concertos—the B Flat Major, that has been called "a symphony with piano obbligato."

Artur Schnabel evokes from this Brahms masterwork all the vernal gladness, romantic nobility and fervent beauty that Brahms poured into it in memory of his first springtime visit to Italy.

This important recording is now available at your Victor dealer's. Hear it. Six 12-inch Red Seal Victor Records, in album with explanatory notes, complete, $12.

★ Also hear the new Victor recording of the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C Minor played by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Few of the immortal works of music have received the popular acclaim that this Brahms First Symphony has won in the last few years. Now Victor gives it a new, higher fidelity recording to bring you a complete verity of reproduction that will thrill you again and again. 5 records, 10 sides, $10.

RCA Victor Division, RCA Manufacturing Co., Inc., Camden, N. J.
RCA Victor Co., Ltd., Montreal, Canada

himself cannot have minimized the difficulty of telescoping one hundred years of literary history into nine names and as many selections brief enough to be printed in their entirety. It is perhaps sufficient defense to submit that the intent of the present anthology is directly away from any formal appraisal of the material included. Yet the question forcibly obtrudes itself whether such an intention is either gainful or practicable in dealing with an era as various as the eighteenth century. One would like, for example, to know why Mr. Kronenberger has reconstructed the century out of nine such blocks as Swift's "Drapier's Letters," Pope's "Dunciad," Gay's "Beggar's Opera," Chesterfield's "Letters," Sterne's "Sentimental Journey," Walpole's "Otranto," Sheridan's "School for Scandal," Gibbon's "Memoirs," and Blake's "Songs of Innocence and Experience." We should wish to be tangibly reassured that Smollett, Richardson, Defoe, Fielding, Dr. Johnson, and the unavoidable "Lyrical Ballads" deserve to yield place to any of the above-mentioned names, and upon what score. And we should even contend that the citation of important dates—the volume prints none at all—would have proved definitely helpful.

In each of these matters the scholar would have satisfied us, even as he would have surfeited us. Ordinarily it should serve in the nature of a recommendation to point out that Mr. Kronenberger's anthology is personal rather than representative. In the present case it must indicate a deficiency as well.

BEN BELITT

German Imperialism

DEUTSCHLAND UND DIE VEREINIGTEN STAATEN IN DER WELTPOLITIK. By Alfred Vagts. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $16.

THESE two volumes of 2,030 closely printed pages will repay careful reading. In relating the detailed story of the relations between the United States and Germany in the years from 1890 to 1906, the author has succeeded, by his astonishing command of the whole published and unpublished source material of that time, in presenting a comprehensive picture and a penetrating analysis of the political and economic forces of the period of imperialism. He has given much more than a diplomatic history. The official notes and private letters of diplomats do not always reveal the real forces in history; there is much more in mundo than there is in actis. Mr. Vagts digs deep. He breaks through the usual separation of foreign and home policies and establishes the causal connection between specific economic interests and popular or "scholarly" sentiments, both of which find their expression in the most bitter of cutthroat competitions—the imperialist competition between isolated states, recognizing no fraternal solidarity and no moral obligation.

Besides its general interest as an invaluable mine of information for the elucidation of the background and workings of imperialism, the book deserves special attention for its characterization of German diplomacy before the World War. In Germany foreign policy remained the exclusive domain of the feudal aristocracy, with its conceit, its antiquated notions of honor and social rank, its scorn for democracy, and its natural inclination toward everything conservative. German policy was in no way more imperialistic than the policy of any other great power in that period, but it was decidedly less intelligent. It suffered, as did the Russian, from its own traditions and from the inevitable shortcomings of autocracy. The Western powers should be thankful to the Germans, who helped them indirectly in the way which John Stuart Mill explained when he said that "the greatest advantage from the presence of extremists is that any cause short of the extreme gains the charm of moderation."

In a talk which the German Emperor had in 1906 with the United States Minister in Copenhagen, the Emperor remarked "in a half-pleasant way" that with the continuing growth of German population the time would come in about twenty years "to say to France that Germany was overcrowded, that France had a considerable domain not being properly developed or utilized, and would it especially discommode them to move inward a reasonable distance."

The imperialism of Germany and the imperialism of the Western powers were equally dangerous for peace and had the same disregard for the rights of weaker peoples. There are many similarities, which Mr. Vagts points out, between William II and Theodore Roosevelt. But there was a fundamental difference in the representation of the two different kinds of imperialism, the feudal imperialism of Germany—and of Russia—and the bourgeois imperialism of the Western democracies. Mr. Vagts's study is extremely revealing on this point. Under Stresemann Germany reached the most successful stage in the "Westernization" of its diplomacy. Under Hitler conservative Germany seems to have come again into full power. Again Germany presents itself to Europe as the guardian and bulwark against the disruptive influences and the threat of bolshevism. But Hitler was more fortunate than William II. He could exterminate the Socialists in Germany. And it may be that with the growing population of Germany he too thinks that there are some countries—this time he does not look toward France, but eastward—with a considerable domain not being properly developed or utilized.

Mr. Vagts is a German who is now living in the United States. His book is written with a remarkable objectivity and impartiality. It is the scholarly work of a historian and a political scientist. But it is deeply rooted in life and it will be found of great interest and usefulness to anybody who desires a competent guide in the complex political and social problems of world politics.

HANS KOHN

What Galsworthy Was Like

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN GALSWORTHY. By H. V. Marrot. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

SAMUEL BUTLER once proposed an admirable if difficult aim for the ideal critic of life and literature—that of getting to see everything first as in itself it really is and then in its relation to everything else. Mr. Marrot, the bibliographer and constant admirer of Galsworthy, has brought together in this lengthy and richly illustrated volume ample materials for the use of such a critic. In the main, he allows his subject to speak for himself, and although the book is somewhat cluttered with trivial and unessential details, the patient reader will find in it a very complete picture of Galsworthy. A great body of heretofore unpublished correspondence throws into clearer light the underlying substance of his character and his writing.

Mr. Marrot has included documents which a more squeamish hero-worshiper might have suppressed, but one notable thing this almost definitive biography reveals is the extent, and sometimes the sentimentality, of Galsworthy's humanitarian interests, his eagerness to aid in practical reforms, from the abolition of solitary confinement of prisoners to the "humane" treatment of horses during the war. And an interesting corollary is the tenacity with which he held himself aloof from parties and avoided propaganda in its narrower sense in all his serious literary work. Perhaps the key to Galsworthy's philosophy of balance, harmony, and proportion is to be found in the conflict between individualist and socialist in his nature.

Again and again his replies to those who would pigeon-hole him indicate his resolve to maintain the intellectual independence of the artist. In 1912 he wrote to one correspondent:

... the real search for truth (at all events to those who follow the arts) consists in the searching of one's own spirit in contact with actual experience and feeling, and phenomena observed; ... there is no such thing as absolute truth, and ... arguments or syllogisms are mainly futile for the discovery of that relative harmony, or proportion of things, in which such truth as we may discern consists.

Galsworthy felt that the novel which was frankly propagandist had the least real influence.

The novel is the most pliant and far-reaching medium of communication between minds—that is, it can be—just because it does not preach, but supplies pictures and evidence from which each reader may take that food which best suits his growth.

In 1919 he declined an invitation to join an idealistic group of French writers.

I would draw your attention to the fact that the great influence which creative writers undoubtedly wield rests on two main factors: first, their untrammelled creative power and the human attraction inherent in it; secondly, the faith which the public ... has in their independence ... the writer who has real creative power and real subtle influence ... is naturally lonely; he works more freely, and with greater force, in conditions of spiritual solitude than in an environment of joined hands.

It may seem strange at first glance that a writer thus wedded to individualism should have been so limited in his appreciation of "happy extravagance" and so devoted to humane causes. But the inconsistency disappears with a larger understanding of the temperament of the man, a temperament which demands a difficult balance between highly sensitive analytical qualities and natural restraint on the one side, and strong emotional sympathies on the other. It is significant that his severest critics have found him either coldly logical or sentimental. A too finely balanced sense of proportion, a too careful weighing of moral, social, and individual values, is irritating to some sensitive minds as well as to men of action. These will never appreciate the apparently stoic sympathies of Galsworthy, whose real faith was the artist's "will toward perfection." "And wherever Beauty and Proportion guide us, the whole of human society benefits; moving ever further away from the quagmires into which Greed and Violence lead."

LESLIE A. MARCHAND

Oracle of Jacksonian Democracy

ROGER B. TANEY. By Carl Brent Swisher. The Macmillan Company. $5.

ROGER B. TANEY: JACKSONIAN JURIST. By Charles W. Smith, Jr. University of North Carolina Press. $3.

ROGER BROOKE TANEY'S name is associated in American history with two momentous events which marked the climaxes of sectional and class conflict. It was Taney who as Secretary of the Treasury in Jackson's Cabinet took the final step in the war against the United States Bank and removed the government deposits. Elevated to the chief justiceship of the United States Supreme Court upon the death of Marshall in order to carry the principles of Jacksonian

The SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE

By DR. HELENA B. WRIGHT

M.B.B.S.

Practicing Gynecologist in London

Over 60,000 Copies Sold

"MANY married couples ... lack the right understanding and enjoyment of the sex-act itself. It is to help such people that this book is written. The writer wants to give such definite and practical information that no one after reading it can any longer be ignorant of the nature of the sex-act, or fail to know exactly how it should be performed."

"I have a high opinion of Dr. Helena Wright's SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE. There is probably no better small manual in simple language for married people." —HAVELOCK ELLIS

"Dr. Wright, from a scientific attitude and a wide practical experience of such cases, has written a most valuable and a greatly needed book. She writes without sentimentality or evasion, of the sex organs and the sex act. She explains the difficulties of sex intercourse during the honeymoon and after; gives actual and explicit information about the sensations of the sex act, the behavior of each partner in mutual stimulation, and of the climax, exhilaration and relaxation which should be found in it. She describes the variety and the perfection which may be aimed at in the art of love-making ... a most valuable and greatly needed book."

—The Journal (England)

"This book contains very detailed information about the ways in which the physical intimacies of married life may be successfully and happily managed. It is addressed to those about to be married in the hope that it may save them from mistakes and sufferings which have darkened married life for thousands of couples."

—From the Introduction by Rev. A. Herbert Gray, D.D.

"THE SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE certainly represents a free, frank, simple exposition of the details of the technic for facilitating sexual harmony. Doctor Wright has written with dignity, honesty and authority. Her experience as a gynecologist, a missionary and a mother finds expression in her understanding of vital human relationships. ... Thoughtful physicians will have numerous occasions to recommend this volume to those who desire intelligent guidance."

—American Medicine.

"We have no hesitation in saying that the book is by far the frankest and yet most refined of any written on the subject of the sex factor in marriage."

—SHERWOOD EDDY, in The World Tomorrow.

CONTENTS

- Introduction to the English Edition
- Introduction to American Edition
- I. MARRIAGE: A SEXUAL RELATION
- II. THE NATURE OF THE SEX-ACT
- III. THE SEX ORGANS OF MEN AND WOMEN
- IV. DIFFICULTIES
- V. THE PERFECT SEX-ACT
- VI. OTHER PRACTICAL ISSUES
- INDEX

ILLUSTRATIONS

- THE MALE SEX ORGANS
- THE FEMALE SEX ORGANS: WORKING PARTS
- THE FEMALE SEX ORGANS: SENSATION-PROVIDING PARTS

FREE OFFER

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to:

THE VANGUARD PRESS, 424 Madison Avenue, N. Y. C. Please send me a copy of THE SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE, in plain wrapper. I will pay $2.00 plus a few cents delivery charge, when the book arrives. I understand that if it is not entirely satisfactory, I may return the book within 5 days and the purchase price will be refunded. I agree to assume full responsibility for safeguarding the book from any improper persons or minors without their parents' consent.

Name

Address

City

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $2.00 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee.)

● What can the individual do to help achieve social security?

Mary Van Kleeck's

NEW BOOK

CREATIVE AMERICA

ITS RESOURCES FOR SOCIAL SECURITY

AMERICA wants to work! Students of economics agree that security for 130,000,000 Americans can be realized. But a dozen Townsend Plans and variegated Utopias have failed to come to grips with the chief obstacle to the release of America's tremendous productive energy.

Mary Van Kleeck has drawn on her 25 years' close study of all sectors of American life, of our mines, industries, financial institutions, political habits, our social services and trade unions. She presents her findings—a comprehensive view of our national economy and its potentialities for all Americans; and a program in which every brain worker, every professional person and everyone who is held back at any point by the pressure of the present crisis, can join against the possessive forces now in control.

Above all, she shows what the INDIVIDUAL, here and now, can do to help bring about social security for himself and for all others.

JUST PUBLISHED, $3.00, at all bookstores

Covici • Friede, Publishers, 432 Fourth Ave., N. Y. C.

"Now is the time to think about it—not after war is declared. Dr. Beard's book ought to go into the hands of every true patriot, every honestly patriotic club, every household that has sons and every school."

—Harry Hansen in The World Telegram

THE DEVIL THEORY OF WAR

By

Charles A. Beard

An inquiry "into the nature of history and the possibility of keeping out of war" in which an eminent historian presents:

1. A succinct summary of the facts brought out in the Nye Investigation regarding the manner in which we got into the World War.
2. An indication of how we may be able to stay out of another war.

$1.50—At All Bookstores.

THE VANGUARD PRESS, 424 Madison Avenue, New York City

democracy into the citadel from which it had hitherto been excluded by the judicial Cerberus of the Federalists, it was Taney again who made the fateful Dred Scott decision, denying to Congress the power to exclude slavery from the territories.

In the words of Charles Sumner, the name of the author of the Dred Scott decision was long "hooted down the pages of history." The butt of the Whig historians, he has been regularly represented as the "pliant tool" of Jackson in his war against the bank. While this verdict has remained substantially undisturbed, his work as Chief Justice has come to be better appreciated. Indeed, he has emerged as an architect of the judicial power second only to Marshall. Now comes Dr. Smith to proclaim Taney as the "political theorist of Jacksonian democracy," while Dr. Swisher explodes pretty thoroughly the myth. History, it seems, is far from a closed page.

Dr. Swisher in his solid and impressive work, which must be the result of long and painstaking research, demonstrates the independent role of Taney in the battle against Biddle and his cohorts. He shows that Jackson's mind was long undecided on the issue of the bank, and that Taney played no little part in influencing him against the renewal of the bank's charter. Taney was not merely courting favor and preferment; his hatred of the bank proceeded from sources even deeper than Jackson's, for as a member of the planter aristocracy he had an abiding distrust of the Northern capitalists and the monied interests, and he had had vivid experiences with the practices of the bank in his own state of Maryland. It is part of the myth that McLane, Jackson's first Secretary of the Treasury, was removed by him for his refusal to remove the government deposits from the bank, and that thereupon Taney was appointed to the vacant place to do Jackson's bidding. But actually McLane had been appointed to the Supreme Court the previous year while his influence with Jackson was so high that he was able to name his own successor. It was the latter whom Taney replaced to carry into effect a policy which he had been first in the Cabinet to champion.

The rehabilitation of Taney as a judge has been accomplished by his admirers by waiving his one fatal "error," and then by looking at the totality of his work, particularly in contrast with the era of Marshall's hegemony. The mission of Taney is perceived to have been the restoration of the rights of the states, with a consequent strengthening of a tendency toward progressivism and democracy. This reversal Taney is supposed to have brought about by forging the conception of the "police power" which plays such a tremendous role in modern constitutional law as a magic formula to save from the limitless reach of the due-process clause legislation in promotion of public health, safety, and morals.

Dr. Swisher, who has the great merit of looking beyond constitutional formulas to social realities, is suspicious of this neat scheme of contrasts and prefers to stress the purely negative character of Marshall's judicial nationalism. Since in his own time federal regulation was virtually non-existent, Marshall did not so much build the national power as protect property interests. Equally anachronistic is the view of Taney as the creator of the police power. Taney did somewhat vaguely refer to a power of police in the states. But to him, as a Southerner, it was simply an aspect of the reserved powers of the states which inhered in their sovereignty. It was not a counter-foil to an interpretation of the due-process clause yet to be born.

As for Taney's democratizing role, it seems highly curious that it should have been played by the judicial exponent of the system of slavery. He did, to be sure, exhibit progressive tendencies in upholding states' rights, but the dominant motivation

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

IDIOT'S DELIGHT. Shubert Theater. Robert Sherwood manages somehow to make a smashing theatrical success out of an anti-war play. With the Lunts and many other entertaining trimmings.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

SAINT JOAN. Martin Beck Theater. Brilliant interpretation by Katharine Cornell of what may well be Shaw's most enduring play.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

GILBERT AND SULLIVAN REPERTORY. Majestic Theater. The same company which usually appears about this time of year in pleasant revivals. A weekly change of program.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Gaumont British. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

DUBROVSKY. Amkino. As romantic as Pushkin, on whose unfinished novel it is based. Not wholly successful, but interesting as a variation on the orthodox Russian theme.

THE STORY OF LOUIS PASTEUR. Warner Brothers. With Paul Muni as Pasteur this film makes "science" exciting, or at any rate uses the life of its hero to excellent dramatic advantage.

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE
MOROSCO THEATRE, 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30
Extra Matinee Wednesdays

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHEMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:45

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:45
300 Seats at $1.10

"The most tormenting war play of the year has come from a new man . . . Mr. Shaw's grimly imaginative rebellion against warfare is a shattering bit of theatre magic that burrows under the skin of argument into the raw flesh of sensation."

—BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times

BURY THE DEAD

The Drama That Startled the World

By IRWIN SHAW

BARRYMORE Thea. 47 St. W. of B'y | Prices: Evgs. 50c to $2.00
Evgs. 8:50. Mat. 2:40 | Mats. Wed. Sat. 50c to $1.50

TRAVEL

Visit SOVIET RUSSIA with JOSHUA KUNITZ

For the third season Joshua Kunitz will share his first-hand knowledge of Soviet life with a group of American travelers. Here is a chance to meet people and get behind the scenes.

Sailing June 27, the group travels 9 weeks, spending a full month in the U.S.S.R.

Inclusive Rate

$469

Tenth Season

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor
8 West 40th Street, New York
Cooperating with Intourist

Other trips from $372
Or you may travel
on your own.

LOUIS FISCHER ON ITALY

Louis Fischer has just visited Italy! What he writes about conditions there as he saw them makes exciting reading, particularly in view of the final Italian victory in Ethiopia. Mr. Fischer's article will appear in next week's Nation.

The Intelligent Traveler

BY JOHN ROTHSCHILD

COLLEGE AND PREPARATORY SCHOOL STUDENTS

WHAT is known generically as the Cook's Tour used to be the fate of American innocents abroad. Prosperous hardware merchants and their wives, school teachers, young ladies finishing their education did the museums by the linear foot and gaped at the monuments from sightseeing buses. For young people, at least, the standard has improved. Each year more college students and preparatory-school boys and girls go traveling in well-planned and chaperoned groups. These are not Cook tourists.

It is generally recognized that, to be educational, trips for young people must afford contact with persons in the country visited. Most of the plans call for meetings with European students on their own ground, that is, in their youth hostels, on hiking and cycling expeditions, and sometimes in their homes as guests. A good deal of painless language study is a by-product of such travel. Costs are astonishingly low, for the young can adapt themselves to ordinary European living conditions and actually like to do so. Addresses of the organizations managing the following tours, unless otherwise noted, are New York City.

A novel scheme involves travel in a specially equipped box-car in which the travelers live and do their own cooking and bed-making. French students will act as guides for the month of "Le Wagon Camping" in France, after which the group will visit Germany and Holland. Girls may go and will have their own box-car. The trip costs $285 for two months, third class throughout. Address The Students' International Travel Association, 139 West 103d Street.

A tour of France by privately chartered motor bus is planned by the National Student Federation of America in conjunction with the French National Union of Students, which will act as host. A week in Paris is included. An American faculty leader will be in charge of the group. The cost for six weeks is $294, third class throughout. Address The National Student Federation of America, 8 West Fortieth Street.

A European tour featuring ten days at the American People's College at Oetz in the Austrian Tyrol is announced under the leadership of Mrs. Fred C. Armstrong of St. Louis. Arrangements may be made for Middle Western young people to travel to New York with her. The itinerary includes Paris, Geneva, Oetz, Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, Finland, Denmark, and England. The two months' trip costs $397, third class throughout. Address Pocono Study Tours, 545 Fifth Avenue.

Faltboating down German and Austrian rivers with a skilled German faltboater and his wife is for enthusiasts of the sport. The gliding competition of the Olympic Games will be encountered at one point. The two months' trip costs $348, third class throughout, for students under nineteen. Address The Students' International Travel Association.

A trip announced as a Bicycle Tour of Europe includes France, Germany, Sweden, Belgium, Austria, and Denmark, but the greater part of the time is spent cycling in Germany, with brief visits in capitals of the other countries. Mrs. Helen C. Dengler and Ben Gottschalk will be leaders, and student guides in the countries visited will join the group. The two months' trip costs $289, third class throughout, for those under nineteen. A similar trip through England and France will be led by John C. Dengler, Jr., and Ernest Watson, an Oxford student. The two months' trip costs $358, third class throughout. Address The Students' International Travel Association.

The Fifth Experiment in International Living is a well-established enterprise which gives the young traveler a month in a foreign home with another boy or girl of equal age. Language study is stressed; applicants are expected to have some linguistic accomplishment before they set out. Cycling or hiking trips with foreign friends take the place of wider travel in the latter half of the sojourn. Groups are being organized for Germany and Austria, for France, and for England. There will be three weeks at Geneva devoted to study of international relations; the French and English plans make room for this period if desired. The rate for all groups for young people under nineteen is $450 for a two months' trip. Accommodations are third class throughout. For the German trips it has been deemed inadvisable to accept Jewish applicants. In the other groups the Experiment for International Living accepts a quota of Jewish children. Address Donald B. Watt, 817 Comstock Avenue, Syracuse, New York.

A. M. Black, head of the Social Science Department at the McBurney School for Boys in New York, will take a group of boys through Europe—England, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, Paris, and Geneva. Special arrangements with student organizations abroad provide for contact with European life. The seven weeks' trip is $440, third class throughout. Address The Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street.

A motor trip through six European countries is this year's plan for the Barry Boys' Tour, conducted by Arthur J. Barry. Twelve boys between fourteen and eighteen will make the trip through Holland, Belgium, Duchy of Luxemburg, France, Switzerland, and Italy. The nine weeks' trip costs $575, cabin class on the ocean. Address Arthur J. Barry, Yale University Club, 50 Vanderbilt Avenue.

Camp Sorland, an international camp for boys at Lillesand, Norway, will take twenty-four American boys for six weeks of all the usual sports, plus a great deal of sailing and craft work, in company with twenty-four European boys. There will be several American counselors at the camp. The boys will have glimpses of several European cities en route and a few days in Berlin and Paris. The cost is $400 for the ten weeks' trip, third class on the ocean, third class rail and good hotels in Europe. Address Marion M. Brooke, 146 East Seventeenth Street, Atlanta, Georgia.

The Youth Hostels of Europe—a chain of simple inns for young hikers and cyclists extending over eighteen countries—is now open to Americans through the organization of the American Youth Hostels, founded last year by Isabel and Monroe Smith. This year there will be several American groups of about ten young people each which will visit some European country, staying in youth hostels. The trips are of six weeks' duration, and one can choose to see Germany and Poland, France, the Alps, the British Isles, Scandinayia, or to go canoeing on German and Austrian rivers. In each group young people of the country will participate as guides and hosts. The cost for any one of the trips is $290, third class throughout. Address Isabel and Monroe Smith, Northfield, Massachusetts.

A bicycle trip through England for girls between the ages of sixteen and nineteen is planned to provide a leisurely approach to English life. The American leader is Mrs. Leo Herz; an English guide, appointed by the British National Union of Students, will also accompany the group. The two months' trip costs $425 for girls under nineteen, third class throughout. Address Mrs. Leo Herz, 93 Glenwood Avenue, New Rochelle, New York.

The International Friendship League sponsors a two months' European trip for girls. Features are ten days spent as a guest in an English home and friendly contacts with young people in every country. The itinerary includes Ireland, Scotland, England, Denmark, Germany, and Paris. Before embarking on the homeward voyage the girls will meet a group of English girls coming to the United States for a similar program of hospitality, and will sail with them. The cost of the trip is $645, tourist class on the ocean, second class rail and good hotels in Europe. Address The International Friendship League, 41 Mount Vernon Street, Boston, Massachusetts.

A group of American students under the leadership of Joseph Cadden, secretary of the National Student Federation of America, will visit Europe and the Soviet Union this summer and attend two important international student congresses, one in Sweden, the other in Geneva. They will compare the co-operative movement of Scandinavia, fascism in Germany, and communism in Russia. The two months' trip costs $562, third class throughout. Address The National Student Federation of America.

The Fellowship Summer Travel School is arranging to take twenty boys and girls between the ages of fourteen and eighteen for travel in France, Switzerland, Belgium, Holland, and England. Three weeks are spent in Swiss villages—one of them in an international camp at Plans sur Bex, with young people of five countries. Miss Truda T. Weil and Mrs. Joseph H. Kohan will accompany the group, which will also be attended by a physician. The cost for the two months' trip is $695, tourist class on the ocean. Address Miss Truda T. Weil, 220 East Tremont Avenue, New York; Mrs. Joseph H. Kohan, 368 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, New York.

Parents who want to be abroad this summer and don't like to have an ocean between themselves and the youngest members of the family may be interested in the American Children's School in the Tyrol at Oetz, Austria. The school is for children from two to twelve. The curriculum of science, social science, fine arts, dance, dramatics, and language utilizes the environment. Expenses by the week are $25 for one child and $40 for two. The rate for the full session, June 12 to September 15, is $250 for one child and $450 for two. Address Miss Edith Little, 67 Stevenson Place.

Dr. Sven V. Knudsen has been taking young people abroad for many years, sharing his enthusiasm for his native Denmark as well as his knowledge of all Europe. This year the boys in the party will spend ten days as house guests in English-speaking families in Copenhagen. They will attend the Olympic Games, and visit in Germany, Paris, Switzerland, and London. The two months' trip costs $540, third class on the ocean, third class rail and good hotels in Europe. Address Dr. Sven V. Knudsen, 248 Boylston Street, Boston, Massachusetts.

"Guests in Europe" is a travel plan for students, carried out under the auspices of the National Student Federation of America and the International Study and Hospitality Association of Geneva. The European sponsors arrange for informal, friendly encounters with students and other Europeans. In parties of ten or twelve, each accompanied by an American faculty member, the "Guests" have a wide choice of what to see in Europe. A typical six and a half weeks' trip includes travel in England, France, Switzerland, Italy, and six days at Salzburg; this itinerary costs $498, third class throughout. Address The Open Road.

The National Student Federation of America sponsors a German trip which it announces to be "frankly a tour of political and social inquiry." An American faculty member familiar with pre-Hitler Germany will be appointed as leader. Student guides will accompany the group in Germany. The six weeks' trip costs $298, third class throughout. An extension of five days at Lucerne, Salzburg, or Oberammergau brings the total cost up to $349. Various other European extensions are offered, with student cooperation and guidance in each country. Address The National Student Federation of America.

The American Student Union announces a trip to "Inside Europe," under the leadership of Joseph P. Lash and James Wechsler. Contact will be made with the British labor movement, the People's Front in France, the Belgium Social Democracy, and underground political centers in Prague. Five days will be spent at the International Socialist Student Congress at Oxford. This nine weeks' trip includes Belgium, France, England, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Soviet Russia, Poland, and Czecho-Slovakia. The cost, third class throughout, is $450. Address The American Student Union, 112 East Nineteenth Street.

The Y. M. C. A. expects to send twenty parties of young people abroad this summer. American leaders are for the most part Y. M. C. A. workers, pastors, or graduate students. Contacts with young people in Europe are arranged through the Y. M. C. A.'s abroad. All but one or two of the groups will attend the Olympic Games. Costs vary with the type of accommodation and length of the trip; a typical rate is $390 for a six weeks' trip, third class throughout. Address J. C. Clark, World "Y" Tours, 347 Madison Avenue.

Regularly
Sold at $18
and UP

NOW
ONLY

$5
Each

Original ETCHINGS

BY FOREMOST AMERICAN ARTISTS

DETERMINED to create wider interest in the purchase of original works of art, the eminent artists listed here are now collaborating in the unusual program of Associated American Artists. Genuine original etchings by these artists regularly sell at $18.00 and upwards. Under this revolutionary plan you may have the etchings included in this program for only $5.00 each—limited editions, perfect in every respect, individually signed, ready for framing or for collector's portfolio. Plate sizes average 8 by 11 inches. Some are larger. Five are prize-winning etchings. More than 20 from these same editions now hang in leading art museums.

FREE CATALOGUE

Send 10c stamps to cover mailing costs of Free Catalogue illustrating photographically the marine, landscape, sporting, nature, character-study etchings available. Also contains biography of each artist's career and awards. Supply limited.

Address:

PARTIAL LIST OF ARTISTS:

Thomas Benton
Arnold Blanch
Alexander Brook
Geo. Elmer Browne
Philip Cheney
John Costigan
John Stewart Curry
Adolph Dehn
Gordon Grant
Irwin Hoffman
Philip Kappel
Andrew Karoly
W. R. Locke
Louis Lozowick
Luigi Lucioni
Margaret Manuel
Ira Moskowitz
Frank Nankivell
Frederick L. Owen
Roselle Oak
Henry Pitt
Margery Ryerson
C. Jac Young
Henry Ziegler

ASSOCIATED AMERICAN ARTISTS

Studio 435, 420 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y.

Letters to the Editors

"JIM CURLEY AND HIS GANG"

Dear Sirs: I started out on Saturday, April 25, to buy in Boston a copy of The Nation for April 29, which contained the article on Governor Curley, and the results were so surprising that I thought you would like to hear about it.

My first stop was Flashman's in Scollay Square, which carries practically all magazines. The man grinned when I asked him for a Nation and then said "all sold out." I got the same answer at four stores on Cambridge Street which usually carry The Nation. One of them is run by a friend of mine who used to run a little grocery store on Beacon Hill until he found that being a number-pool agent was more profitable.

"The boys have been around buying them up. I don't think I'll have any more in," was his answer, also accompanied by the knowing smile.

By this time I could see what was up, so I made an excursion to the Back Bay and to one store in the South End. The same answer—sold out and we don't expect any more in. I found only one man who was going to have more. He said he only had two copies ordinarily and sometimes didn't sell them, but a man came in and bought both on Saturday and so he had ordered more for Monday.

The sum total of this seems to be that "the boys" bought them up and suggested that no one should reorder because maybe Jim wouldn't like the public to see the article.

A. H.

Boston, April 27

SECRETARY PERKINS

Dear Sirs: That a periodical like The Nation would print an article of the kind that appeared in the issue for March 11 about the Secretary of Labor, Frances Perkins, is surprising. The tone of the article, the cartoon which illustrates it, and the implication it conveys are extremely unfair and unwarranted.

Miss Perkins is one of the outstanding women in the country. She will always fight for what she believes is right. It is inevitable that any public official who administers an office such as hers courageously and vigorously should meet with opposition. Everyone in public life must expect criticism. And everyone should welcome it, provided it is frank, intelligent, and fair. The article in question, however, does not rise to the level of criticism.

ETHEL M. JOHNSON

Washington, April 20

WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD

Dear Sirs: Your readers must include many who have taken courses with William Ellery Leonard at the University of Wisconsin, have received an occasional letter from him, or have known him in some other way. May I, through the courtesy of your correspondence section, appeal to such persons to communicate with me at 7 Park Avenue, New York City? I am preparing an authorized biography of Mr. Leonard, and am most anxious to secure all available material.

CLARA LEISER

New York, April 5

CORRECTION

Dear Sirs: You improved many of my sentences marvelously in my piece on Governor Curley in your issue of April 29. But in the process you caused me to say, with reference to the distribution of job tickets in the Chelsea municipal campaign, that they were given out from "Curley's campaign headquarters." This was not the case. Curley, as governor, had no occasion for campaign headquarters in the municipal elections. My manuscript said "his" campaign headquarters and the pronoun referred, not to Curley, but to the Curley candidate for mayor of Chelsea, as the context would show. This distinction means something in Boston however hair-splitting it may sound in New York, so I hope you will bear with my New England fussiness to keep the record straight.

LOUIS M. LYONS

Boston, April 25

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE began her editorial career on The Nation some years ago, leaving to become a member of the Freeman staff when that lively weekly was founded by Albert Jay Nock. She is the author of "Concerning Women" and "Art in America."

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER is coauthor with Kelley Loe of "An Army of the Aged," an analysis of the political and social implications of the Townsend movement, to be issued soon by Caxton's.

HERBERT KLINE, the editor of the New Theater, has lately returned from Hollywood. He is the author of a play, "John Henry," which has been produced several times outside New York.

LIONEL TRILLING is a member of the English Department of Columbia University.

R. P. BLACKMUR, one of the ablest of contemporary critics, is the author of "The Double Agent: Essays in Craft and Elucidation." Mr. Blackmur spends half his year in Boston and half on a farm on the coast of Maine.

HANS KOHN is the author of "Orient and Occident" and "Nationalism in the Soviet Union." He is professor of history at Smith College.

LESLIE A. MARCHAND has lately returned from London, where he spent six months working on a doctor's dissertation in the field of Victorian literature. He has been editor of a monthly book column in the magazine MS and a member of the English staff of the Extension Department of Columbia University.

JOSE CLEMENTES OROZCO is one of Mexico's best-known painters. He has done a number of murals in this country, notably in New York and at Dartmouth College.

A. BIRNBAUM draws for Stage, the New Yorker, and Harper's Bazaar.

DON FREEMAN spent a night in the New Jersey Assembly Chamber to get his picture of the relief groups sleeping there. There was, he reports, as much waking as sleeping—many of the more energetic protestants spent the night in conversation or singing.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · MAY 20, 1936

NUMBER 3698

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

629

EDITORIALS:

WHO OWNS STATES' RIGHTS?

632

WHY THE FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL IS BAD

633

ACADEMIC FREEDOM AT CITY COLLEGE

634

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

635

WAITING FOR LEWIS by Margaret Marshall

637

MR. LUNKHEAD THE BANKER

by James T. Farrell

642

CAN ITALY MAKE PEACE WITH

EUROPE? by Louis Fischer

643

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

646

BROUN'S PAGE

647

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

127,000,000 POETS, OR THE MUSE'S GUINEA PIGS

by Ben Belitt

648

MR. HEARST'S LINEN by George Seldes

649

A BUDDHA OF THE BAYOUS by Mark Van Doren

651

"ABOVE THE AVERAGE" by S. Gorley Putt

652

ETHEREAL POLITICS by Sidney Hook

653

THE SPIRIT OF CHINA by Younghill Kang

654

SHORTER NOTICES

656

RECORDS: by Henry Simon

657

DRAWINGS: by Georges Schreiber, Hugo Gellert,

Käthe Kollwitz, Robert Minor, George Grosz,

José Posada, Frans Masereel, and LOW

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

The Shape of Things

*

GOVERNOR LANDON EMERGED FROM RECENT primary tests somewhat stronger and certainly more talked about than when he went in. Since then, in a radio interview, the Governor has himself had something to say on all the outstanding issues of the campaign, yet his utterances remain wrapped in a fog of non-commitment. Where, for instance, does he stand on Hearst? His advisers claim that the defeat of the Hearst-supported Landon ticket in California was in reality a matter for self-congratulation because it freed the Governor from the uncertain benefits of Hearst backing. But as yet Landon has not used this excellent chance to dissociate himself from Hearst. On other questions of policy he is equally obscure. He says the Republican Party must proceed on "sound and progressive" lines, but does not say what they are. He says he will provide "humanitarian legislation," but what kind he does not reveal. He is going to remove the "disadvantages" under which labor and agriculture suffer, but he does not tell how. He believes in government regulation of business in so far as it "protects, not hampers," and he mentions "the protection of women and children in industry" and "reasonable working hours." But he does not say whether he is for or against the child-labor amendment and a minimum-wage law for women, or what constitutes "reasonable" working hours. On being asked his ideas on social security, he answered, complete with exclamation point, "I am for it!" But what kind, where applied, how implemented, he did not explain. As for foreign affairs, which are more exciting and crucial now than they have been in any Presidential year since 1916, all that Governor Landon could find to say was, "As to our relations with other countries, it might repay all of us to read Washington's Farewell Address again." We have learned to expect campaign utterances to be vague, but Landon sets a new high in sweet evasiveness.

*

THE BATTLE BETWEEN JOHN L. LEWIS AND William Green, which is also the struggle between industrial and craft unionism, has been joined on an important issue—the organization of steel. The fight was precipitated when the Committee for Industrial Organization offered the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers $500,000 for a campaign to organize the steel workers along industrial lines. Mr. Green, for the executive council of the A. F. of L. now meeting in Washington, has made a counter offer which excludes the C. I. O.

and its money, reserves the right of the council to manage the campaign, and provides that jurisdictional rights of all craft unions shall be respected. Mr. Green did not speak of money, but he is quoted as having said that "we will start even if we don't get a dollar." It is no accident that the Lewis group, in this contest, has consistently attacked, forcing the issue at every turn, while Green has been on the defensive, hiding behind jurisdictional rights, accusing his enemy of bad faith, and all the while complaining bitterly. The progressive forces in American labor are solidly massed behind the C. I. O. As we go to press, the convention of the Amalgamated Association in Canonsburg has not decided whether to accept the help of the C. I. O., with $500,000, or the Green offer of a campaign based on the old craft-union policy of divide and rule. A report by Margaret Marshall which appears on another page of this issue indicates that the delegates at Canonsburg and the steel workers in general are overwhelmingly in favor of accepting the Lewis offer. The intrenched officials of the Amalgamated may be able to ward off temporarily the acceptance of an offer which would mean their ultimate defeat. If they succeed, their triumph will be short-lived.

*

AFTER THE FRONT-PAGE BALLYHOO ON NEW Deal extravagances and the growing peril of government deficits it is somewhat refreshing to examine the latest Treasury statement, which appears deeply imbedded in the financial section of most papers. For one who believes what appears on the news and editorial pages it is surprising to find that the government's income has increased by more than $250,000,000 in the past ten months despite the invalidation of the processing taxes. General expenditures have also risen, but not as rapidly as revenues, leaving a surplus in the regular budget of nearly $135,000,000. Expenditures for recovery and relief are running approximately $170,000,000 under those of the previous fiscal year, and the total government outlay is only $56,000,000 higher than a year ago. The deficit, with only seven weeks to go in the present fiscal year, is $2,700,851,000 as compared with $2,895,836,000 in the same period last year. While the payment of the bonus in June may cause this year's deficit to exceed last year's, the improvement in economic conditions will ultimately bring about a more nearly balanced budget without the aid of Republican campaign speeches.

*

THE LEAGUE COUNCIL HAS OPENED WHAT was to have been the most fateful meeting of its history. It still has a significance, but one that is far different from that envisioned a fortnight ago before the unexpectedly complete victory of Mussolini changed the whole focus of attention. Instead of a final showdown on the question of closing the Suez Canal to Italy, an action that should have been taken in October, the Council is concerned chiefly with keeping up the formalities of resistance to Italian aggression. Admission of the Ethiopian delegate to the Council table has caused the Italian delegation to withdraw from Geneva. Sanctions will apparently not be abandoned for the time being, though only because the small powers have made it difficult for Britain and France to support such action. No leadership has developed from any of the major powers for the type of positive measures which alone could preserve the principle of collective security. Formal non-recognition of Mussolini's fait accompli is bound to be ineffective, as Japan has so clearly shown in the case of Manchoukuo. This does not mean, however, that the League should write the whole affair off as a loss and turn its attention elsewhere. To do so would not only indorse Mussolini's triumph but would render further collective action impossible. Non-recognition of Manchoukuo has not checked Japanese aggression, and was not expected to do so, but it has forced Japan into a position of political and moral isolation which definitely limits its strength as a military power. The very fact that Japan has gone to such lengths to attempt to coerce China into recognizing Manchoukuo indicates that the weapon is not wholly meaningless. Italy is far more vulnerable than Japan, both economically and politically. Another six months of sanctions and the Italian people are bound to be restive under the enforced lowering of living standards. The League, if it will, can accelerate that process.

*

THE FLIGHT FROM THE FRANC HAS ALMOST overshadowed, for the moment, the more serious task of establishing a stable anti-fascist government in France. That the victory of the Front Populaire should provoke a serious financial crisis is scarcely surprising. Ever since the United States abandoned the gold standard it has been obvious that France would ultimately have to take similar action. Attempts to combat the competition of the cheap dollar and the cheap pound by rigorous deflationary measures have caused discontent and dissension at home but have not proceeded far enough to ease the overwhelming pressure on the French economy. Every political disturbance in the past three years has led to huge gold exports, on the theory that the next Cabinet might be the one to take the fateful step. This time devaluation appears inescapable despite M. Blum's statement that it is against Socialist policy. France has lost more than a quarter of its gold reserves in the past fourteen months. Further losses, while not fatal, would provoke additional deflation with its undesirable political and economic consequences. For years the left parties in France have been unable to rule, even when in the majority, because of the threat of a financial breakdown. This time the Front Populaire appears to be determined that the will of the people shall not be thwarted. Léon Blum, the Socialist leader and probably the next Premier, has served warning that the new government will not allow itself to be caught in the trap which brought the downfall of Labor in Great Britain and of the Social Democrats in Germany. While it will be impossible for him to proceed with a full Socialist program, he is ready to resort to extraordinary measures, if necessary, to prevent the bankers and industrialists from ruling France in defiance of the recent popular mandate.

THE CAUSES OF LAST YEAR'S MILK STRIKE IN Chicago are illumined by a recent report by the Federal Trade Commission. Two companies, Borden-Wieland and the Bowman Dairy Company distribute more than 49 per cent of the fluid milk sold in Chicago, and buy 68 per cent of all milk sold through the Pure Milk Association, the nominal representative of the producers. Thus they are able to fix not only the prices charged the consumer but also the price paid the producer. During the strike serious charges were made against the Pure Milk Association, many of which are substantiated by the official report. The contract under which the producers' price is established provides for payments based on two factors—production in 1929 and the price of cheese on the Wisconsin Exchange. Use of the first factor seriously penalizes producers who have increased their herds during the past seven years. Use of the second lends a purely fictitious air of fairness to the entire scheme because the price on the Wisconsin Exchange is not based on market conditions but is arbitrarily set by the large dairy and meat-packing companies. No farmers or producers are represented at the price-fixing meetings. Competition in the retail sale of milk has been discouraged by the monopolists in several interesting ways. The drivers' union is a tool of the big distributors. Membership is denied drivers for independent companies, and intimidation of owners of small stores by union drivers was demonstrated. Membership in the bottling exchange is also limited to the monopolists. Altogether, the trust is shown to have made a pretty thorough job of controlling the Chicago milk industry.

*

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN ITS quadrennial general conference has refused to be stampered into an anti-radical position as was demanded by powerful lay interests. Representatives of the reactionary elements in the church made no secret of the fact that they went to Columbus with the primary purpose of discrediting the Methodist Federation of Social Service—an independent organization under the leadership of Bishop McConnell and Dr. Harry F. Ward. To make certain that future pronouncements on social and economic policy would be conservative, they sought to have the conference appoint a formal commission to speak for the church in such matters. Bishop Leonard, spokesman for the conservative group, charged the liberals in the church with seeking to "substitute for our Democratic and Republican institutions a planned economy that is alien and godless." So far the reactionary element has been defeated at every point. The committee on the state of the church upheld the right of the federation to use the name "Methodist," since it is comprised of Methodists, and merely declared that such an organization had a moral obligation to make its unofficial relationship "clear at all times." The movement to establish an official commission to pass on social questions has apparently been killed in committee, and there is a possibility that the conference may yet adopt a resolution denouncing the un-Christian aspects of our economic order. The widespread support given a resolution favoring birth control indicates that the Methodists are definitely in advance of many of the other denominations. There can be little doubt that the younger ministers are beginning to recognize that the very existence of the church in coming years is dependent on its courage in facing the great problems of our day.

*

WITH THE PRESENT SESSION OF CONGRESS drawing to a close, it is evident that exceptional pressure will be necessary if the Wagner-Ellenbogen housing bill is to be adopted this year. Reports on its present status differ widely. A week ago President Roosevelt was cited as favoring passage by the present Congress. On another page of this issue our Washington correspondent reports that a new bill is to be introduced within a few days which will be heralded as possessing Administration support. While the details of this bill are not yet available, it is said to provide for an outlay of $75,000,000 during the next year for slum clearance. This is about one-half the amount appropriated under the Wagner-Ellenbogen bill. The arguments against any compromise seem to us overwhelming. Five years ago a leading housing authority estimated that less than half of the homes in the country measured up to a minimum standard of decent housing. Today the situation is admittedly much worse. New housing construction during the depression has not kept pace with the growth in population. Repairs have fallen behind, and the older houses have deteriorated even more rapidly than usual. Private construction of homes for working-class families is practically non-existent. The Wagner bill provides for only a small part of the new housing which is urgently needed, but it represents a beginning and it must not be allowed to languish for another year.

*

AT EIGHTY SIGMUND FREUD IS, OF ALL LIVING men, the one who has most profoundly influenced the thinking of his contemporaries. Even Einstein is not a close rival. The real significance of what Einstein has had to say is not accessible to any except highly trained mathematicians, while Freudianism, in however simplified or debased a form, has touched the imagination and to some extent influenced the thought of everyone in the Western world whose illiteracy is not absolute. Even the bitterest of his enemies could hardly deny the fact that his is one of the mightiest of heresies if not one of the mightiest of truths. If the whole of his system were to explode tomorrow, his influence would continue for centuries merely through the adoption into our language of his terminology and his metaphors—precisely as the influence of other exploded sciences, like alchemy and astrology and phrenology, has persisted. Not, of course, that there seems any present likelihood that it will be exploded. The main features of his method and the main outlines of his conception have been quietly assimilated by the medical schools and sanatoria which were looking askance at him not more than twenty years ago. One sometimes hears his doctrine referred to as passé, but that is only by persons who mean that the jargon at intellectual cocktail parties has changed.

THE NEW YORK LEGISLATURE HAS BEEN playing politics so busily of late that one wonders if it will ever have time to adjourn. Although Governor Lehman's social-security legislation was passed unanimously by the Senate, the Assembly has held it up in the Rules Committee while taking trial ballots that showed it would be defeated by three votes. The bill is designed to conform with the federal social-security legislation and would supply federal funds in the sum of fifteen to twenty million dollars a year to augment relatively small state appropriations for old-age pensions, dependent children, the crippled, and the blind. Refusal to pass the measure is evidently a partisan matter. So far only four Republicans are willing to be counted with the Democrats, who are solidly for the bill. The Republicans have thus maneuvered themselves between the devil and the deep sea. If they permit the bill to pass, they will seem to be yielding when a Democratic governor cracks the whip. If the bill is defeated, they will have difficulty explaining why to the voters next November. The Senate Judiciary Committee, which has been considering the child-labor amendment, was too smart to get itself into any such difficulty. The bill was killed in committee, the members promising not to reveal how the vote went. Thus the strong public support for ratification of the amendment which was evidenced in the hearings forced upon the committee against its will was answered by a refusal to present the bill to the Senate as a whole. Since the Judiciary Committee is composed of nine Democrats and five Republicans, the responsibility for defeating the amendment rests squarely on the reactionaries of both parties.

Who Owns States' Rights?

AS WE write there is a lull in the campaign. The Republicans are still maneuvering into various formations around each of their candidates, like an army rehearsing its drills for a battle that will never be won. The Democrats are gloating over the present swing toward Roosevelt, which seems strong enough to survive even the confusion over the tax bill and the pressure of the inflationists. The radical parties, as indicated by Earl Browder's speech before the Youth Congress, have given up their early dream of running a Farmer-Labor Presidential candidate. It is a good time to talk of issues.

The basic issue, of course, is and will continue to be unemployment. However much the campaign orators may seek to avoid it, nothing can qualify its central place in the campaign. All the immediate issues—relief, farm policy, spending, bureaucracy, constitutionalism, social insurance—flow from it or are connected with it. But there is another abiding issue that runs through all these, and that is bound to be given prominence in the campaign. That is the issue of states' rights and local government.

It was inevitable that the states'-rights issue should crop up just now, when an electoral campaign falls in a period of constitutional crisis. In every period of constitutional crisis—at the time of Marshall and Jefferson, in the nullification controversy under Jackson, at the time of the Dred Scott decision before the Civil War—the forces straining against the walls of the American governmental structure have expressed themselves in the controversy over states' rights and federal power. That the problem comes up again so violently is one of the darker signs of our time. Realistic students of government know that any constitutional crisis is merely the expression, in terms of formal legality, of deep-lying cleavages in the economic and social structure of the country. The Republicans, in their zeal for turning whatever comes to hand into campaign ammunition, have of course treated the whole matter as if it were a clear-cut issue of states' rights versus federal concentration. They have thus elevated it into the pure ether of campaign shibboleths, and away from realities. Some people may speak of federal usurpation or "the federal octopus" with a sense of righteous indignation. Others may refer to the outworn geographical boundaries of the states with a tone of blasting contempt. Which of these terms is chosen will depend not upon any superior wisdom or civic virtue but upon the speaker's politics.

We must be careful to distinguish between states' rights as a shibboleth and states' rights as a reality—between the phrase when it is used to conceal some vested interest operating behind the scenes and when it is used to express a genuine part of the American historical tradition. The Republican Party and the conservatives on the Supreme Court are now using it almost wholly in the first sense. And they have produced thereby a real confusion in the minds of the voters. Almost consistently up to the present crisis states' rights have been a weapon in the Democratic political armory. John Marshall, who fought the Democrats during his entire tenure on the Supreme Court, opposed states' rights bitterly. He was the first of the great justices of the court who have shown their skill in adapting their arguments to meet the needs of their economic vision and their political creed. In a series of decisions he limited the state power and expanded the national power, largely because the economic groups whose thought he represented feared the state legislatures but needed national legislation for their economic interests. The Democrats of the day, on the other hand, cried down the federal power and cried up states' rights. Today we have a direct reversal of this situation. The Republicans regard states' rights as their final Gibraltar, and the conservatives on the Supreme Court have gone back on Marshall despite the lip-service they pay to his fame: they turn their eyes with desperate devotion to the ikon of states' rights, while they are throttling the federal power in one decision after another. The Democrats, on the other hand, have conceived a sudden and untraditional love for the federal power.

It seems clear that on this front at least the Democrats have been completely outmaneuvered. They have allowed themselves to be put in the position of opposing states' rights—and have thereby lost the immense emotional support that the states'-rights doctrine would bring with it. We can understand, of course, how this has happened. As the incumbents of national office at a time of drastic crisis they have had the need for the extension of the national power brought home to them as never before. The progressive and radical groups also—because of their awareness of the problems of relief, child labor, lynching, and power control—have allowed themselves to be maneuvered into a seeming opposition to states' rights. But this is all unnecessary, unhistorical, and unwise.

The Republicans and the reactionaries among the Democrats are now acting as if they possessed a monopoly of the states'-rights sentiment as well as of some of the more material commodities and amenities in our life. Actually, who owns states' rights? This is an important question. For the doctrine is based on one of the strongest feelings in American life—the sense of localism, the love of neighborhood and the local unit, the roots that one sends down into the soil of one's home region, the sense of kinship with one's regional climate and one's regional way of life. But there is more than regional sentiment involved. Our state units started out by being the centers of democratic and radical thought. Under Daniel Shays, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, Andrew Jackson, under the Non-Partisan leagues and the Farmer-Labor leagues they have been the nuclei of populist and progressive sentiment. It was they who originally opposed the wealthy and propertied groups that established the Constitution, and it is they who have been skeptical of the politicians in Washington and the financiers in Wall Street. That is why it is amazing that we should allow a tradition of this sort to be appropriated by the reactionary elements.

The truth is that the statement of the issue—states' rights versus the federal power—is a false statement. What has actually been happening is that the sphere of governmental activities has been extended all along the line. The federal government, the state governments, the local units—all of them have been overwhelmed by the need for taking over functions that had previously been left to the anarchy of individual action. The division of power and responsibility among these units is not a matter to be argued about as a deathless principle or, in Justice Holmes's words, "some brooding omnipresence in the sky." It is a matter purely of economic necessity and administrative efficiency. There are some matters—for example, the control of agricultural production or the regulation of corporate securities—that can scarcely be dealt with except on a federal plane. There are others that can be left to the states, or divided between the state and federal governments. There are still others that can be dealt with most effectively by the local units. Moreover, even where the federal government is called on to exercise its power, the units of administration may well be state or regional.

All these are things that may well be left to plain sense, aided somewhat by administrative experts. The important thing is to recognize that when the federal government assumes its necessary responsibilities, that does not mean any encroachment on states' rights. The groups that are raising that issue care not a whit for states' rights, or for any other traditional American principle. They are concerned only about having business enterprise unfettered by governmental control of any sort.

Why the Frazier-Lemke Bill is Bad

BY the time these words are read, the House will have voted on the Frazier-Lemke bill and, unless the Administration obtains unexpected support, will have passed it. The fact that the bill was called up for vote was in itself a serious setback for the Roosevelt leadership in the House. For more than a year the Rules Committee has prevented the measure from coming on the floor, despite a favorable report by the Committee on Agriculture, only to lose in the closing days of Congress to a combination made up of the farm bloc, inflationists, reactionary Republicans who desired to embarrass the Administration, and progressive Democrats who hoped by combining with other malcontents to force a consideration of other suppressed proposals.

There has been scarcely any important measure up for vote in the House this year on which the public has so little real information as on the Frazier-Lemke bill. When it has been mentioned by the papers at all, there has been an attempt to give the impression that it was another half-baked proposal like the Townsend plan and the Silver Purchase Act. The Saturday Evening Post, for example, concludes an editorial on the bill by asking, "Why shouldn't the government do everything for everybody and do it free?" Statements of this type by a paper that has rarely, if ever, taken a progressive stand on any public issue are likely to lead thousands of persons who know nothing of the bill to conclude that it must possess considerable merit.

The Post rails particularly at the 11½ per cent interest rate at which it is proposed to refinance all farm mortgages, asking why everyone else should not have the advantage of equally low rates. A partial answer is that the farmer is more heavily burdened by indebtedness than any other important group in the population. According to the most recent available figures, somewhat more than 40 per cent of the farms in the United States are saddled with mortgages. The total value of all farms, including land, buildings, and improvements, was approximately $35,000,000,000 in 1935, which was only about 44 per cent of the 1920 valuation, while the total mortgage indebtedness is about $8,500,000,000 as compared with $7,900,000,000 in 1920. Total farm indebtedness, including short-term debts, is estimated at nearly $12,000,000,000. Despite some improvement in the last few years, the annual interest bill for farmers on all classes of debt is believed to be nearly $800,000,000, which is considerably more than 10 per cent of the farmers' total cash income. In the past five years, moreover, 13½ per cent of America's farm owners have lost their property through foreclosures or forced sales. Although there has been a sharp decrease in foreclosures in the past two years, the number still remains substantially above the pre-depression level. The Frazier-Lemke bill would not only greatly lighten the load of this indebtedness by refinancing existing farm mortgages at 11½ per cent interest, but would extend similar privileges to any farmer who has lost his farm through foreclosure.

since 1921, or to any tenant who desires to purchase an encumbered farm. This interest rate contrasts with the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent temporarily being charged by the Farm Credit Administration and the 4 to 5 per cent being charged by banks and insurance companies.

Such a reduction, if it were practicable, would be highly desirable. But unfortunately not even the government can float long-term bonds at $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest. To make up the difference out of the Treasury would involve a huge appropriation. So the proponents of the bill fall back on the old panacea—they would print the money. Recognizing that an avowed printing-press inflation might be unpopular with those who did not receive direct assistance under the plan, the framers of the measure have camouflaged it slightly. Instead of issuing fiat money directly to the present mortgage holders (insurance companies, banks, private individuals, and the federal land banks) the bill provides that the farm-loan bonds shall be presented to the Federal Reserve Board, which shall deliver to the Land Bank Commissioner "Federal Reserve notes to an amount equal to the par value" of the bonds, and that such bonds may be held as security "in lieu of any other security or reserve." A limit of \$3,000,000,000 is set on the amount of greenbacks which can be issued, but as this is only a fraction of the existing farm indebtedness we may assume that this restriction could not be maintained if the measure were passed.

For the inflationary feature of the bill there can be no defense. A further reduction in the burden of farm indebtedness is doubtless desirable, but any measure for achieving this should stand on its own feet. It should be the first rule of financial policy that every subsidy should be balanced by direct taxation. Inflation is the most insidious type of indirect taxation. A certain amount of inflation may have been advantageous in 1933, but at the present time, when we have close to $2,700,000,000 in excess bank reserves, a measure of this type would set off a boom for which no adequate check exists. It is possible to deal with the problem of agricultural mortgages without thus courting disaster.

Academic Freedom at City College

THE long history of repression of academic freedom and student liberties at the College of the City of New York has come to a climax with the case of Morris U. Schappes, a tutor in the English Department who has been advised by Professor Charles F. Horne, his department head, that he will not be recommended for reappointment. Mr. Schappes is one of the outstanding younger men on the teaching staff. The best student in English literature at C. C. N. Y. during his undergraduate days, he later obtained a master's degree with honor at Columbia, and subsequently became a frequent contributor to learned periodicals and literary magazines. Less than a year ago the late Professor Harry Krowl, at that time head of the English Department, told him in the presence of witnesses that he was a "good teacher." The senior class in the college recently voted Mr. Schappes the most respected member of the teaching staff. Kenneth Ackley, registrar, says of him: "He is generally recognized as outstanding in his department not only as a scholar but also as a classroom teacher. During registration it is very difficult for the office to prevent Mr. Schappes's sections from going beyond the reasonable classroom limits." This is the man to whom Professor Horne wrote as follows: "A tutorship is, as you know, only a temporary appointment, and your efficiency as a teacher of English has not been sufficiently notable to justify me in asking your appointment as a permanent member of the college staff." It is interesting to note that Mr. Schappes's "temporary" appointment lasted six years.

The real reason for Professor Horne's action is indicated in another paragraph of his letter, which says: "I have been somewhat in doubt as to how to make this clear to you, being unwilling that you should connect this matter with your political beliefs. . . . I have been told that you are a member of the Communist Party, but . . . I do not care. So long as anyone is a satisfactory teacher of English, I shall accept his social creed with complete tolerance." Although Mr. Schappes's party affiliations have never been established, his beliefs are as much a matter of public record as his high academic standing. He is one of the few men at C. C. N. Y. who have dared to take the Marxist position in the interpretation of culture, and he has made no secret of his views. He was one of the founders of the Anti-Fascist Association and a charter member of the Teachers' Union local. Moreover, he was active in the organization of the Instructional Staff Association, formed to protect members of the teaching staff below the professorial rank from President Robinson's well-known system of "getting Ph.D.'s to work for him at bargain prices." On the day Professor Horne's letter was written, Mr. Schappes addressed this year's student peace demonstration.

As a final fascist stroke on the part of President Robinson, the members of the English Department have been advised that they cannot expect promotion if they protest the threat to Mr. Schappes. A petition has been circulated with Professor Horne's approval stating that the signers affirm Professor Horne's authority as head of the English Department. But there has been vigorous student protest, and not without result. The Board of Higher Education on May 1 gave out a statement, in behalf of the board and President Robinson, which declared that although "some recommendations for the non-retention of certain members of the instruction staff of City College" had been made by department heads, no action had yet been taken, no one had been dismissed, and each case would be given full consideration. This at least provides a respite to what appeared to be the beginning of a campaign of intimidation. But the Board of Higher Education should be urged one step farther. "Full consideration" of recommended dismissals should mean public hearings with witnesses on both sides. And charges of incompetence should be made within a reasonable time after appointment—six years is not a reasonable time. With these safeguards teachers in general and Mr. Schappes in particular need not complain.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Representative Ellenbogen

Planning Future Slums

Washington, May 10

THE old double cross is being trundled out, greased up, and made ready for action against the Wagner-Ellenbogen low-cost-housing bill. A rival measure is being rushed to completion by Jesse Jones, master of the RFC's millions and several mortgage companies, with the enthusiastic aid of the FHA. Present plans call for its introduction in the House within a week; it is to be ballyhooed as an Administration measure. Concurrently the Wagner-Ellenbogen bill is to be attacked as a creature of the cities, a bill written for the sole benefit of New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Cleveland, and Detroit. All that stands in the way of those plans is the President, and it is at least an even-money bet that he will approve them, for he obviously has no enthusiasm for any bona fide housing program. He is impressed with the fact that such a program cannot be achieved without a lavish outlay of federal funds and without severe damage to the private real-estate-mortgage structure of the country. He seeks only something that bears the "low-cost housing" title to which he may point in campaign speeches.

His attitude has been clear for more than a year, though he has never in that time put it frankly into words. It was made clear when Ickes publicly asserted that low-cost-housing projects were impossible unless the taxpayers paid part of the tenants' rent through public subsidies. The oil magnate then at the FHA's helm immediately engaged Ickes in deadly combat, shouting that what the Secretary of the Interior proposed would "knock the packing out of the mortgage structure." Roosevelt ended the battle in which both sides were right by issuing an order from Warm Springs that the combatants unite in a denial that there was any conflict in their views. Subsequently, under the present work-relief program, he swung around to the Ickes point of view, but quickly curbed the resulting housing operations when he discovered they did not make good relief projects. In the interim, under prodding at press conferences, he has talked many times of housing but always in noncommittal fashion. He alternates between two different speeches on these occasions, and the results are always the same.

In the past week he has used both speeches. One is to the effect that he and his housing consultants have reached substantial agreement as to objectives and hope soon to reach agreement as to details. The other is about how difficult it is to get housing costs down within the reach of the lowest-income groups and how that achievement probably will have to wait upon the development of an industry turning out pre-fabricated houses just as cheap automobiles now are produced. He used the first speech at his Tuesday-afternoon press conference to describe the results of his latest conference on the Wagner-Ellenbogen bill, which, he said, would be pressed at this session but was not to be regarded as "must" legislation. He used the second speech at his Friday-morning press conference, and for quite a different purpose. Those backers of the Wagner bill who were outraged by his references to factory-built houses—and there were many who thought them deliberate sabotage—took him too seriously. The President merely dragged out the old speech in an effort to dull the effects of a story published in the Baltimore Sun that morning. The story, written by J. Fred Essary, presented Roosevelt in a light quite different from that in which he stands to receive the adulation and the votes of the wage-earners on whom he depends for reelection. It told how the President was laboring behind the scenes to make peace with the giants of industry and finance who are supposed to be his antagonists. It recounted some of his efforts to reestablish his lines of communication with the nation's economic overlords, so that they may rally their brethren to his support and tap their tills for his campaign funds. It called attention to such recent daytime visitors at the White House as Walter Chrysler, Owen D. Young, and William L. Clayton, ex-Liberty Leaguer, and it went on to tell how men of similar caliber are slipping into the White House for long and secret talks with the President at night. In the latter class of visitors it placed Myron Taylor of United States Steel and Walter Teagle of Standard Oil.

At the conference the President dragged out another set speech, the one he uses whenever pressed for information on what he plans to do about the unemployment problem. He says on those occasions that he is going to put the problem up to a number of big industrialists. He contrives to leave the impression that he knows they have no answer and that, when they have confessed their lack, he is going to pull an ace out of his sleeve and solve the problem by governmental action. The recent visits to the White House, secret or open, of Messrs. Taylor, Teagle, Clayton, Young, et al., were just some more conferences on the unemployment problem, Roosevelt informed his questioners, and most of them printed the thing just that way. It is easy to keep a straight face in print.

Against such a background of flim-flammetry it is at least conceivable that the President would countenance some such dodge as the Jesse Jones gang are contriving for sidetracking the Wagner-Ellenbogen bill. It apparently is to be another one of those stimulus-to-private-building measures, involving a liberalization of the FHA easy-mortgage plan. Quaintly enough, while Roosevelt talks from the White House about the present impossibility of getting the cost of a decent house down to $2,500, the FHA a few blocks away keeps on issuing claims that its financing facilities are making just such houses available at $1,200. They are, of course, pleasantly painted cheese-boxes, and though the government-insured mortgages on them are to run twenty years, the houses themselves are good for only about five. Put a hundred of them together this year and by 1941 you'll have a slum. Or as the head of the FHA said at a recent meeting of the Administration's Central Housing Committee, "Will they last twenty years? Hell, no. You could turn the hose on any of them and wash them into the creek."

The fact that these monuments to the New Deal are being built with cheap, non-union labor, working in many cases for $2 to $3 a day, offers the country better assurance that the proposed double cross won't work than does the presence of a Roosevelt in the White House. There is an active, aggressive labor lobby behind the Wagner-Ellenbogen bill, and it will meet any attempt to substitute another FHA confection for that bill with a blow straight to the solar plexus of the jerry-builders behind it. They will threaten it with an amendment requiring that all construction under FHA-insured mortgages be done at union wage rates.

Labor and Social Security

EMIL RIEVE, who is president of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers and should be head of the United Textile Workers, has been picked as labor's member of the United States delegation to the International Labor Office meeting next month. As yet the appointment has not been made public, but it probably will be announced by the White House in a day or two, along with the full list of the delegation which is to sail May 20 under the leadership of John G. Winant, chairman of the Social Security Board. Frieda Miller of the New York State Department of Labor also is to be a government member.

Rieve's appointment would seem to be a credit to both the Administration and the A. F. of L., which sponsored it; ordinarily such berths are reserved for labor skates seeking a vacation at public expense and getting it because the federation's potentates are politically indebted to them. However, in this case the credit item needs a little qualification. Rieve did not get the job because he will fill it well. He got it for two other reasons. One was that the White House rebelled against adding another Republican to the list of labor delegates who have received its accolade and a travel allowance. The other reason was that Green and the other A. F. of L. leaders thought that by offering the post to Rieve they might lure him away from the C. I. O. Coefield of the plumbers and Ornburn of the tobacco workers, both Republicans, were the federation's initial nominees.

Incidentally, it is not entirely clear why Winant must be kept trekking to Geneva on errands of this kind. The Social Security Board cannot well spare him. It might be argued, of course, that the board's affairs can safely be intrusted for a month or two to A. J. Altmeyer and Frank Bane. But Winant as chairman must confirm their actions, and this otherwise quite admirable gentleman has one of those Fletcherizing intellects that require him to mull over every topic from every possible angle before reaching a decision. His normal inability to reach a decision on anything in less than a couple of months—some say ten—makes even a brief absence from his board duties regrettable. It might be noted in passing that the board, charged with enforcing a vague, fault-ridden, and labyrinthine law, is faced with a multiplicity of administrative-policy questions, some of which present grave problems in bureaucratic strategy. Among them is the problem of how to detach the United States Employment Service from the Department of Labor and attach it to the board, where it certainly belongs if this country is ever to have a decent unemployment-compensation system. At last report both W. Frank Persons, director of the Employment Service, and Secretary Perkins were determined that this realignment should not come to pass, although Miss Perkins, before she lost control of the social-security machine, had proclaimed her belief in the essential affinity between it and the public employment offices.

The Winant board also is being sweated by its efforts to keep state social-security legislation within the bounds of ordinary decency. It has agents scurrying all over the country on such missions. What keeps them on the hop is the effort of chambers of commerce and similar employer organizations to take advantage of the federal act's loopholes and slip through state legislatures old-age-pension and unemployment-compensation laws that are a little worse than nothing at all. These slippery efforts are not confined to local interests. Some of the national business interests are behind them. The man who keeps the board's combat troops working night and day is employed by Standard Oil to see that the various state legislatures pass social legislation to its taste. Members of the board's staff in charge of such things can hardly sleep at night for wondering where this gentleman will turn up next. Bad as they are, some of the social-insurance laws recently enacted by the states would have been much worse had the board's combat troops arrived too late.

Waiting for Lewis

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

Canonsburg, Pennsylvania.

THE forces of evil are closing in on Mike Tighe. His tight little refuge, the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, is slowly collapsing; it must eventually float down the broad river of industrial unionism to a sea of mass organization. The sixty-first convention of the union met in Canonsburg on April 28. A few days later the rank and file forced open its tightly closed doors to John Brophy of the United Mine Workers, and Mr. Brophy, against the will of the Amalgamated officials, explained to the delegates the offer of the C. I. O. (Committee for Industrial Organization) to contribute $500,000 for the organization of the steel industry, provided the campaign is along industrial lines and its leadership is such as to inspire confidence of success. After that a committee was appointed to study the proposal. The convention is temporarily not in session; the committee has gone to Washington to confer with President Green of the A. F. of L. and his executive council. The executive council will do what it can to save its craft-union skin. But it is difficult to see how the surge toward industrial unionism can be stopped.

In the country town of Canonsburg one is conscious of great issues being decided. Organize the steel industry and the whole course of labor history will be changed. From the beginning the tides of industrial unionism were rolling to the very doors of the convention, though Tighe and his lieutenants had taken every precaution to avoid the flood. The Amalgamated convention was held in Pittsburgh last year; it was removed this year to the safer conservative ground of Canonsburg, on the outskirts of Pittsburgh, where the union has one of its few strong locals. There is no decent hotel; the town is out of the beaten path of newspaper reporters. In contrast to the wide-open convention, 1,700 strong, of the United Mine Workers in Washington, the doors of the Canonsburg hall, where less than 100 steel delegates met, were ostentatiously locked and guarded by a doorman who looked dangerously like a bouncer. The threat of expulsion was held over the head of any delegate who revealed any of the proceedings. There were no accommodations for the press. At the close of the sessions we gathered along an iron railing before the hall. Between times we leaned against the telephone poles of Canonsburg's main street.

It was no accident that the most interesting people were outside; some of the future leaders of American labor took part in the telephone-pole caucuses. John Brophy of the C. I. O. came the first day and went away again; Charles Zimmerman of the International Garment Workers' Union, Ferdinand Bindel of the Federation of Flat Glass Workers, and James Carey of the United Electrical and Radio Workers, the latter two being "NRA unions" which have made and held phenomenal gains, were in and out of the town. Clarence Irwin, outstanding figure in the rank-and-file leadership in steel, was busier than Mike Tighe. They are a vigorous, experienced, confident group, radiating a sense of power that flows directly from the C. I. O. and its strong component groups.

An ancient buggy goes down the sunny street and in chorus it is named the Amalgamated. A reporter admits his Newspaper Guild unit has not tried to get a contract, and Ferd Bindel, wiry, young, intelligent, gives him an earnest lecture on solidarity. As adjournment approaches, the crowd moves toward the hall. As we sit on the iron railing a steel worker just out of the mill comes to see what his union convention is doing. He is covered from head to foot with dark glistening steel dust. His face is shadowed with it; his shiny tin lunch bucket is the high light in this living portrait of a steel worker. At the same time a newcomer approaches. He is an old man of huge frame but feeble in his steps. He peers with apparent effort through horn-rimmed spectacles, and his hat is planted firmly over them to keep out as much light as possible. He carries a battered suitcase and an overcoat. He goes to the bolted door and knocks. After a few words with the doorman and a fumbling of papers, he turns back and the door is locked once more. Mere members are not admitted. He joins the group and immediately gets into an argument with the steel worker, who has just delivered a little speech on one big union. It is a good speech. "When a war breaks out," he says, "the whole country's in it. Florida's in it and so is Washington—that's 4,000 miles away. It's the same thing with a union. We've got to have one big union." The Old Guard protests; he points a long and aged finger. "That's wrong," he says with moral fervor. "Unions are bad when they get too big." There are hoots from the audience on the railing, but he continues. "Why, even the United States Steel has found out that it's a bad thing to get too big." "I suppose," comes somebody's answer, "that's why U. S. Steel keeps buying new properties." The Old Guard is beaten and moves off in disgust.

As usual, there was no news from the inside except what was bootlegged. There had been a test vote on a move to invite a member of the C. I. O. to come and address the delegates. The vote had been forty-two to forty-three, with seven officials voting no. The tide was setting in. On Friday morning a delegation from the convention of the State Federation of Labor in session at Uniontown arrived at Canonsburg carrying fraternal greetings to the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers. By a strange coincidence the delegation included John Brophy of the United Mine Workers and Pat Fagan of the same organization. Tighe did his best to keep out these agents of Lewis bearing gifts. When the first messenger came to announce that the delegation waited outside, Mr. Tighe said that the convention could not interrupt its pressing business. When the second messenger came, the chair, under strong pressure from the floor, was forced to accept the greetings of the State Federation. Mr. Brophy no doubt delivered them in proper form. He also explained to the delegates the offer of the C. I. O.

Tighe himself will probably retire gracefully. There is nothing sinister about Michael Tighe. He is a pleasant old fellow of seventy-eight, proud of his horse-and-buggy virtues, distrustful of "reds." I talked to him after the second day's session. He was ruddy and cheerful in spite of a recent protracted illness. He told me proudly that the Amalgamated had 12,000 members—another estimate is 7,000; when I asked how about the other hundreds of thousands who work in steel, he answered in fatherly tones: "You can lead a horse to water, but you can't make him drink." But he preferred to talk of other things. He told me of his wife, "the sweetest little German-descent woman" who weighs less than a hundred pounds and doesn't like the way the newspapers talk about Mr. Tighe's age. He seemed to be revealing what he thought was the secret of his success when he asserted that he doesn't drink alcohol, use tobacco in any form, or run after fast women. I withdrew quietly after that. Mike Tighe is better left to his memories. He obviously has no regrets.

His official family, headed by Louis ("Shorty") Leonard, is another matter. They are neither sentimental nor old. They will fight to the last ditch.

Three years ago the Tighe stronghold was threatened by the forces that must now overwhelm it. Under the impetus of Section 7-a membership in the Amalgamated rose to 100,000. But Section 7-a went down under the concerted pressure of the Weirs, the Joneses and Laughlins, and United States Steel. And this collapse, combined with a militant lack of support and an open attack on the rank-and-file groups by the Amalgamated itself, soon reduced the lodges to a pathetic impotence. Today Mr. Tighe is proud of his 12,000 members. But the Weirton lodge, where 8,777 out of 11,000 workers were members, did not even send a delegate to Canonsburg; the delegate from Aliquippa, Albert Attalah, who has kept that lodge alive against tremendous odds of discrimination and espionage, instead of being rewarded for his fight was admitted only over the strong resistance of the Old Guard. Today in the beleaguered steel towns the bitterness against "the company" is almost matched by the hatred of the union officialdom which has run out on lodge after lodge and left the most active members to the stool-pigeons and the bosses. Most of these local leaders have been fired; some of them have sold out or turned defeatist. The Amalgamated has much to answer for in somber company towns where company houses and banks and stores are painted with company smoke, and the light of trade unionism flared brightly for the first time in 1933.

What that light meant to thousands in steel can scarcely be exaggerated. The exploits of 1933 and 1934—the meetings, the parades, the strikes, the minor victories over the company, the little bursts of public freedom—these are legends fondly rehearsed and dwelt upon. The significance of that brief interlude of union strength is perhaps best indicated by the reiterated assurance in town after town that in spite of the NRA fiasco, the terrorism of the companies, and the desertion of the Amalgamated, a bona fide campaign with guaranteed support will sweep the industry. The workers are extremely wary. They have learned much since 1933. They will have nothing to do with a movement dominated by Tighe; over and over again that point was driven home. They know the power of the company over courts and judges charged with enforcing the best-intentioned laws. The only agency they look to with hope is the Committee for Industrial Organization.

One descends into Weirton, West Virginia, as into some desolate lower region, through a series of ravines. The first sign of the town is a row of stacks, some of them pouring out smoke reddened by melting iron ore. At the last turn in the road the town is revealed lying in a final depth and spreading up two steep hills. "The mill" is the thing. It covers a large area, and two strands of barbed wire top its high fence. It is an impressive symbol of industrial power. From this central point the town goes out in rows of drab houses, most of them built to a single pattern not bad in itself but monotonous in its endless repetition. Away from the main streets the roads are unpaved.

In one of the houses I learned from a steel worker what life is like in a company town, and of the tempering fires that are welding fighters for a strong union. Weirton has 27,000 inhabitants but no local government. Weirton is run by the county, which is in turn run by the company. For the most part the company does not own the houses in Weirton, that is, not directly. A few years ago, just before the bottom dropped out of the real-estate market, in a burst of magnanimity it offered its workers bargains in houses. Prices for the seven- or eight-room dwellings ranged as high as $8,000. Many a worker used his savings to make a payment of $1,000 or $2,000. The remaining debt he assumed in the form of a mortgage held by one of the local banks. The relation of the company to the banks of Weirton can easily be surmised, even though one of them is named the People's Bank. Some of the houses changed hands as many as ten times, to the benefit of no one but the mortgage holder. The rent for one of these houses set in a desolate town in the wilds of West Virginia is $45 or $55 a month. The occupant must furnish his own heat; he must also pay as much as $25 a year for water; he must also do his own papering and painting.

As for the atmosphere in which the steel worker and his family live, it is a sinister mixture of company smoke and espionage. Half a dozen times during that afternoon, whenever there was a knock at the door, there came a sign to lower voices or talk of something general. The people next door are company people; sometimes one finds that one has rented the upstairs rooms to company people who can't be turned out as long as they pay their rent "steady." The necessity to be on guard against "the rat" even in one's home—that is a force that works continuously in Weirton.

The wage for common labor in Weirton begins at $3.20 a day. The rate for highly skilled workers is much higher, but their average earnings are not high and their numbers are limited. During the strike of 1933 "whoopies" from the West Virginia hills were imported to break it. When they lined up at the company employment office, "you'd a thought there was a squirrel hunt." Now that the union is dead the "whoopies" are losing their jobs, and the old skilled men are being taken back. Meanwhile technological improvement is taking a heavy toll.

The control of the company over local politics need hardly be emphasized. This year a rank-and-file man was running for constable. In his honor the company ruled that there was to be no campaigning in the mill, but not long afterward a company candidate was allowed to go through unhampered. "The best way," said the steel worker in Weirton, "is to see which one they want you to vote for and then vote for the one that's running against him." The labels of Democrat and Republican of course mean nothing. The press? In 1933, according to the proud story, the union cut down the circulation of the Weirton News 80 per cent and kept out the advertising of the independent stores. The News has never quite recovered. It is such triumphs as these, never forgotten, that keep the union spirit alive. "The labor spirit is strong," said the man in Weirton. "Mike Tighe couldn't get nowhere if he brought in $2,000,000, but they'll go with the C. I. O."

The Aliquippa fortress of Jones and Laughlin lies a few miles down the Ohio from Pittsburgh. It extends for three miles along the river and behind its massive barrier lies the blackened town. Aliquippa is a "planned" community—its sections are still called by the numbers given them when the place was laid out. For instance, the superintendents and other officials live in Plan 6. Plan 12 is occupied by mere workers. The highest hill is called McDonald Heights, a dreary unpaved district of company houses. Nevertheless, McDonald Heights is a restricted residential section; no Negroes are allowed there. They live instead in the lower "plans," which are equally unpaved, equally desolate.

Stool-pigeons are rife in Aliquippa. Suspicion is in the very air. Again and again they were pointed out with a dropping of voices and a significant glance. "There's one. He turned after twenty years. His wife left him. She said she wouldn't live with no rat." A silent but open warfare goes on between union men and the stools. They know one another; they have lived in the same small town for ten, fifteen, twenty years. As one of the company men put it to an organizer, "You're here to organize; I'm here to disorganize." In times of stress espionage grows more subtle.

Jones and Laughlin has been one of the National Labor Relations Board's most recalcitrant clients. The victims are workers whose only crime is the determination to live decently. Take Domenic Brandy, Italian. He worked twenty-five years for Jones and Laughlin, and then was fired for not washing coal right! Domenic's name is on the list of World War veterans on the front of the Aliquippa post office. Domenic can't quite believe he's out. Angelo Volpe is an Italian known for his gaiety. He was an officer of the union in Aliquippa. First he was fired from the mill. Then he was fired from his WPA job. His wife and daughter are sick. As for Albert Attalah, president of the lodge, he hasn't worked since September. He hasn't exactly been fired. He stopped work in September because of a severe illness. His case is being "investigated."

In Aliquippa the Amalgamated at least still has an office. At the height of the "movement," as they call it almost with religious fervor, the lodge had 6,200 members. Its officers and members, left high and dry by the Amalgamated, have been fired or discriminated against or intimidated. But persecution has only made more clear the need for complete unionization; and the great days of 1934 when Aliquippa was "opened" for the first time gave them a taste of independence and cooperation they cannot forget.

At Homestead, one link in the long chain of United States Steel forts that line the Monongahela for miles, it is the same story. The lodge that was formed there, "The Spirit of 1892," is disbanded. The new fight will be tough because, as one man put it, "this is a community of scabs whose ancestors were scabs imported by Frick." But the sons of scabs are learning—while the sons of the strikers of 1892 cherish their memory. Even in the company union the men are doing their bit. I heard that one of them in a speech at the annual conference had dared to speak of the increase in earnings. "Gentlemen," he said, "I mean corporation earnings, for whoever heard of a laborer's earnings? Incidentally, I averaged not over $50 per month in the year 1935." He went on to recite the earnings of some of the corporations during the same period—to the intense discomfort of the company representatives.

The steel workers are voting for Roosevelt, despite the failure of 7-a—for that they blame the Supreme Court and the companies. And in many cases the shift to the Democratic rolls represents a significant rebellion. In one steel town the workers had for years been automatically registered by the company as Republicans. To register Democratic meant an extra effort, since they had to do it themselves, and a genuine revolt since it was anti-company. One of the curious results was the discovery that many of them were not full citizens and therefore not entitled to vote. Many a veteran steel worker, proud of his Americanism, was deeply hurt to find after fifteen or twenty years of voting Republican that he was not a citizen.

Though Roosevelt will get the vote this year, talk of a Farmer-Labor Party is met with in every town—but in local terms and usually as something which must wait on industrial organization. At Weirton one intelligent worker was obviously speaking out of his union experience of 1933 and 1934. "There shouldn't be a third party this year," he said. "We've got to wait till we can put up a real fight." At Canonsburg Ferd Bindel said that to go into politics now would be to "burn our candle at both ends."

The steel towns around Pittsburgh are waiting for Lewis. Albert Attalah, for one, will go back from the convention to the dismal streets of Aliquippa full of an overpowering hope. "Next year," he told me, "or the year after, that convention will be so big three halls won't hold it!"

AGAINST WAR AND FASCISM

A Selection of Drawings from the International Exhibition Arranged by the American Artists' Congress

Behind the News by Hugo Gellert, American

Prisoner by Käthe Kollwitz, German

Exodus from Dixie by Robert Minor, American

On the Way! by George Grosz, American

Death's Head by José Posada, Mexican

L'EGLISE

The Church by Frans Masereel, Belgian

Mr. Lunkhead the Banker

BY JAMES T. FARRELL

I RECENTLY met Mr. Lunkhead, the banker. He comes from one of the best banking families in the state of New York. And there is one achievement in his life of which he is proud. It is the great victory of his career. He tells you of it with a voice that oozes self-satisfaction. He says to you that you do not know how old he is. You guess, and say, oh, thirty-eight, forty, forty-two. He smiles, shakes his head negatively, and then he tells you that he is fifty-six. In other words, the one accomplishment in Mr. Lunkhead's life is that he has reached the age of fifty-six without looking his age. There is no gray on his large head. There are few lines in his face. There are no marks of profound or bitter experience. It is a well-preserved face, pickled by good living and moderation. He can enter a room full of people, standing straight and erect, and smile quietly to himself with the realization that they do not know how old he is, and when he tells them, they will express amazement, and he can then tell them how he has managed to attain fifty-six years of life without looking his age.

For there is a philosophy behind Mr. Lunkhead's remarkable achievement. He expresses it for one concisely and with simplicity. You are as young as you feel you are. You are as youthful as you think you are. And you must take all things in moderation, and never do too much of anything.

There is another interesting feature to the personality of Mr. Lunkhead. He does not put upon one the burden of conversation. He is perfectly willing to talk, and to allow you to listen. All that you have to do is to prod him with a question now and then. Thus, you can ask him, "Mr. Lunkhead, what departments of human culture are you interested in?" He will tell you. He will say, well, he likes to read books. Yes, he says, he reads six or a dozen books a year. He reads them all in June. Why June? That requires explanation, but Mr. Lunkhead possesses a great willingness to explain so long as he is explaining about himself. In June he goes on his vacation to Montana. He roughs it in the morning. After lunch he lies down and he sleeps and reads, and he manages to read six or a dozen books. Only these last two years he has had great difficulty in reading that many books in June on his vacation. You ask him why? Well, he brought along a radio on his vacation these last two years. And the only time he has a chance to listen to his radio is in the afternoon, because he roughs it in the morning, and he looks at the stars and listens to cowboy songs in the evening. And so the radio interferes with the six books a year that he reads in the month of June in Montana, where he goes to vacation and rough it. Because, you know, he will tell you, he likes to get Tokyo and Berlin and South America on the radio, and he gets a real kick out of that, and so it is harder these last years for him to read six books a year than it used to be before he took a radio along, when in the month of June he goes to Montana to have a vacation. And then you ask him what books he reads? Well, he reads whatever books his friends say are good. He always waits until his friends say they have read such and such a book, and then he waits until the next June, and then when he goes to Montana, because you know he likes to rough it and have a vacation away from the city, why he reads the book, if the radio does not interfere with his reading, and if the book is good, why then, when that friend says that another book is good, he waits until next June, and he buys it, and when he goes to Montana, why then he reads that book if the radio does not interfere with his reading when he lies down in the afternoon.

Mr. Lunkhead is what is called a he-man. He likes he-man hobbies, and he-man sports, and he looks like a he-man. So he likes to ask a question. What are your hobbies? He is actually not interested in your hobbies. The question merely permits him to tell you of his hobbies. And he has one favorite hobby. He says, well, and then he pauses, and there is a very slight noise in his throat, well, his favorite hobby is old clothes. He likes to wear old clothes. You tell him that old clothes are your favorite necessity, and he says, yes, it is great fun to get out into the open and to put on old clothes and be natural.

He has a philosophical bent, and so he likes to ask questions like what makes a person tick. He will, say, see an attractive young woman, and he will say to her that he wonders what makes her tick. He smiles condescendingly at her, he tells her that he is fifty-six years of age, and that the secret of his success in not looking his years is that he does everything in moderation, and that a person is as young as he looks and as youthful as he thinks he is, and if he never does anything to excess, why there is no reason that he should not reach the age of fifty-six without looking it. And so he wonders what makes a young girl tick.

And then one might ask him what he does all day when he is not in Montana wearing old clothes. And he will say, well, he got up in the morning and he ate breakfast and he looked at the newspaper. And then he came in from Long Island in a motor boat. And he went to his office. And he had a pile of mail on his desk. But he did not read it. "But why, Mr. Lunkhead, didn't you read your mail?" Well, he has a theory about not reading your mail in the morning. There might be some bad news in it, and bad news can always wait a day or two. So he only reads his mail after it is two or three days old, because then, one may assume, the bad news will not be quite so bad. And then he had conferences. There were perhaps some people who wanted his bank to sink some money in the purchase of a golf course. Well, that did not seem a good investment, so he was thumbs down on that. And there were some more conferences. And there was lunch. He had lunch in his office, just a sandwich, because he believes in moderation, he says. And then there was another conference. And a friend called him up. He knew what the friend wanted. He wanted to borrow some money. So he invited the friend and the friend's wife to supper. And then he had an engagement for tea with a charming young lady, and they talked about the philosophy of life, which undoubtedly meant old clothes, moderation, and how to become fifty-six years old without looking your age. And then he had supper with the friend, and since the friend's wife was along, the friend was too sensitive to try and borrow some money. And so another day passed into eternity, and Mr. Lunkhead, the banker, traveled on from the age of fifty-six to the age of fifty-seven without looking his years.

Can Italy Make Peace with Europe?

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Rome, April 24

ALTHOUGH Italy is winning the Abyssinian war, the future is shrouded in uncertainty. Defeat would have been disastrous. But victory raises problems no less fateful. When the last Abyssinian town is taken, only the first stage will have ended. Then another and perhaps bigger show begins.

Italians are at once very confident and somewhat nervous. The unexpectedly rapid advance of their East African armies has exhilarated them. The rise in living costs resulting from sanctions is partially offset by increased employment. It hardly affects the bourgeoisie, and is borne in silence, except for occasional murmurs of unrest in Spezia, Milan, Turin, and Genoa, by the masses, to whom two shots of propaganda in the arm seem to be worth another hole in the belt. This is not the situation that need worry Mussolini at present. The chief difficulty lies in the field of foreign affairs. But the war has also brought to a head the question of the internal structure of the Fascist regime.

It may be more complicated for Italy to make peace than it has been to make war. If Mussolini carries out his original intention to crown a puppet emperor in Abyssinia, will this new King of Kings obtain international recognition? What will the League of Nations say? To accept Rome's appointee means to bless Italian aggression. Certain Italians, therefore, contemplate an Italian mandate for Abyssinia. But can one member of the League become the mandated territory, that is, in effect, the colony of another? Or did Geneva's Committee of Five in the summer of 1935 envisage foreign control over Ethiopia?

This is the formal side. What Italians really fear is that England has a far-flung plan to weaken them in Europe and rob them of their spoils in Africa. They do not take seriously the prospect of closing the Suez Canal. "We will march out through the Sudan and Egypt," one Fascist said to me lightly. But they talk so much about "empires come and empires go and now Britain's day is done," of India's sympathy for Italy, and of the Italian threat to England's Mediterranean position that they have not only convinced themselves; they think the British government is also convinced and has decided to take up the challenge. While the statements of responsible officials are either significantly pacifist or strikingly non-committal, other Italians seek to fit the little British loan to Abyssinia, Mr. Eden's insistence on the continuance of existing sanctions, the sentiment in England for further sanctions, and certain acts of British diplomacy into their idea of the looming struggle between two empires, one already decadent, the other a reincarnation, though still in swaddling clothes, of ancient Rome.

"What has Sir Austen Chamberlain been doing in Vienna and Prague?" some Italians ask in this connection. The Italian government has made diplomatic inquiries. No doubt the visit was private, and Sir Austen is too moderate and wise to do anything. He may merely have been ascertaining what might be done by others. A few things are clear: in Vienna and even more in Prague there is a desire for closer relations with Great Britain. Prague, in addition, wants closer relations with Vienna. Both these objects could best be achieved by making the Austrian government more democratic. A broadening of the popular base of the Austrian state would give it the power to resist German fascism and be independent of Italian fascism. In the summer of 1933 the Czechs had practically arranged with Dollfuss to do this by coopting the right Socialists, but when the little Chancellor saw Mussolini in Riccione in August he changed his mind. The February, 1934, bombardment of the Vienna Socialists, which was provoked, it is said, by Mussolini's agent Morreale, apparently finished this possibility forever. The Czechs nevertheless kept a friendly eye on certain Austrian Socialists. Yet when Mussolini's mobilization on the Brenner checked the anti-Dollfuss Nazi putsch in July, 1934, Prague was impressed. Here was ample protection against German aggression. The Mussolini-Laval agreement of January 7, 1935, further strengthened the ties between Czecho-Slovakia and Italy, for it was understood then that Rome would put a brake on Hungarian revisionism—a movement which of course especially threatens Czecho-Slovakia. The result was that Herr Gömbös, the Hungarian Premier, slipped more frequently into Germany's embraces. Poland, being anti-Czech for the moment, pulled Hungary in the same direction. This made Prague all the more pro-Italian. Indeed, a few Czech statesmen, their sincere loyalty to the League of Nations notwithstanding, regretted the failure of the Hoare-Laval scheme.

They wanted an Italy relieved of difficulties in Africa and free to defend Austria.

Mussolini is extremely sensitive to Italy's role in Europe. Several of his most intimate coworkers urged him to leave the League when sanctions were imposed, but he refused because no European power can be strong overseas if it is ignored just beyond its borders. For the same reason, in fact, Mussolini has a much larger home army today than he had when the East African adventure commenced. After the remilitarization of the Rhineland the German threat to Austria began to receive greater attention. Perhaps the next German push would affect Czecho-Slovakia and Austria. This prospect must necessarily expose them to salvation by Mussolini—unless England, and possibly France and Russia too, offered some alternative. Was Sir Austen looking into this problem? Here the old formula recurs—democratization of Austria. The Vatican has an excellent auditory system, and I learn in Vatican quarters that on consultation most Austrian political leaders favored the introduction of new blood into the Cabinet. The exception was Prince Starhemberg; he objected. Starhemberg is a devoted disciple of Mussolini. Hence, it may be, the rumors of a coup d'état by his Heimwehr. Such an act would hope to achieve the same end as the artillery demolition of the Socialist homes in Vienna in February, 1934.

This is the situation, and Italians assume that Sir Austen Chamberlain's conversations are calculated ultimately to prejudice it against Italy. Similarly Italians contrive to discern in almost every international complex the hand of Britain working in devious but unalterably anti-Italian ways. Thus the soft answer which Downing Street returned to the Turkish request for remilitarization of the straits was interpreted as a bid for Ataturk's collaboration with England against Italy in the eastern Mediterranean. Rome was clearly irritated by the cold shoulder Italy got from Eden at the Locarno discussions in Geneva. But if one accepts this thesis of ubiquitous British wire-pulling to the detriment of Italy, there is rich evidence of similar Roman tactics—which only makes matters worse. After Hitler's scrapping of Locarno, Italy tried to draw France away from England, and Mussolini has sought to persuade a number of other Continental nations that Great Britain is too pro-German to be an important contributor to European peace. At the same time, however, Il Duce himself does not neglect his own German card. To assure Italy a guaranteed part in the affairs of Europe Mussolini holds fast to his beloved four-power pact, which would shelve the League, give Germany a free hand in the East, and exalt the revisionism of Rome and Berlin. How they could recarve the map without also cutting each other's throats is a minor mystery.

While the battlefield is thus being laid out for the struggle of the imperial colossi, the immediate problem is sanctions. Is it a feature of Britain's scheme to prolong this slow leech-like process of sucking Italy dry of gold so as to paralyze Roman efforts in Africa and Europe? In five months, experts aver, Italy's gold and foreign-currency assets will be gone. Let us say they err by three or four months. But obviously if Italy cannot export while it can and does import it must reach bottom some day. It is not a rich country. It seems inconceivable to Italians that sanctions will be prolonged after their Abyssinian victory is complete. Then, to replenish their emptied coffers—later, perhaps, to exploit Abyssinia economically—they will receive a loan from France. They have already asked for this loan. French bankers, I am told on very good authority, thereupon consulted the London City, which smiled and whispered that Italy was a bad investment. Italians nevertheless hope. Surely France would rather lose some money than a potential ally against Germany.

Sanctions, Rome thinks, will make Italy economically self-sufficient. Edmondo Rossoni, Minister of Agriculture and Forests, showed me many samples of substitute textiles. They looked all right, but who can tell how long they will last or what a rain would do to them. On the streets one sees everywhere a poster showing a turkey and a rabbit eating leaves of lettuce which form the letters of the word "Sanctions." Turkey and rabbit, then, are expected to provide Italy with new food resources. I am rather ignorant about turkeys, but I do know that rabbits are anti-Bolshevik. During the first Five-Year Plan the Russians started breeding rabbits to make up for the heavy losses of livestock caused by mistaken collectivization methods. Posters showed how two rabbits soon became eight, and eight sixty-four, and before long they would replenish the Soviet earth. But it transpired that they refused to breed in Five-Year Plan tempo. Maybe rabbits are also anti-Fascist.

Undoubtedly the tendency toward autarchy now forced upon Italy by sanctions will liberate it from a certain amount of dependence on foreign supply; the human mind is resourceful. But these means are costly and insufficient, and they are no solution. Certain well-known concomitants of inflation are already manifest in Italy. Industrial output is up. There is consequently more money in circulation. But the armament industries are turning out lethal weapons at the expense of consumption goods. There may soon be a plethora of lire and a shortage of commodities. A flight from the lira is noticeable now.

Inflation in itself may be good or bad depending on many factors. In Italy it is likely to aggravate a situation which antedated the Abyssinian war and perhaps caused it. For this reason, probably, Rossoni, who refused to agree with me in December that a thoroughgoing land reform might have obviated the war, now tells me that a land reform is soon to be effected. What kind he did not say. The war, it seems clear, will not relieve Italian national economy, will indeed encumber it and therefore hasten the changes it was designed to avert.

Fascists claim that revolution is proceeding under our very eyes. "Bolsheviks, Socialists?" a Cabinet minister exclaimed. "Why, they are all reactionaries. The Bolsheviks have made their peace with capitalism. We are the real revolutionaries."

"Are you anti-capitalist?" I asked.

"We are not anti-capitalist," he replied. "We are anti-capitalism."

"What does that mean?" I demanded.

I had my pencil point on the paper and wrote down his answer verbatim. "We will change the name of the capitalist and call him Führer as in Germany. We are like the Nazis in this matter." Nor could I get from him any clearer definition of the corporative state. He merely hinted at a reduced standard of living. "Italians," he declared, "don't need much. They are not like you." "I agree with the Catholics," he continued, "that you cannot have happiness on earth. Our synthetic cloth is not fine, but only half a million of our 44,000,000 inhabitants must have fine things."

Nevertheless, one must be fair to the Fascists. Many of them are sincerely convinced that they will establish a Socialist Italy. "A socialism with white gloves," one of them described it. The very people who suppress the Communists and Socialists affirm that they will themselves carry out the ideas of their victims. Or are the ideas different? Some capitalists, especially bankers, are subject to rigid control. "I cannot telephone to Paris without government permission," one complained. The long economic depression and the exigencies of war have weakened capitalism's resistance, and it cannot easily cope with an omnipotent, strident state. By helping semi-bankrupt enterprises the government has wriggled itself into a sort of partnership with many firms. But I have yet to hear of an industrialist or merchant or landlord who has lost his property. And this is the acid test.

Meanwhile Mussolini, with the precision that so characterizes this great statesman, has outlined exactly what he does and what he does not propose to do in the field of economics. "Fundamentally," Il Duce said, "this 'Plan of Economic Construction' is based on the assumption of an inevitable situation which will force this country into a war." When and why he would not disclose. Nevertheless, "the Fascist regime has no intention of nationalizing or, what is worse, bureaucratizing the entire economy of the nation. It will content itself with the control and regulation of the economy by means of the corporations." Concretely, "farming retains its private capitalistic character." Foreign trade will become "a direct or indirect function of the state," but domestic commerce "will not seriously change its physiognomy." Credit, that is, banking, has been "placed under the direct control of the state." Private artisans will not be interfered with; they will receive government aid. "Small and medium industries will continue in the orbit of individual initiative and responsibility, but be guided, thanks to corporative self-discipline, into national and social channels." On the other hand, "heavy industries, working directly or indirectly for national defense," would suffer nationalization. Mussolini explained why. "They have only one customer—the state." He said nothing about compensation or even about expropriation. Indeed, ownership may actually not be transferred. The state will "participate" in these giant munitions companies. "In some branches this may take the form of direct, elsewhere of indirect, management. In other branches it may take the form of effective control." All this would be accomplished "without haste, calmly, but with Fascist determination."

These innovations are far-reaching. It will be interesting to watch their actual operation. But anyone who has ever seen a Socialist country knows that it is still a far cry from Italian fascism to socialism.

MISSED THE BUS.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

"WHILE Millions Cheer," Mussolini announces his victory. He has, he declares, conquered Ethiopia. Never was there a greater error. True, he has occupied Ethiopia, ravaged the country, bombed its cities, killed men, women, and children. He has burned out their lungs with his poison gas, destroyed them in their hospitals, tortured or murdered them wherever he could, whether they were in arms or not. Now he thinks he has triumphed and triumphantly tells the world his sadism is quenched, his blood-lust satisfied, his eagerness to rob and plunder assuaged, and his colonial ambitions achieved. He will look, he says, neither to Palestine nor to Egypt to murder and kill some more. Italy is now among "the satisfied powers." "We Italians," he tells the press, "belong no more to the dissatisfied proletariat." The victory "brings us to the other side of the barricade." His countrymen are no longer of the "have-nots"; they are of the "haves."

Vain, foolish, stupid man! Victor? No, vanquished. Vanquished by every count in the court of honor, of morals, of human decency. Today and for as long as history is written and men turn its pages the record will be there of Italy's shame and disgrace. Nothing can expunge it—no railroads, no brilliant feats of engineering, no Roman highways, no palatial hostels, no great public buildings, not even tens of thousands of contented Italian settlers or a large profit on the country's operation and exports. There are still some things no money and no success can atone for and no triumph erase. Chaotic as the world is, misled and betrayed as the peoples are by their leaders, there is still a majority of human beings who know that might does not make right, that the rapist, the robber, and the murderer, whether individuals or nations, are to be neither condoned nor admired but remain the enemies of society and of mankind. Victory? Why, the cost to Mussolini is just begun.

So has the cost to the rest of the world just begun. At this writing it is hardly thinkable that the League of Nations may rescue itself, or that the badly shattered British prestige may be restored. Both of these collapses are fraught with the most serious consequences to the rest of the world. If anyone has any doubt of that, let him read the rejoicings in Berlin that collective security has broken down. The very encouragement that Mussolini has given to Hitler may in turn cost him extremely dear, for when you are a dictator the hand that is for you one day is as readily against you the next. Mussolini's successful defiance of the League will embolden Hitler whenever he glances at Austria, and beyond Austria at the Italian Tyrol with its unhappy subjugated inhabitants of the oldest Germanic stock in Europe. Nor can anyone yet measure the effect upon the colored races everywhere of the smashing of the sole surviving independent country on the continent of Africa. It may not manifest itself openly for years, but wherever there are men of dark skins the sense of outrage and betrayal is intense. That glorious victory in Ethiopia is bound to have repercussions not only in Africa but in India and China as well. It does not suffice to reply that this sort of wickedness has gone on before and that white supremacy has not suffered. These are different times. There is a more alert world conscience and world public opinion than ever before—which is why Mussolini's excuse, that he was doing no more in Ethiopia than England had done all over the globe, availed him not at all—and there is a greater stirring among the colored peoples everywhere than has been recorded since the powerful nations undertook to supply their economic needs at the expense of the backward.

Victory? On the contrary it is another nail in the coffin of the whole colonial system of which Mussolini now believes Italy to be a permanent and triumphant part. There are economic inequalities in the world; it is unjust and wrong that some nations should profit because they hold lands in which nature has been especially bounteous with its gifts. But the way to deal with those inequalities, now so often referred to as the real "causes of war," is not by stealing others' land but by promptly working out a system by which, just as during the World War, the natural resources of the world will be pooled and distributed, not to the profit of imperialistic conquerors but to the just and equal benefit of all peoples. Victory? If to set one large section of humanity against another, if to inflame millions with the thought of vengeance, if to destroy men's faith that there is justice on earth and a just Providence above supervising human affairs, spells victory, why a few more such and the whole complexion of the world will change. What it all means is that Europe is in the grip of a tremendous revolution and that the Italian victory sends it farther along a path which the nations have never trod before.

This may be for the future. Today the simple fact is that outside of Italy Italian prestige has never stood so low. The flag of Italy has not been glorified or sanctified by the effectiveness of its planes, its tanks, its poison gas. It has been dragged in the mire. Wherever it flies there are black stains upon it which will never be eradicated. Whenever it is shown among men and women who reverence honor and decency, justice and the brotherhood of man, it will appear as a symbol of wickedness, of the wholesale slaughter of innocent and unoffending people, whose sole fault was that they were weak and possessed much territory.

BROUN'S PAGE

THE judges who functioned at Churchill Downs are not like their distant cousins of the Supreme Court in Washington. The stewards of the might and majesty of old Kentucky are loose constructionists. They allowed the number of Bold Venture to go up as winner of the Derby and permitted it to stand as official. A wreath of roses was hung around the neck of little Ira Hanford, and it was not until he returned to the jockeys' room that he learned he had been set down for fifteen days "for rough riding in the sixth race."

Still it was something like the ruling of the high bench in the gold-purchase case. After the manner of Chief Justice Hughes and his friends, the stewards said, "It would make too much of a mess to change the result, but don't do it again." Ira Hanford is the first apprentice ever to win the Kentucky Derby, and if rough riding helped him to gain the most coveted prize the American turf affords he is hardly likely to sulk over a fifteen days' suspension. Nor is it likely to prove an awful lesson. Indeed, when friends asked the youngster what he would do with his fifteen days of enforced idleness he answered, "I guess I'll just hang around the stable and feed sugar to that horse."

The judges were right, I think, in rendering an illogical decision. It was a verdict based upon circumstance and upon emotional need. The nine old men ought to make an annual pilgrimage to the Kentucky Derby, and Chief Justice Hughes might learn much if he could arrange to get himself invited to watch the race from the judges' stand. As the horses flash by at the end of the long stretch, those in authority must decide the false and true without the benefit of hesitation. These judges cannot say "perhaps," "maybe," or "we lack jurisdiction." When they have spoken there should be only one interpretation.

Fourteen horses went to the post, but twelve were beaten off and just two came roaring down the stretch together. And in that duel it was Hanford against Wayne Wright. No writer of popular fiction could have more perfectly arranged the circumstances. Hanford will not be a full-fledged jockey until July 25. In handicaps he still gets his "bug" allowance of five pounds because he is an "inexperienced" or apprentice jockey. Wayne Wright is generally regarded as the roughest and the most successful of American riders.

But it was the boy with the "bug" who put up the better finish. His horse was on the rail and yet he purposely bore out a little because Wright whips with his left hand and Hanford wished to cramp him. At the head of the stretch both went to the bat, but in the last sixteenth the apprentice gave Bold Venture only a hand ride. The photographs show the horses heads apart at the finish line, but when Hanford spoke over the microphone just after the race he said that it didn't seem to him to be so very close. "I knew I had plenty of horse left under me," he confided.

Hanford's brother Buddy was killed in a race at Pimlico

a few years ago, and he himself was banged against the rail in Maryland two weeks before the Derby and rode with a wrenched knee. But he gave the horse so aptly named Bold Venture a swaggering ride from start to finish, and when they asked him, "Was this the first Derby you ever won?" he answered, "Sure, it's the first I ever rode in."

Horses, so I am told, are stupid, but Maxie Hirsch, the trainer, does not go entirely on that principle. I first met Bold Venture about half-past five one morning at Saratoga. Hirsch was schooling him in the uses of a starting gate. Bold Venture insisted upon kicking at the padded sides of the stall and rearing up on his hind legs. Maxie walked to the horse's head but he never touched the bridle. He began to talk to Bold Venture with great earnestness. With complete unconsciousness he said, "What's the matter with you? You're two years old; haven't you got any sense at all?"

It would be an exaggeration, although I wouldn't put it past him, to say that Bold Venture hung his head in shame. But he did stop prancing. Hirsch walked ten or twelve feet away from the stall gate and said, "Now come out slowly." The horse walked to him almost like a pretty well-trained dog. "Now go back," said Hirsch, "back into the stall," and he waved at him with one hand. Bold Venture backed into his stall.

You could have knocked me over with a selling plater. I had an uneasy feeling that I was watching black magic and that if Hirsch had said, "Go over to my cottage and chew Walter Lippmann's column out of the paper," the horse would have gladly done so. And that would have been unfortunate because I do not think the average Lippmann column would agree with a horse called Bold Venture. Coldstream, which finished fourth, perhaps could take it.

Racing has been called the sport of kings, but I think it's too good for them, and I am told that they have horse races in the Soviet Union. I'm glad to hear that because it is too fine a sport to be dropped the minute the revolution comes. Maybe the Russians would think some of our Derby customs are funny. For instance, after Bold Venture had won, a very pleasant man named Morton L. Schwartz went up into the judges' stand and received a gold cup. Until then Mr. Schwartz had taken no part in the race. He is merely the owner who pays for the oats.

Still, that would make a pretty deep impression on Chief Justice Hughes and his friends now that I have them up there in the judges' stand. Whatever are they doing there? Why now I remember. I always knew I had something against Charles Evans Hughes in addition to his Supreme Court decisions. It all comes back to me. He was the man who undertook to kill racing more than twenty years ago. Seventy thousand people saw the Derby.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

127,000,000 POETS, or THE MUSE'S GUINEA PIGS

BY BEN BELITT

IT HAS never been determined whether Plato denied the poets a place in his Republic because he distrusted them as citizens, or because, being a poet himself, he foresaw that they would one day feel the need of getting their verses into print. Either predicament is distressing, but the latter alone is insoluble. The state is, in theory at least, capable of restraining its undesirable citizens, but it has so far failed to devise any punitive or persuasive means of curtailing its undesirable poets. We are, according to the best statistical advices, a nation of poets. Only a few years ago John Masefield, during one of his infrequent visits to this country, was moved to remark that here in America we were all either reading verse or writing it. What Mr. Masefield failed to notice was the matter of proportion: if, for example, one half would content itself with reading and the other half with writing, we should be well in sight of the realms of gold. The source of discomfiture lies in the fact that America's 127,000,000 poets are demanding representation all at once.

The situation is not without its political hazards. Should the poets, as some have suggested, see fit to draw up an ultimatum for equal rights under the Constitution as artists as well as citizens, they would have nothing to lose but their end-rhymes. Happily, this trying eventuality has for the moment been averted by certain of our more public-spirited publishers—about whom more later—who have seen the extraordinary good sense of providing for all poets, of whatever race, creed, years, or party persuasion, equal opportunity of appearing between boards. Their medium is the anthology, or, in the more fashionable parlance, the omnibus, in which the occupant generally pays as he enters and is, as the phrase goes, taken for a ride.

Such anthologies are by no means indigenous American institutions. Laura Riding and Robert Graves published in 1928 a joint and seemingly definitive "Pamphlet Against Anthologies," in which the technique of such enterprises in England as well as America was considered from every conceivable angle. The subscription anthology, about which we are here concerned, is cited somewhat casually under Section VIII, Anthologies and the Living Poet; "It is," remark the authors, "a simple, money-making matter, cleverly exploiting the inexperience and ambition of young and old fools of both sexes who have read too many anthologies and are thrilled at any prospect of seeing their own work in print." There follows a helpful study of the gestation of such anthologies, which differs not at all from that customary in our own country. The important word, however, and the trade epithet by which publishers of this order have come to be designated in America, has been curiously overlooked. The word is not, as the authors seem to believe, "inexperience," for the same names fill the same anthologies yearly, nor is it "ambition," since they must all come to understand, eventually, the futility of their position; it is vanity.

The word is indispensable, since it connotes at once an explanation, a technique, and a certainty of benefits to come. It supplies the victim, suggests the approach, pays the bills, and furnishes the publisher with the only weapon which he may with certainty count upon. The Adastra Publications, for example, will cordially invite a long roster of versifying housewives "to participate in the Adastra Poetry Prize Awards Contest": $400 in prizes is to be given away, including $50 in cash, $200 of "autographed poetical works" by assorted anonymities, and oil paintings by one Miss Brown. The contest, by the cheerful admission of the publishers, "is sponsored to secure additional meritorious material for inclusion in 'Calliope's Gifts,' a distinctive volume containing the work of prominent contemporary poets"; and, most significantly, "contestants are not obligated to purchase." There remains for the publisher, thus, a single constant in the midst of all these variables—the factor of vanity, which is, fortunately, sufficient for his purposes and will, as usual, supply the victim, suggest the approach, and market the volume as certainly as it attracted the contributor.

Henry Harrison, among practicing anthology-makers today, is easily the most prosperous figure, though it may be invidious to exclude entirely lesser competitors like the Galleon Press. The latter institution, however, anthologizes only once yearly—as far as the writer has been able to discover—and is thus relatively negligible. Mr. Harrison, on the other hand, has made a career of anthologizing, and further outdoes himself by issuing from time to time, in vertiginous succession, first volumes by such figures as Ruby Archer Gray, Vivian Yeiser Laramore, Mary Edgar Comstock, Edith L. Fraser, and Katharine Carasso (aged twelve). His role, thus, is properly that of absentee landlord rather than anthologist, and in this capacity he has been making, among other things, much history.

His most recent and ambitious volume, edited under the aegis of one Tooni Gordi, has been a compilation of the 1,311 chief "Contemporary American Women Poets," published recently after seventeen months "in preparation," with an "advance sale" of over 2,000 copies. A monument of editorial resourcefulness, it supersedes all previous ventures in the field by its stern prosecution of an ideal which Miss Gordi, for want of a gainfuller word, has let pass as "comprehensiveness," "inclusiveness." Miss Gordi is at some pains to explain that "our conception of a comprehensive anthology is to present, with the design of inclusiveness, the established and widely publicized poets, but primarily to make known the work of the newer, fresher, and less heard voices"; several, we learn, have "barely passed childhood" and certain of the "less heard voices" are making their "first flight into print through this volume." Page follows page, each marshaling two columns of type and each bursting with a plethora of sonnets, couplets, quatrains, blank verse, free verse, and prose proper. We have, for example, one votarist singing "western Utah's barren lands, By far Nevada's desert sands," and another whose "gypsy blood is restless, When summer's in the air," another who holds, "There ain't no poetry Like these middlin' hills," and a fourth who queries brightly, "Well, Doctah, how's you-all? I's feelin' mighty fine"; we have Browns, Taylors, Smiths, Joneses—but no Does. The Smiths, it should be put on record, outnumber the Joneses by a nine-to-five ratio.

The more redoubtable names, like Edna Millay, Louise Bogan, Marianne Moore, and others whose presence in such a volume is equally unaccountable are to be found only after the most exhausting scrutiny of a table of contents which falls nothing short of a telephone directory in "inclusiveness." We assume, since we are informed that no payment could be made for "acceptable manuscripts," that each of these poets has Mr. Harrison to thank for the opportunity of appearing side by side with the Misses Birdie Z. Morgan, Berenice B. Beggs, and Lulu E. McNab, the "fresher and less heard voices." And Mr. Harrison, whirling the vacuum of his anthology about the centrifugal pull of the more "widely publicized" names, doubtless has similar cause for gratitude.

It is, in the end, a patriotic duty which anthologists of this sort are accomplishing, hewn to the large democratic line of American life itself. From Maine to California, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, Mr. Harrison is canvassing the terrain state by state, scattering anthologies as he goes and celebrating in countless individual volumes, the flora and fauna, the fish, flesh, fowl, and good red herrings of the nation. His latest project, a companion volume to "Contemporary American Woman Poets" in which the 1,311 gentlemen poets of America will have their say, is to be edited by one Thomas Del Vecchio, whose first volume Mr. Harrison promises to issue along with "Contemporary American Men Poets." "The opportunity of little-known but gifted poets to achieve immediate distinction in this anthology is," Mr. Harrison feels, "inspiring and unequaled." He is likewise convinced that "the desirability of a companion volume" is both "obvious and inevitable." It is all of that. And it is no less inevitable that, having dispensed with the men and women severally, he will promptly move on to the infants, and eventually come to feel the desirability of another companion volume, a "U. S. Anthology" in which America's 127,000,000 poets will all "achieve immediate distinction" simultaneously. Then, until the appearance of "U. S. Anthology: Series Two," we may have a respite from anthologies.

BOOKS

Mr. Hearst's Linen

IMPERIAL HEARST. By Ferdinand Lundberg. New York: Equinox Cooperative Press. $2.75.

HEARST: LORD OF SAN SIMEON. By Oliver Carlson and Ernest Sutherland Bates. The Viking Press. $3.

IN New York City the other day the American Newspaper Publishers' Association devoted its reunion to the customary fetish rites and the annual obscene dance of the dead cats which it worships in the name of freedom of the press. The convention shouted bloody murder over the Black Senatorial committee's "prying" into Mr. Hearst's telegram to his editors, but not a sound, not an echo was heard of the Hearst organization's prying activities which drove the Lindbergh family out of America. For days attacks on individuals, groups, and organizations held hostile to the publishers—or their profits—filled the assembly halls, but all the publishers stuffed their noble ears against references to the violation of other peoples' rights by their paid—and underpaid—employees, and the association refused as usual to subject itself to the healing surgical weapon which it claims is the guardian of all that is fine in American social and political life—namely, criticism. The first enemy of a free press was never mentioned.

Only one faint voice disturbed the united singing of hymns of hate and paeans of self-praise. In between free-press resolutions and the report of the strike-breaking committee, which clearly again revealed the united publishers of America strongly biased against labor, Mr. Sulzberger of the New York Times declared that there was an easy assumption on the part of some publishers that they enjoyed certain privileges and immunities not vouchsafed to other citizens. He would not say that this indictment was valid, but he noted that a challenge was being made.

If Mr. Sulzberger is unaware that two publishers named Tammen and Bonfils committed a million-dollar blackmail with impunity, and that his own newspaper never retracted or apologized for the injustice done Bob La Follette, and that American publishers have committed ten thousand breaches of ethics if not of the peace, let him at least read the history of George Hearst and his melodramatic son, William Randolph, in these two new books, and he will not question the validity of his half-hearted indictment against "some publishers." These books constitute the most sensational indictment against a living American in our time.

Although many newspapermen will find things they already know repeated, and although there is a duplication of material of almost 50 per cent—with, however, different emphasis and interpretation—I am sure that the profession as well as the laity will be profoundly shocked and intensely interested by the almost unparalleled history of intrigue and hypocrisy which the two volumes relate. Mr. Lundberg scoops Messrs. Carlson and Bates in the chapter on the origins and significance of Chicago gang warfare, for me the most sensational of all the disclosures. As an employee of Mr. Hearst's rival I heard years ago of the notorious newspaper war, but only now do I learn from Mr. Lundberg that the fathers of modern racketeering, the sponsors of present-day gang warfare, were none other than the two rival publishers of Chicago. Mr. Lundberg tells how the first gangsters were employed, he describes the gun

Detailed • Explicit • Scientifically Accurate

SOLD ONLY TO PHYSICIANS OR UPON
A PHYSICIAN'S PRESCRIPTIONPARENTHOODDesign or Accident?*

A MANUAL OF

BIRTH CONTROL

By Michael Fielding, M.D.

Detailed • Explicit • Scientifically Accurate

PREFACE by H. G. WELLS

130,000 Copies Sold in England

At a time when so much pseudo-science upon the subject of birth control is being foisted upon the public, this book, by a recognized British authority, and highly endorsed by the medical profession here and abroad, is trebly valuable.

The leading medical publication of this country (The JOURNAL OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION) comments as follows on this volume:

CONTENTS

The Meaning of Birth Control
The Sociological Factor
The General Principles of Contraception
Methods of Contraception
Methods of the Future
Objections to Birth Control
The Propaganda of Birth Control
Birth-Control Clinics
The Birth-Control International Information Centre
O.K. Theory: A Survey of Fact and Fancy
Names and Addresses of Manufacturers and Retailers of Contraceptives
List of Birth-Control Clinics in the United States
Glossary
List of Books for Further Reading
Index

ILLUSTRATIONS

Female Organs of Generation (Fig. 1)
Female Organs of Generation (Fig. 2)
Foaming Jelly Double Tube with Bakelite Nozzle
"Dutch" Pessary
Cervical Cap
"Dutch" Pessary in Position
Cervical Cap in Position
Whirling Spray

"One of the best books on this subject that has yet appeared. The author has a thorough command of the subject and obviously has devoted much careful thought to the preparation of this volume. The subject matter is well arranged and it is presented with a degree of lucidity that may well serve as a model for other writers on medical subjects."

"It gives very clearly and completely, with all the decency of a scientific textbook, exactly what is clearly known and what is not clearly established about preventive methods . . . This is knowledge that I think every adult in a civilized community ought to possess . . ."

"When the adult citizen has gone through these pages he or she will know exactly the physical factors of the modern sexual problem. He or she will have all the mastery of his or her sexual self that knowledge can give."

—H. G. WELLS, in the Preface to this volume.

"The author is a medical man who has successfully performed a difficult task; he has written a book which satisfies the requirements both of the lay reader who seeks guidance in the conduct of the intimate affairs of his own life, and of the doctor who desires information on how to advise his patients. Of the many books written on the practical problems of birth control, this is likely to be the most serviceable to medical readers."

—LANCET, London, England.

—ST. BART'S HOSPITAL JOURNAL.

Sold Only to Physicians or upon a Physician's Prescription.
If you are NOT a physician, this coupon MUST be accompanied by a physician's prescription.

Mail this coupon to:

The Vanguard Press, 424 Madison Avenue, New York City
Gentlemen: Please send me copies of PARENTHOOD: Design or Accident? A Manual of BIRTH CONTROL, at $2.65 each ($2.50 for book plus 15 cents for postage and handling.)

Signed M.D.

Address

City

battles in the streets, the murder of innocent bystanders as well as opposition gorillas, he gives the complete history of Colonel McCormick's two Annenbergs, now respectable millionaires who contribute to worthy charities, and he concludes a narrative of bloodshed and violence by alleging that Dion O'Bannion, at one time second to Al Capone in the criminal hall of infamy, was actually a Hearst employee.

Sufficient unto each book are the sensations therein: Mr. Lundberg announces he will omit references to his subject's private life, whereas Messrs. Carlson and Bates—rightly it seems to me—declare it, too, "will be treated frankly in the following pages in so far as it has affected his public life, his reputation, and his general development." The Carlson-Bates counter-scoop is especially interesting because it proves one thing definitely—that whereas no layman can protect his private life from the prying of the yellow press he can obtain complete privacy, no matter how "newsworthy" his actions, by becoming the publisher of a newspaper. It is the unwritten law of publishers that they may wash all the dirty linen of the world, including that of King Carol and Magda Lupescu—but exempt that of their own colleagues. (Freedom of the press?) The Hearst linen is pretty well displayed here.

It would take about five times the space I have to report adequately on these two volumes, and I cannot even list the most important episodes. The authors begin with a gaudy, rowdy picture of California in '49, they show George Hearst as the typical robber baron, they tell the story of yellow journalism, the Hearst part in the Spanish-American War, pro-Germanism in 1914, the Mexican forgeries of 1927, the Hitler episode of the other day, the present red-baiting campaign; they cover the political campaigns and analyze the Hearst business empire, but rarely if ever do they say a kind word for the common hero. "This is not to say that Hearst possesses no virtues," declares Professor Beard in the introduction to the Lundberg volume; "Nero and Caligula had virtues." Carlson and Bates attempt a psychological as well as social interpretation—which they share with Lundberg—finding megalomania, a Messianic complex, an overcompensation for inferiority, a tendency toward split personality. Each book has its faults of omission—they sometimes contradict each other, once in the spelling of names—but it would be foolish of me to enlarge on mistakes or make odious comparisons as it is my main intention to drive readers into the bookshops to buy both.

Significantly, the life of the subject is written with the keynote of death. Messrs. Carlson and Bates open with the line, "Before William Randolph Hearst shall pass into the limbo of forgotten things," and conclude with the epitaph, "Unknowingly all his life he has worked on behalf of death—the death of personal integrity, the death of decent journalism, the death of honest patriotism—and now ultimately death will take its own." Professor Beard's preface has Hearst standing "within the shadow that in due course enshrouds all mortals," and Mr. Lundberg's last paragraph recalls Hearst's age as seventy-three. Again both books have one conclusion in common: they agree that Hearst is the greatest enemy of a free press in America and that he is first among America's fascist menaces. In this agreement they will probably find all their readers also. But Mr. Hearst has arrived at his proper position—pretender to the throne of an American dictatorship—a little too late. Uppermost in his mind, as in those of his associate, Paul Block, his attorney, James Francis Neylan, and other candidates for the Hearst political inheritance, must be that one dread word which must never be mentioned in the presence of the lord of San Simeon—death. Life has played Mr. Hearst a very dirty trick.

GEORGE SELDES

A Buddha of the Bayous

STRANGE GLORY. By L. H. Myers. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THIS book bears only a superficial resemblance to the series of novels which Mr. Myers is writing about a group of people in sixteenth-century India. The first three members of that series were collected last summer into a volume which made Mr. Myers seem suddenly to have become one of the best of contemporary novelists. And he still is that, for "The Root and the Flower" has lost nothing by the passage of the months. But "Strange Glory" will have no such life, and perhaps it should never have lived at all. It is "written" well, since Mr. Myers cannot be ungraceful; and it goes through the motions of being philosophical fiction. The resemblance ends there.

The reason for the failure of "Strange Glory" can scarcely be that Mr. Myers knows little or nothing about modern Louisiana, where the story is set. What could he "know" about sixteenth-century India? Yet it is true that even the landscape of "The Root and the Flower" lives on in a reader's imagination, as certain apparently irrelevant properties of a first-rate novel are likely to do; lives on, promising to produce out of itself, with or without Mr. Myers's help, any number of new human situations of the sort that have distinguished the narrative thus far. When a novel is alive it is perhaps all alive. At any rate my own memory of Mr. Myers's forests and plains and cities starts his people moving among them, entangling themselves in crises which are entirely natural to the scene. The scene of "Strange Glory" has no such power, nor have its people any such reality. And this, as I have said, can scarcely be accounted for on the theory that Mr. Myers has never lived in Louisiana, let alone the United States. For all I know he has spent more time in New Orleans than he has in London. It is merely that his imagination has failed to settle there; the result being that his people do not live there either, and that the metaphysics they talk is as thin as commercial buttermilk.

The paradox about philosophical fiction is that it cannot succeed without a great deal of body. There must be not only length; there must be a large, bony frame of events, there must be a veritable landscape, a palpable atmosphere. And there must be a horde of people. There must be something, in other words, for the mind to think about—a universe sufficient to carry the author's ideas if he is so fortunate as to have any in the form proper to fiction. He will have written his novel, indeed, in order to express his ideas, which could not have been expressed in any other way and which even now cannot be extracted from it for the same reason that the mind cannot be extracted from the body.

As the mind can be said to express the body, so the particulars of a novel—and only the particulars—contain its meaning. The meaning of "The Root and the Flower" was contained no less in the temperaments of its people than in their conversations, no less in the accidents than in the substance. And the India of the book was swarming with life—life capable of continuance no matter what one of the heroes thought or said about it. It is a far fall, then, to this attenuated bayou-land where Wentworth the Englishman lives in his little shack and ruminates about the earth-spirit. He has little glades where he goes to brood, and there is a log on which he sits while he stares uncommunicatively at the heroine, Paulina. But his thoughts, like hers and like those of Stephen the Communist, are pallid from disconnection with any sensible world. They are wilted flowers in a vase which no one has supplied with

IS there any difference between Grade A and Grade B milk—besides the price? IS the hosiery sold in Wal-Mart's and other low-priced chains worth buying?

WHICH

are the best-designed toothbrushes?

The first issue is ready!

It gives you the answers to these questions. It tells you what kind of toys contain lead and are dangerous for children to handle; how to get the best toilet soap for the least money. It contains a physician's report on "Alka-Seltzer." It analyzes many other products, and also reports on the labor conditions under which many consumers' products are made.

CONSUMERS UNION

OF UNITED STATES, INC.

is the new consumer's membership organization founded to provide honest, disinterested technical information for all who cannot afford to spend unwisely. It offers two services to members:

$3 A full service giving reports on essential commodities and in addition, information and reports on a wide range of higher-priced goods. This service consists of 12 issues of CONSUMERS UNION reports and a yearly buying guide.

$1 A limited service which concentrates on essential, lower-priced commodities. It consists of 12 issues of an abridged edition of CONSUMERS UNION reports and a compact, available-when-shopping, yearly buying guide.

Both of these services will rate commodities, wherever possible by brand names, on the basis of quality and price.

CONSUMERS UNION also reports (wherever information is available) ■ the labor conditions under which products listed are made. Both of these services are available to groups of 25 or ■ at special rates.

Mail the coupon NOW!

CONSUMERS UNION OF U. S., Inc., 22 E. 17th St., New York, N. Y.

I hereby apply for membership in CONSUMERS UNION. I enclose:

☐ $3 for one year's membership and subscription to the full service.

☐ $1 for one year's membership and subscription to the limited service.

... ($5 to $25) for year's membership and subscription to the full service plus a contribution toward a permanent consumers' laboratory.

I agree to keep confidential all material sent to [redacted] which is [redacted] designated.

Signature.....
(Longhand—do not print)

Occupation.....

Address _____

*A new biography
by the author of LENIN*

RALPH FOX'S

Genghis Khan

"Thorough and thoughtful yet dramatic, this biography of the Mongol conqueror—the unknown superman of Asia—achieves its purpose. In this sense Mr. Fox has written a perfect book—the best modern and intelligible account of Genghis Khan that has appeared. The book was needed. Without this background, Asia cannot be understood."—N. Y. Times.

Just published

Illustrated, $3.00

*Visitors to the Soviet Union
... Read this exciting book before you go.*

Moscow Rehearsals

by NORRIS HOUGHTON

The most exciting theatre in the world today is the Russian theatre. In more than a political sense it is revolutionary, and it has brought a fresh eye, a new sense of values, and a new technique to theatrical production. This is an intimate account of the rehearsals and the performances in the great Moscow Art Theatre today, the Kamerny Theatre, the Realistic Theatre, and the other houses, their directors and creeds. "Norris Houghton has done a stirring book. It is a delight when someone takes an interesting aspect of the vital life of the new Russia and presents it intelligently and interestingly."—H. V. Kaltenborn. "Not only the best travel book on the Soviet stage that I have ever seen but also the best book about the theatre that has been published this year."—John Mason Brown, N. Y. Post.

Illustrated, $2.75

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

383 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK

water; nor could these bayous have furnished the water, since their dampness is purely literary. Here is the flower without the root, here are ideas without being.

The ideas sound particularly silly in their modern setting, such as it is. Mr. Myers is enough of a twentieth-century Englishman to want to make his people, most of whom are fellow-countrymen in exile, speak the clipped and savorless speech of their spent kind. So they say less than they mean; murmur with small mouths; understate most gallantly, most nobly. But then the time arrives for them to be mystics, or for Wentworth at any rate to suggest the eternal presence of earth's mind. The theme calls for trumpets, for woodwinds, for bells. And what do we hear? Mere lips, mere teeth, intelligently clipping sound.

MARK VAN DOREN

"Above the Average"

ANTONY (VISCOUNT KNEBWORTH): A RECORD OF YOUTH. By His Father the Earl of Lytton. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

"KNEBBY," the boxing peer, had most of the qualifications of a candidate for the role of a twentieth-century Sir Philip Sidney. He excelled in all games and sports; his promise was cut short by accidental death; and his life, like Sidney's, provides an unusually revealing social document. There is a certain embarrassment in reading the early letters from Eton, intimate and self-satisfied letters such as most men have written and few would care to see published. But Antony soon tired of exploring the pleasures of the fortunate world into which he was born, and felt vague stirrings of self-justification. Enthralled as he was by Napoleon and Henry V and Mark Antony, "a fine ordinary man, above the average," he wondered, "Is it wrong to win? To try to win? . . . I've got well out of my depth, but I do wish I could be a little less selfish."

These letters illustrate better than anything I have read the upper-class Englishman's terror of being thought serious, his tendency to scurry away to a periphery of games and pastimes until at length huntin', fishin', and shootin' no longer provide a satisfying substitute for thinkin' and doin', and in the resulting confusion his first struggles to come to terms with the world lead to an impatient and immature fascism. Much is revealed in the photographs of Lord Knebworth: the good looks at the time when, with the supreme egoism of boyhood, he busied himself in naively hedonistic pursuits; the slow change from his coming-of-age until his death nearly nine years later. In the year of his majority he wrote: "My face is happy, my jaw large, my forehead negligible, and my hands too large to hold a pen." His forehead was of course anything but negligible. The quality of his Oxford letters and a real distinction of style in the later papers would be sufficient, by themselves, to disprove that. The significance is that he preferred to think it true—it was, in short, good form. "Everything being dandy's what I like," he had written. That was an approved attitude, and led to such statements as "I dislike work so intensely that everything which appears to be connected with it, such as theory, is damned." His short and brilliant career contradicted the words as it underlined the spirit.

A similar mental maladjustment occurred when, as a young National M.P. should, he indulged in political speculations. While still an undergraduate he had tried "to look at everything in a Tory light," and his first nibblings at the forbidden fruit of knowledge were inevitably timid: "Daddy is a free trader and free trade sounds so wonderful." At the age of twenty-one he wrote: "I adore Ramsay MacDonald, but . . . I hate the Bolsheviks and trade unions and all such things." There is reason to suspect that his anti-labor animus was a result less of conviction than of force of habit, and that when later as parliamentary private secretary at the War Office he discovered that "the whole doctrine of liberalism which has pervaded and ruled the world since the Renaissance has been one ghastly futile blunder," it was partly due to circumstance that he chose the fascist path, forsaking the High Whiggery of the Lyttons to become a neo-Tory. From being "confused, bewildered, and hopeless" about politics, he passed to the reluctant conclusion that "I shall yet have to be the one to save England," since "there can only be justice and freedom where there is strength and determination."

His prowess had always been physical; it was on the rugged field and the ski slope and in the boxing ring that he won laurels and found fullest expression as a boy and youth. Finally, turning back to the world of action for comfort and self-expression after his headlong struggles in the world of ideas, he found joy in the air. To his mother he wrote that flying "will take an edge off my delight," and a few months before his fatal accident he wrote to a friend, "I wish you were in the Air Force too. It is all that is fun now." It is oddly significant that the airman is the symbol of Auden and company at the other end of politics, when, for their part also, they seek salvation in action. Reacting from the intellectual life, they too might have written, "I feel it is good to be alive, and the sheer taste of fresh air is a grand thing in itself." A visit to this country might have provided Lord Knebworth with a more educational relief from himself ("I have a perfect passion for the Americans—they are such scrumptious people"). Unhappily, to speculate on the effects of a study of the American scene is now fruitless. Many readers of Lord Lytton's "record of youth" will be reminded of Marlowe's line: "Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight." For throughout the letters there are evidences of an integrity strong enough to translate itself into action if intelligence should have informed sympathy, making possible a more generous view of life and its problems.

S. GORLEY PUTT

Ethereal Politics

THREE GODS GIVE AN EVENING TO POLITICS. By Richard Rothschild. Random House. $1.50.

THE author of this book could not have made a happier choice in selecting Socrates, Jefferson, and Lenin as protagonists in these imaginary conversations. Jefferson appears in the role of a defender of modern industrial capitalism, Lenin as an experimental humanist, and Socrates as a neo-Hegelian idealist. That the portraits of these thinkers are not altogether drawn in historical character, the author readily admits. Nor does it hinder the progress of the political argument—whatever there is of one. Unfortunately Mr. Rothschild is not so much concerned with the confrontation and development of clear-cut political views as he is with the exposition of a peculiar system of metaphysical idealism according to which man must seek fulfilment in the "Absolute, the organism of all organisms." Just when the reader's interest has been whetted by the introductory dialogues, which are not lacking in persuasiveness and grace, Mr. Rothschild loses himself in disquisitions upon destiny, cosmic society, and the morphology of pleasure.

There is no objection to introducing metaphysical questions into a political discussion provided a logical connection can be

His LATEST Book on the Sexual Life
Crystallizes the Findings of a Lifetime

COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME—389 PAGES

PARTIAL CONTENTS

The Nature of the Sexual Impulse
The Sexual Zones
The Sexual Impulse in Youth
Masturbation
Frigidity
Impotence
First Intercourse
Secondary Sexual Characters
The "Under-sexed"; the "Over-sexed"
Exhibitionism
The Sexual Criminal
Analysis of Courtship
Sadism and Masochism
Woman's Change of Life
The Dangerous Age in Men
Cruelty and Pain in Relation to Sex Homosexuality
Hermaphroditism
Sexual Abstinence
Sex Intercourse and Health
The Choice of a Mate

Preparation for Marriage
Fertility and Sterility
Divorce
Monogamy; Polygamy
The Nature of Birth Control
The Question of Abortion
Frequency of Coitus
The Sexual Athlete: Satyriasis; Nymphomania
Jealousy
Married Love
Psychoanalytic Concepts of Sex
Pre-marital Knowledge and Experience
Modesty; Nudism
Childbirth: Sex Life during Pregnancy; Immediately after Sexual Feeling in Women
Sex Practice in Marriage
Methods and Technique of Coitus
Sexual Pleasure and Conception

Positions in Coitus
Sex Life and Nervous Disorders
Sexual Difficulties
Freud's "Unconscious"; "Libido"
Dreams; Their Significance
Sex Life of Unmarried Adults
Sexual Fetishes and Symbols
The Art of Love
Sexual Adjustments
Sex Happiness
Age and the Sexual Impulse
The Sexual Impulse and Love
Love Rights of Women; of Men
Esthetics of Coitus
Expression and Repression
Substitutes for Sex
Glossary of Sexual Terms
Index

AUTHORIZED • $3.00 POSTPAID • UNABRIDGED

CARL VAN DOREN,
Ph.D., says:

"The best one-volume treatment of sex in the English language."

BERTRAND RUSSELL says:

"Few books on the subject of sex can be so confidently recommended as this truly admirable volume."

FREE OFFER

THE NATION says:

"There is probably no better introduction to contemporary knowledge and contemporary theories about the physiology, psychology and hygiene of sex."

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 440-N
333 Sixth Ave., New York City

Send me a copy of Havelock Ellis' Psychology of Sex for free examination. I will deposit $3.00 plus a few cents delivery charge when the book arrives. Full purchase price to be refunded, if returned within 5 days.

Name.....

Address.....

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $3, thus saving delivery charge. (Same money-back guarantee.)

MEXICO—This Summer Of Course!

And while there, join The Summer School of the Workers University of Mexico. June 29-August 15. Your only means to look deep into the soul of the oldest and the newest country in the Americas. Your only way to know and understand the real Mexico.

Information cheerfully given by Workers University of Mexico, Rosales, No. 26, Mexico City or by the Mexican Council and the representatives of the National Railways of Mexico throughout the U. S. N. Y. C. representative: José Miguel Bejarano, 205 West 34 St.

COOPERATIVE DEMOCRACY

by James P. Warbasse

President, Cooperative League of the U.S.A.

... the standard manual on consumers' cooperation!

THE rapid spread of consumers' cooperatives is one of the outstanding facts of our day. In America several thousand are in active operation and everywhere people are turning to them as a method of lessening the cost of living by lessening the cost of distribution. Here is the last and most complete word on WHAT and WHY cooperation is, HOW it works, HOW it can be organized, in a third completely rewritten edition of this standard work. THE indispensable manual on operating methods and theory. 285 pages. $2.50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 49 E. 33rd Street, New York City

LIFE INSURANCE

A CRITICAL EXAMINATION

by Edward Berman

... does your life insurance cost too much?

HERE, based on official reports, is an original appraisal of the operating efficiency of the life insurance business. Fifteen major companies are compared as to net costs, investment yield, officers' salaries, etc., and the experience of the Massachusetts Savings Bank Life Insurance System is presented. In no sense an attack on life insurance, this book raises numerous questions concerning the extent to which the policy-holding public is being economically served. Its proposals for reforms and its ratings of comparative efficiency will interest every insurance buyer and seller. $2.00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 49 E. 33rd Street, New York City

established between metaphysical theories and political conclusions. This the author fails to do. And in his case the task of showing the relevance of metaphysics to politics is all the more imperative because many thinkers who have subscribed to the generic type of idealism embraced by Mr. Rothschild hold political views quite at variance with his own. Conversely, many who agree with the glimpses Mr. Rothschild presents of his political philosophy would reject his metaphysical utterances as either meaningless or quite definitely false. Many wise sayings flash through the pages of this book, but not one of them depends upon the setting in which it is found.

It is a pity that Mr. Rothschild saw fit to ride his metaphysical hobby horses in these dialogues, especially since he has given them full rein in other writings. He would have been more faithful to the title of the book if he had permitted his sensitive intelligence to play upon the important problems involved in accepting both economic collectivism and the values of individuality, personality, and freedom of intellectual inquiry. It is not enough these days for a writer to proclaim his allegiance to collectivism. The existence of collectivists whose conception of the life of mind suggests the cultural monism of the totalitarian state makes it necessary to state what kind of collectivism is meant. Is it to be a collectivism in which democratic processes of control exist? Or is it to be a collectivism administered by a dictatorship of a minority political party? Is the relative autonomy of art, science, and philosophy to be respected? Or is everything to be retarded as a matter of politics and settled by instruments of political coercion? We cannot begin soon enough to make the necessary distinctions between the various kinds of collectivism—not only in the interests of intellectual clarity but because the battles of tomorrow will in all probability be fought around the issues they raise. These problems would have been worthy of Mr. Rothschild's historical protagonists. Perhaps some day he will return to them without the irrelevant metaphysical metaphors.

SIDNEY HOOK

The Spirit of China

MIRROR OF CHINA. By Louis Laloy. Translated by Catherine A. Phillips. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

FRENCH interest in the Orient is of very long standing. More than two hundred years ago the Jesuit missionaries began learning the Chinese language and culture with greater enthusiasm than they were to show in teaching Christianity. The opening New Year of the eighteenth century at the French court was celebrated with Chinese festivities. As far back as 1815 the Collège de France had a Chinese chair, occupied by Abel Rémusat, long before any other European university had anything similar to offer. Rémusat translated as "The Two Cousins" a Chinese novel called "Ju Kiao Li" and delighted Leigh Hunt, Thomas Carlyle, and John Stirling. Théophile Gautier thought Chinese the most important language in the world and secured a native tutor for his daughter. A like enthusiasm is felt by Maspéro, Pelliot, and Laloy.

For thirty years M. Laloy has been studying China, its language and literature. He wrote a good book on Chinese music a quarter of a century ago. He is teaching in the Institut des Hautes Etudes Chinoises at the University of Paris, besides directing the National Opera and writing musical criticism in the Revue des Deux Mondes. In 1931 the university sent him to China to study the modern theater and literature. "Mirror of China" is the result of his journey through the Suez Canal, Ceylon, Singapore, Annam, China, Manchuria, and Siberia.

He met many Chinese scholars and artists, some of whom he had known in France, and he lived and talked with them of literature, the arts, the theater, and politics. In the French colony of Indo-China he feels the unfortunate situation of the natives. "The Annamites employed in the administration receive salaries greatly inferior to those of the French. Primary education is inadequate, and secondary education available only as rare favor. Higher education is only to be had in France. The students who return after enjoying it are indignant at the difference between that land, where they are treated as equals, and the colony, where they are held at arm's length. Taxation falls heavily upon everybody, and they are not spared humiliations." Naturally some who return try to stir the people with revolutionary ideas; then they try to escape to China through the forest frontier, as the Koreans to Siberia. If they are captured they are labeled radicals and at once executed. But most of them linger as long as possible on the Paris streets. M. Laloy is angriest at the Japanese for their Asiatic invasions. He sympathizes with the inscription in every lecture room at the Chinese University, "Down with Japanese imperialism."

Modern China is too busy observing things Western. The literary critic likes to quote Aristotle's "Poetics" or Shelley's "A Defense of Poetry" rather than Confucius or Yen Yu. That is the Geist of the time. M. Laloy sees the mal-education of Chinese youth. Although the Catholic University teaches every branch of Chinese civilization, in too many universities the students learn nothing. They lack culture and moral stamina. He says that the Chinese government has made the irretrievable error of excluding the classical works of China from the curriculum. "The sole ambition is to obtain a diploma. . . . As for a diploma, it means nothing, for most of the Chinese universities have adopted the American method, which makes it the reward of regular attendance at lectures without any examination into the students' acquirements, and accepts marks of attendance and written tests as a substitute for examination marks."

M. Laloy describes all the Chinese types: the reformer, the philosopher, the painter, the poet, the coolie. He notices the children and says, "The children I had seen in China, whether rich or poor, whether petted or in rags, were all nice, friendly, smiling, and innocently trustful, as though the cruelty of man was a thing unknown to them." Personally I don't think that Chinese children or servants are any better than Western, but I can understand M. Laloy; there is an Oriental saying, "If you think your wife is beautiful, you will see beauty even in the pile of dung in your in-law's barnyard."

He gives a very good picture of Chinese cookery—the taste of swallows-nest soup, "the savor of an unseen ocean" in the soft transparent white seaweeds. Of course the Chinese spend much time in cooking; like the French, they consider cooking an art and never take only a few minutes for cooking steak as in America. A Chinese fed on Kartoffeln in Germany meal after meal, or mutton in England every day can appreciate his native cooking as much as M. Laloy, not for materialistic reasons alone but because he recalls how even the celebrated Li T'ai Po drew his "happiest imagery from brimming cup," and how the exiled Tu Fu enjoyed his roast beef. Both reached the poets' heaven by these means—one by kissing the moon in the lake while drunk and the other by overeating roast beef while hungry.

M. Laloy's pages on Chinese music are very stimulating. Once a disciple played a few wrong notes before his master Confucius, who remarked: "He has mounted the threshold to the outer hall, but has not yet penetrated to the inner apartments." M. Laloy has entered into the soul of Chinese music,

Distinguished Novels of recent years

STUDS LONIGAN
By James T. Farrell

GAS-HOUSE MCGINTY
By James T. Farrell

HOMAGE TO BLENHOLT
By Daniel Fuchs

SUMMER IN WILLIAMSBURG
By Daniel Fuchs

SOMEBODY IN BOOTS
By Nelson Algren

THE SAME PUBLISHERS
NOW ANNOUNCE

JOURNAL OF A YOUNG MAN

By MARTIN DELANEY

$2.50 At All Bookstores

VANGUARD ■ 41 Madison Avenue ■ New York City

For The Thinking Citizenry Of These United States

CRIME and JUSTICE By Sheldon Glueck

This book is a penetrating diagnosis of the ills of criminal justice (as reflected in jails, prosecutor's offices, courts, prisons, and administrators) together with wise and practical suggestions for the improvement of agencies to control crime.

It is an easy-to-read, trenchant and profound study which involves several fields of knowledge: law, psychology, psychiatry, sociology, government and politics.

SHOULD BE READ BY EVERY INTELLIGENT LAYMAN!

*Selected as the May choice of The Scientific Book Club.
Recommended by The Book-of-the-Month Club.*

Price $3.00. Purchase from your bookseller or tear out and mail this advertisement to

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY 34 Beacon St., Boston

Name

Address

Check enclosed ☐

Send C.O.D. ☐

VISITING RUSSIA

with

EXPERTS

5 weeks in Soviet Russia under leadership of

LOUIS FISCHER

Special services and comforts. Round trip including Tourist steamship passage $850

1 month in Soviet Russia under leadership of

JULIEN BRYAN

Great centers and places seldom seen by tourists. Round trip including Third Class steamship passage..... $575

1 month in Soviet Russia under leadership of

JOSHUA KUNITZ

A comprehensive itinerary. Round trip including Third Class steamship passage $469

Other trips from $372

or you may travel on your own.

BOOKLETS ON REQUEST

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street, New York

Cooperating with Intourist

Public Affairs Pamphlets

Indispensable supplements to your daily reading

PUBLIC AFFAIRS PAMPHLETS are concise and readable digests of the more important pieces of contemporary research on problems of national interest. They are published by the PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE whose membership is composed of representatives of the country's leading research organizations in the social sciences.

Available Now:

Income and Economic Progress

(Brookings Institution)

Maxwell S. Stewart

Labor and the New Deal

(Twentieth Century Fund)

Louis Stark

Our Government—For Spoils or Service?

(Institute of Public Administration)

Ayers Brinser

June 1:

Security or the Dole?

(A summary of available data)

Maxwell S. Stewart

Single Copies—10c

Subscription to series of 12—$1.00

Greatly reduced rates for quantity lots.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE
National Press Building, Washington, D. C.

which is a mere ting-jang monotony to most Westerners. He thinks the union of the music of China and Europe is possible, because the scales are constructed upon exactly the same notes. "The points of contact do exist. To discover them, it would be necessary to know the history of music not only in Germany but in Europe, from the Middle Ages down to the present." He is right, and no one would be better able to point out these similarities than himself.

Just as he grants to every note its music, saying, "Music imparts the same emotion to all those who listen to it: it encourages humanity," so M. Laloy chooses his own words carefully, seeking to communicate sound, smell, shade, and hue. Describing a Chinese landscape as he saw it on an excursion outside the city, he says, "The silence is only broken by a stream, falling in a series of waterfalls, but invisible beneath the dark moss. We are like those initiated into the mysteries, who hunt for the cloven mushroom, shining among dark undergrowth, which is said to prolong human life." Such lines as these convey China's secret of power and suave tranquillity. M. Laloy writes with beauty of color harmonized by his sense of form.

The translation from the French is well done.

YOUNGHILL KANG

Shorter Notices

RAW MATERIALS, POPULATION PRESSURE, AND WAR. By Sir Norman Angell. Boston: World Peace Foundation. 75 cents.

It has been fashionable of late to give an economic complexion to all causes leading to war. In this pamphlet Sir Norman Angell shows with admirable clarity and conciseness that other more subtle causes often account for military adventures. Both Japan and Italy have given the need of access to raw materials and population pressure as reasons for their present militaristic ventures, but history shows that the colonies which each have possessed for years have not been instrumental in solving either problem. As the author pointedly sets forth, "these efforts for new territory, the vast risks and costs undertaken in these military adventures, do not represent any carefully thought-out plan of economic advantage, welfare, wealth, prosperity; they represent that struggle for power which is the sole means of defense available for a nation in a world of international anarchy." Constantly changing tariffs, the lack of monetary stability, and the ignorance of these facts on the part of the public have served as major factors in causing these unsettled conditions. These conditions of "international anarchy" have in turn led nations to seek security and defense "by the method of anarchy, by individual power, which means that each must try to be stronger than the other." The tariff policy of the United States has contributed a great deal to these barriers to international cooperation. It is unjust then to assume an attitude of public horror against the Italian and Japanese governments for seeking a solution, however misguided and futile, to conditions in which we ourselves have played a leading part. "We must face the fact," Sir Norman Angell continues, "that a nation's tariff policy, exchange restrictions, monetary policy, have ceased to be purely its own affair." Although the author does not see much hope in world conferences, since the ones we have had in the past have failed so miserably, he sees some possibility of a slow extension of these principles through the activities of such bodies as the International Labor Office, by cooperation among central banks, and by bilateral commercial treaties. In the last analysis, however, he finds that "steadily movement in the right direction will be impossible if public opinion, expressing itself in pressure upon politicians and governments, continues to be dominated by certain misconceptions which have hampered sound policy in the past."

VIVE LE ROY. By Ford Madox Ford. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.50.

Novels of mystery have never been noted for their authenticity, but there are limits, conceivably, even to the credulity of mystery fans. Herein Mr. Ford exceeds these limits so freely and so often that his laborious roguishness serves only to emphasize his novel's basic falsity. The scene is that of a future royalist France just recently succored from the bungling rule of Communists. Into its turbulence is transported an American hero (non-Communist) charged with delivering to the Parisian comrades $20,000 from a strangely wealthy New York party. On shipboard appears a Greenwich Village artist-heroine to chatter Fordian-American slang with a Fordian-English accent. "Paradise!" she exclaims at intervals, and seems obsessed—during attacks of Fordian streams of consciousness—with "beasts" who want to "make" her "whilst" she slumbers. By the time the two arrive in Paris they are passionately in love for no good reason; a Dutch detective has appeared to sniff a plot and plant some clues; a French Lord Chamberlain has given indications of greater mystery than his beady eye and ebon beard at first would indicate. Then ensues much Message to Garcia business, replete with cloak-and-sword trappings and a savor of the Man in the Iron Mask, complicated no end by camelots (pernicious fellows given to jabbing hypodermics into unsuspecting conspirators). By page 209 the reader has solved the creaking mystery for himself. Unfortunately, Mr. Ford requires an additional 133 pages in which to recapitulate. It is one thing for him to have had "a glorious time"—as the jacket proclaims—in concocting his mystery; it is quite another for him to have lacked the skill to hide the scaffold of his plot until the end. He embarrasses the reader throughout by the difficulty he has in deducing his own deductions.

RECORDS

VICTOR treats us this month to a small Brahms festival. The most important item is the second piano concerto—the first recording in some years—played by Artur Schnabel with the B. B. C. Orchestra under Adrian Boult (six records, $12). There are a few minor disappointments: some of the runs are smudged; the top register of the piano does not record so brilliantly on wax as does the orchestra; and one could have wished for a less tentative statement of the beautiful Immer leiser theme of the third movement by the solo cello. But these flaws do not seriously detract from a broadly and poetically conceived performance by both soloist and orchestra. In the hands of lesser artists this concerto sometimes seems to fall apart into a bundle of unrelated parts. Not so here. Despite the wide variety of mood and the wealth of thematic material, this is a mature, well-knit, and thoroughly masculine performance.

The second major item of the festival is a re-recording of the First Symphony by Stokowski and the Philadelphians (five records, $10). Those familiar with the earlier recording will recognize the characteristic brilliance of the strings and the slightly exaggerated portamento. Space does not permit a de-

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE

MOROSCO THEATRE, 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Wednesday & Saturday at 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:45

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:45
Seats at $1.10

"The most tormenting war play of the year has come from a new man . . . Mr. Shaw's grimly imaginative rebellion against warfare is a shattering bit of theatre magic that burrows under the skin of argument into the raw flesh of sensation."

—BROOKS ATKINSON, N. Y. Times

BURY THE DEAD

The Drama That Startled the World

By IRWIN SHAW

BARRYMORE THEATRE, 47 St. W. of B'y | Prices: Evgs. 50c to $2.00
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. 2:40 | Mats. Wed. & Sat. 50c to $1.50

RECORDED MUSIC

MUSIC LOVERS

Sale! Brunswick-Polydor-Decca . . . the world's finest recorded music. 50c — 75c per record. Regular price $1.50 and $2.00. The Symphonies, Chamber Music, Operas, of BACH, WAGNER, BEETHOVEN, SCHUBERT, BRAHMS, etc. Mail Orders sent anywhere. Complete Catalog "N" on request. Also Victor and Columbia Records.

MUSIC SERVICE, 111 E. 14th, N. Y. C.

Benjamin Stolberg on Jews and the World

In this brilliant article to appear soon in The Nation, Benjamin Stolberg answers the arguments advanced in "Jews in America" by the editors of Fortune.

tailed comparison of the two versions, but in the newer one Mr. Stokowski depends for his musical effects more on clearly articulated line than on dramatic devices.

To round out the Brahms program, there are four Lieder sung by Elisabeth Schumann on one ten-inch record ($1.50). This is the least satisfactory of the contributions as Mme. Schumann, despite an exquisitely clear natural voice, affects the pet vices of many Liedersänger—scooping and unnecessarily marked dynamics. They are particularly noticeable in the familiar "Wiegenlied."

Still in a festival mood, Victor issues an album entitled "Highlights from Aïda" (six records, $10). This contains no fewer than three sopranos as Aïda (Ponselle, Giannini, and Rethberg), three tenors as Rhadames (Caruso, Pertile, and Martinelli), and five orchestras (Victor, Boston "Pops," La Scala, Berlin State Opera, and an anonymous "with orchestra"). The result is, of course, a hodge-podge, but an extremely interesting one. The old Caruso "Celeste Aïda," fitted out with a fresh orchestral accompaniment, is magically resurrected so that it sounds more lifelike than the old record from which it must have been taken. However, it is still without the overtones of, say, the Ponselle-Martinelli "O terra addio," the last record in the album. The most brilliant recording is, as usual, turned in by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra with the Grand March and the "Ballabili," while the most beautiful singing from the role of Aïda is done by Elisabeth Rethberg in "O patria mia."

Columbia specializes this month in Nathan Milstein's violin playing. The Vitali Chaconne is reissued in an album with the Adagio from Bach's G minor sonata for violin alone (two records, $3). In addition Columbia brings out a short recital including the Vivaldi D major sonata and four shorter pieces (three records, $1.50 each). Mr. Milstein is at his best in passages that require a clean, clear technique, notably the last movement of the Vivaldi and the Paganini-Kreisler "La Campanella." Leopold Mittmann's alert and well-recorded accompaniments are important contributions to the success of these records.

The Kolisch Quartet adds the Schubert String Quartet in A minor to its list for Columbia, and for good measure throws in the Quartetsatz in C minor, the second theme of which is the source of "Say It with Music" (eight records, $6). It may be because the Kolisch members play without notes and thus do not have the interference of music stands that the separate voices record with remarkable clearness. Even when the tone of Mr. Kolisch himself, the first violin, stands out with unusual strength, the other three voices are clearly articulated. The first movement, which opens with a beautiful song-like theme in the first violin accompanied by two different rhythmical figures and bass, is a good illustration of this fine clarity.

Other recent recordings by Victor include some highly engaging virtuosity by Vladimir Horowitz in two pieces by Poulenc and an étude by Debussy (one record, $2); more virtuosity by Gregor Piatigorsky wasted on some nonsense by Weber and expended more profitably on a "Largo and Vivo" by Francœur (one record, $2); and two competently played and splendidly recorded overtures by the B. B. C. Symphony Orchestra under Adrian Boult—Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" and Beethoven's "Coriolan," both of which needed more modern recordings (one record each, $1.50). And if you want to hear a handsome performance of the kind of music you get in New York Russian restaurants, try Columbia's release of a Russian and a Bessarabian folksong arranged and sung by Peter Lescenco (one record, $1).

HENRY SIMON

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

IDIOT'S DELIGHT. Shubert Theater. Robert Sherwood manages somehow to make a smashing theatrical success out of an anti-war play. With the Lunts and many other entertaining trimmings.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

SAINT JOAN. Martin Beck Theater. Brilliant interpretation by Katharine Cornell of what may well be Shaw's most enduring play.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

GILBERT AND SULLIVAN REPERTORY. Majestic Theater. The same company which usually appears about this time of year in pleasant revivals. A weekly change of program.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

MR. DEEDS GOES TO TOWN. Columbia. Directed by Frank Capra, and even better than "It Happened One Night." Gary Cooper as the rustic and quixotic Mr. Deeds is not only charming but meaningful, and the whole film has human importance.

PEG OF OLD DRURY. British and Dominion (Paramount). An eighteenth-century costume piece with Sir Cedric Hardwicke as David Garrick and Anna Neagle as Peg Woffington. Delightfully unhistorical.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Gaumont British. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

DUBROVSKY. Amkino. As romantic as Pushkin, on whose unfinished novel it is based. Not wholly successful, but interesting as a variation on the orthodox Russian theme.

Letters to the Editors

VEBLEN AND HENRY GEORGE

Dear Sirs: Max Lerner gives us an evaluation of Veblen in The Nation of March 11 that is at once stimulating and disappointing. Surely in his final paragraph Mr. Lerner allows his enthusiasm for Veblen—which I confess I share—to seduce his critical judgment. "Such phrases," he writes, "as 'conspicuous waste,' 'absentee ownership,' 'vested interests,' 'leisure class,' 'invidious distinction,' 'calculable future,' have worked themselves into the texture of our own vocabulary in a way that shows the enduring appeal of Veblen's writing."

The theory of vested interests was a doctrine of American radical social philosophy before "The Vested Interests and the State of the Industrial Arts" made its appearance in 1919. Aside from the rise of the shibboleth into popular use in the '80's and '90's, the idea received formulation at the hands of Henry George in "The Science of Political Economy." Actually, its outlines appeared in George's editorials years before.

Those of us who feel that it can in no sense detract from the many other contributors to the philosophy of American radical liberalism to insist upon the importance of George, the social philosopher, can but remain unsatisfied with the work of a competent reviewer which includes the sweeping statement: "His [Veblen's] approach to the problems of this generation would be quite different from that of the other progressives and radicals."

This, obviously, excludes George, though he did "seek the roots of fascism not only in the immediate struggle for power but more searchingly in the entire history of the predatory barbarian tradition." It also excludes John Dewey, certainly an appreciative contemporary of Veblen. Mr. Lerner should ask himself if Veblen's approach is not characteristic of the radical wing of American Populism.

In these shortcomings Mr. Lerner is not alone. In all that has been written in recent years on Veblen, critical and eulogistic, the statements have become common. Previously, they could be ignored. But when a critic with Mr. Lerner's background gives them currency, it is time to object lest the interpretations become legendary. Perhaps if there were available an adequate study of the relation between George's thought and Veblen's this letter would not have had to be written.

EDWARD W. BELL

Clifton, N. J., April 20

"GERMANY—A WINTER'S TALE"

Dear Sirs: In your issue of April 22 Lion Feuchtwanger refers to Heinrich Heine's satirical "Germany—a Winter's Tale," and points out its timeliness. How gifted a prophet Heine was is shown strikingly by a passage in the first volume of his book "Über Deutschland," in the chapter headed Zur Geschichte der Religion und Philosophie in Deutschland. It reads, in translation:

Christendom—and this is its most beautiful merit—has somewhat mollified that brutal Germanic lust for battle, but could not destroy it, and when the taming talisman, the cross, finally breaks down, then there will again come clashing up the wildness of the old battlers, the mad Berserk rage of which the Nordic poets sing and tell so much. That talisman is decaying, and the day will come when it collapses pitifully. The old stone gods will then rise from the long-forgotten debris and rub the dust of a thousand years out of their eyes, and Thor with the giant hammer will finally spring up and shatter the Gothic cathedrals.

S. MILES BOUTON

Ashville, N. Y., April 18

Dear Sirs: In the course of his article "Germany—a Winter's Tale" Lion Feuchtwanger has made some misleading statements. In particular I take issue with him on the question whether or not Germany has been brought to her present state as a result of the activities of the Hitler government.

Regardless of who caused the Great War, regardless of how Germany might have treated the Allies had she been the victor, the fact remains that the Allies made Germany what she is. Having gone through four years of hell, the last of which saw a skin-and-bone civilian population, Germans were faced with the probability of becoming slaves, and having their children become slaves, to the Allied Powers for the next ten, twenty, thirty years. In a land filled with chaos, in a land where money was so abundant that its holders used it for book covers and wall paper, or cherished it as a bitter memento to be handed down to their offspring—in this land of misery the Allies proceeded to degrade the German people still further, to strip them of their last vestiges of honor and self-respect.

Are we, then, to believe, as Mr. Feuchtwanger does, that it is Hitlerism that has "reduced to slim rations, inadequate living quarters," the people "which once had the means to be well fed and well clothed"? No. Germany's plight has not been the work of the Third Reich but of those nations that are today so desperately convening councils, signing pacts, and declaring for peace—the war-time Allied powers.

LEONARD A. GREENBERG

New York, April 20

VERMONTERS STILL ON STRIKE

Dear Sirs: The striking marble workers in Rutland County, Vermont, are now in their seventh month of struggle (under the leadership of their union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor) for decent working conditions. They are fighting against the feudal regime of the Proctor family, which has dominated the economic and political life of Vermont for decades.

A false story is now being circulated that the strike is over. This is not true. Six months ago 670 men came out, and 640 are still on strike after fighting through a bitter Vermont winter on an average income of $1.86 per family per week.

The Vermont Marble Company is now using all means to smash this strike, destroy the union, and drive the quarrymen and marble workers back to work without a union agreement. Five strikers were convicted and sentenced a week ago to from one to two years on the charge of attacking a strike-breaker. They are now in the state penitentiary, held without bail pending appeal. During the past few weeks the local press has reported several cases of "dynamiting" which strangely enough do not hurt any one or anything. Rewards of $600 are posted for the arrest of the culprits. This is the old game of prejudicing public opinion against strikers by "arranging" dynamitings and the like. Out of these events, however, may come a frame-up of union leaders.

The strike goes on. The workers will fight and win if you will help them right now. Meetings are held at Room 9, 7 West Fourteenth Street, every Monday night at 8 p.m. Come and help the Green Mountain boys win their fight.

PERCY SHOSTAC,

Chairman, United Committee to Aid Vermont Marble Workers
New York, May 4

THE NATION IN PRISON

Dear Sirs: The International Labor Defense has complied with the prison requirements of Salem Penitentiary, but none of the liberal publications including The Nation are being delivered to Dirk De Jonge and Edward Denny there. For the past two weeks the papers have been sent direct to the prison.

We urge you to publish this fact, explaining to your readers that this interference with the mail of political prisoners is a blow against freedom of the press. The fact that the Oregon Journal, a reactionary publication, is delivered to them and that other capitalistic papers are sold in the prison proves this. Readers should send letters of protest to Warden W. J. Lewis, Route 6, Box 1, Salem, Oregon.

EARL STEWARD

Portland, Ore., April 22

WILL CALIFORNIA REPEAL THE SALES TAX?

Dear Sirs: The article by Lillian Symes in The Nation of April 22 entitled After Epic in California fails to touch upon what seems to me the most important feature of the political landscape in California today. This is the pending constitutional amendment submitted under the initiative providing for the repeal of the sales tax and the gradual removal during a period of five years of all taxation upon improvements and tangible personal property.

The real-estate boards and the chambers of commerce are under no delusions about the fundamental character of this proposition and are raising thousands of dollars more than six months before the election to encompass its defeat. Whether they will succeed or not cannot be told till Election Day, but the alarm of the privileged groups cannot be discounted. Evidently the pocket nerve has been seriously touched, and the California papers are filled with misrepresentations of its purpose and effect.

Meanwhile all the trade-union groups are united behind it, and the small business men are joining in the fight. The same is true of all progressive newspapers, though the so-called great dailies hear the master's voice and oppose it.

JACKSON H. RALSTON

Palo Alto, Cal., April 21

THE WAY TO DISARM—

Dear Sirs: Versatile and energetic, the baffling Gentleman from New York, Vito Marcantonio, recently introduced into Congress a sufficiently startling constitutional amendment to prick the curiosity of your readers. Incidentally he has earned the gratitude of the Woman's Peace Union, which from profound conscientious motives drafted this amendment which not alone outlaws war for the United States but actually and categorically provides for complete independent disarmament. Introduced into the Senate ten years ago by a realistic "dirt farmer" of North Dakota, Senator Lynn J. Frazier, it has afforded a keen talking-point for three hearings in Washington.

Success, therefore, to H. J. Res. 528!

TRACY D. MYGATT

New York, April 11

QUILTS FOR LABOR

Dear Sirs: A group of housewives in Santa Cruz, California, experts in piecing and quilting handworked quilts in the early American tradition, spend several afternoons a week in making such quilts, all money from their sale going to the International Labor Defense for aid to political and labor prisoners.

They take orders for quilts in any size, color scheme, or pattern. Information can be had from, and orders placed with, the Northern California district office of the International Labor Defense, Room 410, 1005 Market Street.

MADELINE CRAIG

San Francisco, March 26

CORRECTION

[In an editorial paragraph on the strike in the May store in Brooklyn, in The Nation for April 22, reference was made to "May's Department Store." No reference was intended to the May Company, known as the May Department Stores, with branches in Los Angeles and several other cities.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

CONTRIBUTORS

MARGARET MARSHALL was a member of the fence-sitting fraternity who managed to follow the important proceedings of the convention of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, although they were not allowed inside. With Rose Stein as guide, she also visited a number of steel towns in the Pittsburgh area.

JAMES T. FARRELL is the author of the Studs Lonigan trilogy, the last of which, "Judgment Day," was available for the Pulitzer novel prize, but was evidently too distinguished to receive it.

LOUIS FISCHER mailed his article from Rome eight days before the departure of Emperor Haile Selassie from Addis Ababa, when Mussolini's Ethiopian adventure was all over but the shouting—and the menacing consequences which Mr. Fischer so ably discusses.

GEORGE SELDES, author of "Freedom of the Press" and "Sawdust Caesar," was a foreign correspondent in various countries of Europe from 1916 to 1928.

S. GORLEY PUTT is an Englishman doing graduate work as a fellow at Yale.

SIDNEY HOOK, author of "Towards the Understanding of Karl Marx," is professor of philosophy at New York University.

YOUNGHILL KANG, a Korean student of the literature and philosophy of the Orient, wrote the story of his life in "The Grass Roof." He is a member of the English Department of New York University.

THE DRAWINGS on pages 640 and 641 are taken from the Anti-War and Anti-Fascist International Exhibition of Drawings, Prints, and Cartoons, held recently at the New School of Social Research in New York City under the auspices of the American Artists' Congress. The exhibition will be shown in Cleveland, Chicago, Minneapolis, Boston, Detroit, St. Louis, and Philadelphia.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · MAY 27, 1936

NUMBER 3699

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

661

EDITORIALS:

COAL IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL

664

CAN EUROPE AVERT WAR?

665

BOOMERANG AT SEA

666

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

667

THE CORPORATE TAX BATTLE by Max Lerner

669

TREASON AMONG THE FUTURE VETERANS

by James Wechsler

672

THE AUSTRIAN VOLCANO by M. W. Fodor

673

VERMONT: STATE OF ANARCHY

by a Special Correspondent

675

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

677

BROUN'S PAGE

678

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

TACKS IN AN EDITOR'S CHAIR

by Joseph Wood Krutch

679

"IT IS NOT FORBIDDEN TO THINK"

by Marianne Moore

680

THE CULT OF EMOTION by Clifton Fadiman

681

THE TRAGEDIAN PARNELL by Horace Gregory

682

THE COMING WAR IN THE EAST

by Maxwell S. Stewart

684

RADIO by Heywood Broun

686

FILMS: DOCUMENTARY by Mark Van Doren

687

THE INTELLIGENT TRAVELER

by John Rothschild

689

DRAWINGS by Georges Schreiber and Dan Reed

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Gruening,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

The Shape of Things

*

RELIEF, RESETTLEMENT, AND PUBLIC WORKS are sharing the Washington limelight along with the tax bill and the Guffey decision. The last-named two are discussed elsewhere in this issue. The tangle of Mr. Hopkins, Mr. Ickes, and Mr. Tugwell in their struggle for a place in the sun of relief funds does not seem to yield even to Mr. Roosevelt's diplomacy and cajolery. Ickes has forced the President's hand with his threat of resignation, and is likely to get some RFC funds. Tugwell, less strategically secure, has fallen on evil days. The Nation has in several articles criticized the administration and aims of his resettlement work. Nevertheless, whatever its specific faults, there can be no doubt of its value as an experiment in long-range planning. The Tugwells and their measures must be kept from being fed to the Liberty League lions. But even if they are saved from that dire fate, there are always the courts. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia has declared Tugwell's model-housing project at Bound Brook, New Jersey, unconstitutional. This will probably mean that even the scanty PWA funds that Mr. Roosevelt has mentioned as possibly going to resettlement work will now be withheld. Since Mr. Tugwell's funds for the model-housing project came from relief appropriations, the court's decision has cast doubt on the validity of the relief program. How serious this doubt is cannot be determined until the Supreme Court has had a chance to pass on it. Meanwhile it is another instance of the chaos that can be produced by leaving the decision of social policy in judicial hands.

*

IT IS NO CRIME IN FLORIDA TO BEAT A MAN TO death. This was the astonishing implication of the argument advanced by counsel for the defense in a plea for a directed verdict of acquittal in the Tampa kidnaping case. Three men, Eugene S. Poulnot, Dr. Samuel J. Rogers, and Joseph Shoemaker were kidnaped last November, tarred and feathered, and beaten with a chain and a leather strap; Shoemaker died of his injuries. Seven policemen, among them former Chief of Police R. G. Tittsworth, were indicted for "kidnaping"—murder was not mentioned. At the close of the prosecution's case Judge Robert T. Dewell did in fact acquit Tittsworth of being an accessory after the fact, and also another of the defendants, Robert Chappell. The remaining five defendants will continue to be tried, but too much hope need not be held out for a verdict of guilty. From the beginning the trial has been not a simple consideration of a brutal attack upon three unarmed men, but a political battle, in which the issues were communism, the overthrow of the United States government, the menace of Norman Thomas—and the Ku Klux Klan and the power of the large citrus growers in the state. The defendants were known to and identified by the victims. But this was unimportant compared to the alleged fact that the Modern Democrats, the political organization with which the three victims were affiliated, were dangerously red. Testimony that meetings of the group were opened by a rendition of "America" surprised but did not seriously disconcert the defense. The two men who, presumably under fear of testifying, committed suicide while the case was pending might have saved themselves the trouble.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

*

STEEL WILL BE ORGANIZED. THE RESOLUTION adopted by the convention of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers in Canonsburg, Pennsylvania, did not expressly accept the $500,000 offer of the Committee for Industrial Organization. There were too many faces to be saved. Instead, it was a little masterpiece in resolutions. It welcomed the cooperation of the craft unions dominating the A. F. of L. executive council as well as the help of industrial-union advocates in the C. I. O. At the same time it set a limit to the jurisdictional hunger of the crafts. The Amalgamated, reads the resolution, seeks the cooperation of all national and international unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. Such cooperation is to consist of (1) the waiving of any and all rights or claims of jurisdiction in the steel industry by any and all interested organizations; and (2) contributions, trained organizers, and where possible donation of funds. A third provision stipulates that organizations meeting the requirements of points one and two be requested to participate on a joint committee. Since the organizations of the C. I. O. have already waived any jurisdictional claims and have made an offer of real money, they may be expected to have places on the committee to organize the steel workers as soon as it is formed.

*

ROY HOWARD HAS DISCOVERED A CREATIVE writer after his own heart in Rupert Hughes, whose revolt from the Screen Writers' Guild is dealt with by Heywood Broun on another page of this issue. At the moment Mr. Howard is engaged in a manful struggle to retain the liberal readership of the New York World-Telegram while at the same time he fights off the menace of the Newspaper Guild demanding a contract. When Rupert Hughes, king of the free lancers, bolted from the Screen Writers' Guild, Mr. Howard wired him in this fashion:

Only about twenty-five words printed here your statement Screen Guild's closed-shop policy would create writers' soviet. Think important public understand implications this attempt hogtie and standardize creative writing. Newspaper Guild also attempting effect editorial workers' closed shop. Would restrict all reporting and even editorial writing to members committed to closed-shop trade unionism thus eliminating dissenting and controversial opinion from all newspapers. Net effect would be guild dictatorship of American press on parity with Communist, Fascist, or Nazi unilateral press dictatorships abroad. Difference be here guild would dictate policies, owners retain responsibility and foot bills. . . . Will you wire World-Telegram press collect five hundred to thousand words grounds and significance your revolt and prospects for spread this anti-regimentation movement among creative writers. Would like you incidentally point out menace to democratic institutions of attempting limit editorial expression to proponents of any one school of . . . thought.

*

THE EXCERPTS FROM MR. HUGHES'S REPLY cited on Broun's Page bear out his proud boast that he has always found it easy to work with editors, though they cast some doubt on his claim to be a creative writer. Mr. Howard's telegram of appreciation to Mr. Hughes is both shorter and more significant:

Many thanks and my sincere appreciation. That shot punched out the geometric center of the bull's eye. Am asking the press association to watch your efforts tonight which I think are of vital importance to real liberty of the writing craft and honest to God freedom of expression.

Since Mr. Howard owns a large share of the United Press we may expect to see in its dispatches an increasing amount of freedom of the press as defined by Hearst, Howard, and Hughes. Meanwhile, it might be well if some of Howard's best friends enlightened him, press collect, on at least one reason why the World-Telegram is no longer regarded as a liberal newspaper.

*

IS LEON BLUM DOOMED TO BE THE KERENSKY of a new revolution in France? In certain superficial aspects the parallel is startling. He has the support but not the collaboration of the Communists, who are forming local committees all over the country to see to it that the program of the People's Front is promptly put into effect. He is forced to shape his Cabinet from material supplied largely by non-Socialists, insuring a fundamental division of opinion on all important issues. He must struggle within the confines of the capitalist system to support a collapsing financial structure which the capitalists themselves have abandoned. What can he do but temporize and compromise and finally fall under the weight of an impossible load of conflicting obligations and efforts? But the likeness to Kerensky evaporates at exactly this point. Blum and his left-center Cabinet have powerful support in the need of a stable anti-fascist government in France. The Communists will doubtless use their freedom from responsibility to press Blum as far as they dare, brandishing their loyalty to the People's Front program as a weapon of attack. But they will not cause the government to fall while fascism and war stalk along the political horizon. If realistic patriotism and self-preservation were not enough to hold them in line, the influence of the U. S. S. R. would doubtless do so; Russia cannot afford a revolution in France while Hitler rules in Germany. The Radical Socialists also desire the maintenance of republican government and the alliance with Russia. The day has passed when a French ministry could be allowed to fall over a trifling financial dispute—or a major one. Even in the face of the doomed franc, the Blum government will probably be held together not by the strength of a united front in support of social reform but by the strongest of all social forces—fear.

*

WITH THE DISPATCH OF 10,000 ADDITIONAL Japanese troops to the Peiping-Tientsin area, events in North China are once more approaching a crisis. Japanese spokesmen have referred vaguely to the growing Communist "menace"—thus contradicting the reports from Nanking that the Communists had been driven completely out of the north—and have revived the rumor of a secret pact between Moscow and Nanking. The primary cause of friction at the moment, however, appears to have grown out of the repeated British and Chinese protests against the huge Japanese smuggling operations in North China. According to reliable estimates, Korean and Japanese gangs have smuggled approximately $70,000,000 worth of goods into this area in the past year. Chinese customs authorities have been forcefully prevented from interfering with this trade. The evidence suggests that the encouragement of illicit trade by Japan is directed primarily against Great Britain. As long as Britain controls the customs service, and utilizes this position to turn Chinese revenues into the coffers of British bondholders, Japan's political dominance in North China will be of very little value. The widespread smuggling operations kill two birds with one stone: they undermine the customs service, and permit Japanese goods to be sold more cheaply than those of British and American competitors. But the recent troop movements suggest that the Japanese are bent on obtaining the same objectives in a slightly more orthodox manner—by the annexation of North China.

*

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT'S ACTION IN warning banks and insurance companies against granting further credits to Germany is not easy to interpret. Short-range political motives may have taken precedence over purely economic factors. Hitler is at present sweating over a series of very pointed questions on which the British government has asked elucidation, and it is not impossible that the British Foreign Office wishes to bring pressure at this crucial period. On the other hand, no one can doubt that the German financial situation is gradually becoming more critical. The appointment of Göring as financial dictator and the reduction in the powers of Dr. Schacht were clearly the result of growing dissatisfaction with the rigorous economies imposed by Schacht. While Germany's fundamental difficulties may be attributed to the rearmament program, Schacht's policies have undoubtedly aggravated the situation. His attempts to balance trade with each individual country, for example, have frequently led to the importation of inferior raw materials and the payment of inordinately high prices. Further evidence of the anxiety of international financial interests over the approaching German crisis may be seen in the action of the New York banks reducing the price of travel marks by 12½ per cent. This action was entirely voluntary, and was apparently prompted by the fear that the unfreezing of American funds in Germany would not be completed before the final crash. When the bankers begin to sell capitalist Germany short, it is time to take heed.

*

OUR HATS ARE OFF TO MAURY MAVERICK, Capitol Hill's dauntless, self-confessed, and proud-of-it hat-taker-offer. Single-handed, the gallant gentleman from Texas is out to combat the newest menace to our civil liberties, the Association for the Prevention of Taking Hats Off in Elevators. Already the A.P.T.H.O.E. flies its black banner over the nation's capital, and unless immediate action is taken by all liberty-loving Americans we cannot doubt that it will end in rigid regimentation, in fascism! The A.P.T.H.O.E. may seem innocent enough on the surface, but consider the ultimate implications. What will a man do when he sees a pretty girl in an elevator and wants to break the ice? Instinctively his hand will rise to his hat but then, as he remembers the prohibition, he will look guiltily around, pretending that he was only going to scratch his ear. The girl will regard him with contempt. No ice broken, no boy meets girl, no orange blossoms. Our birth-rate will drop off, our population decrease, the country will become defenseless, and, before we know it the Japanese will be on us! Are we to stand by while traitors open our country to the invader? Here and now The Nation founds the C.L.C.H.D.H.B.R., the Chivalry League for Continued Hat-Doffing and a Higher Birth-Rate.

*

AFTER A LONG NIGHT OF HECTIC BUSINESS, when the morning sun was already slanting across the lawns of the Capitol at Albany, the New York legislature mustered just enough votes to appropriate $15,000 for a committee to investigate "communistic activities" in the schools and colleges of the state. The appropriation had originally been $150,000; it must have been some wag who cut it down, and indeed the legislature may have intended the whole thing as a little joke—with the taxpayers' money. For this is how it works out: In 1932 in New York State there were 2,240,000 pupils in public elementary and secondary schools. Add to this 171,000 students in colleges, universities, and professional schools, and 95,000 teachers of all of them, and you have a total of roughly two and a half million individuals to be "investigated" to the extent of $15,000. This divides up to exactly six mills per person, which is very likely equivalent to the amount of "communism" the legislative committee could discover if it spent millions instead of thousands of dollars. Of course, $15,000 would also buy 300,000 hot dogs which could be distributed to school children with the legislators' compliments and might get a few grateful votes from their parents. If the sovereign state of New York were in danger of being overthrown by its school children, we fear that the legislature's appropriation would not help much to prevent such a catastrophe.

Coal Is Unconstitutional

AS with death from a deep-lying cancer, the Supreme Court decision in the Guffey Coal Act was clearly expected but is none the less tragic and distressing. Most of those who had been following the sequence of constitutional decisions since the Railway Retirement Pensions case with that tremulous anxiety which the edicts of the world's most powerful tribunal have a right to expect were not unprepared for Justice Sutherland's majority reasoning. The gentle sage of Utah set down a series of propositions in law and logic which marched inevitably to the conclusion that the federal government had no constitutional power to regulate the bituminous-coal industry, especially in creating a labor board for insuring collective bargaining and settling labor disputes. It might be added that Chief Justice Hughes set down another series of propositions in law and logic which seemed to march just as inevitably to somewhat the same goal, though by a different route. It might finally be said that Justice Cardozo, speaking for the usual minority of three, set down his own series of propositions, equally legal and logical, which not only followed a different path from that of the other two but arrived at an exactly contrary conclusion.

Whatever the merits of the conflicting chains of reasoning, the one overwhelming fact is that as a result of this decision coal is unconstitutional. The industry is left in a state of chaos, with respect to production, marketing, labor relations. Any legislative effort calculated to be effective in introducing some order into this chaos has been adjudged as exceeding the limits of our constitutional structure.

The wisdom or unwisdom of the particular Guffey plan for regulating the coal industry is not anything that need concern us now. Actually we have very grave and disquieting doubts about compulsory cartelization as a pattern of control in a basic industry like coal. The act, which has generally been called "a little NRA" for coal, is far too similar to the unhappy national experiment in industrial control after which it was so closely modeled. The district boards of coal producers which set prices, subject to review by the national commission, are too like the NRA code authorities to fill us with much enthusiasm. The relaxation of the anti-trust laws is always a dangerous principle unless accompanied by more adequate safeguards against monopoly. The provisions for control in the public interest are sketchy at their best. The consumer's representative on the commission is armed chiefly with the power to call for records and testimony, and while this is a better break than the consumer has ever got before, it is still not much of a break. The best things about the act are the labor provisions, which set up a mechanism for assuring collective bargaining. It is no secret that the act, while bearing the sponsorship of Senator Guffey and Representative Snyder, was actually pushed through by John L. Lewis and the massed force of unionism behind him. And it is hard not to feel that the labor provisions atone for the others, and give the entire act real value.

But while all that is very important from the standpoint of social policy, it can have no bearing on the reaction to the Supreme Court's decision. Justice Sutherland was presumably not actuated by any deep concern over the fact that the act is not a radical-enough solution of the coal problem. It is more likely that he is terrified at the amount of "socialism" which he conjures up in the act, and that his opinion is a direct response to his terror of any form of governmental interference with business enterprise. Students of constitutional law have by this time lost their original innocence about the judicial process. They know that however clearly a set of legal propositions marches on to its appointed goal, what gives it steam is the set of economic convictions and social views that the judge holds.

The court's formal reasoning—or rationalization—was the traditional rationalization. Coal production is not interstate commerce. Any disturbances in the coal industry, whether due to a chaos of price structure or to labor conflict, do not directly affect or burden interstate commerce. The wages-and-hours provisions of the act are not, therefore, a "true" regulation of interstate commerce. They represent, moreover, an improper delegation of legislative power. The penalty tax levied by the act in order to carry out these provisions becomes unconstitutional, since it is levied not for revenue purposes but to enforce a power which the federal government does not otherwise have. And since the wages-and-hours provisions are inseparable from the rest of the act, the entire act is void. Chief Justice Hughes's concurring opinion differed from this only in his anxiety to make clear that, while Congress does not have the power to regulate labor relations in the coal industry, it does have the power to fix prices. The price-fixing sections of the act he therefore regarded as constitutional, and as separable from the rest of the act and capable of standing alone.

The effect of the majority reasoning on the remaining New Deal decisions is fairly clear. Wherever the commerce power of Congress is involved, we may be certain that the court will construe it narrowly and mechanically. Wherever there is an attempt to enforce collective bargaining and give labor some protection against the brutal power of concentrated capital and giant corporate enterprise, we may be certain that the court will nullify that attempt. This dooms, among other things, the Wagner Labor Act. Brushing aside the many technical, theoretical, and political issues that cluster around any tangled constitutional problem, the outstanding fact is that the court majority is determined to block efforts of the federal government to regulate industry, whether those efforts are entirely defensible socially, as with the railway retirement pensions, or indefensible as with the NRA. It is using its concern for states' rights as a cloak for the repugnance it feels to any departure from unregulated capitalism.

The minority of three, speaking again through a brilliant dissenting opinion by Justice Cardozo, makes another heroic venture in judicial self-limitation. Justice Cardozo holds that the labor and price provisions are separable; that the price provisions fall within the commerce power of Congress; that the Supreme Court is not called upon in the particular case at issue—the request of the Carter Coal Company for an injunction—to settle any other constitutional problems; that since the act has not begun to function, “what the code will provide as to wages and hours of labor . . . is still in the domain of prophecy. . . . The complainants have been crying before they are really hurt.” The position that Justice Cardozo takes in this case is the only possible position that will keep the court from intruding its views upon the legislature and trying to settle issues of economic and social policy by narrow legalistic categories. It is the only possible position that will allow the court to exist and function and still keep it from wrecking our legislative constructions and throwing our industries into chaos. But as he read his dissent in court, Justice Cardozo sounded like a voice crying in the constitutional wilderness.

What remains is the usual mending of legislative fences after the Supreme Court hurricane has passed by. The ingenuity of constitutional lawyers will in all likelihood find some makeshift to replace the Guffey act, just as they found one after the Hoosac decision to replace the AAA. John L. Lewis and the miners’ union will be forced back on their massed collective strength and the use of the strike weapon when necessary to maintain labor standards. Paradoxically, the labor vote will swing even more strongly than before to Mr. Roosevelt—despite the fact that he refrains from making the arbitrary use of the judicial power a campaign issue. And even those coal operators who opposed the act and welcome the decision will find that their victory is dearly bought, and that a sick industry like coal is not healed and made whole again by the legalistic mumbo-jumbo of six judges.

Can Europe Avert War?

THE past week’s dramatic events in Austria, largely foreshadowed by Mr. Fodor in an article appearing elsewhere in this issue, have once more shaken the delicate balance of European peace. While France and England appear to have sponsored Prince Starhemberg’s removal with a view to limiting Italian influence in Austria, it is an open question whether Schuschnigg and Reither are strong enough to maintain a government which is opposed by three of the most powerful groups in the country—the Socialists, the Nazis, and the Heimwehr. Should Schuschnigg fall, almost anything might happen. Radicals in the German Nazi Party would like nothing better than a renewal of civil disturbances. Although it is unlikely that Hitler would plan a second adventure immediately after his successful coup in the Rhineland, his hand may be forced by events. The danger of a Nazi coup within the next few months is greatly enhanced by the prevailing feeling that neither England nor France would resort to force to preserve Austrian independence. Mussolini, it is agreed, will fight rather than allow German troops to occupy the Brenner Pass. But the success of Hitler’s Rhineland coup has convinced many Nazis that France will not resort to arms unless assured of the support of England, and that England will not fight under any circumstances. The fact that they are probably mistaken on both counts only magnifies the danger.

As long as the League of Nations existed as a potential instrument for mobilizing collective action against an aggressor, the position of Austria was reasonably safe. But for the moment at least the League has been shelved as an effective weapon. Italy’s withdrawal leaves only three of the seven world powers still represented at Geneva. Economic sanctions are difficult at best; they become impossible when a considerable proportion of the chief trading nations fail to cooperate. Italy’s triumph in Ethiopia and Japan’s unopposed penetration of North China have caused even the League’s most loyal supporters to become discouraged about the possibility of building an effective instrument of security in the present-day world. Guatemala’s resignation from the League may be the signal for a general exodus of South American states.

The eclipse of the League leaves Europe at the mercy of the fascist war-makers. In a world devoid of law there can be no security. Isolation is obviously impracticable even for a country like England; for little Austria it would be the height of folly. Efforts to strengthen national defenses can only intensify the horror of the ultimate disaster. Alliances may afford a temporary respite for great powers such as France and Russia, but in the long run they can only serve to transform every war into a world conflict. In lieu of a more hopeful course of action Prime Minister Baldwin, who is as responsible as any one man for the present difficulties of the League, has revived a movement for revision of the Covenant in the hope of thereby stemming the threatening tide of nationalism. By eliminating Article XVI—the sanctions article—Baldwin hopes to persuade Japan, Germany, Italy, and the United States to realign themselves with the League. The abandonment of Article XVI would preclude all attempts to enforce peace by coercion, but would preserve the League as an agency for conciliation.

While it is conceivable that the League might serve a useful purpose even without Article XVI, a wise general does not call for a strategic retreat when he is cornered at his last line of defense. Any modification of the Covenant at the present moment would be rightly interpreted in Rome, Berlin, and Tokyo as an admission of weakness on the part of the non-fascist countries and as an invitation to pursue their aggressive policies without restraint so long as they do not conflict directly with the interests of the other powers. To put it bluntly, it would consign all of North China, Mongolia, and Fukien to Japan, give Ethiopia to Italy, and allow Germany to absorb Memel, the Baltic states, and Czecho-Slovakia. The German-Italian differences over Austria might be patched up by a division of the spoils. Some pacifists would go so far as to say that such a development is preferable to a general world conflagration. Possibly so. But does anyone really believe that the appetites of war-makers become satiated with easy conquest?

There has been no period in recent history when the pessimists seemed to have things so completely their way. A few months ago there was at least a fighting chance of stopping Hitler by an overwhelming display of solidarity against aggression. That chance is practically non-existent today. Hope is not, however, completely dead. The League has maintained at least a semblance of moral integrity in the Ethiopian crisis. Despite great pressure, sanctions have not been lifted against Italy. But if the League is to be saved, it will not be by negative action. Rigorous new penalties must be imposed against Italy if Hitler is to be impressed with the hazards of aggression. Any other course means certain war for Europe.

Boomerang at Sea

THE strike of 374 seamen on the S.S. California in the harbor of San Pedro on March 2 has had almost as many reverberations as the shot heard round the world. It will be recalled that on the promise of a "square deal" by Frances Perkins the strikers, led by Joseph Curran, consented to sail the ship to New York. While the California proceeded round the coast Daniel C. Roper, one of the President's political fences on the right, accused the strikers of mutiny and called upon the Department of Justice to prosecute. Soon thereafter, with the front-page support of the New York newspapers and the self-righteous approval of the shipping companies, the Secretary steamed off on a red hunt in the name of safety at sea.

When the California arrived in New York, the agents of the Department of Justice failed to show up, but sixty-four seamen were docked in their pay and were given discharge notices amounting to a blacklist. The entire crew walked off and became the nucleus of a strike mainly against the International Merchant Marine, holding company which owns the Panama Pacific Line, the United States Lines, and other American steamship companies. The strike was also directed against a recently signed agreement between the national officers of the International Seamen's Union and the owners which disregarded the express orders of the membership that the new terms should match those of the West Coast award won by Harry Bridges and the Maritime Federation.

Since then some four thousand seamen have joined the Curran group, and though the International Seamen's Union still insists that it is an outlaw strike, the New York Times has been forced to recognize it; a transatlantic liner, the President Roosevelt, has actually been delayed in order to allow for an inspection of its personnel because the strikers asserted that inexperienced seamen were aboard; A. J. McCarthy, vice-president of the I. M. M., is trying to drown out the hue and cry over safety by howling "reds"; and the hitherto boring slogan of safety at sea has become a hot issue.

It was unfortunate for Secretary Roper that he selected the safety of passengers as the excuse for his attack on American seamen. He could not have foreseen that it might be a boomerang which would conceivably remove Mr. Roper from his control over the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection, remove the bureau in turn from the influence of shipowners, and make American shipping really safe for both passengers and seamen.

In The Nation of April 29 M. R. Bendiner analyzed the cargo of favoritism, graft, and politics carried by the Bureau of Inspection under the command of Captain Roper. He pointed out, for instance, that the investigators who looked into the Morro Castle and Mohawk disasters were alarmed at the laxity in the government's specifications in ship construction. Testimony at a public hearing held by the National Committee on Safety at Sea bears out the strikers' charges that even the lax requirements of the bureau are evaded by the shipowners and that the inspection service is riddled with graft.

The National Committee on Safety at Sea was appointed by the President himself, and its Progress Report, issued on April 29, thoroughly demonstrates that the American merchant marine is shot through with abuses ranging from intolerable living conditions for crews to the limitation of liability for steamship companies and the deprivation of the passenger's right to a trial by court. The government, through subsidies, is heavily involved in American shipping and has both the right and the obligation to correct these abuses. Senator Copeland has just announced the formation of a committee to investigate personnel and living conditions on American ships, but the fact that it is scheduled to include such persons as Paul Scharrenberg, reactionary official of the International Seamen's Union, but no representative of the rank and file does not inspire confidence either in Senator Copeland's motives or in the committee's success. The danger is that the powerful forces which control American shipping will succeed in diverting the campaign for safety into a red-baiting attack on the maritime unions which have won at least a measure of control over working conditions on the West Coast and have set out to improve their status on the East Coast. In this attack the companies can count on the support of newspapers which have a stake in ship advertising and on all those elements opposed to organized labor.

It is time the President took a hand, since Secretary Roper will not. Obviously the first move should be a clean sweep of the Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection and the establishment of an agency entirely removed from political influence, properly equipped, and manned with a personnel subject to dismissal when regulations are not enforced. The second step is the passage of safety legislation which has been defeated in the past by the powerful shipping lobby. As for the problem of personnel, the passenger's best guaranty of safety lies in the establishment of a strong, responsible union dominated not by a few landlocked officials but by the men who actually go to sea, know its hazards, and themselves have a stake in safety as well as in steady jobs, decent conditions, and the sea as a way of life. So far the seamen on strike in New York have shown themselves far more responsible in matters pertaining to safety at sea than Secretary Roper or the shipping companies. They deserve public support both in their attempt to force the government to live up to its responsibilities and in their attempt to throw off the control of a few reactionary employer-loving officials who have for years "cooperated" with the owners at the expense of the membership. Above all they should not be made the red scapegoats for the sins of shipowners.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Fighting Ickes

Washington Shell Game

Washington, May 17

JEDGAR HOOVER, chief of the G-men, should turn his attention to Congress if he seeks replacements for his recently exhausted list of public enemies. A majority of the members of the House and Senate are getting ready to defraud the public that pays their salaries by grabbing their hats and rushing home without having taken the trouble to vote on a dozen or more measures in which their constituents are vitally concerned. Joe Robinson of Arkansas, leader of the Administration's forces in the Senate, sounded the call for this exodus when he proclaimed to his colleagues, "It is my desire that the session shall conclude its labors by June 6."

In that same speech he listed what he considered to be the only bills standing in the way of adjournment. These were the tax and relief bills, the omnibus flood-control measure, and the commodity-exchange bill. When they and such other bills as have already been passed by both houses and are in conference have been finally enacted into law, he said, the time will have come to adjourn without pausing to pass further legislation. Senator Wagner of New York protested that this schedule would exclude action on his and Representative Ellenbogen's low-cost housing bill. Robinson met his protest with a rebuke in which the majority leader said, "I think the Senator from New York has had sufficient liberal experience in legislative matters to know that it is a physical, moral, mental, and every other kind of impossibility to pass judgment on whether a measure that has not even been reported by one of the committees of the Senate shall be disposed of during this session. So far as I am concerned I would not favor continuing the session beyond June 6 for the purpose of passing the bill to which the Senator is referring. I recognize its importance."

Space limitations preclude a listing of all the major bills his schedule would toss into the discard. Obviously it not only would kill the Wagner-Allenbogen bill but would save the Administration from having to bury it under the fraudulent substitute which Jesse Jones and the FHA boys have been getting ready for that purpose. It also would kill the various anti-lynching bills that have been introduced in both houses, as well as the various bills to reform the ship-subsidy system, which Mr. Roosevelt vocally loathes but painstakingly leaves untouched. The House has just reinserted in the Post Office Department appropriation bill the $26,000,000 item needed for continuance of the present subsidies; the item had been struck out by the Senate to force action on reform legislation at this session. The Wheeler bill, instructing the Federal Trade Commission to protect the consumer instead of merely protecting business men from one another, also would be brushed into the wastebasket by Robinson's adjournment schedule, along with the Kerr-Coolidge immigration bill, the Bankhead farm-tenant bill, the La Follette civil-liberties-investigation resolution, and the United Textile Workers' bill for regulation of wages and hours in the textile industry.

The meaningless, duty-dodging adjournment rush will in addition lessen the chances of decent tax and relief legislation being passed by this Congress. The tax bill already is in such a tangle that it is all but impossible to make sense out of it, and the Administration apparently thinks it isn't necessary to make sense out of the relief bill. Roosevelt's statement on Friday that the provision of $1,500,000,000 is for the exclusive use of the WPA and at the same time for the use of Ickes's PWA and Tugwell's Resettlement Administration as well was unnecessarily confusing. It meant only that in the public-works, work-relief, and relief fields Mr. Roosevelt is running a shell game. If you have ever seen the game, you know that three shells are used and the trick is to tell under which shell the pea lies. Taking the PWA and RA out of the picture would be taking away two of Roosevelt's three shells, and it no longer would be possible for him to hide the pea. He will keep the RA and the PWA, and they may even get some of the WPA's money, but they won't be able to keep much of what they receive; Roosevelt will flick the pea back under the WPA shell each time the audience's attention strays. He has been playing this little game with one variation or another ever since the New Deal began. It is one of the reasons why of all the billions passed under the PWA's shell only $1,250,000,000 has stuck there since 1933, and there never before was such need as now for playing this game of put and take. The $1,500,000,000 will be barely enough to keep Hopkins's WPA show going until Congress meets again. That will be after election, and until after election the RA's boss is going to be Rex the Obscure. He is putting up no fight, for he wants to keep his job. He thinks Ickes's fight is foolhardy, but Ickes knows that Roosevelt does not dare fire him, and so he keeps on fighting.

Champions of Poisoned Drugs.

A SUBCOMMITTEE reported to the full membership of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on Friday a revised version of the Copeland food-and-drug bill which the Senate passed last year. If its backers succeed in pushing it through Congress as it stands, Senator Copeland's name should be taken from the bill and supplanted by that of Representative Chapman of Kentucky, for Chapman, bringing integrity as well as intelligence to the measure, has transformed it by weeks of labor into an act that goes a long way toward fulfilment of the New Deal's initial promises in this field. The indications are, however, that when the full committee gets through with the bill it will be in such shape that Chapman will not want to claim relation to it. Judged by their votes in the bitterly argumentative executive session that began Friday and will be resumed tomorrow, most of the people's representatives on the committee believe that you dote on poison for breakfast, luncheon, and dinner, liking especially lots of arsenic and lead on your fruits and vegetables. They also believe, it seems, that in seeking to improve your appearance, you would rather risk disfigurement, blindness, and death than put the manufacturers of drugs and cosmetics to the risk of being honest with their customers. They think, too, that you would rather see babies suffer the agonies of asthma than put the makers of proprietary foods to the trouble of letting mothers know that their concoctions contain ingredients poisonous to certain children.

I say these things on the basis of the changes thus far voted in Chapman's bill by the committee, meeting in secret session. Its worst defilement of the measure—and one that, if left to stand, will make the bill not only worse than the Senate version but worse than existing legislation—is an amendment which says in effect that a food, drug, or cosmetic must be dangerous to the health of any user to be classified as "adulterated" and thus be made subject to strict federal regulation. It has not yet been possible to ascertain just which members of the committee are responsible for these betrayals of the public trust. Lea of California is known to be one of the Chapman bill's fieriest foes on the committee. Pettengill of Indiana is another who rates profits for drug racketeers ahead of consumer protection. Cole of Maryland also is reported to have constituted himself a champion of the drug lobby, although his opposition to the consumer interest has been tempered by support of the bill's provision giving the Food and Drug Administration control over food, drug, and cosmetic advertising. The food and drug lobbyists need only a few resolute friends in the committee; the ignorance and indolence of the other members make them equally helpful to Charles Wesley Dunn, Frank Blair, and their colleagues in the industries held at bay by the threat of the Chapman bill. Crosser of Ohio, for example, believes in magnetic healing. And imagine trying to explain the importance of allergic reactions to Sadowski, the Detroit builder, or to Chairman Sam Rayburn of Texas. The committee members on whom the public will have to depend, it seems, are Reece of Tennessee, Huddleston of Alabama, Wadsworth of New York, Wolfenden of Pennsylvania, and Kenney of New Jersey, in addition to Chapman, and half of these six sit on the minority side as Republicans.

As reported to the full committee, the Chapman bill continued all the Copeland bill's advances over existing food-and-drug legislation. Its chief advance over the Copeland bill was its erasure of the Bailey amendment, which would force the government to bring an individual court action for each seizure it makes of misbranded goods. The Vandenberg amendment, requiring that all these cases be tried in the home district of the defendant manufacturer, also has been supplanted in the Chapman bill by a provision permitting trial in the judicial district adjacent to that in which the defendant has his place of business. Another major advance in the Chapman bill is a provision for grade labeling; it gives the Food and Drug Administration power to promulgate legal standards of both quality and identity. In addition, it would require the makers of patent medicines to file their formulas with the Secretary of Agriculture, and it eliminates the Copeland bill's provisions for committees of food, drug, and cosmetic manufacturers to superintend the bill's enforcement. Backers of the Chapman bill predict that they will get it reported to the House for a vote before the next week ends. They are fighting to get the bill through the House and to conference within the week so that final action on it at this session may be made certain and its death by adjournment averted.

Rex the Obscure

The Corporate Tax Battle

BY MAX LERNER

PUT it down to Mr. Roosevelt's eternal credit that he has managed somehow to make a good show even of taxes. Here is a subject that has been handled in more or less routine fashion year after year, with the Treasury experts and the big financial shots dominating the scene and effecting a compromise between what was administratively necessary and what would least injure the delicate pecuniary nerves of the big owners. And, presto, this subject is whirled into the news in dramatic fashion, evoking the most emotional philippics and the most heroic defenses—the sort of thing that is generally reserved for boondoggling and Liberty League dinners and Supreme Court justices and the impounding of telegrams. In this dramatization Mr. Roosevelt has been impresario rather than actor. In making a big show out of the tax on corporate surpluses, he has of course had the help of the Republicans, the corporation heads, the campaign, the Supreme Court; possibly also the taut nerves of Senators, Treasury officials, witnesses, frayed by the incessant hammering of recent events; not least, the Washington heat.

But to grasp the forces at work behind the scenes, you must have seen them in dynamic form in the welter of a Senate committee room. Away from Washington, no matter how much you read and ponder over the testimony and the newspaper accounts, the thing somehow fails to come to life. You say to yourself: this pothole over a six-hundred-million-dollar budget item—big as it is—is out of proportion to its budgetary importance. The struggle must have some other meanings, some other roots.

It was the desire to discover what they are that sent me to Washington. I had been informed that on Tuesday, May 12, Treasury Counsel Herman Oliphant would be given a chance to answer the barrage of objections to which his bill had been exposed. I believe I must be the only mortal who ever traveled to Washington to get closer to a tax hearing out of sheer intellectual passion. I wanted a ringside seat at the tax fight. Others might pick Joe Louis or Tony Canzoneri, mauling a hapless victim in the glare of the arc lights while thousands cheer. I picked Mr. Oliphant and Senator Byrd, both stripped (intellectually) to the waist in a hot committee room, fighting over the corporate surplus tax with no one cheering, and with only a tableful of yawning newspapermen and a scattering of others there to see the carnage.

You come into a room already half-filled with smoke. At one end a raised platform of horseshoe formation, and behind it the members of the Senate Finance Committee, posing a little—as the Roman Senate did—as an “assembly of gods,” and a little as a group of American “regular fellers.” Pat Harrison, of Mississippi, in the chair. He turned out what I thought was a consummate bit of chairmaning. At the bar, facing Harrison and with his back to the newspapermen and spectators, stood Herman Oliphant, treasury counsel—more responsible for the fate and character of the bill than any other man in Washington. He spoke slowly but with a bitter intensity, like someone at bay. For months he has been the target of attack, not only from the Republicans but from within the Administration itself. He is a little man, with a bullet head, eyes sunken but flashing, finely chiseled features. Most of the time he speaks straight at the Senators, but when he has something to say that he regards of particular importance he swings his body slowly around and faces the newspapermen and spectators. It is hard to meet the glance of those eyes, but easy to read almost anything into them—certainly zeal, tenacity, conviction. He is a former law professor at Columbia and Johns Hopkins who, as law professors must, knows the corporate structure. I have a suspicion that he takes the New Deal seriously.

The whole episode started, of course, when a soviet of judges and soldiers combined to take over the budgetary reins from the hands of the constituted authorities. The Supreme Court had declared the processing taxes invalid in the Hoosac decision, and then the veterans had marched in and mopped up after the court by getting their bonus. Since the Republicans had openly rejoiced over the foray of the judges, and aided the foray of the veterans, they were in no position to raise an outcry when the President and his financial advisers looked about for ways of restoring the raided revenue. Actually they were a bit happy about it. Taxes are never popular, and raising money is a poor way of enhancing your political prestige. They felt that they had the President in something of a hole. If he did not succeed in balancing the budget, they could raise the Landon-Hearst cry of extravagance; if he did, it would necessarily involve “nuisance taxes,” and cost him votes. There was dark talk of having to make a choice between a sales tax and an increase of the income tax in the lower and middle brackets. When, therefore, Mr. Roosevelt sent his special tax message to Congress on March 3, his novel tax proposal found the country dazed. The only people who knew what to say were the Republicans, but they said it more out of principle than understanding: it was enough for them that the source was satanic. The Democrats, on the whole, tended to stand behind the proposed measure—for the same reason reversed.

What sort of tax universe was the proposal born into? Obviously the rapid growth of the corporation in the last few decades has cut under the entire tax structure of the country. What had formerly been more or less tangible income now became intangible claims to income. A mechanism which in its construction has engaged the best legal resources of the country was bound to create problems both for Treasury officials and for the state as a whole—problems of the concentration of financial power, the wresting of control from the investors, its capture by a small group of insiders who often used it in the manipulation of securities and in a ruthless march toward monopoly. One of the central features in this picture of corporate control has been the accumulation of a huge corporate reserve. Complaints had for years been pouring into Washington pointing to the abuses of such a surplus. It was a happy coincidence, therefore, when Mr. Oliphant's analysis of the possible sources of new revenue fixed upon business profits as having advanced farthest in the movement toward recovery. His proposal to place a heavy graduated tax on the corporate surplus seemed to offer a chance to combine a sound revenue objective with a needed social objective.

The present corporation tax is not very fruitful of revenue. It is an attempt to tax at the source only, and not a very successful one. A tax ranging from 12½ to 15 per cent is levied on the net income of all corporations. Under Section 102 of the present law, any corporation which is prima facie a holding company created for the purpose of tax evasion, or any corporation accumulating capital beyond the reasonable needs of its business expansion, is held subject to a tax penalty. But what constitutes a reasonable reserve is, of course, a question so subjective as to elude even the most competent tax administration we have had thus far. A common device among the big corporations is to place accumulated reserves in the hands of holding companies created for that purpose, and whenever the pile reaches dangerous proportions a reorganization is quietly effected and the entire process begins again. Thus far administrative difficulties have prevented the enforcement of this section. The Aluminum Company, owned by Mr. Mellon, can for example make out a very good case for large reserves as necessary for expansion, and it would take an extremely persistent and clever revenue agent, as an outsider to the affairs of the company, to break through the company position. The Internal Revenue Bureau once selected for study a number of cases of this sort, and after considerable scrutiny it was clear that in the present situation very few would stand up against a cold denial and a clever exposition on the part of the corporation officials. But as far as the strictly legal situation goes, a distinction must be made between the stockholder suits to compel the distribution of dividends, where the courts are reluctant to interfere in corporate matters, and cases where the government itself is a party to the suit.

The most fatal blow struck at the proposed measure was the impressive array of witnesses who appeared to testify against it. The political astuteness of the plan from the very start had rested on the fact that while every tax measure had to cause pain somewhere, the pain in this case would be visited on those who were already anti-Administration. Opposition from the business interests was of course expected. What was not expected was its volume and unanimity and the form it took. It was not just the tory attack of big corporations. It became apparent that the attempt to get at the corporations that evaded a surtax on their undistributed profits would in the process sideswipe the smaller corporations which were in genuine need of building up surpluses. The case was stated most clearly and cogently in the climactic testimony of George O. May, whose prestige in the financial and accounting world is unsurpassed. He not only spoke caustically of the "slaughter of the innocents" that would follow on the attempt to get at the malefactors, but also challenged the Treasury estimates of the probable yield of the tax. The government forces, facing the enemy fire, could not hold their lines intact. In the House committee only one Democrat, Representative Lamneck, deserted, but in the Senate committee the revolt took on serious proportions. The conservative wing of the Democrats broke away from the Administration wing and joined the Republicans. Byrd of Virginia, Bailey of North Carolina, and Clark of Missouri, a trio of able Democrats, led the defection.

What I was witnessing in the Senate committee room was the last attempt of Senators Harrison and Barkeley, the Administration stalwarts, to salvage the principle of the bill by calling Mr. Oliphant before the committee to deliver a final plea. It raised far-reaching issues of policy and tax structure. They may be roughly grouped under four headings: the philosophy of a tax on corporate surpluses; the relation of such a tax to the corporate structure and the principle of corporate democracy; the question of the relative effects of the tax upon the large and the small corporation; the effect of the tax upon the economic structure as a whole and upon the business cycle.

As regards the philosophy of the tax, the Administration finds itself in a ticklish position. The corporate-surplus tax fits integrally into the logic of the New Deal. In addition to the raising of revenue, it has four non-revenue objectives—reforming the corporate structure, protecting investors, putting individuals and partnerships on an equality with corporations, forcing the distribution of corporate income and therefore the more rapid circulation of purchasing power. These are an essential part of an administrative policy which has created a Securities Exchange Commission, sought to regulate the more flagrant malpractices of corporate finance, pushed through the Public Utility Holding Company Act, and emphasized the purchasing-power theory of prosperity and depression. Mr. Roosevelt has been praised and attacked for his political astuteness in proposing such a tax, since it got him out of a serious budgetary difficulty. But this measure was not merely a Roosevelt trick. Mr. Roosevelt has generally been found to play the politician in what he fails to do rather than in what he does, in his retreats rather than his attacks. The real political astuteness of the measure was that it was intended to jibe with the concern that the Administration has always had for the small investor and small business man and to carry that concern into the field of taxation. The focus of Mr. Roosevelt's policy is neither the finance capitalist nor the worker; it is the investor.

The basic weakness of the plan, however, lay in the fact that its two objectives—raising revenue and reforming the corporate structure—did not quite coincide. This was most clearly brought out in the verbal tilts between Senators Byrd and Bailey, on the one hand, and Mr. Oliphant and Senator La Follette, on the other. With impressive tenacity Senator Byrd clung to his contention that the plan would injure the small corporation and favor the larger one. The large corporation is obviously in a much better position to distribute its entire income and thus avoid the payment of a tax completely. Mr. Oliphant's reply that government would get its revenue from the individual incomes taxes of the stockholders was satisfactory from a revenue point of view, but inconclusive from a social standpoint. What had evidently happened was that in order to meet his revenue objectives, Mr. Oliphant proposed removing the existing tax on corporate income; but in the process he was defeating his social objective.

This was a fatal error in strategy, for it gave the conservative forces exactly the handle they were seeking. Senator Byrd, who has been anti-New Deal from the very beginning and who has played closely with the big interests, now stepped forward in a surprising role as the champion of the rights of the little fellow. Senator Bailey of North Carolina, who stands for the big tobacco interests of his state, if he stands for anything, vied with his Virginia colleague in the unctious he showed in defense of their new cause. Senator King of Utah, who throughout the afternoon ranted in spread-eagle fashion and made no point that he did not botch and befuddle, found himself surprisingly swelling the chorus of so-called "liberal" protest.

This leads us to the final issue of the effect of the tax measure on the structure of business prosperity. This issue cropped up time and again in the argument about the desirability of encouraging savings and the need for reserves as a cushion against depression. Mr. Oliphant pointed out that the argument about savings would apply equally to a reduction of the individual income tax; that if savings were needed for reinvestment it would be a simple device for a corporation to declare a dividend and for the stockholder—especially in the case of the small corporations whose stock is closely held—to plow the dividend back into more stock. Ultimately the argument came back again to a question of corporate democracy. The opponents of the bill insisted that once a dividend was declared it was doubtful whether it would ever find its way back into investment, since the flotation of new stock might be difficult or the tendency to spend the income prove overwhelming. Here Senator La Follette invariably took his stand on the ground that such a decision was for the stockholder himself to make, and that he was a better judge of his own interests than some member of an inner corporate directing group. Even more important than these arguments is the growing conviction among our economists that we suffer from too much saving rather than too little.

As we go to press the outlook for a corporate surplus tax is dark indeed. The primary objective of corporate reform which gave importance to the original tax proposal, whatever its shortcomings, has now vanished. All the talk now is, what will raise the revenue? The committee celebrations seem to point to (1) a slight increase of the corporate income tax to 18 per cent; (2) a small 6 or 7 per cent surtax on undivided profits; (3) a raise of the individual income tax from 4 per cent to 5 per cent. This confirms again my conviction that there has never been an income-tax bill framed yet that wasn't a series of weak compromises and crudely concealed surrenders. The Republican members of the committee know that an increase in the individual normal tax is likely to weaken Roosevelt's support in the election. If that happens, it will be a fitting climax to the series of blunders which has marked the handling of the proposal thus far. It would be indeed an irony if the heralded Democratic reform in the tax structure and the corporate structure should turn out to be in the end nothing but a preliminary approach to a raising of the income tax.

If the Administration keeps clearly in mind what it is driving at, the framing of a tax measure does not present insuperable difficulties. The primary objectives are three: to produce the needed revenue; as far as possible, to force dividend distribution along to the stockholders, without affecting the smaller corporations adversely; to prevent the accumulation of huge reserves on the part of the large corporations, with the resulting tax evasion, oversaving, and corporate manipulation. One essential in any tax proposal is that the present corporate income tax should not be removed or decreased. To it should be added a tax on all corporate surplus, large enough to be persuasive but not such as to embarrass the small corporation. A second is the removal of the exemption of the individual taxpayer from the income tax on dividends: thus the dividends whose distribution is forced along will finally yield tax revenue. A third is the enforcement of Section 102 of the present revenue law with a heavy penalty surtax on the unreasonable surplus. I am convinced that in their zeal to find another method for getting the revenue, the Treasury officials have disposed too summarily of the possibility of revising Section 102 and putting teeth into it. For example, the exemption of corporations with a relatively low income from the operation of the penalty surtax on undistributed profits will ease the administrative problem considerably; a rule that any corporation distributing a very high proportion of its profits (to be set by the Treasury) will be deemed to have a reasonable surplus will ease it further. What remains is a problem for administrative ingenuity. If this section can be rigorously enforced, it should serve to penalize the improper accumulation of surpluses, which is after all the principal reform aim of the House bill.

Regardless of what the Senate committee does, the corporate-tax battle is not over. There remains the conference committee of the two houses, and there remains also the President. An abandonment of the principle of penalizing large surplus accumulations may mean an early adjournment of Congress, but it will also mean a betrayal by Mr. Roosevelt of his own reformist philosophy. He is strong enough to apply pressure, if he is willing to exert his strength. If he yields, it will be a proof that only a genuine labor Administration will ever have the courage to place the tax burden where it belongs, and to use the taxing mechanism for making sense of the economic structure.

Treason Among the Future Veterans

BY JAMES WECHSLER

A SUCCESSION of recent events has revealed a growing disparity between the "national commanders" of the Veterans of Future Wars and their undergraduate followers. So pronounced has this breach become that the summoning of a national convention, said to be planned for early September, may end the rule of those who launched the project. They are now conspicuously out of step with their organization. Wholesale treason is discernible in the ranks. Unless the situation is miraculously altered, the leaders are doomed to become Veterans of a Future Insurrection.

It is now clear, in the aftermath of "the biggest publicity stunt since the World War," that the V. F. W. was inspired by a group of conservative Democrats at Princeton whose prime mission is to defend the United States Treasury against all intruders. With happy optimism they envisage themselves as the nation's "future taxpayers" and hence as victims of all "Treasury raids." Dismayed by the passage of the bonus bill, they created the V. F. W. as an anti-bonus burlesque, providing free entertainment for all, publicity for its founders, and copy for starving Princeton newspaper correspondents.

The response which greeted them undoubtedly exceeded their expectations—and their desires. The birth of National Commander Gorin's idea was followed by a deluge of fan mail probably equaled only by that which greeted the birth of Mrs. Dionne's quintuplets. Utterly indigenous in theme and language, the project satisfied the lust for sensation with which Americans are perhaps peculiarly endowed. Satirical and pointed, lacking any complex political terminology, the V. F. W. quickly spread far beyond the campus.

All this was no doubt gratifying to the commanders except for one rather crucial detail. While scores of local "posts" were emerging on campuses throughout the country, virtually none of them shared the anti-bonus enthusiasm of the Princeton officials. Those who rallied to the movement did so because they saw in it a devastating criticism of war. Students who had heretofore remained unresponsive to anti-war propaganda were stirred by a movement which captured their imagination as well as their intellectual approval. The V. F. W. was a rollicking yet essentially sober instrument for a thrust against the war-makers. So plain and widespread was this recognition of its possibilities that the stuffed shirts quickly betrayed panic. Mr. Gorin was labeled a red. There were frightened outcries in women's clubs and D. A. R. chapters. A Hearst reporter was dispatched to Princeton to "expose" Moscow's latest maneuver. All that he found was a bewildered array of conservative Democrats battling valiantly against a bonus bill which had already been safely enacted.

There were those, however, who got Mr. Gorin's point and expected even greater things from him. The American Veterans' Association, extreme right-wing of the veterans, bestowed sympathetic attention upon the plan and sent its national commander to address the opening rally at Princeton. Some sections of the conservative press, undaunted by the cries of "red," hailed the venture as a springboard for renewed criticism of New Deal "extravagance." Bernarr Macfadden was elevated to the post of commander of "physical fitness." William Randolph Hearst declined to serve as honorary national commander, but with profuse thanks.

The V.F.W. leadership, though it made a vigorous attempt to maintain the atmosphere of buffoonery, felt these pressures. While conservative journals urged it to carry on the anti-bonus campaign, a preponderance of the student membership impatiently demanded a statement of position on the April student peace strike. Having enlisted in the V. F. W. on the assumption that it was an anti-war enterprise, they regarded the strike as a logical next step. These were distressing developments to the Princeton officialdom. On visiting their headquarters I was assured that they didn't "want to offend anyone." They were, I was informed, building a large organization; "when everybody is in it we'll see what they agree on and draw up a program." Terrified by the "red" label, they were desperately avoiding any further commitments. They stubbornly refused to criticize American war preparations. They would not challenge the expansion of the R. O. T. C. They were determined to refrain from any indorsement of the student peace demonstrations.

But on April 22 Mr. Gorin partially abandoned his reticence. In an Associated Press interview he was quoted as upholding "necessary" and "rational" wars to which students could legitimately give their support. This, of course, was an implied attack on the Oxford pledge, one of the central declarations of that day's strike. While Mr. Gorin was extolling "rational" warfare, however, a chapter of the V. F. W. at Kansas was being attacked with tear-gas bombs for holding an anti-war meeting, the commander of the V. F. W. at Ohio State was being reprimanded for leading a "corpse" with a placard "Enlist Now" in the R. O. T. C. parade, and several leaders of the DePauw post were threatened with loss of their degrees for supporting the strike. These incidents were typical of many which showed that the V. F. W., in most of its local branches, had become an integral part of the student peace movement. Often they rescued the peace strike from the peril of solemn monotony and routine, injecting a colorful note and translating peace slogans into persuasive American idiom. There are, of course, campuses on which V. F. W. posts have supported the anti-bonus plank of the founders, but these are exceptions. The growth of the V. F. W. has revealed an encouraging disbelief in the glories or sanctity of war. There is unanswerable irony in a parade of Future Unknown Soldiers.

However much these tendencies may gratify liberals, they have thus far made no evident impression upon the national commanders. Mr. Gorin has just published a book devoted entirely to a denunciation of the "bonus grab." Nowhere in this "true story of a sensational youth movement" do its real character and meaning appear. Nor have the recent utterances of Mr. Gorin's cohorts revealed any sensitivity to the situation. It is apparently their determination to pursue their original idea while the membership moves in an opposite direction. Whether the V. F. W. will survive the summer is highly dubious; its potentialities may be already exhausted; perhaps the joke requires new inspiration. If the movement lasts, several stormy sessions will be on its agenda. The policies of the leaders have evoked growing dissatisfaction. Their unwillingness to "offend anyone" has deprived them of long-term purpose and program. It is not valid to assert that they have fled into the arms of fascism. They have fled into the arms of fame and are reluctant to give up the embrace. So imaginative and lusty a creation as the V. F. W. merited a more courageous, idealistic parentage.

The Austrian Volcano

BY M. W. FODOR

Vienna, May 4

AUSTRIA today is faced with a danger the exact nature of which is known to nobody but is feared by all. Two factors make this fear worldwide: First, Germany's remilitarization of the Rhineland shows that Hitler is determined at any risk to carry through the program he advocated long before he came to power, and part of this program is the unification of German-speaking peoples. Second, Austria's unhappy internal situation offers the Nazis an opportunity to do their underground sapping more thoroughly than would be possible if the Austrian government rested on a broader popular base.

Hitler's march into the Rhineland completely changed the European situation, especially in Central Europe. The attempt to bring about a similar fait accompli in Austria would seem to be the logical next step. One suspects that Hitler is a little disappointed over the result of the Abyssinian adventure. He hoped that Italy would bleed so nearly to death in Ethiopia that Mussolini's power on the Brenner Pass would become negligible, and he expected that League sanctions would lead to war between Italy and Great Britain. It now seems quite possible that Mussolini will emerge from the African conflict with unimpaired strength and that the Stresa front will be reestablished. All the more reason for seizing upon the present as the time to act in Austria. The Wilhelmstrasse and the Reichswehr are against such an adventure, but they also prophesied that disaster would result from Germany's adoption of conscription last year and from the reoccupation of the Rhineland a month ago. And their prophesies proved false. On the other hand, Italy is not France or Britain. These two countries would go to war only as a last resort. Italy is ruled by a desperado with the same mentality as Hitler's. Hitler knows very well that if German troops should march into the Tyrol or Salzburg, Mussolini would not hesitate to mobilize his army as he did on July 25, 1934.

Austria's internal situation is equally fraught with danger. The present Schuschnigg-Starhemberg government enjoys little popularity—which in all fairness might have been said of almost any Austrian government for years past. The Austrian people, though intelligent and possessing artistic talents of a high order, are almost entirely without political insight. They are intensely individualistic, by temperament anarchists rather than law-abiding citizens. But it must be admitted that the political platform of the Schuschnigg government is such as to receive only very slight popular support. The Nazis and the Socialists, each claiming the adherence of at least 30 per cent of the population, are sharply opposed to the present government, and even the supporters of the government are torn by quarrels within their ranks.

The truth is, of course, that there is dissension within every dictatorship. It is a fallacy to believe that a dictatorship which nominally abolishes parties actually exterminates them. The parties, as far as their visible existence is concerned, disappear, but they continue to function either as factions within the government itself or as illegal organizations. In the Austrian Fatherland Front three groups can be distinguished. On the extreme right is the Heimwehr, composed of fascists in the Italian sense; in the center are the Catholic Clerical reactionaries; the left wing is made up of semi-democratic Christian Social reformers. Prince Ernst Rüdiger von Starhemberg leads the right wing; Dr. Schuschnigg is the man of the center; while among those who demand democratic methods and reforms are the Minister of Agriculture, Ludwig Stöbl; the Minister of Social Welfare, Dr. Ludwig Dobretsberger; the Governor of Lower Austria, Josef Reither; and the leader of the Catholic workers' organization, Leopold Kunschak.

The breach between the Heimwehr and the left wing of the Fatherland Front is irreparable, and it has placed the Heimwehr at loggerheads with both the peasants and the Catholic workers. Prince Starhemberg and Governor Reither have distrusted each other as long as the Fatherland Front has been in existence. The Prince has stood for fascist totality; Reither is for democracy and self-determination. Both have pretorian guards to support them. Starhemberg commands the Heimwehr; Reither holds the allegiance of a large section of the Sturmscharen, which nominally have disarmed but in reality have kept together pending the date when the Heimwehr is also disarmed.

An equally sharp conflict exists between the Heimwehr and the Minister of Social Welfare, Dr. Dobretsberger. Dobretsberger, a close friend of the late Chancellor Dollfuss, intended and still intends to introduce democratic elements into the Stände-Staat constitution and tries to pacify the workers by granting them concessions. He hoped to improve their lot somewhat through the medium of the Einheitsgewerkschaft, a single, all-embracing, government-controlled trade union. When the automobile workers demanded higher pay (their wages have been cut 40 per cent during the last two years), Dr. Dobretsberger encouraged the Einheitsgewerkschaft to take up the workers' cause. But the industrial federation, led by prominent Heimwehr members, defeated the wage demands, and the leaders of the union were dismissed though they were members of the Fatherland Front. This brought so sharp a difference between Herr Mandl, the chief armament manufacturer in Austria and leader of the reactionary industrialist group, and Dr. Dobretsberger that the latter's early departure from the government is a foregone conclusion.

The affair of the Phoenix Life Assurance Company has created another complication. The Phoenix, the largest company of its kind in Austria, collapsed some weeks ago. The collapse was inevitable, for the Phoenix was the heritage of the old empire, calculated for the needs of a monarchy with 55,000,000 inhabitants, and it was miraculous that it lasted as long as it did. In fact, the error of not liquidating it some nine years ago when the troubles of the company first became known added to the final catastrophe. But when the end came, a list containing the names of those who had received bribes, engaged in improper speculation, or received too high salaries was discovered. Rumors about this list involved many prominent persons connected with the government or with the regime. Dr. Schuschnigg, whose honesty has never been questioned even by his opponents, promised a ruthless exposure of the culprits, and the results of an investigation were published. Though it was felt in some quarters that the list was not complete, its publication helped to calm public excitement over the scandal. In consequence of the exposure, the former Chancellor, General Karl Vaugoin; the Heimwehr leader, Count Botho Coreth; the famous commander in the World War, Prince Schönburg-Hartenstein; the leader of the Austrian Tourist Traffic Association, Strafella; and many others had to resign their positions in the corporative state.

In addition to these conflicts within its own Fatherland Front, the government has had to face the constant propaganda of the Austrian National Socialists, designed to weaken its position. Every divergence of opinion in government circles is magnified into a sign of weakness and decay. Constant rumors about impending government changes help to create the impression that the days of the government are numbered. And the actual quarrels among the ministers, emphasized by Starhemberg's sharp speeches, benefit the Nazi campaign of sniping. The Nazis are also helped by the censorship, which is clumsily and unwisely handled. The suppression of all manifestations of unrest or criticism in the newspapers has caused the people to doubt everything they read and to seek real political news in illegal propaganda sheets like the Nazi Illegale Korrespondenz or the Socialist Arbeiter Zeitung, which are secretly printed and distributed. Skilful and widespread Nazi rumors supply the rest of the "news."

The Nazis themselves are not strong enough to deliver a telling blow against the present regime. Despite the weaknesses of the Fatherland Front, the government still has the situation in its control and could easily suppress a Nazi uprising because of the disorganization in the Nazi ranks. It is believed by well-informed neutral observers that even a march into Austria of the Austrian Legion—recruited from young Nazis who escaped from Austria to Germany and about 13,000 strong—could be successfully suppressed by government troops. Only when Germany decides to move the Reichswehr into Austria will the catastrophe really begin. In Austria there is a firm belief that Hitler realizes the danger of such a step. It would undoubtedly be the signal for a world war, for Italy would immediately go to Austria's assistance and not single-handed.

The Austrian Social Democrats are convinced that only one solution can be effective for Austria, the neutralization of the country after the pattern of Belgium. A neutralized Austria would mean peace in Central Europe. Austria is the bone of contention not only between Italy and Germany but between Italy and Yugoslavia. Since the Italian-Yugoslav frontier is impenetrable, an Italian offensive, in the event of an Italian-Yugoslav war, could be made only by a march through Austria. If Austria were neutralized, such a movement would be impossible, and faute de mieux Italy and Yugoslavia would be compelled to effect a reconciliation.

Amsterdam Telegraaf

"Just a minute, Ladies and Gentlemen. Following our tableau 'The Rhineland,' we will present two sensational numbers entitled: 'We Want Colonies,' and 'Austria Belongs to Us.'"

Vermont: State of Anarchy

BY A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

Barre, Vermont

THE staid old New England state of Vermont has broken loose from its stiff crinolines of law and order and gone anarchist—anarchy is used here in its literal dictionary meaning of "absence or utter disregard of government." The anarchy now prevailing in Vermont was not induced by "mobs" or "the rabble." On the contrary, the best people and the best churches are numbered among its adherents; and with only a very few exceptions the officials condone the new regime by their silence when they do not openly advocate it.

The thing began when the Vermont Marble Company in Rutland County disagreed with its employees. The company was paying extremely low wages. Statistics show that wages in the granite industry in Barre are approximately twice as high as in the marble industry in Rutland County. For a year and a half the employees of the company tried to get their wages raised by negotiation. After all, these employees are conservative and sober Vermonters of the old school. They also attempted to get the controversy settled according to labor laws which were designed to meet just such problems. In Chapter 269 of the Public Laws, for instance, is a statute requiring the Vermont Commissioner of Industry to make an investigation in any dispute and "publish a report finding such cause and assigning such responsibility or blame."

When, after a year and a half, negotiations failed, 600 workers in five Vermont towns went on strike. That was in November, 1935. As for the investigation required by law, the Commissioner of Industry claims he made one. But there is evidence to show that he "investigated" by spending the scanty daylight hours of one winter day at the scene and then publishing the canned statement of the Vermont Marble Company as his report; he also included extracts from the news columns of the Rutland Herald.

The laws of Vermont also empower the governor on his own authority to investigate any controversy that in his opinion "seriously affects or threatens seriously to affect the public welfare." In Rutland County the 600 marble workers who went on strike at the beginning of the bitterest winter New England has had in years are still out. Purchasing power in the community has been throttled, and merchants are losing heavily. Seventy children in one school in Danby had to be provided with clothes by order of the school superintendent. The district attorney of Rutland brought pressure on the overseers of the poor to provide relief to the destitute strikers, although a marble-company official, who was also an overseer, protested. Federal relief, meanwhile, was scanty and its administration highly partial.

When the strike had been in progress two months an appeal for a genuine investigation was made to the Governor. He neither declined nor acceded, and nothing happened. Then a petition bearing more than a thousand names was presented to him. Again there was no reply from the Governor. His Commissioner of Industry, however, stated that the law did not apply to the present strike.

Certainly it would have been embarrassing to the Vermont Marble Company if it had been compelled to testify under oath to the statements it had given out freely to the press. The company denied, for instance, that it had ever paid any employee less than $5 as the balance due him on his weekly pay check. The employees promptly produced scores of canceled company checks for amounts ranging from two to twenty cents and more, but all of them for much less than $5; they even produced a stack of little yellow company forms showing that many men were paid nothing at all after company charges had been deducted for rent, light, and even, in some instances, for the pasturage of the family cow.

These little yellow slips reveal more than one significant item. Here is a sample.

*Vermont Marble Company—Identification Slip for Week Ending Nov. 7, 1935
5212—Mike Boleson*

Disability Insurance
Rent, part	...$2.52..	No Check
Water
Lights
Bank Deposit
Retirement Premium (pension)

Mike Boleson was one of those who worked and was paid nothing to feed his family. But from the point of view of law and order the first item on the slip is even more interesting. Section 6570 of Chapter 264 of the Laws of Vermont expressly prohibits any agreement by an employee to pay any portion of the cost of insurance of any kind maintained or carried by an employer; it further provides that an employer who makes a deduction for such purpose from the wages of an employee is subject to a fine of "not more than five hundred dollars." More than one employee of the company has testified that the fee for insurance is collected, law or no law, by the Vermont Marble Company.

The employees finally appealed to the United States Department of Labor, and a Commissioner of Conciliation came to Vermont. The company officials received him politely but implacably. It was doubtful, very doubtful, whether the dispute was within the province of the United States government. It was a state affair. They had special deputies sworn in and the situation was well in hand.

The story of these special deputies throws a strong light on the attitude and the power of the company. Over the protest of the district attorney from eighty to a hundred deputies were sworn within twenty-four hours after the strike began, although there had been no hint of violence. Among the deputies were two sheriffs from adjoining counties who had been elected and were being paid by the residents of their respective counties. Half the deputies were paid by the state out of a special fund administered by the Attorney General. When this fund was exhausted—the cost was approximately $1,800 a week—the legislature obligingly made an appropriation amounting to more than $18,000, thereby relieving the Vermont Marble Company of maintaining its own private guards. There was no violence before the deputies were sworn in. There has been no violence since then on property owned by the company or abutting upon it. The only clashes that have taken place between the deputies and the strikers have occurred when the deputies have made sorties, en masse, into the town. There has also been some dynamiting. In general, the explosions of dynamite caused loud noises but no property damage. They did make excellent propaganda against the strikers. One charge of dynamite, for instance, was placed on a railroad track in such a way that it could only blow out the dirt between the ties; another splintered the base of a wooden pole on a company power line, but the pole was supported by a second pole so that it could not possibly have come down. In an explosion which occurred on a company bridge at two o'clock on a December morning enough dynamite to wreck a blast furnace was used. But it did practically no damage; and for some reason the dynamiter, allegedly a striker familiar with company property, had selected an unused bridge rather than one a half-mile away whose loss would have seriously crippled operations.

The bridge explosion was notable in other ways. The special deputy sheriff in charge of the company deputies knew of it within ten minutes, though he was twelve miles away at the time and no company man was within a third of a mile of the bridge when the blast went off. Moreover, it was a dark night and no flames followed the explosion. That any deputy could know what it was and where it was is a matter for admiration and wonder. Nevertheless, by four o'clock—it was still as dark as the inside of a cow—the mind-reading sheriff had arrested two strikers by identifying the prints of their shoes in the light spit of snow that lay on the ground. The sheriff further identified the culprits by the tread of a Ford automobile, admittedly theirs, which he was able to detect, by some mysterious sixth sense, in a traveled road near the scene of the explosion. The two prisoners were held in bail for the grand jury and then indicted.

At the trial it was brought out that the shoes of the accused men were thirteen and one-half inches in length, whereas the footprints in the company's photographs were only eleven inches long. Also by accident it came out that witnesses for the company had failed to mention the only clear photograph among the many devoted to the prints of automobile tires. This picture showed the pattern of a tire tread entirely different from that of the tires on the car of the two accused strikers. Reluctantly the company witnesses admitted that all the photographs they had produced were likenesses of the same rut in the road. The strikers were acquitted.

On March 2 there occurred a fracas so trivial that the district attorney entered it for trial as "intimidation of a company employee." At that point the Attorney General appeared and ordered the charge altered to breach of the peace, which, in Vermont, is a charge that can include anything from spilling a garbage can to manslaughter. One man was tried on the charge. The jury disagreed, six to six. The Attorney General then ordered the case tried in the County Court and indicted five men on the same charge. Under Vermont procedure each County Court has two lay judges; the third must have had legal training, but the two lay judges can outvote him on any question. The men were promptly convicted and sentenced to from one to two years in state's prison. Pending appeal the judges were asked to stay execution. The request was denied, although such a stay has never been refused before, and the strikers' terms began at once.

It must be clear to any ordinary citizen that the "public welfare" of Vermont has been affected by the controversy between the Vermont Marble Company and its employees. The normal life of one whole community has been disrupted; the laws designed to protect the rights of citizens have been flouted by those sworn to enforce them. But Governor Smith has not yet seen fit to order the investigation which the laws of his state plainly authorize and which a wide section of public opinion demands.

Drawings by Dan Reed

Strike Call

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE pre-nomination situation of the Republicans gets steadily worse. Senator Borah has not done as well as he gave promise of doing a few weeks ago. The defeat of the Hearst-Landon combination in California has not helped Landon despite the hullabaloo to that effect from the Governor's friends. That he ever could have accepted Hearst's support is the measure of the political vision and ability of the Chief Executive of the state of Kansas. So we are within a couple of weeks of the opening of the Republican convention with no outstanding candidate in sight. If the convention does take Governor Landon it will obviously be simply because, in the absence of any outstanding figure, he has drifted into a more favorable position than anybody else. What a plight that is for the party of which Elihu Root boasted some twenty years ago that it alone was fit to rule!

Now the danger of all this is a serious one—that the powers that be in the convention will repeat what happened when Harding was nominated in 1920. They are quite likely to fish out of the grab-bag at three o'clock on Saturday morning in some private room Senator Dickinson of Iowa or Senator Vandenberg of Michigan. The latter choice would be negatively good, for Senator Vandenberg is a pleasant, kindly, rather attractive person, broad enough to admit that at least half of the New Deal program was entirely justified, even from the Republican point of view, and that that portion of it must be retained. He is not a big man or a dominating personality, but he is far more sympathetic to liberal ideas than are the run of Republican Senators. The choice of Senator Dickinson, however, would be an unqualified misfortune, for he is a complete reactionary, a red-baiter, and an absolute opponent of the liberalism of Franklin Roosevelt. He is essentially of that Republican Old Guard which ought to be driven out of the party at the earliest possible moment if the party is to survive. Actually there is a great deal of under-cover work being done in business circles in New York and Chicago looking to the choice of this Iowa Senator. From the Roosevelt point of view it would be a fortunate choice, because Dickinson would drive many liberals who are now hesitating into the Roosevelt camp.

Now what would a great party that is fit to rule do under the circumstances? It would seem as if it would call a quiet gathering of influential men representing every point of view to see whether there could not be substantial agreement on a man who would have the qualities and the experience in national and international life plainly needed in any candidate for the profoundly difficult job of conducting the affairs of the United States in this crisis of the world's history—qualities which Governor Landon obviously lacks. There would be young Republicans in such a conference. Nicholas Murray Butler would be asked to repeat the statement that he made after his recent trans-continental journey—that not a single one of the candidates now being talked about measures up to the need of the hour. If no man obviously fitted to lead a forlorn hope could be found in the Senate, then such a gathering might well search the academic and the business worlds for a man not now connected with politics but of demonstrated ability in dealing with large business affairs. If it were not for his peculiar record, one might think of President Gifford of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. If there were a Republican of the wide experience of Owen D. Young he would naturally come into the picture. If there were a younger man of the type of Alanson B. Houghton, who was a useful representative in Congress for years and an admirable Ambassador to Berlin immediately after the war, and who is a successful manufacturer on the best of terms with his employees, he would naturally be considered. There would be a serious investigation of the merits of John G. Winant, former Governor of New Hampshire, even though he is now connected with the social-security branch of the Roosevelt Administration. There are several men in the college world whose names immediately suggest themselves, but they would not exhaust the list. It is simply incredible that a party which polled 15,761,841 votes in 1932, which boasts that it contains within its ranks the leading business men, bankers, and great executives of the country, could not find someone worthy of heading the ticket.

Well, I hear cynics say, "What's the use? Roosevelt is going in no matter whom they nominate." True. But I am writing from the Republican point of view on behalf of those Republicans who sincerely believe that their party can be rescued and revamped and made into a constructive social force. There is, however, another reason why independents and Democrats alike should wish to see a strong opposition to the Democratic Party, both in and out of Congress. The safety of our institutions depends in large degree upon such an opposition. It will be little less than a misfortune if Franklin Roosevelt is elected by a greater plurality than he received in 1932 and if there is a less effective minority against the Democrats in the Senate and the House of Representatives. Given such an overwhelming victory, any tendencies in Mr. Roosevelt toward dictatorship will be reinforced if there is no determined, sincere, and able group of men to check his power and forcefully to present to the public the arguments against any policies which he may advocate. The President's acceptance of a modification of his latest tax bill in the face of severe criticism shows the effectiveness of capable analysis and opposition.

BROUN'S PAGE

RUPERT HUGHES has set himself to save the down-trodden film magnates of Hollywood. No blot or stain shall ever come to the escutcheon of Will Hays if Mr. Hughes can help it. And yet it is a strange device which this half-a-minute man wears upon his shield, for he fights for free press, free speech, and Metro-Goldwyn.

Rupert Hughes is the leader of the white-mouse faction in the Screen Writers' Guild. A connoisseur of buttered bread, the author has left the union of his own choosing now that pressure has come from the employing groups. But Mr. Hughes is actuated by the noblest motives. He is one of those who would have his silver and his soul's salvation, too. Ugly words have generally been used about those who desert their fellow-craftsmen in time of strife, but how can they be applied to Rupert Hughes, who would single-handed preserve the American family and more particularly the Warner Brothers?

Rupert Hughes once wrote a penetrating book about George Washington which elevated the eyebrows of the patriotic, but now he tends to conformity, and while the picket line wends its weary way outside the studio he purposes to stick to his desk, setting down "I wonder," "Came the dawn," and "Kiss me, my fool." In other words, Rupert is himself again. Alone in his Alamo he holds the fort against those who would debase the American motion-picture industry with sovietizing influences.

"When the freedom of American writers is gone," says Mr. Hughes from his cubicle on the lot, "American freedom is dead indeed. And since writing is an almost universal form of expression, its regimentation attacks thought, speech, and press and thereby the liberty and security of every citizen. Of late a certain school of writers is not only trying to align the writing craft with the labor unions, but to amalgamate all writers into one grand national union. This will be ruled, of course, by a small committee employing closed-shop principles . . . I believe in organization among all crafts, including the crafts of the employers."

"When the grand amalgamation was broached," Mr. Rupert Hughes continues, "I protested that a tyranny of writers over writers was planned, and this meant a despotism of a few natural-born committee men. Eight or more screen writers sent in their resignations and were immediately accused of bad faith and of 'blatant and callous treachery.' I now felt it time to join the traitors against the unforeseen Soviet, and we secessionists are now forming a new association devoted to the correction of abuses and the betterment of the craft in cooperation with producers as sincerely interested in the prosperity of the picture industry as are we writers. . . . There is a vague thing called Americanism that tries to work for freedom, equality, and democracy with the least possible restriction either in thought, speech, press, or action."

To be sure, "the one grand national union of writers" is a bogey invented by Mr. Hughes himself. And so are the secret negotiations designed to bring it about. I speak from my own knowledge, since I am at least an uncle of the idea which Rupert Hughes distorts. More than a year ago I spoke before a body of school teachers (I think it was the League for Progressive Education) and made the suggestion that authors, dramatists, screen writers, educators, newspapermen, and others whose jobs made them responsible for the creation of public opinion should form a loose confederation and meet in convention once a year. It was my notion that such an association might be helpful in the prevention of war. The screen, the press, and the radio are owned by a comparatively small number of individuals. The writers of America in any given situation have a right to know whether they are acting on their own or whether they are being pushed around by the few who own the media of propaganda.

Mr. Hughes professes to fear "a tyranny of writers over writers." Even if such a thing were possible, would he regard it as a step down from a tyranny of illiterates over authors? Mr. Hughes cannot possibly maintain that he or anybody else in Hollywood has freedom to write as he pleases under the present set-up. The closest sort of regimentation exists, and it is a pressure of men with no interest save that of profit over a group laughingly known in the counting-room as "creative artists." Indeed, Mr. Hughes identifies himself as one sharing wholly the point of view of the management, since he stresses at the expense of all else "the prosperity of the industry."

Rupert Hughes believes in the organization of everybody in the craft including the employers, but he need not lie awake nights wondering whether the poor producers will avail themselves of the necessary protective measures against the savage purposes of their employees. Depend upon it, Rupert, they have their grand union. They have their united front. Your kindly effort to build a writers' "union" to cooperate with the bosses will undoubtedly be welcomed by them, but I fear that it will be regarded by the studio heads as just another evidence of the inveterate passion of some employees to better themselves not by organization but by osculation. Such progress, it is quite true, cannot be obtained by regimentation. Mr. Zukor will be glad to accommodate all pilgrims to Rimmon, but each must take his turn or there will be a bumping of heads.

Equity knew its "Fidoes." The American Newspaper Guild did have its "League of Politeness," and the Screen Writers' Guild should not be surprised to encounter "a vague thing called Americanism" in Rupert Hughes. It is true that Sherlock Holmes did not call it that. I showed him a copy of the communication and after examining the tracks under a microscope the great detective exclaimed, "That man was running for his life."

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

TACKS IN AN EDITOR'S CHAIR

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

A LITERARY editor, like any other kind of editor, is faced by a certain number of recurrent dilemmas. To none of them is there any thoroughly satisfactory solution, but there are two at least which are important enough and persistent enough to warrant open discussion with the readers of a magazine who take, as many Nation readers do, an active personal interest in its policies and points of view.

The first is concerned with the question of what to do with letters of rebuttal and protest. Nearly every review of a controversial book draws one or more, and often a great many. In addition, a considerable proportion of unfavorable reviews of books of any kind are replied to by the author, by one of his friends, or by some outsider who happens to be passionately interested. Such letters are always sent to the author of the review in question, who usually—and at the cost of considerable time—answers them personally, but in most cases the letter writer wants his protest published and in three cases out of four cries "prejudice," "fraud," or "suppression" if it isn't. Yet only a small number of such letters could be printed unless we were willing to devote the major part of the paper to them, and it is not possible to formulate hard and fast rules which will render automatic the decision in any particular case.

We can and do say that errors in fact will be corrected unless they are manifestly too trivial to be of any importance. But if certain facts are obvious and determinable as matters of record, there are, unfortunately, many others which seem facts to a reader but are not demonstrable as such; and more than one correspondence has ended with the reader's declaration, "I merely inform you that your reviewer is a knave as well as a fool, and if you won't publish that obvious fact then you are engaged in the deliberate suppression of the truth." Most letters, on the other hand, are frankly concerned with matters of opinion, and here, of course, the limitation of space is the determining factor. We publish as many as we can of those which seem to us most important and most likely to interest our readers. But the conventional editorial phrase, "Rejection of your manuscript does not imply a lack of merit," means rather more in this connection than it often does in any other. Many interesting letters are never published simply because, interesting though they may be, to include them would mean to exclude some others which for one reason or another we consider it more important to print.

Somewhat harder perhaps is the case of the author who feels that he has been unjustly treated in an unfavorable review. There is, I believe, a law in France which provides that the recipient of an unfavorable review may require the periodical in which it appeared to give him an equal amount of space for rebuttal, but the law is not very often invoked, and if it were, it would make almost impossible the publication of an extended literary section. With us we regard such a reply exactly as we should regard any other contribution and use it only if it seems of sufficient interest or importance to justify the omission of some other letter or article in order that it may be published. After all, most reviews belong in the realm of opinion. They are offered as opinions, and most experienced authors, recognizing the fact, hesitate to reply, sensibly preferring to believe that in the book itself they have had their say.

Even thornier than the problem of protesting letters is that raised by the question of editorial responsibility for or agreement with the opinions expressed by individual reviewers. It is frequently raised and was raised again only a few days ago by a reader who had been infuriated by a certain opinion and who ended by stating roundly: "If the editors of The Nation agree with that opinion they are fools; if they do not agree with it they should have thrown the review into the wastebasket."

So far as this particular protest is concerned, it can be answered categorically. The editors of The Nation do not hold every opinion expressed in every book review or other signed article, and they do not consign to the wastebasket the work of every reviewer who happens to say something with which they do not agree. The variety of opinions expressed ought to be sufficient evidence of that fact, but unfortunately the question as a whole cannot be disposed of so easily. If it is obvious that we do not insist that every reviewer shall share all our opinions, it is equally obvious that, since we select our reviewers, we have some sort of responsibility for at least the general tendencies of their thought. It would be possible to conduct a book-review section from which all opinion opposed to the editor's own should be excluded. It would be impossible on the other hand to conduct one for the general color and competence of which he had no responsibility unless he were content merely to open the daily mail and to turn its contents over to the printer.

In the vast majority of cases books are assigned to a definite reviewer of the editors' choice. He is chosen because the editors believe that he is, in general, a man of intelligence and taste who has, besides, some special competence relative to the book in question. But since the editors believe in the utility of discussion from various points of view they often choose reviewers whose general philosophy they know to be different from that of The Nation but for whom they have, nevertheless, a solid respect. Occasionally the review resulting from such assignment is rejected because it seems dull or badly written, but seldom, if ever, is it "tossed into the wastebasket" because the point of view is not in accordance with our own. Since its author is a man in whom we have reposed confidence we prefer to assume that his opinion, however different from ours, is at least worth hearing.

It is hardly necessary to add that any reviewer who consistently wrote reviews which seemed to us ill-informed or unintelligent would be dropped from our list, and it is to that extent, but to that extent only, that we assume responsibility for the opinions expressed. Doubtless it is impossible to specify more precisely the exact degree of control of opinion which results from this policy: it is obviously dependent in part upon the extent of disagreement which the editors can reconcile with a belief in any reviewer's intelligence and competence. But such a description of our intentions should serve at least to give some sort of answer to the often raised question of the degree of responsibility which we assume. Our readers are justified in concluding that the authors of reviews in The Nation are men whom the editors believe worth hearing on the particular subject in hand. They are not justified in assuming that any specific opinion necessarily even approximates agreement with the editorial policy of the paper.

BOOKS

"It Is Not Forbidden to Think"

COLLECTED POEMS. By T. S. Eliot. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE grouping of these poems—chronological through 1930, and inclusive except for "Murder in the Cathedral"—seems to point to a mental chronology of evolvment and deepening technique. But two tendencies mark them all: the instinct for order and certitude, and "contempt for sham." "I am not sure," Mr. Eliot says in "The Uses of Poetry," "that we can judge and enjoy a man's poetry while leaving wholly out of account all the things for which he cared deeply, and on behalf of which he turned his poetry to account." He detests a conscience, a politics, a rhetoric, which is neither one thing nor the other. For him hell is hell in its awareness of heaven; good is good in its distinctness from evil; precision is precision as triumphing over vagueness. In The Rock he says, "Our age is an age of moderate virtue And of moderate vice." Among Peter the Hermit's hearers were "a few good men Many who were evil And most who were neither." Although as a critic, confronted by apparent misapprehension, he manifests what seems at times an almost pugnacious sincerity, by doing his fighting in prose he is perhaps the more free to do his feeling in verse. But in his verse, also, judgment remains awake. His inability to be untormented by "the Demon of Thought" as action, in Prufrock, posits an overwhelming question:

Oh, do not ask what is it,
Let us go and make our visit;

and as writing is satirized in Lines for Cuscuscaraway and Mirza Murad Ali Beg:

How unpleasant to meet Mr. Eliot!
With his features of clerical cut,

* * *

And his conversation, so nicely
Restricted to What Precisely
And If and Perhaps and But.

One sees in this collected work conscience—directed toward "things that other people have desired," asking "are these things right or wrong"—and an art which from the beginning has tended toward drama. The Waste Land (1922) characterizes a first period. In Ash Wednesday and later Mr. Eliot is not warily considering "matters that I with myself too much discuss Too much explain"; he is in them; and Ash Wednesday is perhaps the poem of the book, as submitting in theme and technique to something greater than itself.

And spirit of the river, spirit of the sea,
Suffer me not to be separated

And let my cry come unto Thee.

This is a summit; an instance, as well, of increased pliancy in rhythm, the lengthened phrase and gathered force of rhymes suddenly collided being characteristic of the later poems.

Mr. Eliot's aptitude for mythology and theology sometimes pays us the compliment of expecting our reading to be more thorough than it is; but correspondences of allusion provide an unmistakable logic: stillness, intellectual beauty, spiritual exaltation, the white dress, "the glory of the humming bird," childhood, concentration and wholeness of personality—in contrast with noise, darkness, drugs, dreams, drowning, dust on the rosebowl, Dusty the makeshift enchantress, cards, clairvoyants, serpents, evasiveness, aimlessness, fog, intrusiveness, temptation, unlogic, scattered bones, broken pride, rats, drafts under the door, distortion, "the sty of contentment." Horror, which is unbelief, is the opposite of ecstasy; and wholeness, which is the condition of ecstasy, is to be "accepted and accepting." That is to say, we are of a world in which light and darkness, "appearance and reality," "is and seem," are ineludable alternatives.

And there are words of special meaning which recur with the force of a theme: "hidden," referring to poetry as the revelation of a hidden life; "the pattern" continuing the Aristotelian concept of "form" as the soul, the invisible actuality of which the body is the outward manifestation. Fire, the devourer, can be a purifier; water has in it the thought of drowning or of drought ended by inundation; as God's light is for man, the sun is life for the natural world. Concepts and images are toothed together and the poems are so consistently intricate that one rests on another and is involved with what was earlier; the musical theme at times being separated by a stanza, as the argument sometimes is continued from the preceding poem—"O hidden" in Difficulties of a Statesman completing the "O hidden" in Triumphal March. The period containing Ash Wednesday, concerned with "the infirm glory of the positive hour," is succeeded by the affirmative one to which "Murder in the Cathedral" belongs; also Burnt Norton, a new poem which is concerned with the thought of control ("The high road and the low are one and the same") embodied in Deity and in human equipoise, its temporal counterpart:

We move above the moving tree
In light upon the figured leaf
And hear upon the sodden floor
Below, the boarhound and the boar
Pursue their pattern as before
But reconciled among the stars.

In Usk, also, Mr. Eliot expresses the conviction that the via media of discipline and self-control is the valuable one:

Where the roads dip and where the roads rise
 Seek only there
 Where the gray light meets the green air
 The hermit's chapel, the pilgrim's prayer.

One notices here the compactness, four thoughts in one—the visible, the invisible, the indoors, the outdoors; and that in the later poems, although statement is simpler, the rhythm is more complex.

Mr. Eliot has tried "to write poetry which should be essentially poetry, with nothing poetic about it, poetry standing naked in its bare bones, or . . . so transparent that in reading it we are intent on what the poem points at and not on the poetry." He has not dishonored "the deepest terrors and desires," depths of "degradation" and heights of "exaltation," or the fact that it is possible to have "walked in hell" and "been rapt to heaven."

Those who have power to renounce life are those whose lives are valuable to a community; one who attains equilibrium in spite of opposition to himself from within is in a stronger position than if there had been no opposition to overcome; and in art, freedom evolving from a liberated constraint is stronger than if it had not by nature been cramped. Indigenous skepticism, also constraint are part of Mr. Eliot's temperament; but at its apex art is able to conceal the artist while it exhibits his "angel"; like the unanticipatedly limber floescence of fireworks as they expand into trees or bouquets with the abandon of "unbroke horses"; and this effect we have in Cape Ann—denominated a minor poem, perhaps as being a mood or aspect rather than part of a thought-related sequence:

O quick quick quick, quick hear the song-sparrow,
 Swamp-sparrow, fox-sparrow, vesper-sparrow
 At dawn and dusk. Follow the dance
 Of the goldfinch at noon. Leave to chance
 The Blackburnian warbler, the shy one. Hail
 With shrill whistle the note of the quail, the bob-white Dodging by bay-bush. Follow the feet
 Of the walker, the water-thrush. Follow the flight
 Of the dancing arrow, the purple martin. Greet
 In silence the bullbat. All are delectable. Sweet sweet sweet
 But resign this land at the end, resign it
 To its true owner, the tough one, the sea-gull.
 The palaver is finished.

MARIANNE MOORE

The Cult of Emotion

THE STORY OF A NOVEL. By Thomas Wolfe. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

THIS is an interesting little memoir of the way in which Mr. Wolfe came to complete his two published novels and a third, still to be published. He tells us of the troubles that went into the making of his books, his difficulties in learning how to write, the intensity of his imaginative life while writing, his discovery that writing is hard work, his wonderment at the source of the artist's material, his relationship with his sagacious editor, his triumphs and despairs, and so on. These are experiences every beginning novelist has had, but Mr. Wolfe, who is impressionable, has had them more grandly and is able to write about them as if they had never happened to anyone before. That is the excuse for his book, and it is a good excuse.

The interest of this essay does not, however, except for professional students of Mr. Wolfe's career, lie in the facts it gives us about the composition of his novels. It lies in the

What makes a human body tick?
 Read this fascinating book!

"The unusual part of this compact little volume is not that it should contain such excellent color-work, nor that such eminent scholarship should be encompassed within its pages; but that so genuinely useful informative a book should be produced at a modest price."
 —MODERN MEDICINE

ILLUSTRATED WITH 39
 8-COLOR REPRODUCTIONS
 UNTIL NOW AVAILABLE ONLY IN SETS PRICED AT

$81

THE ATLAS OF HUMAN ANATOMY

With brief, non-technical text, by JESSE F. WILLIAMS, M.D.

An Absorbing, Profusely Illustrated "Course" in Anatomy

To the layman, the human organism is usually a mystery and the very instrument with which all of life is lived often remains an unknown and mysterious thing. Yet you need no special interest in medicine to discover the human body a tremendously absorbing subject. Few have any idea how much sheer interest rewards even an introduction to it.

In "The Atlas of Human Anatomy," with its brief, non-technical text and the 39 CELEBRATED FROHSE-BRODEL ANATOMY REPRODUCTIONS, will be found a compact, completely fascinating word-and-picture volume on the world's most ingenious machine—YOUR BODY. The infinite marvels of its plan, construction and function hold engrossing hours in store for you—and make an unusual, useful reference treasure.

To go through this brief, unadorned "course" in Human Anatomy is to enrich one's appreciation and understanding of a machine near to us and yet so far we generally overlook it. To any educated person it should provide a knowledge of human anatomy sufficient to give intelligent appreciation of the many proposals and discoveries of biological importance that are made for human betterment.

$81 Set of Frohse-Brodel Charts Lithographed in 8 Colors

Authentic, precisely accurate, the 8-color reproductions in this volume have been called by experts a consummately artistic work. This book contains, moreover, 4 new 8-color charts and 1 line-drawing.

The Complete Set

$2

In a handy 64-page volume with full cloth binding and heavy, selected stock.

POSTPAID

CONTENTS: Cellular Basis of Man; The Skeletal System; Muscular System; Circulatory System; Nervous System; Digestive System; The Respiratory System; Elimination System; Male Urogenital System; Female Urogenital System; Endocrine Glands.

AND—39 8-COLOR
 ILLUSTRATIONS

MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE

BARNES & NOBLE, Inc.,

The Educational Bookhouse,

105 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Please send at _____ vol(s) of "THE ATLAS OF HUMAN ANATOMY" at $2 per volume. It is expressly understood you will refund the purchase price within 10 days if I am not thoroughly pleased.

Name

Address

N-1

THE WORK GOES ON

... and the American public has profited—for example, by a saving of $5,000,000 each night in its lighting bills.

Each year new recruits are added to the army of scientists, engineers, and master craftsmen whose work created the modern x-ray tube and contributed so largely to building the vast radio industry. Because of their work, Glyptal, Carboloy, copper brazing, atomic-hydrogen welding, and many other new materials and new methods have helped industry to furnish you with new products—with improved products at a lower cost.

Here, 50 years ago, Edison established the factory which has grown into the Schenectady Works of the General Electric Company. Here Steinmetz conducted his investigations. And here, for more than 35 years, G-E research scientists have been exploring the secrets of nature. Their discoveries have stimulated the growth of new industries, have created new employment, have provided new comforts and conveniences for you. And still the work goes on. The G-E scientists of today are maintaining the traditions of G-E research.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric explicit statement of his view of life and the relation of the artist to it. First, his vision is completely egocentric. "Everything in a work of art is changed and transfigured by the personality of the artist." These words, true in a degree for all artists, are intensely true for Mr. Wolfe. His novels are, despite their length, lyrics. Second, his vision is a sense-vision. "The quality of my memory is characterized . . . by the intensity of its sense impressions." If he were a poet, he would be like Spenser rather than like Whitman, to whom he has been mistakenly compared. Third, these intense sense impressions produce a range of titanic, if cloudy, emotions in him, and these emotions form almost the entire stuff of his books. Referring to his own "almost insane hunger to devour the entire body of human experience," he says, "The only way I could meet it was to meet it squarely, not with reason but with life." How one can meet an insane hunger for experience by giving it more experience to be insane about is difficult to understand; but there is Mr. Wolfe to demonstrate how it can be done. Life is the answer to all problems, including the problems of life.

96-200N

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

His story is sincere, passionate, and no doubt utterly truthful; but it will make some of his admirers, myself among them, a little uneasy, for its unconscious motivation seems to be a deep fear and hatred of the reason. The cult of emotion is growing fast these days. I would not like to see it triumph here. Yet the presence of Mr. Saroyan, Mr. Engle, Mr. Reynolds, and the victorious Mr. Wolfe himself indicates that the cult of emotion already constitutes a school.

I may be an old fogey, but I still admire reason and consider the works of Thomas Mann superior to those of Adolf Hitler. And so I am, paradoxically, in favor of censorship. I am in favor of a Definition Test which all aspiring novelists would have to pass before being allowed to write. I would like to have Mr. Wolfe say, for example, just what he means by "America" and "American," two words he uses stirringly but not always clearly. I would like to know what he means when he describes this little book as "a story of the artist as a man who is derived out of the common family of earth and who knows all the anguish, error, and frustration that any man alive can know." If he means exactly what he says, then Mr. Wolfe is no man at all, but a sort of demigod, lent for a brief term to mankind and Scribner's. Along with others I have remarked in print with wearying iteration that Mr. Wolfe has streaks of genius, that his energy and power of caricature are admirable, that he is one of the hopes of our literature today; but one must still insist that he define his terms, look closely, after writing it, at what he has written, curb his natural interest in himself, and give the rational soul a break.

CLIFTON FADIMAN

The Tragedian Parnell

THE GREEN LION. By Francis Hackett. Doubleday, Doran and Company, $2.50.

FRANCIS HACKETT always writes with warmth and energy; but beneath its surface his prose too often generates its heat from the purple imagery and facile mysticism of the Pre-Raphaelites. The title of his present book has its source in a quotation from Evelyn Underhill that would have delighted Dante Gabriel Rossetti: "The duty of the alchemist, then, the transmuting process, is described as the hunting of the Green Lion through the forest of the sensual world. He, like the Hound of Heaven, is on a love chase down the nights and down the days." As his biographies of Henry VIII and Francis I testify, Mr. Hackett has a lively appreciation of the so-called human interest that may be found in historical characters, so much so that his biographies closely approximate historical fiction. He endows all his historical periods with colors from a Pre-Raphaelite palette, and this time he has chosen the last quarter of the nineteenth century in Kilkenny, Ireland, that moment which produced Yeats's "tragic generation" of young men who lived within the shadow of Ireland's disaster and Parnell's defeat.

It is perhaps through force of habit that Mr. Hackett constructs his present novel in the loose, episodic form which usually characterizes the writing of his biographies; perhaps the boy hero, Jerry, has a distant origin in Mr. Hackett's memories of childhood in Kilkenny, and if so the book may be read as a document of extremely remote autobiography. Jerry was an extraordinary boy, and at the age of eight was an ardent Parnellite; his Uncle Humphrey, a journalist, edited a Parnell newspaper; both boy and uncle saw Parnell plain, and to them the man was more than a great name: he was their cool, quiet, gentle friend as well as leader.

One should not perhaps lose patience with Mr. Hackett's precocious boy hero (though perversely I am reminded of G. A. Henty's boys under Clive in India, under Wolfe in Canada, under Bonnie Prince Charlie fighting for the lost cause in Scotland); his book does not pretend to be a work of naturalistic fiction. Its weaknesses center I believe in Mr. Hackett's interpretation of Parnell. The Parnell episodes allow him natural opportunities for a historical analysis of time and place within the novel which as such deserve more than casual attention. He says of Parnell:

He was not extravagant or impossible, but he lifted his cause into a force that had formidable claims on world opinion and held England to its bar. This he accomplished by the aid of everyone who loved Ireland, and with the help of lieutenants who cared as much as he did but who did not possess his untrammelled spirit, his governed audacity, his comprehension of the English ruling class, his cool hand. He had an unbroken pride. And to win against the subtle empire that rejected a claim to self-government he only needed loyalty through the dark hour of his career.

"Everyone who loved Ireland," "untrammelled spirit," "governed audacity," and "unbroken pride" are fine mouth-filling phrases for oratorical exercise but they do nothing toward explaining the forces that Parnell had to meet, nor do they lead to an understanding of Parnell's motives and character. Some of these phrases might well be applied to any public hero from Julius Caesar to Charles A. Lindbergh, and therefore the hero remains mysterious, a statue cut in marble or cast in bronze, another tribute to the great-man concept of history, to be admired as a symbol of national pride in city parks and museums. It is this very concept, I would say, that makes Mr. Hackett's Parnell as unconvincing as Parson Weems's George Washington. I do not mean to question the validity of his information: it is his use of it which seems to distort the causes of Parnell's downfall. Mere distrust of Gladstone's good intentions toward Home Rule, and recognition of the evil in Ireland's priest-ridden churches are not enough.

These causes are, I think, too near the surface of events. The real cause may be found in the quality of Parnell's leadership, for Parnell, despite his loyalty to the Irish peasant, seemed to be obsessed by the same concept of history that deflects Mr. Hackett's interpretation of the popular hero. If his lieutenants lacked the power to sustain his policy, it is evident that Parnell also lacked the ability to translate the philosophy of the Land League movement into terms that extended beyond his manipulation of a political machine; the strength of his policy was

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

by

C. B. S. Evans, M.D., F.A.M.A., Member White House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by R. W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch.M., M.B., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecological and Sexologist, London, England.

including

charts of sex organs with detailed explanations

By ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M.D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital

3-WAY GUIDE:

TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

CONTENTS

Bride and Groom

Sexual Overtures
First sexual contact
Frequency of sexual relations
The sexual cycle
Sexual response in men and women; timing

The Cold Wife—Frigidity

Mental, Psycho and Physical Barriers
Effects of Menstruation
Effects of Physical Development
Effects of early parental training
The clumsy husband
Pseudo-Frigidity
Pseudo-Response
Sexual Under-development
The pleasure-motif in sex

The Unsatisfied Wife

Effect upon nerves
Fear of pregnancy
The Acquiescent Wife
True and false sexual response
Happily managing the act
Problems of orgasm
The satisfaction of normal sexual appetite
The oversexed wife

Married Courtship

Making desires known via the special language of sex
Tactics the husband should use
Tactics the wife should use
Helpful preliminaries to sexual union
The sensual appeal; the spiritual appeal
Secondary sexual centers

The Perfect Physical Expression of Love

Positions in intercourse: Factors in determining choice
Two types of orgasm in women
Producing simultaneous climax
The mechanical principles of sexual union
Sexual stimulation
Sexual adjustment

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible explanations of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."

—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."

—Lancet (leading Eng. med. journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."

—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."

—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."

—Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n*

* The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View ■ Organs, Side View ■ Male Sex Organs, Front View ■ Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views. (Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 457-N 333 Sixth Ave., New York

Send me in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 plus few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded.

Name.....

Address.....

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee.)

"From a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly."

A NOTE ON LITERARY CRITICISM

By

JAMES T. FARRELL

Author of

"STUDS LONIGAN"

A concrete analysis of the subject, wherein Mr. Farrell proceeds to "name names" in a volume that already has provoked acute controversy.

$2.50 • At All Bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS, 424 Madison Ave., N. Y. C.

"A blueprint for a bourgeois revolution."

WHO OWNS AMERICA?

A new Declaration of Independence by twenty-one contemporary writers, edited by Herbert Agar and Allen Tate.

"Disquieting . . . provocative . . . inspiring."
—New York Times

"A good book . . . prescribed reading for those who are fed up on economics but who recognize there is a thing called the depression."
—New York Herald Tribune

"An intelligent, convincing exposition of the middle course in America. The book is a splendid statement of the ideals of the economic democrats."—William Allen White

$3.00 HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

vested in his personality. But Parnell was to disclose his great-man complex in the O'Shea affair; in that episode he was to offend, if not entirely betray, the sexual morality of the Irish peasant at a crucial moment; he was to count the world well lost for love of a handsome, vain, ambitious woman who respected him but had no sense of his public responsibility, as any reader of her memoirs would soon discover.

It is clear, I think, that any political leader who lacks a world philosophy is already doomed to betray the very cause which gave him excuse for being; his real strength, however aided by personal character and the ability to dramatize the moment, lies in a philosophy of action for the common good. Lacking that philosophy he is killed, trapped, or overthrown by enemies of equal strength, who like him secure the transient advantage, and a few years later follow the same course to destruction which is the fate of the dictator, whether in ancient Rome or present Germany.

To fail as Parnell failed is to create an analogy to classic tragedy, an analogy of which both Yeats and Joyce are not unaware. Yet Mr. Hackett, in his pursuit of the "Green Lion" remains untouched, and the subsequent adventures of his hero to the age of seventeen, concluding in an escape to America, dwindle into insignificance.

HORACE GREGORY

The Coming War in the East

JAPAN MUST FIGHT BRITAIN. By Lieutenant-Commander Tota Ishimaru. The Telegraph Press. $3.

WHEN JAPAN GOES TO WAR. By O. Tanin and E. Yohan. The Vanguard Press. $3.

WAR IN THE PACIFIC. By Sutherland Denlinger and Lieutenant-Commander Charles B. Gary. Robert M. McBride. $3.

TOGO AND THE RISE OF JAPANESE SEA POWER. By Edwin A. Falk. Longmans, Green and Company. $4.

WAR AND DIPLOMACY IN THE JAPANESE EMPIRE. by Tatsuji Takeuchi. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $4.50.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN RELATIONS, 1542-1936: A SHORT HISTORY. By Roy Hidemichi Akagi. The Hokuseido Press. $4.

THE simultaneous appearance of three books dealing with Japan's approaching struggle for mastery of the East can scarcely be set down as a mere coincidence. It is interesting to note, however, that the authors are unable to agree on Japan's probable opponent in this conflict. Commander Ishimaru has reasons that are at least plausible for choosing England rather than America or the Soviet Union for this role. War between the two great island empires is inevitable, he maintains, unless England, rich in colonies, forgoes all attempts to maintain the status quo or Japan abandons its policy of expansion. The latter he dismisses as unthinkable and holds the former to be desirable but unlikely. In contrast to the strong bonds of trade between the United States and Japan, he points out that there is deep-seated economic rivalry between England and Japan. Both are of necessity trading countries living by their exports of manufactured articles, and both are dependent on their markets in the East. Any one of a number of issues—trade restrictions, naval limitation, immigration policies in the colonies, or the Open Door in China—might provide the occasion for war.

Commander Ishimaru does not think much of Britain's chances should such a war break out. Unless England can find an ally in Soviet Russia or the United States, he feels that Japan has nothing to lose and everything to gain by the conflict. Britain, he believes, is decadent. The passing of the era of free trade has deprived England of whatever natural advantages it had as a manufacturing nation. The necessity for defending its wide-flung empire would offset whatever naval supremacy it appears to possess. India, Egypt, and the Irish Free State are only waiting for a chance to escape from London's yoke, and it is even doubtful whether all the self-governing dominions would give full support to the mother-country. Only one major difficulty is seen by the author: how to make an unexpected attack on England without violating the Kellogg peace pact and running the risk of war with the United States. Admittedly the excuses offered in connection with the Manchurian affair would be even less convincing in the event of an attack on a great power. This factor, however, is subordinated to the necessity of attacking before the British fleet could be assembled at Singapore or Hongkong. The book ends with an impassioned plea to Britain to prevent war by making way for the new empire in the Orient.

The second is also a war book, but of a very different type. Tanin and Yohan, authors of an authoritative book on Japanese fascism, have turned their incomparable talents for research to making a careful evaluation of Japan's economic and social resources so as to form a judgment of its capacity to wage war against the Soviet Union. While recognizing that any estimate of this type can be little more than a rough guess, the authors have piled up an amazing amount of quantitative data. First they compile a complete list of the materials which they believe would be necessary in the first six months of the war, and in subsequent semi-annual periods. Having done this, they proceed to explore all the possibilities of obtaining these supplies—the abundance or lack of raw materials, the country's agricultural and industrial resources, the prospects for imports and exports, and the chance of obtaining foreign loans. Special attention is directed to the class antagonisms within Japanese society and to the possibility of a Communist uprising. The authors do not make the mistake of underestimating the strength of the Japanese military machine. They admit that in a short war Japan would exhibit considerable strength. But their analysis indicates that very serious weaknesses would appear in an extended conflict. Japan's heavy industries are especially weak. Not only would it be necessary for it to import a considerable proportion of its iron and steel, machinery, and special war equipment, but it would encounter grave problems when it came to organizing the national economy on a war basis because of the preponderance of small industries and lack of modern technique. Raw materials of all types would also have to be purchased from abroad, as would a considerable amount of food. With very small gold reserves, and with an inevitable falling off in export trade, Japan would find itself in an extremely critical situation by the opening of the second year of the war. Granting that Japanese discipline would suffice in the early months of the conflict, the authors feel that the underlying class antagonisms would be of growing importance as food supplies were curtailed, and the population faced the shock of bad news from the front.

"War in the Pacific" deals with a possible Japanese-American encounter, and is in many ways the most rewarding of the three books. It is analytical and descriptive rather than prophetic. While it does not attempt an exhaustive evaluation of Japanese resources such as Tanin and Yohan give us, it contains a brief chapter on this phase of the subject which agrees substantially with the Russian study. The book is primarily concerned, however, with technical questions of equipment and

The Syllogism of America Today

More and better business is imperatively demanded by the conditions of today. More factory goods and more farm goods MUST be produced and sold through quick turnover if America is to come through into the clear light of prosperity.

Two Reasons Why

- (1) Bigger and better industry is urgently required as a fiscal base to carry the growing tax-load—since all taxes are ultimately paid out of PRODUCTION alone and not out of "money".
- (2) Industrial expansion is needed to absorb unemployed labor, which will increase mass buying-power and cut down relief taxation.

Blocked by Prevailing Set-up

But industrial expansion is blockaded by the prevailing economic set-up, which forces productive capital to operate between the upper millstone of heavy taxation and the lower millstone of recurrently inflating ground rent. The mere, initial cost of ground alone defeats not only government projects of slum clearance but also private initiative in the erection of badly needed new housing throughout the country—thus keeping a great deal of labor out of work, depressing mass-power to buy goods, and narrowing the fiscal base. The housing illustration is but one of hundreds to the same effect.

Like It or Not

The only way out is to shift the main burden of taxation from PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL to ground values, urban and rural, improved and vacant.

Productive Capital the Goat

Productive Capital, then, is overloaded with taxation and compelled to pay billions for the rental or purchase of ground; while at the same time further tax burdens are proposed by Townsends, Bonusites, and Share-the-wealthites. Moreover, to cap the climax, the Marxites mistakenly identify productive capital as the central villain of the economic tragedy, and advocate its total confiscation. More and more people are studying the logic of the American economic situation in—

SAFEGUARD PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL,

by Louis Wallis

(Reading time only one hour)

Seventy-five cents at bookstores,
or direct from

DOUBLEDAY, DORAN & CO.
GARDEN CITY, LONG ISLAND, N. Y.

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE

MOROSCO THEA., 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Wednesday & Saturday at 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:45

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:45
Seats at $1.10

["Quite apart from propaganda, it is a thrilling play."—William Lyon Phelps.]

"BURY THE DEAD"

The Drama That Startled the World by IRWIN SHAW

BARRYMORE Thea. 47 St. W. of B'y | Prices: Evgs. 50c to $2.00
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. 2:40 | Mats. Wed. & Sat. 50c to $1.50

A Party and Talk

"The TRUTH about SHOSTAKOVICH"

Joshua Kunitz, recently returned from the Soviet Union where he was New Masses correspondent, will give a first-hand account of the event stirring world music circles today. Then stay and attend the PARTY and DANCE

the New Masses editors and staff are giving to welcome Kunitz back. Music! Dancing! Refreshments!

Wednesday

May 27th

8.30 p.m. at

WEBSTER MANOR

125 E. 11th St.

Tickets $55c. at

New Masses,

31 East 27th St.

Workers Bookshop,

50 East 13th St.

SCHOOL

• Announcing NEW LOW RATES

To make our School available to a more varied income group, we announce the new rate schedule herewith noted—to take effect at once for our 15th season starting September 23, 1936. Registrations are now being accepted under this plan. Prospectus on request.

$350 to $500

the Year

Including Tuition,
Noon Dinners and
Supplies

BROOKLYN ETHICAL CULTURE SCHOOL

A Coeducational Day School from Kindergarten through 8th Grade—conducted on the same basic principles as the New York Ethical Culture School.

49-50 Prospect Park West, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Telephone SOutH 8-4300

BOOK

BE FAIR TO THE RICH

By RONALD TOOTLEBRIDGE SKIPPY

"Don't kill the goose that owns the golden egg," says Mr. Skippy. A timely appeal for a kindly and protective attitude toward those of our fellow citizens who have accumulated wealth. Read this little book and learn how much we owe to the affluent, how unjust it is to "sack" them.

Twenty-five cents. Send coin, not stamps.

WILLIAM FEATHER PRESS, Caxton Bldg., CLEVELAND, OHIO strategy, and contains a vivid description of crucial engagements in the coming struggle.

For one who wishes to understand the source of Japan's strength, despite its apparent economic weakness, considerable light is furnished by Mr. Falk's definitive biography of Admiral Togo. The rise of Togo coincides almost completely with the growth of the Japanese Empire into one of the world's great powers. As an individual Togo appears to have been lacking in all the external attributes of greatness, except one:
he was completely immersed in his job. The navy was his life, and as a master of naval strategy he is ranked second only to Nelson. In addition, he was typically Japanese in his single-minded loyalty to the Emperor and his acquiescence in the expansionist aims of his country.

A partial explanation, at least, for the almost universal acceptance of the postulates of militarism in Japan may be obtained by reading between the lines of Dr. Takeuchi's remarkable book. Dr. Takeuchi gives us what is undoubtedly the most authoritative description available in English of the workings of Japan's invisible government, and the means by which the army and navy have maintained their influence over foreign policy. He follows this by a "case history" of each of the crises in foreign relations in the last half-century, showing how the various groups in this invisible government affected the final outcome. While the value of the book for the ordinary reader is marred by the author's failure to interpret the amazing collection of facts which he has assembled, it is indispensable to anyone seeking a clear understanding of Japanese foreign policy.

In contrast, Dr. Akagi's book suffers from over-interpretation.
As a semi-objective defense of Japanese foreign policy it has its value, but it is scarcely a book that would interest the average reader.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

RADIO

UNDOUBTEDLY the large advertisers try to give the public what it wants in the matter of radio entertainment, and since many accounts remain on the air year after year it must be that the commercial results are satisfactory.
And yet unquestionably the development of the medium lags.
Radio needs critics. Fan letters do not suffice, since there are those who write and rather more who merely yawn and turn the dials. Newspapers do not evaluate radio programs in the manner in which they review books and plays and, to a lesser extent, motion pictures. They do not want to help radio or hurt the feelings of advertisers. But somebody really ought to tell the sponsors of Eugene and Willie Howard how perfectly dreadful their new program is.

The lag between a good radio show and a poor one is even greater than in the case of plays or pictures. The program makers go on the theory that people who resemble each other are equal to the same thing. It isn't true at all. One need do no more than contrast Amos and Andy with their many imitators.
Amos and Andy, of course, are dealing with a wholly synthetic conception of Negro life, but they really stand as the founders of a possible folk school of radio skits. They have endured because they deal in character, such as it is, and incident, and because they never employ gags. To be sure, they mispronounce words, but so does Herbert Hoover and he isn't nearly as funny.

The sharpest criticism of radio advertising and radio entertainment (the two are entwined) is offered by a pair of radio performers who do not seem to have helped themselves commercially by the keenness of their jabs. Indeed, Colonel Stoopnagle once said, "Budd and I seem to get along all right by going from one dissatisfied sponsor to another." Although they stand only moderately well in popularity polls, Stoopnagle and Budd seem to me easily the most amusing of the radio comics. They have developed a distinct radio technique while many of the others are still using the devices by which one gets laughs from a theatrical audience.

If there were a radio Will Hays, heaven forbid, he would do well to abolish the practice of studio audiences. Until this is done, or until television comes, the radio performer will never fully adapt himself to his medium. The invisible audience is not amused by the fact that Ed Wynn wears a fire helmet. Radio will begin to come into its own when the stooges are kept out of the studio.

It might be well to point out that Amos and Andy, who have outlasted them all, never permit anybody to watch them while they are working. Radio's appeal should be to the ear alone. It is a mistake to try and swap senses while crossing a stream of consciousness.

But perhaps my criticism should be discounted. I'm the person who laughed his, or her, head off when Stoopnagle and Budd mentioned their friend Phoebe B. Beebe who owns a new canoe canal.

HEYWOOD BROWN

FILMS

Documentary

"WE ARE FROM KRONSTADT," the new Russian film at the Cameo, was undertaken not so much to tell a story as to present for the information and edification of its audience a certain body of material hitherto passed over by the camera. "In 1933 I was given an assignment to write a scenario about the Baltic fleet," writes Vishnevsky for the program. "I wrote this scenario, refuting many cinema traditions, blazing new trails. I came out against parlor realism, against a conventionally symbolical cinema, against cinema hyperboles. . . . The country must see the face of the Red navy—that was the assignment, and everybody should understand that such an assignment must be covered fully, receiving the highest marks." With Dzigan as director the work went on, first in the Baltic and then on the shores of the Black Sea, where a Northern atmosphere was created by planting pine forests and building a landscape equivalent to that against which the original action had taken place. The original action was the defense of Petrograd in 1919 by land and sea, and since action of some sort is the subject matter of the film it may be said of course to tell a story. But the story is not the thing.

The average American movie-goer would scarcely need to be told this. He would find the film bewilderingly slow and literal. The soldiers and marines would look to him now and then as if they had paused to have their pictures taken. The humor would seem rudimentary—developed with half a heart and then dropped all at once. And in general he would miss the sense, with which he is so familiar, of history concentrating itself into a series of self-conscious and significant gestures.

VISITING RUSSIA with EXPERTS

5 weeks in Soviet Russia under leadership of

LOUIS FISCHER

Special services and comforts. Round trip including Tourist steamship passage $850

1 month in Soviet Russia under leadership of

JULIEN BRYAN

Great centers and places seldom seen by tourists. Round trip including Third Class steamship passage $575

1 month in Soviet Russia under leadership of

JOSHUA KUNITZ

A comprehensive itinerary. Round trip including Third Class steamship passage $469

Other trips from $372

or you may travel on your own.

BOOKLETS ON REQUEST

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street, New York

Cooperating with Intourist

For The Thinking Citizenry Of These United States

CRIME and JUSTICE By Sheldon Glueck

This book is a penetrating diagnosis of the ills of criminal justice (as reflected in jails, prosecutor's offices, courts, prisons, and administrators) together with wise and practical suggestions for the improvement of agencies to control crime.

It is an easy-to-read, trenchant and profound study which involves several fields of knowledge: law, psychology, psychiatry, sociology, government and politics.

SHOULD BE READ BY
EVERY INTELLIGENT LAYMAN!

*Selected as the May choice of The Scientific Book Club.
Recommended by The Book-of-the-Month Club.*

Price $3.00. Purchase from your bookseller or tear out and mail this advertisement to

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY 34 Beacon St., Boston

Name

Address

Check enclosed ☐

Send C.O.D. ☐

The episodes of the film would remain separate in his imagination, and within each episode the actors would appear to be only rather listlessly aware of what their doings meant. This would be in part because the film is European, and hence out of touch with our tradition of "pace." In addition, however, it would suggest that Vishnevsky and Dzigan had succeeded in their attempt to avoid symbol and hyperbole. My own notion is that they have succeeded too well. The documentary film has its great interest; and I am not unaware that there is a certain pleasure to be derived in the present case from an absence anywhere of signs that Artem Balashov and his friends know they are making history. The trouble is that they seem to know they are making a film. The art of documentation has paraded itself here no less conspicuously than the arts of symbol and hyperbole parade themselves in Hollywood films.

The single fine exception is the episode in which several Red sailors are executed by being pushed over a cliff into the sea; and curiously enough this scene is saturated with conscious poetry. If it is the scene which most members of the audience will remember longest, as I am sure it is, the reason must have something to do with its having been imagined dramatically. The group to be executed has its arbitrary symmetry: on the one wing a commissar with distinguished face and white hair, on the other wing a little boy who has volunteered from the ship, and in between them half a dozen indifferent marines. It is no accidental grouping of human figures; nor is it by chance, I am convinced, that gulls fly freely and beautifully over their heads as one by one they take their last look at the sky. I am positive that Dzigan waited for those gulls, and I insist that they are symbols. It is a powerful scene, as the central scene of any narrative should be, and indeed it is one of the best scenes I can remember from any movie. My point merely is that the average American is moved by a proper instinct when he asks for more of the same, and when he calls most of the picture dull.

The films now being privately shown in this country by Joris Ivens, a young Dutch director, are announced both as "documentary" and as "social." Mr. Ivens, introducing them the other night at the National Board of Review, claimed for them that they did not go sentimentally in for plot. They were camera studies, he said, of the contemporary world—studies made in certain cases from a definite social point of view, but above all studies rather than stories. "Borinage" and "New Earth," the first having to do with a coal strike in Belgium and the second with the draining of the Zuyder Zee in Holland, were especially interesting; but I could not see that Mr. Ivens had accomplished much by abandoning narrative. The great steam shovels dropping clay and stones to keep out the North Sea seemed finally to move with an almost human anxiety. Yet that was it, they were almost human. The art of narrative is absolutely human, and I cannot think that the art of gathering and photographing the accidents of existence will ever surpass it in interest. Meanwhile, needless to say, the documentary film will continue like the textbook and the newspaper to have its uses.

"It's Love Again" (Roxy) is a British imitation of the films in which Ginger Rogers and Fred Astaire have done their irresistible dancing. The feminine part of the bill is more than filled by Jessie Matthews, who is both merry and toothsome, but Robert Young certainly does not correspond to Fred Astaire. A funny colonel, Robert Hale, helps however to make up for the lack; and in general it may be predicted that "It's Love Again" will last charmingly through the summer months.

MARK VAN DOREN

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

IDIOT'S DELIGHT. Shubert Theater. Robert Sherwood manages somehow to make a smashing theatrical success out of an anti-war play. With the Lunts and many other entertaining trimmings.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

SAINT JOAN. Martin Beck Theater. Brilliant interpretation by Katharine Cornell of what may well be Shaw's most enduring play.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

GILBERT AND SULLIVAN REPERTORY. Majestic Theater. The same company which usually appears about this time of year in pleasant revivals. A weekly change of program.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

MR. DEEDS GOES TO TOWN. Columbia. Directed by Frank Capra, and even better than "It Happened One Night." Gary Cooper as the rustic and quixotic Mr. Deeds is not only charming but meaningful, and the whole film has human importance.

PEG OF OLD DRURY. British and Dominion (Paramount). An eighteenth-century costume piece with Sir Cedric Hardwicke as David Garrick and Anna Neagle as Peg Woffington. Delightfully unhistorical.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Gaumont British. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

THE PRISONER OF SHARK ISLAND. Fox. Tells the story of Dr. Mudd, convicted in 1865 of having helped Booth to escape. Somber and powerful; does not spare the spectator.

DUBROVSKY. Amkino. As romantic as Pushkin, on whose unfinished novel it is based. Not wholly successful, but interesting as a variation on the orthodox Russian theme.

The Intelligent Traveler

BY JOHN ROTHSCCHILD

OUTSTANDING TOURS

EVERY year there are a few trips and cultural undertakings abroad which merit the thoughtful investigation of travelers. A selection of them follows. Addresses unless otherwise stated are New York City.

A European Art Tour under the direction of Ralph Fanning, Fine Arts Department, Ohio State University, will visit England, Belgium, France, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Hungary, Czecho-Slovakia, Holland. The eight weeks' trip costs $795, third class on the ocean, second-class rail. Address Bureau of University Travel, Newton, Massachusetts.

The International School of Art conducts summer courses in the arts in Poland, Rumania, Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, and Hungary. Distinguished artists of each country give instruction, and wherever there is an interesting folk art, such as the glass painting of Czecho-Slovakia or the ceramics and weaving of Hungary, it is featured. There are many excursions into the peasant countryside and unplanned contacts with native life. Rates vary for each country, the lowest quoted being $350 for the seven weeks' trip of the Czecho-Slovakia group, third class on the ocean. Address International School of Art, 4 East Twenty-eighth Street.

The School of Speech, Northwestern University, offers a Theater Study Tour in England, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, and France. It will be conducted by Garrett H. Leverton, professor of dramatic production at Northwestern; credit for six semester hours is given. The rate, including tuition, is $624 for eight weeks, third class on the ocean. Address Drama League Travel Bureau, Essex House.

For the ninth year the Drama League of America sponsors an English Study Tour, this year under the leadership of Dean Pearle Aiken-Smith, professor of speech at the University of Southern California. Six weeks at the summer session of the Central School of Speech and Drama in London, and attendance at the Malvern and Shakespeare festivals are the features of the tour. The eight weeks' trip costs $597, tourist class. Address the Drama League Travel Bureau.

The People's College, Oetz-in-Tyrol,

Austria, is the focus of a number of tours of social inquiry, which travel through Europe and settle down for a week or ten days of lecture-discussions and rest in the middle of the journey. This year's tours include:

Adult Education and Social Progress, under the leadership of Dr. Hubert Phillips of Fresno State College, visiting France, Switzerland, Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, Germany, the Scandinavian countries, and England. The eight weeks' trip costs $458, third class.

Social and Cultural Developments Abroad, under the leadership of Betty Youngstrand, of the Midwest branch of the League of Nations Association. The group visits England, the Scandinavian countries, Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, Rumania, Austria, and France. The rate is $458, third class, for eight weeks.

A similar plan will be followed for a group under the leadership of Hertha Zwerger, which will visit England, Scotland, Holland, Luxemburg, Austria, Switzerland, Spain, and France. The eight weeks' trip costs $573, tourist class. Address Pocono Study Tours, 545 Fifth Avenue.

A Trip to Cooperative Europe under the auspices of the Cooperative League of the United States will be conducted by Meyer Parodneck, president of the Sunnyside Consumers' Cooperative. It will visit Scotland, England, the Scandinavian countries, and the U. S. S. R. The seven weeks' trip costs $465, tourist class on the ocean, third class in the Soviet Union, second-class rail in Europe. Address Pocono Study Tours.

Public Housing in Europe and the Soviet Union, under the leadership of Helen Alfred, director of the National Public Housing Conference, includes France, Holland, Germany, the Soviet Union, the Scandinavian countries, and England. Seven weeks, tourist class on the ocean, second-class rail in Europe, third class in the U. S. S. R., $661. Address The Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street.

A tour featuring Modern Architecture will be conducted by Kenneth J. Conant, professor of architecture at Harvard University, and Marian Hayes of the Department of Art at Mount Holyoke College. The itinerary includes England, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, Poland, Germany, Holland, Belgium, and France. The seven weeks' trip costs $550, third class on the ocean, third-class rail in Europe, tourist class in the U. S. S. R. Address the Bureau of University Travel.

The International Institute of Teachers College, Columbia University, offers a series of field courses in foreign education, carrying credit in the college. They are as follows:

Residence Study Group in Berlin, Thomas Alexander, John W. Taylor, and Nellie S. Buckey instructing. Foreign Study Course in the Psychology of Social Reconstruction, Goodwin Watson instructing. Field Course in the Teaching of Literature in England, Professor Ida A. Jewett conducting. Field Course in Social Work in England, under the direction of Elsa Butler Grove. Physical Education Field Course in Sweden, Denmark, and Germany, under the direction of Professor J. F. Williams and Dr. Norma Schwendener. Field Course in Nursery School, Kindergarten, and Early Elementary Education in Holland, Belgium, France, and England, conducted by Agnes Burke. Fine Arts Field Course in Europe, Elise E. Ruffini, instructor. Fine Arts Field Course in Mexico, under Professor Charles J. Martin.

Social Inquiry and International Friendship are the pivotal interests of a group conducted by Carolyn Dudley. The countries visited in a leisurely itinerary include England, the Scandinavian countries, Germany, and France. The two months' trip costs $478, third class. Address The Open Road.

A tour of Europe's northern countries will be led by Adolph Hodge, a teacher in the New York schools. The trip is for Negroes and is the eighth European party conducted by Mr. Hodge. The itinerary includes the Soviet Union, Norway, Sweden, England, France, Germany, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, and Lapland. The eight weeks' trip costs $642, third class on the ocean, second-class rail in Russia, Belgium, and France, third class elsewhere. Address Adolph Hodge, 1949 Seventy-fourth Street, Brooklyn, New York.

Compared to the other countries in which tours are so well organized, Spain is terra incognita. Recent events there have heightened the intelligent traveler's interest in the country; a tour under expert leadership presents fascinating possibilities. R. Selden Rose, professor of Spanish at Yale University, and Mrs. Rose will conduct a group through Spain and France, traveling by private motor. The entire trip takes a little over six weeks and costs $840, tourist class on the ocean. Address Europe on Wheels, 366 Madison Avenue.

In the Wake of History is the name of a tour to be led by Will Durant. The tour follows the path of man's progress in Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Lebanon, Constantinople, Greece, the Isles of the Aegean, and Italy. The nine weeks' trip costs $890, third class on the ocean, and second class-intermediate for Mediterranean services. Members may leave the tour at Athens on July 25, the price of this shorter tour, including return passage, being $590, same services as above. Address William M. Barber, Babson Park, Massachusetts.

Motoring. Europe on Wheels has developed to a high point the pleasures of European motor travel. A typical trip is titled "Unknown France," under the leadership of Alphons Vorenkamp and Cyrus Stimson, both of the Art Department of Smith College. The trip lasts seven weeks, all of the time abroad being spent in France; the cost is $636, third class on the ocean. The organization arranges for brief motor trips which may be a part of any European holiday; one may rent a car and choose one's own itinerary; services extend through England and the Continent. Address Europe on Wheels.

Mexico. The committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America will hold its annual seminar in Mexico City and Cuernavaca from July 9 to July 29. This year the outstanding events are the section on Inter-American Relations, which will have representatives from Mexico, Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the United States, and the section on Mexican painting, headed by Daniel Cotton Rich of the Art Institute of Chicago, to which outstanding Mexican painters will contribute. The rate for the seminar, without extensions, is $398 by cabin steamer from New York; $355 by rail from Chicago, Pullman berth included. These prices include meals during the one week spent in Cuernavaca but do not include meals in Mexico City. Hotels are included. Seminar members may spend a week in Yucatan with Dr. Herbert J. Spinden, archaeologist, before the program begins, the extra cost being $100. They may spend one or two weeks following the program in Oaxaca and Michoacan, the cost being $50 a week. Address Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America, 287 Fourth Avenue.

Dr. C. W. Weiant, who has lived in Mexico and pursued scientific investigations there, will conduct a small party over a far-flung route this summer. Most of the travel will be by automobile. The six weeks' trip costs $425, cabin-class steamer. Address Dr. C. W. Weiant, 55 West Forty-second Street.

J. G. Lippincott, an instructor in art and architecture at Pratt Institute, will take a group to Mexico with a week's stay in Yucatan en route. Some horseback and canoe trips are included in the plans although most travel is by motor. The seven weeks' trip costs $596. Address Europe on Wheels.

Enrique C. Aguirre and his wife conduct a service for the independent traveler which offers many of the advantages of organized travel without its limitations. The Aguirres arrange accommodations in homes for those who would like to get away from hotel life, arrange interviews with personages, and smooth the road for travelers whose time is limited. Their services may be engaged through a travel agent on an all-expense plan, or one may write them direct for help in planning a trip. Address Aguirres Guest Tours, Av. Madero 25, Mexico City.

The Orient. The Eighth Cultural Expedition to the Orient, under the leadership of Upton Close, will sail along the coast of Pacific Asia, visit the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, and Japan, and make a long inland excursion into China and Korea. Shipboard lectures and round-table discussions are designed to give the visitor the fundamentals of Asiatic history, culture, and politics. The ten weeks' trip (from Vancouver or Victoria, Canada) costs $995, tourist class. Address William M. Barber.

A tour of Japan and China, with emphasis on Japan, is planned under the leadership of Frank Alanson Lombard of the Bureau of University Travel. The party will travel on Japanese steamers. The ten weeks' trip from Seattle costs $835, tourist class on the ocean. Address Bureau of University Travel.

A Round-the-World Tour under the direction of G. Sidney Phelps, who has lived in the Far East, places emphasis on the Orient. It makes inland excursions in Japan, China, Siam, India, Palestine, and Egypt, with a brief European stop-over. Of several rates quoted the lowest is $2,570. The dates are October 1 from San Francisco to February 23, New York. Address Bureau of University Travel.

Letters to the Editors

OUR SOCIAL INSECURITY

Dear Sirs: I have just been reading the current issue of The Nation and cannot resist commenting on the so-called security act. I sat in a meeting the other day and listened to the provisions for the act in my state—with burning indignation. In the first place, where in the United States can $30 a month purchase food, room, clothes, medicine—to say nothing of recreation—for a person? Please let me know. I think it is the greatest insult ever offered to any old person, to call that small amount "security." Surely $50 a month for one, $75 for husband and wife, can be given easily, and then we can talk about security, but not until then. The thing that upset me most, in the proposed security bill for one state, was the investigating. At least three investigations were to be made before the vast sum of $15 a month would be paid by the state. One such investigation was to be made upon the complaint of any individual that the recipient did not need the money. I was on the board of a Family Welfare Society for seventeen years before I came to this state and I well know what neighbors can do in quarrels. I can visualize the plight of the defenseless poor, being investigated and reinvestigated for that small pittance.

In my opinion the old-age pension should be run like the money-order department of our Post Office. State funds should be paid to the government and government funds should supplement state funds in order that old people should be paid $50 for one and $75 for a couple. Every person reaching sixty-five years should go before a notary, get his old-age certificate, and then and there be free from espionage of federal, state, and county to spend the money as he pleases.

Also, any state should honor at once the certificate of any other state on the applicant's age.

So let's work for an adequate pension for all people sixty-five years old, and let's do away with the bugbear of investigations. I was giving free service on an unemployment job once, and found families had been investigated as many as seven times by incompetent persons. We can spare old people this. If our own government offered adequate Social Security, Congress would not need to try to besmirch a plan as fantastic as Dr. Townsend's. This is from the pen of

AN INSECURE OLD WOMAN

Tulsa, Okla., May 8

"MODERN PARIAHS"

Dear Sirs: I read in your edition of April 8 a letter under the above heading by Hugo Mock; unfortunately I missed seeing Mr. Villard's article to which he refers, though I can gather its trend from Mr. Mock's remarks. May I, an English reader of your journal, say a few words on the cruel anachronism known as anti-Semitism? I am not going to lay special stress on the duty of every civilized man whether Gentile or Jew to fight this atavistic savagery on grounds of altruism and common decency, for that appears to me to be axiomatic; my present plea, or rather my present purpose, is to give a warning that unless we fight to protect the Jews now we'll fight in vain later to save civilization itself. Anti-Semitism is a malignant cancer that tends to eat out the heart of our Western civilization, a civilization which owes so much of its greatness and beauty to Jewish conceptions of God as well as to Christianity. The Jews are bearing the brunt of this brutal assault now, but if we stand by indifferent to their miseries and humiliations it will be our turn next.

I am a Lancastrian and my name is well known in my native town, Liverpool; I have no Jewish connections.

CLIFFORD MUSPRATT

Lausanne, Switzerland, April 24

NEGRO LIBRARIANS AND SOUTHERN HOSPITALITY

Dear Sirs: The American Library Association meets this year in Richmond, Virginia. Two years ago it met in New Orleans. These towns are full of romantic and historic charm. Librarians flock from all over the country to discuss problems of their profession and enjoy the charming hospitality that the South so well provides. But among the librarians are some who are again subjected to the hu-

ONLY

1.75

a month
(at age 30)

$1000.00

for this

Whole Life Policy!

Low Rates At All Ages—Men or Women

WE HAVE NO AGENTS. You share the savings we make through the elimination of commissions, branch office expenses, and high overhead charges. Low initial rates—reduced still further by TWO DIVIDENDS: Guaranteed $9\frac{1}{2}\%$ dividend, and an additional contingent dividend as earned. Policies include all standard Privileges, Benefits, and Values.

CONSULT THIS CHART FOR LOW RATE AT YOUR AGE
PER $1000 OF INSURANCE

AGE	MONTHLY PREMIUM	LESS 9½% DIVIDEND	AGE	MONTHLY PREMIUM	LESS 9½% DIVIDEND
16	1.36	$1.25	38	$2.44	$2.23
17	1.38	1.27	39	2.53	2.32
18	1.41	1.29	40	2.62	2.40
19	1.44	1.32	41	2.71	2.48
20	1.47	1.35	42	2.81	2.57
21	1.50	1.37	43	2.92	2.67
22	1.53	1.40	44	3.04	2.78
23	1.57	1.44	45	3.16	2.89
24	1.60	1.47	46	3.29	3.01
25	1.64	1.50	47	3.42	3.13
26	1.68	1.54	48	3.57	3.27
27	1.72	1.58	49	3.73	3.41
28	1.77	1.62	50	3.90	3.57
29	1.82	1.67	51	4.08	3.73
30	1.86	1.70	52	4.28	3.92
31	1.91	1.75	53	4.49	4.11
32	1.97	1.80	54	4.73	4.33
33	2.03	1.86	55	4.98	4.55
34	2.09	1.91	56	5.24	4.79
35	2.15	1.97	57	5.53	5.06
36	2.22	2.03	58	5.84	5.34
37	2.29	2.10	59	6.16	5.63
	2.36	2.16	60	6.51	5.95

Note: Twice the amount shown for $2000.00; 3 times for $3000.00; 4 times for $5000.00 etc.

$43,000,000.00 Paid Out

Postal offers you the life time protection of real Old Line, Legal Reserves Life Insurance with cash and loan values and all standard provisions guaranteed in the policy. This strong 30 year old company operating under the rigid New York State Insurance laws has paid out over $43,000,000.00 to policy holders and their beneficiaries. Insurance is vital!

9½% Dividends
Guaranteed

Get Protection At Once

Find out how Postal can lower the cost of insuring your life. Find out what Postal can do for you. Find your age in the chart at left. Note the low monthly rate at your age. Note the further reduction due to Postal's guaranteed $9\frac{1}{2}\%$ dividend. Sign the coupon and attach just one month's net low premium. This is all it takes to put the insurance wheels in motion for you. But act at once. Now!

FOR QUICK ACTION CLIP AND MAIL AT ONCE

Postal Life Insurance Company
511 Fifth Avenue, Dept. RW121, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

I wish to apply for a life insurance policy.

My exact date and year of birth is.....

My occupation is.....

I wish to pay a premium of..... per month, for.....

worth of insurance. I enclose first month's premium which will be returned to me at once if my application is not accepted.

Name.....

Street and No.....

City..... State.....

(Please Print or Write Plainly)

BUY DIRECT
and
SAVE MONEY

miliation that is also conspicuous in the South. The colored members of the profession are not able to join the dining and social sessions and are even shunted into a special section during the business meetings.

For the A.L.A. to subject its members to such indignity is truckling to Southern prejudice to an extent that seems unbelievable when one considers the type of person who is attracted to library work. Protests are already being sent in by staff associations of libraries. Another year perhaps the A.L.A. will not meet in the South to demean itself in the tradition of the provincial and reactionary states below the Mason and Dixon Line.

Though I have never joined the A.L.A. I am a librarian of many years' experience in both the Newark and New York libraries, and a descendant on my mother's side of the Stringfellow and Adams families of Virginia. My grandfather, Benjamin Franklin Stringfellow, was educated at the University of Virginia and in his time highly respected as Attorney General of Missouri. My great uncles were Episcopalian ministers, and several fought in the Civil War. On these grounds, I think I am justified in criticizing my ancestors' state.

DOROTHY MANLEY DUFF
New York, May 8

CONTRIBUTORS

M. W. FODOR is The Nation's Central European correspondent. His article, written a few days before Prince Starhemberg's dramatic dismissal from the government, provides a necessary background for an understanding of the present Austrian crisis. Mr. Fodor's letter which accompanied his piece said he hoped it would reach us "before Austria ceases to be."

JAMES WECHSLER is the young gadfly who, as editor of the Columbia Spectator, made life pretty miserable for the university powers that were while he was an undergraduate. After getting his degree last June, Mr. Wechsler became an official in the American Student Union. He is the author of "Revolt on the Campus."

MARIANNE MOORE is one of the most distinguished of contemporary poets. Her "Selected Poems," which appeared a few months ago, was prefaced by a critique by T. S. Eliot.

CLIFTON FADIMAN is the New Yorker's book critic. He was singled out by the Misses Marshall and McCarthy in their articles last fall criticizing the critics as one of the half dozen possessing taste, judgment, and sound literary standards.

HORACE GREGORY'S last volume of poems was "Chorus for Survival." He is now at work on a study of English and American literary rebels to be called "Firebrands of Literature."

HEYWOOD BROWN'S radio column which appears in this week's Nation is the first of a series which Mr. Brown will contribute from time to time on the merits and demerits of various radio programs.

SCHOOL

THE COMMUNITY SCHOOL

2059 Bedford Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.
A Low Tuition, Progressive School;
Cosmopolitan; Ages 4-13. Experienced teachers, child psychologist. Opening
September 1936.

Until September 1, Address:
Dr. Augusta Alpert
247 East 52nd St., New York City
Tel. VOLunteer 5-6057

CAMP

LAKEWOOD MODERN SCHOOL CAMP

Begs to announce that its location this year will be in CARMEL, NEW YORK

For reservations and further particulars write:
Jas. H. Dick, 115 Cary Street, Lakewood, N. Y.

COTTAGE FOR RENT

Summer cottage for rent to family with 5 year old child. Five rooms, furnished, water, electricity, creek. $100. Season. Catskill Mts. GRamercy 5-1067.

WANTED

Volunteer assistants to work with young children at The Walden School with opportunity to receive teacher training. If interested telephone for interview, SC. 4-1208.

Several young men to work in resort. State qualifications, age, experience, etc. Box # 760, c/o The Nation.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Young woman, Columbia M. A., desires position as waitress or kindergarten in country. Experienced. Available immediately. Box # 757, c/o The Nation.

Intelligent, middle-aged woman of varied experience desires position as companion. Any location. Box # 756, c/o The Nation.

Alert, intelligent young woman desires editorial or journalistic position. Good background in various types of journalistic endeavor. College graduate. Box # 759, c/o The Nation.

WEARING APPAREL

Bert & Bess, creators of apparel. Ready to wear garments $5.95 up. Alterations free. 425-5th Ave., cor. 38th St. Suite 506. MURray Hill 4-8884.

FOR RENT

Now RENTING at

SUNRISE

LAKE BUNGALOW COLONY

Cozily furnished Cabins and Rooms in Smart Adult Camp. Country Club Atmosphere. Hr. N. Y. Lacka. R.R. Free Handball, Tennis, Boating, Dancing. Horses available. Golf nearby.

E. ABRAMS, Mendham Rd., Morristown, N. J.

Bungalows and tents at HILBERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y. Tennis court. Telephone Bert Friedberg, Murray Hill 4-8884.

Charming, artistic country home, all improvements, magnificent view, Croton-on-Hudson, 35 miles from N. Y. C. Call WOrth 2-1370.

3 rooms, kitchenette, spacious owner's quarters, private house. Simply but completely furnished. Piano. Service. References required. $75. 163 W. 81 St.

Bungalow, 3 rooms, sleeping porch, sanitary plumbing, 40 acres, beautiful country, swimming. Owner's children 4-8-10. CANal 6-1840.

550 West 114th Street (Off Broadway), three bedrooms, two baths, living room, dinette and kitchen. Completely furnished—piano, radio, etc. Rent July and August $85. Call at Sherover or phone EDgecombe 4-9138.

Easton, Conn. near Westport. Furnished cottage, large room, fireplace, large screened porch, kitchen, bathroom. Electricity, phone. Woods, orchard, brook. GRamercy 7-5076

FOR SALE OR RENT

Mohegan Colony, Peekskill. 4 large rooms and 2 porches, attractively furnished, all modern improvements, refrigerator. Wolsk, 26 Court St., Brooklyn, N. Y. TRIangle 5-1728.

WILL SHARE

Sportsman's Paradise, Northern N. J. Beautiful private lake. Ideal hunting, fishing country. Owner will share with approved parties each ten or more acres with lake frontage. $2,500. 1 hour from Washington Bridge. COLUMbus 5-0815 or Box # 762, c/o The Nation.

TRAVEL

KNOW and SEE MEXICO
WITH
THE 11th SEMINAR IN MEXICO
CUERNAVACA & MEXICO CITY
JULY 9th - 29th 1936
THE COMMITTEE ON CULTURAL RELATIONS WITH LATIN AMERICA
209 FOURTH AVENUE NEW YORK, N. Y.

BENEFIT

FLASH! Meet every newspaper man in town, at the three biggest bars in town.

ANNUAL BENEFIT for the NEWSPAPER GUILD OF N. Y. EMERGENCY FUND Friday, May 29 at the Manhattan Ball Room, 311 W. 34th St. Meyer Davis in person and his orchestra. Dancing 'till 4 A.M. Stars of Stage, Screen and Radio will attend. Tickets $1. Obtainable at the Guild Office, 62 West 45th St., Murray Hill 2-8840, or at the door.

SYMPOSIUM

OUTSTANDING SYMPOSIUM OF THE SEASON. MARX and/or FREUD. Distinguished speakers: Dr. Frankwood E. Williams, Granville Hicks, Dr. Emanuel Glick, Corlies Lamont, chairman. Hotel Delano, June 4, 8:15 P.M. Admission 50c. Tickets on sale at HEALTH and HYGIENE, 41 Union Sq.

BOOKS

MEDICAL NOTES ON THE SEX LIFE OF THE UNMARRIED ADULT

By Robert Latou Dickinson, M.D., F.A.C.S., Secretary of the National Committee on Maternal Health

Any bookstore or direct from the publishers
Vanguard Press, Dept. N-5, 424 Madison Ave., N.Y.C.

PAMPHLET—ONLY 35 CENTS

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · JUNE 3, 1936

NUMBER 3700

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

693

EDITORIALS:

AMEND THE CONSTITUTION!

696

MUSSOLINI'S CONQUEST MUST NOT BE RECOGNIZED

698

FROM GENESIS TO FREUD

699

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

700

TVA: THE NEW DEAL'S GREATEST ASSET
by Stuart Chase

702

THE FRENCH SOCIALISTS IN POWER
by M. E. Ravage

706

WHY ARABS KILL JEWS by Albert Viton

708

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

710

BROUN'S PAGE

711

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

ALL FOR LOVE by Joseph Wood Krutch

713

DER FUHRER by Walter Duranty

714

WOUNDS FROM NOWHERE by Mark Van Doren

715

CORPORATIVE STATE MYTH by Oscar Jaszi

716

THE PERFECT GENTLEMAN
by Louis Kronenberger

717

BORAH, THE GREAT MYSTERY MAN
by Oswald Garrison Villard

718

SHORTER NOTICES

720

RECORDS by Henry Simon

720

DRAWINGS by Georges Schreiber and William Gropper

The Shape of Things

*

GOVERNOR LEHMAN'S ANNOUNCEMENT that he will not again be a candidate for Chief Executive of New York State was undoubtedly made in perfect good faith. Nor is it any denial of his sincerity to believe that, in spite of strong personal inclinations to the contrary, he may yield to the tremendous pressure that will be put upon him to run once more. But if he does not, the contest will be thrown open to a free-for-all in which the powers of Washington, Tammany Hall, and upstate New York to dictate the nomination will be exerted to their utmost. And the Democratic Party will be hard put to it to keep for the President a state which it has held, in spite of all the business pressure against Mr. Roosevelt, by virtue of Governor Lehman's incomparable vote-getting propensities. In such a dog fight political bargaining will loom large. Tammany is being challenged by Postmaster General Farley for control not only of the state but of New York City, where the pickings are larger. It is altogether possible that the Hall might fortify its declining prestige by a deal which would make the city safe for Tammany even though the state were lost. In that case Mr. Farley would name Governor Lehman's successor, providing the upstate counties did not throw a monkey wrench into the machinery. Robert H. Jackson, a Roosevelt appointee to the Bureau of Internal Revenue, has been suggested as one who enjoys the Farley-Roosevelt approval; incidentally he would make a good candidate and an admirable governor. Attorney General Bennett has his champions. Senator Wagner has been mentioned, and except that he could hardly be spared from Washington, where he has been of the greatest service to labor and to progressives generally, would make an excellent choice. But the field is still wide open.

*

THE SPLIT IN THE SOCIALIST PARTY COULD not be avoided, and no time should be wasted regretting it. When differences concerning fundamental policy grow as large as those between the Old Guard and the left majority, it is better to call quits than to expend energy on intra-party struggle. We cannot believe that the decision of the Old Guard to form a separate party is of any moment from the point of view of realistic politics; it can be little more than a gesture of defiance from those about to die. On the other hand, we do see realism in the majority decision to avoid commitments either to the

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

New Deal or to the Communists. To support Roosevelt's reelection would be a fatal betrayal of Socialist purposes and a strategy of suicide; while the Communist proposal of united action, whatever might be its fate under conditions of greater urgency, has at present too great a gulf to bridge of past bitterness and diversity of purpose. Until the John L. Lewis labor groups and the more radical farm groups decide to abandon their old-party allegiances, the official role of the Socialist Party must continue to be one of watchful independence. We foresee in the years immediately ahead an increasingly important function for a well-led Socialist Party in this country—a function of mediation as well as leadership in an emerging political labor movement. The decisions of the present convention indicate that the party leaders recognize the elements in the situation and are prepared to face the exigencies of rejuvenation. A large Socialist vote is less important this year than a policy of clarification in the interests of a much larger labor-party vote when the time is ripe.

*

THE PRIVATE WAR WHICH THE ARABS ARE waging against the Jews in Palestine has not ceased since Mr. Viton mailed the article which appears on another page of this issue. On April 20, when he wrote, sixteen Jews had been killed; by May 20 ten had been added to that number, sixteen Arabs had been killed in fracasés with police or British troops hastily summoned to quell the disturbances, and the wounded on both sides numbered several hundred. In addition to assault and murder the Arab attacks are taking the form of looting, incendiarism, house-breaking, stoning buses, and strewing nails on the highways. On April 27 the damage to Jewish property by fire alone was estimated at $150,000. The Arabs continue to demand cessation of Jewish immigration and of the sale of land to Jews. Arab leaders are instigating a campaign of civil disobedience and non-payment of taxes. The British answer is another royal commission to investigate Palestinian disorders, although commissions in 1921, 1930, and 1931 brought small results. But at the same time announcement of further increases in the number of Jewish immigrants is also made by the British. The crux of the matter lies here: Jewish immigration to Palestine is increasing at a steadily accelerating rate. Anti-Semitism in Europe is increasing as steadily. It seems imperative that the rise in immigration should be maintained; but if it is, the British use of force to subdue the Arab protest seems equally inescapable.

*

AS THE SUPREME COURT TERM DRAWS TO A close, the destructive mood of the court majority keeps pace with its dispatch. The Monday following the Guffey decision was marked by a clearing away of seven cases from the court calendar, among them three of considerable importance. By a vote of five to four, Chief Justice Hughes voting with the liberal minority, the court invalidated another New Deal law—the Municipal Bankruptcy Act of 1934, which had sought to make the federal bankruptcy laws accessible to local governmental units in financial straits. This extends the impact of the court veto to another field—that of local public finance, but in its essential pattern the case follows the previous ukases of the court. The grounds of the majority decision were again the states'-rights doctrine, despite the fact that the operation of the act depended upon the willingness of the state to allow the local governmental units to come under it. It may be ventured that the real force behind the decision was an insistence on freezing the economic status in the interests of the owning and creditor class. The economic intent emerges even more clearly in the case of the Elgin, Joliet, and Eastern Railway Company, which was accused of violating the commodities clause of the Interstate Commerce Act, forbidding a carrier to transport anything in which it has a direct interest. The railroad is a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation, and it was not surprising that six of the nine judges should have upheld the type of vertical monopoly integration which the tie-up presented. This shows the economic bias of the judges. Their political bias is shown in the Kansas City Livestock case, where an attempt by Secretary Wallace to delegate power to Under Secretary Tugwell was voted down. The whole country will breathe with relief when the justices finally enter on their well-deserved vacation.

*

IN IMPOSING A 42 PER CENT INCREASE IN THE tariff on Japanese cotton textiles, the President has succeeded in neatly straddling one of the most important issues before the country. When appealing to farmers, consumers, and low-tariff groups in general, Mr. Roosevelt can point to his reciprocal-tariff program, which has appreciably reduced some of the most indefensible of American customs rates. At the same time he can call the attention of the industrialists, nationalists, and neo-planners to the recent boost in the tariff on Japanese imports as an example of the Administration's solicitude for domestic industry. The two are not inconsistent, the President assures us, since the idea behind the reciprocal agreements "is to lower tariffs without hurting domestic interests." Politically this may make sense, but from the standpoint of economics it is nonsense. If a reduction in tariffs is to mean anything, it is bound to affect marginal American producers. Nevertheless, there remains only one way to increase trade and create new outlets for American exports—that is by reducing import barriers. It is true that the recent sharp rise in the importation of Japanese piece goods constitutes a substantial threat to the piece-goods industry in this country. But with respect to cotton goods as a whole the United States is an exporting rather than an importing nation, and foreigners supply less than 1 per cent of the country's total consumption. Moreover, Japan is our third best customer, and we sell it about 25 per cent more than we buy in return. Japan is also notoriously sensitive regarding fancied or real discrimination against its citizens. To risk the loss of a substantial part of this export trade, endangering the very existence of our Southern cotton farmers, would seem an exorbitantly high price for a few votes.

ITALIAN-BRITISH FRICTION DURING THE PAST few months has left a mark which will not be easy to erase. Il Duce's references to the coming war are invariably interpreted in Italy as applying to an inevitable struggle between England and Italy for the mastery of the Mediterranean. The Giornale D'Italia (Rome) refers to this war as one of "irrepressible exasperation justified by the vital needs of a nation of 45,000,000 inhabitants . . . which will be the most terrifying and bloody conflict that humanity has ever known." In anticipation of this struggle war propaganda is already flourishing in both countries. Mussolini's subjects are being told that the British supplied the Ethiopians with dum-dum bullets, while the Britishers are being regaled with stories of poison gas and Italy's responsibility for the recent disturbances in Palestine. With British public opinion running high against Italy, both the Cabinet and the Foreign Office are divided on fundamental questions of foreign policy. Sir Austen Chamberlain and the right-wing Tories are anxious to restore the Stresa front as a protection against an imminent German thrust in Central Europe. Eden and his friends are for a new type of Stresa front with the Balkan powers substituted for Italy. Baldwin would favor Italy to the extent of lifting economic sanctions, but stands committed to the largest peace-time armament budget in British history. Confused and divided, the final direction of British foreign policy will probably depend very largely on the program of the new French government. If we are to judge by M. Blum's early statements, this will involve a coalition of democratic-socialist countries against the fascist powers. Obviously this is no iron-clad guaranty against war, but failing a revival of the League what other hope exists?

*

LABOR'S NOTABLE VICTORY IN THE FIVE-month struggle for fair treatment of the men thrown out of work in the consolidation of the railroads has turned out to be only a paper triumph. The President has instructed Joseph B. Eastman, federal Coordinator of Transportation, to refrain from forcing consolidation on the unwilling roads until after the election campaign, knowing well that Mr. Eastman's authority expires on June 16 and that it will not be extended. It is apparent that the agreement to pay "coordination allowances" to the displaced men was signed by the railway executives for the purpose of defeating the Wheeler-Crosser bill, which would have made dismissal allowances mandatory for railway workers. While the railroads have been successful in blocking compulsory coordination and have saved themselves from further severe regulation of their labor policy, the agreement between the railroads and the Brotherhoods nevertheless stands out as an epoch-making document. For the first time in our history a large group of employers have recognized, in theory, their responsibility for the men thrown out of work by technological improvements. The dismissal allowances are too small to provide real security, but are much more liberal than was expected. Employees who are deprived of their jobs as the result of consolidations are either to receive 60 per cent of their wages for a period of six months to five years or, at their option, a "separation allowance" of from three to twelve months' pay. In addition, workers who are compelled to change their place of residence are to be reimbursed for all their expenses. That provisions of this type should be unusual is a reflection on the rugged individualism of a day that is gone. They should be mandatory not only for railway employees but for all workers whose jobs are threatened by technological advance.

*

THE BLACK LEGION AND ITS MURDERS MORE than wipe out the welcome news of the convictions in the infamous Tampa flogging case. Tampa has a tradition of whitewash in such matters, and therefore the verdict against its five defendants is distinctly heartening. But the Michigan Black Legion, coming hard on Tampa's heels, is the gravest example of mass terrorism since the Ku Klux Klan. It is something infinitely more sinister than an isolated flogging. It is a movement. Accidentally uncovered while police were investigating the murder of a WPA worker in Detroit, the legion has been found to go back several years, to be well organized on military lines, to have a membership of over 100,000 in Michigan and uncounted others in neighboring states, and to be pledged to a program of terrorism aiming at a dictatorship of the country. In the twenties a wave of unskilled factory workers emigrated from Klan regions to the north, and it is these men who make up the bulk of the legion's membership. Like the Klan the legion is rooted in hatred; it is anti-Catholic, anti-Jew, anti-Negro, anti-Communist, and in pursuance of these various enmities its members are sworn to take up arms. Already in rural districts it has begun to exert political pressure, and the police forces and municipal employees in many towns are cankered with its members. In just this way the Klan built itself up to an estimated membership of six million and to a position of national power. Just as the Klan of the twenties sprang from the backwash of war hysteria and the economic insecurity consequent on demobilization and a panic year, and as Nazism had its source in similar conditions in post-war Germany, so the Black Legion has been produced by the depression. The terrorism of the night riders is but a reflection of the terror born of social insecurity.

*

WE ARE IN RECEIPT OF A GENEROUS OFFER BY the newly formed Six Star Service to furnish us with business editorials wholly without charge. The Six Star Service is written by a group of well-known educators—including such men as President James S. Thomas of Clarkson College of Technology; Dr. Walter E. Spahr, chairman of the Department of Economics, New York University; Dr. Harley L. Lutz, professor of public finance, Princeton University; and Dr. Ernest Minor Patterson, president of the American Academy of Political and Social Sciences. A press service which makes the comments of such educators available free of charge for all the newspapers in the country should be a valuable instrument in the shaping of American thought. In a world beset with propaganda of all types, it is good to know that our universities at least may be counted on to furnish us with objective information on current problems. In the first issue we find an authoritative article by President Thomas, entitled Our American Plan Works, in which we are told that while "the European plan may be alright [sic] for Europe," we should not forget that under the "American Plan" our people "had created and owned more than half of the wealth of the world." There are two brief articles by Dr. Spahr rebuking President Roosevelt for advocating a wider distribution of wealth and a restriction of the years of industrial labor. Two other articles deal with the plague of taxation. All of this, you understand, is not propaganda—it is part of the "American Plan." At first we were somewhat disturbed to discover that the expense of the service is being met by the American Manufacturers' Association, but we were relieved to note that "the association has nothing whatever to do with the preparation and editing of the material." One cannot be too careful about such things.

Amend the Constitution!

THERE has been a good deal of talk among liberals about enacting an amendment to the Constitution in order to give Congress adequate powers for dealing with its immense national economic tasks. Thus far it has been chiefly talk. It was a desire to help crystallize progressive thought and pave the way to action that led the editors of The Nation to address a telegram to five leaders of liberal, farm, and labor opinion. The telegram and the four answers we received are printed at the end of this editorial discussion. No clear picture of strategy or policy emerges from them. But they offer a starting-point for what is undoubtedly—whether or not it is featured in the campaign—the paramount issue before the country today.

This week is being dubiously celebrated as the anniversary of the Schechter decision. Next week the Supreme Court will hand down the final opinions of the present term of court. Thus draws to a close one of the most fateful chapters in American constitutional history—what the Supreme Court majority has done to the attempts at federal economic control; and thus opens a new and even more fateful chapter—what we intend to do about it. As the curtain falls on the work of the Supreme Court, the stage resembles that of an Elizabethan tragedy at the end of Act V: the audience is left to survey a scene strewn with dead bodies in a senseless carnage. The latest to fall, the Guffey Coal Act, finds the onlookers a bit jaded. Yet in a sense this decision is the most important of all: it is the one most directly aimed at labor.

It needs no over-subtle constitutional sense to see the anti-labor direction of the Guffey decision. The court considered two aspects of the act—the price-fixing provisions and the labor provisions. Justice Sutherland's majority opinion refused to consider the price-fixing aspect, but held the attempt to establish collective bargaining by the power of the federal government unconstitutional. Justice Hughes felt the same about labor, but went on to make clear that price-fixing was valid and that the two were separable. Even the minority opinion, perhaps for strategic reasons, refrained from considering (and supporting) the labor provisions, but upheld the price-fixing. All this is not very surprising. It is not surprising that when the rights of labor have locked horns with a rigid individualism, the Supreme Court should be wary of giving the victory to labor. What is surprising is that in the face of such a decision labor itself, with the honorable exception of Mr. Lewis and his union, should be unwilling to press for a changed constitutional framework which would make adequate labor legislation possible by enlarging the powers of Congress. And what is also surprising is that the progressives who are labor's allies, and who know that there can be no solution for America except one based on an organized labor movement and a genuine control of business, confess themselves for the moment helpless. Even when they believe in the necessity for a constitutional amendment, they qualify their belief by adding that this is not the time to press it.

Why the paralysis? We can understand why Mr. Roosevelt does not want the constitutional issue pressed. The closer the actual elections, the more wary have he and his advisers grown about any commitment on the matter. They have evidently become convinced that the issue is packed with the most deadly dynamite, and that the Hearst-Liberty League fuse can set it off and blow up the whole universe of the Democratic Party. They tremble at every mention of the Constitution. They have surrounded it with what is almost a conspiracy of silence. It is well known that Mr. Roosevelt is acting on the principle that the election is clinched—if he will only stay put and let the Republicans make all the mistakes.

While we understand Mr. Roosevelt's point of view, we cannot agree that it has either courage or a long-run wisdom. It is true that a sense of the sanctity of the Constitution and the divine right of the judges to act as guardians of it is deeply rooted in the American mind. It is true that it will not succumb to a quick or casual attack. But that is exactly why the issue cannot be ignored at this time, and why it should be geared to the great personal prestige and popularity of Mr. Roosevelt and the undoubted acceptance of the New Deal by the greater number of the common people. These are all parts of an integral pattern. Mr. Roosevelt will win the election, one way or the other. He has a safe margin of victory now, with enough to spare even for the accidents of the intervening months. But if he looks only to the main chance of his personal election, it will be a hollow victory. For Mr. Roosevelt—and this applies also to men much greater than he—cannot move worlds in a vacuum. Except as leaders of social movements that have meaning, they are in their temporary success pitiable figures caught in the grip of personal opportunism. If Mr. Roosevelt's Presidency has had any meaning at all it is because the New Deal program of federal control of industry has seemed to the common man a departure from the individualism of the jungle. Whatever achievement the New Deal thus represents should be recognized in the election and embodied in a mandate from the people to proceed farther.

Even with that mandate the struggle for constitutional change will be a difficult one. Without it, it will be hopeless.

This is no longer the private affair of Mr. Roosevelt and the Democratic Party. Large sections of organized American labor, under some of its most progressive leaders such as Lewis, Hillman, and Dubinsky, have aligned themselves with Mr. Roosevelt in Labor's Non-Partisan League. They have made common cause with him less because they had a common aim than because they were fighting a common enemy—social reaction. The labor and liberal strength that they bring to Mr. Roosevelt represents all the difference between his fortunes and those of the Republicans, for between the Farleys and the Fletchers or Hamiltons there is no essential difference other than the difference between the possessors and the pursuers of booty. Labor has staked out a claim, then, to know and be consulted about Mr. Roosevelt's position on the most vital issue affecting labor's future and the future of the common man in America—how an adequate program for controlling business and passing the necessary social legislation can be assured. Thus far Mr. Roosevelt has made no commitment on this issue. Increasingly he avoids it. Undoubtedly this avoidance proceeds, as we have seen, from deep sources of campaign strategy. But labor and the progressives should ponder whether a party and a candidate capable of being deflected from their purpose by high considerations of pre-election strategy may not be equally deflected afterward by high considerations of post-election business pressures.

Labor's function at the present time is clear. It must act as a pressure within the Roosevelt camp for a clearer meeting of the problem of Congressional power to deal with national tasks. It must bring into the open the Democratic strategy for dealing with the obstacle which the judicial oligarchy places on the road that leads away from chaos. And if Mr. Roosevelt still feels too insecure to venture any greater explicitness on the matter, the brunt of making the fight must for the time being rest on the workers and farmers. It will not be the first time that they have built up support for a new reform, only to have one of the major parties step in finally and cash in on it. But they must take the risk. And they must begin now.

Several questions still remain. One is, what kind of amendment can we write and support? Those who have been troubled by that question will find Dean Garrison's telegram, in its specific and concrete character, a convincing answer to their doubts. Another question is, will not the whole problem be solved by Mr. Roosevelt's new appointments to the court? The answer to that is clear. It will not do to base so crucial a policy upon an act of God or calculations of life expectancy. Besides, all our waiting may result only in the appointment of a Joe Robinson. We might as well face the fact that we shall have to amend the Constitution eventually in order to give Congress adequate power. The statesman-like and open course for the labor and progressive groups would be to make the adoption of that amendment part of the mandate the people will give Mr. Roosevelt in November.

The Question of an Amendment: Four Opinions

The editors of The Nation would like your answer to the following two questions. Will you wire collect for publication?

One, do you think it is necessary to amend the Constitution in order to make possible adequate control of industry and adequate labor, farm, and social legislation? Two, do you think the passage of such an amendment would be facilitated by an early conference of representatives of progressive and labor groups, and would you be willing to participate in such a conference?

Delegates from the United Mine Workers of America to the Atlantic City convention of the American Federation of Labor sponsored action in instructing Executive Council to prepare amendment to Constitution. The January convention of the United Mine Workers of America adopted strong declarations in favor of amendment to Constitution. Our organization is unequivocal in its attitude on this question. We feel that the American Federation of Labor should assume the initiative in this matter and are keenly disappointed by its procrastination. In answer to your second question, our organization would be willing to send a representative to any substantial conference looking toward the crystallization of sentiment and early action on this question.

John L. Lewis, President of the United Mine Workers of America

Because of constant denunciation of president and other officers of American Federation of Labor as reactionary published in almost every issue of The Nation, there does not appear to be any justification for making any answer to any inquiry you may submit.

William Green, President of the American Federation of Labor

I have just read your telegram, requesting my opinion as to whether a constitutional amendment is necessary to make possible adequate control of industry and adequate labor, farm, and social legislation, and also whether I would participate in a conference called for the purpose of furthering such an amendment. I cannot answer these questions properly within the limits of a telegram, although I have wired you I believe such an amendment is necessary.

Personally, I believe the Constitution is broad enough to permit Congress to legislate properly on the subjects mentioned. However, by a divided opinion the Supreme Court has held otherwise. I have to accept the opinion of the Supreme Court, and I do so, of course, without any hesitancy. Nevertheless, I do not believe it is right. I am firmly of the conviction that the Constitution is a living thing, that it grows as we grow, that it keeps pace with civilization, and that it should be construed in accordance with the enlightenment of the present age, and not in accordance with conditions as they existed 150 years ago.

When the Supreme Court rendered its decision in the Triple-A case, I was of the decided opinion that this question should be made an issue in the coming Presidential campaign. I believe we should go before the people, frankly present this question, and fight it out during the coming campaign. As I see it, this question is fundamental. If the Constitution must be construed in the light of conditions which existed at the time of its adoption, it will be a stumbling-block in the way of advancement instead of a protection to a more enlightened and more highly developed civilization. As the majority of the Supreme Court construes and expounds it, it becomes an impediment, not an aid, to human freedom and liberty, and an instrument of oppression.

My point of view did not prevail. I was in a minority in my belief that the question should be argued out at this time. Those whom I consulted, and I consulted a great many, agreed with me entirely in my construction of the Constitution, but they did not agree with me that this was a proper time to present the question to the people. An approaching Presidential election has a tendency to make men timid and backward in taking a stand which they fear might be construed as radical. . . .

The foregoing is in substance also an answer to your second question. As I see it, it would be impracticable to attempt to make this an issue in the coming campaign, because our forces would be divided. The issue is only postponed, however; it will be renewed when the general election is over. For my part, if I participate in the coming campaign, I do not intend to avoid this issue. . . .

G. W. Norris,
Senator from Nebraska

I would favor amending the Constitution so as to give Congress general power to legislate in the economic field with the right to delegate such power in whole or in part to the states. This power of delegation would make it possible for national economic legislation to take the form of a general framework with the details to be filled in by state legislation and the administration to be by state authorities subject to the standards enacted by Congress and subject further to the right of Congress to provide the details and the administration in those states which did not act within a prescribed period of time. In some matters detailed national legislation and direct national administration would probably be necessary, but in other matters a combination of declared national policy with supplementary state legislation thereunder and state administration subject to national standards would undoubtedly be practical and would work better than centralized control from Washington. An amendment permitting both methods and leaving the choice of means to Congress would give us adequate powers of self-government with as much decentralization as possible. As a matter of plain prudence it seems to me essential that we as a people give ourselves the same power to control our economic life as all other civilized nations possess. This power can be given only by constitutional amendment which should preserve as far as possible the functions of the states along some such lines as suggested above. I doubt whether any organized movement looking toward an amendment would make any headway now in the face of an impending Presidential campaign, and that it would be wiser to wait until the campaign is over and we have taken a little more stock of where we are at and where we are going.

Lloyd K. Garrison, Dean of the University of Wisconsin Law School

Mussolini's Conquest Must Not Be Recognized

MORE than three weeks have elapsed since the fall of Addis Ababa, and no word has as yet come from Washington regarding the application of the Stimson non-recognition doctrine to ill-fated Ethiopia. That there should have been some delay is understandable. Governmental machinery, particularly in the realm of foreign affairs, moves slowly. For a few days there was a disposition to see whether Mussolini might not enter into a last-minute agreement with the League which would absolve this country from the necessity of taking formal action. Now, however, there can be no longer any reason for delay. The League has condemned Italy, and Il Duce has ordered the withdrawal of his representatives from Geneva. Both from a legal and a moral standpoint our duty is every whit as clear-cut as it was in the case of Japan's illegal invasion of Manchuria.

The most fundamental principles of American foreign policy are at stake. The United States has consistently refused to associate itself with the League in joint action for the prevention of war. Instead, we have sought to build up, through the Kellogg-Briand Pact and the Stimson doctrine of non-recognition, a distinctly American peace program. Weak and unrealistic as this program may seem to those who believe that war can only be abolished by a change in the economic order or by the creation of a strong international agency, it nevertheless represents significant progress toward destroying the intellectual and moral foundations of the war system.

As a principle the Stimson doctrine is inescapable as long as we hold that no nation has the right to further its national ambitions by force of arms. But like any principle it must be uniformly and universally applied if it is to have meaning. It has been argued that since the Italian-Ethiopian conflict is of particular interest to Europe, the United States should carefully refrain from taking any action which might be construed as interference in European affairs. For those who believe in American isolation, this argument will carry weight. But except on the basis of crass imperialism it would be difficult to show why America should have one set of principles for Africa and Europe and another for Asia and South America. The very fact that Europe's policy toward Italian aggression is complicated by a thousand and one problems of a distinctly European character makes it particularly important for the United States to take the initiative in refusing to recognize territorial gains obtained in violation of the Pact of Paris.

The weakness of the non-recognition policy lies in the fact that it is essentially negative in character. Refusal to recognize illegal conquest does not directly affect any of the basic forces which make for war. Indeed, the primary if not the only reason for appealing to a moral principle as a means of preserving peace is the hope that men will be inspired thereby to a more ruthless exploration of the basic causes of international conflict. And the educational and inspirational value of the non-recognition policy depends entirely on its frequent and forceful enunciation. If the Stimson policy is to be applied at all in the present crisis, it ought to be invoked in as dramatic and vigorous a manner as possible.

Failure to take immediate and positive action with respect to Ethiopia is bound, moreover, to have unfortunate repercussions in the two spheres where America's interests are the greatest. It is obvious, for example, that any hesitancy in applying the Stimson doctrine in the present crisis will be a justifiable cause of irritation in Japan, and that it must lead inevitably to a collapse of our moral opposition to Japanese aggression in the Far East. Equally distressing would be the effect of any equivocation on our relations with Latin America. The Argentine anti-war pact, signed at Montevideo in 1933, specifically commits the United States as well as the other American republics not to "recognize any territorial arrangement which is not obtained by pacific means, nor the validity of the occupation or acquisition of territories that may be brought about by force of arms." This pact was thrown open to adherence by all nations and was formally accepted by Italy on March 14, 1934. Failure of the United States to carry out its obligations under this agreement would seriously undermine our prestige at the coming pan-American peace conference in Buenos Aires, if it did not render that conference futile.

Even more disturbing than the question of recognition is the possibility that American bankers may extend loans and credits to Italy for the exploitation of its ill-gotten empire. Recent estimates place the cost of the conquest of Ethiopia at approximately $1,000,000,000. More money must be poured in before there can be any hope of financial return from the new colony. Harassed by sanctions, and with its gold reserves practically exhausted, Italy must have capital before it can reap advantage from its conquest. The only two important sources of international capital today are London and New York. Needless to say, the chances of obtaining British aid for the development of an Italian empire in Africa are slight. Consequently a number of hints have already been thrown out regarding the desirability of obtaining American financial assistance. The Johnson act prohibits American investors from advancing new loans or credits to Italy, but it can doubtless be evaded by the establishment of dummy corporations in Ethiopia for the purpose of obtaining American money. In the past, however, the State Department has been able to exercise an effective veto on international loans by private bankers when these loans were held to be contrary to public policy. A positive non-recognition policy should carry with it application of this veto to prevent our financial interests from sharing in Mussolini's plunder.

From Genesis to Freud

SENSATIONAL journalists have many sins to answer for, and some of them know it. But they must have been surprised to read, in reports of the recent convention of the American Medical Association, that they invented the pains of childbirth. A good many American mothers were also surprised, and disagreeably if one may judge by the irate letters which have since been appearing in the press. The occasion of this surprise and this indignation was an attack on painless childbirth which followed reports, by nine doctors from three different cities, of some 7,400 successful deliveries under twilight sleep.

To make matters worse for potential mothers and better for the men who participated in the attack, it was led by a woman, Dr. Gertrude Nielson of Oklahoma City, who is herself the mother of three children and happens, apparently, to like giving birth without the aid of anaesthesia. But her arguments were not based on personal preference, or even wholly on the ground of such danger to life as twilight sleep may involve. She wandered into the boggy fields of opinion, conjecture, and sheer fantasy. The mothers, she said, who are deprived of the conscious experience of giving birth "in some cases" pay for this "escape from reality" with nervous disorders. Psychoanalysis had proved that many of the nervous troubles of women could be traced to the psychic injuries of unnatural childbirth. The obstetricians, in her opinion, could allay the prospective mother's fears by explaining to her that the pain existed largely in the minds of magazine writers.

It seems a little late for the researchers in painless childbirth to turn their attention to the writers. For it is several thousand years since a writer first put this quaint notion into the minds of women—the writer who recorded the sentence passed upon Eve for her unauthorized researches into the meaning of life: "In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children." It became morally wrong to alleviate the pain invented by this divinely inspired writer because he voiced the celestial will that the sins of Eve should be visited upon her daughters.

Times change. And the authority of Holy Writ being no longer regarded as wholly scientific, the basis of the argument has had to be shifted. It is no longer God but Dr. Freud who may be outraged if the pains of childbirth are allayed. This position is more easily assailable than the earlier one. God cannot be consulted, but Dr. Freud can. We have not consulted the great man himself, but we did lay the matter before a pupil of his who is one of the leading psychoanalysts in this country, and his answer was about what we expected. There is nothing, he declared, in the whole of psychoanalytic literature to support the contention that painless childbirth does harm to a woman's psyche. Such talk is "vicious and sadistic nonsense." He remarked further that since the complex and nerve-racking life of civilization (not the magazine writers) has interfered with the automatic nature of the child-bearing process, the least civilization can do for the woman in childbirth is to find means to alleviate the agony for which it is largely responsible.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Scared by Townsend

Washington, May 24

TOWNSEND and the Supreme Court defy Congress; Congress defies the commonweal; the Senate Finance Committee repudiates Mr. Roosevelt. There, in eighteen words, you have the high lights of the last few days in the nation's capital. And if good taste were the sole criterion, none of it would be news fit to print in a family journal.

Take, for example, Dr. Townsend's defiance of the House committee that is supposed to be investigating the methods and machinery he has used to promote his old-age-pension scheme. It is a circus that ought to be staged on the backstairs of a bawdy house. The committee, headed by one of Tom Pendergast's stooges, Jasper Bell, a man of little talent and dull wit, is composed from end to end of men of like caliber and has for its counsel another Pendergast protege, Sullivan, who behaves as though he were playing the prosecutor's role in a river-boat production of Madame X. In refusing to submit to further interrogation by this aggregation, Dr. Townsend plainly is in contempt of the committee and, therefore, of Congress; yet the committee hesitates to prosecute him. It is doubtful that any jury would find his contempt unjustified, for the committee day after day has made it abundantly clear that what horrifies it about the Townsend organization is not its plan or its methods but the much more disturbing fact that it threatens to deprive certain Congressmen of their seats.

Fear of what a jury would decide, however, is not what deters the committee, for the case belongs by rights not to a jury but to the House, where the contempt proceeding normally would be tried. Having bungled its job and failed thus far to make a better case against Dr. Townsend and his henchmen than they already had made against themselves, the committee is afraid to drag the doctor before the bar of the House lest the House repudiate the committee and turn him free. More specifically, it is afraid that a majority of the House members would be afraid to vote against Townsend in an election year, and it has reason for being afraid, for members of the House privately are assailing the committee from all sides with demands that the case be taken elsewhere and they be spared having to vote. That is the reason why the committee is considering the unusual proceeding of trying Dr. Townsend in one of the federal courts here. And the only reason it has hesitated to follow that course is its fear that the Townsends, if they failed to get the case thrown out of court on jurisdictional grounds, would at least manage to stall off a decision until after the November elections, with resulting advantage to their cause in the interim. It was with full knowledge that such terrors would beset the committee that Townsend's advisers prevailed upon him to stalk out of the hearing room, with the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith, former chaplain in Huey Long's Share-the-Wealth army, clearing a path for him. It was his intuitive realization that the Townsend investigation probably would boomerang in this fashion that caused O'Connor of New York, chairman of the House Rules Committee, to try to head it off before it ever got started.

Labor and the Court

TAKE, next, the Supreme Court's action of last Monday in the Guffey case. Enough has been said about the majority opinion and too much, it seems to me, about the minority opinion of Cardozo, Stone, and Brandeis, for they too adopt a dry-rot logic that leads essentially to the same final goal as the majority's. In fact in all their dissents they seem to be saying to the majority on the bench, "There's a better, smoother way of doing what you're doing, and it's less likely to cost the court its power." However, that is not the point here.

The point is that although it reduced "the stream of commerce" to a trickle and served notice that a death warrant awaits the Wagner Labor Relations Act if it reaches the Supreme Court while that body still has its present membership, the decision invalidating the Guffey Coal Control Act was received meekly at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue. The President remarked that it had great educational value and muttered something about achieving the Guffey act's objectives by some other route. He curtly silenced those who asked when and how. The answer to their question came a few days later when, after a series of hasty conferences, the Guffey act was reintroduced in Congress minus all its labor provisions but retaining its price-fixing sections and the punitive tax for its enforcement to which the Supreme Court had objected.

Talk of amending the Constitution was almost totally lacking. Roosevelt long since has abandoned that idea, and John L. Lewis, United Mine Workers chieftain, who might have revived it and who did tersely blaspheme the Supreme Court in his reaction to its decision, was too busy. Lewis was busy putting together a machine to drive new legislation through Congress at this session in the hope of keeping the price structure of the bituminous industry bolstered up; he is trying to prevent a period of price-slashing that would lead inevitably to costly and devitalizing strikes this fall in the southern West Virginia and related fields. When the Supreme Court struck down the Guffey act's labor provisions, Lewis lost nothing material, for those provisions did little more than direct that the fixing of wages, hours, and other working conditions in the bituminous industry should be done through collective bargaining. Lewis can hold his organization together if the bituminous industry itself can hold together. He faced a far tougher problem in union leadership when he entered the recent negotiations for a new agreement in the anthracite industry, which is far sicker than the bituminous industry, and he emerged with a pact that under the circumstances is almost miraculous in its terms.

Something comparable will have to happen if he is to get the new Guffey act through this session, and it is hardly worth the effort. He will have to fight against the Administration's fear of seeming to buck the Supreme Court and its respect for the powerful financial interests, including the Mellons, which are opposing the legislation as mine owners and large industrial consumers. He will have to fight, too, against the zeal of Congress to drop everything and mount the campaign hustings by June 6, and he will get no support from organized labor in general, as his foes in the A. F. of L.'s executive council have indicated by seizing on the Supreme Court's decision as a base for "I told you so" statements aimed at Lewis. The council, in fact, washed its hands of the constitutional-amendment issue this week and fled straight back to pure Gompersism. It was amusing to hear Dan Tobin of the teamsters and Bill Hutcheson of the carpenters making statements about "nothing to gain from the government, we must use our own strength," as if they had not always used the courts, state legislatures, city councils, and the cops for their unions' purposes and, more often, their own.

Lewis already is engaged in a bitter battle with them and their fellow petty Borgias in the executive council over the campaign to organize the nation's steel workers on an industrial-union basis. Having smashed their claims to leadership of organized labor by outmaneuvering them for the backing of the rank and file in the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, he finds the battle only just begun; though the rank and file voted for

Lewis and his C. I. O. plan, they left responsibility for its execution in the hands of Amalgamated's veteran officers, who promptly double-crossed the C. I. O., renewed their pledges of fealty to the A. F. of L.'s executive council, and then holed up a little to the right of that body in positions from which Lewis at the moment is trying to dislodge them with a barrage of publicity appealing to the rank and file. They intend of course to remain in their rat-holes for the duration of the war and thus to thwart the C. I. O.'s steel-organization program, which in the end would surely cost them—and their bosses—their jobs.

The Tax Battle

LITTLE need be said about the Senate Finance Committee's repudiation of that New Deal will-o'-the-wisp called "the Administration's tax program." Months ago somebody in the Treasury got the idea of using the tax instrument to break up vast accumulation of financial power by prying apart corporate surpluses. As has happened with so many other attractive ideas, Mr. Roosevelt seized upon it before it had been examined and before means of putting it into operation had been devised. He passed it on to Congress in a message that deftly struck a "soak-the-rich" note and thus was a good vote-getting manuscript. Having passed it on, he turned to other matters and let the Treasury's experts worry about devising a bill to fit the idea. They soon discovered the task was an enormous one, and it grew in enormity under the clumsy handling of the House committee in charge of the bill. By the time the bill reached the Senate, the idea was past saving. To be sure, a majority of the members of the Senate Finance Committee had no taste for saving it in any event, for they are the same gentlemen who have written the tax bills of former years, placing a premium on great wealth and corporate adiposities that aid tax-dodging. It is probable, however, that in committee these men of tawdry faith would have contrived a bill that retained a resemblance to "the Administration's tax program" but for the presence of one member, Jim Couzens, of Michigan. What would have emerged then would have been a bill delighting the hearts of tax-dodgers and falling far short of its revenue objectives while seeming to fulfil Roosevelt's suggestions. But Couzens, in addition to being the Senate's wealthiest member, is an honest man, a zealous foe of tax-dodgers, and a person thoroughly conversant with accounting methods and corporate practices. He will not knowingly vote for a fraud. Moreover, he consistently refuses to be bound by committee rules of secrecy and thus makes it difficult for his colleagues to enter into committee deals to report out bills which pretend to do one thing and do another. These various attributes combined in this instance to make of Couzens a catalyst. His resolute resistance to the Administration's bill finally forced the committee to get down to business and write a new measure in which Roosevelt's proposals for repeal of the excess-profits and capital-stocks taxes were scrapped. The new bill is little more than a measure increasing certain of the old corporation taxes, and it probably will be enacted in about that form.

Couzens of Michigan

TVA: the New Deal's Greatest Asset

BY STUART CHASE

I. Landscape and Background

IN WASHINGTON you find acres of office work set in a stately, remote city. The nation is being saved by a hurricane of inter-office memoranda, going round and round. The saviors wear a slightly confused air. One supposes that the spiral whirls upward, but one is not always sure. So many Corinthian columns, so many filing cases, so many sheets of paper, with twice as many carbons.

You climb in a car and drive west from Washington, over the red fields of Virginia, up the Blue Ridge Mountains, down the Shenandoah Valley, with billboards screaming of limestone caves, up the Appalachians again, with the Great Smokies looming to the south, and down into Tennessee and the Valley of the Tennessee, running yellow with silt. You come to Knoxville, and hard by it the town of Norris and the Norris Dam. Here are filing cases and inter-office memoranda, too, but towering above them is the dam itself, solid and eternal as the temples of Karnak. Its lofty, lovely concrete face is the reality of achievement behind the paper work. Those who strive to help the Valley are not confused. They do not seem to move in circles and spirals; they move, like the profile of their dam, in straight lines. One feels their excitement. It is a very revealing experience to go from Washington to Knoxville. It might be a good idea for Mr. Ickes to build a thundering big dam on the Potomac.

The story runs that one of the TVA staff went north to Ontario to see how the Hydro was functioning. He stopped a farmer on the road and asked him what, after twenty years of experience, he thought of the Hydro.

"I think it's a fine thing."

"Why?"

"Well, stranger, there are a lot of reasons, but the biggest reason is that it keeps the young folks at home. The smartest ones used to go off to the cities, and now most of them stay on the farms. There is so much right here to interest them."

As we shall see, cheap electric power is not the only function of the TVA, is probably not even the most important function in the long run. The Ontario farmer, however, stated the ultimate goal as well as it can be stated in a phrase. The TVA is an attempt to keep a region viable, healthy, and interesting, and to hold the oncoming generations on their homeland.

One day, with Benton MacKaye and the foresters, I climbed far up on the shoulder of Le Conte, one of the giants of the Great Smokies. Looking west, we saw the great valley unroll before us until it was lost in the mists of the horizon—fields, wood lots, meadow lands, villages, the sparkle of rivers, and the mountain wall around. Fields run high on the mountain slopes. Years ago farmers used to supplement their income by day labor in mines and forests. Such work has largely disappeared. Only the land remains. The cornfields grow steeper, increasing the erosion rate, promoting floods, silting the streams and rivers. More than seven million acres in the Valley are subject to serious erosion.

The peak on which we stood, the splendid forest of hemlock, beech, poplar, and rhododendron through which we had climbed, the tumbled crags to the north, east, and south, were the property of the United States government. A good part of the mountain wall from which the little waters fall to make the tributaries which in turn make the Tennessee is national forest or national park. Nearly five million acres, more than a quarter of all the forest land in the Valley, is government owned. The TVA is thus not an isolated experiment, but yoked with large projects in silviculture and recreation, which preceded it and which serve to protect the Valley's headwaters.

These waters come down from Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and eastern Tennessee in a series of rivers which meet not far from Knoxville to form the main river. This region is tumultuous at the height of land, rugged below with steep cornfields and little farms tucked into the mountain "coves," then rolling land with broader farms, and finally, in the cotton fields of Alabama, almost flat. The elevation descends from 6,000 to 250 feet, giving a climate which ranges from that of the Great Lakes to subtropical. The rainfall is heavy, varying from fifty to eighty inches. The Valley can grow anything which now grows between Canada and the Gulf. It is the perfect laboratory for an experiment in regional planning.

The watershed is shaped like a butterfly with the narrow waist at Chattanooga. The east wing is larger and more rugged, swelling over the eastern part of Tennessee and clipping off segments of Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia. Here is where the water comes from; here the region of heaviest rainfall. The Powell and Clinch rivers join at Norris Dam, to pour into the Tennessee some eighty miles below. The Holston and the French Broad rivers join at Knoxville to form the Tennessee. The little Tennessee comes in from North Carolina below Knoxville, and the Hiawassee River still farther down.

The west wing is the course of these united waters from Chattanooga down into Alabama, over Muscle Shoals—where the Wilson Dam was built during the war, and which formed the nucleus of the TVA—across the corner of Mississippi, and then due north through western Tennessee into Kentucky, and finally into the Ohio River at Paducah, not far from where the Ohio pours into the Mississippi at Cairo.

The Tennessee contributes about 20 per cent of the flood waters of the Mississippi. The commingled waters of the Ohio, the Cumberland, and the Tennessee make the spot where they enter the Mississippi one of transcendent importance for flood control. The Valley is a watershed entity, true, but at its mouth it locks into the water economy of the whole Mississippi Basin.

The Valley cuts across seven states—God unfortunately did not consult the Supreme Court—and contains some 40,000 square miles of territory, about four-fifths the area of England. It has a population of nearly two and one-half million people, only a quarter of whom live in cities. More than half the area is forested, but hardly virgin. Nearly all has been cut over, and much of it burned, slashed, and butchered in accordance with sound American practice. There are coal, iron, copper, phosphate, and other minerals in the Valley, and millions of horse-power in the rush of the rivers. There are a number of factories, but the region as a whole is not industrial. It has lived, or tried to live, primarily on its raw resources—forest, pasture, soil, minerals.

If there be such a thing as "native stock," the Valley is peopled with it. This particular strain, however, has a relatively high birth-rate. The youngsters sprawl at the cabin doors, and in Alabama the native stock is often black.

The Valley has tried to live on its natural resources. Yet the average annual cash income of the 4,000 families moved from the Norris reservoir site was under $100. This failed signally to provide the relatively simple wants of the group. Wants have been studied with some care, and include:

20 acres of crop land	Plenty of children
A tight five-room house	Some old-fashioned religion
1 horse	1 radio
1 cow	1 automobile
1 hog	1 washing machine
Chickens	Access to the movies
A reasonable chance for a little neighborly litigation

This you will admit is not an exorbitant budget—save possibly on the score of children—but $100 per family, plus the self-subsistence labor of the family, falls far short of it. The people of the upper Valley are hospitable, proud, salty, independent, illiterate by modern standards, and desperately poor. They are poor because many of their ancient crafts have lapsed, and because in the highly specialized economy of today the exchange value of these crafts is low. They do not have enough to exchange with the outside world for the things they need and want. When they do have enough by weight, the price may run so heavily against their raw agricultural products that the exchange ratio remains pitiful.

Here for instance is Grainger County, part of which will be under water when the Norris reservoir fills. Arthur L. Pollard has made a county loss-and-gain account, the first to my knowledge to be prepared in America. Here in a few cold figures is the basic problem of America reduced to negotiable proportions.

Grainger County is exclusively agricultural, and nearly everything imported from outside its borders must be exchanged for soil or forest products within. There are no factories to be taxed or to provide employment, no railroads or power lines traversing the area; the people of the county possess no invested wealth in stocks or bonds. Their land and labor form their only wealth. Nor do they own all their land, for many are farm tenants and must pay to outside owners. The county consumes one-third of what it produces, and sells two-thirds to the world beyond. The total cash proceeds of these sales in 1932 amounted to $425,000. The county receives some alien revenue from one large resort hotel, two inns, and two gas stations. There are 1,150 boys and girls from eighteen to twenty-three years of age, of whom seven are in college. There are 900 passenger automobiles and 100 trucks. Residents who have no cars have gone back to carts, and those who have no carts to sledges—for the trade of wheelwright has disappeared. The average farm consists of seventy acres—twenty plowed, twenty-two in pasture, the rest in wood lot or waste. Such a farm can provide only bare subsistence when worked by the owner under current methods.

The average family is 20 per cent larger than the average for the nation as a whole. At the age of twelve, children begin leaving Grainger County for the world outside. At age twenty-two the proportion of population is less than that of the United States and goes down steadily until a peak deficiency is reached at age thirty-three. Then it begins to climb again, until at age fifty-three it levels the national average. A whole world of tragic maladjustment lies in these figures. The city which has absorbed the youngsters begins to kick them out as middle age approaches. They come drifting back, their youth and vigor gone; sacrificed to no end, except the steady depreciation of their homeland.

Here is Mr. Pollard's balance sheet, somewhat condensed and rearranged:

Grainger County

Annual Loss and Gain Account, 1932

Income—Sales of crops.....	$425,000
Outside labor	20,000
Tourist income.....	20,000

Total operating income.....$465,000

Outgo—Food purchased	$155,000
Clothing purchased	140,000
Automobile expense	120,000
Machinery, tools, fertilizer.	40,000
Education	10,000
Miscellaneous expense...	70,000

Total operating outgo.....$535,000

Interest paid	85,000
Taxes—outside	20,000
Miscellaneous losses	25,000
Depreciation—buildings	80,000
Depreciation—machinery	20,000
Depletion—soil	55,000

Total outgo.....$820,000

Deficit of county.....$355,000

How is this deficit met? It is not met, but is reduced in part by:

State aid for roads and schools.....	$ 60,000
Federal aid	51,000
Insurance receipts net.....	32,000

Total.....$143,000

Leaving a net deficit of $212,000.

The county thus keeps going by virtue of state and federal aid, by sinking more deeply into debt, by cumulative depreciation of its agricultural plant, and by cumulative depletion of its natural resources. Commenting on this study, David Cushman Coyle says: "When income is too small to include repairs, replacements, and fertilizer, civilization is in full retreat." The end of the story cannot be long postponed. Grainger County can give up its motor cars, store clothes, and farm machinery if it must, and live as its forefathers lived—with sledges, tallow candles, and homespun. It can get along without the world beyond if worst comes to worst. But two questions are in order: Can Detroit and International Harvester get along without Grainger County? Why did the native stock leave England and Scotland in 1700 in order to achieve a standard of living in America in 1940 appreciably worse than that of the old country at the time they left?

Grainger County warrants a philosophical digression. I must ask the reader's indulgence, for I cannot discuss the TVA intelligently until it is placed in wider perspective than a series of dams, a net of transmission lines, and a sensible labor policy. The TVA has been called an experiment in regional planning. What does regional planning mean, in the light of Grainger County?

A given community to function must either (1) supply its own essentials, as in handicraft communities, or (2) have something to exchange for its essentials. Otherwise the community has no economic underpinning, and must either die or go on the dole. Grainger County, it appears, supplies less than a third of its essentials at home, and has a very serious shortage of goods and services to exchange for the remaining two-thirds. It is already on the state and federal dole, and is depleting its natural resources at the same time—that is, taking more out of the soil each year than it returns.

In modern times the choice of commodities to exchange offers considerable scope. New York City, in addition to its manufacturing activities, offers banking, brokerage, and gambling services as well as night life and other sophistications in return for the very hearty support in tangible goods shipped in by the rest of the country. Atlantic City exchanges sea air and bathing beauties. Florida exchanges sunshine and dog races; the county seat exchanges trading facilities; Washington exchanges administration and the opinions of nine dignified gentlemen; Reno exchanges divorces; New England, which once exchanged textile manufacturing, turns to recreation; California exchanges vegetables, films, and starry-eyed movements for the regeneration of mankind. All these "services," however, are based on tangible goods in the last analysis. The goods come first in any culture. Only when the stomach is assuaged can one turn to playing the market, astrology, or the fine arts. The tangible goods in turn are all based on natural resources—soil, water, and minerals—lodged in that thin crust of the planet between the air belt and the lava belt. The whole economic pyramid, the existence of man on the earth, rests on resources, and without resources collapses.

Meanwhile it is true that in an abundance economy resources are liquid and readily transferable. Nitrogen may be had from the air, with the aid of large infusions of power, as well as from the deposits of Chilean sea fowl. Food may be grown in water baths indoors, as well as from the soil. Houses may be built of glass as well as of wood or brick. For many standard resources substitutes are now available in whole or in part, and more may be expected as technology advances.

It is also true that relatively few communities, strategically located, equipped with plenty of inanimate energy and a variety of automatic or semi-automatic factories and mechanized farms, could theoretically provide the bulk of all essentials for a much wider area. At a guess, under strict engineering control one-fifth of American communities, employing one-fifth of available labor, could furnish the necessities of life for the whole nation. This is the dream of the technocrats, and it is logical if not practicable.

For nearly two hundred years American communities functioned on the basis of self-support with exchange at a minimum. As the machine age developed after 1800, communities increasingly specialized, and the exchange ratio grew, aided by new inventions in transportation. They specialized in raw materials, in fabrication of materials, and later in services. This interdependence made for a larger per capita output and on the whole for higher living standards. Even Grainger County obtained its automobiles. But in due time community after community worked through its resources, and the exchange balance went into the red. The lumber barons swept from Maine to Oregon, leaving behind expensive mills, charred and tangled desolation, and town after town with no visible means of support. Mining camps and oil fields grew into towns and cities and became home to hundreds of thousands of Americans. The vein failed or water seeped into the petroleum pool; the resource died. Fishermen's villages, supported by marine life for generations, suddenly found the catch diminishing, because of silt, pollution, slaughtered forests, or plain over-exploitation with the help of mechanical equipment. And now huge sections of farm land—of which Grainger County is an example—have lost, or are losing, the soil itself owing to erosion, leaching, dust storms, and inability, in a scramble to make ends meet, to put back into the land what the cash crop took out. The city has robbed the farmer by the progressive failure of price parity, and the farmer has robbed the soil. The soil runs thin and gullied.

Many communities, too, have lost their exchange balance by virtue of technological change, population shifts, transportation shifts, shifts in public demand. Consider the stranded coal towns, the shoe workers of Haverhill who have watched the industry drift west, the mill hands of Manchester and Lowell, the hay and oats farmers when gasoline displaced some millions of horses and mules.

It is needless to labor the point. No American communities are today self-sufficient. Community A, which once had exchange values, has them no longer. Community B may have new values, but the people of A have come to call A home. They live on in their ghostly areas, loath to be torn up by the roots. After three centuries of systematic exploitation nature's bins are empty over great areas—while the cumulative speed of technological change has rendered other communities barren of the means of livelihood. If the Liberty League is to have its way and economic planning is to be taboo, we may confidently expect the situation to worsen at something like a compound-interest rate, until America explodes. Look again at Grainger County. If some degree of conscious foresight is to be the order of the day, three alternatives present themselves:

1. Move people out of submarginal and blighted areas and replant them in communities which have a resource base or other exchange medium. This demands a drastic and a psychologically dangerous experiment in planned migration on a vast scale.

2. Let the people stay and maintain them on the dole, their only function that of consumers. This is technologically possible—indeed, is being carried on to the tune of some millions of individual cases at the present time—but is fantastic from the human point of view. It means maintaining a quarter of the nation, more or less, as a huge charitable asylum.

3. Reconstruct the resource base of those communities where reconstruction is possible. Where it is flatly impossible, planned migration will have to be resorted to. The Resettlement Administration is now trying to work out a technique for the latter. Reconstruction means building up the soil, restoring the forest and grass cover, checking erosion, reconditioning the fisheries, taming the rivers, encouraging wild life and recreation areas, supplying cheap energy, especially from water power, establishing a certain number of new local industries—but not enough to result in wasteful duplication—maintaining a large program of public works, particularly in the field of conservation, to provide local cash income. On these conditions, and only on these conditions, can the people of hundreds of American communities continue to call the homeland, home.

Oust them, feed them, or recondition them—so that they may presently feed themselves. The last makes more sense, politically and psychologically, than the first two. The second makes more engineering sense as efficiency is at a maximum, but psychologically and politically it is valueless.

This is what America faces today, and increasingly tomorrow. The New Deal as a whole is fumbling around with all three policies. The Tennessee Valley Authority is planted solidly on the last: let the Valley people stay in their homes and recondition the resource base. That is what makes it so important and so human. That is what helps it to move in straight lines rather than spirals. In the next article we shall examine how this policy squares with the Constitution and is being given tangible effect.

[Mr. Chase's second article will appear next week.]

The French Socialists in Power

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, May 15

IT WILL be two weeks Sunday since the French people, deaf to threats and warnings, went red. They were told—oh, what weren't they told?—that if they voted for the Front Populaire they would step off a precipice into the abyss. M. Maurice Prax of the Petit Parisien had an interview with Bela Kun in Madrid—on the same day that another correspondent of the same "non-partisan" newspaper reported the Bolshevik agitator ill in Moscow—where he was directing the Spanish revolution and only waiting for May 3 to cross the Pyrenees and take charge of things in Paris. The Front Populaire meant all the calamities in the calendar. It meant war, civil and international. It meant the collapse of the franc—the Communists' slogan "No devaluation" was shameless demagoguery—and the collectivization of the vineyards, the nationalization of women and the destruction of the family, the raping of nuns and the burning of churches, death and disorder, with a German invasion and a fascist dictatorship to redress the balance. Well, it is nearly two weeks since these assorted disasters were predicted. Yet somehow Notre Dame and the Sacré Cœur are still standing.

I have seen three general elections in France and a large number of partial, senatorial, and municipal ones. I recall none like this for confounding all the wiseacres and all the calculations, left as well as right. It was said that the National-Union Radicals would carry their districts at the first poll, and thus escape giving the pledge to the Front Populaire. The vast majority of them were eliminated on April 26. The Communists expected to triple, and claimed they would quadruple, their present number of deputies; they got more than seven times as many. Their gains, we were assured, would be at the expense of their allies; two-thirds of them came from the moderates and the reactionaries. The losses of the Radicals, it was predicted, would about balance the gains of the Marxists; so that the Front Populaire majority would be little if any greater than that of the combined left in the present Chamber. In reality, the defeated Radicals are in the main those upon whom the right counted to betray the left bloc. The Croix de Feu had been ordered to swell the Communist vote at the first poll and then swing over to the right on May 3, thus at the start eliminating the Radicals, whose faithful would presumably refuse to play the game with the Marxists. The results show that if the Colonel's followers obeyed the first part of the command, they forgot the second. As for the left voters, they had asked for fusion candidates from the outset; therefore on May 3, when there were neither Radicals nor Marxists but simply "candidates of the Front Populaire," they went to the polling booths with a solidarity and a discipline beyond anything recorded in the annals of French political history.

The greatest surprise of all was of course the magnificent showing of the Socialists. When I tell you that on the morning of April 27 the Populaire, thumbing over the results of the first ballot and estimating its prospects at the second, announced rather soberly that the party would come back as strong as in 1932 and make good the defections of the 1934 Neo-Socialist split-off, you will realize how far from the truth was even the official organ of the S. F. I. O. On May 5 Paul Faure's leader on the victory had the accents of a man who had drawn the big prize in a national lottery.

The victims experienced as many surprises as the winners. I am not thinking in saying this of de la Rocque. His attempt to "arbitrate" between the parties of the right—to set himself up as a one-man front of the reaction against the left—was for months the big political joke throughout France. He has no complaint to make of the final results. He asked for a new team, for a united and clean France. He has got them, though not quite according to plan. His February 6 was more than any other one thing responsible for May 3. And the wags of the left are well inspired in proposing that he be given a statue with the inscription, "To Count Colonel Casimir de la Rocque—in gratitude from the Front Populaire." Nor do I particularly have in mind the Radicals. They lost fifty seats, but an analysis of the figures shows that they saved at least as many by their affiliation with the extreme left, and that where they were beaten, it was generally because of the fierce attacks of the right, not of the drift to the left. My sympathies go out in the first place to Déat and his colleagues among the Neo-Socialists. They broke away from the Marxists because Blum by his resolute refusal to share the government with the Radicals kept them out of Cabinet seats. And at the very moment when the Socialist Party is going to have portfolios to offer they are left out in the cold, and their party, though fused with the Socialist Union of Paul-Boncour, is reduced to fourth place in the Front Populaire, trailing miles in the rear of the Communists!

The miracle which no one so much as envisaged has come to pass. The S. F. I. O. is going to form and head the next government of France. For a day or two everyone was walking as in a dream. All the plans were made, all the precautions were taken, on the theory that the Radicals would remain the biggest party in the country and among the left. The only one who was not bowled over was Léon Blum, the man whom the vast majority of Frenchmen have designated to be the first Socialist Premier of France. Within a few hours after the results were known he issued his ringing proclamation: "The Socialist Party is ready to assume the role which belongs to it—to constitute and direct the government of the Front Populaire."

Difficulties in plenty await not only him, not only the Socialists, but the whole new majority. No one who knows the legacy which they are inheriting from Doumergue and Laval can envy them their task. But I think the strains within the Front Populaire are not going to be, as the defeated right anticipates, the chief problem which the men at the helm will have to contend with. There is a fervid resolve in all quarters to live up to the oath of July 14, 1935, to cooperate, to play the game, to keep the faith of the masses, to avoid at all costs a return to the nationalists. As this is being written, the Radicals have signified their readiness to participate in the Cabinet without conditions. I think Daladier and the left wing of his party can be trusted implicitly to bring the utmost good-will to the common task, and Herriot will certainly do nothing to complicate matters.

As for the Communists, they are showing the same zeal, enthusiasm, and moderation that they brought to the formation of the Front Populaire, to the campaign, and to the victory. If they refuse to enter the government, they do so in keeping with their pre-election pledges and reservations. They feel that they have a specific task to perform just now—to keep the masses who voted for the Front Populaire united and alert. They wish to dedicate themselves to the work of organizing—in the factories and offices, in the city blocks and the villages—local councils of the united left, ready to assist and second the government, ready above all to defend it by all the means at hand against any attempt to hamper its fulfilment of the Front Populaire program of reforms. A proclamation of the National Committee of the Front Populaire published in this morning's papers indicates that the entire left is fully in accord with them in this enterprise. Moreover, the Communists feel, rightly in my opinion, that at this stage their presence in the ministry, far from being an asset, would be a liability to their friends and allies. Every error of the government would be attributed to Bolshevik pressure, and the Cabinet would be eternally leaning backward to avoid this charge. Best of all, the Trade Union Confederation has in the last day or two signified its desire to collaborate, not by accepting portfolios for its leaders, but by lending its experts to every department of the state where their services could be useful in ushering in the new day, and to start with by organizing the State Reinsurance Fund—a scheme recently proposed by Labor which would at once, it is hoped, pour much-needed cash into the treasury, and furnish the wherewithal for the public-works program planned as a fighting measure against unemployment.

The real difficulties are of another nature and are an inheritance from previous governments. They fall under three main heads: financial-economic, administrative, and diplomatic. The right always sees to it that the treasury should be at rock bottom when the time comes for them to hand the reins of office over to their rivals. It was thus that Tardieu contrived to get rid of the eleven-billion surplus left in the cash box by Henri Chéron; so that Herriot would have to be "good" when he stepped in. Doumergue and Laval have gone him one better. They have not merely left an enormous floating debt and an undermined credit, so that an attempt to raise a loan within the country some months ago ended in total failure and the state was obliged to borrow from the Bank of England; by their precious decree-laws they have so diked in the state's revenues that for two years the Ministry of Finance has been living from hand to mouth without knowing where the next month's pay roll would come from. With all this not a dent has been made either in unemployment or in the misery of the countryside. May 3 was a protest not merely against the fascist assault of February 6 but also against the oppressive, deflationist, do-nothing Tardieu-Laval regime that emerged from the abortive putsch.

In international relations the legacy left behind by these two sinister men is if possible worse. In an article in the Oeuvre on May 10 Herriot inventoried the diplomatic position of France at the end of their rule. I sum it up here briefly, with additions of my own: a breach of the peace in Africa which may not impossibly prove to be, like the Balkan wars of 1912-13, the prelude to something graver; a moribund League of Nations, agonizing from the blows it has received from Hitler, Mussolini, and their accomplice, Laval; Poland alienated and, as it seems at this writing, thrown into the arms of Germany, thanks to Foreign Minister Laval's coddling of the Francophobe Colonel Beck; the Little Entente gasping for breath, thanks to the intrigues of the Nazis in Rumania and Yugoslavia; last, but most important, a state of irritation in Anglo-French relations which, unless it is remedied at once, will give Hitler the chance he has outlined in "Mein Kampf" and has been working toward ever since he came to power. In a word, the isolation of France is greater than has been known since the days of the two Bonapartes.

Blum and his colleagues will have to work fast and adroitly to undo this mischief before it is too late. But their more immediate chores will face them in the departments of the various ministries at home, in the administrative bureaus, in the judiciary, as well as in diplomacy. It is a proverb in France that whether governments are of the right or of the left the "inspectors of finance" are always master and always right. These sons of the upper bourgeoisie and disciples of the Jesuit colleges are the real government of France where money is concerned. The army, the police, the council of state, every important branch of the public service are, thanks to the efforts of men like Poincaré, Tardieu, Doumergue, and Laval, honeycombed with enemies of the republic, ambushed to boycott any and every attempted reform. In the judiciary it is only necessary to mention such a name as Lescouvé, virtually chief justice of France. In diplomacy the nobility still reigns as if there had never been a 1789. Fancy a man like François-Poncet, a member of the Comité des Forges, being French ambassador in Berlin!

Léon Blum uttered some years ago a memorable phrase. "A holiday from legality," he said, "may become necessary if human progress and human liberty are not to perish." It is well to remind him now that if Hitler is master in Germany today the responsibility is largely that of the Weimar Republic for failing to rid the new regime of its enemies.

Why Arabs Kill Jews

BY ALBERT VITON

Jerusalem, April 20

ALL the Hebrew papers came out today with wide black margins. "Tel Aviv Mourns Its Dead" is the headline of one. "Bloody Day in Jaffa" reads the large black streamer of another. The Palestine Post, the moderate, unofficial English organ of the Zionist Executive, carries a double head, "Nine Jews Dead, Scores Hurt in Arab Attacks," and goes on to say:

... Loosed passions of Jaffa's underworld. ... In two or three hours nine defenseless Jews were done to death and at least two score injured, some very seriously. ... Jaffa's main roads ... were turned ... into lanes running with blood and strewn with glass of smashed windshields from motor cars. Blood-covered stones were about everywhere. ... Every half-hour vehicles from Jaffa turned up ... with their load of dead and wounded. ...

An Arab was seen raising a bleeding hand. ... From this point on, the life of every Jewish man or woman in Jaffa was in danger. ... All Jewish traffic in the Jerusalem direction was suspended. ... Roads became unsafe as crowds of villagers had collected menacingly. ... Meetings were held in Nablus last night at which ... boycott of the Jews was demanded and the proposal made to call a general strike throughout Palestine.

And so on. But this is a news report, and as everybody knows, news is not always synonymous with information. To understand what happened yesterday, to evaluate this incident correctly, reading a news story, however true, is not sufficient. We must study the forces which led to yesterday's bloody massacre.

Revolutionary changes are taking place in the whole Arab world. A movement which gripped most of Europe during the last century has arrived in Arabia and is bringing no less momentous changes. The old adage, "There is no nationality in Islam," is no longer true. Here, too, the old social force, religion, is beginning to give way to the new social force, nationalism. Not that religion is not still a powerful force in Arabia, but it is on the defensive and daily losing ground to the encroaching nationalism. This change has gone farther in Palestine than in Hejaz, farther in Syria than in Palestine, and farther in Egypt than in any other Arab state. But one can see it even in Trans-Jordan, where Emir Abdullah's car was pelted with onions when the news spread that he had sold land to the Jews. One can see it plainly in Jerusalem, where a general strike against the British recently took place although the Grand Mufti, Haj Amin al-Husseini, was strongly opposed to it, and where the number of Moslem religious pilgrims is perceptibly falling off while the membership of nationalistic clubs and societies is rapidly increasing. Many Arabs have warned me not to explain the widespread anti-Jewish feeling on religious or racial grounds. Racially, they point out, they belong to the same stock as the Jews, and their preoccupation with religion is far too mild to make them hate anybody because of it. Their bitter animosity is purely nationalistic—they see in the Jews the agents of British imperialism coming to take away their country.

The standard bearers of the nationalist crusade are young men between fifteen and twenty-five. This, the revolt of Arab youth, is the most important phenomenon in the Near East. It is true that there was a nationalist movement even before the World War, but it was nationalist chiefly in the sense that the Arab effendis (landlords) were opposed to the foreign exploiters because they wished to do the exploiting themselves. Suspicious of this sort of nationalism, the young men are opposed to all exploiters whether foreign or native. The riots in Cairo were carried on entirely by young men, and though it is easy to ridicule these youths making defiant gestures at John Bull, it was these same young men who prevented—with stones and fire, when they were needed—the old, unscrupulous leaders from selling out, and who in the end forced Britain to yield to their demands. In Damascus, too, it was the young men who forced the leaders to take the boldest steps. When the leaders issued a declaration calling off the strike on the seventeenth day, the students took matters into their own hands, overruled their elders, kept the strike going for another forty-odd days, and in the end forced concessions from the French government such as had never been given before.

The Arab youth movement cannot be trifled with, and the sooner the West learns to respect it, the better. In Palestine nearly every village now boasts a patriotic youth society; the Scout movement, in the vanguard of the new nationalism, was unheard of before 1920, but now it has a membership of about 4,000; so great is the demand for education that some 60 per cent of the applicants have to be turned away every year for lack of accommodation, though the British have been opening about seventy new schools each year. The rising generation represents a complete break with the Arab past.

Opposed to them stand the Zionists. There is of course no comparison between the Zionists and the imperialists of the West. Driven out of the countries of their birth, the Jews come to their historic home willing to pay their way—paying ten times the real value for every inch of land. Nor has the coming of the Jews worked to the economic disadvantage of the original inhabitants. Not only has Palestinian Arabia been enriched by Jewish immigration, but Palestine has become the center of attraction for the whole Near East. Tens of thousands of Arabs enter illegally every year in search of work. According to one Jewish economist, the Jews have paid to the Arabs about $100,000,000 for land, and the total Jewish investment in the country certainly exceeds $300,000,000. The Arab nationalists point out, however, that they are losing their country. The Jewish population has increased by about 600 per cent since 1919, and has more than doubled during the last four years, jumping from 174,000 in 1931 to an estimated 375,000 at the end of 1935. The Jewish proportion of the population as a whole has increased from 9.5 per cent in 1919 to about 40 per cent at the end of 1935. In 1922 the Jews owned 600,000 dunams of land (a dunam is approximately a quarter of an acre); in 1933 the Jews owned 1,260,000 dunams. Probably they own a million and a half today.

The Zionist leaders do not, of course, underestimate the threat of a growing Arab nationalism. Ben Guryon, leader of the Federation of Jewish Labor and one of the most important men at the Jewish agency, said frankly: "Zionists should know the dangers of Palestine, dangers which we have not seen yet, dangers from the East, far greater than the danger from the West. Palestine is no picnic [he used this good American word]." Again and again he spoke of the "permanent war" to be waged here.

Ben Guryon was right. A permanent war is being waged; usually on the economic and political planes, sometimes—in April, 1929, May, 1921, August, 1929, October, 1933, and now—it becomes a real war. The tourist is introduced to the permanent war at the port, where Jewish taxi-drivers pull Jewish tourists away from Arab taxis. Palestine is surely the only country in the world where Jews smoke only Jewish-made cigarettes, which in turn are boycotted by Arabs. Arabs do not buy in Jewish stores if they can avoid it; Jews do not buy from Arabs, although the latter sell somewhat more cheaply.

Nowhere is the struggle more bitter than in giving work. Arabs try to employ only Arabs. The Federation of Jewish Labor makes keeping work from Arabs one of its chief aims. I recently asked a prominent Histadruth leader, in whose office hung the picture of Karl Marx, how he reconciled such a policy with the class struggle. "The struggle for pure Jewish labor is the class struggle," he cried. Even Ben Guryon told the Palestine Jewish Congress: "Just as it is unthinkable for a Jew to open a house of prostitution in one of the Jewish villages, so unthinkable must it be for a Jew to employ Arabs."

The political struggle against the Balfour Declaration began as soon as the Arabs were told of it. As early as 1920 a Moslem-Christian committee went first to London, then to Geneva, and back to London to protest the "flagrant breach of promise" on the part of the British. No incident, however insignificant, occurs in Palestine without the Arabs exploiting it as an occasion for repeating what they think of the Balfour Declaration. In 1925, for example, the Arabs brought two cases to court against the government. One was to restrain the government from using springs belonging to the Arab village Urtas to supply Jerusalem with water; the other was to remove the hated initials "E. I.," Eretz Israel, Land of the Jews, from the postage stamps. The Arabs lost both cases, but great excitement was engendered while they were being tried. The possibility of reconciling the two points of view is almost nil. An Arab nationalist sees in a Zionist his mortal enemy who comes to rob him of his fatherland, although he pays for it. Every good Zionist sees the Arab as an unnecessary obstacle to his homeland dream. There are certain exceptions, liberals like Dr. Judah Magnus of the Hebrew University, who want peace and generous cooperation. Ragheb bey Nassashibi, ex-mayor of the Holy City and president of the National Defense Party, had an answer to this: "Why shouldn't they want peace? Peace will enable them to build their national home and then they will confront us with a de facto. It is we who cannot afford peace. To expect that of us is like expecting a man whose throat is being cut to smile pleasantly." The Revisionist slogan, "With Blood and Fire Will Judea Rise," is closer to the truth. Palestine is not a picnic. Two powerful forces are colliding. Blood is inevitable. It has flowed in the past; it is flowing today; it will flow in the future until one side emerges victorious.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

I READ with peculiar satisfaction that the American Unitarian Association at its annual convention at Boston on May 19 voted "overwhelmingly" to seek for the Unitarian faith the same privileges accorded to Quakers for their conscientious objection to war, and that it had at last passed a "resolution of repentance" for its acts against its ministers who, when the World War came, refused to subordinate their allegiance to the Prince of Peace to loyalty to the war policy of their government. It was especially gratifying to note the ovation given to the Reverend Henry W. Pinkham, a minister who was driven from his pulpit at Melrose, Massachusetts, with all possible contumely, because he would not yield to the public clamor and was afraid neither of that clamor nor of governmental authority. If ever a man bore himself as a moral hero in those days it was Henry W. Pinkham. I can still recall the shock it was to me to think that the enlightened body of clergymen and laymen who constituted the Unitarian church could have been so recreant to the teachings of Christ and to decent recognition of intellectual and moral consistency as to join in the hue and cry against men who would not bargain away their souls at the behest of the mob at the foot of the new Calvary.

An equally significant happening is the adoption by the Methodist Episcopal General Conference in Cincinnati of a similar appeal to the government, reading: "We therefore petition the government of the United States to grant to members of the Methodist Episcopal church who may be conscientious objectors to war the same exemption from military service as has long been granted to members of the Society of Friends and similar religious organizations." More than that, the conference adopted a report which asked the Federal Council of Churches to seek to find a method by which "the spiritual ministry of the churches to the armed forces of the United States may be performed by ministers appointed and supported by and amenable to the churches." This, in my judgment, is the beginning of an effort to take chaplains out of uniform and put an end to that ghastly anachronism which only brings the churches and all their servants into contempt. In any event, it is most gratifying proof that the cause of peace is at the forefront of every important church gathering today. This is precisely where it should be, for even Lloyd George has said that if the churches of America and Great Britain allow another great war to come they might just as well close their doors for good and all.

Meanwhile, the Emergency Peace Campaign, initiated last fall, is rapidly going ahead. No less than three hundred meetings have been held, or will be held in the immediate future, eighteen of which have been addressed by George Lansbury. More than two hundred able young men and women have been selected to carry the campaign into the rural areas of this country, into which the organized peace movement of the United States has hardly penetrated heretofore. These young people are serving without pay, indeed, in many cases are actually paying for the privilege of enlisting in the movement. Wherever they go they will call the attention of people to the imminence of the danger of war and to the rapid militarization of the United States under the Administration of Franklin Roosevelt. It is planned to raise and spend $1,000,000 in this campaign during the next twelve months, and the churches are counted upon to do everything in their power for it. This and the action of the two conferences I have cited above are the answer of the religious bodies of the country to the recent outrageous attack upon them by the Assistant Secretary of War, Harry E. Woodring, who in an address to the American Legion in Texas undertook to question the patriotism and loyalty of the seven thousand ministers who have declared that they will under no circumstances take part in a war or have anything to do with it. I know the cynics say that many of them will recant when the bands begin to play and prison doors open, but the vote of the Unitarians in Boston gives me the faith to believe that several thousand will stand fast where there was only a handful of such as Henry W. Pinkham and John Haynes Holmes in 1917, and that all who stand fast will have the sympathy and the moral support of their churches.

The proposal just made by Rabbi Sidney E. Goldstein to the Federation of Jewish Women's Organizations of this city that a peace committee composed of from fifteen to twenty-five persons be formed in every Congressional district in the United States is additional evidence of an increasing realization of the need of organizing for peace. Never before was there such an encouraging situation. One has only to compare the number of people aroused to the cause of peace and the multitudes who have an informed and intelligent opinion on international questions with the lack of such information and the weakness of the peace organizations in 1917 to see that when the threat of war comes again, the forces that will refuse to accept it or compromise with it will be vastly more powerful and intelligent than they were twenty years ago. Americans are not going to be so easily deceived by war propaganda and by hoary platitudes about standing by the flag while saying goodbye to reason, common sense, conscience, morality, and humanity, at least as long as there are so many people aware of how the country was humbugged in 1917-18. The total failure of the Italian effort to impress the world with atrocity stories out of Ethiopia is proof that it isn't going to be so easy to fool all the people even for a short time.

BROUN'S PAGE

Procurator

A Chapter from a Possible Biography of Pontius Pilate

OF COURSE I remember Jesus Christ. I crucified him. Several have come to me to ask about that strange man whom I met once in Jerusalem. Lately there seems to be a cult in Rome and a new interest in his personality. Although his teachings died with him, it is not altogether strange that his memory should linger a little while even though he and I fought the great battle in an obscure corner of the world. Indeed, as I sit now to write the story of a long and varied life, the figure of Jesus looms so large that everything else is blotted out. We exchanged no more than a dozen words. I was finished with him in less than an hour, but that morning tested everything that I was or had ever hoped to be. Judgment was passed on me as well as on Jesus in that short span.

I knew then as I know now that it was my hour of trial. And I triumphed over great temptation and danger because all my life had been a period of preparation for that crisis. I stood as lonely as a sentry. The man I sent to spy on Jesus had become his apostle. The city was ready to rise in tumult in defense of its hero. One of my most trusted soldiers, a centurion, had paid public homage to him. And last of all my wife, who had heard him talk to a multitude, pleaded for his life. It is easy to say that I represented the might and majesty of the Roman Empire while he was a disinherited fanatic, but he was of the stuff by which kingdoms fall. With words he could destroy that authority which legions protect precariously. He never called himself the King of the Jews. His mind went far beyond any such goal. He knew and I knew that the Eastern world of mystics and of dreamers was about to march on Rome. March, I say and I mean it, for an idea can cut through shields which a javelin would never pierce.

Civilization as we know it faced the threat of going down under the feet of the mob. The weak were to overthrow the strong through weight of numbers. The meek, of whom He spoke, would go marching through the streets where once the proud held up their heads, and in plain sight there was a world in which the meanest slave could pluck a Roman by the sleeve and call him brother. I was a provincial governor, but no Caesar was ever called upon to render so momentous a decision. With a wave of my hand I might have swept the surface of the known world and left a clean tablet upon which to write a new one. The phrases of Jesus and the soldiers of Pilate were ample to create an empire.

I never liked the High Priest, nor did anybody else in Jerusalem, and for a fleeting second I thought how neat a stroke it would be to send him to crucifixion and turn the market-place loose to the eloquence of Jesus. And let no man think that my decision was in any way affected by the clamor of the High Priest, who was wholly without honor even in his own community. His servants were a scrubby crew who would have cheered if I had slashed his throat. He served me as a blind.

No more was the issue Jesus or Barabbas, as I suggested for the sake of strategy. My choice lay between Rome and the new kingdom to which Jesus had given the name of Heaven. I had to decide whether to save that tangible civilization built upon the exploits of our far-flung armies or make out of the mist a new city towering to the sky. I had to choose reality or a dream world. It is true I hesitated. I stood in the presence of a great man. We were alone, for I had drawn him into a room away from the noisy riffraff of the High Priest. Jesus was not afraid. And in the supreme moment of which I have written neither of us spoke. I stared intently into his eyes to catch even a glint of that fear which comes to men who are in the shadow of death. It was not there. He smiled. It was a friendly smile almost as if he were saying, "Make either choice. I will understand." And as I looked at him it seemed as if my spirit left my body and I was carried up to a high place from which I could see the kingdoms of the world. But though I looked to the far horizon Rome was not of them. Gone, blotted out was the Eternal City. An old wound in my left shoulder began to throb. I remembered how our thin ranks stood up against a charge in defense of our homes and firesides. It was an old campaign. For the moment I have forgotten in what distant land we fought it. But when we beat them off we raised out swords high in the air and cried out "Rome! Rome! Rome!" Once again our eagles had conquered.

And suddenly I found myself again in a room in Jerusalem staring into the eyes of Jesus Christ, and I knew I had come to my answer. In a voice so low that we could hardly hear it I said, "Crucify him," for I was still shaken. But then, lest there be any mistake, I threw back my head and I cried loud enough for the guard at the door to hear, "Crucify him." The incident was over. Rome had spoken.

HEYWOOD BROWN

E. M. FORSTER'S Abinger Harvest

The first collection of essays by the author of A Passage to India and one of England's most distinguished writers. It is a large and fully representative volume that covers a wide range of subjects—the past, the present, books, the East, personal essays. "Anyone who misses reading this book will be missing one of the most exquisite pleasures that the contemporary market can afford him . . . It is nice to be able to use the phrase 'master of English prose' about . . . somebody who is alive and English."—George Dangerfield, Saturday Review. $3.50.

EDMUND WILSON'S Travels in Two Democracies

One of the most able observers and writers in America shows how the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R., the strongest and most interesting countries in the world, are living their daily lives and working out their national destinies at the present moment in history. Mr. Wilson's method varies from objective reporting to relating personal experiences and reflections. He presents a wealth of a new kind of information and appraisal in a singularly revealing manner. In a special sense, he was well qualified to do this book, because during his long visit to Russia he discovered exactly what it meant to be an American and he came back with a strong sense of his own nationality. "I feel convinced," he writes, "that American republican institutions, disastrously as they are always being abused, have some permanent and absolute value. . . . We shall be in no position to reprove the Russians till we shall be able to show them an American socialism which is free from the Russian defects." Just out. $2.50.

By LLOYD LEWIS and

HENRY JUSTIN SMITH

Oscar Wilde Discovers America: 1882

"One of the most valuable and generally amusing social histories of the time."—N. Y. Herald Tribune.

"A significant contribution to our knowledge of a picturesque figure as well as valuable Americana."—Saturday Review.

"A gorgeous presentation of the United States of the late 19th century, with all its flamboyant love of size and wealth . . . This is Americana concentrated, in its ripest, most lush form."—United Press.

"A pageant of Main Street, America, three years before Sinclair Lewis was born, a vastly entertainingly sidelight on history."—Lewis Gannett.

"Packed with epigrams and anecdotes and as delightful to read as it is genuinely informative."—Herschel Brickell. Profusely illustrated. $4.50.

Collected Poems of T. S. ELIOT

"The later poems of T. S. Eliot, for years fugitive and hard to come by, are at last joined to his early work. . . . So the record, up to now, of the poet who has changed the accent of poetry written in our time is at last completely available to us. . . . It is now possible to read the beautiful poems of the transition period in their proper order, as well as the latest brief lyrics, the nonsense rhymes, and the fine choruses from 'The Rock.' . . . The 'Collected Poems' are more than a work of poetic creation; they are a work of poetic regeneration."—Louise Bogan, The New Yorker. $2.50.

HARCOURT, BRACE
AND COMPANY

383 Madison Ave.
New York

BOOKS and the ARTS

ALL FOR LOVE

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ROSAMOND LEHMANN was the author of a first novel, "Dusty Answer," which turned out to be one of the publishing sensations of 1927. None of her several succeeding books achieved comparable success, but there is a new one called "The Weather in the Street" (Reynal and Hitchcock) which is destined, I feel sure, to make itself a place on most of the best-seller lists and to be alternately lauded and damned with more than usual enthusiasm by various reviewers. It is so admirable an example of one sort of thing that it may be profitably looked at with more than usual attention, and it is so much in the manner of the earlier book that one may well begin with something which was said nine years ago about "Dusty Answer."

Turning to the files of The Nation, I discover that the latter book was disposed of in rather short order by Clifton Fadiman, who was then a new beginner but already almost as shrewd a critic and almost as telling a writer as he has since become. To him "Dusty Answer" was merely an example of the kind of decadent emotionalism characteristic of dying societies, and among other things he wrote:

Here we have a group of young men and women in whom the subconscious acceptance of a failing national destiny is so strong as to make them wearily impervious to all experiences save one, and that the most devitalizing and hopeless of them all—romantic love. . . . Over-intelligent though they all are, they are never once sufficiently intelligent to question calmly the whole problem of romantic passion, to examine it historically as a traditional national weakness, to assign it its increasingly insignificant niche in an increasingly materialistic civilization.

Looking calmly at that statement, one may perhaps feel that the critic was expecting rather too much when he reproved the very young persons of the novel for not examining their passion "historically as a traditional national weakness." Only in the operas of Gilbert and Sullivan or the novels of a more than usually serious Marxian would lovers, especially young ones, be likely to look upon their love primarily as material for a historical analysis or even to regard it as obviously "a weakness." As one of the fairies in "Iolanthe" protests, "but this weakness is so strong." And even today it very frequently is. Probably what Mr. Fadiman meant was not so much a criticism of the lovers for not seeing romantic love "historically" as a criticism of their creator for not seeing as deeply as he into the significance of her creatures. The important fact is that the lines, written in 1927, two years Before the Flood, so perfectly anticipated a point of view which has since become very widespread as to make it inevitable that most of the attempts to demolish "The Weather in the Street" will unconsciously paraphrase what Mr. Fadiman had to say about "Dusty Answer."

There can be no question that the new novel, though somewhat more mature as well as concerned with somewhat more mature persons, is as completely romantic as the earlier one. It is, that is to say, based upon the assumption that even for certain intelligent, sophisticated persons love can become the most important thing in the world, and upon the further assumption that the novelist may write about the passion of such persons in such a manner as to accept it at their own valuation. The whole story turns about a somewhat resigned and disillusioned young woman who, after separating from an unsatisfactory husband, accidentally meets a man whom she had known years before, begins a love affair with him, and presently finds herself absorbed and consumed by that love to an extent she had never dreamed possible.

Obviously this is one of the simplest as well as one of the oldest stories in the world, and its only novelty consists in the local habitation, temporal as well as spatial, which is given it; in the attempt to capture the special tones and overtones produced by the fact that it centers about a certain sort of person in a certain sort of civilization.

If one assumes that such an enterprise is necessarily trivial, that the serious novelist cannot possibly remain serious if he consents to treat love as an emotion whose value is absolute, then of course "The Weather in the Street" is so much trash. But the novel of sensibility has a tradition almost as respectable and at least as long as the novel of moral or social criticism, and unless the genre itself be rejected in toto, then I find it difficult to see how Miss Lehmann's work can fail to deserve real praise. I am not by any means maintaining that it is of absolutely first rank. There are passages which, on the surface at least, seem to constitute an almost too complete abandonment to emotionalism, and I dare say that the book will be admired by many who admire also the, to me, vile romances of Margaret Kennedy. But Miss Lehmann, unlike Miss Kennedy, maintains contact with reality. Her grasp on character is far firmer, and it is, indeed, this sense of character, plus her keen appreciation of the salient features of contemporary manners, which gives her book its real distinction.

Various other recent writers, Aldous Huxley for example, have dealt with the same milieu and with a similar situation: the sudden efflorescence of romantic love in persons who had assumed, rather too easily, that they were beyond it. But Mr. Huxley is a satirist whose gift is for caricature. His portraits of such persons are parodies, and the world in which they move is a world everywhere dominated by the reductio ad absurdum. Miss Lehmann, on the other hand, writes with the sympathy of a participant, and in her pages a society which may be dominated by "the subconscious acceptance of a failing national destiny" is, at least, described in a fashion which both its members and its critics should find recognizable and more.

Technically the most remarkable feature of the book is the often brightly humorous dialogue which manages somehow to be extraordinarily expressive while seeming to be couched exclusively in the jargon natural to the characters. Few languages, I suppose, were ever more thoroughly debased than that of the upper-middle-class Englishman and Englishwoman of today. By comparison the slang of the American taxi driver is rich, varied, and flexible. "Simply darling" to indicate any degree or shade of approval, "perfectly putrid" to indicate the reverse, seem almost to exhaust the resources of the language. "Positively foul" must serve indiscriminately to express one's opinion of black treachery or an unbecoming hat. Indeed, the refusal to discriminate between opinions, the determination to make "quite" serve as a universally adequate response to any remark whatsoever, is a deliberate and modish affectation. But Miss Lehmann performs the miracle of making her characters communicate something while appearing to speak a language which makes communication impossible. Her triumph is the triumph of a dialect writer, but in this particular case it serves an artistic purpose which contributes to the artistic effect of the whole. Her people feel what, theoretically, they ought not to be able to feel. They also say what, theoretically, they ought not to be able to say. And the effect is one of extraordinary realism. "The Weather in the Street" is primarily a love story. It is also, if one insists, a document.

BOOKS

Der Führer

HITLER. By Conrad Heiden. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

HITLER. By Rudolf Olden. Covici-Friede. $3.

THESE are two unlucky books, although both of them are written with care and skill and both possess unusual interest. They are unlucky because they are twins, one might almost say identical twins, so close is the parallel between them. They came into the world at the same time with the same name. Each of them was written by a German newspaperman now in exile—Conrad Heiden was for many years one of the star writers on the Frankfurter Zeitung, while Rudolf Olden was long the political editor of the Berliner Tageblatt.

Both authors have pursued an identical method, that is to say, they have taken Hitler's own book, "Mein Kampf" (My Struggle), and have written a commentary on it from material at their disposal. Naturally enough, they had almost all of this material in common, and the consequence has been that the books are really twins. From similar treatment and similar sources it was inevitable that a similar result should be produced. There is, however, a certain difference in style. Heiden is more vigorous and straightforward, Olden more reflective and analytical. Heiden's chapter on the "Blood Bath" of June, 1934, rises to lyric heights of description. His report of the coal cellar at Lichterfelde reminds one of the finale of Malraux's "Man's Fate." He writes:

About 150 candidates for death, all of them superior S.A. (Storm Troops) leaders waiting to be called out, in a dirty coal cellar. At short intervals there rang out four names. That meant: execution!

The prisoners didn't know that they were to be shot at Hitler's behest. They thought that their supreme leader was held in prison somewhere by the Reaction—or perhaps that he was already dead. Karl Ernst, group leader of Berlin and very probably the man who set fire to the Reichstag building, fell on that account with the cry, "Heil Hitler!"

The men in the coal cellar had a remarkable instinct for the imponderability of fate. They would make a guess as to who would go at the next call of names; in three or four cases the guess came true. Through a cellar window those who remained behind would follow their companions as they went across the court to the farther wall. Those who were going kept their eyes turned to the cellar window. . . .

Then the victims would stand in a row of four against the wall. An S.S. (Special Police) man would open their shirts over the chest and with charcoal would draw a circle around the left nipple: the target! Only about six or eight meters away stood the squad of S.S. men with their rifles. . . . Here too the command rang out, "The leader wills it. Heil Hitler! Fire." . . .

Almost all the victims met death courageously and calmly. . . . On the other hand the nerves of the S.S. who did the shooting could not long stand the strain, and in the later executions particularly many of the shots went wild, so that the victim would lie hit upon the ground, yet still alive. Then the S.S. leader in command would step forward and give the prostrate one the coup de grâce in the head.

All this was visible from the cellar window.

Either of these books is valuable as source material, as a lucid and detailed explanation of the extraordinary phenomenon that is Hitler's rise to power, but they resemble each other so closely that it is unnecessary to read both of them—one might flip a coin and choose. Both in my opinion suffer from the prevalent and characteristically Central European fad for psychoanalysis. For this, it is true, Hitler's strange personality offers a tempting field, of which both writers avail themselves with gusto. They describe his frustrated youth and reach the conclusion that he has a maladjusted, unbalanced, and "double" personality. Then with complete unanimity they go on to show that the war "made a man of him," that it gave him backbone and will and desire for leadership. Thereafter, it seems, he went forward with whole-hearted energy and perseverance, dodging and maneuvering when necessary but never losing sight of his goal nor the means by which he hoped to reach it. At moments these hostile critics accuse him of uncertainty and hesitation, but to an impartial reader it seems from their own account that he was weighing men in the balance of his mind and awaiting the psychological moment for action. In these passages the parallel between the two books is so close as to be fantastic. Their description of Hitler's service at the front and of a "severe lung disease" from which he declared he suffered from childhood are almost word for word. A little farther, on pages 73 and 74, Heiden writes, "To Hitler the program was only a question of propaganda . . . but in this propaganda Hitler is really a creator." Olden says on page 81, "Always the chief factor of its [the program's] success was propaganda, an art at which Adolf Hitler was a master."

There is, however, one point of divergence between the two books. Rudolf Olden implies that the Reichswehr, the army, has been throughout and still is the real force in Germany, that in a sense it has "used" Hitler rather than submitted to him. Olden writes:

In one thing, however, Hitler failed; he could not make the army National Socialist. It continued to lead its own life. . . . The old military caste obeys the dictator; they support and tolerate him, but the army does not belong to him. It belongs to itself.

And in a later passage:

The question "Will Hitler stay?" stands in close relation to the question that Germany's friends ask themselves, "How did it ever come about?" Hitler himself produced the brief pregnant reply, "If the army had not stood on our side in the days of revolution, we should not be here today." The answer to both questions is this: If one day the armed forces should be no longer willing to tolerate Hitler and his crowd, he would quickly be removed.

Heiden, on the other hand, takes a more realistic and, in my opinion, more accurate view when he suggests that Hitler played the younger officers of the old army who were left jobless and dissatisfied by the restrictions of the Versailles treaty against the higher officers, the generals, who retained positions in the Reichswehr to a disproportionate degree. Heiden seems to feel that Hitler to no small extent maneuvered the Reichswehr, as he had maneuvered his friends and his opponents, that while perhaps he might not have achieved success without the army, he is necessary to the army, that he is the "Leader" without which no army can exist as a vital force.

Both of these books might, I think, have been written by the prophet Balaam, the one, you remember, who came to curse the Israelites and was forced, unwillingly, to bless them. The authors revile Hitler unceasingly; they never miss an opportunity of slurring him and sneering at him. Even when they absolve him of sexual irregularities they hint darkly at something foul, and the horrid word syphilis is introduced with calculated indirection by Heiden in a chapter on Hitler's relations with women, which all the information about the Führer at my disposal leads me to describe as "hitting below the belt" and yellow journalism of the meaner type. No, my reference to Balaam was deliberate. The effect of these two books, so painstakingly and bitterly written and so well documented, has been to give me a far higher opinion of Adolf Hitler than I had before. Here is no Pied Piper of Hamelin, no strange freak of nature, "hypnotizing" the German people by loud words and frothy rhetoric, but the Man whom the Occasion calls forth, as Marxists would say, the Leader, not unbalanced but balancing, not lightweight but weighing, shrewd, pertinacious, and patriotic, who saw clearly the agony of Germany, prostrate under the Versailles treaty, and capitalized that, and saw the ravages of depression and unemployment, and capitalized that, and gave a hopeless people hope and a leaderless people leadership. In a word, as Heiden puts it, he responded to the inner cry of the German heart, "Save us and rule us."

When one thinks of it, this is a more reasonable explanation than that of the "Pied Piper" or "hypnotizer." Because no man ever can thus rise from deeply low to vastly high unless there is power in him and quality far beyond his fellows.

WALTER DURANTY

Wounds from Nowhere

FROM A SURGEON'S JOURNAL: 1915-1918. By Harvey Cushing. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

IN TWENTY years I have read no war book more horrible than this one, which is all the more horrible because its author gives no sign that he knows what he is publishing. Read with attention, the journal kept by Dr. Cushing during the various periods of his service as brain surgeon with the French, British, and American troops on the western front should raise the most unanswerable questions yet raised concerning the possible utility of any modern war. Dr. Cushing, as I have suggested, raises no such question himself. He seems at the time to have had no general doubts as to the supreme importance of what was going on; he wanted America to come in long before it did; during the suicidal offensive of the British in 1917 he could jot down the sentiment that "this is what men were intended for"; and on the day of the Armistice he could look back over the whole thing as if it had been an "intercollegiate football game." He had, to be sure, momentary and local doubts. He was not sure once about the wisdom of the British offensive; when Mr. Eliot back at Harvard spoke "on the good things that are showing up through the war" he remarked to himself that "they seemed somewhat microscopic"; and he could wonder in November, 1917, "what it's all about and what indeed we are all over here for." But for the most part the journal as it stands is noncommittal—and all the more horrible because it is.

Here without further ado are some of the cases which Dr. Cushing recorded on the backs of temperature charts and scraps of stray paper after exhausting days with streams of wounded men:

I was going over a man this afternoon with a facial paralysis from a bullet wound in the mastoid. He got hit during an engagement on September 7 . . . and with a field full of other wounded was left for dead. The enemy came over them a day or so later; a soldier poked at him and, finding him alive, swung at his head with the butt end of his musket, breaking his jaw. He was finally picked up during a counter-attack and, after a bad otitis media and erysipelas, is now ready—after seven months!—for a nerve anastomosis.

A cervical sympathetic paralysis in a man shot through the open mouth.

The ball, having passed through the right shoulder, had entered the mastoid process to emerge through the very center of the cornea, completely destroying the eye.

A young lieutenant . . . was looking through his field glasses when a Mauser bullet made a direct hit of the lens in front of his right eye, exploding the cylinder and producing an ugly wound not only of his hand but of his right orbital region and cheek. Some metal fragments could be seen by X-ray, driven back into the base of the skull.

He has been paralyzed for six months or more from the effects of a ball which had passed directly through the spinal canal.

Another group of injuries that were new to me were the transsections of the spinal cord in the lower neck, which show, in addition to the total paralysis, an extraordinary lowering of body temperature—sometimes as low as 93° F.—with suppression of urine and death in two or three days, consciousness being retained to the end.

A strip of his helmet about two inches long and half an inch wide had been cut out as though by a can opener. This metal sliver had curled in through the temporal bone over his ear, passed through the brain, and its point emerged just behind the external angular process. Not a pleasant thing to dislodge, particularly as it had divided his meningeal artery.

A stretcher-bearer with a perforating wound from the right temple and out the left eye, cutting both optic nerves.

The casualness of the record is what counts—the minute, unemotional pursuit of the paths made by random pieces of metal coming from nowhere, or rather from everywhere, through nerve, tissue, organ, and bone. To read tables showing millions of deaths and many more millions of casualties is to read nothing like this. Or to read, say in Homer or Malory, stories of ancient battles in which helmets and brainpans were shattered with one mighty blow of an angry hero's hand—that is not the same thing either. That can be understood in a way, just as the statistics of the World War can somehow be taken in. But it is impossible to make any sense of this death which literally filled the air for four years, falling on men who could not see where it came from and shedding its wounds with an idiot's impartiality. Nor have I spoken of the things which happened to masses of men—men blinded from sand blown by bullets "right through the lids," men gassed, driven insane, and shell-shocked; of the first two cases of shell shock observed by Dr. Cushing one came "with pronounced general tremor, an anguished expression, and semi-conscious; the other still more stuporous and jerking about, every few minutes—as though falling in his sleep or having a strong electric current passed through him." They all were one mass of men, huddled for four years under a meaningless thunder storm, cowering in a nightmare of unmotivated murder. And ironically enough the hospitals of war had never been so good, or so efficiently informed as to what was expected of them. On the eve of the Argonne offensive, for instance, "our calculations for the eight divisions, with six in reserve, are 14,000 casualties—that is, 6 per cent of the total engaged if there is serious resistance, as there is almost certain to be; of these, 3,000 dead and 11,000 wounded, of which we may expect 10 per cent to have head wounds." And the dentists of Neuilly—"it is remarkable what they are able to do in aligning the jaws and teeth of an unfortunate with a large part of his face shot away."

"The marrow of the tragedy is concentrated in the hospitals." So wrote Walt Whitman in "Memoranda During the War," a book which Dr. Cushing read at Oxford early in 1919. What was true of the Civil War was doubly true of the World War, and Dr. Cushing, being a great surgeon instead of a great poet, has been content to let Whitman's sentence stand on the fly-leaf following his dedication.

MARK VAN DOREN

Corporative State Myth

UNDER THE AXE OF FASCISM. By Gaetano Salvemini. The Viking Press. $3.

OF OLD, dictatorship was, first of all, a fact of violence, but for the new tyrants in the former capitalistic democracies the old violence is not enough. They must have also, it seems, an institutionalized terror and a myth, elaborated by continuous propaganda and internationalized through adequate channels.

The Italian tyrant has met the latter need by an ingenious discovery—the corporative state—a myth designed to demonstrate that the crushing of the proletariat was done in the interest of the proletariat itself. The corporative state promised to be a third way between capitalism and communism, the reconciliation of the interests of capital and labor, the elimination of class conflict, the remolding of recalcitrant human nature into the glorious synthesis of the corporative man, who would combine in himself "an absolute liberalism with an absolute socialism"—in a word, the maintenance of free initiative with the most completely planned economy. The attraction of the idea of the corporative state was for many years almost irresistible. A few clear-sighted and honest observers (some of them Americans) remained aloof from the hysterical chorus and expressed the gravest doubts not only of the mortality but also of the efficiency of the corporative system, but lacking an intimate knowledge of the Italian language, temper, and tradition they were not in a position to justify their doubts by a thorough study of Italian events. This work has now been done by Professor Salvemini, who is prepared for it by the experience of a lifetime devoted to historic studies and to the improvement of his people.

In the four hundred pages of his book Professor Salvemini describes the nature of the corporative state and its social, economic, and moral consequences. Every single item among the innumerable ones he sets down is supported by unchallenged authorities, the great majority of them Fascist. This critical survey of facts, theories, and values affords the author an opportunity to criticize a great part of the Anglo-Saxon literature published on the corporative state. He gives a caustic rebuke to all those who, either consciously or under the influence of mass hysteria, have misrepresented this most tragic period of the Italian people. The reader will see that "scholars" and "independent" gentlemen glorified the corporative state for many years before a single item of its program was put into practice. It was really, as Salvemini puts it, "looking in a dark room for a black cat which was not there." Even now, after the codification of the corporative institutions in 1934, the whole conception is entirely on paper and without the smallest possibility of forwarding the aims which were so sonorously heralded by the dictator. Salvemini does not exaggerate when with biting satire he states as his final conclusion on the corporative state:

All the categories of the traditional economic system remain intact: profit, interest, and wages. But profit becomes the corporative salary of the employer; interest becomes the corporative salary of the capitalist; wages become the corporative profit and interest of the worker. The worker is no longer a worker, but has become "a civil servant in the broadest sense of the term." Don Quixote attacked windmills as if they were real monsters; Mussolini deals with real monsters as if they were windmills.

But Salvemini's book is more than the best sourcebook yet published concerning the so-called constructive work of Fascism; it is at the same time a noteworthy human document. Its author shows that one can defend a cause without neglecting or distorting the facts. He knows very well that under given world conditions Mussolini could not make a paradise of Italy. He acknowledges even that some forward steps have been taken, but he demonstrates that those modest accomplishments were achieved at an enormous cost in freedom, human dignity, and the standard of living of the masses. The perspectives which the author opens toward the future are not less important. The humbug of a planned economic system in an autocratic military state was never more forcefully unveiled, and it was never more clearly proved that there is more of the despised laissez faire in Italy for certain groups than in any other country. A careful analysis of the situation makes it clear that the Fascist dictatorship finds its supreme aim in itself, and that it can become a danger even for those who originally financed it. The reviewer would go even farther than the author, believing that the Fascist dictatorship may ultimately destroy the capitalistic system itself, not, of course, to replace it by a popular socialism but by a type of Inca socialism whose traits are already plainly visible both in Italy and in Germany.

Salvemini makes the timely observation that the Ethiopian adventure of Mussolini had the same social function as the blood purge of Hitler in June, 1934. It gave to the Duce an excuse for sending to the front the extreme left elements of the party. This interpretation will be reinforced if there is verification of certain newspaper reports that Mussolini intends to leave in Ethiopia 400,000 men of the army as involuntary colonizers. This would be something new in the history of imperialism, something which only a Fascist state could accomplish—the use of the human herd not only as cannon-fodder but also as unwilling colonists in an exotic and abhorred country.

Limitation of space makes it impossible to review here the excellent chapters which analyze the various "battles" of Mussolini (almost every act of ordinary social policy becomes in this happy country a deed of war!), the ingenious mechanism of the Dopolavoro, and the appalling misery of a country where "there are no longer any beggars." But a last point may be emphasized which only another exile can sufficiently evaluate. It was surely a great sacrifice on the part of the author to write this book. Digging into petty lies and mystifications, reconstructing trivial and often disgusting facts with the expenditure of an enormous amount of energy and time, must have been torture for a man of Salvemini's universality, because all this must have reminded him of the tragic experiences of his life. He told me once that he had only one wish—to forget and to devote the remainder of his years to some thrilling chapter of history. Yet he felt that he could not afford to live in peace. The memory of his martyred country and blasphemed ideals compelled him to fight on.

OSCAR JASZI

The Perfect Gentleman

PENNY FOOLISH. By Osbert Sitwell. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

WITH Osbert Sitwell it would sometimes seem that the chief reason for acquiring the good things in life is to belittle them. Thus the real advantage of being well bred is that it enables you to be magnificently rude, the real advantage of social success is that it enables you to turn blasé, the real advantage of being well educated is that it enables you to act as though you weren't. To put it more simply, Mr. Sitwell delights in having a superior manner. It is not something, as it is with so many people, that he has cultivated, but something he seems to have been born with; which means no doubt that he has also a superiority complex. He never seeks to coerce anyone into his way of thinking, he never protests hotly about anything, he never apologizes for his dislikes, he never gets rattled, he writes as he pleases; and it must be added that now and then he writes very well.

The present book of very many very short essays comes down in the end to penciling a portrait of Mr. Sitwell—his opinions, his prejudices, his interests, his tastes; and since in the course of it he roams round the field of modern life, we may appraise it as a criticism of the world he lives in. That he does not roam very far or live very fully is perhaps the most significant thing about him—certainly it gives us a clue to everything else. We can conclude without much trouble that

The Soviet Union

Onlookers at the human parade that is Europe today can ill afford not to witness the Soviet scene . . . the tremendous strides forward being enacted in industry, culture and social development by the 175 million people in the largest of all countries . . . their great achievements in education and human betterment . . . their new way of life. Moscow, Leningrad, Kharkov, Kiev, Odessa, all the centers of the U.S.S.R. are easy to reach by fast air, train and boat connections from more western Continental cities. Rates in the Soviet Union are on an all-inclusive daily basis of $15 per day first class, $8 tourist and $5 third. These include meals, hotel, transportation on tour, sightseeing and trained guide-interpreters. On your free time you will find travel incidental purchases inexpensive due to the new dollar-rouble exchange. . . . Any travel agent will arrange an itinerary of from five days in one center to a month's tour taking in the Volga trip, all the main cities, a motor ride over the Caucasus, a cruise in the Black Sea and a visit in lovely Crimea. Write for colored 22"x16" map and illustrated Booklet No. NA-6.

THEATRE FESTIVAL

MOSCOW AND LENINGRAD

September 1 to 10, 1936

Fourth annual theatre festival . . . staged by foremost artists and directors such as Stanislavsky, Meyerhold, Moskvina and others internationally famous. Prices are moderate for the ten-day stay. They include meals, hotel, transportation between Moscow and Leningrad, sightseeing, guide-interpreters and theatre tickets for 12 brilliant presentations of drama, opera and ballet.

APPLY TO YOUR TRAVEL AGENT

INTOURIST, INC.

545 Fifth Avenue,
New York
Monadnock Bldg.,
681 Market St.
San Francisco

Mr. Sitwell is a tory, that he is an aesthete, that he is a particular brand of Englishman—the brand that may criticize England exactly as a man may criticize his own family: but you may not. He is a tory, the deep not the narrow kind, the kind you sometimes suspect of being a liberal because you confuse his dislike of stodginess with a dislike of reaction, or his dislike of specific cruelty with a dislike of cosmic injustice. (He disapproves of Hitler but approves of fascism; deprecates war but defends the ruling classes.) As an aesthete he is yellow-ninetyish with better taste. His perceptions are cultivated, his impressions are individual, and his feeling for background is genuine and keen. It is more questionable, however, whether he actually has any great background—whether he has thought deeply, read widely, or observed things intently. There is rather a sense of slightly wilful orchidaceousness: for example, the only sort of dog he can tolerate is a Pekingese. Still, the aesthete has nosed out the Englishman to the extent of a strong dislike of horses, Eton, English cooking. Naturally he sniffs at the middle classes, which are the lowest breed not wearing livery he ever seems to have heard of.

One can most accurately describe Mr. Sitwell's interests by saying that they are similar to Max Beerbohm's: manners, whimsicalities, and questions of art treated in terms of a highly special personality. In both cases the personality has been conditioned by a social background which somehow seems the more formidable the more it is flouted. Neither man is in any sense a rebel against the upper-class tradition, as Shelley or even Byron may seem to have been; each is simply an enfant terrible inside the fold, and each is more concerned with pranks than with principles. But Max has always seemed at bottom a genuine, however frivolous, satirist of his own world, and has steadily proved that if he lacks the impulse openly to break with it, he possesses the sense to mimic and make fun of it; whereas Mr. Sitwell's attitude strikes me as something between a sneer and a caress. He uses his birthright where it is handy, helps himself to something else where it is not. He has not, of course, so much talent as Max. He has no literary charm; has nothing like the same humor or the same engaging playfulness or the same finished temperament, and has only so much personality as his oddities can furnish, where Max has more personality than he will ever need. These many little essays are neither good nor bad. They are very readable, sometimes clever, here and there exhilarating for their style. But nothing beyond that; and when you have finished them you forget what they are about, and only remember that Mr. Sitwell from his rather rococo tower has flung some pebbles on to the ground from which he steadfastly averts his gaze.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Borah, the Great Mystery Man

BORAH OF IDAHO. By Claudius O. Johnson. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

THIS is an extremely timely book, but it would have been warranted even if Senator Borah were not seeking the Republican Presidential nomination, for there has been no more baffling and contradictory figure in Washington these last thirty years, none to raise more continually the question why a man of such brilliant achievements, such profound legal knowledge, and such unquestioned ability has not gone farther and accomplished a great deal more in his political career. It was in Mr. Borah's power profoundly to influence the whole development of our national life, even to assure the existence of a great liberal-progressive party, with himself the head of it—if only he had been willing, like Theodore Roosevelt and Robert La Follette, to bolt his party and set up the standard of revolt. But when the crucial time came he was never ready to sunder party ties. He actually put off contending for the Presidential nomination until this year's campaign, when he is in his seventy-second year. Even then he started his quest too late to achieve his purpose of entering the Cleveland convention with a large number of delegates pledged to him. But far more important than any question of his personal advancement is the fact that his refusal to live up to his own teachings and expressed opinions and lead the American progressives has been a grave disservice to his country, since no one else has appeared to take the place of Robert La Follette, with the ability to build a liberal third party.

What does Mr. Johnson contribute to the elucidation of Borah's baffling, elusive, and self-contradictory character? He frankly admires him and is "tempted to say that history will place him by the side of Webster as an orator." Mr. Johnson rightly denies that his subject is the "Straddler Magnificent." But he admits that there is truth in the allegation that the Idaho Senator is the "Great Opposer." As to that he quotes Borah as saying, "Some of my best service has been in the things I have been able to prevent." Yes, the weakness of Senator Borah lies not in his persistent opposition but in his failure to oppose consistently and to keep up his fights to the end.

As for consistency, both the Senator and the biographer admit his inconsistency. Mr. Johnson quotes Borah as saying, "I do not know that consistency is a virtue of any particular worth." Mr. Johnson says that Mr. Borah "makes little effort

THIS $3 BEST SELLER
FREE!

special but complete edition with a 6-month subscription to COMMON SENSE. 4 REASONS why you should try COMMON SENSE: It contains the most complete news of the Third Party movement on every front; contains constructive articles on planning for a cooperative society in America and the transition to that society; is not a "forum" nor "debunker"; is rounded out with features, news, cartoons and humor.

"Ought to be read from Maine to California."

—Charles A. Beard

JOHN DOE PASSOS says:

"COMMON SENSE is a foundation upon which a new national press might be built."

COMMON SENSE 315 Fourth Ave. New York

Enclosed is $1.50. Send me a 6-month trial subscription to COMMON SENSE and the HEARST book absolutely FREE.

Name

Address

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

to establish a record for consistency." Yet inconsistency may often gravely damage a statesman's reputation for honesty, truthfulness, and trustworthiness, and cast doubt upon the sincerity of his intellectual processes. For example, let us take the case of Mr. Borah's attitude toward Mr. Hoover—a matter quite inadequately treated by Mr. Johnson, who does not even explain fully what brought about the final break between the two men and left Mr. Borah bitterly antagonistic to the ex-President. In 1918 and 1919 the Senator charged Herbert Hoover with "under the cover of honesty" permitting "the gathering of unconscionable profits from a charity fund." He went farther. He said, "No man who has such perverted views of decency ought to be intrusted with unlimited power to deal with $100,000,000." These charges related to Hoover's management of the Food Administration. And then in 1928 he recommended Mr. Hoover's election to the American people and declared that he was the man best fitted in all America to work out our national destiny! In other words, the man that he had charged with malfeasance in office, with permitting corruption, with assenting to the exploitation of the American people in war times by profiteers, had become a saint a decade later. When confronted with this inconsistency, Mr. Borah had nothing to say, no explanation to offer. Is it any wonder that his reputation as a reliable public guide suffered a great deal?

Indubitably the Senator has at times been rarely courageous, outspoken, ready to take up extremely unpopular causes which the ordinary politician dares not touch. But these things never happened when he was a candidate for reelection. Then he always forgot how he had denounced the Republican Party as unworthy of public trust and became once more its loyal and "regular" follower. It is painful to record (it is not recorded by Mr. Johnson) that in 1924, when Robert La Follette was running as a third-party candidate for the Presidency, Borah besought him for a letter indorsing his, Borah's, candidacy for reelection to the Senate, believing that such a letter was essential to his reelection. But when it came to standing by La Follette in return, Borah could do nothing beyond paying a tribute to La Follette's character. Finally, Mr. Johnson attributes "kindliness, frankness, unselfishness, truth, honesty, independence, courage, justice, reverence, righteousness, and common decency" to Senator Borah—but avoids any final judgment by saying, "but the man himself, his work, and his influence may be judged only by the relatively impartial tribunals of future generations."

All in all, while Mr. Johnson has made a notable contribution to our knowledge of the Senator, and has given us a valuable volume of reference, he has not advanced greatly the final solution of the Borah mystery. The book is extremely readable, is a genuine contribution to the history of American politics of recent years, and is certain to make friends for Mr. Borah. If it is incomplete in spots, allowance must, in justice, be made for the length of Mr. Borah's public career and the extraordinary number of issues for which he has fought, or which he has opposed. Especially valuable for future historians is the story of Borah's fight against the Treaty of Versailles. Mr. Johnson does not conceal the fact that after having for years opposed the soldiers' bonus in the Senate, Senator Borah finally yielded and voted for the bill to pay the veterans cash for their adjusted-pay certificates because the country needed, he thought, a larger volume of currency, because Congress had long since agreed to pay the veterans, and because many veterans were in great need in 1935. Thus did principle again yield to expediency.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A Month in SOVIET RUSSIA with EXPERTS

PRINCESS SKARIATINA'S GROUP

The old and new under leadership of one who knows both. With Tourist passage

$790

JULIEN BRYAN'S GROUP

Great centers and places seldom seen by tourists. With Third Class passage.....

$575

JOSHUA KUNITZ'S GROUP

A comprehensive itinerary. With Third Class passage

$469

Other trips of a month or more in Soviet Russia from $372

or you may travel on your own

Don't forget the
FOURTH MOSCOW THEATRE FESTIVAL
Sept. 1-10

BOOKLETS ON REQUEST

THE OPEN ROAD

12th floor

8 West 40th Street, New York

Cooperating with Intourist

The Workers University of MEXICO—invites YOU to attend its first Summer School Session

JUNE 29th to AUGUST 15th

Let the representatives of Modern Mexico inform you about the problems of their country.

(Regular summer school subjects, also)

Write for free illustrated catalogue and full information to:

WORKERS UNIVERSITY OF MEXICO

Rosales No. 26

Mexico City

or to Mexican Consuls and agents of the National Railways of Mexico throughout the United States.

New York City representative

JOSÉ MIGUEL BEJARANO

205 West 34th Street

New York, N. Y.

(Ours is the only Mexican Summer School whose certificates are accepted and endorsed by the Department of Education of Mexico.)

Shorter Notices

"SIR WALTER RALEGH: LAST OF THE ELIZABETHANS." By Edward Thompson. Yale University Press. $4.

"My main reason for writing this book," declares Mr. Thompson in his preface, "is that for nearly forty years Raleigh has been a major interest of mine." This unexceptionable motive has produced a long book of little significance either as literature or scholarship. It certainly does not displace the standard biographies of Edwards (1868) and Stebbings (1891). Nor does it contain any new original material. Of late years Raleighan research has centered around the events which brought Raleigh to the scaffold: his last voyage to Guiana—that desperate, hopeless, tragic expedition undertaken at the age of sixty-five after thirteen years' imprisonment in the Tower—and the concomitant diplomatic intrigue by which Count Gondomar, the Spanish Ambassador in London, induced King James to sacrifice Raleigh's life for the sake of peace with Spain. This is the period dealt with most fully by Mr. Thompson, who devotes 120 out of 400 pages to it. The only claim he makes for his book in the way of new material is that he has incorporated in a general life of Raleigh for the first time Edward Harlow's recent findings of original documents bearing on the fatal and mysterious voyage to Guiana. But Mr. Harlow in 1932 published the new documents himself, in an excellent book entitled "Raleigh's Last Voyage." There seems little excuse for rehashing the whole business, especially since Mr. Thompson himself in 1932 published a play called "The Last Voyage," which was all too solidly based on Mr. Harlow's documents. The best features of the present book are its footnotes, its bibliography, and its appendix listing the seventy-seven different contemporary spellings of Raleigh's name. The style is choppy and undistinguished. The quotations with which the book bristles are for the most part badly mangled. The surgery of quotations, which must be tenderly cut out of their context if they are not to bleed their flavor away, is an unknown art to Mr. Thompson, who just hacks out what he wants and uses it to patch his own stylistic nakedness. With all the facts at his command he fails to regiment them into any intelligible pattern, achieving the almost impossible task of making a dull narrative out of Raleigh's career.

ENGLISH COSTUME OF THE LATER MIDDLE AGES: THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH CENTURIES. Drawn and Described by Iris Brooke. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Working from Chaucer, the Paston letters, effigies on tombs, figures in illuminated manuscripts, and many lesser sources, Miss Brooke adds here the sixth volume to a charming series which now covers the principal changes in English costume from 1300 to 1900; and another volume, dealing with the early Middle Ages, is said to be in progress. Those who cannot afford the costly works familiar in this field will be grateful to Miss Brooke for the fund of information which she has supplied so expertly and at so reasonable a rate. Every right-hand page is filled with illustrations, some of them in color; and the opposite text is amazing for the ease with which it accomplishes the twofold aim of description and criticism. The series should be considered indispensable to students not only of English dress but of English literature and morals.

RECORDS

ANNOUNCEMENTS of the International Records Agency of Richmond Hill, New York, make American companies appear comparatively unadventurous. Listings are included not only from Western Europe, but from Japan, Australia, and Brazil. Consult Grove for the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Zielenski, Szamotulski, Gomolka, and Gorczycki, whose motets and psalms appear on the April list of the Polish Syrena Company. The French branch of Columbia lists a group of castanet solos by the Spaniard Roca, some with guitar accompaniments. There is also plenty of Handel, Mozart, and Brahms. Unfortunately, most of the prices are not available and one must buy sight unseen—or rather sound unheard; but A. J. Franck, who edits the announcements, makes intelligent and illuminating remarks on some of the releases.

The English branch of Victor, known as "His Master's Voice" or H. M. V., goes in for series of albums by one composer. Recent additions include the fifth volume of the Haydn Quartet Society, the fourth of the Sibelius Society, the second of the Mozart Opera Society, an album of Handel harpsichord suites played by Wanda Landowska, an album of Moussorgsky songs, and the fifth volume of the Wolff Lieder Society, reviewed some weeks ago in these columns. These may be heard and bought in the various shops that specialize in importations.

The most courageous, as it is the most expensive, of the H. M. V. "society" releases is the virtually complete recording of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" by the Glyndebourne Festival Company under Fritz Busch (twenty records in three volumes, $50). Parts of the recitatives are cut—and wisely for phonographic purposes—but all the rest of the brilliantly ironic music is there, performed with spirit and humor. The cast is not well known in America, and not all of the singing is up to the best Metropolitan standards. But that fact is not of prime importance, for Mr. Busch has obviously aimed at—and achieved—a beautifully balanced performance rather than a sample of star-system opera. The comparatively minor roles of Don Alfonso and Despina are done as well as or better than the quartet of lovers—which does not preclude brilliant singing by Miss Souez in the difficult "Come scoglio" aria. The recording is superb, and Walter Legge's annotated libretto is enlightening and unobtrusive.

A more reasonably priced set of importations worth looking into is a group recorded by Pathé from seven Lully operas. Particularly recommended are the Menuet from "Amadis" and an air from "Atys" coupled on a ten-inch record with a Menuet from "Proserpine" ($1.50) and arias from "Persée" and "Roland" sung by Solange Renaux (one record, $2).

Recent local Victor releases include a recording of the tone poem "Mihara Yama" by Claude Lapham, the talented director of the Victor Symphony Orchestra (one record, $1.50). This is a piece of program music, but we are not supplied with the story it has to tell. There are also the two intermezzi from Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna" brilliantly performed by the Minneapolis Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy, heir apparent of Philadelphia, with a fourth side devoted to the Coppelia Valse and Entr'acte (two records, $3). And if you have a fondness for waltzes played con amore, you can do much worse than look up the various recordings by Marek Weber and his orchestra, the latest of which is a "Waldteufel" potpourri (one record, $1.25).

HENRY SIMON

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

IDIOT'S DELIGHT. Shubert Theater. Robert Sherwood manages somehow to make a smashing theatrical success out of an anti-war play. With the Lunts and many other entertaining trimmings.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

GILBERT AND SULLIVAN REPERTORY. Majestic Theater. The same company which usually appears about this time of year in pleasant revivals. A weekly change of program.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

BURY THE DEAD. Ethel Barrymore Theater. A play against war based on a conceit of originality and power. While uneven, it is incomparably the best of the left-wing dramas seen this year.

BOY MEETS GIRL. Cort Theater. Rough-and-ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since "Once in a Lifetime."

Mark Van Doren says:

WE ARE FROM KRONSTADT. Amkino. A film of the Potemkin school, dealing with the red marines of 1919. Intermittently very interesting.

IT'S LOVE AGAIN. Gaumont British. An English song-and-dance picture, remarkable for the silliness of its plot and the childish charm of its heroine, Jessie Matthews.

MR. DEEDS GOES TO TOWN. Columbia. Directed by Frank Capra, and even better than "It Happened One Night." Gary Cooper as the rustic and quixotic Mr. Deeds is not only charming but meaningful, and the whole film has human importance.

PEG OF OLD DRURY. British and Dominion (Paramount). An eighteenth-century costume piece with Sir Cedric Hardwicke as David Garrick and Anna Neagle as Peg Woffington. Delightfully unhistorical.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Gaumont British. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

DUBROVSKY. Amkino. As romantic as Pushkin, on whose unfinished novel it is based. Not wholly successful, but interesting as a variation on the orthodox Russian theme.

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE

MOROSCO THEATRE, 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Wednesday & Saturday at 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:45

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:45
300 Seats at $1.10

["Quite apart from propaganda, it is a thrilling play."—William Lyon Phelps.]

"BURY THE DEAD"

The Drama That Startled the World by IRWIN SHAW
BARRYMORE THEATRE, 47 St. W. of B'y | Prices: Evgs. 50c to $2.00
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. 2:40 | Mats. Wed. & Sat. 50c to $1.50

SCHOOL

Announcing NEW LOW RATES

To make our School available to a more varied income group, we announce the new rate schedule herewith noted—to take effect at once for our 15th season starting September 23, 1936. Registrations are now being accepted under this plan. Prospectus on request.

$350 to $500
the Year

Including Tuition,
Noon Dinners and Supplies

BROOKLYN ETHICAL CULTURE SCHOOL

A Coeducational Day School from Kindergarten through 8th Grade—conducted on the same basic principles as the New York Ethical Culture School.

49-50 Prospect Park West, Brooklyn, New York
Telephone SOuth 8-4300

RESORT

THE PINE BROOK COUNTRY CLUB

For the Month of JUNE Features

GOLF TENNIS RIDING
SWIMMING BOATING HANDBALL

Plus Unusually Smart Musical Shows and THE GROUP THEATRE

Special Weekly Rates

For June

$25

Write for Booklet N

Pine Brook Country Club, Nichols, Conn.

Letters to the Editors

MILLIONS OF POETS

Dear Sirs: Thank you for calling my attention to Ben Belitt's unfortunate essay in the May 20 issue. I am happy that Mr. Belitt, who knows nothing about me, considers me "easily the most prosperous figure" among practicing anthology-makers today. (Creditors, please note!) I have striven for ten years to achieve this enviable monetary place, and to be recognized at last is success indeed. Will you kindly send a marked copy of Mr. Belitt's article to the Corn Exchange Bank, Sheridan Square branch, that they likewise may be convinced?

"Mr. Harrison . . . further outdoes himself by issuing . . . first volumes by such figures as Ruby Archer Gray, Vivian Yeiser Laramore, Mary Edgar Comstock, Edith L. Fraser, and Katharine Carasso," writes Mr. Belitt. Point of fact: the volumes by Mrs. Laramore and Miss Comstock were not first books. Surely, Mr. Belitt did not deliberately overlook mentioning that I have published the first books of Lucia Trent, Ralph Cheyney, Carl John Bostelmann, Samuel Heller, Royall Snow, Boris Todrin, Clyde Robertson, and a host of others whose work has been recognized by slightly more eminent critics than Mr. Belitt.

Since Mr. Belitt demands the privilege of his own opinion, he will be eager to grant me a like one. His approach to "Contemporary American Women Poets" proves that he wanted to find the poor things in the anthology rather than the good ones. And the book contains both. I was its publisher, not its critic. "The more redoubtable names, like Edna Millay, Louise Bogan, Marianne Moore, and others whose presence in such a volume is equally unaccountable are to be found only after the most exhausting scrutiny," writes Mr. Belitt, who wants us to believe that a book containing the work of Anna Hempstead Branch, Frances Frost, Harriet Monroe, Laura Benét, Martha Dickinson Bianchi, Helen Hoyt, Lizette Woodworth Reese, Katherine Garrison Chapin, Sarah N. Cleghorn, Elizabeth Coatsworth, Miriam Allen deFord, Babette Deutsch, Ethel Romig Fuller, Abbie Huston Evans, Helene Mullins, Sara Bard Field, Muriel Rukeyser, Hortense Flexner, Florence Kiper Frank, Amanda Benjamin Hall, Amory Hare, Gwendolen Haste, Josephine Johnson, Ruth Lech-litner, Agnes Lee, Marie Luhrs, Margery Mansfield, Marjorie Meeker, Susanna Valentine Mitchell, Grace Fallow Norton, Martha Ostenso, Marjorie Allen Seiffert, Constance Lindsay Skinner, Roberta Teale Swartz, Eunice Tietjens (would you like me to list more?) is an anthology to be dismissed because it likewise contains the work of poets unknown but good, and sometimes regrettably not so good.

As for "Contemporary American Men Poets," being edited by Thomas Del Vecchio, may I say that with the cooperation of poets and publishers (and I don't mean financial) this anthology will be the most significant yet published. Mr. Belitt is invited to contribute.

"Having dispensed with the men and women severally, he will move on to the infants." Too late, Mr. Belitt, a Southern publisher has just brought out an anthology of verse by children.

HENRY HARRISON

New York, May 20

Dear Sirs: Mr. Harrison is inclined to underestimate his peculiar status in the publishing world today when he declares he is unknown to myself; nor is he entirely unknown to certain of the "slightly more eminent critics" of whom he makes mention. I must confess that I was not deeply moved by the sad chronicle of Mr. Harrison's bank account, nor does the picture of Mr. Harrison grinding out volume after volume like pork sausage, with staggering losses to his income and nothing to sustain him but his disinterested devotion to the muse, affect me as anything but a pure whimsicality.

In the same way, I am unimpressed by the roster of poets whose volumes, issued under his imprint, I appear to have overlooked: Mr. Harrison is correct in his agreeable supposition that I did not "deliberately" overlook them. They are all cut from the same general cloth, and it was certainly at no time my sober intention to fill the pages of The Nation with a complete catalogue of his mid-winter publications. On one other score only is Mr. Harrison correct: it is indeed my wish—and I thought I had made it plain enough—to have Mr. Harrison and all interested parties "believe that a book containing the work of [all the poets named and all the others who might have been named at Mr. Harrison's neighborly invitation] is an anthology to be dismissed," deplored, and publicly exhibited as conclusive proof of why "Contemporary American Men Poets," now in preparation, should prove to be the least significant omnibus of its kind yet published. It needs hardly to be said that the essential point of my article has been curiously overlooked by Mr. Harrison in his unfortunate reply to my unfortunate essay. This, too, is unfortunate; but Mr. Harrison is the first to admit that he is a publisher, not a critic.

New York, May 20

BEN BELITT

THE VANITY PRESS RACKET

Dear Sirs: For a number of years I have been warning students and such members of the College Poetry Society as happened to question me against the whole of the "vanity" press. I was delighted, therefore, with Mr. Belitt's article and glad to see him name the worst of the profiteers of this industry. I have never known Mr. Harrison to publish in separate volumes any but third-rate poets. I have checked his anthologies and observed that when he includes better-known names, he usually reprints from books and must, therefore, be paying some copyright on the poems. Those unknown poets who contribute do so, doubtless, because, in their ignorance they believe themselves recognized by some critic or editor. The result is such padded, cheaply printed volumes as "Contemporary Women Poets," edited by someone else but obviously one of Mr. Harrison's projects. It is high time someone attacked the whole vanity-press racket.

EDA LOU WALTON

New York, May 20

TAKE OFF YOUR GLOVES!

Dear Sirs: I liked the spirit of Mr. Belitt's article and its presentation of the issue. But I wish it were a little more savage, a little more unreserved. Mr. Belitt seems to have on not only a kid glove, but a couple of well-lined gauntlets. (I grant, of course, that one of the gauntlets is thrown down, but I wish it had been with more force and less flourish.) After all, Harrison is Poetry's Public Enemy

No. 1, and should be met with machine-gun malice, not with gentility. I particularly liked the ridicule with which Mr. Belitt begins devastation after he gets going, and only regret that he pulled his punch until almost the middle of the article. Otherwise, I am happy that there is at least one sharpshooter sniping along in a Good Cause!

The inclusion of Millay, Bogan, and Marianne Moore is, I think, explained by the Acknowledgments. It seems obvious that Harrison, in spite of his announcement that "no payment can be made for accepted manuscripts," paid a fee to the publishers for a few "names" to give tone to the collection and to buy a bait to attract the suckers. He will probably buy a poem of Frost's, one of MacLeish's, and so on, until he has some six or seven names to dangle before his prospective men customers.

LOUIS UNTERMAYER

Ausable Forks, N. Y., May 14

POETS ARE NOT FOOLS

Dear Sirs: I want to congratulate The Nation for its publication of Ben Belitt's 127,000,000 Poets. For years my mail box has been stuffed with circulars from "vanity" publishers, and I believe that Mr. Belitt's article will do its share toward cutting down the more obvious of those appeals which are merely forms of exploitation in the name of poetry. Indirectly the practices of the vanity publishers have their economic consequences on the rates paid for poetry by legitimate publishers and magazine editors; the vanity publishers perpetuate the mistaken tradition in America that the poet is a fool, someone who is easily duped, someone who is so eager to see his name in print that he will pay a price for it. All this, of course, is false: the great majority of people who are anthologized by the publishers mentioned in Mr. Belitt's article are beneath serious criticism; they are, for the most part, I believe unfortunate people who have failed to receive adequate ego compensation in the occupation they have chosen, whether housewives or clubwomen, business men, lawyers, doctors, or journalists.

HORACE GREGORY

Bronxville, N. Y., May 15

FROM A VICTIM

Dear Sirs: I enjoyed reading 127,000,000 Poets because I am one of the fall guys. In 1930 I became foolish and sent poetic material to Richard G. Badger, 100 Charles Street, Boston, Massachusetts (you probably know all about him); I signed a contract and sunk $300. The Paeber Publishing Company of New York tried to hook me with flattery but I investigated them. Then the noble Dorrance and Company, of Philadelphia, tried to talk contract. I talked about money. No go.

Regarding anthologies, the Galleon Press of New York tried the flattery game again. So did Henry Harrison with his Poetry World—I asked for sample copies and got them.

This year I contributed verse to "Contemporary American Men Poets," which Mr. Belitt spoke of in his article, and refused to submit until I had an understanding that I did not have to purchase, but as you say, the whole business is so timed that you almost hate to refuse to subscribe. I did not subscribe.

I wonder if you know where I can get Laura Riding's and Robert Graves's 1928 "Pamphlet Against Anthologies."

V. T.

Morristown, N. J., May 15

FROM A LADY POET

Dear Sirs: Ben Belitt's splendidly written article concerning laboratory animals is at hand. I also happen to have a copy of "Contemporary Women Poets," and though I have had well over 800 verses (some call them poems) published in the last fourteen years I am not represented in that publication.

My experience with anthologies has been most happy . . . either from inclusion or merely from reading for happy moments or more serious references. . . . What if a dozen other publishing houses have put out inferior anthologies? Has Mr. Belitt ever shown constructive comprehensiveness in a concrete way like this? If so, I want some of it on my shelves. "Contemporary Women Poets," move over for a new neighbor. What if some names are unknown? Is Mr. Belitt, chaperoned and incubated by the most pessimistic Nation, the mentor of the 400 in poetry publications? Does he pay Mr. Harrison's gas bill, his light bill, his laundry bill? Does he pay his own laundry bill—or does he use a laundry? It seems his article, after the first glow of cleverness has passed, contains many unwashed turns of word and phrase. Does Mr. Belitt yearn for the job of advising Miss Millay where she shall see her verses in print? And if an extra Mrs. Smith out West or up North wants to hatch an extra nest of eggs to spring chicks to buy a book where her dream is in print, is Mr. Belitt tending to the nesting and pin-feather stage to young frying sale?

Mr. Belitt has really written a fine article for exhibitionism and space filling. If we had not already acquired a copy of Mr. Harrison's splendid anthology, we should acquire one at once and insist on an autograph too. The fact that The Nation is agin' it would make us, from previous experience, be assured it was good.

FRANCES M. LIPP, Director,

Brooklyn Writers' Group

Brooklyn, N. Y., May 15

OUR HUMBLE APOLOGIES!

Dear Sirs: Why don't you ladies and gentlemen look in the Daily News once in a while? I quote parts of our editorial of April 23, which are certainly pertinent to your criticism of the New York press for its attack on the parole system after the Titterton murder:

Several of our esteemed contemporaries are complaining that this case gives the parole system a black eye. We can't see that. Fiorenza had a police and jail and court record, true; and he was out on parole when he murdered Mrs. Titterton. But he had never been convicted of a sex offense. He was an auto thief primarily. . . . The worst the psychiatrists ever found about him was that he was a creature whose impulses sometimes got the better of him. Was that a reason for keeping Fiorenza in jail for life? And if not for life, when would it be certainly safe to let him out? . . . Even if it were wise, it would be economically impossible to keep every petty-larceny thief in jail for the rest of his life.

REUBEN MAURY, Editorial

Writer, the Daily News

New York, May 8

THANKS FROM LABOR

Dear Sirs: I am a subscriber to The Nation and a delegate to the Central Labor Council here. It is with pleasure and gratitude that we welcome Louis Adamic's splendid study of Harry Bridges and his factual delineation of our situation. The Labor Council will listen to the article in full at its next meeting. Also, Heywood Broun's page helps us to secure funds for the guild strike in Milwaukee. E. M. S. Oakland, Cal., May 6

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

STUART CHASE made a trip to the Tennessee Valley partly for pleasure and partly to get material for a forthcoming book on natural resources. Mr. Chase's last book was "Government in Business."

ALBERT VITON is the pseudonym of a journalist traveling in the Near East who had the good fortune from the standpoint of news to arrive in Damascus at the time of the general strike in February and March—his article General Strike in Damascus appeared in The Nation for April 8—and to reach Jerusalem in the midst of the Arab riots which he describes this week. From the standpoint of personal safety Mr. Viton is perhaps less fortunate. He writes under date of April 20: "I hope that I will not be killed before hearing from you—though one can never tell in this country. Not counting yesterday's Jaffa toll, some sixteen Jews have been removed to the nether world during the last four months."

M. E. RAVAGE is The Nation's Paris correspondent. He has been living abroad, principally in France, for the last eight years, with sojourns of varying length in Austria, the Balkans, Turkey, England, Spain, and Italy. He is the author of "The Malady of Europe," "An American in the Making," and other books, and has contributed to many American and European periodicals.

WALTER DURANTY, in his able dispatches to the New York Times, did much to make the Soviet revolution seem human and credible to American readers. Many of his news stories are incorporated in his latest book, "I Write as I Please."

OSCAR JASZI is professor of political science at Oberlin College. His informative articles on Central Europe have long been familiar to Nation readers.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER is the editor of "An Eighteenth Century Miscellany."

DAN RICO made the drawings in the article Vermont—State of Anarchy, in the issue of May 27. By an error the artist's name was given as Dan Reed.

RECORDS

R. C. A. Victor now presents
TOSCANINI

in magnificent performances of selections from LOHENGRIN, GOETTERDAMMERUNG, and SIEGFRIED IDYLL. This and all other Victor and Columbia Album Sets carried in stock—
At Substantial Savings.
Mail Orders Promptly Filled.

VESEY MUSIC SHOP

67 Vesey St., N.Y.C. Tel. CO. 7-5781

FOR SALE

5 acres to desirable neighbor. Peekskill vicinity. Large frontage, municipal water supply, beautiful panoramic view. Box # 765, c/o The Nation.

WANTED

Professional couple wants comfortable accommodations, including food, in country home for Summer. Commuting distance from New York. Limited Number of guests. Box # 764, c/o The Nation.

PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

YOUR MANUSCRIPTS RECONSTRUCTED criticised, written, for moderate fee or share in proceeds. Highest standards in all departments. Robert L. Newman, 251 West 71st, New York City. Tel. En 2-4146.

TUITION

SPINOZA—KANT—SCHOPENHAUER taught and clarified from the text, privately or in small groups, for serious students desiring thorough knowledge. $10 Monthly. Box # 771, c/o The Nation.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Editorial: professional, newspaper, magazine background. Intelligent, adaptable. Interested in any position offering responsibility and advancement. Box # 761, c/o The Nation.

Young Man, executive secretary, 26, married, seeks permanent responsible position with future; well educated; 9 years' diversified experience, including six years in motion picture industry; supervision correspondence, office details; will travel; has automobile; excellent references. Box # 770, c/o The Nation.

Intelligent, middle-aged woman of varied experience desires position as companion. Any location. Box # 756, c/o The Nation.

HELP WANTED—FEMALE

Consumers national buying club seeks stenographer-correspondent, advertising, publicity experience; start $15. Assist volunteer workers. "Cooperative," 19 West 31 St.

CHILDREN WANTED

Like 3 children spend Summer in Connecticut. Ideal surroundings. $30 Monthly. Call Taylor, before 10:30 A.M. CHelsea 3-2523.

FOR RENT

Now RENTING at

SUNRISE

LAKE BUNGALOW COLONY

Cozily furnished Cabins and Rooms in Smart Adult Camp. Country Club Atmosphere. Hr. N. Y. Lacka. R.R. Free Handball, Tennis, Boating, Dancing.  available. Golf nearby.

E. ABRAMS, Mendham Rd., Morristown, N. J.

Bungalows and tents at HILBERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y. Tennis court. Telephone Bert Friedberg, MUrray Hill 4-8884.

Charming, artistic country home, all improvements, magnificent view, Croton-on-Hudson, 35 miles from N. Y. C. Call WOorth 2-1370.

Magnificent 3½ room apt. L shaped living room—foyer, 33x27x16, charmingly furnished, river view, Mason-Hamlin, radio, library, 3 exposures, sacrifice. Call Rlv. 9-5432.

THE BROADLANE (220 Beach 20 St., Far Rockaway)—Overlooking the ocean. Seashore and country combined. Furnished modern apartment. Private bath. Reasonable. For information call Schneider, CLarkson 2-8504.

3 Rooms, screened porch. Fireplace. Modern plumbing. Electric refrigeration. Swimming and boating. 80 miles from New York. Season $150. Box # 766, c/o The Nation.

Two Room Gypsy Cottage. Furnished. On edge of sunny swimming pool. Up a country lane. Fifty-three miles from New York. $150 for year. Marie Barrell, 729 Seventh Avenue, BRyant 9-5397.

Apartment, furnished, to rent for Summer months; overlooking Botanical Gardens and near Prospect Park Plaza in Brooklyn; 6 rooms with double exposure; airy and cool. Large library; modern furniture; tenant must furnish highest references. Sacrifice $85 a month. Box # 767, c/o The Nation.

West 105th Street, 172, Large, light, private rooms, conveniences, shower, telephone. $5.00 up. Hammond.

Charming four room cottage, furnished, all improvements, fireplace. Commuting distance N. Y. Accommodates 4 to 6 persons. Handball on premises. Golf, tennis, nearby. $200 Season. ATwater 9-2444.

Unusual studio-cottage, furnished. Secluded countryside overlooking trout brook. Fireplace, terrace, improvements. Commuting distance. WAtkins 9-3094. Peekskill 2325-W.

Writer's colonial 10 room house, 2 baths, completely furnished, newly decorated, swimming nearby, 1½ acres. Long season. Reasonable. Ted Shane, North Salem Road, Ridgefield, Conn.

Cottage on Mt. Beacon, 60 miles N. Y. C. Beautiful view, easily accessible, telephone, 5 rooms, bath, porches. $150. season. Box # 773, c/o The Nation.

SUBLET

Teacher's 5 room outside apartment. Kingsbridge Road. Charmingly furnished, piano, radio, library, electric refrigeration, cross ventilation. Box # 768, c/o The Nation.

July and August. $75 Monthly. Furnished six room house, garage; suburban wooded Yonkers. Twenty minutes from Columbia Univ. References. Ralph, 18 LeRoy Ave., Yonkers, N. Y.

5 Rooms, elevator, modern, bright, airy, near Columbia University. Sublet June-Sept. $50 month. Apt. 21, 527 W. 124 St.

Large studio, kitchenette, modern, furnished, including free telephone. Centrally located. Reasonable. June-Sept. 586 Lexington Ave. (51 St.). Solomon.

3 months. 4 large, airy, quiet, tastefully furnished rooms. Elevator, refrigeration, library, radio. Reasonable. 312 W. 20 St. CHe 2-4429.

Skylight studio apartment 20x20. 2 Rooms, kitchenette, refrigeration, furnished. 4 Flights. July, August, September. $45 monthly. CHelsea 3-3281—10 A.M.

July and August, six room furnished apartment in Sunnyside, two baths and sun porch, suitable two families. $80 Monthly—NEwtown 9-8377.

July and August. 4½ room penthouse, lower Manhattan, River view, attractively furnished, grand piano. Sacrifice rental. Call DRydock 4-1374.

BLOOMSBURY—LONDON. To let July-September. Modern furnished flat, three large rooms, kitchen, bath, balcony on Brunswick Square, garden, tennis. Terms moderate. Lowe, 1 Brunswick Square, London, W.C. 1.

MISCELLANEOUS

Traveler, experienced, gentleman taking car England, Norway, Sweden, can accommodate one or two extra paying passengers. Sailing around June 15. References exchanged. Box # 763, c/o The Nation.

PAINTER driving California end of June in new car would like congenial partner, experienced driver. Share expenses. 2 Months stay. Box # 758, c/o The Nation.

Across continent vacation—Young teacher with new Ford wants driving passengers paying all her expenses. Box # 769, c/o The Nation.

FOR RENT

Attractive bungalow, 50 miles New York, 3 rooms, sleeping porch, modern improvements, swimming. 40 acres, beautiful country. CAnal 6-1840. Weekends call Cold Spring 274-F 11.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · JUNE 10, 1936

NUMBER 3701

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

THE MASK IS TORN AWAY	727
CALIBAN IN AMERICA	728
1940 IS JUST AROUND THE CORNER	729
THE UNFINISHED BUSINESS OF CONGRESS	730
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	731
HARVARD HERETICS AND REBELS by Roger N. Baldwin and Corliss Lamont	733
MILITARIZING THE PHILIPPINES by Harold E. Fey	736
TVA: THE NEW DEAL'S BEST ASSET by Stuart Chase	738
THE METHODISTS RETREAT by Paul Hutchinson	742
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	744
BROUN'S PAGE	745
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
JUSTICE HOLMES: FLOWERING AND DEFEAT by Max Lerner	746
TRADITION FOR TRADITION'S SAKE by William Troy	747
THE RANGE OF ENGELS by Harold J. Laski	748
"DREAM'S ENTERPRISE" by Eda Lou Walton	749
FALLACIES OF LIFE INSURANCE by L. Seth Schnitman	750
DISSENTING OPINION by Dorothy Van Doren	751
MR. PRALL'S AESTHETIC by Eliseo Vivas	752
RADIO by Heywood Broun	752
FILMS: FURTHER DOCUMENTS by Mark Van Doren	753
DRAWINGS by Georges Schreiber, William Steig, and William Gropper

MAX LERNER

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

The Shape of Things

*

THE CORPORATE-SURPLUS TAX BILL HAS BEEN altered by the Senate Finance Committee beyond all recognition. Instead of a measure directed at the elimination of one of the gravest weaknesses of our economic system—the failure of the big corporations to distribute their earnings—it has presented us with a revenue measure with social trimmings. Certain features of it are excellent. We welcome the increase of the corporation tax to a maximum of 18 per cent, the 7 per cent surtax on undistributed corporate profits, and the increased surtax on individual incomes. But there is a basic weakness in the measure. At least nine-tenths of the stock in large corporations is held by individuals possessing incomes of over $10,000 annually. Under the Senate bill all dividends paid to such individuals will be subject to a normal tax of 4 per cent and a surtax of at least 6 per cent. This will place a premium on the retention of corporate profits unless some stronger dynamite than a straight 7 per cent tax can be found to blast it out. We welcome the President's determined stand for the retention of a graduated tax on surpluses in the face of a tory opposition. But as we suggested in a previous issue, there should also be a re-examination of the possibilities of a real enforcement of Section 102 of the present revenue law, with a heavy penalty tax for corporate surpluses above a reasonable level. Without these provisions the proposed measure will achieve nothing in reforming the corporate structure, whatever may be its efficacy in getting revenue.

*

THE SEAMEN'S STRIKE IN NEW YORK WHICH has just ended served to make the public more conscious of safety at sea than it had been before; it also served as a warning to the conservative officials of the International Seamen's Union that the same thing can happen on the East Coast that happened on the West. There the Maritime Federation organized by Harry Bridges provided a means by which rank-and-file locals could band together to fight their battles directly with the employers instead of having their strength sapped and their demands ignored by job-holding officials who get on much better with the shipping companies than with their own membership. The result of the settlement is that the New York strikers have at least won a hearing for their grievances before the executive board of the I. S. U. They have gained valuable experience in organized action, and have made a start toward the house-cleaning that has been long overdue in the maritime unions. The public is coming off much worse in the matter of safety at sea. The publicity given to specific charges made by the striking seamen when they visited Secretary Roper some weeks ago forced him to promise an investigation. It was to be conducted by a committee representing the Treasury, Commerce, and Justice departments—but not the Labor Department. Now, however, Mr. Roper has called off his proposed investigation. It would overlap, he says, another investigation planned by a committee appointed by Senator Copeland, which contains, among others, some of the worst of the officials of the seamen's union. Perhaps that is true. Perhaps any investigation supervised by Mr. Roper would be just as ineffective as any investigation supervised by Senator Copeland, whose attitude toward the shipping owners is well known.

*

THE EARL OF DUDLEY'S INVITATION TO THE American steel industry to affiliate with the International Steel Cartel dramatizes the dilemma which confronts capitalism in all highly industrialized countries. Faced by intensified competition at home and abroad, industry is impelled to reach across national boundaries to form agreements for price regulation and a division of markets. At the same time there is a powerful tendency for domestic producers to seek higher tariff rates, thus destroying the very fabric of international organization. Both forces are playing upon the steel industry at the present moment. The drive for adherence to the international cartel may prove irresistible. Yet W. A. Irvin, president of the United States Steel Corporation, recently complained in an address before the American Iron and Steel Institute that dumping of foreign steel was becoming increasingly prevalent and asked for a tariff that would protect American industry against "the pauper labor rates of foreign countries." From an economic standpoint there can be little doubt that international agreement is preferable to open tariff warfare, but either tendency may be anti-social in practice. Cartels are merely trusts projected into the international sphere. They are most likely to be efficient where domestic industry is highly centralized. But like domestic monopolies their fundamental purpose is to raise prices, restrict production, and thereby eliminate the consumers' last safeguard under what is still euphemistically known as the "competitive system."

*

SINCE THE RIGHTS OF WOMEN SEEM TO BE increasingly under attack these days, we are especially sympathetic toward the proposed equal-rights amendment to the Constitution, which has just been favorably reported upon by the subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee. If democracy were more a matter of justice and less a matter of group pressures, the right of women to equal status with men would have been recognized long ago; for there is no ground either of justice or expediency on which legal discrimination against them can be logically defended. It is a striking commentary on the rapacity of our economic system that part of the opposition to the amendment is based on the argument that it endangers legal discriminations in favor of women. A group of women headed by that veteran exponent of women's rights, Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, has announced that the amendment is "prejudicial to the economic interests of women" because it will deprive women workers of such safeguards against greedy and irresponsible employers as are provided by laws prescribing minimum wages, maximum hours of work, standards of safety—laws which, they contend, have also indirectly benefited men wage-earners. Leaving aside the fact that the researches of the Women's Bureau have found these safeguards to be of rather doubtful benefit to women workers, there seems to be no good reason why men workers should be left to secure indirectly and fortuitously such benefits as social legislation may guarantee. The proposed amendment, if it becomes law, will add fuel to the movement for legal safeguards that shall apply to men and women workers equally. And we can see no cause for lamentation in that.

*

THE OUTCRY FROM PUERTO RICO AGAINST the terms of the Tydings independence bill has apparently killed that measure for the present session of Congress. American residents of the island declare that the bill aroused a wave of hysteria, bitterness, and anti-Americanism such as had never previously been experienced. Conservative leaders of the coalition government have always opposed independence, and have resented the Tydings bill as an attempt to undermine their rule. The Liberal Party has had an independence plank in its platform for some time, but many of its leaders look upon the present bill as an attempt to discredit independence by coupling it with economic suicide. While favoring independence on any terms, the Nationalists have also refused to credit the good faith of the Tydings plan. If the purpose behind the proposal was to restore American prestige in Latin America preparatory to the pan-American peace conference, that objective has been defeated by the obvious injustice of the bill's economic provisions. Although the injury to our prestige is deep-seated, the damage is by no means irreparable. We welcome the creation of a Senate committee to study the issue, and trust that it will utilize the time between now and the next session of Congress to draft a program which recognizes American responsibility for the present economic status of the island and provides for a far more gradual assumption by Puerto Ricans of the economic responsibilities of independence.

*

GERMANY'S VICIOUS LUNGE AT THE ROMAN church in the mass trial at Coblenz of 276 monks affords new evidence of the ruthless disregard of justice which characterizes the totalitarian state. Based on evidence which, as the outside world has known for some time, the Nazis have been busy faking and fabricating, wholesale charges of sexual perversion are being brought against the accused. Two have already been sentenced to four and eight years' penal servitude, respectively, and in view of the fact that some witnesses for the prosecution are feeble-minded charity wards of the monasteries, there is not much hope for the others. That the particular stick of immorality should be chosen by the authorities to beat the Catholics with bears testimony to their determination not only to break the power of the Roman church but also to discredit it in the eyes of the people. As the court proceedings are secret and the only reports which reach the public are official, the attack will be partially successful. This is the more true because the Catholic church has no weapon at hand but the courage of its leaders. In the days of the first Kulturkampf it could fight back through the powerful Center Party, but since the dissolution of that party in 1933 and the suppression of the Catholic press the church is in no position to defeat Hitler as it did Bismarck.

*

HARVARD HAS CHOSEN AN IMPRESSIVE AND deserving list of scholars on whom to bestow academic knighthood at the Tercentenary, and they are to be congratulated on receiving the accolade of America's oldest and most honorable institution of learning. From all corners of the world the scholars will be coming to Cambridge—from all corners but one. No one has been invited from the Soviet Union. Because of its tradition of cultural independence Harvard has produced many men of progressive thought. It is regrettable that the university should now belie that tradition.

*

THE EDITORS OF THE NATION WISH TO thank the public-utility companies for giving additional point and news value to the series of articles on the TVA by Stuart Chase, the second of which appears in this issue. The series was planned because we felt that the TVA was of continuing importance and ought to be reckoned with in the campaign as the most impressive achievement of the Roosevelt Administration. By what must have seemed almost a matter of collusion, nineteen public-utility companies banded together—in the very week in which the first Chase article appeared—to file suits attacking the TVA. It will be remembered that the Supreme Court's decision in the Ashwander case on February 17 reached only to the Wilson Dam, and held that the federal government had built it legally (using the defense power and the power to aid navigation) and could therefore dispose of the electric energy generated by it, even to the extent of purchasing transmission lines in order to bring the electric power to market. But the decision was deliberately a restricted one. What is now sought is a determination of the constitutionality of the entire TVA. It will undoubtedly be attacked on the ground that the government is aiming not at limited objectives but at the social welfare of the Tennessee Valley. Absurdly enough, the government will have to deny that it has at heart anything as outlawed and cowering as social welfare. And even more absurdly, it is not beyond possibility that the court may hold in its next term that the TVA is unconstitutional, that the federal government must restrict itself to national defense and leave all matters of social welfare—to whom?

The Mask Is Torn Away

ONE thing the Supreme Court majority may be credited with is a sense of climax. Any other tribunal might have been hard put to discover a fitting end for a term of court which has included the decisions in the AAA case, the rice millers' processing-tax case, the Jones SEC case, the St. Joseph's stockyards case, the Guffey coal case, the Vermont income-tax case, the Mayflower Farms case, the municipal-bankruptcy case, and the commodity-clause case. But the judges have triumphantly rounded out their term of court just ended by invalidating the New York minimum-wage law in the Tipaldo case. And as if to give us that thrill of recognition that may be the essence of great art, they have—with a nostalgia for the past cases—again made the decision a 5-to-4 affair. The court majority must be thanked at least for the consistency with which it has held to its reactionary stand.

The decision in the Tipaldo case had been awaited with a good deal of tension. Upon it depended not only minimum-wage laws for women in New York and other states, but any kind of genuine attempt to enforce adequate labor and social legislation by the states. We commented on the case in an earlier issue, when it was declared unconstitutional in a narrow and mechanical 4-to-3 decision by the New York Court of Appeals, basing itself upon a previous Supreme Court decision in the Adkins case, which involved a federal law for the District of Columbia. It was sheer pressing social necessity which had led the New York legislature to frame the law, and in framing it they had sought deliberately to meet the objections raised by Justice Sutherland in the Adkins decision. They had provided, in an attempt to meet the taboo of the due-process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, that the minimum wage rates were to be based not only on the cost of subsistence living but also on the fair value of the services.

In the majority decision Justice Butler, who developed his sense of humanity and justice as a railway lawyer in Minnesota, repeats in various laborious ways that there is no difference between this case and that involved in the Adkins decision. What New York was trying to do, he says in effect, was to take away from the women laundry workers without due process of law their "liberty of contract"—their right to work for less than a subsistence wage if they saw fit. Chief Justice Hughes, in a belated transfer to the group of dissenters, tries just as laboriously to show all the differences between this case and the Adkins case. But it is left for Justice Stone, in a second minority opinion, to brush aside the technicalities of both Butler and Hughes. In a memorable dissent that deserves to be quoted in full, he refers to "the grim irony in speaking of freedom of contract" in the case of women who have to "give their services for less than is needful to keep body and soul together."

But to no avail. While eloquence, sense, logic, humanity, and sheer economic sanity go with the dissenters, the decision goes with the majority. Three things have now become clear, if they were not clear before. First, the court majority is determined to stop at nothing in its savage destruction of every attempt to enact social legislation or control business. Second, the real issue is not between federal power and states' rights. A state act and not a federal act is involved here. The mask of judicial rhetoric has been torn again from the face of the Supreme Court majority. Third, the aim of the Supreme Court majority is not to defend states' rights, but to freeze the movement of economic change. Its bias is for the dominant economic class in a jungle laissez faire economy. It will go to any lengths to distort the plain and obvious meaning of constitutional phrases, or to ignore the economic facts that are patent to a schoolboy, if by doing so it can maintain undisturbed the halcyon serenity of profits-as-usual.

An amendment to the Constitution granting clear powers to Congress would not, on the face of it, deal directly with the power of the New York legislature to enact social legislation. Yet indirectly it would prove completely effective. If Congress were clearly given by the Constitution a power which the Supreme Court denied to New York, there would no longer be any incentive for the court to don its mask of states'-rights rhetoric. It could no longer protect the vested interests in this fashion. And we should no longer have to content ourselves with minimum-wage laws for women alone. Social legislation and labor legislation should meet the needs of the working class as a whole. For that purpose, we must repeat with wearisome iteration, a constitutional amendment is necessary.

Caliban in America

PAUL WARD'S article elsewhere in this issue on the forces behind the Black Legion gives rise to some extremely disturbing reflections. If it is true that this monstrous organization is not just a grim excrescence on American life but something that has been built into the structure of American business and politics, the Black Legion is worth serious analysis.

"Remember that our purpose is to tear down, lay waste, despoil, and kill our enemies." These are the words read by the "Chaplain" of the Black Legion to those about to be initiated into the order. Standing "under the black arch of Heaven's avenging symbol," encircled by grim, black-hooded figures, staring half-hypnotized at the guns pointed at them, the neophytes are inducted with the Black Oath, by which they swear "in the name of God and the Devil . . . to devote my life to the obedience of my superiors . . . and to exert every means in my power for the extermination of the anarchist, communist, Roman hierarchy, and their abettors." Each prospective member must swear he is a native-born, white, Protestant, Gentile, American citizen; he must state his attitude on lynch law; he must agree to arm himself immediately and to take arms, when called upon, against his "enemies." He must do all in his power to place only white Protestants in office; he must forget party and vote only according to the orders of his superior officer; he must accept the punishment of death for failure to keep his oath. When he has promised to do all this he is ready to sign in his own blood his willingness, if required, "to perform some service on a higher plane than ordinary routine night riding." What this "service" is, a body found lying in a ditch next day could testify.

Fire, flogging, and death are the methods favored by the legionnaires in their program of terrorism, although they have not neglected the subtler but none the less powerful weapon of propaganda. Police raids on their headquarters have uncovered leaflets for distribution replete with horror tales about Negroes attacking white children in the schools and advocating segregation of the races. But in general their preference is for the brutal rather than the subtle, for the direct attack rather than the indirect. There is reason to suspect that the burning of Father Coughlin's shrine at Royal Oak may have been their doing, and their fierce anti-radicalism has led the police to reinvestigate the shooting of one automobile-union organizer in 1933 and the murder of another in 1934.

Just how large the membership of the legion is may never be determined. The claim of six million members seems nearer to wish fulfilment than to fact. But the activities of the legion, although concentrated in Michigan, Indiana, and Ohio, extend to a dozen or more other states, with repercussions as far east as Boston and New York. The Department of Justice, however, has so far declined to cooperate in the investigation because no evidence has yet been found of violation of a federal statute. To proceed against the individuals involved in the "execution" of Poole on a direct murder charge leaves untouched the structure of the organization as a whole. The federal kidnaping law cannot be invoked unless victims are transported across state lines. Prosecution on the ground of illegally carrying firearms is prohibitive in this case as it would involve apprehending each of the legion members in the actual possession of a gun. And though there is a law in Michigan against wearing masks in public, it makes this no more than a misdemeanor. There is, however, one statute under which a statewide indictment could be issued that might effectively shatter the legion as far as Michigan is concerned. It is the Michigan criminal-syndicalism law. There is the spice of poetic justice in the fact that the Black Legion may be demolished under the very law which their kind put on the statute books to confound their enemies.

What is the meaning of the Black Legion? To dismiss it as a local and passing matter would be fantastic; to call it American fascism would be too easy. Race hatred, religious bigotry, sadism, red-baiting, union-smashing, the vigilante technique—whenever these are found together in a pattern they point to a festering condition in the social organism. We cannot be so naive as to think that seven years of depression could have failed to take toll of us. We live in a world where the individual is at the mercy of the blind forces of the market-place. Formerly when he thought himself ruled solely by nature's forces and changes, he could fashion religions and mythologies to appeal to the natural forces, and science to control them. Today the individual sees himself as even more helpless in a man-made industrial world, in which nature has been conquered but depressions still come unpredictably, where jobs are suddenly lost and life-long savings are wiped out overnight, where the small man is stunted by all sorts of privations. And, still seeking some specific explanation for his defeat and some personal devils to wreak his wrath upon, he resorts to the mumbo-jumbo of secret societies and the releasing effects of violence and terrorism.

He is not necessarily a monster. Look at the newspapers or newsreels and see the faces of those indicted for the murder of Poole. They are the ordinary run of Americans. Under other conditions they might have been honest farmers, or young leaders of the rank-and-file workers. But under the impact of all the corroding forces of the depression, their energy has been turned to a deadly destructiveness. It is easy to put such men as these to the uses of the unscrupulous holders of economic power, who see in the trade-union movement and in minority groups a threat to their dominance. A desire to wreak cruelty and terror always goes hand in hand with a slavish obedience to authority. The very men whose animal lusts are turned against their fellows get a sense of security from taking an undying oath to perform all the commands of some leader. In their despair they follow the first leaders that appeal to them. In their ignorance they make bigotry and race hatred and anti-radicalism seem the solution for their own dilemmas. In their blindness they fall a prey to the purposes of the very men who exploit them economically.

This is the Black Legion—a reincarnated Caliban. It sprawls across the American scene, twisted, spiteful, stupid, and malevolent. And yet there is much in it to pity, and much to understand. We must fight all Black Legions wherever they appear, and disband them by law. But we shall not be rid of them until we have rid America of insecurity and despair.

1940 Is Just Around the Corner

THE Socialist convention has met and split. Norman Thomas and his left-wing supporters have set up a national ticket with a general Socialist platform and specific recommendations to meet immediate problems. If the vote this will muster is bound to be small, it will at least keep the Socialist light burning; and if it serves to fool the Tories into believing that radicalism is waning in this country it will contribute to the benevolence of a growing season that promises to be much more favorable for a political labor movement than might be expected in a world blighted by fascist droughts.

While the left wing and a membership majority of the Socialist Party follow Thomas into splendid isolation on the left, the right wing, controlling Socialist institutions and a good share of the Socialist trade-union vote, will join official labor in supporting Roosevelt. Meanwhile, the Farmer-Labor conference in Chicago has abandoned the idea of the immediate formation of a third national political party.

The decision of the left not to draw away support from Roosevelt by pressing for a national Farmer-Labor ticket this year grows out of the preoccupation with the danger of fascism; the Socialist Party platform is deeply concerned with the same question. Meanwhile it becomes clearer week by week that the decision of John L. Lewis and the Non-Partisan League to throw labor's support to Roosevelt this year was made not from a generalized fear of reaction but with the hope of a very specific advantage. It aims to keep Republican weeds from choking the first sprouts of an industrial labor movement.

From the organizational point of view this is sound strategy. If labor were still nursing the illusion that collective bargaining could be legislated into effect, there would be reason for regarding its support of Roosevelt as disastrous. But it has been thoroughly demonstrated in Roosevelt's first term that his well-intentioned laws do not enforce themselves. At the same time Section 7-a whetted labor's appetite for organization. And even if the New Deal labor laws cannot be more than partly effective, it is infinitely better to have Lloyd Garrison and Warren J. Madden and other genuinely conscientious men repeatedly calling public attention to the existence of these laws and to their flagrant violation by the big employers than to have a Republican President's appointees burying collective bargaining under six feet of silence. In the matter of civil liberties, the Roosevelt Administration has paid much less attention than it should have to shocking local violations. But there is no denying that the national air of the New Deal is expansive rather than suppressive—which will be of immense help in a national campaign to organize labor. Especially if the present relative recovery persists, a second Roosevelt term pretty well insures a political climate in which John L. Lewis and his industrial-union associates can get on with organization in the mass-production industries. By 1940 labor may be able to nominate not a "protest" candidate but a serious contender for national power.

The time is short, however, and numerous obstacles must be overcome. The first enemy line is the executive council of the American Federation of Labor. The automobile workers have succeeded in throwing off its narrow control. The organization of steel is being delayed temporarily by the tactics of its officers. Despite a clear mandate from the membership for immediate action the officers have so far succeeded in keeping the lid closed tight. Rank-and-file pressure is increasing, however, and that old mine worker, J. Lewis, is doing his best to help the members dislodge their officials. The latest threat of the executive council—to suspend the charters of the unions in the Committee for Industrial Organization if the committee is not immediately dissolved—is the most ominous so far. It remains to be seen whether the die-hards will actually break up the federation in order to hang on to their craft power. The council is said to be bearing down hard on its only member from the C. I. O., David Dubinsky of the I. L. G. W. U., and upon other progressives who value A. F. of L. affiliation. But there is at least a strong chance that the council's innate inertia will keep it from being as vindictive as it would like to be. It is to be hoped that the final showdown will come quickly, so that labor can consolidate its fighting strength against employers.

The function of the left progressive groups in these next crucial years is above all one of clarification and education. No radical party has had sufficient success in this country to assume that its approach or its method is infallible or that its knowledge of the most complicated and the most puzzling country in social history is either dependable or complete. Never before was there such need for that humility, that absolute honesty, which opens the eyes and sharpens the wits of the scientist. We must have general principles, tested always by pragmatic action. A socialized future is the only adequate political solution for a mass-production world. To chart the specific American path to that future is our primary task.

The Unfinished Business of Congress

ALTHOUGH agreement on the tax bill appears as remote as ever, Congressional leaders are still talking in terms of a June 6 adjournment. No one really expects the entire legislative slate to be wiped clean by that date, but it is obvious that the members of Congress intend to bolt for home as soon as they have a pretext for doing so. This is election year, and by a curious quirk in our electoral system the average Congressman's chances for reelection seem to be in inverse ratio to his attention to duty in Washington.

Some of the bills endangered by an early adjournment are presumably favored by the Administration and would have a good chance of passage if they could be called up for a vote. Perhaps the most important of these is the Wagner-Ellenbogen housing bill, which, though a feeble substitute for a real housing measure such as was promised by the Administration, has the indorsement of organized labor and of all the leading housing authorities. With a fifth of our urban housing classified as "unfit for use" by the Real Property Inventory of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, it is obvious that a year's delay on this measure would be little short of criminal. Yet the bill will be sidetracked unless public pressure forces a last-minute change of heart on the part of the Administration. The same may be said of the various anti-lynching bills now before Congress. Year after year bills are introduced for dealing with this crime in the only way that is possible—by federal action—only to be brushed aside in the rush of eleventh-hour business. The Bankhead farm-tenant bill, to which the President stands committed, is likewise in great danger of being overlooked in the scramble.

Administration spokesmen have indicated that the omnibus flood-control bill and the proposals for regulating the commodity exchanges will probably be passed before adjournment, although there is no certainty that this will be the case. The new Guffey bill, which contains the dubious price-fixing regulations of the former law without any of its admirable labor provisions, is also likely to go through. The ship-subsidy bills, on the other hand, appear to be doomed despite the President's anxiety to have this particular form of graft put on an "honest" basis. Although there is little likelihood that Congress would turn away the importunate shipowners if the proposals came to a vote, the inability of the shipping ring to agree on details of the handout has prevented action at this session.

A few weeks ago proponents of stricter regulation of the food, drug, and cosmetics industries were fighting desperately to get the food-and-drug bill enacted. Now that the Copeland bill has been reported out by the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, they are more than willing to forgo action at this time. For the committee's revisions of the pending bill have made it worse than existing legislation in several important respects. That the Frazier-Lundeen social-insurance bill has not come up for debate in either house is scarcely surprising. Despite the brief and on the whole very favorable hearings held by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, Administration tactics have been designed to prevent as far as possible the discussion of a proposal which would reveal the shortcomings of its own unfortunate Social Security Act. Much the same fate appears to have befallen the Ellenbogen bill for the regulation of wages and hours of textile workers and the bill to repeal the law forbidding the teaching of communism in the District of Columbia.

Merely to list the other bills which would be "must" legislation for a really socially minded Administration would take more space than we have at our disposal. There is, for example, the Neely-Pettengill bill, which would make it illegal for moving-picture producers to force their inferior films on the local theaters by means of "block booking"; the Van Nuys bill to prevent employers from influencing the votes of their employees; the Copeland bill, liberalizing existing legislation against the dissemination of birth-control information; the Wheeler-Crosser bill, requiring railroads to pay dismissal allowances to workers who are displaced by consolidations; and the Marcantonio bill for unemployment relief. There are also many bills which should be passed after revision. On such a list would appear the Kerr-Coolidge alien bill. This bill, which has the backing of the Department of Labor, is designed to alleviate the severity and injustice of the regulations which have operated to separate husbands and wives, and would deal more leniently with non-criminal aliens in general. It stands in need, however, of modification which would permit the Secretary of Labor to exercise discretion in cases of political deportees.

Perhaps it is too much to ask any Congress to enact such an amount of legislation in one session. In the past five months just two important measures have been passed: the soldiers' bonus and the substitute farm plan to replace the invalidated AAA. Yet only three years ago a Congress of much the same composition as the present one distinguished itself by the enactment of at least a dozen laws more far-reaching and more controversial than any measure debated by the present Congress. The failure of the present Congress may be attributed partly to the improvement in economic conditions, partly to the fact that this is an election year, but primarily to the lack of effective leadership from the President.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Who's Behind the Black Legion?

Washington, May 31

THE constant trumpeting of the New Deal's campaign slogan, Roosevelt or Reaction, with its nuances of fascism as the price of a Republican victory in November, has produced a fortuitous and unforeseen result. It has given the Black Legion obscenities at Detroit a place in the forefront of the national consciousness which they deserve but otherwise would not have enjoyed. Even here in the nation's capital the latest outbreak of kluxery has overshadowed all other questions in those anterooms and subcellars where politicians let down their hair and the truth is spoken.

I predict, however, that it will not long continue as a conversational dominant either here or elsewhere. From this distance it looks distinctly as if the Black Legion were about to be treated to a coat of whitewash, lavishly applied by the bourbons who rule Detroit and the rest of Michigan. It would not suit the purposes of the state's industrial barons to have the public shown the extent to which their agents were involved in the Black Legion's formation and the extent to which they have used it in their fight against unionization of their employees. It would not do to have it disclosed that the Michigan judges, prosecutors, militiamen, cops, mayors, and councilmen who are their bondservants also were platoon commanders of the Black Legion, that their own secret police were its color-bearers and file-closers, and that they used its bloody oath chiefly to bind to themselves in servility the hill-billy labor they have recruited from the South as their best surety against finding themselves faced with workers able and determined to demand their rights.

If I seem to impute unearthly alliances to the overlords of Michigan, remember that they were shown to have the same sort of alliances when the records of the Ku Klux Klan in that state were pried open ten years ago. Remember, too, that the biggest of them is General Motors, that General Motors is du Pont, and that the du Ponts were among the financial backers of the grass-roots convention run a few months ago by Gene Talmadge, the Georgia Hitler. Then note that already the dispatches coming out of Detroit are minimizing the earlier reports as to the size and importance of the Black Legion and are picturing the organization as smashed by the disclosures; they suggest that with the legionnaires in flight further investigation will be unnecessary and that all that remains to be done is to prosecute some sixteen men for the murder of a WPA worker. Note also that the loudest singer of that tune is McCrea, the Wayne County prosecutor, who confessedly was a member of the Black Legion along with his chief investigator and at least one other member of his staff.

Next I call your attention to the fact that the man who is most active in investigating the Black Legion per se is the state's attorney general, Crowley, a corporation lawyer serving under Governor Fitzgerald, who holds his post by the sufferance of the employers' association and who has appointed as chairman of the state's Social Security Board one Dr. Philip A. Callahan, who was the Klan's grand cyclops in Michigan. And what sort of investigation have Crowley's efforts given rise to at Detroit? One of Michigan's unique one-man grand-jury investigations in which a single judge hears and weighs the evidence, unaided by a jury. The act which makes this sort of proceeding possible was put over by the employers' association a number of years ago as an "economy" measure. It has served their purpose admirably, as, for example, in the case of the one-man grand-jury investigation of the Detroit bank failures in 1933. The chief purpose of that investigation was to let the responsible bankers blame their ills on Washington without undergoing cross-examination or the peril of rebuttal; to assure them a wide audience the "grand-jury" investigation in this instance was public instead of secret. More than thirty of those bankers have since been indicted by a federal grand jury, and three have been convicted. The one-man grand jury returned no indictments against the bankers.

And who is to be the one-man grand jury in the Black Legion case? The Wayne County circuit judges have got together and picked one of their colleagues, Judge James A. Chenot. A Republican, he was known as Ford's candidate when he ran for office. Before mounting the bench Chenot was county prosecutor. It was while he held that office that six men were slain in a march on the Ford plant. Chenot investigated. No indictments were returned. Chenot at that time worked hand in glove with Harry Bennett, chief of Ford's secret police. Their intimacy, according to reports, has not been impaired by his assumption of judicial robes. There is little likelihood that Judge Chenot will find an inquiry into the Black Legion's industrial ramifications relevant to his task. There is even less likelihood that the Justice Department, to which McCrea has appealed, will respond in bona fide fashion, for the Black Legion affair raises racial and religious issues and those are leprous to politicians in an election year.

The State of Civil Liberties

THE situation in Michigan and the attitude of the Department of Justice makes it doubly important that the La Follette resolution to investigate violations of civil liberties be passed by the Senate before Congress adjourns. Under the terms of that resolution the committee it would set up would have authority not only to investigate labor espionage but also to probe deeply into the Black Legion and all similar organizations. Unfortunately the prospects for its adoption do not seem very bright, although Senator La Follette retains his optimism. The resolution is snagged in the reactionary Audit and Control Committee, made up of Senator Byrnes, from darkest South Carolina; Senator Tydings of Maryland, who twice guided Bethlehem Steel Company union stooges when they appeared to testify against the Wagner bill; Senator Bachman of Tennessee and Senator Townsend from the domain of du Pont. If Senator La Follette's hopes are fulfilled, the committee will pass the bill on to the Senate tomorrow or Tuesday. To lessen the committee's resistance to the measure, the appropriation which the resolution carries has been cut down to $15,000 from $30,000. Its backers are counting on getting additional funds from the next Congress. To do that, they will have to uncork some dramatic evidence with the aid of the initial $15,000. Their ability to do so with such a meager fund is highly questionable.

Senator Vandenberg

How difficult the investigation would be even if amply financed is suggested in the NLRB's summation of its testimony relating to the labor-espionage phase of the investigation. "Even a simple investigation, mere exposure, damages none so much as the spy," it says. "There is some question, however, whether an unethical secret system can be adequately investigated by ethical means. . . . The personnel of spy and strike-breaking agencies is often the same as of political gangsterism." The difficulties of the proposed investigation are further enhanced by evidence that the labor-espionage agencies already are preparing to combat it by submerging. From unimpeachable sources comes the information that three weeks ago Steel Corporation spies in Pittsburgh were told: "This thing is getting too hot; we are going to fold up for ninety days. Here is your money and a bonus; we shall want you back in three months." From the same sources there also comes word that the files of certain detective agencies are being destroyed on orders from headquarters, that on May 18 the headquarters of the Railway Audit and Inspection Company and its Central Industrial Service in the Commonwealth Building, Pittsburgh, were closed, and that the chief operatives have disappeared from their hotels. This is not demobilization; it's reorganization—underground.

On to Cleveland!

THERE'LL be a black legion at Cleveland next week when the G. O. P. convention opens there, but it will be one quite different from that which has just come to light in the home state of Senator Vandenberg, who stands second only to Landon as a potential winner of the Republican nomination. This legion will be made up of the blackamoors who always appear from the South, ready to sell their votes as convention delegates to the highest bidder. They have no other significance than as purchasable blocks of votes, yet they are capable of making trouble, as Hoover and his majordomo, Walter Brown, found out in 1932. Hoover had spent a good part of his energies after his 1928 victory in trying to create a "respectable" Republican machine in the South, and to that end he tried to supplant the Negro leaders there with whites by taking away their patronage. He got rid of Ben Davis, G. O. P. committeeman from Georgia, in this fashion, and he also unseated "Tieless Joe" Talbot of South Carolina. But he miscued when he got around to Perry Howard and Mary Booze, of Mississippi. Talbot, a white, showed up at the 1932 convention with a white delegation and sought to regain his seat. Perry and Mary showed up with their usual Negro delegation. Talbot played white and lost. Perry raised the race issue, scared hell out of the party leaders, and got back his committee seat. Now "Tieless Joe" is all set to take a leaf from Perry's book, show up at Cleveland with a Negro delegation, and threaten to turn the Negroes of the nation against Lincoln's party if it denies him and his'n seats.

He will have Vandenberg on his side, for they let the Negroes vote in Detroit, where there are a lot of them. They also are beginning to let them vote in parts of the darker South, chiefly because the Democratic bosses there have discovered that a majority of them can be persuaded to vote Democratic. Some Southern journalists whose admitted prejudice makes their testimony on this point weighty assure me the trend is growing rapidly. As they explain it, economic interest is playing an increasingly larger and more conscious part in Southern politics, as the combination of misery and growing industrialization widens class divisions. They see the small farmer welcoming the supporting votes of Negroes against those of the large landowners, bankers, industrialists, and their retainers. They report the former as ardently pro-New Deal and the latter as pro-Liberty League. And they point to the fact that in Louisville, Memphis, Raleigh, and Decatur voting rights have been accorded in the last few years to Negroes in the primaries, which are the decisive contests in the South. They also point out that delegates to a county Democratic convention at Raleigh a few weeks ago elected a Negro delegate to the state convention.

Harvard Heretics and Rebels

BY ROGER N. BALDWIN AND CORLISS LAMONT

[This article was originally intended for the particular interest of Harvard graduates. The Harvard Alumni Bulletin, however, sole and official organ of the alumni, declined to print it on the ground that it might offend Harvard conservatives, who would then refuse to contribute to the Harvard Tercentenary Fund, now being solicited. The article finally appeared in the Harvard Advocate, an undergraduate monthly. As it appears below it has been completely revised by the authors, both of whom are Harvard graduates, and is believed by the editors of The Nation to be of interest not only to Harvard men but to dissenters in general.]

IT WOULD be an affront to most Harvard men to suggest that the university's crimson banner has any relation to the red flag of international revolution. Yet red flags, whatever they symbolize, can easily be confused, as was dramatically illustrated when the Massachusetts anti-red-flag law of 1920 was found to be so written as to make the Harvard crimson illegal in public display. The law was changed. But the taint of heresy associated with Harvard from its earliest days still remains strong enough to identify a sizable minority of Harvard men with 'loyalties, or at least leanings, in the direction of two red flags.

Harvard grew out of religious dissent. It was rooted in the soil of heresy. Its first president was removed by the authorities for questioning infant baptism. Boston from its earliest days has been the home of dissenters, nourished by the Puritan tradition. It has been one of the few communities in the United States where a man may be a rebel or heretic without loss of caste. In it or around it all the great movements of reform and revolt long centered—in religion, in politics, in the colonial revolution, in the struggle against slavery, in the campaign for women's rights. For generations it held the intellectual leadership of America. If it does not now, yet the impress of independent and challenging thinking permanently remains upon it. And Harvard is Boston's offspring. The stamp of the New England Puritan aristocracy is all over it—its economic conservatism along with its tolerance of dissent.

Harvard dissenters today are of all types and attitudes. Commonest are those whose dissent is not so sharp as to take them out of their privileged class associations. They do not depart from the ethics and economics of capitalism. They are the champions of liberty and free speech under democratic capitalism, not as tools for a new working-class power to replace it, but as inherent processes of democracy. In this liberal school of Harvard men, outstanding was the late Oliver Wendell Holmes, '61, whose philosophy of law and of social change went the limit of experimentation. Not committed to any new economic order, he nevertheless conceded the right of those aiming at an entirely new system to propound their views, even if such freedom of opinion should involve the possibility of the temporary destruction of democracy by a dictatorship of the proletariat. Few liberals go so far. Walter Lippmann, '10, pre-war Socialist and now spokesman of a spurious liberal point of view, is in effect a defender of the present class divisions and set-up. The status quo with trimmings is all that he desires. Genuine in his liberalism but still essentially capitalistic is the militant pacifist crusader Oswald Garrison Villard, '93, for seventeen years editor of The Nation.

A number of Harvard alumni who have been associated with the present Democratic Administration can be put into a class by themselves as New Deal liberals. First and foremost, of course, is the President himself, Franklin D. Roosevelt, '04, who like President Theodore Roosevelt, '80, has expressed active hostility to the "malefactors of great wealth." The economic situation rather than personal predilection has forced Franklin D. to advance considerably beyond the policies of Theodore. But in spite of the present Chief Executive's many innovations and experiments, his reforms are aimed only at making the profit system work better. Close to President Roosevelt as advisers and members of the "brain trust" are or have been Professor Felix Frankfurter, LL.B., '06, of the Harvard Law School faculty, and A. A. Berle, Jr., '13, Chamberlain in New York City's Fusion administration.

While these New Deal liberals can be regarded as rebels against the status quo only in the relative sense that they are pushing forward toward change, their influence tends to support the interests of producers and consumers against property-owners. Washington is full of them, with a sprinkling of Harvard men all along the line from the top down. To mention only a few, we cite Lloyd K. Garrison, '19, dean of the University of Wisconsin Law School and first chairman of the National Labor Relations Board; Ernest H. Gruening, '07, chief of the Bureau of Insular Possessions in the Department of the Interior; Laurence H. Duggan, '27, chief of the Latin American section of the State Department; A. L. Wirin, '22, of the legal staff of the National Labor Relations Board; L. R. Brown, '26, of the staff of the Senate munitions investigation; Charles E. Wyzanski, Jr., '27, solicitor of the Department of Labor; and Thomas Hopkinson Eliot, '28, grandson of Harvard's former president and chief counsel of the Social Security Commission. There are also Harvard New Dealers in state affairs, such as Charles Poletti, '24, the able counsel of Governor Lehman of New York; and Ernest Angell, '11, New York regional director of the Securities Exchange Commission.

These men are typical of scores of Harvard liberals long associated with political or social reform, among whom may be further noted: Fiske Warren, '84, single-taxer; Dr. Richard C. Cabot, '89, pioneering physician and teacher of social ethics; John S. Codman, '90, libertarian and single-taxer; Dr. Haven Emerson, '96, public-health crusader and champion of Indian rights; Robert Hallowell, '10, formerly of the New Republic; Robert Littell, '16, one-time dramatic critic of the old New York World; Samuel H. Ordway, Jr., '21, Civil Service Commissioner in New York City; George D. Pratt, '21, member of the Emergency Committee for Strikers' Relief and in earlier years a leading stimulator of student thought and protest; Maurice Wertheim, '06, banker, supporter of liberal enterprises, and present owner of The Nation; Graham R. Taylor, '03, social worker and interpreter of Soviet Russia; William P. Hapgood, '94, experimenter in workers' cooperative control of industry; Frederick Lewis Allen, '12, author of "Only Yesterday" and "The Lords of Creation"; Gilbert Seldes, '14, journalist, author, and playwright; Walter H. Pollak, '07, who successfully argued the Scottsboro case before the United States Supreme Court; and John F. Moors, '83, member of the Harvard Corporation, a banker by profession but distinguished rather as a liberal and political reformer.

Somewhat farther to the left and sometimes approaching a thoroughgoing economic radicalism in their attitudes or activities are Dr. Horace M. Kallen, '03, author and teacher at the New School for Social Research; Osmond K. Fraenkel, '08, active in legal work on behalf of civil liberties and associate counsel in the successful Scottsboro appeal to the Supreme Court; Newton Arvin, '21, professor of English at Smith College; Merle E. Curti, '20, professor of history at Smith; Quincy Howe, '21, chief editor of Simon and Schuster, member of the board of directors of the American Civil Liberties Union, and former editor of the Living Age; and Eliot D. Pratt, '27, on the board of the Civil Liberties Union and a trustee of the German University in Exile.

To mention such men is merely to pick types of Harvard graduates who have struck off from the more trodden paths, but not into territories very remote from established economics and politics. While they do not hesitate to expose the evils of the capitalist system, they on the whole support the existing social order and rarely champion measures aimed at its fundamental institutions and incentives as do the radicals.

Some few Harvard men have voluntarily unclassed themselves, earned their livelihood as manual workers, and accepted a working-class standard of living and way of life. Conspicuous for a time in the public press was Charles Garland, '19, a disciple of Tolstoy who handed over a fortune to the radical movement in the form of the American Fund for Public Service, living himself on a worker's standard. This fund eventually distributed more than $2,000,000 among a large variety of enterprises. Garland for a time lived on the land as a farmer, and is now doing left-wing organization work among farmers. In the days of the I. W. W. a considerable number of Harvard men were attracted to its revolutionary program, joined it, and became speakers and writers for it. John Reed, '10, in his first class life reported membership in two clubs—

"Harvard and I. W. W." Hutchins Hapgood, '92, philosophical anarchist, lecturer, and writer, championed the I. W. W., though not himself a member.

The Socialist movement before the war enlisted many Harvard men. Prominent among them were the Reverend John Haynes Holmes, '02, better known as a religious radical and pacifist than as a Socialist; Stuart Chase, '10, economist and writer, whose earlier activities included organizing Socialist groups among intellectuals; William P. Montague, '96, professor of philosophy at Barnard, one-time Socialist leader among intellectuals; and Horace A. Eaton, '92, professor of English at Syracuse, pacifist and Socialist sympathizer. Since the Socialist Party was officially against the World War, most of its members were pacifists as well as economic radicals. But many outside the party took the pacifist stand. Harvard men among them were outstanding: Professor Robert Morss Lovett, '92, for example, of the University of Chicago, now president of the League for Industrial Democracy and a leading figure in united-front movements; and Professor Walter Nelles, '05, of the Yale Law School, counsel during the war to the National Civil Liberties Bureau. Among the few hundred men imprisoned for refusal of military service on conscientious grounds, two of the non-Socialists were Harvard men—Harold S. Gray, '18, and Brent D. Allinson, '17.

The Socialist movement, since the war, besides holding the loyalty of most of these older men, has attracted a number of the younger graduates as speakers, writers, or organizers. Well known among them are Powers Hapgood, '21, of the National Executive Committee of the Socialist Party, who has been since his graduation a coal miner and labor organizer, at present for the United Mine Workers; John Herling, '27, aide and associate of Norman Thomas, long active in strike situations, and executive secretary of the Emergency Committee for Strikers' Relief; Albert Sprague Coolidge, '15, a Harvard faculty member, who is on the National Executive Committee of the party; and the Reverend Bradford Young, '23, speaker and candidate for office on the party ticket. One of the conspicuous recruits to socialism after the war was Heywood Broun, '10, columnist and journalist, president of the Newspaper Guild, now out of the Socialist Party but a leading figure in united-front movements of the left.

But the most extreme of Harvard radicals are those who were aroused by the Russian Revolution and the international Communist movement to championship of revolutionary measures. By far the best-known American intellectual so inspired was John Reed, '10, mentioned above, who threw himself into the proletarian cause at the very moment of the Bolshevik seizure of power, dramatized in his book "Ten Days That Shook the World." Reed lies buried near Lenin's tomb in the Red Square at Moscow. A portrait of him, painted by his classmate Robert Hallowell, now hangs in Adams House at Harvard.

Publicly identified with the Communist movement as party members or as sympathizers are or have been John Dos Passos, '16, author of "Manhattan Transfer" and "The 42nd Parallel"; Edwin Seaver, '22, novelist and an editor of the Sunday Worker; Granville Hicks, '23, teacher and critic, contributing editor of the New Masses, author of "The Great Tradition"—a Marxist interpretation of American literature—and of the recently published biography of John Reed; Malcolm Cowley, '20, long an editor of the New Republic and author of "Exile's Return"; Ivan Black, '24, executive secretary of the left-wing Writers' Union; Lement Harris, '26, executive secretary of the Farmers' National Committee for Action; Merle Colby, '24, contributor to the New Masses and a member of the national committee of the radical League of American Writers; H. W. L. Dana, '03, teacher, lecturer and specialist on left-wing drama; Alfred H. Hirsch, '29, of the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners; and Paul Crosbie, '05, business man and American Legion member, recently a convert to communism.

Other Harvard radicals, with no party affiliation but well known for their opposition to capitalism or their sympathy for Soviet Russia, are Horace Davis, '21, teacher and economist; Charles Angoff, '23, fearless and able editor of the American Spectator; James Waterman Wise, '24, lecturer, writer, and an editor of the new labor tabloid, the People's Press; Lee Simonson, '09, stage designer and drama expert, long associated with the Theater Guild; Benjamin Stolberg, '18, co-author of "The Economic Consequences of the New Deal"; Frederick V. Field, '27, secretary of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations; W. Osgood Field, '26, chairman of the American Russian Institute; Lewis Gannett, '13, columnist on the New York Herald Tribune; Lincoln Kirstein, '30, former editor of the Hound and Horn; Joseph F. Barnes, '27, editor of the symposium "Empire in the East," and on the staff of the New York Herald Tribune; Tredwell Smith, '15, teacher and leader of student tours to the U.S.S.R.; and Professor John H. Gray, '87, former president of the American Economic Association and present treasurer of the People's Lobby. Among these may also fairly be included the Episcopal Bishop of Missouri, the Right Reverend William Scarlett, '05, whose pro-labor and pro-Soviet utterances mark him as no supporter of capitalism.

Few defenders of the status quo would dispute our classification of the Harvard men we have mentioned. They would tend to lump them all together as subversive influences. We have, however, covered a wide range of thought and action, little unified by a common philosophy, and representative only of a tendency.

Precisely how far Harvard heretics and rebels were ready-made by their homes and early environment and how far Harvard contributed to their dissent only the most painstaking inquiry would show. But it is obvious from the very atmosphere of the university that its practices and traditions favor, in comparison with other educational institutions, the critical and dissenting mind. If Harvard has been careful in selecting teachers with not too unconventional views, it has also adhered to high standards of academic freedom. To our knowledge not a single teacher in modern times has been let out for his views; and pressure has often been heavy. President

Lowell stood out against it during the war in the case of Professor Münsterberg and later in the attacks on the Law School faculty by reactionaries.

The Corporation and Overseers, representing the most conservative of influences on the university, have been on occasion minded to interfere, but both Eliot and Lowell stoutly resisted infringements on freedom of teaching or on the public activities of professors. It should be noted, however, that while President Lowell defended Professor Harold Laski against those who wished to see him ousted for his support of the Boston police strike, he made it clear to Laski that he could hope for no academic promotion. President Conant has already indicated his thorough agreement with the tradition of academic freedom and has applied it strikingly to incidents not ordinarily conceived as closely related to it. He rejected the offer of a scholarship from Hitler's associate, Ernst Hanfstaengl, '09. He refused to prosecute two Communist girls arrested in the Yard on Commencement Day, 1934, for interrupting his own address with protests against the presence of Hanfstaengl. And he strongly and publicly opposed the teachers' oath bill when it was before the Massachusetts legislature. These are acts of a courageous liberalism.

To analyze the extent of unorthodoxy among the members of the Harvard faculty would make an interesting and worth-while study. We shall not here take up that question, but two recent circumstances strike us as highly significant. First there has been the opposition to the teachers' oath bill led by such Harvard faculty members as Kirtley F. Mather, professor of geology, and Samuel Eliot Morison, '08, professor of history. Second there was the formation at Harvard last fall of the Cambridge Union of University Teachers, affiliated with the American Federation of Teachers, which in turn is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. This indicates that a considerable number of Harvard teachers see the need and advantage of both unionization and close association with the labor movement in the United States as a means toward their own protection and toward economic reform.

Boston and Harvard long ago learned that the rebels and heretics of today are the leaders accepted by tomorrow. Monuments to the men scorned or bitterly fought in their day testify to it. Theodore Parker, Henry D. Thoreau, Ralph Waldo Emerson, James Russell Lowell, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Wendell Phillips—abolitionists, religious heretics, champions of women's rights—were all pioneers in a hostile land, though sons of New England and of Harvard.

Perhaps the fairest measure of a university's merit lies in its production of non-conformists. Yet most American universities turn out all but a tiny minority of graduates with wholly uncritical outlooks on the basic issues of politics, economics, and culture. That Harvard produces a larger, more conspicuous, and more constant minority of dissenters should be accepted as a notable contribution to the country and to the university itself.

Militarizing the Philippines

BY HAROLD E. FEY

A YEAR ago, when Congress was suffering from alternating attacks of spring fever and "must" legislation, a bill was slipped through under which Major General Douglas A. MacArthur was assigned to serve as military adviser to the Philippine Commonwealth. According to the adjutant general of the War Department, Brigadier General E. T. Conley, the bill became law on May 14. He seems to be the only person in Washington who remembers this event, which had the appearance of a kindly gesture intended to give a favored general a pleasant vacation. Possibly the amiable gentlemen on Capitol Hill were embarrassed by the fact that the General had been graduated from the army's highest post long before the age of retirement. At any rate, they generously permitted General MacArthur to go on his way, retaining his regular salary and emoluments in addition to whatever the Philippine government might decide to pay him.

Acting on the advice of General MacArthur, the Philippine Commonwealth, on December 15, 1935, passed its first major piece of legislation—a National Defense Act. This law, which presumably reflects General MacArthur's best thinking on national defense, founds that defense upon a system of universal compulsory military training. In addition to providing a basic professional army of 16,000 men it compels every male Filipino over ten years of age to undergo a course of military training and thenceforth to give some time during each year of his active life to military service. By this means it is planned to develop within the ten years that the Philippines are still under the American flag an army of 500,000 men. At the end of this period the Filipino nation of 13,000,000 people will have one of the largest armies in proportion to its size in the world.

It is hardly likely that Congress foresaw that the loan of General MacArthur would have this result. Already certain complications have become evident. The warlike Moros have refused to register for the military draft. They have taken to the hills of Mindanao and are rebuilding their old fortresses. To express their opinion of MacArthur's militarism, they murdered a Filipino propaganda officer who had been sent among them, slitting his mouth from ear to ear, and then sent word to Manila: "We need none of your military training. Give us rifles and we will show you how to fight." In Palawan 500 young men have refused to register for the draft because they believe this program of military training is preparation for a war between the United States and Japan. On March 31 there was a pitched battle in the province of Lanao in which ten Moros were killed by Philippine constabulary. The Moro princess Oliama Malawani charged that the clash resulted from persistent threats by army officers to jail Moros if they continued to resist universal registration.

More serious is the probable effect of the defense act upon our relations with Japan. That nation can hardly be indifferent to the fact that the American army's leading Japanophobe has quietly begun the organization of a force of half a million men which will not have to be transported thousands of miles in case of trouble in Asia. Neither can the American people afford to be indifferent to this unauthorized addition to the armed forces under the American flag. The new Philippine constitution specifically recognizes the right of the United States to call into its service all the military forces organized by the commonwealth government.

A minor reason for the prompt repeal of the measure is that MacArthur's appointment was directly contrary to the intent of the act of Congress under which the Philippines are in process of getting their freedom. The independence act provided for a civil representative of the United States with the Philippine government. General MacArthur is a military representative not subordinate in rank to the High Commissioner, and actually possessing, because of his friendly personal relations with President Manuel Quezon, more power than any other representative of the United States. More important is the fact that the military program effected by General MacArthur will make impossible the attainment of Filipino freedom. The Philippine government cannot finance its present burdens. The additional cost of this huge army can only be carried by borrowing. It is hardly likely that the United States will permit the Philippine government to get funds for this purpose from any government other than our own. The result will be that at the end of ten years such economic dependence will have been created as to take all meaning out of political independence.

The policy which General MacArthur has recommended negates the work of thirty-five years, during which America has been attempting to teach democratic ideals and techniques to this Asiatic nation. We are not serving those ideals when we permit an official representative of the United States to saddle upon a young Asiatic democracy a conscript army of such proportions. Such action has increased significance in connection with the present social unrest in the islands, whose depressed taos must find justice either through peaceful parliamentary processes or through bloody revolution. The temptation to the Filipino ruling clique to maintain by force their present dominant position will be irresistible with an army of this size. Such action will not only be the end of democracy, but will endanger the relations of the United States with other countries whose nationals may suffer in the turmoil.

The American public has had a number of plain warnings in recent months that the military and naval machine we are pampering with unprecedented appropriations is prepared to do what is necessary to circumvent civilian control in the interest of what they believe to be a sufficiently aggressive foreign policy. Last year Admiral J. M. Reeves chose the day on which Japan abrogated the Washington Naval Treaty to announce naval maneuvers of a staggering magnitude in the Pacific. General MacArthur now makes his contribution to our foreign relations by this unauthorized move to militarize the Filipino people. It is high time for this nation to reassert in unmistakable terms that the responsibility for policy-making on matters of vital national concern belongs, under our Constitution, to the civilian arm of the government. The recall of General MacArthur would serve that purpose.

TVA: The New Deal's Best Asset

BY STUART CHASE

II. Broadening the Exchange Base

THE preceding article on the TVA described the Valley, and argued that the primary function of regional planning, under the conditions which face America today, is to drive an exchange base under local communities, so that each area may have goods or services to exchange with the world beyond its borders, and thus share in the abundant output of modern technology. Failing such a base, it must lapse into the primitive self-sufficiency of the pre-machine age. The Tennessee Valley has little in the way of manufacturing and less in the way of services to offer the world beyond its hills. Its exchange base must be primarily natural resources—foodstuffs, raw materials, water-power. What is the TVA doing specifically to increase these resources?

The Constitution of the United States knows nothing of regional planning, for the conception would have been fantastic in 1787, when a specialized exchange economy was still in the womb of time. The Supreme Court knows nothing of regional planning except in the negative sense that a watershed comprising portions of seven states is suspect in the light of the commerce clause, and probably unlawful. Congress has never heard of regional planning officially, and would be seriously confused as to the patronage involved, if it had. The President first had a definite idea as to the functions and scope of the TVA. He saw the watershed as a geographic and hydrologic unit; he wanted to make the people in that watershed more comfortable, and he wanted to set up a series of yardsticks to measure power facilities, rural electrification, flood control, erosion control, progressive agriculture; yardsticks hopefully to be applied in other regions and to make people more comfortable there. Many members of Congress undoubtedly shared these desires with the President, especially Senator Norris.

But under the American system one cannot go straight to one's desire. One must adopt a crab-like course which defers to established taboos and symbols. To control the watershed of the Tennessee in the interests of the people living within that watershed is legally an outrageous procedure, as Professor Arnold of the Yale Law School ironically suggests, and not to be tolerated by right-thinking citizens. But both navigation and flood control have sidled past the taboos in times gone by, and are now admitted as right and necessary functions even by the lawyers of the American Liberty League. Federal production and sale of power, however, was on the fence—until the United States Supreme Court settled it in the affirmative by eight votes to one.

The TVA act was framed with these taboos in mind. It provides for:

1. A maximum development of the Tennessee River for navigation.
2. A maximum amount of flood control.
3. A maximum generation of electric power consistent with flood and navigation control.
4. The investigation of a proper use of marginal lands.
5. Studies on a proper method of reforestation.
6. Recommendations for "the economic and social well-being of the people living in said river basin."

This last provision was perhaps too frank. It may yet prove the undoing of the whole experiment. It comes perilously close to stating what the act was really designed for. It is bad form and bad law to consider the social well-being of two million people scattered over seven states. Such frankness was not really necessary. All that needed to be stipulated in the act was navigation, and nature would do the rest, even including the welfare clause. Why? Because you cannot tinker with nine-foot channels from Paducah to Knoxville without tinkering with the whole flow of water down the basin, which involves the hydrologic cycle, which dominates and controls the ecology of the region, and thus lets in the whole program—animal, vegetable, human, and divine, if you please. Of course, you can dig a nine-foot channel at fabulous expense without considering any of the related factors, but the first spring flood will damage it, and silt rushing down from the eroded fields will complete the ruin. Various "navigable" channels have been so constructed in the past, but they have fallen under the general title of the Congressional pork barrel. There is no pork to be had in the TVA, as any member of Congress will sadly tell you, but instead rather a strict interpretation of a permanent nine-foot channel.

You may or may not respect men and their taboos, but you must respect the laws of nature. You put a nine-foot channel up to nature, and ask that it be made permanent. What does she stipulate? She first makes it very clear that what goes up must come down. Water is drawn to the clouds from the Atlantic and the Gulf and precipitated in rain and snow over the Valley, especially on the Eastern mountains. This water feeds plants and is transpired by them, runs into lakes and underground reservoirs for slow seepage seaward, and runs off on the surface through rivulets, creeks, and rivers. Ultimately it finds the sea, and the cycle repeats itself—so long as this planet endures. The water will come down. The people of Hartford, the people of Pittsburgh, the people of Johnstown have no illusions on this score.

Dependable navigation calls for flood control; flood control calls for dams and reservoirs; reservoirs must not fill with silt or their function vanishes; Hales Bar Dam in the big river is 33 per cent silted in twenty-three years.

Silt can be prevented only by the control of erosion on agricultural lands and little waters. Erosion control calls for cover crops, both forest and grass, and scientific methods in tillage and crop rotation; cover crops call for cheap fertilizer, otherwise they will not take root on the exhausted soils; cheap fertilizer, especially phosphate, which is the major requirement in the Valley, can best be made with the help of electric furnaces and cheap power. So the cycle returns on itself, a house-that-Jack-built. If you really mean navigation, all these things will be added unto you. Similarly if the national taboos frowned on navigation and smiled on fertilizer, let us say, the cycle would be almost identical. Nor does it stop here. Large reservoirs demand the removal of many houses, which calls for an intelligent resettlement program. Large reservoirs demand an extensive replanning of railways, highways, schools, and recreation areas. The forest cover which is to check erosion calls for permanent management and many jobs for fire patrollers and forest workers. Large reservoirs often produce trillions of mosquitoes—probably in these latitudes mosquitoes which spread malaria; malaria calls for a medical-engineering control as rigorous as the methods of Colonel Gorgas when the Panama Canal was built. Malaria is less lethal than yellow fever, but it is at least as hard to eradicate. Water control ties in with fish and wild-life preservation, with purification of streams polluted by city sewers and industrial wastes.

Such are nature's demands. In writing them down, I have automatically listed the functions of the TVA. To the list may be added certain collateral functions which appear to fit the cycle logically enough: a labor program for the very extensive engineering operations involved, primarily dams and reservoirs; the conservation of the Valley's mineral resources, especially phosphate rock; the development of the hydroelectric power resources of the Valley as one integrated, low-cost system, and the discovery of ways and means, such as rural electrification, to put the power to useful employment. There are other functions which are somewhat more indirect, such as land classification, including aerial mapping, a program for the use of marginal lands, and the development of domestic industries to supplement agriculture and provide employment.

We start with navigation and end with a pretty comprehensive program of regional planning. We could start with flood control or with power and arrive at substantially the same program. As a matter of fact—and I trust the Supreme Court is safely asleep as I whisper it—navigation is probably the least important aspect of the cycle, from the point of view of the well-being of the people of the Valley. Army engineers anticipate a very substantial traffic by 1950—some eighteen million tons in fact—but it is safe to say that they have not anticipated all the technological developments which may occur in transport within the next fifteen years.

As one drives down the Valley, its appearance is probably not very much changed from ten years ago—with a few exceptions shortly to be noted. This experiment which so agitates the nation is rather hard to find, unless one knows where to look. Ten years ago there was a great dam at Muscle Shoals, now called the Wilson Dam. It was equipped with generators for producing power and with two nitrate plants. These assets the TVA, a corporation outside any government department, took over. The generators were put to work and power was sold to various private companies and to a few towns. One of the nitrate plants was converted into a laboratory for experiments on a cheap phosphate fertilizer. Headquarters were established in Knoxville, three hundred miles from the original assets, and work begun on a dam in the Clinch River, a tributary of the Tennessee, twenty-five miles from Knoxville. To house the dam workers and part of the headquarters' staff, the town of Norris was built. The Norris Dam is now completed, generators are being installed and power will flow early in the summer. As the reservoir fills behind the dam, it will back upstream at least forty miles, and then the TVA will begin to make a very tangible impression on the landscape.

As skilled workers finish at Norris, they go down to work on the Wheeler Dam, some twenty miles above the Wilson Dam. Wheeler is almost finished, and presently its reservoir will fill. A dam at Pickwick Landing is well under way. Dams have been surveyed at Guntersville and Chickamauga. When their reservoirs are full, the Valley will have taken on a very different appearance indeed. Nor is this all. Dams are recommended for construction at Gilbertsville, Watts Bar, and Coulter Shoals on the main river, and two more tributary storage dams, like Norris, at Fontana and Fowler Bend.

Nine dams in the main river, including Hales Bar, built and leased by a private power company, and three in tributary rivers. With these twelve dams in place, the nine-foot channel running 650 miles from Knoxville to Paducah is assured and protected; no conceivable flood can seriously damage the Valley, for the plans are based on a flow of water 50 per cent greater than the historic flood of 1867. The power load will be integrated from dam to dam, so that the resources of those where the water is low will be supplemented by those where the water is high. Any power engineer can tell you what this means in dependability and low cost. Great transmission lines will link generator to generator. To take a specific instance: Wilson Dam is a run-of-the-river plant. Its reservoir does not provide much storage, and in the summer and fall, when the river is normally low, its power output is at a minimum. Norris Dam, on the other hand, is designed primarily for storing flood waters, and has a huge capacity. While Wilson is well supplied by the high river in the spring, the Norris gates will be closed; flood waters will fill the great reservoir. As Wilson declines, Norris comes in. The gates are opened. Power is generated once at the Norris turbines, and as the released water goes down the river, generated again at Wilson. Norris and Wilson together can generate three or four times as much dependable power as either could produce alone.

With nine run-of-the-river dams, it is conceivable that every bucket of water released from Norris, or other tributary reservoirs, will be used ten times. Within a year from today every bucketful will be used three times, once at Norris, once at Wheeler, once at Wilson. This is the engineering ideal of balancing the load, and makes for cheap power. No private company can hope to rival such watershed control.

By the end of 1936 about $85,000,000 will have been spent on six dams—Wheeler, Norris, Pickwick Landing, Guntersville, Chickamauga, and Fowler Bend. By the end of 1940 all six will be completed—Congress permitting—at a total cost of about $185,000,000. By 1944 another $144,000,000 can be expended to advantage in constructing four more dams to make the system complete—Gilbertsville, Watts Bar, Coulter Shoals, and Fontana. The total outlay is thus estimated at about a third of a billion—say the cost of half a dozen battleships. The work has been planned, furthermore, to keep the skilled labor force steadily employed for the next eight years, thus preserving the human balance as well as the hydrologic. Labor costs under such a long-swing program will of course be at a minimum, as any personnel manager can tell you.

All the dams will have locks for navigation where necessary. All will be wired for power, as it were, but generators will not be installed until demand warrants it. Wilson, Wheeler, and Norris are about to produce 205,000 kilowatts of continuous power. If and when the whole group comes in, the total will be raised to 660,000 kilowatts of continuous, dependable, year-round power.

So much for dams, the bony skeleton of the TVA. Now for the flesh and blood. Looking around the Valley, if your eyes are sharp, you will find the face of nature on the farms being slowly changed. Twenty enterprising farmers in each county are allowing experiments in the control of erosion to be made on their farms. Steep slopes are going out of corn and cotton and back to grass or forest. Tilled slopes are being terraced or contour-plowed. CCC boys are helping to plug gullies with little dams and thickets of black locust. Dr. H. A. Morgan's phosphates are bringing up green new grasses, presently to be grazed by livestock. A scientific plan of crop rotation is being followed.

Neighbors come and lean over the fences—first to scoff, then to be interested, finally to consider seriously a similar plan on their own farms. Already the farmers of the whole Valley are interested. (The wise methods by which their interest has been aroused will be discussed in the next article.) Thus in encouraging methods of agriculture primarily designed to keep reservoirs from filling with silt, one-crop farming is giving way to diversified farming—a bitter need of the South; farm diet is being improved and balanced with milk and vegetables; a way is being prepared to replace King Cotton, who is toppling from his throne. Twenty experimental farms in a county are not many. But the leaven spreads.

This brings us to the subject of fertilizer, which for all I know may prove more important than power in the long run—especially in its reverberations throughout the nation. Dr. H. A. Morgan is the prophet of phosphates and his voice is that of Moses. One morning he seized me by the arm and pushed me into a car. We drove out to the University of Tennessee in the suburbs of Knoxville, and thence to a sloping field beyond, part of the great experimental farm of the university. It was raining softly and spring was in the air. Here in neat squares, perhaps twenty feet to a side, were twenty-seven green plots of winter wheat pushing through the red earth. Nine were control plots, fed with nitrate and potash but no phosphate. Nine had been fed with standard commercial phosphate; nine with the new low-cost phosphate developed in the electric furnaces at Muscle Shoals. The control plots were easy to recognize because they looked so thin and poor beside the bright green of the other eighteen. Could we distinguish standard phosphate plots from the new phosphate plots? We could not. Sometimes we guessed one, and sometimes the other.

This meant that the new phosphate nourished wheat as well as the old, although it could be produced by the government at a third or a quarter the cost. It is called calcium metaphosphate and runs some 63 per cent pure element. The old type of "superphosphate" runs only 16 per cent pure element. The great point was whether nature under actual field conditions would accept the new phosphate. In glass beakers in the laboratory the case appeared doubtful. But here was a conclusive answer in the springing wheat. Dr. Morgan was ablaze with excitement. He saw the land not only of the Valley but of the whole country drinking in this new material, coming back to health after generations of progressive leaching and starvation. Dr. Morgan can hardly speak of the soil of America without passion and tenderness. Its exploitation and waste have hurt him as if he watched a friend slowly bleeding. Today he saw his therapy beginning to staunch the wound. I looked over the curve of the hill where these plots lay to the Valley beyond, and up to the mountain on the horizon, and wondered if I were witness to one of the most important days in American history.

"Dams, yes," says Dr. H. A. (like all good American executives, the Big Shots are known by their initials), "dams are good. But if we could raise the underground water table of the Valley only six inches that would mean 26,000,000 acre-feet of water—four times as much as the Norris reservoir will hold. Nature would do the storing. One hundred pounds of sand holds 25 pounds of water; 100 pounds of clay holds 50 pounds; but 100 pounds of humus holds 200 pounds of water!"

Storage of this kind must be done by cover crops of forest and grass—especially grass; and cover crops require fertilizer—especially phosphates. Again the cycle swings round.

In the course of mining our soils, nitrogen and phosphorous have been heavily drained. Potash, the third major plant food, is still to be found in the so-called B horizon under the top soil. Its deficiency is less urgent than that of the other two. Nitrogen may always be had from the air—either by means of synthetic fertilizer made by the electric fixation process or by the more natural method of plowing into the soil crops like peas, beans, and vetches, which fix nitrogen by their own root bacteria. From the long-range view there is no shortage here. Phosphorus, however, one of the elements contained in our bones, presents an alarming problem. Generation after generation of men and animals have eaten the phosphorus out of the soil, and the bones lie segregated in ten thousand graveyards. The packing houses return a small amount. The main source of supply is the deposit of fossilized bones and shells of prehistoric animals lying in the rocks. Such deposits occur in Tennessee, Florida, and the Rocky Mountains—most of them in the Rockies. According to Dr. Morgan, we need every pound to bring back our soils to par. Meanwhile phosphate rock is being mined and exported in large quantities, especially to Japan. This, in his opinion, is a national crime—like shipping foodstuffs for profit out of a hungry country. To get this phosphorus back into the soil of the United States involves a heavy transportation cost. That is why his process for making calcium metaphosphate is so important. In this form it can be shipped 63 per cent pure phosphorus and mixed later on the farm with the proper inert ingredients. The meta promises to cut 2,000 shipping pounds of plant food to 730 pounds, for an equivalent amount of nourishment.

I have before me as I write a piece of metaphosphate given me by Dr. Morgan. It is about the size of a marble, amber colored and translucent. One can only guess at what this crystal is some day to mean to American agriculture, the food supply, the preservation of the American homeland. Had there been no TVA I should never have held this crystal in my hand. The patents are held by the government, and the development will be non-profit government business—unless the Liberty League lawyers contrive to get hold of it and lock it up in their economy of judicial scarcity. Dams, yes. But perhaps here is something even more important.

I think I have said enough to show that the TVA is well on the way to drive a resource base under the people of the Valley. If its present activities are carried to their logical conclusion, the Valley will be free of floods, provided with cheap navigation, overflowing with cheap electric power. Its soils will be rebuilt, its forests and tree crops brought back and put on a permanent yield basis. Its agricultural pattern will be revolutionized—passing from a one-crop basis to a diversified basis, with vast areas of pasture lands to replace the deepening red gullies between the rows of corn and cotton. The new pattern is taking shape, with the cooperation and consent of the people of the Valley. The strategy of planning is based on that consent. A few more years of the same kind of progress, and the roots will have been driven so deep that not even the Republicans will dare to thrust this Valley back into progressive depletion and despair.

In the next and final article we shall examine the matter of planning by democratic consent, the specific techniques involved, and the kind of people who are carrying it forward.

[Mr. Chase's third article on the TVA will appear next week.]

The Methodists Retreat

BY PAUL HUTCHINSON

THE Methodists have wound up their quadrennial General Conference in a burst of self-congratulation. Heralded as a church gathering in which social reactionaries and liberals would collide head on, the six hundred delegates stayed in session for three weeks without allowing more than a few faint murmurs of disagreement to disturb the placid calm. "What was to have been a battle has proved to be a peace pact!" one delegate proclaimed in triumph. The big news in the Methodist church, its leaders insist, is that a session of this governing body has proved that no reasons exist within its ranks for conflict on social issues.

Such an interpretation of what happened at the Methodist conference is simply another illustration of the readiness of American Protestantism to fool itself concerning its relation to the gathering social crisis. The Methodists did, to be sure, dodge a fight on social issues. But they did so by the simple device of failing to propose any affirmative social measures and by leaving the social conservatives in virtual control of the denominational machinery. Such social liberals as the church contains were left free to agitate as they may desire in unofficial organizations outside the official stockade. But at those spots in the church's regular machinery where—according to certain groups of alarmed laymen—subversive social ideas have been fostered, dependable champions of the status quo were placed on guard. This is the basis on which in this period of social tension and economic insecurity the Methodists have found peace.

Because the Methodists have so often proved the bellwethers of the Protestant flock and have been on the whole the most responsive of the large denominations to progressive social ideas, the developments revealed by their recent conference must be granted a significance extending beyond the bounds of the denomination. Four years ago their awakening social concern led their General Conference to adopt a declaration that "the present social order is unchristian, unethical, and anti-social, because it is based largely on the profit motive, which is a direct appeal to selfishness. Selfishness is never morally right, never Christian, and eventually never benefits anybody." Faced by a social order under such condemnation, the Methodists declared it to be the business of the church to "stir the consciences of mankind to create a social way of life in which all men shall have opportunity to develop their capacities to the fullest possible extent," and they specified further that in fulfilling this duty the church "must clearly teach the fullest possible cooperative control and ownership of industry and of the natural resources upon which industry rests."

So spoke the Methodists in 1932. It was a year, it will be remembered when the bankers and the railway magnates were trampling one another in their eagerness to secure handouts from Washington, and when there were few apologists who dared lift even a feeble voice for good old laissez faire. But this is 1936. Roosevelt is still ruining the country in the front pages of the metropolitan press, but back in the financial section things don't look so bad. In fact, they look pretty juicy. That magic word "boom" begins to be bandied about with increasing frequency. Even the Saturday Evening Post thought it necessary recently to deal with the puzzling question why business men don't quit courting apoplexy by cursing Roosevelt and take to dancing in the streets.

With this sort of thing going on, a considerable number of Methodist laymen have awakened to the socially subversive character of the resolution adopted by the Methodists during the depths of the depression condemning a profit-motivated society. A first sign of the change in attitude induced by a changing business climate came early last autumn when a small group of Midwestern laymen met in the Union League Club of Chicago and organized a "Conference of Methodist Laymen" with the object of getting their church back to its proper business of preaching the gospel. Later a similar group with a similar purpose was organized in Southern California, and later still in the New York metropolitan area, with Newark as its headquarters. From these groups came demands, given ample publicity in the Hearst and other reactionary newspapers, that Methodism clean its house of socialistic ideas and socialistically inclined denominational officers and ministers.

The principal targets against which these conservative laymen directed their fire were two. There has existed for years an unofficial organization of Methodist clergy and laity called the Methodist Federation for Social Service. Its president is the liberal Bishop Francis J. McConnell; its executive secretary the radical Professor Harry F. Ward, who, in addition to being a professor in Union Theological Seminary, New York, and titular head of the American Civil Liberties Union and the American League Against War and Fascism, is an ordained Methodist minister. As an unofficial organization, supported by the dues and contributions of individual members, the federation has confined its efforts largely to the dissemination of factual information bearing on social issues. Though it operates in this highly controversial field, the statements contained in its bulletins have seldom been questioned. The laymen, knowing that the denomination possessed no authority to suppress this voluntary and unofficial body, contented themselves with proposing that it be denied the use of the name "Methodist" in its title—this despite the fact that they had named their own voluntary and unofficial body the Conference of Methodist Laymen.

The other target was the young people's department of the denomination's Board of Education. Here was something official—a department which through thousands of Epworth Leagues and hundreds of summer camps and conferences was sending out a constant stream of educational material for use in discussion groups. All this material was frankly written to fit a program entitled "Christian Youth Building a New World." Its diagnosis of the present ills of society was drastic. Its proposals envisaged a planned society in which production should be for use and not for profit. Moreover, the particular staff secretaries responsible for indoctrinating young Methodists with social ideas of this sort made no attempt to disavow their own position as Socialists. The laymen wanted an end put to this poisoning of the minds of the young.

When the Methodists met in their General Conference—at Columbus, Ohio, on May 1—they discovered that the actual number of votes the conservative laymen could command was not large. However, the denominational leaders were disturbed by the thought of the damage which might be done by laymen refusing to furnish financial support. It takes money to run a denominational machine as ponderous as that of the Methodists. The list of colleges, secondary schools, hospitals, orphanages, and similar enterprises that look to the Methodists for endowment and current support occupies pages and pages in the denominational yearbook. Every missionary represents an investment of $2,500 and the Methodists are proud that they have so many missionaries. During the Coolidge era large Methodist churches were built in many American cities; today in most cities one or more Methodist congregations are staggering under a fantastic debt load. It all comes to money—and the money has to come out of the layman's pocket!

The thing that happened at the Methodist General Conference, therefore, represented an attempt to keep from repudiating openly the advanced social positions which the denomination had taken in the past while making it clear to the conservative laymen that they need not worry about the future. Unofficial groups were assured the right to use the name of the denomination in their titles, but were warned against letting the impression get out that they spoke for the church. The usual resolutions on peace were adopted, but the denomination's peace commission was left without an appropriation, so that its efforts will not assume large proportions. When it came to the critical report on social and economic questions, a pronouncement was brought in which was avowedly so neutral, so much "on-the-one-hand-and-on-the-other," that its total meaning added up to zero. The denomination which in 1932 adopted the report I have already quoted managed this year to run away from the whole social issue by declaring, as the mover of the report succinctly put it, that "there is a wide divergence of opinion among us as to the meaning of a Christian society as well as to the means of its realization."

Then, to make the triumph of the conservative laymen complete, the Methodist bishops, who have the power of nominating the members of the boards of the denomination, dropped their own colleague, the liberal Bishop Edgar Blake of Detroit, from the presidency of the Board of Education and put in his place the arch-reactionary of their number, Bishop Adna Wright Leonard of Pittsburgh. With Bishop Leonard in the president's seat, the membership of the board was then made up to include a group of ministers and laymen who are expected to put a sudden end to the liberal teaching which has been going out from this board to young people's groups. Already the board secretaries tagged with the Socialist label have been asked to resign "quietly." By this act the bishops have not only assured the laymen that the denomination's attitude on social issues will be kept regular in the future, but they have clearly identified themselves as a final stronghold of the forces of social reaction within the denomination.

This, in the main, is what has happened to social liberalism in the Methodist church. Much the same thing seems likely to happen in other churches, depending, of course, on the radicalism of the pronouncements on social issues which those churches may have made during the days when their laymen were prostrate and inarticulate. A revealing, if minor, incident at the Methodist conference was the ovation given to the moderator of the Presbyterian church, Dr. Joseph A. Vance of Detroit, when he spoke of capitalism and warned against "killing the goose that has laid the golden eggs." The reason for the present wave of reaction is not hard to discover. Protestant churches are essentially middle-class clubs. As the middle class feels the effect of business recovery it becomes increasingly indifferent to and even opposed to proposals for change in the social order. For capitalism, when it works, is acceptable to the middle class. If the Roosevelt recovery continues, the Protestant layman of the middle class will again find himself fairly well off. As soon as he does, he will tell his pastor to let social questions alone.

The other side of this picture is of course the fact that the Roman Catholic church, which is essentially not a middle-class club, is becoming socially aroused as the Protestant churches become socially silent. The use which the National Catholic Welfare Conference is making of the two papal social encyclicals is in striking contrast to the readiness of the Methodists to admit that nobody knows what a Christian society would be or how to get it. If the Catholic church could escape from the influence of one or two reactionary cardinals—especially with reference to the child-labor issue—it would be well set to make a new and unprecedentedly successful appeal to the mass of the laboring population. For that part of our population has already discovered that capitalism has no recovery to offer which will carry its benefits down to the common worker. Wall Street and the business index may tell the middle class member that happy days are (almost) here again. But there are still twenty million Americans on relief, with slight prospect of getting off; the number of unemployed has apparently become stabilized at eleven million; and the basic economic rivalries which make for war are everywhere being accentuated. If the Protestant church has a contribution to make toward the Christianizing of our social order, it must act quickly.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

UNDOUBTEDLY the downfall of J. H. Thomas and his forced resignation from the British Cabinet will be hailed by many of his former associates in the Labor government and Labor Party as a piece of retributive justice. Like Ramsay MacDonald, Thomas was ready to enter the bogus National government and to break with almost all the associations of a long and active life in order to stay in the Cabinet. Not that that was their sole motive. MacDonald and Thomas and the other National Laborites doubtless convinced themselves that they were patriotic in the highest degree in striking hands with their life-time enemies, the Conservatives, in order to keep England on the gold standard and prevent other financial disorders. They were not abashed by the country's prompt departure from that monetary standard and have since continued to act as if the present government were something other than an ordinary Conservative undertaking. For certain temperaments retirement to private life after a long public service becomes so unthinkable as subconsciously to warrant any new political orientation.

As I have repeatedly pointed out, there is nothing which so quickly disintegrates certain types of character as office-holding and the wielding of great political and social power. The record of the MacDonald administration was a sad one even before the Great Apostasy. One minister after another yielded to the seductions of high office, to the lure of "society," to the blandishments, the flattery, of those naturally on the other side of the political fence. Snowden's acceptance of a title—attributed to his wife's social ambitions—the profound influence exerted by certain titled persons upon MacDonald himself, and the swollen self-esteem of some of the other ministers—these are known of all men. But Thomas seems to have yielded to the get-rich-quick madness as if he were a member of the Miami Rotary Club or one of our leading bank presidents in the pre-Roosevelt era. Whether he let the budget secret out or not, it is quite sufficient that he had accepted an advance of $75,500—to buy his wife a house—on his unwritten memoirs, from a publisher who had never published anything but a racing sheet. He was either money mad or in financial distress—he followed the horses and bet steadily on all sorts of things. More than sufficient to drive him out of public life is the fact that he bet upon the chances of a fall election when he sat where he would have inside information. It would also seem a quite adequate reason for his resignation that he, a Cabinet minister, was a constant race-track gambler and that one of his close associates, who used his own son under a false name to place his bet at Lloyds on the coming of tax increases, was obviously not the type of man who should have had the free run of Mr. Thomas's office. With such a pal sooner or later leakage of an important state secret was inevitable.

So the damage is final and complete and cannot be explained away. It is a triple tragedy. Thomas has not only betrayed himself; he has betrayed the Labor Party even though no longer a part of it. Finally, he has dealt a dreadful blow to the high repute of British ministers and official life in general. That has been something that England has had a right to be proud of. Its Cabinet members might be short-sighted and stupid and wholly class-conscious, but it has been felt, with reason as the records show, that they were above speculation or what could be termed conduct unbecoming a minister of the Crown. The cables are probably correct in reporting a universal sense of shame, and universal relief that the offender resigned so promptly. The Labor people feel especially aggrieved. For here is a man who rose from the ranks, who became a great figure within the party, who was bound to set an example not only for his party's sake but for that of his class—and now he winds up in disgrace.

It does not mitigate the shock to say that he was anything but a success as Minister for the Colonies. He was from the beginning a misfit there. The Manchester Guardian as usual tells the exact truth when it says that "he has no achievement to his credit except the exacerbation of feeling within the empire." His part in the recent Irish dispute was unworthy of the government he represented. Hence, for all his one-time popularity both here and in England, there can be no real grief over his retirement. The pity of it is that no Labor government hereafter can take office without the questions being asked whether it contains one or more J. H. Thomases to betray the cause and how many others in it will be taken in by Milady This and the Countess That and flattered to their destruction by the undersecretaries and permanent officials. The pitfalls are many, and they are carefully prepared for those who have come up to the top after lives of hard labor, privation, and penury. The new office-holders are carefully studied, like organisms under the microscope, with a view to finding out their weaknesses and exploiting them. Is it human nature to yield? Inevitable that among many a few may stumble? Yes, but when the cause of the masses is at stake, when a tremendous popular movement has just reached its fruition and has seized the opportunity to govern where there has been misgovernment before, then its chosen representatives are in duty and in honor sacredly bound not to yield to their weaknesses or to indulge their desires for sudden wealth and $75,000 houses. For the evil that they do will live after them and the good be interréd with their bones.

BROUN'S PAGE

THE American Newspaper Guild took an important and an inevitable step at its third annual convention in New York when by a vote of eighty-four to five it decided to apply for membership in the A. F. of L. as an international union. At the beginning of the guild movement the members were pretty generally opposed to asking for affiliation. There were always some who favored such a move, but they soon learned that it would be quite impossible to sweep the membership along by even the most eloquent and vigorous campaign of propaganda. I am aware that quite a different theory has been spread on the record. Marlen Pew of Editor and Publisher and several newspaper owners have paid me the distinct compliment of charging that I personally kidnapped and dragooned some four or five thousand newspapermen and left them on the doorstep of the organized labor movement. I honestly wish it were true, because any such achievement on my part would be enormously good for my inferiority complex.

Unfortunately it has no basis in truth. I don't need to be too humble. I am proud of the fact that when organized newspapermen made their first articulate demands I did make a short speech in which I said that if we could not get those things we needed through the NRA and through a guild type of organization, we would seek them through the power of trade unionism. But at that time it was no more than a good guess. I based my prophecy on the distinct feeling that the newspaper publishers would not meet us halfway, one-third of the way, or even one-hundredth of the way. If any decorations are to be conferred upon the individuals who brought reporters into a consciousness of their part in the labor movement, those decorations must all go to the publishers.

The first contact between organized newspapermen and newspaper owners took the form of a cocktail party which the guild gave at the Hotel Astor for the publishers of New York. I was on an assignment in Washington and missed most of the party, but I am told that, between rounds, it was a sort of round-table discussion of the rights and privileges of reporters. Somebody mentioned the fact that newspapermen are grossly underpaid. All the publishers nodded a grave assent. Another guildsman mentioned the fact that jobs are insecure and argued that American reporters ought to have severance notices approaching those which obtain in Europe. Again there was complete agreement in principle.

Much encouraged, we set about to get from the newspaper publishers of New York an agreement which would include a few mild concessions. But the response to our first letter was neither friendly nor hostile. There just wasn't any response. After an interval of more than three years I timidly offered another olive branch only a few weeks ago. The American Newspaper Publishers' Association was meeting in New York, and as the president of the guild I sent a polite telegram to its executive (if memory serves me right a man from Syracuse named Barnum) in which I suggested that a good many misapprehensions as to guild policies and guild objectives might be cleared up if I could get permission to appear before the convention to give frank answers to any questions which they cared to ask. I said that I knew their time was limited and I had no desire to make a speech. Mr. Baumgart of Utica made no answer. When the guild convention met in New York recently a public invitation was extended to any publisher to appear and answer questions about the policies of his organization in order to clear up any misapprehensions among guild members as to the policies and objectives of the publishers' union. But again there was no answer.

Mr. Hearst's attitude of complete isolation from contacts with organized newspapermen has certainly helped the growth of the trade-union movement. Roy Howard's decision to break off negotiations with the World-Telegram unit and post his concessions on the bulletin board rather than through any sort of agreement speeded up the drift toward the A. F. of L. So did the lockouts carried on by various publishers in Staten Island, Newark, Jamaica, Harlem, and Lorain. But the man who most of all deserves to be decorated for bringing the American Newspaper Guild to the doorstep of the A. F. of L. is Marlen Pew of Editor and Publisher. The bitterness and unfairness of his editorial comment made converts every day.

In the beginning Mr. Pew professed to be very much in favor of newspaper organization, but when the Associated Press fired Morris Watson, Editor and Publisher commended the wire service for its action and said boldly and bluntly that every editor should fire every reporter who joined any sort of organization for collective bargaining. Mr. Pew has professed to be the bitter foe of Hearst, but his editorials have all been passionately against the guild strike in Milwaukee. The overwhelming vote for A. F. of L. affiliation at the last guild convention was the result of no leader's propaganda. No speech or article had anything to do with it. As a matter of fact the Guild Reporter was under instructions for a considerable period to carry no editorials in favor of affiliation. The decision of the membership was made in the manner in which all important decisions should be made. The members in units throughout the country decided that they wanted to get into the American Federation of Labor because there was no other way. The publishers had convinced them of the necessity and not by words but by deeds. When a man gets fired from a job for guild activity he does not need to hear a speech or read an editorial. He realizes that what he needs is a larger and a more powerful organization. He has learned out of experience. The publishers have furnished the experience, and we will furnish them the militant union. Van Bibber regrets that he will be unable to lunch today.

BOOKS and the ARTS

JUSTICE HOLMES: FLOWERING AND DEFEAT

BY MAX LERNER

THIS is a sad essay, for much of my reading recently has been in the opinions of the Supreme Court, and their narrow unyielding quality has sent my mind back to the towering figure by the side of whom Chief Justice Hughes seems merely a politician and Justice Sutherland a school-marm. The triumph of the present Supreme Court majority is in a real sense a triumph over Justice Holmes and the memory of Justice Holmes. In the same sense it is a triumph of legalism and business enterprise over literature and the philosophic mind. As I have watched the Supreme Court majority during the past fifteen months riding roughshod over every principle of humanism and tolerance that Holmes ever stood for, my mind has turned back with increasing frequency to Holmes himself—to his decisions and his speeches and his letters, all fit to stand with the great writing of America and its noblest thinking. I have turned back in quest of the roots of his flowering and defeat.

What emerges most clearly as one reads Holmes and reads about him is that here was a whole man. His genius—and it was genius—did not proceed from eccentricity, nor did it proceed from revolt. It was not the schizoid genius of a Poe, nor the tight austerity turned into flame of an Emerson, nor the truncated genius of a Melville. There was a wholeness about Holmes which could come only from the flowering of the sole aristocracy America has ever had—the New England intellectual aristocracy.

The picture that we have of Holmes as he grew into maturity is the picture of a young New England intellectual aristocrat, with literary and philosophical tastes, careening to success in his chosen profession of the law. He had chosen the law deliberately as a pathway to expression and not because some inner need or some cruel urge and pressure of the time dictated that career and that alone. He had a hunger for greatness or distinction of some sort and a hunger for adventure. He got his chance at the second during the Civil War, in which he was wounded three times and distinguished himself for bravery. When he came back from war he was ready to plunge just as intensely into the battles of peace, if only he could get an adversary formidable enough. That may be, indeed, why he chose law: simply because to fashion something great and enduring out of such barren and unyielding material one would need to have a firm sculptor's hand, and ample heat of the brain with which to govern the chisel. "In our youths," he afterwards said, "our hearts were touched with fire. It was given to us to learn at the outset that life is a profound and passionate thing." It was this conviction that enabled him to master the technicalities of legal study, read his fill of the English Yearbooks, get out his edition of Kent's "Commentaries" and his book on the "Common Law." But even as a young lawyer he was still absorbingly interested in philosophy. In an office on Beacon Street, with the shades drawn, the gas-light flaring, a whiskey bottle on the table, and Holmes's tall frame leaning against the mantel, he and William James would spend the evening in talk, "twisting the tail of the cosmos."

He seemed to have all the gifts the gods could offer: family, wit, elegance, grace, a profound belief in life, a quiet self-assurance, a deep sense of security. He was of the leisure class, he lived and talked in the grand manner, with just enough hint of the casual, the profane, and the shocking to make it clear that the grand manner was something he adopted deliberately while he viewed it objectively. His success was like an irresistible force. He taught at Harvard College; got the first professorship of law for which there was an opening; and, barely launched on legal teaching, was elevated to the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. No wonder that later he was able to touch the hearts of all young men with fire. For what he did for them was to take a profession that was rapidly becoming too commercialized and sordid even for the strong stomachs of American youth and invest it with nobility, grandeur, daring.

Holmes came to the bench already equipped with a philosophy which he had compounded somehow out of Plato, Emerson, and William James and out of his own already fabulous experience. It was not a self-contained philosophic system in which the ends always met. More often than not he brought to the writing of one of his opinions merely a series of sharp insights and sharper phrases, which he would proceed to lick into shape and give an organic structure mainly by his unflagging vitality. His thought flowed from an insistence that any fact had to validate itself before it could disturb his desire to let past experience stand. "All that I mean by truth is what I can't help thinking. . . . But I have learned to surmise that my can't helps are not necessarily cosmic."

But he had not rid himself of the influence of Plato, or of Plato in Emerson. Try as he would to wash his thought in the cynical acid of pragmatism, he still lived considerably in the realm of essences. There was always a straining for the universal, a restlessness until he had shown "the relation of his fact to the framework of the universe." Although he was called a sociological jurist, the values and experience he cared most about were of invariance rather than change. He had his eye peeled always for the curious uniformity with which the human animal behaves, whatever the century: he sought identities, whereas his colleague Brandeis always sought mutations.

His equipment in the lore of human uniformity was profound; his equipment in the sciences of social change was negligible. He gave lip-service to economics, and said that the man of the future in law was not the black-letter man but the economist; yet his own economics was fragmentary and almost archaic.

But beyond philosophy or economics, Holmes was ridden by two myths: that of the soldier and that of the gambler. Life was a campaign, requiring heroic and disciplined individual qualities. Life was a throw of the dice, but the stakes were worth the risks. Both myths, it will be seen, are of the leisure class. His memory of the war made his approach to life that of the good soldier; his philosophy was an aleatory philosophy—the gods playing at dice with human destinies; his theory of law was that it was merely “the rules of the game.” With this framework it was amazing how successful Holmes was in handling the problems of a complicated industrial world. On the Massachusetts bench his tough and skeptical conservatism allowed the existing legal rule—embodying all the changes and chances of the past—to stand unless the new doctrine forced its way in. On the United States Supreme Court he turned his skepticism toward the process of judicial interpretation itself, and would allow the action of the legislature—embodying men’s experience and the risks they were willing to take in learning how to govern themselves—to stand unless it seemed entirely unreasonable. What had seemed conservatism at first now seemed radicalism.

But Holmes was no radical. He was against any “tinkering with the institution of property.” “The notion that with socialized property we should have women free and a piano for everybody seems to me an empty humbug.” After rendering an opinion favorable to some strikers he went on very sedulously to disclaim having any illusions that strikes were economically valid. He saw them merely as “a lawful instrument in the universal struggle for life.” In fact, his whole conception seems at times an aristocratic refinement on Darwinism. He believed in the law of the economic jungle, but he wanted to see the beasts behave like gentlemen and observe the rules of the game. He was able to come out in protection of trade unionism on the ground that it gave the employees “equality of bargaining power”—that is, a good gambling chance. But to apply an individualistic approach or a philosophy of risk and gamble to American business was a thankless task. Business was more adept at that than was anything dreamed of in Holmes’s philosophy: it had Holmes licked even before the word go. Given monopoly conditions, law could not be regarded with Olympian calm. To view thus the position of the worker as against the large corporation, or the small business man as against the holding company, was at best a bitter sort of irony.

Like Henry Adams, Holmes was the flowering of an aristocracy that felt itself bewildered under the impact of the new industrialism. But while Adams analyzed with a poignant awareness the sources of his defeat, Holmes gallantly and robustly proclaimed that one could still live in a world like this. Even aristocrats could. The function of the aristocrat was to maintain the great traditions while the forces loose in an industrial world battled it out to a conclusion. But Holmes is dead, and his influence lingers only with a few dissenters, protesting in a diminuendo. The prevailing tone of style and thought in the Supreme Court decisions is now set by Justice McReynolds and Justice Sutherland. But while Holmes’s defeat shows that the preindustrial aristocratic tradition cannot grapple with the problems of finance capitalism, he will always be proof that the tradition could generate a superb personality and a great style.

BOOKS

Tradition for Tradition’s Sake

REACTIONARY ESSAYS ON POETRY AND IDEAS. By Allen Tate. Charles Scribner’s Sons. $2.50.

EVEN in his title Mr. Tate is the hard-pressing dialectician; for reaction, it is explained later, is actually the most radical of programs, since “it aims at cutting away the overgrowth and getting back to the roots.” What we are accustomed to call radicalism is simply a modified version of a heresy that has been with us for a long time, a mere “rearranging of the foliage.” Such boldness of paradox is characteristic of Mr. Tate’s method throughout, a method of unrelenting definition and redefinition which makes for criticism that is at once stimulating and exhausting. For it is one of the tacit assumptions of this criticism that the critic must never permit himself to become emotional, even when he is dealing with emotional subjects, and the reader must respond by pretending to remove any such suspicion from his mind. He must meet the critic on his own plane of dialectic logic, however difficult that may be, and in Mr. Tate’s case it is very difficult indeed. To some readers the effort may seem greater than the rewards; but for those who feel that no effort is too great, no mass of intellectual overgrowth too tangled to break through, in the search for some light on our problems, Mr. Tate’s book will offer plenty of rewards of every kind.

The largest single idea to be extracted from it is the conviction—which Mr. Tate rightly admits is not, beyond a certain point, demonstrable—that experience is something which must be grasped as a whole. Apparently Mr. Tate has been led to this conclusion through his study of literature, for the volume opens with a half-dozen papers on specific literary figures and topics, each devoted to one or another aspect of the general view, and pointing toward the long theoretical essay entitled Three Types of Poetry. For Mr. Tate, poetry, the right sort of poetry, is neither propaganda, which he calls allegory, nor romantic self-expression, which he calls “the poetry of the will,” but a vision of the whole—a creation of “the totality of experience in its quality.” Its ultimate function is to provide “a focus of repose for the will-driven intellect that constantly shakes the equilibrium of persons and societies with its unrelieved imposition of partial formulas upon the world.” From literature as something complex and imponderable, and therefore only to be apprehended in its entirety, Mr. Tate is naturally led to an inspection of that other important vehicle of qualitative experience, religion. In Humanism and Religion dialectic is reduced to its barest in an attack on what is described as the anti-naturalistic naturalism of Paul Elmer More and his school: Mr. Tate defends the “whole view” of religion against the partial formula of the humanists in the name not of any particular religion but of an undefined religious point of view.

The important long essay Religion and the Old South is a deeper and more elaborate statement of the same point of view. In this essay we are presented with the not too happy analogy of the horse—the whole horse of religion in contradistinction to both the half-horse of science and the half-horse of romantic mysticism. We are made aware of the futility of pure Quantity and of the vacuity of pure Quality by an illustration of the manner in which both are compounded in actual reality. Also in this essay Mr. Tate presses on to the more direct and immediate application of his doctrine. If literature led him to religion, religion now leads him to politics, or at least geography. For we are asked to examine the present status and future possibilities of religion in one particular area of the earth's surface. On the whole, Mr. Tate is discouraging about the state of religious health in the South, and skeptical about its future; the trouble with the South is that it has always been without an adequate system of religious dogma. But while it has had a weak religion it has had a very strong tradition. And for Mr. Tate, at least in this essay, tradition comes to be pretty nearly as good a thing as religion. Like religion, from which it becomes separated in his analysis, it offers a concrete way of dealing with concrete things. The only question is whether there is enough of it left to enlist support for its restoration. This, Mr. Tate decides in a passage that will be seized on by certain of his opponents, would lead to action, that is, to politics.

No such résumé as this can possibly do justice to the whole of Mr. Tate's book—which is perhaps another way of saying that criticism, when it is on as high a plane as this, is of the same qualitative essence as literature: it is incapable of being abstracted into anything but itself. No summary can indicate the quality of intensity, for example, which animates every line of its prose. Emotion in this critic is not a superficial property of style, betrayed in rhythm and language, but something inherent in the mental process itself, as it should be in good criticism. Nor is it possible to point out the many special insights and observations, especially those having to do with the poetic art, which are the incidental by-products of the argument. The total value of this criticism is not measurable by the extent of one's agreement with its assumptions and implications.

For it will be necessary to note briefly what seems to be a contradiction between the idea of tradition, which must be "automatically operative" in order to be valid, and the main implication of the book, that tradition can and must be defended through political action. Does this not require that tradition itself be reduced to one of those hateful abstractions by which "the qualitative view of experience" is robbed of its true value and function? Does not the defense tradition become another mischievous expression of "the will-driven intellect"? The final objection to Mr. Tate's position turns out to be the very one that he raised against the humanists: "Mr. More's doctrine is morality for morality's sake, and if art for art's sake has always been an outrage upon reason, his position is no less so." By divorcing tradition from religion or any other body of objective values, as he seems to be doing, Mr. Tate is actually perpetrating the same sort of outrage upon reason. He is asking us to believe that tradition is capable of lifting itself by its own boot-straps, which is tradition for tradition's sake. And this doctrine, like any other sufficiently indifferent to the historical relationship between values and experience, can become, in the wrong hands, a very mischievous doctrine indeed.

WILLIAM TROY

The Range of Engels

FRIEDRICH ENGELS. By Gustav Mayer. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

THIS is the first full biography to be devoted to Engels, and it is by the foremost living authority upon its subject. For over a generation Professor Mayer has devoted his energies to the history of socialism, and the two-volume work he devoted to Engels last year will long remain the essential discussion of its theme. In the present book he has aimed, above all, at a portrait of Engels the man, and the result is wholly admirable. Engels emerges from the shadow of Marx as a full and significant human being. Learned, creative, generous, warm-hearted, even gay, it is not difficult to feel in him the qualities of a great man. Even without Marx, he would have been a thinker of distinctive importance. The union of their dual insight led to the most distinguished partnership in the history of social thought.

In the portrait painted by Professor Mayer, what is above all arresting is the range of Engels's mind. Philosophy, natural science, history—he is aware of the central movement of ideas in all of these. He can write brilliantly upon military questions. He is, as his articles in half a score of journals make evident, able to comment with pungency and insight upon the passing affairs of the day. His vision extends from California to Russia; he is able to see the significance of the gold discoveries in the one as he penetrates the significance of the abolition of serfdom in the other. No doubt he has some of Marx's own defects. He suffered from excessive optimism; though he saw the large shape of the revolution he helped to make, he was always premature in predicting its advent. He was harsh to those who differed from him, and, like Marx, he was never really just to Lassalle. Like Marx, also, he did not suffer fools over-gladly, and where he disagreed he did not avoid the temptation to condemn. Unlike Marx, he seems wholly free from vanity, though it is not improbable that this difference is partly to be explained by his own more comfortable circumstances. Those who attack Marx on this score must ceaselessly remember the tragedy of a man of genius almost the whole of whose life is passed in a bitter struggle with a gnawing poverty which results from his own supreme integrity.

The attractiveness of Engels as a man is evident on every page of Professor Mayer's book. His loyalty and devotion have rightly become proverbial. His courage is only less remarkable; and his own integrity has never been called into question. In the forty years of his friendship with Marx there is only one clouded moment, and this due to no lack of faith in Engels himself. Again and again his insight into the major events of his time is amazing—on America, Ireland, Russia, on British trade unionism he saw horizons the significance of which we are only just beginning to discern. Forty years after his death the quality of his written work—not least his letters—seems even more enduring than in his own lifetime. And when it is remembered that for practically a generation he was a slave to a business he hated from a sense of obligation to the movement he served, it is impossible not to salute as noble a man as there has been in the history of the socialist movement.

Professor Mayer has done his work with exactly the balance the ordinary reader requires. The scholar, perhaps, would like a little more detail on minor points. Was, for instance, his "Conditions of the Working Class" inspired by Buret? Or was it independently conceived? Did he ever fully understand the trade unionism with which he was so impatient? What is the meaning of the preface he wrote to the final edition of the Communist Manifesto? These, and other questions like them, would perhaps have justified a discussion Professor Mayer does not undertake. But what is here is, clearly enough, as lifelike and accurate a portrait as we are likely to have. No living scholar other than Professor Mayer could have written it with the same easy mastery of the complicated materials. It is an indispensable book to anyone who wishes to know the detailed history of Marxian socialism. HAROLD J. LASKI

"Dream's Enterprise"

POEMS, 1919-1934. Walter de la Mare. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

WALTER DE LA MARE in his introduction to Rupert Brooke's poems took occasion to remark that "visionaries are those whose eyes are fixed on the distance, on the beginning and the end rather than on the incidental excitement of life's journey." He went on to declare that "such poets have to learn to substantiate their imaginings, to base their fantastic palaces on terra firma." It was De la Mare's misfortune, however, to become a poet at a time when the world discouraged a visionary. Yeats alone of this period had built, out of Irish mythology, a realm of the imagination into which he could retreat and with which he could compare the world of reality. De la Mare's has been the world of childhood rather than the world of heroic myth, a realm both ephemeral and intangible, the world of childhood as it is remembered by the adult. This poet, born evidently a very dreamy and sensitive child, became in later years a statistician, and passed eighteen years of his life in the Anglo-American Oil Company. In consequence, his work, like Lamb's, whose career so greatly resembles his own, reflects a characteristic escape into whimsicality and nostalgia for the lost, even while it lacks Lamb's bitterness and wit. There is a continuous longing for childhood's remembered intensity together with an adult's recognition that these early experiences can be recaptured only briefly, and then projected as through a glass, darkly.

De la Mare is, to be sure, concerned only with beginnings and with ends, and not with the incidental excitement of life's journey. His earlier poetry reflects most often the child's quick sensitivity, while his later poetry dwells continuously on the end of life, on the release, the peace of death—of death in no conventional guise, but as a return to a childhood awareness. Nor does De la Mare forget that the visionary must base his "palaces on terra firma." But his terra firma is most likely to be the child's picture of reality. Note the beginning of his very fine poem describing the escape from life—The Last Coachload:

Crashed through the woods that lumbering Coach. The dust
Of flinted roads bepowdering fellow and hood,
Its gay paint cracked, its axles red with rust,
It lunged, lurched, toppled through a solitude

Of whispering boughs, and feathery, nid-nod grass.
Plodded the fetlocked horses. Glum and mum
Its ancient Coachman reeked not where he was Nor into what strange haunt his wheels were come.

The poem continues then, from an account of the actual journey to a description of the escape into the infinite release.

All Journeying done. Rest now from lash and spur—Laughing and weeping, shoulder and elbow—'t would seem
The Coach capacious all Infinity were.
And these the fabulous figments of dream

Visiting SOVIET RUSSIA with EXPERTS

LOUIS FISCHER'S GROUP—Behind the scenes with one who has lived 13 years in the Soviet Union. Special services and comforts. 5 weeks in Russia with Tourist passage. $850

JULIEN BRYAN'S GROUP—Great centers and places seldom seen by tourists. One month in Russia with Third Class passage. $575

JOSHUA KUNITZ'S GROUP—A comprehensive itinerary. One month in Russia with Third Class passage $469

Other trips of a month or more in Soviet Russia from $372

Or you may travel on your own

Don't forget the Fourth Moscow
Theatre Festival, Sept. 1—10.

Booklets on request

THE OPEN ROAD

12th FLOOR

8 West 40th St., New York

Cooperating With Intourist

Just published

The new novel by the author of MAN'S FATE

DAYS OF WRATH

by André Malraux

A passionate, flaming novel of the human spirit triumphant in a world gone mad—by France's greatest living novelist. A Book-of-the-Month Club selection. $1.75

RANDOM HOUSE

Mad for escape; frenzied each breathless mote,
Lest rouse the Old Enemy from his death-still swoon,
Lest crack that whip again—they fly, they float,
Scamper, breathe—"Paradise!" abscond, are gone . . .

There have, of course, been other visionary poets, other poets who dreamed toward escape. Poe, for example, courted the weird through images intellectually contrived to enhance the strangeness of his verse music. Shelley, because often the world was too much for him, disembodied in imagery all he pictured, made reality into spirit, himself into spirit. Blake, a visionary of the Old Testament variety, born of wrath, threw against the reality which he abhorred his own early Christian conceptions of right and wrong. Coleridge escaped into the supernatural, drawing his imagery mostly from curious books and embodying these concepts in dream images.

Indeed, every visionary poet projects in his poetry the realm most akin to his spirit. Old mythologies, old or new philosophies have sometimes given a poet his symbols of truth. But De la Mare was born into a scientific world. For him, certainly, childhood held the only beauty, and this was an intangible thing, an awareness, an exploration only. When he had to recognize adulthood, he knew it as a kind of purgatory through which one must pass in order to escape again into newness, into a new sense of eternal freshness—for so he pictures death. All his symbols and his images are really those which give an abrupt, brief, growing awareness, such as the child fathoms. Adult life for him is a "wild banishment." But he never presents in poetry a dull anguish or a heavy despair, only a groping, evanescent hunger. His images are delicate, silvery, and fluttering; his music is variable and flute-like. In a world of dawns, dusks, and moonlights, of small sounds, feathery touches, light whispers, he affirms the hope that one "may pierce through all earthly memory" and rediscover the shadowy, marvelous impressions of life's inner growing, of the beginning, or understand the mystery of its end, of the final release.

EDA LOU WALTON

Fallacies of Life Insurance

LIFE INSURANCE—A LEGALIZED RACKET. By Mort Gilbert and E. Albert Gilbert. Marlowe Publishing Company. $2.50.

LIFE INSURANCE—A CRITICAL EXAMINATION. By Edward Berman. Harper and Brothers. $2.

ABOUT the time the first American policy was written, Barry Cornwall had already defined life insurance as "the greatest humbug in Christendom." Only last winter in one of his humorous radio skits Fred Allen described it as "a contract a man signs agreeing to go through life poor so he can die rich." Today some 65,000,000 policy holders in America are invited backstage to see the players, the props, and the sets of this greatest financial drama of all times. Two provocative volumes now bid you to view that side of life insurance most of us seldom if ever see. Neither volume challenges the basic principle of insurance; indeed, no one can—successfully.

Both books, however, rightly and justifiably attack the administration of life insurance, and this on the most vulnerable flanks. The inordinately high premium rates, the misadmixture of insurance and savings in the hybrid endowment and limited-pay contracts, the industrial-insurance disgrace, the policy-loan racket, the agency system, the net-cost fable, the dividend humbug, come in for fair and proper criticism at the hands of challengers who do not pull their punches. Mort and E. Albert

Gilbert have captioned their book on life insurance "a legalized racket." Professor Edward Berman has described his volume as "a critical examination" of the subject. In the distinctions between these two captions lie all the differences in the manner, style, and vigor of their respective criticisms and their proposed remedies.

The Gilberts have defined their subject, to use their own words, as "a detailed exposition of the workings of life insurance, an analysis of the more popular kinds of policies, and a documented exposé of America's most respectable confidence game." What is more, they show just what the policy holder can do to get from under the heavy burdens of high-cost insurance. For this alone their volume deserves wide attention. They show how to retrieve the cash values in the insurance contract without reduction of the insurance estate; how to make the insurance company carry the entire load of protection for which it is being adequately compensated; how to cancel the policy loans with profit to the estate. In their advice they make out a strong case for switching to the so-called renewable term contract, which "at age thirty-five costs less than half as much as ordinary life, one-third as much as twenty-payment life, and one-fifth as much as twenty-year endowment." Now many policy holders, because of impaired health, cannot effect a switch or a "twist," to use the term employed by the companies for the practice that is usually good for the policy holder but not so happy for the company. This class of insured also may find sound counsel between the covers of the Gilbert manual.

For those who are not impaired the renewable term policy is an inexpensive way of providing protection. The Gilberts remind the insured that whether he pays $10 per thousand or $50, upon death the beneficiary receives only $1,000. What is worse, they show that in the latter case the beneficiary gets nothing from the cash accumulations within the policy, in spite of the many misleading claims of the companies that insurance is an investment or that insurance is "better than a government bond"—as was once extravagantly claimed by the venerable William Alexander, the present $40,000-a-year secretary of the Equitable Life Assurance Society. When they arraign insurance on charges of high net costs the Gilberts are on firm ground too, but experience seems to justify Mr. Epstein's cynicism when he says of the authors in his introduction to the Gilbert volume: "Their advice to policy holders to organize, it seems to me, will prove least fruitful of results."

Professor Berman's book makes out a strong case for savings-bank life insurance, which has been in successful operation in Massachusetts for a generation, thanks to the pioneering labors of the Honorable Louis D. Brandeis, associate justice of the Supreme Court, and the earlier foresight of Elizur Wright. This form of insurance operates under state supervision, but is privately run by the mutual savings banks of the state. The system is not, as is sometimes supposed, operated by the commonwealth with the taxpayers' money.

In examining the fifteen largest life companies, this volume shows how much cheaper savings-bank life-insurance rates are; how much more favorable is the expense ratio of the savings-bank system; how much better their investment experience than that of the insurance companies; how much better the lapse and surrender ratios of the system; in short, why all other states in the union should establish similar systems which do not employ agents or any of the other high-cost selling and administrative instrumentalities that are the insurance world of today. Professor Berman stands his ground best when he discusses our great national disgrace, which shackles the lives of some 40,000,000 individuals. "We believe," he says, "that the wage-earning class itself would be greatly benefited if no company were permitted to sell insurance policies of the kind sold to wage-earners today by the industrial-insurance companies operating in the United States." An unfortunate use of figures on page 151, however, makes Professor Berman's critical volume vulnerable at the hands of insurance companies, who are prone to seize every typographical error as evidence to prove the incompetency of criticism justly leveled.

It is to be regretted that both the Gilberts and Professor Berman failed to show how the federal government, with its new series of United States savings bonds, issued in small denominations, now makes it possible for the insured to save with virtual safety alongside his term-insurance policy. The individual policy holder will probably benefit more from reading the Gilbert treatise than from the Berman book, but both are worthy additions to the literature on that side of life insurance which demands a square deal for the policy holder.

L. SETH SCHNITMAN

Dissenting Opinion

THE BEAUTIES AND FURIES. By Christina Stead. D. Appleton-Century Company. $2.50.

MISS STEAD'S latest book has been widely praised. This in itself need not be a recommendation to an honest critic, but when a reviewer with the acumen and taste of Mr. Fadiman of the New Yorker writes that a book has "such streaming imagination, such tireless wit, such intellectual virtuosity" that its author is not only "the most extraordinary woman novelist produced by the English-speaking race since Virginia Woolf" but "a simon-pure genius," even the most cold-blooded reader must sit up and take notice. I started the book with eagerness, prejudiced in its favor in advance.

And having read it, I must sadly dissent. To me, Miss Stead is not a genius, nor is her book extraordinary or fine. It seems to be simply the story of a cold, leech-like, mindless middle-class wife, involved in an amour with a young student in Paris and returning at last to her incredibly long-forgiving husband, leaving the young man happily starting another affair. This little domestic triangle is adumbrated by literally hundreds of pages of gaseous conversation pretending to wit and erudition by the use of classical allusion and such words and phrases as "she calcined," "zentrum," "calentures," "infundibular prison," "quincunial gardens," "your heart . . . like a redolent ham in your breast."

If these are harsh words, here is a sample of Miss Stead's style:

She was in love. Only by imagining hyperbolic and hyperborean scenes of license, folly, and luxury, throngs of splendid women, sybaritic men, courts, staircases, frescoes, tapestries, plate, porcelain, jewels, wild-hued cheeks, eyes flashing with zodiacal light, spilled wines, lips smeared with sherbets, serpented arms, agate-nailed hands, small snowy feet, like doves, Medusan locks, and angelican skies and the scattered roses of blood and the ascending spirals of mystic purple, and the wild, white-browed, dark-locked faunish youth, and old age paunched or shriveled with white body-hair, lazily leering with dead-fish eyes, like almonds slit through their green and pasty rinds, and purple mouths ending in folds and ranges of lofty noses, whiter and snottier than the jutting Tyrol, and love, bestial and divine, to excess—only by these dreams could she forget her love, fever, and the insufficiency of men.

The like of this passage could be duplicated on fifty pages of Miss Stead's book. I confess that to me it is merely dull—not even, as perhaps she intended it to be, salacious.

Her characters are, with the single exception of the long-

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

by C. B. S. Evans, M.D., F.A.M.A., Member White House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by B. W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch.M., M.B., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecological and Sexologist, London, England.

including charts of the organs with detailed explanations

By ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M.D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital

3-WAY GUIDE:

TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

CONTENTS

Bride and Groom

Sexual Overtures
First sexual contact
Frequency of sexual relations
The sexual cycle
Sexual response in men and women: timing

The Cold Wife—Frigidity

Mental, Psychic and Physical Barriers
Effects of Menstruation
Effects of Physical Development
Effects of early parental training
The clumsy husband
Pseudo-Frigidity
Pseudo-Response
Sexual Under-development
The pleasure-motif in sex

The Unsatisfied Wife

Effect upon nerves
Fear of pregnancy
The Acquiescent Wife
True and false sexual response
Happily managing the sex act
Problems of orgasm
The satisfaction of normal sexual appetite
The oversexed wife

Married Courtship

Making desires known via the special language of sex
Tactics the husband should use
Tactics the wife should use
Helpful preliminaries to sexual union
The sensual appeal; the spiritual appeal
Secondary sexual centers

The Perfect Physical Expression of Love

Positions in intercourse: Factors in determining choice
Two types of orgasm in sex
Producing simultaneous climax
The mechanical principles of sexual union
Sexual stimulation
Sexual adjustment

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."

—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."

—Lancet (leading Eng. med. journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."

—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."

—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."

—Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n

* The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View ■ Organs, Side View ■ Male Sex Organs, Front View ■ Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views. The External Sex Organs ■ Female Sex Organs, Front View ■ Entrance to Female Genital Parts ■ Male Sex

(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 465-N 333 Sixth Ave., New York

Send me in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 plus few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded.

Name.....

Address.....

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee.)

suffering husband mentioned above, without frankness, honor, loyalty, or passion. Her young lover is a chestnut-haired Don Juan with a "small, dark-red mouth"; her erring wife is slumbrous, dark-browed, but needs to "build up her bosom." Coromandel, daughter of an old antique dealer and a mad mother, "resembled closely a China pompadour bust, upon a small stele"—"no Dresden shepherdess ever bore a whiter, deeper, or more noble bosom, or a smaller head." But the pièce de résistance of the novel is the frustrated genius Marpurgo, who does most of the talking. Marpurgo is by birth an Italian, by law an Englishman, by temperament Parisian; he buys lace for a living, runs up extravagant expense accounts, interferes maliciously in the affairs of his neighbors, lies about everything, and talks. Curiously enough a sample of Marpurgo's conversation would sound a good deal like the passage about love quoted above. Miss Stead has diffuseness but no great variety.

Not her garrulous pretentiousness, not the lush commonplaceness of her images counts most heavily against Miss Stead. These merely make her tiresome. But her book has another more serious defect, which I believe definitely precludes its being considered a fine novel. It is without virtue, seriousness, morality, if you like. These talkers are lost souls, with no anchor, no port to put into, no course by which to steer. They pay allegiance to no idea, no person, no tradition. Nor is there, as in the case of Proust or Aldous Huxley, a seeming awareness of their futility in a world that is also lost. They are little over-dressed marionettes whirling around in a meaningless sea of words. As far as Miss Stead is concerned, Virginia Woolf is still without a peer.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Mr. Prall's Aesthetic

AESTHETIC ANALYSIS. By D. W. Prall. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $2.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Prall's new book does not seem to record radical shifts in theoretical position or to explore essentially new ground, its appearance is an event for students of aesthetics. For no other book of the importance of his earlier "Aesthetic Judgment" has been written in this country, with the exception of Mr. Dewey's, since the publication in 1896 of "The Sense of Beauty." The contribution which this book makes consists in its deeper analysis of some aspects of the earlier theory. Restricting the term "aesthetic," as he did before, to the surfaces of experience, Mr. Prall first seeks to define more exhaustively and precisely the elements which make up these surfaces and the orders of which they are intrinsically capable, and then to explain how, through these, the artist expresses the feelings of those sections of his experience which interest him.

Searching as Mr. Prall's analysis is, it is not altogether free of difficulties, and of these, two seem of fundamental importance. The first springs from Mr. Prall's shifting use of the pivotal words "emotion" and "feeling," and from his assertion, sanctioned partly by his terminology, that art expresses feelings or emotions. It is only fair to state that Mr. Prall's presentation of this thesis is one of the very few with which the reviewer is acquainted which makes a serious effort to show exactly how art expresses emotion. But the very thoroughness of the analysis reveals the weakness of the thesis, and makes it clear to the careful reader that what can be meant is that objects on which aesthetic attention is focused consist of determinate objective characters, which language sometimes denotes by words used to denote emotions.

No one of course wishes to deny that objects give rise to bodily processes, and that these processes, if we become aware of them, are the emotions, which are defined not only by the character of the processes but also by the objects which arouse them. Nor is it denied that they always help partly to determine the character of the objects on which we are attending. What is denied is that the aesthetic object expresses emotions. It arouses emotion, but in inverse proportion to the degree of rapt attention we pay it. And only loyalty to a terminology convenient perhaps for criticism but radically inadequate for precise analysis will insist that this is what is meant by the expression of emotion. Though seemingly verbal to the superficial glance, the point is of extreme importance, since the thesis that art expresses emotions fails to point out that the emotion an aesthetic object arouses is a variable over which the artist has little or no control, and that what he does control is the objective characters he is interested in expressing.

The second difficulty consists of Mr. Prall's account of "aesthetic" apprehension. For him it consists of the apprehension of "the surface" of our world, but it excludes the apprehension of conceptual schemes, and hence it is not an intellectual activity. It includes, however, the apprehension of meanings present on the aesthetic surface attended to, since he holds, and rightly, that the apprehension of mere surface is never possible. This seems to involve a contradiction. And the manner in which Mr. Prall gradually and insensibly passes from his restricted use of the term aesthetic in the first and second chapters to the common, more extended use in the fifth confirms the reader's suspicion. And it suggests that what marks aesthetic quality is not that, being mere surface, it is immediately present to attention, but that it is capable of holding attention exclusively and centripetally, thus constituting a self-sufficient and autonomous universe, and the only one that exists during the aesthetic experience.

These observations are not at all meant to disparage the signal achievement of Mr. Prall's work. The high esteem in which he is held by all serious students of aesthetics is fully merited. For, however the aesthetic response may be defined and whatever the content of the aesthetic object may be considered to be, the task of isolating the elements of aesthetic surfaces and of defining the orders of which they are intrinsically capable is of primary importance, not only for theory, but for a sound criticism and an adequate enjoyment.

ELISEO VIVAS

RADIO

I LIKED Dr. John Erskine on the Kraft cheese hour, particularly when he played. Bing Crosby was a little less happy on the same program, or perhaps it would be more precise to say that he was too happy. Mr. Crosby was interviewing Dr. Erskine on the classics, and the dialogue seemed to be built upon the notion that here was a meeting of a crooner and a pedant, and that the guest star must be supported by Crosby's quips. Now as a matter of fact Dr. Erskine is an old hand at radio and possesses a dry and ready wit. He really stands in no need of such interruptions as "Now you're in my kitchen."

It is difficult for anybody to talk when he has to wait for the other fellow's laughs, and this is a common fault in radio. Too often the interviewer is strutting his own stuff and using the subject of the questions merely as a foil. Values have a curious way of becoming mixed upon the air. John Erskine should not be used as a stooge for Bing Crosby.

In somewhat similar vein it seems to me that the Major Bowes hour would be far more interesting if it were not for Major Bowes. Of course I give the Major every credit as a sagacious entrepreneur. I just don't think he's much of an entertainer. As an organizer he ranks with the real industrial geniuses of America. Whether or not the amateur idea originated with him, it is still true that he grasped its manifold financial possibilities more completely than any rival. The set-up, in so far as it concerns Major Bowes, is one which would have aroused the envy of the elder Rockefeller. Never before has amateurism been made to yield such dividends.

To be sure, the word "amateur" is construed loosely, in the manner of our more successful college football teams, but these singers, dancers, and accordion players are recruited from the limbo of small time or the unknown. Few are very good, but none are terrible. Still, it is a surprisingly interesting program in spite of the over-lengthy introductions of the Major. In the beginning he proceeded on two sound psychological assumptions. The program was based upon the theory that the great American public is cruel and that it is sentimental. Apparently the Major, an extremely intuitive fellow, has decided that we are more sentimental than directly cruel. The gong which was a ration for our sadism has disappeared. The hour is now based on the familiar success story, "Local boy makes good."

"The wheel goes round and round," the Major exclaims every once and too often. He is correct in assuming that his entertainment caters to the gambling instinct in us all. The last soprano was not so very good, but the baritone who is about to sing—his name is Joe Doaks and he drove a taxi in Akron—may prove to be one of the sensational singers of all time. It doesn't happen but there is always that chance, and so we wait and listen to the bootblack from Lynn. Of the making of Miltons there is no end, and a benevolent gentleman who undertakes to bring out the mute and inglorious finds to his great surprise that he himself is the one to reach the rainbow and win the pot of gold.

HEYWOOD BROWN

FILMS

Further Documents

IN an unquiet corner of the Grand Central Palace last week could be seen and heard twice daily a documentary film produced by the Resettlement Administration. The occasion was the fourteenth annual Women's Exposition of Arts and Industries—an indoor fair which all but smothered this little work of art with vast, irrelevant waves of light and sound. In spite of everything, however, it was a work of art. Written and directed by Pare Lorentz, accompanied by music from the hand of Virgil Thomson, and declaring its practical purpose at every moment of its flight across the screen, "The Plow That Broke the Plains" was in some very pure fashion effective.

Its intention was to make as clear as possible the disaster which has overtaken the Great Plains from Dakota to Texas; what the government has been saying about dust storms in the newspapers was said here in thirty minutes of unforgettable pictures—first of the plains when grass grew on them and cowboys followed their herds beneath the sun, then of the first

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE

MOROSCO THEA., 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Wednesday & Saturday at 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:45

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:45
300 Seats at $1.10

CONFERENCES

MEETING

TAMIMENT SUMMER CONFERENCE LABOR'S NATIONAL FORUM

Six Sessions—June 25 to June 28

Labor's Status since the NRA, the Problem of Constitutional Amendment, Political Currents among Organized Workers will be discussed by

Commissioner Elmer F. Andrews	Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia
J. J. Bambrick	Algernon Lee
Harry Chapman	Mayor Jasper McLevy
Professor Morris R. Cohen	Abraham Miller
John T. Flynn	Charlton Ogburn
Harvey Fremming	Alex Rose
John P. Frey	Samuel Shore
President William Green	Louis Waldman
Elinore M. Herrick	Chester M. Wright
Senator Rush Holt	Max Zaritsky

Special rate: $3.00 per day. Moderate Conference fee.

Camp Tamiment, 7 E. 15th St., ALgonquin 4-3094.

For regular Summer rates write Camp Tamiment, Tamiment, Pa.

Nation Readers are invited to the Summer Conference of the League for Industrial Democracy

FOREST HOUSE, At Interlaken, LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y.
Friday, June 19 to Sunday, June 21, 1936.

Subject: "WAR AGAINST WAR"

Speakers and Discussion Leaders include: Norman Thomas, Devere Allen, Upton Close, John T. Flynn, Lewis Corey, Jessie W. Hughan, Harry W. Laidler, Ludwig Lore, Scott Nearing, Joseph Schlossberg, Rose M. Stein, Robert Woolbert, Murray Baron, David P. Berenberg, Mary Fox, Evelyn Hughan, Joseph P. Lash, Siegfried Lipschitz, Benjamin C. Marsh and others.

Rates: $7.00 from Friday to Sunday; Single day, $3.75.
Conference Fee, $2.00 for members; $3.00 for non-members.

Make your Applications at once to

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
112 East 19th Street, New York City

MASS MEETING

THE PRESENT SITUATION IN PALESTINE THE JEWS, THE ARABS, THE COMMUNISTS

Speakers: Rabbi Edward L. Israel; Goldie Meyerson, delegate Palestine Labor Federation; Hayim Greenberg, editor Jewish Frontier; Joseph Schlossberg, sec'y-treas., Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America.

THURSDAY EVENING—JUNE 11th

HOTEL DELANO 108 W. 43rd ST., N. Y. C.

Sponsored by: Socialist Zionist Party Poale Zion-Zeire Zion.

plows that turned the grass roots under, then of the great machines that came in 1917 to win the war with wheat, then of the drought years when the soil began to blow, then of the years when it piled up in the manner of Sahara, and at last of the resettlement projects which may or may not succeed in undoing the human damage done. The natural damage to at least forty million acres can never be undone; the film shows that, whatever else it shows, and thus succeeds within its limits at the effect of tragedy which must have been the original aim. Those limits, as I tried to say two weeks ago, are inexorable, history being different from poetry, fact from fable. Yet "The Plow That Broke the Plains," even more simply than Mr. Ivens's "New Earth," proves what can be done with facts. Obviously the camera can give them all but perfect life. The degree to which it does this depends of course upon the initial curiosity which the spectator brings with him. If the spectator is not curious he will not be interested in the news with which he is presented, and he will prefer "The Plow" to "New Earth" only if he happens to care more about the new American desert than he does about the Zuyder Zee.

Another documentary film now showing in America may be assured of a wide and eager audience, since it offers for the first time in human history a glimpse into the lives of nuns, and it may be supposed that no one is indifferent to that. "Cloistered" (Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse) is a series of photographs taken by permission within the walls of the Convent of the Good Shepherd near Angers in France. It is entirely serious and terribly impressive. The inhabitants of the convent never look up as they go about their business of praying, walking in slow file, laboring with stone and leather, taking vows, and prostrating themselves sometimes with an absolute abandon before the image of their bridegroom. From the Mother Superior down to the newest novice, from the planters of trees and the breakers of coal down to those who sit in their robes at typewriters, they are oblivious to any conceivable intrusion, to any audience which may be staring at them as audiences stare in theaters. The effect is both stern and beautiful, and nowhere more so than in the numerous scenes which reveal lines or groups of sisters in their ghost-white hoods and robes. The attention of the audience is called on one occasion to the striking resemblance between five or six such figures and the stone effigies with which we are familiar on the friezes of cathedrals. The one picture faded into the other while an accompanying voice proclaimed the resemblance. Perhaps the voice was not necessary, and in a work of fiction it would of course be shocking. But this is merely another reminder that "Cloistered" is not fiction. It is fact, a stranger thing; though not a truer.

It is an absurd leap from here to "Show Boat" (Music Hall), but it is a merry one. Irene Dunne (to me, I must confess, quite irresistible), Charles Winninger, Helen Morgan, and Helen Westley (to me, I fear, too much of a stereotype after all these years of her growling and grimacing in character parts) carry the classic off with proper style; and Paul Robeson sings "Old Man River" even a little better than he ever sang it before. The setting is frankly artificial, and I am not sure that this is right. But neither am I sure that a genuine Mississippi River would have consorted with what we have to look at and listen to. The document might very well have dampened what otherwise remains after several years as crisp and bright as ever. Of "One Rainy Afternoon" (Rivoli) less can be expected, since it certainly is not a classic. But Hugh Herbert and Roland Young furnish enough first-rate comedy to make up for a great deal of pretty silliness by Francis Lederer and Ida Lupino.

MARK VAN DOREN

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

CALL IT A DAY. Morosco Theater. Gay and delightful comedy about what almost happened to an English family on the first dangerous day of spring.

IDIOT'S DELIGHT. Shubert Theater. Robert Sherwood manages somehow to make a smashing theatrical success out of an anti-war play. With the Lunts and many other entertaining trimmings.

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

END OF SUMMER. Guild Theater. The wittiest of American playwrights sets a group of interesting people to talking about the world as we find it. Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins help make a very happy evening.

WINTERSET. Martin Beck Theater. Two weeks' summer run of Maxwell Anderson's critics' prize-winner. Bold, original, and engrossing.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

BURY THE DEAD. Ethel Barrymore Theater. A play against war based on a conceit of originality and power. While uneven, it is incomparably the best of the left-wing dramas seen this year.

BOY MEETS GIRL. Cort Theater. Rough-and-ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since "Once in a Lifetime."

Mark Van Doren says:

WE ARE FROM KRONSTADT. Amkino. A film of the Potemkin school, dealing with the red marines of 1919. Intermittently very interesting.

IT'S LOVE AGAIN. Gaumont British. An English song-and-dance picture, remarkable for the silliness of its plot and the childish charm of its heroine, Jessie Matthews.

MR. DEEDS GOES TO TOWN. Columbia. Directed by Frank Capra, and even better than "It Happened One Night." Gary Cooper as the rustic and quixotic Mr. Deeds is not only charming but meaningful, and the whole film has human importance.

PEG OF OLD DRURY. British and Dominion (Paramount). An eighteenth-century costume piece with Sir Cedric Hardwicke as David Garrick and Anna Neagle as Peg Woffington. Delightfully unhistorical.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Gaumont British. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

DUBROVSKY. Amkino. As romantic as Pushkin, on whose unfinished novel it is based. Not wholly successful, but interesting as a variation on the orthodox Russian theme.

Letters to the Editors

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS AND THE CLOSED SHOP

[When The Nation asked Roy W. Howard to verify the authenticity of his telegrams to Rupert Hughes which were printed in our issue of May 27, Mr. Howard forwarded copies of a further exchange of telegrams between himself and Dudley Nichols. They appear below.]

Roy W. Howard
World-Telegram
New York, N. Y.

Note correspondence with Rupert Hughes today's Variety regarding amalgamation Screen Writers' Guild with Authors' League. If your principle of avowed fairness means anything believe you should invite comment on other side from Marc Connelly or Ernest Pascal. Your attitude against Newspaper Guild duplicates attitude here of producers' association against Screen Guild. Statements that employee organization would stifle free expression are as preposterous as statement that present employer organization encourages free expression among writers. Since when have Hollywood pictures as dominated utterly by employers made any free or bold or honest artistic comment on American life, which is their foremost duty? Since when have Hollywood producers made any vigorous fight against throttling censorship, which is the first enemy of free expression by writers? The Screen Writers' Guild stands for the fundamental principle of freer expression and better motion pictures, and the fact that it has been betrayed by a minority group, some of them honestly misguided and some treacherously inclined for their own advantage, should not prevent the Scripps-Howard papers from publicizing both sides of this controversy. I know you want to be fair.

DUDLEY NICHOLS

Los Angeles, Cal., May 12

Dudley Nichols
Los Angeles, Cal.

Thanks for your wire. World-Telegram today using story from Variety quoting Pascal that guild not seeking closed shop, etc. Have requested both Associated and United Press cover both sides controversy adequately, also glad have Connelly wire five hundred words collect presenting anything vital uncovered by Variety. Meantime for your private information you in error regarding Scripps-Howard attitude toward Newspaper Guild. We completely sympathetic to principle of collective bargaining but oppose as unfair to public, writers, and publishers application of closed-shop trade-union tactics to journalism where no yardstick of competence exists as in mechanical departments and also because idea is incompatible with real freedom of editorial expression and reportorial objectivity. We are equally opposed to closed shop of owners or publishers.

ROY W. HOWARD

New York, May 13

AND FREEDOM FOR WRITERS, TOO

Dear Sirs: In all the years I've been reading The Nation, this is the first time it ever blew right up in my face—and just as I got to town.

In all the years I've been reading Heywood Broun, this is the first time he ever held me up to scorn and ridicule. And for a whole page in The Nation!

It was nice of him to get it all so wrong. His ignorance of the civil war among screen writers is apparently complete. This releases his humor from any shackles of fact. Rarely has the great liberal been so liberal with misstatements. He is probably only being whimsical when he says that I have set myself "to save the downtrodden film magnates of Hollywood," and "single-handed save Warner Brothers." But he appears to be serious when he calls me "the leader of the white-mouse faction," speaking from my "cubicle on the lot," and describes me as trying to curry favor with the picture producers—a "man running for his life."

But I was not running for my life or even my livelihood. Producers have never controlled my life or livelihood, and have never even tried to. I have never occupied a "cubicle on the lot." In all my life I have worked for the studios on a salary for only one period of four weeks two years ago, and another of six this year. In both cases I did all my work at home on my own hours. I have not worked at all on a lot for over ten years, and then only as a director of my own stories on a profit-sharing basis.

I am not technically a screen writer at all, though I have sold to the studios outright many published novels and short stories, and produced plays, also a few plots in "treatment" form. These have been handled by their own large staffs of screen writers on salary.

I was in no sense a "leader" of the recent revolt of certain screen writers against certain other screen writers. It was as a member of the council of the Authors' League, of which I am one of the six honorary vice-presidents, that I made my first personal revolt as soon as I understood what was contemplated in the amalgamation of all the guilds under a gigantic plan to organize and combine all writers in every field into one vast closed shop. I raised a small personal riot at a meeting of the League Council and said that I was horrified by the prospect of a life controlled by a soviet of writers controlled by a few Stalins. Also I predicted a civil war among writers. Quite independently in the Screen Writers' Guild a number of the leading screen writers had been opposing the amalgamation because it gave the Hollywood writers no autonomy and no control over their special local and technical conditions. The officers of the Screen Writers' Guild made concessions to these complaints, but these were not and have not been authorized by the other guilds, and so no bad faith can be charged against the screen writers who walked out in self-defense.

In fact, it was suddenly and astoundingly discovered that the Screen Writers' Guild had been all the while only a California corporation sailing under false colors. The officers themselves have decided since the secession to let that guild die, and they have urged the deluded members to join a new organization called the Screen Writers' Guild of the Authors' League—the very name the old guild wore and the very thing it had been supposed to be. It is all very complicated, and Mr. Broun hasn't an inkling of it for all his ink-slinging at it.

Thoroughly understanding the situation and thoroughly distrusting a certain dominating and domineering element in the Screen Writers' Guild, sixty or more of the most successful and independent screen writers had decided to pull out. The claim that they were intimidated or coerced by the producers could only be made by one who knows neither these writers nor the other facts.

To call such independent men and women by Mr. Broun's term, "white mice," is sillier than it is vicious. To say that I "led" them completes the burlesque or Brounesque. I did join the group, but only after it was recruited and preliminarily organized. Were it not for the scenarios I wrote a dozen years ago for my own stories, I could not even qualify for admission. I honestly believe that what these people are doing is for the best interests of both the writers and the moving-picture industry.

I might mention that while I cannot compete with Mr. Broun in picketing or jail service, I have spent far more hours of hard toil for the organization and independence of writers than he ever has—not counting of course the time he has spent in writing and strutting his stuff in columns and pages at high prices. He does not mention the many years I spent in hard work as a founder of the Authors' League and the Dramatists' Guild and the Screen Writers' Guild, old and new. I spent many a long night as a member of the five-and-five committee of the NRA in open war with the producers. Incidentally, I was one of the committee of five dramatists which brought about the end of the Actors' Equity strike, in hot opposition to the managers.

I have never been afraid of managers, or producers, or publishers. I am not really frightened—much—when Mr. Broun goes Boo! and Grrrr! He does it so often—so always—and so well! I was not running for my life but for my freedom when I opposed the amalgamation of all authors. But I was completely terrified by the prospect of having my life run by other writers.

If the moving-picture producers—who are as jealous of one another as writers are—should have joined together against me and barred me from every studio, it would have made little difference in my income or activity. I should still have had the rest of the world of authorship open. But if that amalgamation had succeeded and I had offended the ruling writers, I could have been debarred from shooting off steam not only in the movies, but in magazines, newspapers, pamphlets, books, plays, the radio, television, everywhere. That was the grand plan. I could have been forced to earn my living by digging ditches or something. This might have been all for the good of literature and art; but oh, the difference to me!

And Mr. Broun ought not to bewail the collapse of the amalgamation, either.

He too has a way of getting in wrong with other writers. They do not all adore and follow him—if any do. They might have ganged up on him and forced him into—painting landscapes, for instance. That would have been all for the good of art; but oh, the difference to him!

He apparently believes what he seems to preach: that all employers are illiterate brutes and all employees chained philosophers and angels. He loves to ridicule and abuse his employers in the texts they pay him to write. It is a very picturesque trait of his that has always seemed to indicate more liberality in his employers than in the great liberal. I am not of his mind, and I would rather be ruled by any employer I've ever worked for than by any committee of writers I've ever heard of—even though they were all as great and good and generous, scrupulously just and accurate, and as sparing of unkind words as Heywood Broun. Imagine being managed by a committee composed exclusively of Heywood Brouns!

Yet, since he had to devote a page to me, I thank him for pirouetting on a prostrate form that is not mine, even though he gives it my name. You can't expect a dancing hippopotamus to watch his big feet. He can't even see them. And what does he care where they land? He has no reputation for accuracy to lose.

RUPERT HUGHES

New York, May 22

MR. HARRIS ON THE WEBBS

Dear Sir: On my return to Moscow I find a copy of The Nation with Abram Harris's most inadequate review of the Webbs' great book on Russia. He uses the review to air his own threadbare, shopworn, and uninteresting prejudices against the Soviet Union, which, I think, he has never seen. But many reviewers do similar things. What I miss is an evaluation of the service which the Webbs have performed in giving us a rich, comprehensive account of the workings of the Soviet system. No mention is even made of the very significant fact that here we see the Webbs, the parents of Fabianism, the originators of the theory of the "inevitability of gradualness," converted to revolution and accepting the doctrine of the end justifying the means. Where the Webbs fall down miserably—in their criticism of the Third International—Harris finds them "more realistic." The Webbs failed to differentiate between the Comintern as an institution and a certain Comintern policy. That policy has now been scrapped, and Harris to the contrary notwithstanding, people in other countries are following the new Comintern line.

LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, May 20

CONTRIBUTORS

ROGER N. BALDWIN is director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

CORLISS LAMONT, son of Thomas W. Lamont of J. P. Morgan and Company, is chairman of the national executive committee of the Friends of the Soviet Union and author of "The Illusion of Immortality."

HAROLD E. FEY is executive secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation.

STUART CHASE has lately returned from the Tennessee Valley, where he obtained material for three articles for The Nation, of which this is the second. He is now at work on a book on natural resources in the United States.

PAUL HUTCHINSON was at one time a Methodist missionary in China. For many years he has been managing editor of the Christian Century.

EDA LOU WALTON, associate professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University, is widely known as poet and critic. She is at work on a study of modern American poetry, dealing primarily with the relation of poetry to social development.

L. SETH SCHNITMAN is chief statistician of the F. W. Dodge Corporation. He has made a particular study of life insurance.

HAROLD J. LASKI, The Nation's London correspondent, is professor of political science at the University of London and has long been active and influential in the councils of the British Labor Party.

ELISEO VIVAS is a young philosopher who has for several years been associated with the work of the Experimental College at the University of Wisconsin.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · JUNE 17, 1936

NUMBER 3702

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

757

EDITORIALS:

ADDRESS TO THE REPUBLICANS

759

SOVIET DEMOCRACY

761

PROGRESS IN THE SOUTH

762

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

763

FRANCE ON STRIKE by M. E. Ravage

765

THE JEW AND THE WORLD

by Benjamin Stolberg

766

THE SOUTH IS RISING by Maury Maverick

770

THE NEW SOVIET CONSTITUTION

by Louis Fischer

772

TVA: THE NEW DEAL'S BEST ASSET

by Stuart Chase

775

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

778

BROUN'S PAGE

779

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE LESSON OF THE MASTER by William Troy

780

MR. FORSTER'S HARVEST by Louis Kronenberger

780

THE DIRECTOR AS TRANSLATOR

by Mark Van Doren

781

"THE BOY I WAS" by Eda Lou Walton

782

ART AND MR. BULLIET by Virginia Nirdlinger

782

FOUR CASE HISTORIES by James T. Farrell

783

AN ANALYSIS OF EGOTISM by Reinhold Niebuhr

784

SHORTER NOTICES

784

RECORDS by Henry Simon

785

DRAWINGS by Georges Schreiber, William

Gropper, and Howard Cook

The Shape of Things

*

IT LOOKS AS IF THE FRENCH STRIKES HAD proved as helpful to the Blum government as the banking crisis of 1933 was to the incoming Roosevelt Administration, and in much the same way. They not only afforded the new Premier an opportunity to act promptly and decisively, but gave the parties of the right a scare which may somewhat dampen their enthusiasm for the announced intention of Louis Marin "to fight to the last ditch if the revolutionary front strives to carry out its idiotic pre-election proposals." The strikes, therefore, have had an important political effect. They have pried M. Blum away from the over-cautious attitude of "moderation" which so pleased the right after the elections and have forced him to reaffirm his adherence to the program of the People's Front. They have also made it clear to the right that any attempt to sabotage the program will be resisted by the workers. M. Blum's Cabinet is facing tremendous difficulties. There is danger that his ambitious program for improving the condition of workers and farmers will bog down in contradictions like those which have paralyzed the New Deal. And he faces not only actual enemies on the right but potential enemies among the none too firmly united parties of the left. M. Blum is the most conservative man who could govern France in its present radical mood. But that very fact prompts the question, How long can he hold his leftist support? Other governments in other countries have tried to meet the demands of the left without disturbing the interests of the right, with disastrous results. M. Blum's government may prove to be an exception, but to act effectively it should have full power, not merely some power.

*

SENATOR NYE'S MUNITIONS COMMITTEE HAS within the week done two things for which the nation should be grateful. It has issued its report on commercial and financial relations with belligerents, which includes the recommendation that all loans and credits to belligerents be prohibited. In spite of the New York Times's wistful attempts to prove that the Nye committee whitewashed Morgan, this recommendation shows the committee's belief that the Morgan loans led us into war once and that somebody else's may lead us in again. But even more important was the committee's report denouncing the War Department's mobilization plan. Written by Senator Bennett Champ Clark, this is a document that should be read

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

by everyone who thinks he will live to see us in another war. The War Department's plan gives to the President war-time powers to regulate wages, prices, production, and trade, to suspend laws, and to censor the press. But the real kernel of the plan is the provision calling for a draft of all males over eighteen, all to be subject to military or labor service and to court-martial for failure to report for duty. What this implies is an enforced draft of labor, the denial of the right of labor to refuse employment at unfair wages and hours, and the assumption by the military of the power to break strikes and shatter unions. Too close for comfort is the resemblance of this scheme to the regimentation of labor under military control by existing dictatorships. It mirrors, as Senator Clark says, the example of these dictatorships and "the constant temptation therewith presented to democracies such as ours to solve their own problems by the use of force." Unless this temptation is resisted and the War Department plan scrapped, we shall not have to wait for fascism until after a war; mobilization and fascism will come linked arm in arm.

*

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE'S RESOLUTION WHICH calls for an investigation into labor spying and violations of civil liberties has passed the Senate. Meanwhile in other fields, such as receivership abuses, railroad finances, and lobbying, both houses of Congress have arranged to continue in ensuing months the sound policy of conducting investigations in aid of legislation. All such inquiries will be facilitated if Congress now takes the next step, the passage of an amendment introduced by Senator Fletcher of Florida. Bearing in mind the difficulties encountered by his committee when it conducted the banking inquiry a few years ago, he proposes that persons who interfere with investigating committees at any stage of their work should be subject to the relatively mild punishment which, under the law as it stands at present, applies only to the later stages of such investigations. Senator Fletcher has made a sensible proposal which will save the government time and money and will tend to produce more of the information which Congress is entitled to have.

*

JOHN L. LEWIS HAS WON HIS BATTLE FOR THE privilege of organizing the steel workers along industrial lines. The Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers has joined the Committee for Industrial Organization (the C. I. O.), and Lewis, as the committee's chairman, is specifically vested with the power to name the members of the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee, which in turn "shall have power to handle all matters relative to the organizing campaign." Lewis achieved his objective by appealing directly to the rank and file. While he was serving notice on Louis Leonard and his fellow-officials of the Amalgamated that the C. I. O. would have nothing to do with a "policy of fluttering procrastination," a group of Amalgamated lodges sent delegates to Pittsburgh to put pressure on the officers, who will be up for reelection in a referendum vote in October. After an afternoon spent in communion with William Green the executive committee of the steel union surrendered on every point. The Lewis coup makes it all the more likely that the executive council of the American Federation of Labor will suspend in July the group of unions comprising the C. I. O. At the same time Lewis's victory enormously increases his prestige, both with the public and the ranks of labor. If he can now put through a swift and successful organizing campaign among the 500,000 workers of the country's most important industry, it will serve to remove the sting from the loss of A. F. of L. affiliation just as it will win new adherents to the C. I. O. With the organization of steel we shall see the beginning of a major development in American labor which may well be the beginning also of a new day in American politics.

*

SOUTH CHINA'S ULTIMATUM TO NANKING threatening to invade Chiang Kai-shek's territory if he refuses to fight Japan is but one expression of a nationwide wave of resentment against Japan's most recent military activities in the Peiping-Tientsin area. Despite the drastic decrees recently promulgated against all anti-Japanese activity, students have staged demonstrations in all sections of the country. On May 30 a group of bankers, merchants, and writers from all sections of China met secretly in Shanghai and formed the National Salvation Association for the purpose of instigating war against Japan. In the North it is reported that Sun Cheh-yuan, head of the pro-Japanese puppet government, has kicked over the traces and joined the southern leaders in bringing pressure on Chiang. When Chinese militarists of this type unite on what appears to be a suicidal venture, it may be assumed that they are being driven by powerful forces from below. This makes Chiang's position extremely precarious. He must choose between a highly unpopular civil war against the South in which he is likely to be defeated by defections from within his ranks and a highly popular war against Japan in which the odds would be overwhelmingly against him. Previously he has always chosen to risk domestic discontent rather than almost certain defeat. But his long struggle with the Communists and the disastrous effect of Japanese smuggling on the customs revenues have so depleted his treasury that he may very well embrace the anti-Japanese campaign as the one way to regain popular support and save his rule from ignominious collapse.

*

THE VICIOUS CIRCLE OF TARIFF POLICY HAS never been better illustrated than in the recent imposition of countervailing duties ranging from 22 to 56 per cent on numerous German articles imported into this country. For this situation Washington rather than Berlin is chiefly responsible. Pre-Hitler Germany was a debtor country, dependent on its exports to meet reparations and other foreign obligations. Because the commercial policies of its creditors, particularly the United States, made it increasingly difficult for it to sell sufficient goods to meet these obligations, the Reich was compelled to declare a partial moratorium in the summer of 1931. When this failed to afford sufficient relief, the German government set up a deliberate program of expanding exports by means of subsidies. At the same time it sought to promote trade by a series of exclusive bilateral agreements, the benefits of which were not extended to other nations. This policy, in turn, led the United States to suspend most-favored-nation treatment for German exports and, when this measure seemed ineffective, to invoke the anti-bounty clause in the Hawley-Smoot tariff. As opponents of the present German regime we cannot grieve over the fact that the Nazi's commercial policy has struck a snag. We have supported the anti-Nazi boycott in the hope that an aggravation of Germany's exchange difficulties might weaken Hitler's grip. Nevertheless we cannot but deplore the application of discriminatory tariffs for any reason, political or economic. The tariff is an exceedingly treacherous weapon which injures its user at least as much as it harms the intended victim. This is particularly true of the United States as a leading creditor nation, since each retaliatory act merely enhances our commercial isolation.

*

FIVE MEN HAVE BEEN SENTENCED TO DEATH or imprisonment during the month of June by the United States Labor Department. Their names are Otto Richter, Walter Saupe, Benno Martini, Adam Mueller, and Joseph Ganghofer. Their crime is their faith in America as a refuge from tyrants. All of them are fugitives from Hitler's justice; all of them will be thrown into prison the moment they touch German soil. The stories of Joseph Ganghofer and of Walter Saupe, who is only nineteen, were told by Louis Adamic in The Nation of March 25. Through all these cases runs the theme of resistance to intolerable suppression for which the right of asylum was designed. The right of asylum to dissenters, America's highest contribution to the cause of human freedom, is in danger. Help to preserve it by telegraphing to Secretary Perkins your protest against the deportation to Germany of five innocent men.

*

THE PLIGHT OF THE JEWS, AS POINTED OUT elsewhere in this issue by Benjamin Stolberg, is not new. It has been reemphasized by the recent Arab massacres. It is not unnatural, therefore, that plans are now being laid for the calling of a World Jewish Congress at Geneva which shall set up a permanent international executive body for the defense of Jewish rights. We trust the Jews in America and elsewhere will search their hearts and consider very critically the dangers of such an organization. One of the stock arguments used against the Jews by their enemies is that they already have a secret international organization which seeks to control world affairs in the interests of Judaism. While the intelligent know better, the unintelligent will tend to find this charge confirmed by the existence of an international executive body. Such a congress could scarcely fail to fall into the hands of the Jewish middle-class groups which do not represent the broad strata of Jewish labor organizations, and it could scarcely hope to take over the vigorous work that voluntary groups of Jews have already done all over the world in the interest of Jewish resettlement and the alleviation of persecution. Moreover, the advantages of continuity and permanence which such an organization would achieve would be outweighed by the increased tension which would result both within the Jewish groups and among the enemies of the Jews. The best the new organization could become would be an effective sounding-board, but it might also become a new Wailing Wall.

*

THE UNLEASHED FURY OF A MOB IS NOT A lovely thing. Just how unlovely it can be is the theme of a recent film called "Fury," directed by Fritz Lang and produced by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Hollywood has done it, despite the doubts we had that business-dominated Hollywood would ever turn out a work of art which was at the same time a savage and biting social satire on American life. The film shows a man in a small Midwestern town, arrested and jailed for a kidnaping he did not commit. It shows business men, strike-breakers, loafers, women, lashed into fury by the emotional drive of vigilantism, sadism, and frustration until they merge into a lynching mob that burns down the jail; it shows finally the trial of twenty-two of the mob for murder. There has never been so direct and realistic a confronting on the screen of the structure of American society and the sources of our law-and-order lawlessness. This film must be regarded not only as a major cinematic achievement, but as one of the evidences, along with the conviction of the Tampa kidnapers and the victory of the forces of law in the verdict for damages in the New Orleans lynching case, that not all the battalions of American life are on the side of the Ku Klux Klan, the Black Legion, and the vigilantes. M-G-M's release of "Fury" is an honorable act. It goes a long way toward removing the stain of that company's refusal to produce "It Can't Happen Here."

Address to the Republicans

SONS and daughters of Lincoln, Mark Hanna, and Warren Harding: You may deem it somewhat extraordinary for the editors of the The Nation to address this plea to you. Our roads have not run together much since those early days when The Nation was young and the Republican Party still had a virginal freshness. You were the party of a vigorous young industrialism which was sweeping all before its path, and you swept slavery away because slavery was an obstacle to your onward march. Today you are the party of a class trying desperately to hold on to its power in a collapsing economic world, and willing to hold on to its power even at the expense of abundance, order, justice, welfare. Assembled in convention at Cleveland, you still put on a gallant show of salutes to your favorite sons, banners, speeches, thunderous cheering, and the pinning of interminable Kansas sunflowers on rows of blank lapels. There are, as of old, the huddles of master political minds, the lightning shifts of alignment, the conspiracies and coalitions. But it is mostly a brave front. The heart has gone out of it. The path of your economic advantage as a class is no longer the path of social sanity. You are a dying party in a dying order.

As we write this address, you have not yet chosen your candidate. Who he will be is beyond our control—or your own. All the papers are saying now that the "Stop Landon" movement is hopeless. It was hopeless long ago, when Mr. Hearst first picked Mr. Landon as his candidate, and he thereby became yours as well. Formerly Mr. Hearst would not have been able to achieve such a feat single-handed. But the bitterness with which you set your face against the slightest movement away from the past has thrown you into his arms and made you blood-brothers. Although his leadership is not openly yours, his purposes and his hatreds have become yours.

It is inevitable that you will nominate Mr. Landon. Your thinker-laureate, Walter Lippmann, says that in his candidacy alone, among all your much-bruited names, are there the makings of a popular movement. He is right. This will not be the first popular movement that Mr. Hearst's newspapers have manufactured. It is surely no mere coincidence that the Republican masses discovered Mr. Landon at exactly the moment when Mr. Hearst did.

What your platform will be is quite another matter. The deadly blight which has stripped you barren of leadership, purposes, morale, has stripped you most barren of ideas. Your platform-framers will undoubtedly find plenty of phrases to employ. They will beat the living needs with the bones of dead issues. A tariff policy, a monetary policy, and a farm policy that have long been found useless and outworn will be dug up again and refurbished. The party that has built its power upon the monopolists—the party of holding companies, which has fought every measure for the control of corporations—will miraculously find itself standing on a tough-sounding anti-monopoly plank.

There is one problem, however, you will not be able to escape, any more than Mr. Roosevelt will be able to escape it. That is the problem of a constitutional amendment. The Nation two weeks ago printed some replies by leaders of liberal and labor opinion to its inquiries about the need for an amendment. We have now directed the same inquiries to the makers of public opinion—those who through their newspapers mold what people think. We are printing their replies at the end of this address. You will notice that Mr. Hearst, who found and made your candidate, sets his face stonily against any constitutional revision. His views are the views of the Landon supporters who came to Cleveland with their "Oh Susannah" song:

"Landon, oh Landon, will lead to victory

With the good old Constitution, and it's good enough for me."

Of course, the minimum-wage decision seems to have made a difference. Before that decision you were all willing to swallow everything that the reactionary Supreme Court majority did, and you cried for more. You put it on the grounds of the sanctity of the court and the Constitution, along with some talk of states' rights. But now that your Supreme Court majority has doomed even the state power to enact social legislation, everything is changed. Not only William Allen White but even Hamilton Fish and Herbert Hoover have come out for a state-power amendment. Some of your most hardened constitution-mongers are shedding crocodile tears over the fate of the women laundry workers of New York.

Republican men and women, to what extent have you looked into this question of an amendment? We welcome your surprising interest in it, as we welcome any accession of strength to a movement we believe in. But are you genuinely concerned about gaining for the states the power of dealing with insecurity, poverty, low wages? Remember that the men sitting in this convention hall with you, the men who swell not only your applause but also your campaign funds, are the men who have fought social legislation of any kind tooth and nail—first in the state assemblies, and then by invoking "due process of law" and "liberty of contract" in the Supreme Court. They are the men who formerly fought every state law trying to establish decent hours of labor and who are now fighting the state unemployment-insurance laws and the state housing laws. In this very term of court they sat by without the slightest protest while the Supreme Court majority declared invalid, because of due process, a Vermont income-tax law and a tax assessment by a North Dakota state railway commission.

You will forgive us, therefore, if we question the integrity of your belief even in a states'-right amendment. States' rights as a doctrine is too recent an acquisition of yours, it is too alien to you, it runs too seriously athwart the tradition of your vested interests to give us any real confidence that you will push such an amendment vigorously. Besides, states' rights are not enough. What we are faced with is a condition of economic collapse which runs across states lines and which can only be controlled by federal aid and federal power. The Constitution as it stands is broad enough to allow for the exercise of such power, but the Constitution has been narrowed and distorted by a majority of the Supreme Court operating within the framework of Republican business thought. If you are genuinely concerned for the masses and their welfare, if you care about the standard of living of the people and the continuance of the American tradition, come out for a constitutional amendment that will put the federal power to deal with social legislation beyond the reach of interference by the Supreme Court majority.

Only thus will you give the common man any ground for belief that you are really turning to liberalism. Only thus will you rescue yourselves as a party from the dead hand of vested interests and vested ideas.

The Question of an Amendment More Opinions

Speaking entirely for myself the answer is triple yes.

William Allen White, Publisher, Emporia Gazette

I do not think it is necessary or desirable to amend the Constitution for any purpose at present. We amended the Constitution with the Eighteenth Amendment to allow governmental interference with personal liberty, and had to amend it back again to free ourselves from the intolerable conditions such interference created. . . .

Industry, labor, and farm conditions have had more than "adequate" government control already. They have had government control to their obvious injury and almost to their extinction. The industry which has had the most government control has been the railroads, and that industry has developed the most depressed condition of any—entirely through ignorant governmental interference. . . .

Government is not an abstraction. Government is composed of individuals in governmental positions. Control of industry by government means . . . taking the control of American industry out of the hands of the able, skilful, and experienced men who built it to worldwide superiority, and putting it under the incompetent management of men who are ignorant of the industry, inexperienced in business, extravagant in management, unfamiliar with anything practical except practical politics, and indifferent to everything except finding jobs for themselves and their political supporters regardless of fitness. . . . True Americans certainly do not want to change the Constitution . . . and furthermore, in my opinion, true Americans do not want to change the character of the Supreme Court, which has so ably and patriotically upheld the rights of the citizens.

American prosperity has begun to return since the Supreme Court rendered its American constitutional decisions, striking the shackles of government control from the industry, the labor, and the agricultural activities of the nation. Common-sense Americans do not want more regimentation. . . . They think that the Constitution should be preserved . . . and that the country should be saved from further reckless and ridiculous socialistic experimentation.

William Randolph Hearst

Sorry but have made it a rule not to answer questionnaires as to my views. I find it better to express them in columns of newspaper.

J. M. Patterson, Publisher, New York Daily News

Although I am not opposed to necessary changes in the Constitution to keep it a living, growing charter of our liberties, I am opposed to amendments hurriedly prepared to meet temporary maladjustments which can be righted by constitutional means. I am not convinced that such an amendment as you suggest is needed. I am opposed to present tendency toward government control and management of everything and everybody on field or in factory . . . and fear it a step toward dictatorship and toward conditions that prevail in Italy, Germany, and Russia. We need to end intolerable economic conditions. . . . Government management and control will not solve the problem of unemployment or of agriculture's lost income. Instead it will make matters worse. For that reason I am opposed to hasty tampering with the Constitution lest we open the door to greater evils instead of improving our economic situation, and so I do not think this should be a campaign issue. Holding this view, of course, I should be sorry to see appointed to the Supreme Court judges who would be in sympathy with bureaucratic control of agriculture and industry. . . .

Frank E. Gannett, Publisher, the Gannett Newspapers

The New York Post favors a constitutional amendment to clarify beyond possible doubt the power of Congress to legislate for human rights as well as property rights—an amendment which will protect the rights of labor, permit Congress to exact minimum-wage and maximum-hour laws, and give Congress an unfettered hand in curbing exploitation and fraud in high places as well as low places. We recognize, however, that such an amendment may require months if not years for ratification. Meanwhile, Congress does have the right to exercise its power under Article III, Section 2, of the Constitution: "The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact with such exceptions as the Congress shall make." Here is a check upon arbitrary abuse of the judicial power deliberately placed in the Constitution by the Founding Fathers. It is just as important that this check be used by Congress to preserve a balanced American government as it is that the President and the court use their powers to the same end. Congress can limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. It has done it in the past and the court has recognized its right to do so.

J. David Stern, Publisher, New York Post

Soviet Democracy

LOUIS FISCHER'S article on the new Soviet constitution, which appears elsewhere in this issue, is a journalistic scoop of the first order. While it has been known for some months that the new constitution would be more democratic than the old and that it would abolish the inequalities and discriminations which were necessary in a transitional period, no one expected changes as fundamental as those he describes. What we have, in effect, barring last-minute changes, is a liquidation of the dictatorship of the proletariat in the civil sphere and its replacement by constitutional democracy.

Of course the Soviet system has always contained far more genuine democracy than outsiders have realized. It is true that the open ballot and indirect election made popular control over the governmental apparatus somewhat remote. But the essential power in the Soviet Union has never rested entirely with the government. A considerable amount of influence has been wielded by organizations of producers—trade unions, collective farms, and the planning agencies—by cooperatives, and especially by the Communist Party. The village soviets have been largely autonomous and have exercised far more power than similar units in the United States. All these organizations, the Webbs point out in their monumental work, have been subject to a large degree of popular control, which leads them to conclude that the essential government of the U. S. S. R. "has been the very opposite of a dictatorship . . . a government by a whose series of committees."

In the past the active anti-Soviet elements—kulaks, priests, former bourgeoisie, and members of the old aristocracy—have been almost totally excluded from this arrangement. They had no vote; they were not members of trade unions, cooperatives, or collective farms; they were barred from the Communist Party. The important new fact is that the majority of individuals in these groups will now receive the full privileges of Soviet citizenship.

Some conservatives in this country have already hailed the new trend as evidence that the Soviet Union is at last moving toward sanity, while radicals have naturally been suspicious of changes which seemed to introduce some of the most unsatisfactory elements of our own system. Both have overlooked the fact that the form of government is relatively immaterial; the real power in each case is to be found in the ownership and control of the economic organization. Much more information than Mr. Fischer gives us is necessary before we can pass final judgment on the changes which he outlines. He does not tell us, for example, how the administrative section of the government is to be set up or how the local governments are to be chosen. It is not clear, moreover, how election to the parliament will be a check on incompetent or bureaucratic officials. Does this mean that all administrative officers will be forced to stand for parliament? And why this sudden enthusiasm for geographic representation? Did not occupational representation constitute one of the most useful elements in the Soviet system, since it meant that a worker was certain to have as his representative a man whose economic interests were identical with his own? In one place Mr. Fischer declares that a dictatorship exists whenever there are several classes; in another he speaks of a bloc of democratic, anti-fascist states—which includes the U. S. S. R., England, France, and Czecho-Slovakia. Surely both statements are not to be taken literally. Finally, is he not guilty of a most un-Marxian statement when he declares that "the government cannot disappear . . . perhaps . . . the party will"? It would seem to us that the loosening of the bonds of dictatorship might equally well be interpreted as the first step in the "withering away of the state."

Progress in the South

IT is not wholly accidental that this week's issue of The Nation contains two articles dealing with the problems of the South. As Representative Maverick points out so graphically, the South is in ferment today as it has not been since the Civil War. The depression and the world-wide trend toward economic nationalism have threatened the foundations of its economic structure. The loss of the export market for cotton has perhaps permanently cut off its chief source of cash income. While the AAA and the Bankhead act staved off complete ruin for the landowners, hundreds of thousands of share-croppers have been deprived of their only means of earning a livelihood. In the old South the situation is particularly grave because of competition from the more efficient cotton producers of the Southwest.

Barring war or a miracle—such as a drastic cut in the American tariff—cotton will never again play the dominant role in the South that it has played in the past. A complete reconstruction of the economic life of the entire region is inescapable, although it will be greatly retarded by political and cultural backwardness. The decay and corruption resulting from the single-party system makes it unrealistic to expect progressive leadership through ordinary political channels. Denial of franchise to the underprivileged, both Negro and white, precludes any effective revolt through the ballot-box against the power of the land-owning aristocracy.

Programs such as the TVA—described on another page

by Stuart Chase—are bound to contribute to the removal of some of these barriers; but it goes almost without saying that the motivating impulse for a fundamental reshaping of the social pattern must come from within. There are numerous indications that this process is already under way. The existence of militant organizations of share-croppers in Alabama and Arkansas, the formation of the Modern Democrats in Florida, and the successful fight being waged by the progressive Democratic wing in Texas are illustrative of the ferment at work. The recent conference of the Southern Policy Committee at Chattanooga brought together many of the leaders in this movement. Composed of professors, editors, and business men, the group represented a fair cross-section of Southern progressive opinion. The moderate nature of their recommendations is a reflection, at least in part, of the magnitude of the problems which they faced. As immediate steps for improving the economic status of agriculture, the conference recommended passage of the Bankhead-Jones farm-homes bill, the organization of farmers in producers' cooperatives, the reduction of tariffs, the establishment of laws for the enforcement of minimum housing standards applicable to rural conditions, and the extension of the federal Social Security Act to cover agricultural unemployment. In the industrial field the conference went on record as favoring laws prohibiting the abuse of injunctions in labor disputes, guaranteeing the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively, restricting the work week, and establishing minimum wages. It also recommended ratification of the child-labor amendment, and the passage of legislation implementing the Social Security Act.

Mild as they are, these proposals are indicative of a definite social awakening on the part of certain "responsible" elements in the South. It is disheartening, however, to realize that even in a group as progressive as this there is so little disposition to come to grips with fundamental problems. It is almost incredible, for example, to find that apart from general recommendations regarding the extension of suffrage and educational facilities it offered no specific proposals for aiding the Negro. For though a Southerner may be right in arguing that Negroes will be aided by any measure that is designed to benefit the South as a whole, it can scarcely be denied that the colored population as a group is suffering from innumerable economic and social disabilities which must be removed before they can make their full contribution to the renaissance of the South. There was a similar disinclination to face the fact that the injustices of which the group complained are deeply ingrained in the profit system. Except for a mild indorsement of collective bargaining, the committee showed little disposition to choose weapons adequate for the task at hand. The conference apparently ruled out political action, either through the Democratic Party or by the formation of a new party, as impracticable under present conditions. This may or may not have been a wise decision. But if the ordinary avenues of popular expression are closed in the South, it would seem all the more imperative that attention be centered on the organization of rural and urban labor for direct economic struggle.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Just Before the Battle

Washington, June 7

AN Administration spokesman on Friday confidentially warned members of the Congressional press gallery not to forecast further action at this session on the new Guffey coal act, the ship-subsidy bills, or the Wagner-Ellenbogen low-cost-housing bill. None of these he said, will be brought to a vote before adjournment. He might have added to his list the various anti-war measures put forward by the Nye committee, the Wheeler bill making a consumer-protection agency out of the Federal Trade Commission, the Kerr-Coolidge immigration measure, any one of half a dozen anti-lynching bills that have been pending in Congress for a year or more, the food-and-drug bill, the Sisson repealer of the loyalty oath imposed last year on District of Columbia school teachers and janitors, the Bankhead farm-tenant bill, or the Walsh-Healey bill for federal regulation of wages and hours in concerns enjoying government contract business.

Congress will find time, however, to complete action on the Robinson-Patman bill, which has been given an anti-chain-store label by its backers but is in reality a vicious piece of legislation against the consumer. All that can be said in its favor is that the measure—introduced by Robinson and Patman to curry favor with the wholesalers in the distributing centers in their home districts—is so grotesquely drawn as to defy enforcement. Disguised as an act to help the corner grocer and neighborhood druggist, it is purely a vote-snatching device, but that is precisely the kind of measure which enlists the vigorous interest of the people's representatives in Congress assembled in an election year, while measures in the public interest are being sidetracked with the Administration's aid. One cannot say, however, that the closing days of the Seventy-fourth Congress will be entirely wasted, for they promise to produce enactment of the Black bill requiring lobbyists to register themselves, their employers, and their expenditures. Black, backed by Norris and a few other Senators, has managed to frustrate the attempt of the Administration-controlled House to put over a fake anti-lobby bill; he made the Senate substitute his bill for the House bill, and force the House conferees to agree to the substitution. The conference report has yet to be adopted by the House and Senate, but there is little likelihood of a slip-up there.

It is also a pleasure to report that the Kramer and Tydings-McCormack anti-sedition bills are dead, and that yesterday without debate the Senate passed the La Follette resolution for a Congressional investigation of labor espionage and violations of civil liberties in the United States. Under the terms of the resolution, the investigation can be broad enough to cover the share-cropper situation in Arkansas, the Black Legion, the various manifestations of incipient fascism in California and kindred states, and the whole kit and caboodle of red-baiting patriotic-society rackets. The Senate's action was a single-handed victory for La Follette and vindicated him in his adoption of the languorous technique for which he was criticized in this column two months ago. His apparent lack of enthusiasm served to divert from the resolution the attention of all those Senators who would have fought it had they been alert to its significance. The one flaw in his technique is that it produced an appropriation of only $15,000 for the investigation, a sum so small as to make it virtually certain that the investigation will make no material headway until Congress meets again next year and votes additional funds. More important at the moment than the amount of money available is the personnel of the investigating committee. There are only a few men on the Senate Education and Labor Committee who can be trusted to do the job properly, and it is from that committee that the investigating group almost certainly will be picked. It would be possible to turn the investigation over to such gentry as Puddler Jim Davis, Jesse Metcalf, Dr. Copeland, Murphy of Iowa, or "Honest Vic" Donahey. Pious citizens will send up prayers for the nominations to fall upon such other committee members as La Follette, Black, Borah, or even Rush Holt of West Virginia, or Dave Walsh of Massachusetts.

Labor Against the N.A.M.

It should be noted that though the last A. F. of L. convention instructed Bill Green and his lieutenants to see to it that Congress at this session took action against labor-spy and strike-breaking agencies, they had no hand in the introduction of the La Follette resolution and expended no effort on seeing that it was adopted. The point is important at this time because Dan Hastings, the du Ponts' Senatorial stand-in, is bleating about the labor lobby as if it were a juggernaut. He demands that the Black committee investigate it, and he bases his demand upon Green's telegram a few days ago to members of the House Judiciary Committee relative to the Walsh-Healey bill, which is the No. 2 measure on the A. F. of L.'s legislative "must" list. Several weeks ago the House Judiciary Committee voted eleven to seven to table the bill. Green appealed to Roosevelt for aid. Roosevelt called in McIntyre, one of his secretaries, and through him instructed Chairman Sumners of the Judiciary Committee to see that the bill was reported out so that the House at least could vote it up or down. Labor lobbyists meanwhile went to work on committee members and were promised fifteen of the committee's twenty-five votes. The promises were not fulfilled. At last, spurred on by a man whose services as a lobbyistist have earned him only the enmity of the senile creatures who are supposed to perform those services for the A. F. of L., Green a few days ago telegraphed the committee members a demand that they take up the Walsh-Healey bill. In his telegram he said that the A. F. of L. would have men watching the committee room and that any member absenting himself would be regarded as opposing the bill.

The threat worked. The committee immediately reported out the bill, but only after subjecting it to emasculating amendments. The reason for its resistance to the bill—and this resistance is admitted privately—is that the committee members are lawyers and most of them have as their clients back home manufacturers who are opposed to taking their employees out of the sweatshop class. The opposition is strongest from textile and garment manufacturers. The big organizations fighting the bill are the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, and, significantly, the Southern Economic Conference. There is almost no chance that the bill will advance beyond its present position, and as reshaped by the Judiciary Committee it is hardly worth fighting for. If by a miracle it should be transformed into law, it would stand as the only material accomplishment of the A. F. of L.'s legislative service at this session.

Stop-Light on Housing

Senator Wagner is still hopeful of getting his housing bill—the No. 1 measure on the A. F. of L.'s "must" list—passed before adjournment, but he's about the only person who is. He refuses to believe that Roosevelt has hung a red light on the bill, though the lantern is visible to everybody else for miles around. Yesterday the Senate rushed through a dozen or more bills, but when it reached the Wagner bill, Robinson, leader of the Administration's forces on the floor, blocked action by establishing the lack of a quorum. It had not mattered to the Administration forces that there was no quorum present while the other dozen bills were being put through. Robinson makes no secret of his determination to forestall action on housing legislation at this session. His stand may be personal and based upon his friendship with Jesse Jones, who has been fighting the Wagner bill. But there is no reason to believe that it does not accord with Roosevelt's own views. In the first place, Roosevelt assured the Jones mob two weeks ago that there would be no housing legislation of any kind at this session. In the second place, Robinson ascribes his position to the failure of the committee in charge of the bill to report it out until this week, and that delay has been almost wholly of Roosevelt's own making. Each time virtual agreement was reached in the committee on the bill's terms, Roosevelt ordered it held up for "minor" amendments. Jesse Jones has been the "minor."

The course Roosevelt has pursued with respect to the Wagner housing bill is almost precisely like his course relative to the Wagner Labor Relations Act, which delayed the passage of that act for more than a year. In the present instance the White House tactics are more portentous. Few will dissent from Representative Ellenbogen's dictum that the death of the housing bill at this session will leave the housing movement with a prolonged attack of sleeping sickness. He bases that dictum on the all too reasonable expectation that "next year we shall have a more conservative Congress and a less powerful executive." It should be added that Ellenbogen, one of the few House members deserving reelection, believes that Roosevelt will still be President in 1937.

Jesse Jones Has Been the "Minor"

The death of the Wagner-Allenbogen bill will also place in double jeopardy the New Deal's most promising venture in public housing—the Resettlement Administration's program for suburban "green-belt" communities. I say in "double jeopardy" because that program already has been placed in jeopardy by a Justice Department boner. When injunction proceedings were instituted here against the RA's project in Bound Brook, New Jersey—ostensibly at the behest of Franklin Township but actually at the behest of the head of the Interwoven Hosiery Company, whose estate adjoins the project site and who objected to having low-income workers for neighbors—the Justice Department, horning into the case, insisted on erecting a purely legalistic defense instead of trying the case on its merits. As a result it reached the Appellate Court here without a hearing on the facts. Those facts would have demolished the plaintiff's right to sue, since it was the plaintiff's claim that the township would be put to great expense in providing schools and other public services for the project's occupants without receiving any taxes in return. The RA's system deeds the project to a non-profit corporation which immediately becomes taxable as to both real and personal property by the state and local taxing authorities.

The Justice Department's foolish strategy let the plaintiff get into the Appellate Court without having to show a right to be there and placed at issue before that tribunal of septuagenarians only the bare bones of the law itself. The court promptly held it unconstitutional by a vote of three to two and thus made it possible for objectors to any of the three other RA projects almost automatically to procure injunctions against them on application to the lower court here.

France on Strike

BY M. E. RAVAGE

Paris, June 8, by Cable

HERE has been no general strike in France; no Soviets; no sabotage; no disorder; no incipient revolution; no conflict with public authority. There has never been the slightest prospect of famine. The food supply has remained unimpaired, and arteries of transportation have functioned normally. Public opinion as reflected by the entire left press has been whole-heartedly with the strikers. In a long talk which I had with Léon Jouhaux, general secretary of the Confédération Générale du Travail, and other labor leaders on Saturday, Jouhaux said:

The situation could not be more satisfactory. In the beginning it was suspected that agents-provocateurs had a finger in the pie, but subsequent developments have shown the rumor to be false. The alarmist reports that Communists are responsible for the strikes are silly twaddle. The strike movement is purely economic. It is a spontaneous explosion of accumulated grievances of unorganized workers against unhygienic conditions, an oppressive spy system, the stubborn refusal of owners to bargain collectively, long hours, wage cuts, the emergency decrees and the rising cost of living. [The official Index of Cost of Living in Paris shows a 30 per cent increase in food prices.] The political triumph of May 3 gave these distressed workers hope that relief was in sight, but the month's interregnum strained their patience to the breaking-point. The first strike was in non-unionized metallurgical plants and took us completely by surprise. But from the start the workers have turned to us for guidance.

To show you that the C. G. T. controls the situation, when the Central Market truckmen and slaughter-house workers struck on Thursday night we convinced them that by threatening Paris with starvation they risked alienating public sympathy from a movement now whole-heartedly admired and universally approved, and they forthwith cheerfully resumed work. In one week the C. G. T. gained 100,000 members in the metallurgical industries alone. You may tell America, quoting me, that although the movement probably will spread until all exploited workers obtain satisfaction, we are victoriously settling hundreds of strikes daily, and neither public services nor utilities will strike. These last are the best-organized workers in France and the backbone of the C. G. T.

These strikes are unique in the history of the world. Although hundreds of thousands of workers are involved, in scores of industries ranging from airplanes to bill-posting, from department stores to five-and-ten's, there has been not one window broken, not one case of drunkenness, no disturbance requiring police intervention.

I dined with voluntary prisoners in the Thompson-Houston telephone plant. The confidence, comradeship, and discipline were splendid. From nothing the workers had created a self-contained community with commissary, dormitories, self-government, and recreational facilities. Gifted leaders had sprung as it were from the earth. Two unemployed chefs cooked for 2,300 persons, even supplying warm meals to the smaller neighboring plants. Sympathetic bakers in the vicinity supplied bread at the cost of the flour. Slaughter houses offered meat without profit. Shopkeepers contributed every imaginable kind of merchandise, while the public furnished hay for beds and lent blankets, dishes, phonographs, and radios. Professional artists entertained the workers. Teams of strikers made hourly rounds, keeping order and preventing fire, sabotage, and immorality. Beer was admitted but no wine. Employers stayed away, communicating with the delegates by telephone and meeting them outside the plant. Buildings and machinery had never been so clean.

Meanwhile the Comité des Forges and other industrialists declared the strikers were driving the national economy into bankruptcy, and wavered between surrender and intransigence. On one day they would agree to meet the C. G. T. at the Labor Ministry, and on the morrow they would excuse themselves. They trusted to miracles, to the hope that the workers might resort to disorder, to the alarmist press, and to the hope that the fascist leagues might recover their vitality. The newspaper owners' association stopped publishing for two days out of solidarity with the employers, believing that the public would resent the deprivation and blame the workers. They also appeared to believe that the rumor-mongers would have a freer reign if no regular papers appeared. The gesture proved futile, and they resumed publication on Saturday. Then De la Rocque took a last stand for a lost cause. He ordered his striking adherents to organize Croix de Feu unions, and he sent wagonloads of food to the workers. The workers rejected both organizers and gifts. Thereupon De la Rocque turned revolutionary and urged his henchmen among the workers to adopt an uncompromising attitude, while he advised the employers to resist to the end. Pitiable maneuvers, pitiable results. The technicians and engineers abandoned both the Croix de Feu and its tactics, and went over to the C. G. T.

The Blum Cabinet has unquestionably been embarrassed by the strikes, but the Premier must be held partly responsible for them since his first utterances were over-cautious and the adulation they inspired in the conservative press tended to make the left-wing groups uneasy. For the long run the movement has eased Blum's task. It will induce employers to swallow far-reaching social legislation at which they would otherwise have gagged. Unwittingly the metallurgical workers have speeded up the tempo of the new government, which otherwise might have been too conscious of its dependence on the Radical Socialists, and excessively circumspect.

The Jew and the World

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

I

THE Jews, Dorothy Thompson once brightly remarked, are like everybody else; only more so. There is always some Jew who illustrates with exaggerated aptness every variety of man and every conceivable prejudice, including of course that against Jews. The Jews are in every class and of every race. Some Jews are even Chinamen. This Chinese puzzle may, indeed, by its very absurdity, help to illumine the problem. For a Chinese Jew is either an anthropological miracle if he is a Jew, or an optical illusion if he is a Chinaman. And since I, for one, believe neither in miracles nor in illusions I am bound to conclude that it's all a mistake. The Jewish question is not really, How can a Jew be a Chinaman? That is easily answered: he can't. The Jewish question is, Why in the world should any Chinaman think he is a Jew?

For that matter, why should anybody think he is a Jew unless he is an Arab in Palestine? The natives in the "Jewish" homeland are after all the most probable descendants of those twelve Bedouin tribes who created the god of Rassenkultur to make them the Chosen People. For the Diaspora was of course only a partial dispersion; and those Jews who left to wander the earth naturally became far more absorbed by other groups than those who stayed home to mix only with immigrant neighbors. These remained largely the Arabs they always have been. They merely became Mohammedanized.

Of course, those quarrelsome Siamese twins, Jewish separatism and anti-Semitism, have succeeded in keeping alive an illusion of Jewish endogamy and racial purity. But no matter how carefully we may weight Jewish vital statistics by all sorts of sociological factors, it still remains true that every Jew living has had an incalculable number of millions of ancestors since the last Fall of Jerusalem. Only historically sidetracked peoples such as Icelanders or African pigmies have remained hermetically sealed by their environment; and even there the seal no doubt has been broken many a time. But the racial purity of the Jews, the most diffused of all groups, is obviously only a myth.

Once at lunch William F. Ogburn, then professor at Columbia and president of the American Statistical Association, computed for my enlightenment the minimum number of illegitimacies, mixed marriages, and plain whores in our ancestral multitudes since the dawn of Christian civilization. All demographic factors were duly considered; the fanciest possible errors were carefully weighted. With great delicacy Dr. Ogburn allowed my forbears the benefit of every possible doubt. The statistics were avowedly more facetious than exact. But even so, when I acquired an ancestral demi-monde larger than greater New York I called a halt. And ever since it has seemed to me exceedingly dubious that millions of Jews marched in strict racial formation for nineteen centuries all over the world just to conceive an immaculate Walter Lippmann or an undefiled Walter Winchell. It hardly seems worth all the restraint!

The truth is that the modern Jew, no matter how "pure" he may appear to pride and to prejudice, is Germanic or Slavic or North African Negro or Latin or Levantine. He is of the same mongrel race, with a similar dominant strain, as the peoples among whom he lives—if he has slept there long enough. And the degree to which he differs from them can be traced to some prior lengthy abode. American Jews who have been here for two centuries are as American as anybody else who has been here that long. And Jews more recently arrived are no more and no less alien than other recent arrivals. Yet the world insists that the Jew cannot be what he obviously is. It is as though the Jews are what they are, not by birth and climate and nurture, but by blood transfusion and protective coating and social trickery.

Of course you can always "tell a Jew"—always as often as not. But the anthropologists can't, for the closer they measure him the less Jewish he is. Nor is it, as is widely believed, such a remarkable feat to single out the members of a merely sociological race. Any child is more sensitive to a "problem" than to its causes. Through long practice I can "tell" Negroes who are white. But the fact remains, they are white. Indeed, one of the paradoxes of race prejudice is that a professional Negro is far more likely to succeed in his profession of black leadership if he is white; just as a professional Zionist is far more impressive on the bench of the United States Supreme Court than in the pulpit of a jingoist synagogue. The bourgeois world is always glad to show not only its tolerance but its respect for those members of a minority group who gain rather than suffer through its disabilities.

II

Yet there are Jews in the world. My good friend Dr. Wilhelm Cohnstaedt, former editor of the Frankfurter Zeitung and as echt Deutsch as Hans Sachs, actually feels himself an alien in his own land, which only recently admitted to citizenship its mongrel dictator. Jews exist, if only as a state of mind. And a state of mind cannot be dismissed without being deepened. The Jewish dilemma is real with all the force of great tragedy, whose nature it is to heighten reality. The Jewish problem has a historical cause; it has run a varied yet definite course; and it has a multiform, often contradictory, and unique symptomology. In short, it has a cultural background, and it functions as a social neurosis in time of social peace and as a social psychosis in time of social war.

When the Jewish clans were in the national making, and especially when they were a nation, there obviously was such a thing as a Jewish culture. Even this original culture had neurotic beginnings, as have all pure theocracies. Jewish homogeneity was always cemented by the fear of a jealous God. Hence the exclusive and monolithic character of that culture, whose genius is attested by a profound literature. This literature had great poetry and great prophecy, that is, both inner wisdom and public direction. But its wisdom and its direction were cramped by the totalitarian, theocratic, juridical way of life out of which they grew. That is why, instead of broadening the culture, it narrowed and strengthened it; and finally paralyzed it. Ancient Judaism was really a highly sophisticated and gifted expression of tribal fascism.

The dispersion broke up the physical cohesion of this culture. It no longer had a geographical home. It no longer had a demographical base. A closed community became a universal diffusion. Not ten but all twelve tribes of Israel got lost, not only in the physical world but in the historical process. The modern Jew, removed by some ninety migratory generations from his Arabic source, has lost not only his anthropological but also his cultural continuity. He has nothing left of the original theocracy but its theological tradition, which he usually observes in the breach. A way of life became a memory of behavior. Judaism survived only as a sectarian fixation, ranging in intensity from the tantrums and taboos of primitive orthodoxy through the confused symbolism which motivates a Warburg on the Day of Atonement to that shadowy feeling of "being Jewish" which is more a vague sense of anxiety than a consciousness of culture.

However, the Christian revolution against the pharisaism of the Jewish theocracy infused new life into the Jewish culture-religion and thereby created the new myth of Judaeo-Christianity. This new myth shows all the traumatic characteristics of its origin. A "wrathful" and "jealous" God is killed, in the person of His own Son, by His own children. And the wages of this inexpressible sin is the permanent consciousness of guilt which is at the heart of the Judaeo-Christian tradition. Myth riding history!

This new myth received a tremendous impetus from the intolerable class-exploitation of the Roman world, for it satisfied the appalling need of that world to rationalize its own consciousness of guilt, its sense of sin, and its despair. And it is precisely because of the vitality of early Christianity that pure Judaism, having fulfilled its function of generating this new myth, survived only as a sectarian fixation. It became a cult parading as culture, to serve as a foil for the militant intolerance of Judaeo-Christianity. And this intolerance, which was an expression of social guilt, continued because the class struggle continued. Medieval society succeeded Roman society. Primitive capitalism succeeded feudalism. Finance capitalism is in power today. But social exploitation remains. And so the sense of guilt persists. Hence wherever class domination is at its strongest, there we are likely to find anti-Semitism at its darkest. What the world can never really forgive the Jew is that in his own image he has given it the Christ who disapproves of what it is doing between Monday and

Saturday and of its hypocrisy on Sundays and holidays.

Anti-Semitism then is the relation between the Jew and the world, in which both share, not unlike the relation in an unhappy marriage where neither husband nor wife is to blame but the bond between them is sick. The main difference is that an unhappily married couple can separate, while Jewry and world are inseparable. Hence the fantastic alternative of "segregation" or "assimilation," as though a psychosis could be either isolated or digested. It is as though one way to cure an asylum Napoleon were to marry him off to a lady who fancies herself to be Josephine; and the other way were to ship him off to St. Helena, which is precisely what the Zionists are trying to do.

III

And now let us look into the actual mechanism of this Jewish question.

The Jewish state of mind functions in a characteristic paradox. It shows itself partly in the very strenuousness of the resemblance of the Jews to the peoples among whom they live—and of whom they are indeed a part. And it shows itself also in the strange fact that this resemblance never quite achieves identity. It is this marginal failure which explains the high tension of the Jewish temperament, be it too reserved or too strident. It is this same marginal failure which is a source of both Jewish pride and shame. And it is this same marginal failure in every country which is the international bond of the Jews and which enables the more hare-brained anti-Semites to blame them for all international phenomena, from communism to finance capitalism. In common opinion the Jew is racially separate but psychologically assimilable. Exactly the opposite is true. The Jew is racially almost extinct, but because of the "racial" psychosis between Jewry and world he is psychologically unassimilable.

In a world of separatist cultures, of racial obsessions, of national jingoisms, of class wars, an international minority which everywhere just fails of regional assimilation is alien, irritating, and suspect to the average man. For the average man feels at home only in the civilization to which he is house-broken; and the slightly alien disturbs him far more than the totally alien. The flaw in the likeness of the Jews to the Joneses annoys the Joneses; which in turn gripes the Jews, for they practically are Joneses. This maladjustment between Jewry and world cannot be assimilated. This psychosis may be either disregarded, in which case the Jews become a nation within a nation, or it may be suppressed, or conceivably it may be cured.

In Poland, where for various reasons even partial assimilation was impossible, this psychosis has turned into permanent madness. Poland today is an anti-Semitic lunatic asylum where the Jewish Poles have become rigidly set in a primitive tribalism, of which the Dybbuk is a fitting symbol, while the other Poles are as rigidly fixated in a barbarous anti-Semitism, of which the permanent pogrom is a natural expression.

In Germany, on the other hand, where the Jew was almost completely "assimilated," what really happened was that the psychosis was merely profoundly suppressed. And when Hitlerism tried to cure the social and economic havoc of a defeated capitalism with an exaggerated chauvinism, it became obvious that the German-Jewish psychosis never had been assimilated. It flared up into violent social insanity. And because of the criminal tendencies and sexual deformities of Nazi leadership, German anti-Semitism took the form of a mass crime passionnel.

IV

On the crazy affinity between Jewry and world whole philosophies and institutions of pride and of fear and of abysmal ignorance have been built. Professional Jews have made careers of the "culture" of Judaism. Professional Jew-baiters have made careers of anti-Semitism. And what is just as bad, a "liberal" attitude of mutual tolerance for this neurotic condition has laid claim to the world's admiration.

To the professional Jew all civilization is a Jewish monopoly. And he is forever digging through history and combing the globe to check up on the boys who made good, in the hope that a Jewish destiny may have shaped their ends. The professional Jew has nothing to learn about Rassenkultur from the Gobineaus and Houston Stewart Chamberlains or even the psychiatric ideals of Herr Hitler. He is the original aristocrat of race prejudice, who is outraged by these parvenus in racial obsession.

The professional Jew, more often than not an unconscious anti-Semite, is always faced by the professional Jew-hater, the morbid sadist who can't let Jewry alone. To the professional anti-Semite civilization is not merely a Jewish monopoly; it is a Jewish conspiracy. Nazi professors have conclusively shown that the Pope is a Jew whose "real name" is Finkelstein, that President Roosevelt's "real name" is Rosenfeld, and that J. P. Morgan and Company, that most notoriously Jewish of all notorious firms, subsidized Lenin and Trotzky, whose "real names" were Zederblum and Bronstein, in order to wreck Jewish capitalism with Jewish Marxism. They have also shown that Jesus and eleven of the Apostles were really "Aryans." For the professional Jew-hater differs from the professional Jew, whose mania it is to claim all public figures possible, in that he picks and chooses to suit his own insane convenience.

Such is history according to the Jewish-fascist lamentations of the professional Jew and the Aryan-fascist shrieks of the professional Nazi. Ordinary public opinion, that is, common middle-class ignorance, by and large accepts both of these contradictory lunacies. The average American agrees with the cracked notion of the professional Jew that the Jews as a whole are a lot brighter, abler, shrewder, and altogether superior fellows. Then he agrees with the equally cracked notion of the Jew-baiter that they are invariably greedier, greasier, louder, and more crooked than their fellow-citizens, and of course a much poorer fire risk. And just to show that he accepts both fantasies quite impartially, he smugly remarks that some of his best friends are Jews.

This confusion in the public mind leads to a chronic anti-Semitism as infectious as the common cold. For obviously a minority which is so much better than the rest of us must be put down. And equally obviously a minority which is so much worse than the rest of us must also be put down. In times of comparative social peace this chronic anti-Semitism confines itself to a phlegmatic neurosis. In times of social strain and struggle it flares up into the psychosis of violent hate. But at all times this discriminatory confusion is so pervasive that even philo-Semitic efforts are tinged by it, indeed part of it. For there can be no bourgeois defense of the Jews which is not a mere palliation of Jew hatred, which is not a mere effort to keep anti-Semitism well-bred and respectable. One of the historic pleas for toleration of the Jews consists, in fact, of the argument that since they are almost indistinguishable from the Joneses, since there are so few of them, and since these few labor under considerable disabilities, there is really no danger whatever of their domination. Every ten years or so some astute publicist, with liberal intention, will prove statistically that the Jews can't get us. Why pogroms if prejudice will do?

V

The magazine *Fortune some time ago hit upon this brilliant if somewhat hoary idea of stemming a more ominous anti-Semitism by objectively proving that the present disabilities of the Jews are perfectly sufficient to keep them in their place. The editors shrewdly suspected that the Jews, being a minority group, probably lack even proportional representation in the power and wealth of the country. Guided by this sound suspicion, they decided to find out just how much of America the Jews really control; just how smart (or dumb) they actually are; and to just what degree they endanger this Christian commonwealth.

Accordingly Fortune organized one of its sociological Abercrombie and Fitch expeditions to gather an article. The head of this expedition was Archibald MacLeish, a sociological ingenue of great personal culture and with a real desire for social decency. Assisted by the usual number of beaters and boys and natives from Yale, the Fortune expedition took off and explored the whole of our racial wilderness to hunt for Jewish big game in the wistful hope of catching only small Jewish fry. It returned rich in facts, its hope fully justified. But practically all of its findings I could have discovered, at far less expense, in the main reading-room of the public library. The only really startling fact the Fortune expedition brought home is that Douglas Fairbanks, the former better half of America's sweetheart, is after all one of our boys.

The findings appeared in the February issue of Fortune. They immediately made a "sensation." Professional and even amateur Jews all over the country, who in fear of a growing anti-Semitism are at the moment anxious to show that the Jews by no means have it all over the Goyim, demanded that the study be republished in book form. So it was. And the blurb writer, with every evidence of being sold by his own sales talk, informs the reader that "the FACTS contained in 'Jews in America' will be startling . . . will surprise . . . will be of profound interest to every American . . .," will bowl you over!

*"Jews in America." By the Editors of Fortune. Random House.

Now just what does "Jews in America" show? It shows that the Jews do not run this country. It proves that they exercise no greater power than their numbers warrant, in fact considerably less, as might be expected from a minority group under frequently open and permanently invidious discrimination. Fortune discovered, for instance, that of the 420 listed directors of the New York Clearing House in 1933, only 30 were Jews; and half of those were bunched in two minor trust companies. It found that in the investment field there are a few large Jewish houses, such as Kuhn, Loeb, and Company, the Speyers, the Seligmans, and the Lehmans. But all these houses have Gentile partners, and none of them begins to compare in power with the great non-Jewish firms.

In the basic industries—in coal, steel, oil, rubber, shipping, transportation—there are practically no Jews at all. Jewish ownership is really confined to light industry, to merchandising, and—ironically—to the manufacture and sale of amusement. Jews control the clothing industry because so many of them started as tailors. There are a good many Jewish department stores because so many Jews started as peddlers and small storekeepers. The Jews have had a great deal to do with the movies because so many of them started nickelodeons. Today, however, Jewish control of the great motion-picture companies is far from monopolistic. My own feeling is that with the advancing control by finance capital of all other forms of Big Ownership, Jewish control is likely to shrink. The Morgans and Rockefellers and Mellons are not in the habit of inviting Jews to their melon-slicing parties or for a swim in their private pools of watered stock. To sum up, Fortune found that of the 80,000 individuals listed in Poor's Register of Directors only "4.7 per cent seemed to be Jewish," just about the proportion of other Americans who seem to be Jewish; and these few are certainly not among the towering exploiters.

In the professions, in medicine and law, the proportion of Jews is no greater than the proportion of Jews to the rest of the country. And their power, in terms of hospital connections or membership in leading law firms, is infinitely less. In other learned professions, I feel certain, the Jews enjoy less than their quota. Owing to their background as well as to their difficulty in finding good jobs, Jews prefer the merchandising professions of law and medicine to the salaried professions of engineering or architecture. There are some Jewish university professors. But with very few and honorable exceptions they are not men of great distinction or intellectual integrity. Mostly they rise on the academic escalator, safe and sane and respectable proofs for the boast of our higher learning that it does not draw the anti-Semitic line. But in fact they are the exception which proves the line of academic anti-Semitism. And more often than not they are far more adept as expert lickspittles than as expert authorities. In short, conventionally successful Jews, like conventionally successful leaders in other handicapped minorities, get there less through their authentic ability than through their gift of conformity. And since they never achieve real power, they are ominous mainly as dinner partners.

The expedition fully satisfied the editors of Fortune that the Jews are no danger. The Jews control no more than their share, and even that share, though somewhat more strident, is far less important. Obviously, there is no need for an artificial numerus clausus, because bourgeois Jewry has a congenital quota of ability which pretty much parallels Gentile capacities. The liberal conclusion is clear. If the Jews are so much like the rest of us but are only 4 per cent of us, and even these 4 per cent labor under various open and covert disabilities, then why all the fuss?

Unfortunately this fuss has been going on for thousands of years because the Jewish question has nothing to do with these things. The Jewish problem, as I have tried to show, is the sick relation between Jewry and world, a consciousness of social guilt which goes with social war. The mechanism of this Judaeo-Christian psychosis is a unique expression of man's brutality to man.

Mr. MacLeish did not allay my fear that the Jews may control America. I have no such fear, provided they are not professional Jews. It is not the Jew but the reactionary in Barney Baruch to whom I object, just as it is not the Anglo-Saxon but the reactionary in Mr. Lamont who must not be allowed power. What the editors of Fortune assume is that if all public figures were Jews there would be reason to worry. And since they can easily show that no dominant group is ever entirely or even largely composed of a suppressed minority, they feel that America is safe and anti-Semitism silly. To me anti-Semitism is evil for very different reasons. I wouldn't care if all bankers were Jews—or for that matter all university professors were Negroes or all Cabinet members American Indians—provided they were the men for the job as it needs to be done. Incidentally we know that the distribution of human ability makes it quite impossible for any minority to monopolize it. The only way a minority, be it of race or of class, can disable the majority is through the police powers of the state.

VI

Bourgeois society cannot solve the Jewish problem any more than could feudal or ancient society. It has nothing to offer but the hoary alternative of segregation or assimilation. Neither of these is a cure; both are myths. Segregation, as the American Negro shows in his very complexion, does not segregate. It merely acts as a morbid attraction. Every Ghetto in history, whether it was actually physical or sublimated into social discrimination, has acted as a maleficent magnet for the worst features of both groups. The earlocks of orthodox Jewry in Poland are far blonder than those in the Ghetto of Tunis. Segregation is a suppressed, secret, anti-social affinity. And the cultural intercourse between two groups under segregation, no matter what subtle forms it may take, invariably binds them with the neurotic ties which bind the split personality.

Bourgeois assimilation, as I have shown, is no less a chimera. Even though thousands of Jews may "pass," the Jewish problem remains. For bourgeois "assimilation" is not assimilation to social democracy but to bourgeois prejudice. The Jew who becomes assimilated to bourgeois society, thereby becomes assimilated to bourgeois anti-Semitism. Some time ago a Jewish classmate of mine proudly informed me that he had "got into" the Harvard Club. "If you have made good, you have no trouble at all," he boasted. Here is your whole mechanism of bourgeois assimilation. Denial is not cure. To be Jewish is not a secret vice but a social absurdity. It may be convenient and clever and even advisable to change Schoenberg into Belmont. But it surely is no fundamental therapy. The only way to solve the Jewish problem is to solve the great problem of social and industrial democracy.

That is why I have found, to my amazement, that the little Jewish tailor who shouts in Yiddish in his Socialist or union local is far less race-conscious than the big German-Jewish banker whose family has been here for a century. Unlike the banker, he does not want to join a club in order to snub others. He wants a society which everyone can join in security and justice. He may not get such a society for a long time to come. And when he gets it, it will no doubt have its terrible faults. But at least he is on the way.

You've guessed it: the answer is Marxism!

The South Is Rising

BY MAURY MAVERICK

BURIED under the rapidly deteriorating soil and choked economically from the outside and inside since it lost the Civil War, somehow the South is rising. We have been robbed by cotton speculators, utilities, big-town and small-town money lenders. We have sent our "upper" classes off to Northern colleges and our poorer ones off to be burned up by machines in Eastern industrial cities, and we have thus been drained of our best energies. We have taken punishment long enough and we are sick of it.

There are signs of revolt. As yet it is only a vague rumbling restlessness, but it is growing and cannot be ignored. In this revolt look back to that figure that rose up in the eroded hills of Louisiana—Huey Long. In his bones and his blood was deep hatred born of the oppression, undernourishment, sorrow, misery, ignorance, and desperation of his people. Raging in his soul, he clattered on the scene and slashed and cut and cursed the gods of oil and sulphur—his first hates—and then all the other gods right across the national scene. He was like a violent Gargantua shouting his Rabelaisian song as he went. God rest his troubled soul in peace. There was much in him that was vicious but what he stirred up cannot be downed.

Drawn by this ferment but not part of it, except to get the little lickin's around the kettle of graft, have come lesser ones like Talmadge. Talmadge—little, mean, cheap, and common—with not a millionth of the brains and none of the endearing qualities of Huey—inheriting only what was dangerous in him. Others as well have rattlesnaked up and have for the time fooled and are fooling Southern people, who have been slugged so long that they are easy to deceive.

Against what are the Southerners rising? They are beginning to rise out of their slavish submission to an economy which has given them the sweet imaginary odor of the magnolia blossoms—and also poverty, hunger, hopelessness. They are rising against the economic consequences of Appomattox; against what Charles W. Pipkin calls "selfish interests that have been able to screen themselves behind . . . Southern ideals, . . . traditions which they meant to exploit and degrade." They have had enough of that inferiority complex which takes the form of a reminiscent self-satisfaction born of the war gloriously lost. They are rising finally against political separatism which brings inequality and a system of business enterprise which has drained the South of its natural and human resources for three-quarters of a century.

An indication that the South is beginning to prepare for action is the recent formation in Washington of the Southern Policy Committee. Numbering among its members many Southern Congressmen and officials in the various administrative departments of the government, the committee represents a valid Southern movement of a genuinely progressive nature. The nation will be hearing from it before very long.

What are the facts and forces behind the present restlessness of the South? First of all King Cotton is dead, and the South knows he will never rise again. Cotton was king after the Civil War, but at no time was he a gentleman-George V. He was a blooming Hitler who ordered the Southerners to grow cotton and sell it for cash—or be purged by starvation. The results of cotton tyranny are inscribed on the death scroll of soil erosion. Mississippi has 63.7 per cent of its farm lands injured by sheet erosion and 47.1 per cent by gullying; Tennessee, where over half the land has been rendered valueless for farming, has the same proportion of sheet erosion and 80.7 per cent of gullying; Big-Mouthed Eugene's Georgia, 50 per cent washed out, is going fast. Sixty-one per cent of the nation's eroded land lies in the South. Five million more acres of fertile bottom land have been lost to cultivation through stream choking and floods, and twenty million tons a year of potash, nitrogen, and phosphates race to the ocean from the stark fields of the old cotton empire.

This relentless drainage creates a vicious circle in which the South is forced to grow cotton for sale in order to buy fertilizer (5,500,000 tons of it a year, compared with 2,500,000 tons for all the rest of the nation) with which to grow cotton for sale. Sacrificing all to cotton, the South has neglected its other agricultural opportunities and has been compelled to buy produce it could grow more economically itself. Christmas trees from the West Coast are sold in the Carolinas, land of evergreens; spinach and carrots from distant California are sold in the Southeast; Southern farmers buy winter rutabagas from Canada and cabbage from everywhere; hay, corn, and feed are sold by the West to the Southeast, and those that can afford it live to a large extent on canned goods bought from nearly anywhere but from the South. For the South to import these things, a group of Southern economists have recently stated, "results in everyday scarcity of what could abound without limits." Furthermore the goods the South buys must jump the prices jacked up by a high tariff wall; but the goods it sells must grovel and beg miserably under the protectionist spite-fence and compete against the whole wide world. This would be enough to explain the unenviable records of the South in American agriculture: the lowest per capita farm income; the lowest income per farm worker; the lowest return per horse-power unit; the lowest ratio of income from livestock; the lowest per capita amount of pure-bred livestock; the lowest production of milk and butter.

Worse still is the human drain on the South. Since the turn of the century it has had a net loss of three and a half million people. In the single decade of 1920-30, 380,000 Negroes emigrated to Northern cities. The charts of population movements prepared by the government show the people fleeing from the South as from the invasion of a foreign army, black and white alike, flooding north, west, and even down into Florida, from the devastated provinces of our dead king. Of those who are left behind, many live in areas where from half to nine-tenths of the children receive diets inadequate by any human standard, resulting in disease, feeble-mindedness, and social degeneration. A particularly bitter aspect of the emigration is that it empties the South of its best leaders and turns them into betrayers of their homeland. Education in the South may lag behind the national average but it has its high spots equal to any in the country. The University of North Carolina is outstanding as an intellectual center, Texas has perhaps the finest university library in America, while Rice, Duke, and others offer the same advantages to students as any of the old pre-revolutionary Eastern universities. Yet traditionally substantial numbers of the most intelligent—educated on the last resources of proud families—go North, there engaging in the exploitation of the land of their birth. By the contracts they learned to write in Eastern colleges, by ownership documents, mortgages, bonds, stocks, utilities, and rail franchises, they syphon out our salt, oil, sulphur, cattle, cotton, and natural resources, along with the brain and brawn that must inevitably follow.

This exodus has helped nobody. By draining off the population it has inflicted heavy loss on the South, and by flooding other parts of the country with millions of unorganized, uneducated, untrained day laborers it has lowered purchasing power and wage scales in those regions, thus causing economic loss to the nation as a whole.

It is easy for critics whose ignorance and prejudice are different only in kind from ours to say categorically just what is wrong with the South. The story, however, is deeper than they know. Some, with Abolitionist psychology, blame the planters. But planters and tenants are caught in the same trap. Landlordism is the curse of the South, but it is a stupid landlordism that denies profitable production and purchasing power to its serfs. It is the hateful landlordism of the anonymous—the banks, the insurance companies, the distant investors, the credit lines, the bankruptcy receiver-ships, all the dreary apparatus of financial exploitation by remote control. All this time most Southerners have thought, if they have taken time to think at all, that it was exploitation by the Northerners of which they were the victims. The same crowd of exploiters are doing in the North and West just what they are doing in the South. Exploitation knows no geographical divisions.

So the South has decided to muscle in at the national table. Southerners have come to realize that helped by their climate they can, by conservation and coordination, change their record of the lowest per capita farm income to the highest.

Who but a couple of damned Yankees should be the ones to have led the South to this realization? Senator George W. Norris and President Roosevelt, by setting up the TVA, have given the South the first real hope of revival it has known since the Civil War. They marched in, pitched camp and set to work, but unlike General Sherman, they came with an army of construction. Covering 40,000 square miles, enriching the lives of over two million people, TVA has become the great central dynamo for seven states. TVA has brought light, heat, and power to the destitute South. Its enemies, the utilities, backed by their Eastern friends and by Southern gentlemen who have stolen carpet-bags, still fight it bitterly. They profess to see in TVA a deliberate slap in their faces from the hand of Roosevelt. They picture the President sitting off in Washington, like a Count of Monte Cristo, throwing gold into pet schemes like TVA merely to gratify a personal hate for the private power groups. But they have not seen the truth, for TVA is a great deal more than just a negative gesture of spite. It is a break for, and in, the South and it is also the most successful enterprise of the New Deal. The great majority of the Southern people realize that Roosevelt is the only President who has given the South full support, full encouragement, full recognition since the Civil War. The allegiance and strict obedience of Southern Senators and Representatives is sincere and almost fanatical. Roosevelt, heart, liver, and lights, is our man.

Together he and Norris have set 16,000 men to work. They are unlocking the magic of electricity and farm technology in an area which was one of the most backward in the entire nation, releasing the energies of modern science with a dash and morale akin to that of war. A little army but a victorious one—victorious over local prejudice, victorious over utilities, partially victorious even over the Supreme Court.

What this peace army means for the South not even those who know the South can say. It means breaking with a past which took mournful pride in having been overpowered, not licked, by the Yankees, and which despised the only means by which the defeated Confederacy could convert defeat into victory. Yes, there is another Southern rebellion. But there is no nonsense or equivocation about the facts. There are no bugles, no faint smells of imaginary magnolias, no inferiority complexes. It is a rebellion in which Northerners—damned Yankees—lend assistance to the grandsons of the ragged troopers who starved and fought and died with Jackson and Lee. Both have found that they have a common enemy—and that enemy is to be seen not in terms of sectional cleavage but in terms of economic power.

The New Soviet Constitution

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, May
WHEN a truth about the Soviet Union is told too early to unprepared minds it is dismissed as "propaganda." Three years ago it was "propaganda" to say that the U. S. S. R. was successfully carrying out an unprecedentedly broad and rapid program of industrialization. Now for a few years it will be "propaganda" to say that Russia is scrapping the dictatorship and establishing a real democracy.

It is interesting that when I first wrote about the democratization of the U. S. S. R. in the middle of 1935, even those Soviet Communists with whom I discussed the trend were not aware of its existence. For there has been no popular demand for democracy. The dictatorship is not retreating under pressure. It is voluntarily abdicating.

Though I violently dislike the raucous paeans of praise for Stalin which are repeated in this country with benumbing frequency and monotony, I must add my voice to the chorus. Democratization is not a whim inspired by a moment or a bit of opportunism provoked by a temporary situation. Stalin apparently thought this out years ago. He has been preparing it ever since 1931. Forward-looking people abroad will hail the change toward democracy. Yet most of them swore at the costly and often cruel steps by which the U.S. S. R. approached the goal.

The Bolsheviks know from their own and from foreign experience that when several classes exist, one dominates the others. No matter what we call it, such a relationship is a dictatorship. In Stalin's view, therefore, the road to Soviet democracy lay through the annihilation of certain classes and the equalization of those which remained. This describes the painful social process through which the U. S. S. R. has passed in the last six years.

With the opening of the first Five-Year Plan in 1929 the city bourgeoisie—the Nepmen of dim memory—finally disappeared. Stalin's six-point speech of June 23, 1931, buried the policy of unfair discrimination against the intelligentsia and raised the professional groups to the political level of the proletariat. Materially, these engineers, physicians, and others were better off than workers. But the fate of the peasantry, more than anything else, would determine the future of socialism and of democracy. In 1929 agrarian collectivization commenced, and with it the persecution, expulsion, and economic destruction of the kulaks, the relatively more prosperous or at least more hopeful peasants whose vain belief in the preservation of Russian capitalism led them into stubborn resistance to the socialization of agriculture. The bulk of the peasantry joined the collectives. Here their political conversion made rapid strides. They ceased to be the competitors of the socialist city. They became its collaborators in the erection of a new system of society. They were consequently entitled to equal rights. In February, 1935, Premier Molotov announced the new constitution which would grant equal suffrage to peasants. Today the vote of a Soviet workingman is worth five peasant votes. The Bolsheviks deliberately put this provision into their earlier constitution because they were afraid of being overwhelmed by a huge hostile rural electorate. Now, however, the collectivized peasant represents no danger to socialism. Culturally and materially the village is being lifted to urban levels. Political leveling follows. As a corollary of this political reform came the statutes of March, 1935, which instituted a new regime in the collectives whereby the general assembly of each kolhoz became its highest authority; the assembly can even overrule the village Communists, who had previously dominated. The village thus won a large measure of economic self-government.

Advancing technique and mounting culture make the Soviet workingman an embryonic intellectual. Through the mechanization of agriculture many peasants are at the same time workers. The difference between brain and brawn and between factory and farm grows narrower. The divisions still exist, but these classes are complementary to one another, instead of hostile as before. Under the new constitution they will enjoy the same rights and prerogatives. The class war, therefore, has practically ended in the U. S. S. R. A few anti-Soviet individuals there are, but no anti-Soviet classes or even fractions of classes. A homogeneous Soviet nation is being born, and the authorities are straining every muscle—with what success I do not yet know—to cultivate a new patriotism and a new consciousness of nationhood.

Internal peace, plenty, and progress conduce to democracy; their opposites, to dictatorship. The Soviet Union, therefore, can safely move away from dictatorship toward democracy. Abroad it will be said that democratization is an expedient to make the population more loyal in case of war. That will be its effect; it is not its cause. Soviet democracy is a logical, natural outgrowth of years of revolutionary history. The war menace, which the Bolsheviks are no longer exaggerating, slackens the speed of the advance toward democracy. It cannot interrupt it.

This summer the Bolshevik Party will definitely write the birth certificate of the new democracy. National elections on the old basis will then take place for an extraordinary Congress of Soviets, which alone has the formal right to annul the former constitution and adopt the new one. Immediately thereupon a second nation-wide poll will be announced to elect the Soviet Union's first parliament. The elections will be secret and direct. Citizens will cast their ballots for or against particular candidates, who, if successful, will become members of parliament. Hitherto national bodies have been chosen indirectly.

Parliament will consist of two houses. The lower chamber will count some 600 members elected by popular vote. The Senate will number approximately 300 members selected by the legislative assemblies or governments of the several constituent republics and autonomous territories which comprise the Soviet Union. The commission which drafted the constitution considered the advisability of direct elections for this body, too, but decided in favor of an upper house which would represent the many Soviet nationalities. At present the Soviet Union is a federation of seven national republics: the Russian Federation, the Ukraine, White Russia, the Caucasus Federation, Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, and Tadjikistan. Now the Caucasus Federation will be broken up into its three units—Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan—each of which rises to the status of a national republic. Moreover, Kazakhstan and Kirghiz will be detached from the bulky Russian Federation and given independent existence. These eleven major republics will each select about ten senators; the smaller nationalities which the republics embrace will likewise send their senators to Moscow. Instead of seven presidents of the Soviet Union, one from each national republic, there will be one supreme president of the Union elected by parliament.

Both houses may initiate legislation, but the lower house will enjoy greater authority. It is assumed that parliament will sit twice a year for two-month sessions. During the remaining eight months commoners and senators will resume their ordinary tasks. One may go back to his lathe, the other to his plow, a third to the operating theater, a fourth to his job as governor of a province. The Bolsheviks definitely do not want to divorce the executive from the legislative branches of government. The local administrator or the director of a plant or the teacher has intimate contact with life and knows best what laws the country needs. Having passed the laws, he presumably will know best how to put them into effect. Between sessions the congressman comes to his constituency not as a visitor but as a participator.

Stalin has said in private that the parliamentary elections will serve as a sort of examination of officials. Should these officials displease the population, they will be rejected if they stand for parliament. And then, of course, they will be discharged from office too. The bureaucrat is exposed to popular disfavor. This is the most effective weapon against bureaucracy.

Any organized group of citizens can add names to the list of candidates for parliamentary seats. Such groups might be the party, the trade unions, cooperatives, academic societies, university student bodies, voluntary corporations like the Osoaviakhim (an organization for encouraging civil aviation and teaching the people protection against air bombing and gas attacks), and so on. Each candidate will engage in a pre-election campaign in which he will naturally extol his own virtues and reveal the shortcomings of his rivals. This will be a school of democracy such as Russia has never known. The vote will be cast by a mark opposite the favored person's name or by scratching out all the others.

Both houses of parliament will contain Communists and non-Communists. Here, in a sense, are two parties already. Indeed, the proportion of non-Communists may be quite large. The range of choice may not be very wide in the beginning, but the system affords scope for a reflection of public opinion.

Place of residence will determine where one votes.

Soviet Court

Drawing by Gropper

This is a crucial change. Members of municipal soviets are now elected by factories or offices voting as units. This is an essential characteristic of the Soviet system. Its replacement by parliamentary elections according to territorial divisions should herald the end of the Soviet system. Domicile is more or less accidental, and its use as a basis of voting stresses unifying aspects—a locksmith may live on the same street with a professor—whereas voting according to place of work emphasized the criteria which once distinguished one class from another. Fewer inhabitants, moreover, will be disfranchised. The promulgation of the new constitution granting suffrage to many persons now deprived of it—ex-kulaks, former political enemies, and others—will have the effect of an amnesty. Simultaneously Moscow will probably indicate that the Soviet Union is a refuge for all enemies of foreign dictatorship except those who advocate or practice individual terror.

The new constitution is a distinct advance toward democracy. The people of the Soviet Union, when they actually control their own affairs, will control all their affairs—political, economic, social and cultural—for no fields will be reserved to private interests. The forthcoming statutes, to be sure, declare that not only national property but also certain forms of private property are "holy," but this second category is small and includes such unimportant items as a single house or apartment, a summer bungalow, an automobile, a library, a cow. Personal wealth is "holy," not capital.

This concession to personal wealth is also a partial concession to the inviolability of one's person. In the final analysis the question of democracy in the U. S. S. R. is the question of the GPU, or the Internal Commissariat, as it was renamed after the recent restriction of its authority. Equality of political rights is a great deal but not enough. The essence of democracy lies in civil rights. The new constitution contains a long section about justice. The administration of justice through the public courts, as distinguished from direct action by the Internal Commissariat, will be strengthened. Ultimately the judges in the people's or lower magistrates' courts will be elected by popular vote. This is the first of a large number of steps required for the creation of an independent judiciary.

There remains the question of the Communist Party, which is still the spearhead of dictatorship. But here also many changes have occurred in recent years. On May 2, 1935, Stalin said that there were "party and non-party Bolsheviks." That is, there were staunch, devoted Communists who could be trusted even though they possessed no party card. He might have added that there were Communists who had the party card but did not merit it. Party membership no longer carries with it a monopoly of loyalty and authority. Moreover, as the years go by, the line of demarcation between party and government grows less distinct. The function and activities of the party now merge with those of the government. More than ever the government's newspaper Izvestia looks like a twin brother of the party organ Pravda. Where does the talented Lazar Kaganovich cease to be a member of the party's supreme Politbureau and become the government's Commissar of Railways? The government cannot disappear. Perhaps, by and by, the party will; the Komsomol, or League of Communist Youth, has already lost most of its political physiognomy. These developments do not impend today or the day after tomorrow. I am sketching a distant perspective which, nevertheless, is the frame for the concrete measures already being introduced to make a real democracy.

While the threat of attack lurks in the Far East and in Europe, the dictatorship must be within call. On the other hand, Soviet democracy may lessen the likelihood of world war. If the English "young Conservatives" were to realize that together with France and Russia they could afford to take a stand on principle and oppose both the Italian and German menaces to the British Empire, a bloc of democratic, anti-fascist states—the U. S. S. R., England, France, and Czecho-Slovakia—might stem aggression as well as reaction and turn Europe back toward sanity. A little spell of prosperity would facilitate this.

There are some slight indications that the tide of fascism in Europe is receding. The new Soviet constitution will be an important factor in this situation. Stalin is the chairman of the government commission which drafted the constitution, and the task, undertaken upon his initiative, had his minute guidance from start to finish. Collectivization, industrialization, and now the launching of democracy—with these remarkable achievements to his credit, Stalin's place in history is secure.

TVA: The New Deal's Best Asset

BY STUART CHASE

III. Planning by Consent

IN THE preceding articles I have tried to set the TVA upon the wider base of planned resources for human livelihood, and to enumerate the specific activities upon which the Authority is now engaged—activities which arise automatically when the control of a great watershed is undertaken. In this article let us inquire into the personnel, their point of view, their methods, and their success in overcoming opposition. How is the TVA progressing psychologically? What are the chances, from the human and the institutional points of view, of achieving its admittedly admirable objectives? Dams, locks, and generators can be built, and under such an engineer as Dr. A. E. Morgan superlatively well built, so long as Congress provides the money. This program, as we saw in the last article, is going briskly forward. What of human engineering; how are the people of the Valley going to live with their dams?

The total staff of the TVA now includes some 13,000 persons. About 5,000 are building engineering works. In their ranks are many highly skilled workers. About 4,000 are clearing reservoirs, most of them local farmers, unskilled in mechanical trades. Upward of 4,000 are salaried workers, technical or clerical. Here we find engineers, foresters, experts in the control of erosion, ecologists, geologists, physicists, chemists, agronomists, medical and sanitation experts, architects, statisticians, economists, sociologists, educational experts. We find a young woman whose duty it is to pacify the few rugged individualists who announce noisily that they would rather drown beneath the swelling reservoir than leave their cabins, and who will not sell at any price. The Liberty League should erect a monument to them, for they are as courageous as they are cracked. This young woman has a talent for absorbing their protestations and ultimately bringing them around.

The technical staff is not large considering the area involved—almost as large as England—and the mammoth task of reestablishing the economy of a whole region. This staff, however, is only the front line. Behind it is a much more numerous army made up of local organizations—county agents, Extension Service teachers from the land-grant colleges, school boards, farmers' cooperatives, the Red Cross, highway authorities, to name a few; and the staffs of other federal agencies—the Forest Service, the triple A, the triple C, the Resettlement Administration, the Bureau of Mines, the Reclamation Service (the greatest designers of dams in the world, with Boulder Dam as their outstanding achievement), Geological Survey, War Department, army engineers, and so on. The cooperation is genuine. There seems to be something about the boldness and vigor of the whole enterprise which fires the imagination and enlists the support of all who come in contact with it.

Let me give you a concrete example of the kind of project with which the TVA has to cope. To protect the shores of the Norris reservoir from silting, pollution, mosquitoes, and real-estate operators, a quarter-mile strip surrounding the 775 miles of shore line has been purchased, to a total of 117,000 acres. It is to be known as Norris Forest. People who have their farms in this area must be provided for. This demands a Removal Section in cooperation with the Resettlement Administration and the Extension Service of the University of Tennessee. Its biggest job is to protect the migrants from the realtors. Then airplanes must go aloft and take mosaic photographs of the whole region for a basic land-use map, to be checked by field surveys. The 117,000 acres will be divided into ten functional areas, and for each area expert technical study and planning is required.

1. Settlement areas, where farms will be continued, the farmers to receive dependable cash income from forest work.
2. Crop lands, where agriculture is advisable under proper tillage methods.
3. Grazing lands, for lease under strict controls against overgrazing.
4. Permanent-yield forest (76,000 acres) for lumber production to perpetuity. Cutting is never to exceed annual growth. The lumber will produce revenue.
5. Tree-nursery area, including experimental work on erosion-control vegetation and forest crops which feed men and animals—black walnuts, Japanese chestnuts, persimmons, mulberries, pecans, and many others. Incidentally this is one of the most interesting experiments in the Valley, partly because of the exceptional competence of the scientist who has it in charge.
6. Game areas, for restricted hunting, for protected breeding of wild fowl, and for a sanctuary where no trespassing is permitted.
7. A wilderness area, for solitude. No improvements of any kind to be permitted. Thoreau would find peace here.
8. A primeval area, where the remnants of the virgin forest are to be protected.
9. A study area (6,000 acres), a laboratory for ecologists. No hunting permitted.
10. Recreation areas for campers, hikers, Boy Scouts, leased camp sites, and the rest. No hot-dog stands.

All this is but one part of one reservoir. When private airplanes are foolproof and cheap, I think I shall apply for a summer camp on the shores of Lake Norris. I know that its superb natural beauty can never be spoiled under this program but only enhanced.

Almost the first question which I asked upon arrival was the strength of the opposition. What vested interests are fighting the TVA? The answer was surprising. There is little organized opposition in the Valley. New York, pulling the strings to its puppets in Tennessee, registers the very considerable opposition of the power companies and of certain bankers and business men. But the mass of the people are for it—farmers, workers, mechanics. Main Street is for it, the small business men. Professional and middle-class people generally are for it. Some politicians are disgruntled because their wards find no jobs at the TVA without first undergoing an exhaustive test by the personnel division as to technical competence. Nothing is more discouraging to a politician's second cousin. The Chattanooga Chamber of Commerce blows hot and cold. At a recent meeting two resolutions were passed—one deploring the TVA on high moral grounds as a violator of sound American institutions, and the other demanding that all contracts for TVA supplies be let to Chattanooga business men. Thus the chamber roundly denounced the devil and in the same breath solicited his sulphur-and-brimstone business.

By and large, the Valley has been won over. When the Supreme Court's decision was handed down, people burst into spontaneous parades and celebrations. This is due in no small measure to the substantial cash disbursements which the construction of mighty engineering works entails. In greater part it is due to a friendly and diplomatic attitude. All three directors share this attitude, and all are responsible for it, but the initial credit probably goes to Dr. H. A. Morgan, who has lived in the Valley for forty years, studying its soil and learning to understand its people.

The TVA did not appear over the mountains, an alien swarm of bureaucrats, flourishing blueprints, prepared to tell the people of the Valley what to do, and like it. No. The temper of the Authority has been to ask the people: What do you want? How can we help you get it? This is your Valley; you live in it. Perhaps we can show you some ways of doing things whereby you can live better. We shall be glad to try. And the Valley, after the inevitable period of shock at anything new, was disarmed by this frankness and humility. Tentative cooperation turned into enthusiastic cooperation.

This basic assumption that the people of the Valley come first touched every member of the staff with whom I talked. All are interested in the men and women about them, especially in the hill people with their strong characters and original points of view. Stories run in relays from office to office and from mouth to mouth. For instance:

TVA CENSUS TAKER: Have you any children?

OLD FARMER: No, stranger, but I've got a dam fine hog.

TVA EROSION MAN: Perhaps we can show you a little something about scientific agriculture.

GEORGIA CRACKER: Well sir, I've run through three farms, and pretty well used up this one. You can't tell me nothing about farming.

ONE OLD-TIMER TO ANOTHER: I tell you this TVA juice is cleaner than private-company juice. It's made with running water and not with dirty coal.

Whenever possible, the TVA works through local groups which are already organized and functioning. If none exist, the TVA starts them. The technique has now reached almost Machiavellian proportions. To obtain rural electric-power lines, farmers must first form a local cooperative. When approached, a given county may be on the defensive. So the TVA agents call a meeting and simply tell the story of what rural electrification means, what it costs, and what its benefits are. Then they pack their charts and prepare to leave, remarking as they take their hats that this particular county is a difficult one to service. The meeting, they point out, was called to get the general news before the farmers. Some day, perhaps, if all goes well, a line might be arranged. But hardly now. No indeed, not now. From defensive the audience turns to offensive. Why not now? What's the matter with this county? Why can't we have what other counties have? Mister, where are those blanks? We'll have a full list of names for you tomorrow, no, tonight; and we'll sign up that 662 kilowatts per mile. What do you mean, we can't have TVA power now? And the cooperative is enthusiastically launched under its own steam, with full local responsibility.

The TVA act directs that surplus power shall be sold first to public groups—cities, towns, rural cooperatives—and if any remains, to private power companies and industries. In 1935 plenty did remain, and $500,000 of current was sold to private companies. The outlet to municipalities has been slow, owing to the desperate legal battle being waged by the power interests. It takes from three to seven years, thousands of dollars, and an interregnum of thoroughly bad service for the citizens of any community in this Republic to provide themselves with electric power. Mr. Lilienthal tells the typical story of Florence, Alabama. First, the citizens by almost unanimous ballot, in an election provided by state law, voted to set up their own distribution system and to buy current wholesale from the TVA. Second, the franchise with the Alabama Power Company expired. Third, the company refused to sell its distribution lines to the city except at an outrageous figure, and finally refused even to discuss the matter of sale. Fourth, the service was grossly unsatisfactory; the Florence hospital was unable to instal a sterilizer because the lines were so overloaded. Fifth, the profits of the company have been spectacular; the gross income in a single year exceeds the appraised value of the whole investment. Sixth, every effort of the citizens to move in the direction of the TVA has been blocked by litigation, injunctions, court decrees; and every penny of the cost of this litigation to the company is paid by the citizens in their electric bills.

When the way is at last opened, when the period of impudence, effrontery, and sabotage is over, the TVA proceeds to close cooperation with the local town or city. Uniform accounting systems are installed. Power profits are not commingled with tax receipts. A considerate policy is adopted toward the customer. The customer is always right; he is entitled to good service—a welcome change from the attitude still held by some municipal systems that the customer is a dog of a taxpayer. Equipment and facilities are modern. Incoming lines are installed in duplicate, so that if one fails in a storm, the other can be switched in. In brief, the intention is to give the town all the benefits and services which a private company can give plus a few additional benefits, without the holding-company milking-machine attachment. Rates must fall, and a real yardstick appears. TVA charges are already beginning to rock the rate structure of the region. The power companies will charge that the cost accounting is unfair; that too much capital cost goes to flood control and navigation and not enough to power. This is a nice point; the row promises to be tremendous; but we must not forget that the dams are not being built primarily for power.

When Henry Ford dumped his cars on a nation, there were no roads to carry them, but presently paved highways appeared. Cheap power descends on the backwoods, and presently appear motors, pumps, refrigerators, radios, toasters, ranges, and washing machines. As energy is the basis of any civilization, this is not so magical as at first it seems. Certainly in the Valley lower rates have greatly stimulated power consumption; equipment sales have increased more rapidly than in any other region. One of the local private companies received the annual blue ribbon from the Edison Institute for the largest jump in business of any American utility. When the TVA current first came in, local companies complained bitterly that there already was a surplus of generating capacity. Now an actual shortage is on the horizon. The dams, we may rest assured, are going to be used.

[Mr. Chase's concluding article will appear next week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A DISPATCH to the New York Times reports the proceedings at Liblar, Germany, of the Carl Schurz Society of Berlin on the tenth anniversary of its foundation. Liblar was Schurz's birthplace. A large group of government officials, representatives of the National Socialist Party, and members of the faculties of Cologne and Bonn universities, together with forty-five American exchange students, took part in the ceremony, which concluded with the singing of "Deutschland über Alles" and the Horst Wessel song. Of course a message from Dr. Joseph Goebbels, Minister of Propaganda, was not lacking, but so far as the dispatches report he did not pay any particular tribute to Schurz himself. That was the only decent thing about the proceedings. For the Carl Schurz Society of Berlin has been gleichgeschaltet, that is, coordinated to the National Socialist Party, and is nothing but a branch of the Goebbels ministry. The mere presence of Nazi officials at a celebration in honor of Schurz was an insult to one of the greatest republicans.

One has only to read Schurz's published writings to see how he abominated despotisms and absolutisms of every kind. Schurz was but nineteen when he inspired his fellow-students at Bonn University to rise against the constituted authorities because they were dictators and tyrants, because there was no free parliament in Prussia, because the will of the Prussian people could not express itself, because there was neither freedom of thought nor freedom of speech and press nor freedom of political assembly. If there is one thing certain in this world, it is that were Schurz living today he would be blistering the Nazi dictatorship of Germany with the same superb eloquence that first burst from him in the Aula of Bonn University and that he put at the service of his new fatherland from the time that he reached our shores. Much stress was laid in the Liblar ceremony upon Schurz's efforts to foster a good understanding between the two countries. That was obviously the only thing that those Nazi officials and the United States chargé d'affaires, Ferdinand L. Mayer, could safely talk about. Had anyone really eulogized Schurz as he was, the speaker would have been arrested.

Let us suppose that there had been a real Schurz celebration at Liblar. One of the Bonn students would, of course, have led off with a restatement of those burning words which Schurz uttered at Bonn, after which he donned the uniform of revolution and was shut up in the fortress of Rastatt, escaping after the surrender as by a miracle. Over the speakers' stand would have been emblazoned these words of Schurz's: "The German Empire will infallibly find the surest guaranty of its stability in the progressive development of free institutions. The Germans are like every other strong people—fidelity will increase with freedom" (spoken at Chicago, June 15, 1893). The next speaker would have told of the price that was put upon Schurz's head as a traitor to that mild German despotism which never thought of ministers of propaganda or the tortures of concentration camps, or of a purge in which more than 1,250 persons were killed in a single night. True, the Prussian and other German autocrats did kill, and about this Schurz had something to say; so that another free speaker would have recalled Schurz's indignant reply to a German who wrote him in 1857 in protest against the murders in Kansas. He admitted their shocking character, but he repelled the statement of his correspondent that "the deeds of certain individuals in Kansas are, if possible, more barbarous than any atrocities of European despotisms," saying, "How can you think so? . . . Who would compare them with the long list of legally sanctioned murders committed in Baden . . . quite apart from the horrors that were perpetrated privately and praised publicly?" Can anyone doubt where Schurz would stand on the Hitler atrocities?

Finally, a real honoring of Carl Schurz would have terminated with the following from a letter written by him May 25, 1903, which sounds as if penned in 1936:

While those [Kishineff] outrages in Russia stand pre-eminent in their savage cruelty, it should not be forgotten that they only present one of the natural upshots of a widespread movement which in our days has put a peculiarly repulsive blot upon our vaunted civilization. The persecution and maltreatment of human beings on account of their race or their religious beliefs is always an offense, not only unjust to the victim, but also degrading to the offender. But the persecution and maltreatment of the Jews, as mankind has witnessed it and is now witnessing it in several countries, has been not only especially barbarous in the ferocity of its excesses, but in a singular degree self-debasing and cowardly in the invention of the reasons adduced for its justification. . . . And now . . . we hear apostles of anti-Semitism, even persons belonging to the so-called upper classes, insist with accents of profound alarm that if the Jews be permitted the same rights and privileges as other people, that despised race, forming so infinitesimal a part of the world's population, will surely outwit us all and rob us of our property, and possess themselves of all the controlling forces of society, and that therefore the Jews must be shackled hand and foot with all sorts of legal disabilities, if not exterminated. . . . Nothing could be more absurd and at the same time more cowardly than such reasoning and such appeals. But it is to agitation inflamed by just this spirit that we owe horrors like those of Kishineff, in beholding which humanity stands aghast.

By all means, honor Carl Schurz, you Jew-torturers, Joseph Goebbels and Adolf Hitler!

BROUN'S PAGE

THIS is written before the assembling of the Republican delegates at Cleveland, and so it must venture the risks of prophecy. It was held a few months ago that the sharpness of the protest against the New Deal would bring the Republican Party into complete unity. As I write I make the guess that Alfred Mossman Landon will be nominated on an early ballot. Nevertheless, such a quick agreement upon a candidate is far from indicating party unity. Surface harmony has been in too many cases nothing more than the calm which precedes the storm.

If a coalition ticket is agreed upon, the writer is a bad prophet. I venture to predict that it will be a Republican ticket and a Republican as usual. And unless this particular group of delegates double-crosses me, an attempt will be made to even up both geographically and along the economic front as well. A mild liberal, such as Landon of Kansas, will have as his running mate a rockribbed conservative like Wadsworth of New York. There is no true unity in the Republican Party any more than there is in the Democratic. The attempt to combine the agricultural West and Middle West into the sort of conservatism which the captains of the industrial East require can never be wholly successful. It would be just as logical for the Democrats to name a Republican of a liberal turn of mind as Roosevelt's running mate as for the Republicans to nominate a conservative Democrat to go along with Landon.

The convention in Cleveland (and on this prediction I risk all my reputation as even the second cousin of a prophet) failed to take the one step in coalition which would have been completely and wholly logical. It did not name William Randolph Hearst as the vice-presidential candidate of the Republican Party. This was an error in tactics as well as logic. Mr. Hearst discovered Landon and fostered him. His name would hardly have come before the convention at all but for the spade work performed by Hearst and his lieutenants. Alfred Mossman Landon won thousands of primary votes in communities where his name and his views were wholly unknown except through the active propaganda of the Hearst newspapers and the Hearst magazines. In spite of the slight setback which the California primary entailed, William Randolph Hearst did Landon far more good than harm in the pre-nomination campaign. This situation may be reversed after the nomination, but if a break was to be made Landon and his advisers were in honor bound to force it before the convention met. Woodrow Wilson did not wait so long in dealing with Colonel Harvey.

But the Republicans in Cleveland owe Hearst much more than a debt for the discovery of a candidate. For more than a year Hearst has set the pace and defined the issues for practically all the attacks made upon the Roosevelt Administration. Even such bitter newspaper rivals of Mr. Hearst as the Chicago Tribune, the Los Angeles Times, and the New York Herald Tribune have taken their tone from San Simeon. In the general strike in San Francisco the local papers almost without exception went into a coalition under the leadership of Neylan, Hearst's lieutenant. In similar manner they have followed the counsel of Hearst in the pre-convention campaign against Roosevelt. Although Colonel McCormick has made more speeches about the freedom of the press than anybody else, the real leadership was gained by Hearst some two years ago when he induced the Publishers' Association to come to his support in the Jennings case.

So great has been his hold over his associates that J. David Stern was the only newspaper owner in the country who dared to criticize Mr. Hearst's newspaper practices in the matter of the Fiorenza fake. Every once and so often the Society of American Editors meets and lays down general principles about the ethics of journalism, but no practical application is ever made. Eager observers are still waiting for the society to cite Hearst for palpable violations of any of the standards set. It is true, of course, that William Randolph Hearst has far from a complete sway over the American press, but he has more control than any single individual has ever had since the beginning of American journalistic history. Even those publishers who do not like Hearst's methods or his politics very seldom express their disagreement in public. The Republican candidate in this campaign will have more than 75 per cent of the press on his side. Hearst has delivered a large part of this. He syndicates not only a news service, which has been highly colored to the extent of always calling the New Deal the Raw Deal, but also comic strips, columns, and various features. These have been handed over bodily to the Republican Party. I point out, for instance, that Arthur ("Bugs") Baer, Mr. Hearst's best paragrapher, has been assigned to almost unbroken partisan political comment for more than a year although his usual service has been merely to provide merriment without choosing sides.

It is a little late in the day for the Republican Party to talk of breaking with Hearst or disowning him. At this particular time not much would remain of the Landon organization if Hearst were left out. On several occasions the Lord of San Simeon has attempted to capture the Democratic organization, but in each case he has fallen short in spite of local victories. His tactics in regard to the Republican Party were extremely shrewd. He took the party over before the convention met. In the beginning most observers felt that Hearst was not serious in advancing the cause of Landon. "That's just for trading purposes," was the general comment. This time Hearst went through with it. Landon's lead was too long to be cut down. Having captured the candidate, Hearst has also captured the party. Now is the time for all good Republicans to make pilgrimage to San Simeon. They have no other place to go.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Lesson of the Master

DRAMATIS PERSONAE. By W. B. Yeats. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

YEATS is never more the poet than when he attempts to write prose, and it will be a mistake to look in this book for the kind of logic that one can more easily find in a preface by Bernard Shaw or the most recent volume by Bertrand Russell. "To keep these notes natural and useful to me I must keep one note from leading on to another," begins one of his diaries, "that I may not surrender myself to literature." Obviously Yeats is warning himself against the too well-balanced sentence, the too well-developed paragraph, and the too well-organized formal structure that we associate with a certain type of "well-written" prose. He has always guarded against these things because they have been for him artifices of the logical mind which get in the way of the truth, the poet's truth. Incoherence, digression, and general irrelevance have been constant features of his prose; but it is not right to say that they are cultivated for their own sake. They are simply the logical results of using a logical medium for the expression of beliefs and insights which are essentially non-logical in character. Comparisons must be made with the Delphic epigrams of Blake or the journals of Baudelaire. The thought progresses, if it does progress, not according to any scheme of abstract reasoning, but according to an arrangement of metaphors. To follow the thought is really to perceive these metaphors, and this is not an affair for the reason alone. Ultimately the metaphors refer to a realm in which the reason is not yet altogether at home and in which it must proceed with a certain trepidation. Almost as much concentration is required as in reading the most difficult poetry.

Even the well-known literary personages of the opening section, Dramatis Personae, may be thought of as metaphors or symbols of this kind. The portrait of George Moore is built up with the greatest richness of description, anecdote, and dialogue; it strikes us with the same impression of unanalyzable reality that we derive from the best fiction. Yet it is also another illustration of one of Yeats's favorite distinctions (one which Allen Tate has recently appropriated to great advantage): "Improvement makes straight roads; he pumice-stoned every surface because will had to do the work for nature." Lady Gregory is the personal embodiment of those virtues which, because they are rare in modern democratic society, Yeats prefers to call aristocratic and identify with the essential values of the artist. "We come from the permanent things and create them, and instead of old blood we have old emotions," he explains in making the analogy. So also for all the other members of this private hagiology—Edward Martyn, Arthur Symonds, Florence Farr, Standish O'Grady, and the rest: all are sharply realized as individuals at the same time that they represent different aspects of that ever-broadening and ever-deepening contemplation of experience which makes Yeats the most considerable of living poets. As in such poems as the elegy on Robert Gregory and The Tower, the lives of known individuals become symbols as definite as tree or mountain, and like them the more real for being seized as wholes by the imagination.

This is perhaps most clearly seen in the case of Synge, who has been for Yeats throughout his later career an archetype of the modern intellectual man. Here it is less Synge's personality than the circumstances surrounding his death that provide Yeats with his pattern. Behind the two diaries, Estrangement and The Death of Synge, lies the whole drama of Yeats's own struggle to preserve his role in the resharpened teeth of the men of action. Written in 1909, at a moment of intensely revived political hatreds in Ireland, they correspond to the most anguished and uncertain period of his verse. What Yeats sees in his friend's troubles with the patriots and religious fanatics is really a challenge to his own view of the special role of the man of imagination. The notations provide a rare record of a great artist's most intimate efforts at self-understanding and self-justification.

Needless to say, their interest for us is greatly increased by their relevance to current preoccupations, their evidence that the drama which occupies us at the moment was played out by Yeats thirty or more years ago. Retracing the history of the "Young Ireland" school of poets and of his own movement, Yeats explains how he found it necessary to renounce "the deliberate creation of a kind of Holy City of the imagination, and express the individual." Nearly everything that Yeats has to say about the patriotic rhetoricians of his time is equally true for the writers of so-called revolutionary literature today: "The ethical ideas implied were of necessity very simple, needing neither study nor unusual gifts for their understanding." And again, "Neither the grammars of the Gaelic League nor the industrialism of the Leader, nor the Sinn Fein attacks upon the Irish Party, give sensible images to the affections." With a few simple substitutions this remains as pungent a statement about the relationship between literature and politics as when Yeats first made it. It is a statement, like numerous others strewn through these attic-sweepings of genius, which bears constant examination and reexamination at the moment. And it may be added that its truth will depend not only on the difficult logic that lies behind it but also on the authority of the speaker, the only authority that counts for very much in matters like the present, the authority of a great example.

WILLIAM TROY

Mr. Forster's Harvest

ABINGER HARVEST. By E. M. Forster. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

FIFTEEN years ago E. M. Forster, though not very well known, was very well thought of; then he wrote a best-seller and became deservedly famous; today he seems to have gone honorably on the shelf. Latterly the fault may rather be his than ours, for he has produced very little, and that not at the top of his bent; yet he remains, I think, among the not numerous modern writers worthy of our attention, and the present book—despite its shortcomings—may restore to him part of his vanished stature. It would be a pity if it didn't. For though neither a writer of the first rank nor a writer who satisfies our most pressing needs, he is one with a peculiar value and charm, and these ought not to be wasted.

In many respects, of course, Forster writes both in a tradition and as part of a generation; yet that much is only like seeing his face with no expression in it. The expression that brings it to life, the smile as much directed against the face itself as against the world, is what makes all the difference. It has saved him, if not from disappointing, at least from displeasing us. He might so easily have been somebody who went to school in his youth to Meredith and Henry James and then fell regularly into line. As it was, he did not altogether escape the pitfalls of his special generation, the generation that comprises among others Strachey, Virginia Woolf, and Rebecca West. Shuttling between creative work and critical, being rather ostentatiously snooty toward the present and rather dreamily indulgent of the past, turning precious half out of fear of turning stuffy, conducting their experiments somewhat en amateur, this group have only been intellectuals who exhilarated us, never people who nourished our deep needs.

Forster, with much of their temperament, has avoided many of their mistakes, and hence has come off by far the best. He has been the least self-indulgent, the least self-conscious, the least mannered. With him as with the others race and education have proved both a hindrance and a help, but at any rate wherever he has reacted to life with that besetting English upper-middle-class sin of frivolous urbanity, he has done so with light humor and not with high-handed wit. Strachey's pomp, Rebecca West's glitter, Virginia Woolf's chastity have spoiled all three as human beings; but if Forster, like the others, has failed of full creative or critical growth, at least he remains an admirable person, and one who never claims for himself more than he can show. He is always engaging and honest, and usually thoughtful and keen.

The present book, for all its inequalities, is not a bad index to his character and talents. No more than its immediate predecessors is it the book one really wants from him. It is after all a harvest of scattered and sometimes dated grain—old sketches and essays and book reviews, some written with journalistic haste, others with journalistic levity, others with no more than journalistic liveliness. There is no sense of art in it, or of a considered intention and a core. But there is no bunk in it either, no cant, no chirping and twittering, no strutting and posing; and in addition to much good sense and somewhat less good criticism, there are two very praiseworthy things.

The first is a fused and radiant personality. Whether Mr. Forster is writing—to use his own designations—of The Present or The Past, of Books or The East, the same gusto tempered by caution, the same sensibility disciplined by toughness, the same humor and grace and generosity come through. He is the least fanatical writer I can think of who at the same time shows no deference to the opinions of others. He always adopts sound attitudes. Journeying through the East, he is ever conscious of being a Westerner and never of being a well-born Englishman. He loves Jane Austen but manages not to write about her like a doting ass. He admires Virginia Woolf but manages not to write about her like a Bloomsbury neighbor. He touches the past with both hands and writes quite as shapely essays about it as did Strachey, who never touched anything with more than the tip of one finger. He discusses the English character without either waving the Union Jack or jumping up and down on papa's grave. And it is all done in terms of a sensitive personality; his abilities may sometimes have withered in the bud, but his personality has flowered.

The second praiseworthy aspect of this book is the portrait it provides of the best type of modern liberal. Mr. Forster has not shrunk from life and he does not shrink from sharp comment upon it. Almost everything he has observed of upper-class England comes in for his condemnation, sometimes for being vulgar and silly, but oftener for being selfish and corrupt. It is a condemnation which takes the shape of protest, and now and then—as in Me, Them and You—the protest is magnificently effective. Forster's principles are as clearly defined as his personality; since both are admirable, one finds it harder to accept those minor qualities, those lapses not from integrity but from intensity, those artistically relaxed moments, here and elsewhere, which have kept Forster from becoming a major writer. Somehow he should be occupying in modern letters, not an honorable place, but a distinguished one.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

The Director as Translator

ROMEO AND JULIET. By William Shakespeare. A Motion-Picture Edition. Random House. $2.

FILM AND THEATER. By Allardyce Nicoll. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $2.50.

THE shortest way to appreciate the difference between plays and films is to examine a portion of some play which has been made into a film and note what has happened to it. It is seldom possible for a layman to do this, but he may do it easily with "Romeo and Juliet," which Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer now publish in two versions, Shakespeare's and their own. The producer, the director, the author of the shooting script, and many other functionaries of the film have appended essays the purpose of which is to convince us that they approached Shakespeare with the greatest respect and changed him as little as possible. Yet a glance at any portion of the script reveals how great must be even the minimum change in such a case.

Take, for instance, the seven lines in which Shakespeare's Friar John explains to Friar Laurence why he has not delivered the all-important letter to Romeo in Mantua:

Going to find a bare-foot brother out,
One of our order, to associate me,
Here in this city visiting the sick,
And finding him, the searchers of the town,
Suspecting that we both were in a house
Where the infectious pestilence did reign,
Seal'd up the doors, and would not let us forth.

These lines are not spoken in the script, which substitutes for them a series of elaborate scenes showing us the events themselves. Friar John, who incidentally takes no associate with him, enters on his way to Mantua a village wherein a folkplay is being given before a happy crowd. As he stands watching it a terrified woman runs to him, whispers, and pulls him into a house nearby. Entering with him, we find a man stricken by the plague—news of which, spreading through the town, creates pandemonium and brings soldiers to nail up the doors and windows of the house so that Friar John cannot proceed on his errand; though at this very moment Balthasar rides with his news to Romeo and as a matter of fact passes the door behind which Friar John is detained. Or take the better-known passage of the play in which Romeo, standing before the apothecary's shop, describes its contents. The film, of course, gives us the contents themselves; conducts us into the shop with Romeo and lets us look at

■ tortoise hung,
An alligator stuff'd, and other skins
Of ill-shap'd fishes; and about his shelves
A beggarly account of empty boxes,
Green earthen pots, bladders, and musty seeds,
Remnants of packthread, and old cakes of roses

as well as at other properties which the imagination of the studio has added—"snakeskins, skulls, vials, retorts, bottles"; and omits the speech.

The lines in both cases have been translated from Shakespeare's language into that of the motion picture. There are images in both, but that is the only resemblance. Shakespeare in such passages depended on his words to create the necessary vision; the motion picture tries to give us the vision. In other passages which are dramatic rather than descriptive the need for translation may be less, and indeed the great moments of "Romeo and Juliet" seem to have passed over in the present instance almost without change. The differences, however, between play and film remain very great, and so must they always be when both things keep their character. In advance of seeing "Romeo and Juliet" on the screen one cannot say how good it is, since it cannot exist on paper; one can only be prepared to judge it in its own terms, which will not be Shakespeare's. The merit of the present production would seem to be that those who were responsible for it knew perfectly when Shakespeare was writing for them and when he was not. They would seem to have been experts in the art of translation.

Mr. Nicoll, having written many books on the drama, turns now to the film; and as might have been expected he is sharply aware of the differences between the two forms of story-telling. His analysis of these differences, while never absolutely novel, is both sane and comprehensive, so that his book may be recommended as one of the best elementary guides to the subject. It is a large subject about which much remains to be said, as Mr. Nicoll, a historian of the theater, knows better than anybody. In his opinion there is no eventual danger that either of the two arts will destroy the other. They are rivals, not enemies, which means among other things that each must know its own business and its own strength. The theater must do what it alone can do, and so must the movies. And Shakespeare can exist in both.

MARK VAN DOREN

"The Boy I Was"

LANDSCAPE WITH FIGURES. By Lionel Wiggam. The Viking Press. $1.75.

LIONEL WIGGAM, just twenty-one, names his first book of poems well. "Landscape" here is more important than "figures." Almost all these poems are pictorial. Mr. Wiggam is not, as yet, writing of human relationships. He is writing of himself and of a certain scenery which expresses his own feeling. Nor is the scenery specifically Middle Western—country of this poet's birth; it is rather a kind of setting drawn in simple lines, and against this setting moves sensitive youth in its own poetic dream.

This young poet is extremely competent, almost dangerously at ease in writing. So faultless a technique in one so young can mean a lack of intensity and a lack of inner struggle. There seems to be no surplus of passion in Mr. Wiggam's lines, no over-richness of sensuous impression in his imagery. Nor is he trying against difficulties to shape language to his own music and purposes. His music is always the same, fairly conventional, quiet, and charming. His phrasing is very precise, but not striking.

The best poems in this first book are those in which Wiggam expresses the awareness of boyhood developing dreamily toward young manhood. Yet even in these poems the poet tends to describe the experience rather than to enter into it and give it back to the reader.

And all I shall ever know I discovered there:
Where the buzzard achieved a sullen altitude,
Where the sun was lusterless brightness on dry air,
And the earth was a pattern somberly pursued.

The least successful and most broadly derivative poems in this collection are those lyrics descriptive of young girls in love. Here the influences of George Dillon and of Louise Bogan are marked. The poems are romantic, pictorial, and rather obvious. Wiggam has not Miss Bogan's intensity and subtlety. He merely describes an emotion:

Some women walk in wilderness forever
They live obscurely in a cave of grief.
Their hearts are softly crumbling, as in winter
The blown leaf

Miss Bogan, on the other hand, chooses images to fix exactly her psychological analysis of women:

Women have no wilderness in them,
They are provident instead,
Content in the tight hot cell of their hearts
To eat dusty bread.

To say that Lionel Wiggam shows influences of older poets, that his music in many poems is learned from MacLeish, that he has written poems directly comparable to some by Miss Bogan and Mr. Dillon, is not necessarily to condemn him as unoriginal. A young poet usually shows that he has studied older poets. But Wiggam at present is lacking in any striking originality of thought, of feeling, or of language, and one or more of these qualities is present in the best poets. Although his book contains a number of very lovely lyrics, many of these seem written a little too easily. Poetry like his can wear thin and become mere magazine verse of a high order. If, however, with his competence in verse forms and his instinct for the right word, Wiggam matures in feeling, learns to draw more from a real scene and to search more deeply his own sensibilities, he may develop into a very interesting artist. His first book of verse is praiseworthy for its clarity and its music; he has taste, and little awkwardness. The trouble, as I see it, is that he has achieved control of form without having learned specifically what is his own to say.

EDA LOU WALTON

Art and Mr. Bulliet

THE SIGNIFICANT MODERNS. By C. J. Bulliet. Covici-Friede. $4.

ALTHOUGH much muddy water and muddled paint has passed under the bridge since the publication, in 1927, of C. J. Bulliet's "Apples and Madonnas," its author still considers "significant" a synonym for "modern." "Apples and Madonnas," it will be recalled, derived its title from the statement that "an apple by Paul Cézanne is of more consequence artistically than the head of a madonna by Raphael." This determination to consider Raphael only in the light of the Perry prints is typical of Mr. Bulliet's methods of selection and elimination. The sixty-eight moderns whom he has singled out for consideration in the present volume can hardly be accepted as representative of the modern movement in its entirety, since the title, like Thomas Craven's "Men of Art," is more inclusive than the contents.

Mr. Bulliet's elect include Cézanne and Renoir but neither Manet nor Degas; and those interested in influences will be surprised to find Forain sandwiched in between Dufy and Foujita, instead of preceding Toulouse-Lautrec. Mr. Bulliet still takes seriously the magazine covers of Marie Laurencin and writes ecstatically of the painting and parties of the "horribly sophisticated" Hélène Perdriat. Among the women painters "Rosa Bonheur and Mary Cassatt, of course, don't count," but a self-portrait on silk by Salcia Bahnc "challenges the masterpieces of medieval times." Suzanne Valadon is considered less in the light of her masterful line than as the unhappy parent of Maurice Utrillo—the tale of whose brutal begetting Mr. Bulliet repeats in the biographies of both mother and son. He deals kindly, if cautiously, with such faint flashes in the Parisian pan as Picabia, Miro, Georg, Gris, Lhote, Ozenfant, and Kees van Dongen, and writes respectfully, if somewhat repetitiously, of the experiments of the Brücke, Blaue Reiter, and Bauhaus Germans. The Italian elect are the futurists, Balla, Severini, and Carra; the last-named Bulliet considers "the painter of the best picture the movement produced, the only one that ranks high in the general output of the extreme modernists over all Europe." On the strength of this masterpiece—The Funeral of the Anarchist Galli—which is elsewhere described as Miltonic, Carra "may claim kinship with Dante." The canvas of this "one-picture genius" which Mr. Bulliet reproduces is rather less impressive. The omission of any mention of American art, from Thomas Eakins to today, is unexplained except by the condemnation, in the Introduction, of America as a land "where the artists have always preferred the easiest way of a lazy naturalism." In view of the author's tolerance for the least of contemporary European painters, this clean sweep of the American slate seems somewhat drastic. If the best of Brooke, Hopper and the early Blume lacks significance, what about the celebrations of Foujita and Paul Klee?

"Art critics are useless and detrimental." This credo, from the futurist manifesto, with which Mr. Bulliet irrelevantly opens the chapter on Carra, applies more pertinently to the present volume. For as soon as Mr. Bulliet abandons the simple journalism of the early chapters on Cézanne, Rousseau, and Van Gogh (and even here he is careless enough to state that Van Gogh painted the portrait of Dr. Gachet at St. Remy), his style becomes turgid and vulgar, and his critical opinions, whenever they are without benefit of earlier opinion, lack both acumen and discrimination. Even more prejudicial to a consideration of the book as a definitive work is its constant pornographic appeal. Culture, for C. J. Bulliet and Thomas Craven, is a pill to be sugar-coated with scandal, and the royalties resulting from this pandering to popular taste should soothe the sting of the censorious—which in the case of the present reviewer would be less severe were not Mr. Bulliet's salacious stories so very stale.

VIRGINIA NIRDLINGER

Four Case Histories

STERILE SUN. By Caroline Slade. Issued in a special edition, the sale of which is limited to physicians, psychiatrists, sociologists, social workers, educators, and other persons having a professional interest in the problems of adolescence. The Vanguard Press. $2.75.

CAROLINE SLADE was a social worker for many years in a town in upper New York. Her book, the bitter fruit of such experience, presents the story of four prostitutes in their own language. In each of these stories Mrs. Slade brings out unobtrusively but clearly the economic forces which drove these girls into their respective "careers." One of them, Sue, is hardly more than a child. At the age of twelve she is placed in a home where she is to help with the housework and go to school. When the husband seduces her and pays her for it, she learns that she has something that men want and that they will pay for. Step by step, through maltreatment, casual reprimands, threats of the reform school, and the like, she drifts along until she is a professional prostitute. Another of the girls, Winkie, has been an underpaid employee in a five-and-ten-cent store, where the attentions of men lead to increased income. She becomes a routine prostitute, and struggles to save money, find a man, and join a church. Her fear of disease becomes an absorbing terror, and her life becomes a kind of miserable race between the dangers of syphilis and the growth of her bank account. A third works at her trade in order to support her children, is driven to drink in order to tolerate herself and her life, and ends by being sentenced to a long term in a reformatory and losing her children. The fourth receives human aid and kindness only from a pimp.

"Sterile Sun" is an uncompromising indictment of society. Its case histories uncover some of the most disgusting social cancers which a capitalistic economy creates and permits. They reveal the processes by which prostitutes are made, the routine futility of social workers, the role of the pimp in the life of a prostitute, and the uselessness of reformatories as instruments of reformation. However, the book is not merely a series of case histories, not merely a presentation of data. If our censorship laws were not so uncivilized, "Sterile Sun" could be presented as a volume of short stories; its effect is that which we get from stories projected with truth, and force, and genuine art. The first part of the book, recounting the story of the child Sue, can stand comparison with most of the stories to be found, say, in the yearly O'Brien anthologies. "Sterile Sun" is both an important social document and a moving piece of writing.

JAMES T. FARRELL

Five important new titles — NOW ONLY 95¢ EACH

BARCHESTER TOWERS AND THE WARDEN #41

Anthony Trollope's greatest novels in 1
vol. Introduction by A. Edward Newton.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF HORACE #141

BARREN GROUND #25

by Ellen Glasgow, preface by the author.

THE PORTRAIT OF A LADY #107

by Henry James

DEAD SOULS #40

Nikolai Gogol's masterpiece.
Introduction by Clifford Odets

MODERN LIBRARY

Send for free catalog of 215 titles
20 E. 57 St., N. Y. C.

An Analysis of Egotism

THE ETHICS OF POWER. By Philip Leon. The Macmillan Company. $3.

A YOUNG English philosopher, as yet unknown in this country, has written one of the most important, wise, and discriminating books on moral theory that have appeared in recent years. The book is really an analysis of human egoism. Its title is therefore misleading, though the author does incline to accept Adlerian psychology and therefore to regard the will-to-power as the fundamental characteristic of the libido. But the Adlerian thesis is not accepted unreservedly or without testing it in terms of the classic moral theories of past centuries.

The analysis makes a sharp distinction between egoism (appetition) and egotism (ambition). The egoist enjoys life. His conduct may roughly conform to the pattern which hedonism ascribes to all human conduct. The egotist, on the other hand, "loves neither goodness nor himself determined as, or identified with, this or that experience or process. . . . He loves just himself." It is this egotistic self-love which is the root of all evil. Man does evil "not because he loves evil, but because he loves himself." The quintessential character of egotism is the tendency of man to regard his determinate and contingent self as Absolute. Since the whole of multifarious reality outside himself negates this claim of absoluteness, egotism expresses itself in terms either of isolation from or of identification with the whole of life. In the one case the egotist withdraws from life in order to worship himself in vacuo. In the other case he seeks to absorb life into himself and identify himself with the Absolute. These tendencies must logically end in either dementia praecox or paranoia, to use not the author's phrase but one coined by Lewis Mumford in defining the aberrations of modern nationalism on the one hand and imperialism on the other. Nationalistic isolationism and imperialism are in fact perfect illustrations of the two contrasting expressions of human egotism, so accurately analyzed by the author.

The traditional distinction between egoism and altruism is properly questioned. Leon does not follow Hobbes in deriving the latter from the former but merely calls attention to the fact that the one is continuous with the other. "In alteregoism [a phrase which admirably defines this relationship] there is not an abolition of the barriers but only a moving of them further on so that they inclose a wider territory." Hence the great difficulties faced in problems of collective behavior, in which the force of individual other-regarding impulses is compounded with collective egotism.

It has been the habit of modern moral theory since the Age of Reason to regard increasing rationality as a guaranty of increasing sociality. Reason has been conceived as a force of universality moving against recalcitrant egoistic impulses. One of the chief merits of this treatise lies in its vigorous challenge of these modern assumptions. In elaborating his position upon this point the author comes very close to the old theological doctrine of "original sin." He declares upon one occasion:

We have tried to prove that egotism is as primary as appetition and that it is not derived from appetition nor necessarily subservient to it. What we have called its forms are a priori like those of thought. These also cannot be shown to be derived from anything; all we can say is that they emerge pari passu with the emergence of intelligence. . . . Self-regarding sentiment is present germinally at least in the form of self-feeling even in children and animals, developing its conceptual side later as intelligence develops.

Naturally Mr. Leon has little patience with those who hope that either education per se or a new social order per se will be able to overcome this basic egotism. He fears the idealists who "see big and far and think constantly in terms of humanity, the world, the nation, the state, the ideal, the race or the millennium." He fears them as egotists who do not know themselves. It must be admitted that there are problems of collective man which this analysis does not fully comprehend or appreciate. It is nevertheless a sobering and illuminating contribution to moral theory and to moral life.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Shorter Notices

TO MY CONTEMPORARIES. By Edwin Rolfe. New York: The Dynamo Press. $1.

Edwin Rolfe is one of the earlier poetic recruits who have been developing a Marxist ritual in this country. His concern—in his own words—is with the creation of "clearer visions," of maintaining the cause of "fists, tight-clenched around a crimson banner," against the cause that "waves a flag and blows hot air through a star-spangled banner." Like Spender, who protested a "palpable and obvious love of man for man," Mr. Rolfe espouses the "natural love of man for fellow-man" as a major article of faith; the prevailing mood, however, is one of pride, scorn, impatience—almost arrogance—toward the non-believer, and militant enthusiasm toward his comrades. The most telling lyric in the book, Definition, shows the poet keenly aware of incidental bad faith within the ranks, but maintaining nevertheless a sure belief in the symbolic integrity of the fraternal salutation. Technically, Mr. Rolfe can hardly bear judgment by even the most elementary of poetic canons. His medium is a prose medium, with only the roughest and readiest of poetic rhythms and an entirely fortuitous use of rhyme. He convinces us, through naivete, by first disarming us; and then, not of the fact that he is a poet, primarily, but that he is a true believer whose candor is not to be questioned.

HEAD O' W-HOLLOW. By Jesse Stuart. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

The literature of eastern Kentucky and of the Appalachian region in general has always been a regional literature in the narrowest sense. If home-made, it was also home-read; if foreign made, it had all the defects of a manufactured product. Mr. Stuart's book of stories, "Head o' W-Hollow," is of another sort arising from a true impulse to self-expression, and it is good to have. Mr. Stuart's is the most honest writing that has ever been done about Kentucky mountain people. He has always the genuineness and realism which are the raison d'être of regional literature, and he sometimes expresses enough of essential humanity to rise above that level. A few of the pieces are dull: Red Jacket and Governor of Kentucky might have been left out. Mr. Stuart speaks most lyrically through his life-loving farmers; one can hardly fail to be attracted by Big Eif Porter, who spent his last day exactly as he wished and died punctually at ten o'clock in the evening. Accidental Death, in which a section boss picks a Negro off a coal-car with a cinder, has a gruesome Faulkner touch. The Word and the Flesh and Snake Teeth are episodes in the relationship between religion and snake-bite—a theme which, if newspaper-picturesque, is nevertheless authentic. Dark Winter is a hesitant work of art, remarkable for its selectiveness and its lack of emphasis at the same time. Mr. Stuart knows the terrible importance to the Powderjays family of the hunger, hard work, illness, death, and recovery which go to make up the flow of the relentless winter; and he knows how the winter shrinks when it goes to take its place as a unit in their past lives. Having read Mr. Stuart, one knows a great deal about life in W-Hollow, but the generalizations are one's own; he is objective and concrete.

A STUDY OF LOVE'S LABOR'S LOST. By Frances A. Yates. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

LOST PLAYS OF SHAKESPEARE'S AGE. By C. J. Sisson. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

Both of these interesting books support the theory, slowly gaining ground among responsible scholars, that the Elizabethan drama was frequently more topical than it has been the rule to assume, or than it is possible after three centuries always to prove. As for Shakespeare himself, "Love's Labor's Lost" has seemed clearly his most-topical play; and it has often been examined from that point of view. The merit of Miss Yates's study is that she extends the examination to a point where it includes and reconciles a number of previous conjectures and indeed reduces them, because of what she adds, to certainties. The play becomes in her hands the work of a young man who had to answer for himself the then popular question whether poets learned more from life or from books; and who answered it in a ripe-minded satire not so much against individuals like Florio as against the type of person who knows more than he understands—or, to appropriate Brander Matthews's definition of the high-brow, who is educated beyond his intelligence. Mr. Sisson, working not with conjecture but with legal documents, unearths several unsavory stories of Elizabethan plays which got into court because they were libels on living unfortunates. His detective work consists first in reconstructing the situations in real life upon which the plays were based, and then in reconstructing the plays themselves, the actual texts of which have been lost. The result is an entertaining and rather terrible book; and it has its importance because one of the playwrights concerned was George Chapman, whom Miss Yates, incidentally, pretty well establishes not only as one of the pedants whom Shakespeare found typical for his purpose but as the rival poet of the Sonnets.

RECORDS

AFTER seven years Toscanini has made a series of new recordings. The first to be issued is an album of Wagnerian excerpts, which includes the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," the "Dawn and Rhine Journey" music from "Götterdämmerung" in a Toscanini-Humperdinck concert arrangement, and the "Siegfried Idyll" (Victor, five records, $10). The magic that one has come to expect each time Toscanini leads the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is, of course, there. Note the effectiveness of the string diminuendos at the close of the first act prelude and on the first side of the "Siegfried Idyll"; the ominousness of the brasses in the "Nie sollst du mich erfragen" theme at the close of the first prelude, achieved without the usual ritard; the exquisite horn playing after the first climax on the third side

SEX

TECHNIQUE

in MARRIAGE

By
ISABEL EMSLIE
HUTTON, M.B.,
Ch.B., M.D.
Physician to the British Hospital for Functional Mental and Nervous Diseases, London
Foreword by IRA S. WILE, M.D.
Former Commissioner of Education,
N. Y. C.

ILLUSTRATED
with EXPLANATORY
DIAGRAMS

RECOMMENDED by PHYSICIANS

AUTHORITATIVE COMMENT

"THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE is a clear, succinct, non-emotional, authoritative and conservative exposition of the practical factors involved in making marriage successful on the sexual level."

—Ira S. Wile, M. D.

"Dr. Ira Wile describes the book exactly . . . It is primarily concerned with the conduct of the honeymoon and with the technic of the sexual performance."

—Morris Fishbein, M.D.

"A practical work . . . with a modern point of view, and the author has certainly been guided by good judgment as to what constitutes general medical opinion."

—Journal of the American Medical Association.

"It is a book that can be safely recommended by physicians and parents."

—Johns Hopkins Hospital Bulletin.

*The membership of the A.M.A. consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

"Sexual pleasure, wisely used, may prove the stimulus and liberator of our finest and most exalted activities."

—HAVELOCK ELLIS

CONDENSED RESUMÉ

Preparation for Marriage	Sex Intercourse During Pregnancy; After Child Birth
The Sex Organs of Men; of Women	Inability to Perform Sexually
Sex Instinct in Men; in Women	Menstruation and the "Change of Life"
Analysis of Sex Intercourse	Carable Childlessness
The Technique of the Sex-Act	The Value of Birth Control
Practical Considerations	FIVE DIAGRAMS
The First Sex-Act	The Male Sex Organs (Two Views)
Adjustment to Sex Life; Difficulties; Mutual Consideration	The Female Sex Organs (Two Views)
Frequency of Intercourse	Male and Female Reproductive Cells
Positions in Performing the Sex-Act
Influence of Age, Sex Instinct, Health

INTERNATIONAL ACCLAIM

Below are a few of scores of publications, lay and medical, that have praised SEX TECHNIQUE: Journal of the American Medical Association; Johns Hopkins Hospital Bulletin; The Lancet (London); American Journal of Psychiatry; Japan Medical World; American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology; Indian Medical Gazette; American Journal of Nursing; Irish Journal of Medical Science; Cleveland Press; Canadian Practitioner; San Francisco News; Medical Journal of Australia; Cincinnati Enquirer; Scottish Health; Providence Journal; Parents Magazine; Medical Times; British Medical Journal; Journal of Neurology and Psychopathology; King's College Magazine; Public Health (London); Eugenics Review (London); Middlesex Hospital Journal; London Hospital Gazette, etc., etc.

Price $2.00
(Postage 15c extra)

EMERSON BOOKS, Inc.

333 Sixth Ave.
New York
N. Y.

SEND NO MONEY

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 478-N,
333 Sixth Ave., New York
N. Y.

Send me in plain wrapper SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE for FREE EXAMINATION. I will deposit $2.00 plus 15 cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied I may return book within 5 days for refund of purchase price.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $2.00, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee.)

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE

MOROSCO THEATRE, 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Wednesday & Saturday at 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:45

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St., W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:45
300 Seats at $1.10

CONFERENCES

Nation Readers are invited to the Summer Conference of the LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY

FOREST HOUSE, At Interlaken, LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y.

Friday, June 19 to Sunday, June 21, 1936.

Subject: "WAR AGAINST WAR"

Speakers and Discussion Leaders include: Norman Thomas, Devere Allen, Upton Close, John T. Flynn, Lewis Corey, Jessie W. Hughan, Harry W. Laidler, Ludwig Lore, Scott Nearing, Joseph Schlossberg, Rose M. Stein, Robert Woolbert, Murray Baron, David P. Berenberg, Mary Fox, Evelyn Hughan, Joseph P. Lash, Siegfried Lipschitz, Benjamin C. Marsh and others.

Rates: $7.00 from Friday to Sunday; Single day, $3.75.
Conference Fee, $2.00 for members; $3.00 for non-members.

Make your Applications at once to

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY

112 East 19th Street, New York City

Supreme Court Decisions

will be discussed at

THE TAMIMENT LABOR CONFERENCE
JUNE 25 TO JUNE 28

List of Speakers headed by President William Green

Special rate: $3.00 per day

CAMP TAMIMENT 7 East 15th Street AL. 4-3094

For regular summer rates write Camp Tamiment, Tamiment, Pa.

RESORT

CAMP MILFORD
KENT, CONN.
"MICKEY" MICHAELS DIR.

GALA OPENING JUNE 19
A modern adult camp in the heart of the Connecticut Hills; on beautiful lake. Every outdoor activity. Splendid Entertainment. Delicious meals. Congenial fellow guests.

June rate $25.00, daily $4.
Complete social and athletic activities.
JULY AND AUGUST WEEKLY RATES.
$27.50 per week $5.00 daily
Reduced R.R. fare $1.65 one way.
Write for illustrated booklet.

11 WEST 42nd STREET
Pennsylvania 6-7842

of the "Idyll"; and the extraordinary range of dynamics, which you may even see by noting the bands on the surface of the third-act-prelude disc. You may also note such little features as Toscanini's humming in the first-act prelude, a slight hitch in one of the many turns of the Brunhild theme passage on the first record of the "Götterdämmerung" selection, and the awkward spots at which most of the records must be turned. These shortcomings are unimportant, for the set is superb. The next to be released, according to rumor, is Beethoven's Seventh. Hosanna!

Columbia's leading contribution for the month is an album of twenty-four Franz Lieder sung by Ernst Wolff to his own accompaniments (five records, $6.50). One seldom has a chance to hear so much Franz together, and he stands up under the test with extraordinary consistency. The songs are slight and brief and the lyrics frequently sentimental tosh; yet each Lied is a piece of perfection—and Franz wrote ten times as many. The recital has the obvious advantage of an artist accompanying himself; for Herr Wolff is an artist and not a mere baritone. Yet one wonders whether the difficulty of attending to both ends of the performance may not account for an uneven quality in some of the top tones. One may also not entirely like the slight overemphasis in some of the simplest songs—for example, in the "Kennst du die eignen Lieder nicht?" lines from "Widmung." But it is a beautiful voice, beautiful accompanying, and beautiful music. You cannot want much more.

Another type of one-man show is that given by Samuel Barber, who sings his own setting of Matthew Arnold's "Dover Beach" to the accompaniment of the Curtis String Quartet (Victor, one record, $2). Here is intelligent music intelligently sung—and with a naturally beautiful voice. Mr. Barber has made literal musical expression of such lines as

Begin and cease, and then begin again
With tremulous cadence slow and there is a rich and idiomatic quality in the string-quartet accompaniment. His diction is clear and careful—though he does sing "moon-beach'd land" for "moon-bleach'd sand."

The International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, 3 West Sixteenth Street, New York, has issued two records chiefly for use with amplifiers at labor meetings. With the exception of the "Internationale" the lyrics and the tunes are nothing to boast of, but the discs must serve their purpose admirably, the singing being straightforward and vigorous, and the recording excellent.

For hot-weather consumption, Victor has issued the fourth Dvorak symphony played by the Czech Symphony Orchestra under Vaclav Talich (five records, $7.50) and the Mendelssohn E flat quartet played by the Budapest String Quartet (three records, $6.50). The Dvorak is seldom played in America, and one can understand why. It is pleasant music enough, but it dates badly—more than the "New World" symphony. The Czechs give it a loving performance. They are blessed with a more than ordinarily component wood-wind section, and they come through in particularly fine style in the most attractive of the movements, the last. The quartet, composed by Mendelssohn at the age of twenty, shows strongly the influence of the Beethoven of the second period, excepting in the frequently heard Canzonetta movement. It is played as the Budapest Quartet always plays—with brilliance and complete absence of affectation. The virtuosity of the players comes out in the trio of the Canzonetta, which is taken at a terrifying speed, and in the precision of the swift last movement. But the best of the movements is the first, which bears many repetitions, especially as played here.

HENRY SIMON

Letters to the Editors

BROWDER TO HACKER

Dear Sirs: Having been out of my office for a few weeks, I have just read in your issue of April 22 Louis Hacker's review of my recent book. May I be permitted a few remarks regarding it?

It seems to me that under cover of a book review you have given us a very stale rehash of sectarian attacks against the Communist Party. If The Nation were an organ of Trotskyism, there could be no objection to this; but when it is smuggled in under the banner of "liberalism" or even of "radicalism," then it smells badly of false pretenses. The same thing happened with my previous book in your columns. I need not assure you, I hope, that I do not expect an uncritical dealing with Communist Party literature; certainly the handling of both these books by the New Republic, for example, was far from uncritical—in both cases the reviews were by my political opponents—but it was unexceptionable from the point of view of good faith, being without trickery. The readers of The Nation have a right to be guided in their reading on communism otherwise than by the distorted lenses of a discredited sect.

Both your reviews made great play of proving confusion and inconsistency in the estimate of fascism; in both instances dishonestly. For example, Mr. Hacker says: "Last year the New Deal was fascist; a half-year ago the Longs and the Coughlins were the fascists; today the fascists are the Republican Party and the American Liberty League." The impression is created that I have expressed three mutually contradictory positions. But clearly explained in the book was my opinion that in 1933-34, when all the Liberty League forces, Hearst, and a large number of the Republicans were in concentration around Roosevelt, the Administration plainly exhibited the signs of a drive in the direction of fascism; that in 1935, with the rise of the Liberty League opposition with Hearst, with the passing over of Hugh Johnson and his type into opposition, and with the Republicans coming out with their slogan to "gang up" with the American Bankers' Association, the Manufacturers' Association, etc., the whole political picture of America changed. The new reactionary combination attracted to itself most of the fascist-tending forces of the country.

During all this time our view was uniformly expressed that Long and Coughlin must be classed among the fascist forces. One can agree or disagree with this analysis. But only a dishonest person can present it, as Mr. Hacker did, as nothing but confusion.

Perhaps Mr. Hacker should not be taken so seriously on political questions, which seem to take him out of his depth. But since he has something of a reputation as a "Marxist" historian, a field in which I cannot claim special qualifications, it might be expected that his critical remarks on the historical questions would be at least plausible and intelligent. Unfortunately, his history is on the same level as his current politics.

Mr. Hacker implies that I said the revolution of 1776 was to wipe out feudalism in America. That is nonsense. I used a brief formulation to indicate that 1776 marked the beginnings of American capitalism, which was forced to throw off "the fetters of a dying feudal system," clearly indicating thereby the fetters of British rule, which for the colonies was not "mercantilism" but feudal remnants which bound them to British mercantilism. British liberals themselves understood 1776 as "only the counterpart of the heroic struggle led by Russell, Cobden, Bright, and Gladstone at home to establish the dominion of the English mill-owners over Crown, clergy, and landed aristocracy"; that is, to use my formulation, to "free a rising capitalism from the fetters of a dying feudal system" (See Beard, "Rise of American Civilization," p. 190).

Mr. Hacker questions my authority for the statement that the men who wrote the Declaration of Independence were nurtured upon the most progressive thought of England and France. This he considers an error. Perhaps he will accept better authorities than either myself or Mr. Hacker. V. L. Parrington says: "Jefferson was equally at home with the English liberals of the seventeenth century and the French liberals of the eighteenth" ("The Colonial Mind," p. 343). "In the major doctrines of his political philosophy Jefferson was an amalgam of English and French liberalisms, supplemented by the conscious influence of the American frontier" (p. 344). Both Thomas Paine and Jefferson were "profoundly in sympathy with French revolutionary ideals"

(p. 327). "Locke became the textbook of the American revolution" (p. 189). Why does not Mr. Hacker attack these ideas, if he disagrees with them, in their elaborate expression in the books of established historians, instead of choosing my own humble comments, which but faithfully paraphrase, in our own structure of argument, these particular established facts?

Mr. Hacker claims to be a Marxist and charges that I have "left behind" my Marxism. He then proceeds to prove this by rebuking my claim that we Communists are the inheritors of the revolutionary tradition of 1776. This, he says, is terribly un-Marxian. "True," he says, "the workers of today and tomorrow must learn from example. But their heroes and their slogans are their own and not those of another class." By this Mr. Hacker only proves that if he ever read Marx's work "he has read it hastily." Quite contrary to Mr. Hacker, for whom the bourgeois revolution has no lessons for the proletariat and no relation to the proletarian revolution, the very essence of Marx's teachings is the continuity of history. This was the essential thought of the "Communist Manifesto" of 1847. Read, for example, in its concluding paragraphs, that classic formula: "The bourgeois revolution in Germany will be but the prelude to an immediately following proletarian revolution." Remember, in this connection, how the incomplete and compromised character of the German bourgeois revolution delayed and distorted the proletarian revolutionary movement. Study Lenin and the close interconnection between the bourgeois and proletarian revolutions in Russia. Remember how Lenin not only studied but honored the great bourgeois revolutionists of his country. Recall his famous slogan: The Bolsheviks are the modern Jacobins! No, Mr. Hacker may be anything else, but he is no Marxist.

But quite aside from Marxism, what shall we think of a "historian" who states that in our Civil War of 1861-65, "a suppressed class seized power." That is great news indeed, if true, and as finally discovered by Mr. Hacker some seventy years after the event, deserves a more prominent place in the columns of The Nation than an obscure review of my book.

New York, May 6 EARL BROWDER

HACKER TO BROWDER

Dears Sirs: It is difficult to believe that Mr. Browder is seriously trying to conduct a debate. He has committed a number of egregious blunders but instead of retreating gracefully he thinks that by bluster he can still hold his position. For example: Mr. Browder is not really quoting Charles Beard, for in the cited passage Beard was simply recording the fact that nineteenth-century English liberals were thinking this and that about the first American Revolution. That wasn't Beard's opinion. I am a little amused that Mr. Browder, who talks so loftily of honesty, is trying to convey the impression that it was. As for Parrington, I am sorry to record that he was partially wrong; and that where Parrington was right, Mr. Browder misunderstood him. Jefferson himself, in speaking later of the writing of the Declaration of Independence, recorded his debt to Aristotle, Cicero, Locke, and Sidney. This has nothing to do with the French Encyclopedists or the "British classical political economists" (Mr. Browder's original words). Also, I confess my complete inability to understand Mr. Browder's final paragraph. Mr. Browder seems to be sarcastic about something: I assume he is trying to indicate I have made a great discovery about the Civil War. He should be told that my characterization of the Civil War as another revolution is now a commonplace and perhaps is already incorporated in public-school textbooks. At any rate, if Mr. Browder had read the second volume of Mr. Beard's history he would have found there the classic formulation of the theory.

I have nothing to say about Mr. Browder's discussion of fascism, except to record again my surprise. The upshot of Mr. Browder's analysis seems to be that everybody he doesn't like, at any particular moment, is a fascist. The inevitable result must occur even to the most simple-minded: that when fascism really threatens, Mr. Browder's warning will have about as much authority as that of the little boy who cried "Wolf" once too often. And as for his willingness to consort with the Divines, Olsons, and Townsends, that is his business, but it has as much relation to the building of a revolutionary party as attending a Sunday School picnic has. If Mr. Browder wants to go ahead telling the workers and submerged farmers all about Jefferson, Lincoln, Milo Reno—and Daniel Webster!—that is also his business; but I must confess I am somewhat shocked at his willingness to drag in Lenin's reference to the Jacobins as a cover for his blunderings. The Jacobins were a lower-middle-class party which separated from its allies in a revolutionary period and set up a class dictatorship. Where does Mr. Browder find their counterpart in American history?

The substance of Mr. Browder's letter is not as important to me as his method of conducting a controversy. Here are to be found the typical untruthful, bullying, and snide remarks that have turned so many people against the present Communist leadership. Mr. Browder calls me a Trotskyist, which, without prejudice, I may say is simply not so. He says quite coolly that I am dishonest; in view of the fact, however, that we are unknown to each other I am moved to wonder on what basis he is in a position to question my motives so readily. I want to call attention, also, to Mr. Browder's childish trick of putting words between quotation marks, particularly "Marxism" and "historian." About my Marxism, my review must speak for itself, but I must insist that I am a historian and not a "historian." If Mr. Browder thinks I am a bad one, that is his opinion; but surely, in view of the fact that I have published rather extensively, he will allow me the formal designation.

Finally, I am interested to note that Mr. Browder says nothing about his war position in his replies to me and to Norman Thomas in the New Republic. I am sure that there are some curious persons who would like to read Mr. Browder's categorical reply to the following question, particularly in view of the fact that Mr. Browder fills the two positions of vice-president of the American League Against War and Fascism and secretary of the Communist Party, U. S. A. Will he support an American declaration of war against Japan, which obviously could be made only to further our own imperialist designs in the Far East, if Japan, at the same time, is also engaged against the U. S. S. R.?

LOUIS M. HACKER

New York, May 17

BROWDER TO HACKER

Dear Sirs: Answering Mr. Hacker's question, I am glad to inform him that the New Republic has agreed to publish a full article by me on the question of war, and I shall be pleased to give The Nation another one on the same subject. Briefly, the answer is that opinions like Hacker's on war help disarm the world in the struggle against it; we believe that the United States should have an active peace policy, supporting the efforts of the League of Nations and making a pact with the Soviet Union to keep the peace of the Far East.

New York, May 25 EARL BROWDER

CONTRIBUTORS

BENJAMIN STOLBERG, well-known author and journalist, whose provocative articles on Governor Talmadge appeared recently in The Nation, will shortly contribute a study of John L. Lewis.

MAURY MAVERICK of Texas has emerged from his first term in Congress as one of the leading liberal Congressmen. His chief enthusiasms are peace, civil liberties, national resources, and the South; and his speeches may yet make the Congressional Record a best-seller.

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's Moscow correspondent and author of "The Soviets in World Affairs," has lived for thirteen years in the Soviet Union. Among the Russians themselves he is perhaps the best-known of all the foreign correspondents.

STUART CHASE spent several weeks in the Tennessee Valley, in the course of which he obtained material for his TVA series in The Nation. His concluding article will appear next week.

JAMES T. FARRELL, author of the "Studs Lonigan" trilogy, has for his next assignment the Louis-Schmeling fight, which he will report for The Nation.

VIRGINIA NIRDLINGER has been art critic and book reviewer for International Studio and Fine Arts.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR is associate professor of the philosophy of religion at the Union Theological Seminary and author of "Reflections on the End of an Era."

HOWARD COOK, well known for his lithographs, etchings, and woodcuts, has twice held a Guggenheim fellowship. On the first he went to Mexico to study mural painting. He is now at work on a fresco for the Pittsburgh federal courthouse.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 60 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · JUNE 24, 1936

NUMBER 3703

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

789

EDITORIALS:

ALL DRESSED UP . . .	791
HOMEKEEPING HEARTS	793
NO PEONAGE	794
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	795
CARTOON: THE ELEPHANT GOES WEST by Edmund Duffy	796
THE ELEPHANT PACKS HIS TRUNK by Oswald Garrison Villard	797
MR. HEARST'S CONVENTION by Heywood Broun	800
THE CASE OF JOHN A. KINGSBURY by James Rorty	801
TVA: THE NEW DEAL'S BEST ASSET by Stuart Chase	804
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
FIVE YOUNGER POETS	807
NOVELIST BITES CRITIC by Edmund Wilson	808
SOLILOQUY IN THE DARK by William Troy	810
THE MACHINERY OF WORLD PEACE by Vera Micheles Dean	811
FABLE IN NAPLES by Louis Kronenberger	812
"O TIME IN YOUR FLIGHT" by Broadus Mitchell	813
ART AS DISCIPLINE by Ben Belitt	814
THE MORAL TOP OF THE WORLD by Margaret Marshall	816
THE INSTINCTS OF A BARD by R. P. Blackmur	817
SOCIAL-SECURITY TACTICS by Eveline Burns	819
MUCH ABOUT A LITTLE MAN by Mark Van Doren	820
FILMS: UNSETTLED ACCOUNTS by Robert Giroux	821

The Shape of Things

*

MR. ROOSEVELT, DURING HIS TOUR OF THE Southwest, gathered to himself some of the limelight that might otherwise have been shed on Cleveland. In a series of speeches from which, though they were ostensibly historical, his hearers could clearly draw allusions to contemporary problems, he took up the questions of monopolies, labor, conservation, social security, going the Republican platform one better on each of these. Ably skirting the pitfall of the too specific, he concentrated on the past. He managed, however, when talking in Arkansas about the Louisiana Purchase, to allude to the fact that it was made "without the unanimous approval of every member of the legal profession" and that no one took the case to the Supreme Court. And while complimenting Texas on its pioneering legislation for trust-busting, he brought in references to the present-day monopolies and vested interests. Nor was he afraid to tackle the question of the hour—the right of Congress to legislate for the national welfare. Despite the President's curious circumlocutory technique, reminiscent of the eighteenth-century poets who would not call a fish a fish but a "finny denizen of the deep," we venture the interpretation that he is against a constitutional amendment but is willing to take his stand on the necessity and validity of federal regulation on problems of national concern. "Unless the action of states is substantially uniform and simultaneous," he said, "the effectiveness of reform is nullified." Since such action can hardly be expected, we deduce that the President believes federal regulation to be necessary. But whether this is to be accomplished by the appointment of new judges or by more drastic measures is left unclear. Here is a plank for the Democrats to hew away at.

*

THE SEASON OF HARD-WON DEGREES AND free advice is once more upon us. Commencement orators are lucky; no matter how much platitudinous nonsense they talk, their audiences cannot walk out on them. This year the Commencement Day addresses and baccalaureate sermons used this rare advantage to the limit. There was the usual talk about the ideal of service, the need of religion, the menace of radical teachings, and so on. There was also, we are gratified to note, recognition here and there—as in Dr. Angell's baccalaureate address at Yale—of the menace of economic and political reaction. At New York University, Dr. Fred I. Kent called "that great political slogan, 'social security,' " destructive to employment,

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Gruening,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

while Secretary Perkins told the graduates of Alfred University that "the greatest opportunity of youth" lay in "the development of a social technique for security." You pays your money and you takes your choice. If we were among this year's graduates, we should plump for social security. It may be true, as Dr. Ernest Martin Hopkins declared at Dartmouth, that the opportunities of our forbears were "few in number and inconsiderable in importance as compared with those which today lie close at hand for all of us"; but our forbears were also few in number as compared with all of us, competition was not so keen, and holding companies did not exist. If we were called upon to advise the current crop of bachelors, we should exhort them to take stock of the world as it is, not as speakers say it is. And we should probably close with a peroration about rolling up their sleeves and setting out to make this land once more a land of opportunity.

*

PREMIER LEON BLUM ENTERS HIS SECOND fortnight of responsibility with many of his most pressing problems behind him. The epidemic of strikes which threatened for a time to embarrass his first days in office has been settled in such a way as to contribute greatly to his prestige. At least a million French workers, suffering from years of hardship as the result of the deflationary policies of previous governments, have obtained increased wages, reduced hours, and vacations on pay. The government bills providing for a compulsory forty-hour week and two-week vacations on pay, restoring pay cuts to government employees, and guaranteeing the right of collective bargaining were pushed through the Chamber with no more than seven dissenting votes. But the government's economic troubles are not ended. In opposing devaluation of the franc M. Blum has taken the position that the rise in working-class buying power through increased wages will stimulate lagging economic activity. Actually there is little chance that this will occur. Increased wages, shortened hours, and vacations on pay cannot but increase the costs of French producers, which are already high in comparison with foreign competitors because France has seen fit to cling to the gold standard in the face of almost universal devaluation. As a result there is danger of economic stagnation unless the government takes immediate steps to devalue the franc. With the gold flow as yet unabated it is probable that at best devaluation can be staved off only a few months. The question is whether M. Blum will act quickly enough to benefit from this inevitable step.

*

THE LANDING OF JAPANESE TROOPS AT AMOY may be the decisive factor in transforming China's threatened civil war into united resistance against Japan. While recent developments have indicated that the two Kwangsi leaders, Li Tsung-jen and Pai Chung-hsi, have been motivated more by personal antagonism against Chiang Kai-shek—because of the diversion of their former opium revenues—than any desire to fight Japan, the anti-Japanese movement appears to be assuming mass proportions. Not since 1927 has China seen anything comparable to the great popular demonstration staged at Canton on June 13. Under the tolerance of the local authorities hundreds of thousands of Cantonese—peasants, industrial workers, students, and coolies—participated in a gigantic anti-Japanese parade, shouting for war against their country's foe. At Peiping five thousand students attempted a similar demonstration, but were dispersed after a sanguinary struggle with the police, although the latter informed the students that they too were "anti-Japanese." Frightened by the possible popular reaction in case of a civil war, General Chen Chi-tang, leader of the Cantonese forces, has withdrawn his troops from Hunan and addressed a further appeal to Chiang Kai-shek to "name the route by which the Cantonese may advance against Japan." While it is evident that Chiang is not yet prepared to run the risk of a conflict with Japan, it is not impossible that he will be driven to war by pressure from below. Nor would China be as helpless in such a struggle as is generally believed. Japan would have every advantage as far as munitions and equipment are concerned, but might find itself as vulnerable in the face of a nation-wide strike as were the British when South China employed the same methods against Hongkong in 1925-26.

*

IN REMINGTON-RAND PRESS RELEASES THE strike of 4,000 workers in the company's plants in six cities has been settled almost daily. Back of this rather misleading publicity is a story of attempted intimidation and steady refusal to confer with strikers or to accept mediation by governmental agencies. The strikers, who walked out a month ago when sixteen workers were discharged following a move for higher wages, are demanding a 20 per cent wage increase, recognition of the union, a $15 bonus, and the reinstatement of striking workers. The company, instead of discussing these demands, has repeatedly threatened to close the plants if the strikers do not return to work, and now it announces that the plants of Middletown (Connecticut), Syracuse (New York), and Norwood (Ohio) will be definitely abandoned. The manager of the Ohio plant is reported as having said that in the announcement concerning it the words "part of" were "unintentionally omitted," and that only one-third of the plant will be moved elsewhere. It looks as if the taxpayers would pay dearly for the company's intransigence, for there is no doubt that hundreds of its discarded workers, with their families, will soon be on the relief rolls. According to the company's latest report, its net profit for the last fiscal year was $3,010,288, an increase of 72 per cent over the previous year's showing.

*

THE WEEK, AN ENGLISH BULLETIN WHOSE reliability is ordinarily beyond question, gives over most of its June 4 issue to a report of the activities of William Bullitt, Ambassador from the United States to the Soviet Union, which should be of serious concern to every American. Mr. Bullitt is charged with having used his influence, unofficially of course, to win certain British leaders to the support of the foreign policy of the present German government. He is said to have urged acceptance of Nazi aims, partly on the ground that they are a "bulwark against Bolshevism," and partly because a conciliatory attitude might postpone a German attack in the West. Mr. Bullitt is also reported to have warned his British friends that a red revolution in France and Spain is not far distant, and to have besought them to prevent the appointment of M. Yvon Delbos as Foreign Minister of France, because he feared that the latter's influence would go toward the strengthening of the Franco-Soviet pact. Despite the usually uncanny accuracy of The Week's "inside" information, we find it extremely difficult to believe that an American ambassador, wittingly or unwittingly, could allow himself thus to be drawn into the European political maelstrom. That "Bill" Bullitt, long regarded as a sincere friend of the Soviet Union, should permit himself to be used by the Soviet's bitterest enemy is even more incredible. But in view of the seriousness of the charge and the reputation of the agency advancing it, we should expect more than a routine denial of the allegation. The situation warrants thorough investigation by the highest authorities of the State Department and drastic action if the charges prove to be substantially correct.

*

THE STAMPEDE OF THE WASHINGTON STATE Democratic Convention to a production-for-use platform stands without parallel in the current political campaign. Three years ago various left-wing groups in Seattle and Tacoma, including labor unions, organizations for the unemployed, and technocratic clubs, were amalgamated into what later became known as the Washington Commonwealth Federation. These groups played an important role in electing Schwollenbach to the Senate in 1934 on an EPIW (End Poverty in Washington) platform. In early May of this year, when the state's precinct and district caucuses were called, leaders of the Commonwealth Federation were discussing the possibility of a third party in the fall election. But meanwhile they had been carrying on an effective campaign among the rank and file of the Democratic Party. Under the leadership of Howard G. Costigan, thirty-two-year-old executive director of the federation, the left-wing groups swept one after another of the county conventions. After a bitter struggle the state convention adopted the federation program almost in toto, though it is considerably to the left of the platform which Upton Sinclair forced on the Democrats of California in 1934. It is somewhat startling to find a Democratic state convention going on record for "public ownership of natural resources, munition plants, and public utilities . . . federal ownership and operation of national banks" and asserting that the need for some plan of production for use "is urgent, pressing, and vital." The Commonwealth Federation is also urging the adoption of initiative measure 119, which would permit the state to organize its unused productive forces in the interest of the entire population. The immediate drive for control of the state may fail in the face of a threatened coalition of the reactionary forces, but production for use appears to have come to stay as the major political issue in the Columbia River basin.

All Dressed Up . . .

THERE can be no doubt that a real coup has taken place in the Republican Party. It does not represent a genuine shift toward liberalism or a new alignment of forces within the ranks. What has happened is that one political gang within the party has turned out the other. Led by Governor Landon and John Hamilton, the Kansas group has effected a palace revolution. The new group is younger and more vigorous than the Old Guard. And is ready to put on a real show. No one will question that. Mr. Roosevelt will need all his own adroitness and all the strategic resources of Jim Farley, Charlie Michaelson, and their cohorts to meet the attack. The Democrats are no longer confronted by an enemy which will make all the stupid blunders that the Republican Old Guard could always be counted on to make. These new Republican boys are a bunch of hard-boiled newspapermen, shrewd tacticians, aggressive go-getters. Their build-up of Mr. Landon before the convention and their masterly tactics in pulling the convention puppet-strings are only a beginning. More will be heard from them. They have a heart-breaking job on their hands, but they have the crusading zeal that is based upon the most powerful of impulses—the determination of an office-hungry group to get the political gravy for themselves. Landon has shrewdness, Knox and Roberts know the newspaper ropes, Hamilton has infinite self-confidence and a brash sort of drive. It is clear that the Republican Party is all dressed up.

No Place to Go. But it is equally clear that it has no place to go. All the talk of progressivism is sheer bunk. The Hearst visit to Topeka and the placing of the official imprimatur upon the Kansas governor represented an amazing flaw in otherwise skilful strategy. The selection as the vice-presidential candidate of a man whose opinions and moral fiber were formed as one of the most ruthless of the Hearst executives is another amazingly unstrategic move and another proof of the Hearst tie-up.

As for leadership, the one impressive fact is that even Herbert Hoover loomed like a giant in the convention of pigmies. Brobdingnag Hoover got up and made a speech in the assemblage of Lilliputian puppets, and the country almost forgot that he was only old Lemuel Gulliver. It is true that much of the ovation he got was synthetic, and the rest of it was due to the fact that the delegates had been so completely shelved that when they finally got a chance to stretch their legs and their voices at the only dramatic moment offered by the convention, they surprised themselves and Mr. Hoover by their enthusiasm. But this only gives an indication of the Republican stature. Landon has maneuvered himself into the nomination by his felicitous gift for vagueness: the logic of his position will compel him to cultivate that gift further. For despite the choice of candidates by acclamation the Republican Party has no inner unity and cohesion. It has been whipped and demoralized by failing to meet the emergency of the crisis when it was in power and to act as an effective opposition when it was out of power. Its new sources of strength do not lie in any genuine accessions of popular feeling. It is a broken party, trying to cover up its disunity by a factitious agreement upon an unknown leader and a discredited platform.

The Platform. It is fundamentally misleading to think of the Republican Party merely as the representatives of entrenched capitalism. Outside the rank and file of the party's supporters—white-collar and manual workers, small shopkeepers, and professional men and women—whose interests are almost completely ignored in the platform, the articulate elements in the party are divided into three main factions. First, there are the true Tories—bankers, academic economists, and conservatives of the old school—who are passionately committed to the doctrines of laissez faire. This group desires above all else a return to the gold standard, stabilization of world currencies, a balanced budget, the removal of all restrictions on trade, and would like to see a complete abandonment of agricultural subsidies. Though influential in proportion to its members, this faction plays no decisive role in the party.

In agreement with the old school on many points but fundamentally opposed to laissez faire stand the representatives of the Eastern industrial oligarchy which has dominated the Republican Party for the last fifty years. While theoretically in favor of a restoration of the gold standard, this clique may be counted on to fight to the last ditch against such changes in American commercial policy as are necessary to the reestablishment of an international monetary system. Set apart from both these groups by fundamental economic interests are the agrarian Republicans of the West. Although opposed to the high-tariff demands of the Eastern industrialists, they are against laissez faire where it affects agriculture. In monetary policy they tend to be either pro-silver or inflationist, and they are strongly in favor of production control and subsidies for farm products.

Torn between these conflicting opinions, the Republicans have confined themselves largely to violent denunciation of Democratic policies and offer little that is positive. It is scarcely illuminating, for example, to find that they are in favor of a "sound and stable currency" and are opposed to further devaluation of the dollar. The Democrats, the Socialists, and even the Communists might well have identical planks in their platforms. Governor Landon interprets the plank as providing for an eventual return to gold, but as it stands it could apply equally well to a managed currency, a "commodity dollar," the old gold standard, a silver standard, or bimetallism.

On a few points it is evident that the Republicans have learned a great deal from four years of wandering in the wilderness. Unlike the 1932 platform, which contained no mention of monopolies, the regulation of the security markets, the right of collective bargaining, child labor, or civil-service reform, the present platform contains fragmentary statements on all these points. Similarly, it is encouraging to see the G. O. P. coming out emphatically—in contrast to its silence on the subject in 1932—for old-age and unemployment insurance, though it would leave the burden primarily on the states. Moreover, it is in advance of the Democratic Party in insisting that the revenues for social insurance should be derived from general taxation, although its qualifying phrase, a "direct tax widely distributed," sounds suspiciously like advocacy of a sales tax.

The plank on foreign affairs is perhaps the most disappointing of all and represents a distinct retreat from the 1932 platform. In opposing America's entry into the World Court the party follows Hearst's leadership as against the specific recommendations of three Republican Presidents, while its blanket rejection of the League is utterly incompatible with the pride with which it previously detailed the instances in which Republican Administrations had found it advisable to cooperate with Geneva. No mention is made of the three primary issues of present-day foreign policy—neutrality, collective security, and nationalization of the arms trade.

A few sections of the platform are frankly and undeniably reactionary. Perhaps the most vicious is the proposal to return the responsibility for relief to the states, and to make federal aid conditional upon the assumption of "a fair proportion of the total relief burden" by the states and local governments. For many parts of the country, particularly the South and Middle West, this amounts to throwing the unemployed into the streets to starve. Equally indefensible, though somewhat confused, is the party's stand on the tariff. It comes out unqualifiedly for the repeal of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and advocates "sufficient protection to defend the American farmer and wage-earner," but at the same time pledges itself "to furnish government assistance in disposing of surpluses in foreign trade by bargaining for foreign markets," and to adjust tariffs with a view to promoting international trade. If this means anything at all, and the phraseology has purposely been made confusing, it suggests the Peek plan of rigorous regimentation of trade and the bludgeoning down of the trade defenses of weaker countries by superior economic force. It is scarcely a program for restoring international economic stability. The platform's phrases about balancing the budget through the immediate curtailment of federal expenditures also have an ominous ring. It is unthinkable that any Administration would actually reduce emergency expenditures to this extent, but if carried out such a measure might easily provoke a reaction which would drive the United States back to the dark days of the depression. The elimination of federal relief, the dismissal of thousands of federal employees, the raising of the cost of living through an increase of tariffs, the abandonment of federal unemployment and old-age insurance are a fitting platform for the party responsible for the great crisis, but hardly one upon which to win a Presidential election.

Fishbait for the Farm Vote. Since the main Republican hope lies in an invasion of the farm area, the farm plank is particularly important. In its main features it pirates the policy of the New Deal, but with qualifications designed to insure ineffectiveness. Instead of benefits based on limitation of production, the Republicans promise benefits based on domestically consumed portions of the crop "to make the tariff effective." The allocation of the domestically consumed portions of the crop to the individual farmer, and the division between landlord and tenant would involve difficulties of administration even greater than those encountered by the AAA. The amount of subsidy, if it were really to make the tariff effective, would exceed a billion dollars. A party pledged to balancing the budget, and in fact controlled by the financiers, cannot keep any such promise. It is merely bait for the farm vote, which has in the past taken the Republican hook even without bait.

The Roosevelt policy of retiring marginal land is accepted but with the provision that the acquisition of such land must be with the approval of the legislative and executive branches of the states concerned. This means that for a project like the Tennessee Valley involving several states, the governor or the legislature of any one state, or the interests controlling such a state, could hold up the project. In every case federal action would wait upon state legislation, with all the delays inherent in such a division of authority. The farmer is promised increased protection against the importation of farm products. This is a revival of the old hocus-pocus that protection can help an export industry. The farmer is promised government assistance in securing foreign markets, which cannot be secured without the reciprocal concessions the Republicans are pledged not to make. He is promised cheap farm credit when and if the party finds the money to lend it. He will be subsidized for his cooperation in striking a balance between soil-building and soil-depleting crops if this can be done consistently with a balanced budget—as it cannot be.

All benefits, if there are any, are to be confined to the family-type farm. The Chamber of Commerce farmers, like Tom Campbell, are to be thrown to the wolves. When in danger a capitalistic crowd always makes a generous gesture like this.

The Real Platform. Of course the real Republican platform was never formally adopted or published. The real platform is hatred of Mr. Roosevelt. It came out in Senator Steiwer's incredibly malignant speech and in Mr. Hoover's hysterical oratory. There is little chance of the Republicans winning, but if they should ever win we should have the spectacle of a gang held together by greed and hate, with not the slightest evidence that they have enough social intelligence to guide this greed and hate to anything like even the rational order of their own interests. What they would do would be to carry the country a long way farther toward the kind of social disaster which Mr. Hoover so successfully inaugurated. The striking thing about both the Republican convention and the Republican platform is their amazing moral bankruptcy. Not one breath of idealism has been allowed to filter through the entire striving for power. There is no indication that the group in control cares anything about the things that move the common man today in America—the desire for increased bargaining power in the hands of the workers, the intense desire of every plain American for neutrality and peace, the growing recognition that we form a national economic pattern and that we cannot go back to the extreme states' rights that characterized the Articles of Confederation. Even the group of hard-boiled go-getters who form the clique which now controls the party will not be able to swing a campaign on such a dearth of social and moral intelligence.

Homekeeping Hearts

THERE is a hoary superstition, kept alive by a whole army of sentimentalists, that housekeeping makes the whole world of women kin. This supposed kinship was stressed pretty heavily in the plentiful publicity which the press gave the Congress of Associated Country Women of the World, lately assembled in our national capital. The reporters made much copy of "titled women who supervise their own farms" sitting "elbow to elbow" with those who actually till the soil, "absorbed in each other's experiences and problems." It was as if Owen D. Young had been caught rubbing elbows with a Third Avenue vendor of radio sets, both absorbed in their common interest.

The A.C.W.W.'s official pamphlets reveal that its honorary president is Ishbel, Marchioness of Aberdeen and Temair, president of the International Council of Women; that its president is Mrs. Alfred Watt, holder of the Order of the British Empire for war services; and that other officials are Lady Tiphaine Lucas of France, Lady Eleanor Cole of East Africa, and Baroness Schröder and Countess Keyserling of Germany. These horny-handed tillers of the soil are officers of an organization which, if the assembled delegates in Washington were representative, is made up pretty exclusively of middle-class and upper-class countrywomen. The foreign delegates, except for the Germans and Latvians, whose expenses were paid by their governments, were obliged to foot their own bills; and perhaps this partly accounts for the conspicuous absence of working countrywomen from their numbers. Herr Hitler, who could have sent some women workers, was evidently more concerned with furnishing able Nazi propagandists to an international movement so closely akin to his own fantastic Kirche-Küche-Kinder policy that it would be greatly to his advantage to capture its control. His delegates were Frau Reith, appointed leader of peasant women in South Germany, and Frau Küssner-Gerhardt, adviser to the Minister of Agriculture. Baroness Schröder participated as an unofficial German delegate. The American delegates, we have it from a reliable and attentive observer, were mostly wives of the landed gentry.

And what were the problems that occupied the conference? The labor problem was one. Among the American delegates there was considerable complaining about demands for higher wages from their "hired help" or "niggers." Frau Reith's description of the "most successful" Nazi method of assuring cheap domestic labor aroused much enthusiasm—this method consists, it will be remembered, in placing girls as apprentices in private families, where they work fifteen hours a day for wages ranging from nothing to $10 a month. Baroness Schröder's description of the government labor camps where girls are trained for domestic and agricultural service also aroused much interest. A South Carolina delegate commented, "We just can't get girls to work as apprentices for low wages, and niggers are expensive too." And another delegate remarked, "I wish we had some scheme like the German where girls got into their own line of business." The sisterhood of homekeeping hearts melted away before the desire for an inexhaustible supply of cheap labor.

They were interested in peace, but merely as an ideal, said Mrs. E. M. Orr, English delegate—"something we feel we will achieve by desiring it." Mrs. Orr felt that Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt "overstepped in talking about peace so strongly." According to Miss Grace Frysinger of the United States Department of Agriculture, it is the purpose of the association "to concentrate on the fundamental things women can do." And the conference left a strong impression that in the association's opinion the most fundamental thing women can do is to withdraw from industry and the professions and converge on the home. "We in England feel," said Mrs. Orr, "that men should have the jobs so many young women now have." Frau Reith assured the delegates that "all the girls in Germany are happier in their homes." She discreetly refrained from mentioning the announced increase of 28 per cent in the German divorce rate in 1934.

Here is a fine reactionary way of concealing the true extent of unemployment. If women can be removed from industry and the professions, the employment of men will mount and the indices of unemployment will fall, as women are classed as unemployable. And with only domestic employment open to women, those fortunate enough to have homes and incomes will be assured of finding plenty of cheap "hired help" among those who have neither. There is no Russian representation in the A.C.W.W. It would never do to advertise that a socialized state offers a wide range of opportunity to women workers. To a declining capitalism women in gainful employment now mean an embarrassing official percentage of unemployment and a corresponding large expenditure for relief. But so-called democratic governments could hardly attempt to force women back into the narrow sphere of exclusive domesticity. Better depend upon persuasion by interested women. "If you must have an issue," said the late Calvin Coolidge to the late Dwight Morrow, "talk about the home. Everyone's for it."

No Peonage

NO LAW of our country makes the share-cropper a slave. But, as we have learned in the past year, law, when it meets hard domestic fact, can turn its face the other way. As the strike of the Arkansas share-croppers continues with desperate steadfastness day after day and slowly gains more notice in the press, we are becoming aware that in a section of our country slave labor still prevails. To get any work at all, the share-croppers have been forced to accept yellow-dog contracts at wages of 75 cents for a ten-hour day, and even this they owe in advance for rent, food, and clothing; so that many of them never handle a coin from one end of the year to the other.

Starved into the last ditch, the cotton workers could retreat no farther. They began to climb out. They organized. Negroes and whites together forgot the urge to hate in the urge to live and joined to form the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union. The planters tried to shatter it by instituting a system of terror by eviction. In answer the union called the present strike, in which six thousand workers are demanding a wage increase to $1.50 a day.

Planters, police, sheriffs, and judges are concentrating their efforts on breaking the strike. State rangers are driving the workers back to the cotton fields at the point of a gun. The National Guard has dragged machine-guns into the village streets, and although there has been no shooting, has forced picket lines to disband by intimidation. Harassed by threats to "leave or be lynched," many of the workers have crossed the state line to seek refuge in Tennessee. But the terror they fled from was there to meet them. In Memphis last week a judge sentenced five cotton choppers from Arkansas, arrested in a police raid, to a fine of $50 each in order "to set an example of the men and prevent agitation." At the same time a picket line of refugees was charged by the police and one of the pickets killed. Meanwhile in Arkansas the cooperation of law and private property has forged a savagely effective weapon against the strikers. The law brings about the arrest of the strikers on charges of vagrancy, sentences them to fines instead of imprisonment, and then makes them work out the fines by picking cotton on the private plantations. In one town a man named Beachers ordered the arrests in his official capacity as chief of police, and then in his private capacity as plantation owner contracted with himself to put the prisoners to work in his own fields. In this situation the special assistant district attorney sent down by the Department of Justice to investigate violations of the federal peonage, or "forced-labor," law was helpless. For while the state of Arkansas has abolished private contracting for prison labor, several counties allow it. Thus, when Governor Futrell of Arkansas promised Whitaker, the Department of Justice man, to remedy whatever illegal conditions the investigation should disclose, he knew he was quite safe since Whitaker would have to report, as he did, a finding of "no peonage."

What makes the situation so grim a deadlock is the fact that the planters are in their way as desperate as the laborers. It is true that in cotton the margin of profits is so thin that higher wages might narrow it down to nothing. Cotton is the sick man of the South. It may have been king once, but like all kings who feel their power slipping it has become a tyrant, and this accounts for the brutality which has marked the planters' efforts to break the strike. Even in the unlikely event that the share-croppers should win their extra 75 cents a day, that would be but a temporary solution. The roots of the problem go deeper than the question of wages and hours; they reach down to the fundamental cause—the bankruptcy of Southern agriculture. Unless a program of diversification of crops and the breaking up of large-scale, single-crop holdings into individual farms is adopted—and the federal government allowed to put it into practice—no stop-gap remedy will save the share-croppers.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Hopson's Choice

Washington, June 14

HAVE you been buoyed up of late by an impression that the Black committee's exposures have broken the power trust's grip on Congress? Then prepare for a sinking spell. Evidence just come to light here shows that the power lobby still operates in Congressional antechambers. In fact, its latest sortie, led by the Hopson gang, surpasses in desperateness any that has preceded, for it is one whose purposes cannot be masked. Neither can the fact that two Administration Senators—Van Nuys of Indiana and O'Mahoney of Wyoming—cleared the way for the buccaneers.

The story begins back in 1935 when the late Representative Perkins, a New Jersey Republican, introduced an amendment to Section 77-b of the Bankruptcy Act. Under Section 77-b as it stood any three creditors of a company, provided they had claims amounting to at least $1,000, could go into federal court and file a petition for that company's reorganization. Under the Perkins amendment it would be necessary for those petitioners to hold at least 5 per cent of the outstanding debt claims against the company. Aimed ostensibly at prevention of "strike suits"—that is, at protecting big shysters from the forays of little shysters—the amendment looked innocent enough, and it was passed by the House. Sent to the Senate, it was referred to the Judiciary Committee and thence to a subcommittee composed of Van Nuys, O'Mahoney, and Hastings of Delaware.

When Van Nuys, O'Mahoney, and the inconsequential Hastings had finished with the bill, it had undergone further amendment. They not only took the Perkins proposal to their breasts but made it retroactive and applicable to all suits pending under Section 77-b. Then they slipped the bill through the full committee and on to the Senate floor, where it was adopted without debate and passed back to the House for concurrence in the Senate amendments. It was all done so quietly that the bill was on the verge of routine enactment into law before a few gentlemen of good faith awoke to the situation and threw a wrench into the machinery. Incidentally, the best hurler was a gentleman in the Senate who is damned week in and week out by liberals and radicals as a black-blooded reactionary and champion of the vested interests. An appeal to his sense of fair play was all that was needed to get him to jam the legislative machinery at once and bring about the bill's hasty recall to the Senate, which promptly sent the measure back to the Judiciary Committee.

In the hearings that followed, the true significance of the amendments and the identity of the forces behind them were spread upon the public records by William O.

Douglas of the SEC, C. M. Hester, the Treasury's assistant general counsel, Frank J. Wideman, until recently an assistant attorney general in charge of tax cases, and last but not least one Tom McKeown, a former Congressman from Oklahoma. Their combined testimony offered unmistakable evidence that the amendments were the work of the Associated Gas and Electric Company's lobby and were directed solely at keeping the Hopson empire from being brought down in a heap by a reorganization proceeding instituted under Section 77-b at New York two years ago by holders of $750,000 worth of A. G. and E. securities. McKeown, in fact, owned up to having been the author of the amendments, and he is a self-confessed lobbyist for the company. McKeown—who drew Van Nuys and O'Mahoney into his own coterie by saying to them, "We had difficulty as you may remember in trying to write out the proper thing"—also owned up to having had knowledge that his amendments would wipe out the case against the company in New York, but he asked the Senate to believe that he was acting at the time merely as a public-spirited individual. He said he was employed by Associated before and after he wrote the amendments but not while he was selling them to the committee. There are indications, some of which are matters of record, that in his selling feat he had the help of such respected gentlemen as Bruce Kremer, Basil O'Connor, Pat Hurley, Jim Watson, Nathan Miller, and Joseph Proskauer.

Had McKeown's trick succeeded, it would have done more than merely wipe out the New York suit which the Hopson gang has kept in suspension to date by a series of legal stalemates that have cost the petitioners thousands and the company more than a million dollars. According to Hester, it would seriously have impeded the government's $50,000,000 tax judgment against the Associated, which is scheduled for adjudication along with the 77-b case. The potential general effect of the McKeown amendments was illustrated by Douglas of the SEC. "What the result will be is clear," he said. "It will mean that all the vices of the old friendly or consent receivership will reappear with little check on them. The insiders can proceed at their own leisure to set the stage for a reorganization of their own liking and to move quickly and with dispatch toward a consummation of the plan which will give them the greatest degree of protection."

Will the committee heed his warning? At last report it was busily engaged in changing the wording but not the effect of the McKeown amendments and in adding a new one which would enable Associated to slide out from under the New York case, if greased ways proposed by McKeown failed. However, there is little likelihood that these proposals will get by the Senate. Senator Norris is now lying in wait for them.

THE ELEPHANT GOES WEST

The Elephant Packs His Trunk

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Cleveland, June 12

THAT is what has happened here—and nothing else. The Republican elephant has been taken over by the Kansas crowd, not without the usual compromising and shifting, of course. But because they were the only ones who had a possible candidate to offer from the right geographical section and had successfully concealed his real opinions from everybody, and because their candidate has been too inconspicuous to make any enemies, the men who put Landon over have annexed the elephant. He has packed his trunk and his other belongings in the hope that he now has a chance of saving them from a bankruptcy sale, and after four lean years is heading for the drought- and dust-stricken area of the Middle West. Will his trek across the prairies lead him to Green Pastures fresh? Will he ever come back? Will his new masters exploit him to the full, or will they be compelled to make terms with his late owners, the Old Guard, to get the wherewithal to carry on their political show business?

These are the questions the party now faces after the usual asinine performance which in America is termed a "national party convention." No one can answer them because no man knows whether the new owners realize how great an opportunity is theirs, or what use they propose to make of their sudden power. No one can guess as yet whether the Governor of Kansas will lead or be led; whether or not John Hamilton, Henry J. Allen, Bill White, and Roy Roberts will seek to give a 1912 Bull Moose slant to the campaign without regard to the feelings of Wall Street and the wealthy backers of the party who control its purse. It is an unparalleled situation in many ways. Not since the days of Grant has the party nominated a man by acclamation. This time it is not a national hero to whom this honor has gone but a mystery man with whom not only the country but the present leaders of his own party will have to become acquainted as the campaign develops. It is to be the Unknown Battler, wearing a mask until now, against the Known Champion of the ring. One of the few remaining Old Guard leaders admitted yesterday that he had never met Landon and had not the faintest idea what his real views were, or whether the Governor might not surprise him and his pals by turning out sufficiently progressive to send cold chills down the backs of the business men who are most opposed to the New Deal. They did not like that telegram from Topeka at all.

Snell as Permanent Chairman

There are, of course, those who think that the tactics of the Old Guard in making little effort to fight the Kansans are very shrewd, that these men feel in their hearts that Roosevelt will win, and that therefore it will be just as well to let the other fellows bear the stigma of defeat. In that case they would expect to be the heirs of the Kansans and bring the elephant back to his old Wall Street quarters, give him plenty of hay, and train him for another race in 1940 with a mahout of their choosing on his back. When it comes to getting the campaign funds, they are probably arguing, the new managers will have to come to them and that will be the time to make terms. Perhaps so. Perhaps they are reckoning without their Hamilton. For that young man is an aggressive go-getter, and Mr. Landon has been a gambler in the oil business who has dared and won. And what is to keep this Kansan from making an acceptance speech that will go half or more of the distance of the New Deal? They cannot feel wholly encouraged by the result of the platform fight. They carefully packed the subcommittee on resolutions with some of their choicest spirits—Dave Reed, Hiram Bingham, George Moses, and Walter Edge, ex-Senators all. The member from New York, Representative Taber, had obviously not had a new idea in forty years. The chairman, Congressman Herman Langworthy, although a Landon man, ranks as anything but a progressive, and so does J. Reuben Clark of Utah, who played a big role in the day-and-night sessions of the subcommittee. Still the Old Guard did not get what it wanted. In many of its planks the platform accepts the philosophy and teachings of the New Deal. The Landon forces kept in touch with the Governor, and when they lost points it was because of political ineptness or their yielding to Borah. But in the main they got pretty much what Governor Landon wanted. It is a safe bet that the Old Guard will not write the speeches for Landon, and if ever I saw a disgruntled group of men it was Fletcher, Hilles, Wadsworth, and Bingham in a group by themselves at the Hotel Cleveland early this morning.

But what will happen with Landon? Is he in a position to cut loose from Hearst? Is it his idea to make over the party, give it a national headquarters in Chicago, call young men to the key positions, and generally build up a liberal, grass-roots party, free from all taint of Wall Street? If he and his Kansas associates have this in mind, we may be witnessing the beginning of a real political revolution.

But here again no man knows. The California-Hearst episode and Landon's reception in Topeka of Hearst himself have put the Governor under a suspicion that he must live down promptly, especially as his running mate, Colonel Knox, was for years the willing tool of Hearst, whom he served as general manager of his newspaper properties—which by itself ought to disqualify him.

It is a fact that many of the delegates who voted for Landon have marked doubts as to his fitness for the Presidency. Let no one be deceived by the press reports of a united and happy Republican front as a result of the convention. There was acceptance of the accomplished fact, and resignation, and belief that the best of an exceedingly poor string of candidates had been picked. But real enthusiasm there was not, outside of the Kansas crowd. No intelligent and honest person would assert that he had witnessed any great occasion or that a real crusade to save the Republic is under way. Governor Landon may rise to his opportunity and prove himself something else, but the belief is that he has so far been only a pleasant politician of the ordinary type. It is known that two of the other candidates are anything but enthusiastic over Landon. Can he now convince the people that he is of the caliber for the greatest American job in the worst crisis in our history?

As for the convention, all the childish features of these occasions have been in evidence—the blaring bands, shriller and louder than ever, the driveling campaign songs, the Negro singers, the shrieking soloists, the presentation of the oldest living Presidential widow, incredibly bad speeches, fortunately far fewer than usual, and cattle-like herding of the delegates, who were more like ventriloquists' dummies than ever before, if that be possible. It is not surprising that one of the Russian journalists, from Stalin's kept press, expressed his amazement yesterday at the total absence of any democracy in the proceedings. "Why," he said, "when our Soviets meet, every delegate has the right to be heard, and here not one was. We debate all morning and all afternoon and in the evening we go to the opera, but we don't interrupt the proceedings with vaudeville." Even with the vaudeville, the convention was dullness itself until Hoover appeared.

The speaking? Well, so far as any recognition of the dangerous situation of the world is concerned or any intelligent discussion of our own grave crisis, the speeches would have been unworthy of the smallest county fair. The keynoter, Senator Steiwer, was execrated by every intelli-

A Kansas Family Affair

Borah Represented Himself

gent Republican editor here. The Herald Tribune said editorially that he showed how to lose and not how to win a campaign, but its representatives privately used far less polite language than that. Snell as permanent chairman went over the same ground a bit more effectively—he probably was wise enough not to accept the aid of the twenty-one counselors who had spoiled Steiwer's broth. I've been over both these speeches, line by line, and Hoover's also, and I cannot find a really concrete suggestion as to how the economic situations they complain of can be remedied. The whole strategy has been to concentrate the attacks upon the President and to charge him with treason, oath-breaking, fascism, and communism. If that is kept up, it is obvious that it will cause a reaction in the President's favor. It is well to talk of having a President with a conscience, but those who urge this should set the example of being conscientious enough not to impugn the President's motives or bring ridiculous and hysterical charges against him. Ungrammatical as it was and distinctly hysterical, Hoover's speech was effective, and he may well be satisfied with the fifteen-minute cheering which greeted him, for it was genuine and spontaneous.

Like all the other speeches, Hoover's had no reference to the crux of the whole matter—our relations to the rest of the world. The worst of this convention was its utter remoteness and detachment from the world as it is. One would think that when the nation stands again in utmost danger of war, when democracy is everywhere threatened by absolutism and dictatorship, a great party assembled to take counsel on the state of the Union would have devoted much time to discussion of what was going on at home and abroad. Not at all. Peace, disarmament, neutrality—these were not even mentioned. In this respect as in others the platform is a disgrace. The Kansans, out of an utterly needless fear of Borah, let him write the international plank. Bill White, ex-Governor Goodrich, and the others calmly let Borah act not only for the platform committee but for the entire convention. The platform does not represent the party's opinion but only Borah's. It is current gossip that Landon wanted to denounce the reference to the World Court but refrained from a direct break with the convention. Yet the fact remains that out of sheer cowardice the narrowest isolationist was permitted to write this plank. Borah represented nobody but himself. He cut a miserable figure in his interview with a corps of correspondents, who left the room with ill-concealed contempt for his backing and filling. Had the committee threatened Borah, as it well could have, with reprisals in Idaho, he would have gone under the nearest bed. He should have been utterly ignored, for he would not have bolted but merely have sulked at home. Whether one believes in the League and the World Court or not, this is a shameful way to handle a vital international problem in the quadrennial convention of a great party. If Borah's reputation survives it, it will be surprising. The humor was grim with which an Idaho delegate remarked that the delegation was for Borah "as long as he hung together."

Finally it remains to be added that the Old Guard was represented by a handful of men only. Not a member of Hoover's Cabinet took part in the convention. The old order is certainly disappearing, and it was highly significant that Walter F. Brown, Hoover's Ohio-gang Postmaster General was defeated for reelection as national committeeman by a rich bank president and coal-mine owner from Massillon — not much of a change possibly so far as liberalism is concerned, but still one to be rejoiced at. If this disappearance of the old leaders is amazing, it was still more incredible to sit in a Republican convention and to hear speech after speech pleading for freedom of the individual,

Hoover—Effective but Irrelevant

freedom of the press, and so on. This new-found passion for human liberty has been forced upon the party largely by Franklin Roosevelt's errors. Not since the Civil War has the Republican Party busied itself with any American's freedom; under its recent Presidents we were all becoming more and more slaves to the big interests, and Hoover, Coolidge, and Harding cared no more about the constant breaches of civil rights all over the United States than has Franklin Roosevelt, who has yet to say his first word against these infringements of the Constitution. But let us be grateful for the new stand of the Republicans. Perhaps Landon and Knox, Hamilton and Fletcher, will now apply for membership in the Civil Liberties Union.

[Mr. Villard's regular page, Issues and Men, will appear next week as usual.]

Mr. Hearst's Convention

BY HEYWOOD BROWN

IN ALL fairness to the Republican national convention it must be said that it could have been much worse. I'm not speaking now of its quality as a theatrical entertainment—everybody admits that in this respect it was deplorable. What I have in mind is the social significance of the gathering. It is my impression that the Republican Party has moved one and three-quarters inches to the left. The G. O. P. has so constantly frozen the ball when in power or indulged in purely defensive punting that to some extent this very slight gain may be mistaken for a first down. The head linesman ought to be called to the middle of the field to measure. As usual the Republicans are in the middle.

Time alone will tell to what extent Alf Mossman Landon is a liberal. His platform telegram cuts both ways. The suggestion of the possibility of an amendment was couched in the mildest possible terms; yet even so it was a step forward. But the vague hand-wave to the gold standard was distinctly reactionary. It is a pity that the platform writers of the Republican Party are always ambidextrous. The party gives and the party takes away.

Such changes as have occurred in Republican leadership and liberality are largely superficial. Some of the older bosses are gone, and new men, a little younger and a little more westerly, have taken their places. But if Landon is a Kansas Coolidge, in all probability Hamilton will prove to be a Topeka Will Hays or even a small-town Farley. At first view the new campaign manager seemed far more interested in tactics than in principles. I make this charge with no great rancor, for that is the way the game has always been played. I merely suggest that Farleyism is a fake issue. It may go with the voters, but any Republican politician, after the second drink, will admit that his chief complaint against Jim is his political shrewdness. They hope that Hamilton can do as well.

Up to date he has made some bad blunders. John Hamilton took not much more than six or seven minutes before saying, "I place in nomination for the Presidency of the United States the name of the Governor of Kansas, Alfred Mossman Landon." I thought it was one of the greatest nominating speeches I'd ever heard. None of the phrases were particularly eloquent but the whole thing had been simple and short. The demonstration was about as lively as the caliber of the convention could afford. But to my consternation I suddenly found that John Hamilton had done no more than a preface and that he purposed to go on again as soon as the mild din was over.

You can't do that. It's against tradition and against common sense. The custom of conventions is that as soon as you have named your man you must sit down again. And that's one of the few convention customs that are really reasonable. Hamilton tried to get two demonstrations for his candidate instead of one from a convention which hardly had the energy for a single hoopla.

But Hamilton's greatest blunder lay in not fighting more fiercely against the nomination of Colonel Frank Knox for the Vice-Presidency. I don't mean that the good gray colonel is a devil with horns or that his mentality is below the run of the mine supply of Throttlebottoms but in naming the publisher of the Chicago Daily News the convention let two cats out of the bag. A strong effort was made to keep quiet about Hearst. Although he is the chief adviser of Governor Landon, his discoverer, and his leading propagandist, William Randolph Hearst came up in no discussion on the floor. Still, the Democrats are not likely to forget that for some five years Colonel Knox was general manager for Hearst.

Indeed, the significant thing about the Republican convention is a real change in the power directly behind the throne. The convention practically announced that the newspapers of America not only represent big business but are actually big business themselves. They have been the shock troops for the financial interests for many years. Now the brass hats are prepared to let them openly shoulder the greater part of the show. This decision may have been partly brought about by a recognition of the fact that the slaughter in the campaign will be terrific.

Again it may be that some strategists felt that the Hearst issue might be met by saying in effect, "It isn't just Hearst who is running Landon but all the great publishers of America." It seems to me that this is a decision made by men who are drunk with power. The editors of America are naive enough to believe that their readers love them. That good old slogan "the freedom of the press" has been so useful as a weapon to serve every material interest of newspaper owners that it is being trotted out again as a campaign issue. The voters of America are being asked to preserve democracy by turning the rulership of this country over to William Randolph Hearst, who may if he chooses ask some slight assistance from Colonels McCormick and Knox.

The cohesion of the publishing fraternity in this new plan of fourth-estate dictatorship is almost unbroken. Very few are left outside the magic circle. Even leaders of papers generally identified as liberal and pro-New Deal have been extremely polite in dealing with the Republican proceedings in Cleveland. Some had the audacity to refer to Senator Steiwer as an orator even after he had delivered his keynote speech. Mr. Hoover's address was hailed practically everywhere as magnificent. Mr. Hoover had been tactful enough to refer to the courage of the American newspapers. The sage of Palo Alto can recognize a lord and master when he prances on the stage wearing across his chest an eight-column headline.

The Case of John A. Kingsbury

BY JAMES RORTY

ON APRIL 5, 1935, the Board of Directors of the Milbank Memorial Fund announced the resignation of John A. Kingsbury, executive secretary of the fund. "Differences of opinion as to policy" was given as the reason. Behind this polite diplomatic phrase, however, lies a sorry tale which can now be publicly told. Its main features are the following:

1. A campaign by doctors to force the Milbank Fund to abandon a fifteen-year program in the field of medical economics because it favored "group payment" plans for medical and hospital care. In this campaign there developed a boycott, conducted by physicians, of the products of the Borden Company, manufacturers and distributors of milk and milk products. The boycott worked because 45 per cent of the income from the Milbank Fund's $10,000,000 capital is, or was, derived from its holdings of Borden stock; also because Albert G. Milbank, president of the Milbank Fund and chairman of the Board of Directors, is also chairman of the board of the Borden Company.

2. A concomitant and subsequent campaign of vicious, slanderous gossip directed at Mr. Kingsbury—the specific form being that classic canard of gutter politics, whispered doubts of his mental balance.

3. The highly significant about-face of Albert G. Milbank, who, besides being president of the Milbank Fund and chairman of the board of the Borden Company, is head of the great Wall Street law firm of Milbank, Tweed, Hope, and Webb, counsel for the Rockefeller interests, the Chase National Bank, and the Title Guarantee and Trust Company.

4. The panicky retreat from liberal leadership in medical economics of the Milbank Fund—a foundation committed to the principles of science and of academic freedom, which for fifteen years, under the supervision of its dismissed secretary, had done more probably than any other single agency to make possible higher standards in the health services.

To understand the details of this lurid drama, the historical setting must be recalled. The United States is today almost the only civilized country in the world which has failed to institute some form of compulsory health insurance. Here as elsewhere the efforts of social workers, enlightened physicians, and public-health officials to bring adequate medical care to the whole population have been confronted by the vested interests of "organized medicine." But in no other country has the medical hierarchy, faced with the demonstrated chaos and inadequacy of existing health services, resorted to such unscrupulous methods of sabotage and obstruction.

The long struggle to democratize the nation's health services, led first by the American Association for Labor Legislation, for a time abandoned, and then renewed under the aegis of the philanthropic foundations—especially the Milbank Memorial, the Julius Rosenwald Fund, the Twentieth Century Fund, and the Pollak Foundation—came to a head in the fall of 1932, when the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care rendered its report. Although a minority of doctors on the committee dissented from the recommendation of the majority, the factual findings of the committee have never been successfully challenged. In briefest summary, they showed that, in the prosperous years at least, Americans spent more per capita for medical care than any other people and on the whole got less for their money. In 1930 the total expenditure was $3,700,000,000, or about $30 per capita. This, according to the late Edgar Sydenstricker of the Milbank Fund staff, who was generally conceded to be the leading statistician in the field, "is enough money to buy reasonably adequate care at current average prices." Yet what did we get for this huge expenditure? Again, quoting the same authority:

In a year's time, even in a prosperous era, millions of families cannot afford to obtain any medical care; hundreds of thousands of cases of illness needing medical attention are unattended; less than 7 per cent of the population have even a partial physical examination, and less than 5 per cent are immunized against some disease. . . . Although we are accustomed to boast of our achievements in medicine and public health as manifested in a lowered mortality among infants, children, and younger adults, the death-rate among adults of middle and old age has not appreciably diminished in the past fifty years. . . . Even the mortality among mothers and infants in a large class of the population of the United States is still far above that in some other countries.

The doctors were and are among the chief sufferers from this fantastic situation. In 1929 one-third of American physicians had net incomes of less than $3,000 and one-half less than $3,800. Since the depression they have been "plowed under" at an appalling rate, and for every doctor unemployed some hundreds of patients who could not afford to pay their bills have been neglected.

The majority of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care included, among other conservative physicians, its chairman, Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, former president of the A. M. A. and Secretary of the Interior. The committee recommended that physicians practice in groups to reduce their overhead and increase their effectiveness and that they offer service to the public on a periodic-payment plan—small fixed contributions, in return for which each subscriber would receive all the medical and hospital care he needed. Unfortunately, however, the minority clique of prosperous, well-placed, and reactionary medical politicians who control the destinies of the American Medical Association did not realize that this plan would mean more certain income for the doctor. So they proceeded to obstruct and sabotage practically every subsequent attempt to effectuate the committee's recommendations.

On the day the report of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care was released, metropolitan city editors all over America had on their desks advance proofs of an editorial by Dr. Morris Fishbein which was published a few days later in the Journal of the American Medical Association. I will quote the most significant portions of this widely circulated document:

So definite was the trend of the committee's studies in this direction [so-called "socialized medicine"] that one must view the expenditure of almost $1,000,000 with mingled amusement and regret. . . . The Journal has pointed out repeatedly that such practices will mean the destruction of private practice; that they represent the exploitation of physicians for the gain of business; that they put medical schools into competition with their own graduates; and that they are, in a word, "unethical." . . .

The alignment is clear: on the one side the forces representing the great foundations, public-health officialdom, social theory—even socialism and communism inviting to revolution; on the other side the organized medical profession of the country urging an orderly evolution.

Not satisfied with this burst of demagogic nonsense, Dr. Fishbein returned to the attack in subsequent issues. On December 10, 1932, he said:

Intent on their daily and nightly task of preventing disease, healing the sick, and ministering to the afflicted, they [physicians] have given scant attention and but little of their time to a consideration of the way in which their work was being invaded by big business. . . . This is the question of Americanism versus Sovietism for the American people.

The medical politicians soon realized that the progressive doctors, together with the social workers, public-health workers, and economists, backed by the liberal foundations, were determined not merely to give effect to the mild recommendations of the majority report but to press for legislative action in terms of compulsory health insurance. It would appear that some of the medical obstructionists then determined upon "direct action." Because the Milbank Fund technicians, specifically John A. Kingsbury, the late Edgar Sydenstricker, and Dr. I. S. Falk, had been outspoken and effective in their public advocacy of health insurance, and because the fund had an Achilles heel in its Borden investments, the attack centered from the beginning upon this particular foundation.

A boycott of Borden products boiled up early and actively in Indiana. Other state and county medical journals soon began to print unveiled incitements to doctors to boycott the Borden Company. Reports of progress detailing the cumulative effects of the boycott followed. Eminent names are signed to some of this literature. For example, Dr. Nathan B. Van Etten, then vice-speaker of the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association, in a published letter to the editor of the Bronx County Medical Bulletin wrote:

It is difficult to reconcile the individualistic accomplishments of the chairman of the directors [of the Borden

Company] with the collectivistic activities of the president of the foundation [the Milbank Fund] in the delivery of medical service. . . .

Most astonishing of all, however, were signed assurances, printed in the same publication, from Louis J. Auerbacher, president of the Dryco Company, a Borden subsidiary, and director of medical relations of the Borden Company, to the effect that he was "100 per cent with the doctors" and was doing everything in his power to get the fund and its employees out of medical economics.

In February, 1935, the following piece of propaganda, whose origin is not known, appeared in the Philadelphia Medical Roster and Digest, and was reprinted in many state and county medical journals:

KNOW YOUR FOUNDATIONS

We are often unmindful of the eventual fate of the dollars we place in the hands of our business friends. . . . At times we may discover to our dismay that his profits are applied to philanthropy that is ill-directed or actually destructive. A man may be the soul of honor and possessed of rare business acumen and yet be misled by social and economic soothsayers to turn his millions into a foundation the activities of which are not above reproach.

As illustrations we might consider the foundations which have lately interested themselves in the problems of medical care of the people, and some of which have vigorously espoused the cause of socialized medicine. That many of the dollars used by these foundations to the detriment of the practice of medicine have been furnished directly or indirectly by the medical profession goes without saying. If members of the profession were to stop using or recommending the products of the corporations supporting these foundations, the enthusiasm of their social experiments would be cooled more readily than by any amount of verbal protest. In fact, it has been rumored that one of the foundations has already modified its elaborate plan to sell state medicine for the simple but effective reason that many discerning physicians have stopped prescribing a certain product.

There is appended a brief listing of the four foundations referred to, with the Milbank Fund heading the list, and the concluding injunction: "If you do not approve policies of these foundations, make certain that you are not contributing indirectly to their campaign funds. Know your foundations."

Conceivably, both the Milbank Fund and the Borden Company might have found this sort of thing actionable. But Milbank had already practically surrendered in a speech before the Indiana secretaries. And the ineffable Mr. Auerbacher, representing the Borden Company, had presented to Mr. Milbank, Mr. Kingsbury, and the fund's technicians an alternative program for the fund that would have withdrawn it entirely from the field of medical economics. When this program, which had to do with the nutritional values of milk, was curtly rejected both by Mr. Kingsbury and Mr. Milbank, Mr. Auerbacher returned to his ardent collaboration with the embattled medicos.

Still Mr. Kingsbury received no direct intimation that his dismissal was being considered, although rumors to this effect were current everywhere among medical men. But the hunt was nearing its end. The Detroit Medical

News of April 29, 1935, announced the kill as follows:

NOW THEY UNDERSTAND

The Milbank Memorial Fund has announced the termination of the services of John A. Kingsbury and others with this brief explanation: "Differences of opinion as to policies." The fund clearly indicates a new understanding of the individual medical practitioner's social and economic problems. Mr. Kingsbury was the genius guiding the activities that seemed to have as their objective the socialization of medicine.

Mr. Louis J. Auerbacher of New York City, president of the Dryco Company and director of medical relations of the Borden Company, was most influential in accomplishing this result, and is to be congratulated for his services to the public and to the profession.

In the face of this evidence Mr. Milbank has assured the writer that the medical boycott was not the determining factor in the dismissal of the internationally known and universally respected social worker whose efforts over a period of fifteen years, by Mr. Milbank's own acknowledgment, had placed the Milbank Fund in the forefront of American foundations, whom he had known and worked with intimately for twenty-five years, and who had been the friend and confidant of his cousin, Mrs. Elizabeth Milbank Anderson, the founder of the fund. Mr. Milbank, in fact, went so far as to assert that the dismissal of Mr. Kingsbury was determined upon almost a year before it was announced; that the execution of this decision, necessary in Mr. Milbank's opinion because Mr. Kingsbury was a "fanatic," was deferred first by the death of Mr. Kingsbury's son and then by the medical boycott of the Borden Company. Mr. Kingsbury, in turn, presents some rather convincing evidence in rebuttal of this ex post facto explanation; according to him Mr. Milbank had at least one moment of elation when he declared to Kingsbury that if it became necessary to choose between the fund and the Borden Company, he, Milbank, would choose the fund.

Mr. Milbank's assertion that the medical boycott was not the determining factor in Kingsbury's dismissal is heavily discounted by most of the informed doctors, social workers, and public-health workers with whom I have talked. Moreover, it is flatly contradicted by Mr. Kingsbury on the evidence of the decisive interview with his chief which occurred on April 1, 1935, three days before the faithful Mr. Auerbacher delivered his Message to Garcia in Detroit.

According to Mr. Kingsbury, who dictated an abstract of this three-hour interview immediately upon its completion, Mr. Milbank told him flatly that he found himself obliged to choose between his responsibility to the Borden Company and his responsibility to the fund; that even if the fund substituted other securities for its Borden stock—except possibly government bonds whose yield would be insufficient—it would still be in a vulnerable position; that he had prayed about it and arrived at the irrevocable decision that the fund could not continue under Mr. Kingsbury's leadership, for Mr. Kingsbury was at heart a socialist, intimate with such people as Brandeis, La Follette, John Dewey, and the late Theodore Roosevelt, while he,

Milbank, was a capitalist who had inevitably moved to the right during the depression.

Concerning the last point there can be no dispute. On March 16, 1933, before the assembled boards of counsel of the fund, Mr. Milbank had said:

Sickness insurance—or more precisely insurance against the costs of medical care—is needed. This, as you know, is recommended by the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care as a voluntary and local measure. But in my opinion such insurance will not produce the results contemplated unless the scheme is compulsory and at least statewide in its scope.

On a precisely similar occasion two years later, and three days before Mr. Kingsbury received his dismissal, Mr. Milbank stated:

Our Board of Directors has not indorsed compulsory contributory health insurance or any other plan to distribute the costs of medical care. We have not sponsored any form of legislation, federal or state, bearing upon this subject nor have we given, directly or indirectly, any financial support in furtherance of such legislation.

If you talk to eminent medical politicians you may hear that, since Mr. Kingsbury was paid his 1935 salary in full and retired on a life pension of $8,000 with a provision of half that amount for Mrs. Kingsbury in the event of her husband's death, he ought to be grateful for such princely generosity and quite content to "quit and go fishing." According to Mr. Kingsbury, however, the retirement provision represented in large part merely the execution of an understanding arrived at about eight years ago. At the urgency of the late Dr. Linsley Williams, the Milbank Fund employees were then enabled to participate in the Carnegie pension system. At that time the fund undertook to pay back annuities to 1920, when the fund was started. This would have given Mr. Kingsbury about $4,000 a year even had he voluntarily resigned. The additional amount was made up partly by the fund and partly by Mr. Kingsbury's own contribution through the cashing of his life insurance. The $8,000 pension amounts to retirement on half salary, which is not ordinarily considered either unusual or excessive in corporation circles.

You may also hear that Mr. Kingsbury was really dismissed because the accidental death of his only son in June, 1934, coupled with the persecution of the medical politicians, had rendered him mentally irresponsible. I have examined the record of Mr. Kingsbury's behavior at various stages of the events here chronicled, and I have talked to several of his close associates during this period. I can say, with the knowledge that I shall be fully supported by men and women of unimpeachable integrity, that this vicious gossip is without foundation. It is in fact an all too familiar political canard.

Mr. Kingsbury is now employed by the Works Progress Administration on work for which he is eminently fitted, and his mental and physical health is excellent. As for Mr. Milbank, well, the Borden boycott was called off, was it not?

[This is the first of a series of articles by Mr. Rorty on medical economics. The second will appear in an early issue.]

TVA: The New Deal's Best Asset

BY STUART CHASE

IV. The Great Transition

IN THE preceding article we noted the wisdom of the TVA in cooperating with local organizations in the distribution of power. There are other functions where the same wise cooperation is in evidence. Let us consider the land program. Here TVA works through the Extension Service units of the land-grant colleges, which have been functioning for years. The farmers have come to trust these people. A program of vocational education operates through local agencies set up under the Smith-Hughes law twenty years ago. Here again is no break with the past.

Public-health work is carried on through the State Health Department and through the long-established county agents. Dr. E. L. Bishop is the technician who is evolving the crucial program of malaria control at the reservoirs, but the contact work is done by local agencies. He has discovered among other things that alternately raising and lowering the reservoirs about a foot so disturbs the ecology of marine life at the brink that food for mosquito larvae is kept at a minimum, and the pests starve before hatching. He is working out a method for dusting reservoir surfaces by airplane to poison the larvae. He has saved $260,000 in the costs of clearing Wheeler reservoir by a new method which also aids the control of mosquitoes.

One of the most dramatic examples is the cooperation with local labor unions. This story has often been told, and I shall only review it briefly. Credit is due primarily to Dr. Arthur E. Morgan. The TVA principle is: allow no labor conflicts on government jobs, standardize the wage structure, eliminate the peaks and valleys of employment, look always at the worker's annual income, for this is what his family lives on, not on a high day rate. Business agents of the unions were at first suspicious. They put on their poker faces and prepared for the usual game of bluff. But the TVA granted collective bargaining at once and invited the agents to assist in preparing the whole bargaining structure. The policy, every item of which was checked by the unions, was adopted in May, 1935, including full machinery for grievances and wage adjustments. Some 85 per cent of the skilled workers are organized, 50 per cent of the unskilled, and 10 per cent of the white-collar group. There is a man named Killen who has a genius for settling jurisdictional disputes. The bluffing game has gone. Both sides lay their cards face up on the table. Men usually prefer to play square if you give them a chance. Norris Dam as a construction job will be a little below the average cost, yet its wages have run from 5 to 20 per cent above average. The WPA may be cutting prevailing wages, but the TVA is bettering them. There is no sabotage; output per man-hour is high. The accident rate is phenomenally low. Labor throughout the region has been won to the TVA and will fight for its continuance.

The Valley has been convinced, with the exceptions noted above. The strategy has been that of the "middle road." Planning is by democratic consent rather than by dictatorial blueprint. To balance resources against population, figure a possible living standard, and appoint every man to his post, is not an excessively difficult job on the drawing-board. I have done it myself on occasion. But to get men, particularly Americans, and particularly the native stock of the Tennessee mountains, to go to their posts is something else again. The connection is remote. Blueprints are necessary. They assess the potential well-being of any region; they furnish a goal. In the shape of land-planning maps, of course, they are as vital as working drawings for dams or integrated power load. But when it comes to the practical matter of getting people to move, of changing long-established institutions, of shifting encrusted habits and folkways, it seems to me that Dr. H. A. Morgan's policy is the right one—indeed, the only one short of revolution. Of all the many problems which the TVA is tackling this seems to me the most vital: how to make Americans conscious of their resource base, and how to encourage them to act for themselves.

There has been much confusion about the whole matter of planning. Let us see if we can get the basic concepts clear. It is agreed that our objective is to raise the living standards of a given area. There are three approaches:

First: If the area is virgin territory with few people living in it and no vested rights, the planning becomes a straight engineering job. Assess the natural resources, design the plant, and invite the people in. Examples are the Panama Canal, the original city of Washington, the PWA town in Alaska, the TVA town of Norris.

Second: Granted an inhabited area, planning may be autocratic. Vested interests which object are exiled or wiped out. People are moved about like chessmen. Prevailing institutions are swept aside. The idea is: we are going to take charge of your standard of living whether you like it or not. Examples: Liberia and other large plantation areas in the tropics; parts of Russia, Italy, Germany; coal-company towns; the state of Delaware under the du Pont dynasty.

Third: Granted an inhabited area, planning may be attempted with the consent of those who live therein. Vested interests are deflected, outgeneraled, and not encountered head on except in critical cases. Prevailing institutions and folkways are reckoned with. There are no dictatorial powers, but rather persuasion, example, yardsticks, cooperative agreements, education. Examples: Sweden, Norway, Finland, many programs in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand—and the TVA.

This is not to say that the TVA is on the way to inevitable success. It may be wrecked on any of a dozen reefs. This is only to say that its goals are undeniably the right ones, that the strategy employed to reach those goals appears to be a shrewd one, that the opposition is for the moment in retreat, that visible progress is being made. The reefs are there, treacherous beneath the channel. Perhaps the power gentlemen and their courts can break not only the power yardstick but the whole experiment. I doubt this, but it is always a possibility until we break the unconscionable habits of power gentlemen. In Sweden they have been broken, but many private companies still sell power and make a good living at it. They do not, however, monkey around much with injunctions.

In the physical frame of reference the TVA makes such obvious sense that even a tory might grasp it. In the pecuniary frame the case is not so clear. As resources are built up and transformed into crops, industrial products, and energy, vested interests in scarcity outside the Valley are bound to be alarmed, even though the chances are that they will be helped more than they will be hurt by the increased prosperity of the region. Their behavior will be on all fours with the behavior of many of our best people today, who are wailing because the government spends so much, while the net effect of that spending has been to put them back on their financial feet. Plain facts are no guide in the premises, however. If enough vested interests come to believe that the TVA is destined to harm them, even though it is actually enriching them, they will gang up on it, as big business has ganged up on the New Deal, and will move heaven and hell to put it out of commission. By vested interests I mean farmers beyond the Valley as well as industrialists and power companies—indeed, all and sundry who fear for their own markets.

The TVA will certainly reach a point when the matter of developing local industries will have to be squarely met. At present this subject is in the laboratory. One hears of ceramics, canning, sorghum syrups, woodworking, and so on. I doubt if the sale of raw materials to the outside world will ever give the Valley enough in the way of exchange values to provide really adequate living standards. So the Valley will have to take some of its cheap power and produce certain strategic manufactured goods for its own consumption. Otherwise the whole experiment will hang in mid-air, like a lopsided moon. At this point every manufacturer of similar commodities outside the Valley will cry, "Ho! Help, murder and police!" Let them cry. Too much middle-road technique might end by tempering the project to so many winds that it would lose all momentum.

The TVA may be gently, even tearfully, starved to death by a Washington Administration pledged to economy, unaware that to reestablish the resource base of a large region is the soundest conceivable economy in the long run. Again, the local administration may become confused following divergent policies—dams, for instance, as against soil rebuilding—and exhaust its energies in an internal struggle, losing the united picture of an integrated watershed in which no one function takes precedence.

The future is none too clear. American institutions have changed markedly since 1929, but they must change considerably more before we can enrich our livelihood with forthright, honest regional planning. The TVA, at the present stage of what historians may some day call the Great Transition, must inevitably be a compromise—as the navigation clause which legally justifies it is a compromise—between what is and what is to be.

Finally, the world outside the Valley may sharply ask why this region should be marked off for assistance above other regions. There is a good answer to this question, but it may be disregarded. The charity is also an investment for the nation as a whole in certain ways which are worth stating categorically. The TVA can help us all:

1. By reducing our bills for electric power through the yardstick device. This is already beginning to happen.

2. By helping to prevent floods on the lower Mississippi and so saving heavy losses to people outside the Valley.

3. By giving a cheap phosphorus fertilizer to the nation.

4. By working out a practical program to replace the one-crop cotton culture of the South. This affects the whole cotton belt.

5. By working out the techniques of integrated watershed control, good for any valley.

6. By working out techniques for the control of erosion, for land use, forestry, recreation, free ways (controlled motor highways); for decentralization, resettlement, town planning; for the control of malaria; for labor policies—all of which have wide general application.

7. By creating a degree of local prosperity which will be infectious beyond the local boundaries. If average farm income can be raised from $100 to, say, $500, a large new market is created for imported goods. (As noted above, however, the beneficiaries may be so busy protesting against new Valley industries that the fact will escape them.)

8. By developing a middle-road technique for the human and institutional aspects of regional planning, applicable throughout the Republic during this phase of the Great Transition.

The TVA can help the rest of us, particularly the boys and girls of the lost generation, by giving us hope, by furnishing tangible evidence that there is a way out.

Compromise or no, to see the Authority in operation is a spiritually refreshing experience. To look at the clean, strong walls of Norris Dam between the hills of pine; to feel the will to achievement, the deep integrity of a thousand young-minded men and women, schooled in the disciplines of science, free from the dreary business of chiseling competitors and advertising soap; to know that over this whole great watershed from the Smokies to the Ohio men's faces turn to a common purpose and a common goal—these things intoxicate the imagination. Here, struggling in embryo, is perhaps the promise of what all America may some day be.

[This is the concluding article of Mr. Chase's series.]

The personal document of a writer who is much more than a reporter, who tells what he saw and did and thought in America and Russia, the two most powerful and interesting countries in the world today.

EDMUND WILSON'S

Travels in Two Democracies

"An engaging and provocative book. In it the reader will find some of his best writing and more of a revelation of himself than in any of his other works. . . . He is more than a reporter. He is bent on reading meaning and purpose into everything he encounters. Nor is he an ordinary man. He is a highly civilized individual, or rather a highly individualized philosopher with an immense tenderness, little passion, and ever conscious of his civilized tastes and of his sense of justice."—Maurice Hindus, Saturday Review.

"No man now writing, no super-reporter of the varied human scene, provides more stimulating entertainment than Mr. Wilson. . . . He is the most entertaining one of the host of alien commentators on life under the Soviet regime."—Hartford Courant.

"Edmund Wilson has put some of his best work into this book, and his best, in its sensitiveness, its observance of significant details and a style which is certainly carefully studied but usually does not seem so, is very good indeed."—R. L. Duffus, N. Y. Times.

"It is not possible in a short notice even to suggest the brilliance of insight which plays in his book, the excellence of the writing, and the richness of detail. . . ."—Baltimore Sun.

"Contains enough scintillating, accomplished writing to reinforce Wilson's position as the best of America's social essayists. . . . Since H. L. Mencken . . . there has been no one around these woods to touch Wilson for prose at once dignified and savage."—News Week.

Just published, $2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND CO., 383 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK

BOOKS and the ARTS

FIVE YOUNGER POETS

A Flashing Cliff

BY MURIEL RUKEYSER

Spinning on his heel, the traveler sees across snow a flashing cliff.
Past the plain's freeze, past savage branches immune in ice, a frozen waterfall, clamped in December, glistens alive.

Love, will you recognize yourself displayed?
Or is the age defective, cold with storm to lock fast water in iron artifice, whitening cataracts?—contempt and loss,
and nothing, in the great world, can lie calm, travel alive, but is frozen solid,

and will not face its mirror nor speak its pain.
Will you fight winter to break in immense speed resisting and sensitive, a waterfall-flash sparkling full across the vicious plain?

Fight down our age, the mad vindictive time?
No victory's here. Now, any passion suffers against proud ice, flashing, angry, and jailed.
You, maniac, catalept!
And, love. You are all rivers.

Genesis

BY THEODORE ROETHKE

This elemental force
Descended from the sun;
A river's leaping source
Is locked in narrow bone.

This wisdom floods the mind,
Invades quiescent blood,
A seed that swells the rind
To burst the fruit of good.

A pearl within the brain,
Secretion of the sense;
Around a central grain
A meaning grows immense.

January Crossing

BY CLARK MILLS

After the frenzied movement and the thunder, salt in the mouth, and sound of voices driven across the mind, rippling the mind, like cavernd water under low granite shelves

—never the clear word given freely, but sound of seventy voices blown—in this house on the crest of the northmost hill

I am alone and I am not alone who see men to the east, buried in tumult, and men to the west, who are still,
for I have grown about their lives, and seen what they have seen, laughed as they laughed, grieved for their dead
—upon the fixed ice, and across the tip-visible green slopes to the north, and at the northern fountainhead that branches below day and flows in seven torrents of light about this open haven.

Such as the Trick Chameleon

BY W. R. MOSES

The art is not unlike the trick chameleon's
Whereby both oak and gum trees grow in balm
As though rich Balm of Gileads alloyed May—
An art, for fall as usual hints decay.

A cotton poverty is sick in fields,
The leaves of maples by the year worn thin,
But as, unprincipled, the air flows soft,
Chameleons, weathercocks, gums bear aloft

May cartilaginous—and surely man
Is brother to the leaf that perishes.
The sloshing acids made to burn him hard,
Remove the flesh, reveal determined shard,

May fall—and still one liquid laugh can melt,
Two little tears can melt the saline form,
Not like a sharp-edged stone, or clear medallion,
But only like the slight, the trick chameleon.

Upon Twelve

BY JOSEPHINE MILES

Now has been contrived in the increasing noonday
Some show of order wherein to be at rest,
Some stilling of the need that space be tended,
That time be pressed.

Where in our path was the ambitious clutter of morning,
The leaf shadow and stir, the brush and broom,
Now at the base of trees is a clean sunlight,
At the door, room,

We can sit with minds quiet with the loftiness, though cooler,
That the sun has for its meridian,
In the fine short space before the roof eastward
Darkens again.

NOVELIST BITES CRITIC

BY EDMUND WILSON

JAMES T. FARRELL'S "Note on Literary Criticism"* is quite a remarkable event. For one thing, it is one of the few intelligent discussions of literature from the Marxist point of view which have yet been written by Americans. But it is especially conspicuous as being the work of one of the ablest of the younger novelists. The book suffers a little, it is true, from Farrell's characteristic faults: it is diffuse and badly organized; it runs to footnotes as long as the chapters; and the line of the argument is not always kept clear. But it is inspiring to see a novelist getting up to argue general principles with the critics and actually showing authority in that field in which they have been pretending to instruct him. And one is surprised, after reading Mr. Farrell's novels, which derive so much of their effectiveness from the total immersion of the author in the lives of unreflecting and limited people, to discover behind them a mind capable of philosophical abstraction and analysis.

In order to take up properly all the questions raised by Mr. Farrell in this book—questions of the relation of Marxism to literature—it would be necessary to write a book oneself. I shall therefore confine myself to noting points which seem to me important.

The first thing to plant firmly in the foreground of any discussion of Marxism and literature is a definition of dialectical materialism. The most depressing thing about the Marxist disputes which have been raging in the literary reviews is that the writers who consider themselves Marxists know as little what they are talking about as the anti-Marxists with whom they are trying to argue. Both sides are always assuming that Marx's and Engels's dialectical materialism is crude economic determinism and that the aim of the Marxist critic is simply to explain the work of art in terms of its economic origins. Real dialectical materialism is of course a much more complicated affair, which allows man to make his own history, though "not just as he pleases," but conditioned by "circumstances as he finds them," which allows works of art and ideas to influence economic conditions as well as economic conditions to mold ideas and art, and which conceives the various departments of human thought as continually straining to set themselves free from the entanglements of class relations and to establish professional classes of their own. Editors of magazines really ought to demand from leftist writers nowadays some kind of certificate of competence which would show that they have at least read Marx and Engels and that they can explain dialectical materialism. Mr. Farrell does display such competence, and he goes about his task correctly when he pulls out the real Marx and Engels at the very beginning of the discussion and holds them to the heads of his opponents.

The next thing which ought to be forced upon the attention of the practitioners of leftist criticism is that, even when we understand Marx, Marxism can tell us nothing whatever about the goodness or badness of a work of art. A critic may be an excellent Marxist and yet, confronted with a bad book and a good book, both of them ideologically unexceptionable, be unable to choose between them if he is lacking in imagination and taste. That is why leftist critics with no real aptitude for literature sometimes write interestingly about inferior productions which may be taken at their surface value and have no importance save as social documentation, but are likely to go horribly astray on books by first-rate writers—because in literature of the highest quality the vision of life is likely to be complex and the moral implicit rather than explicit. Also, there are writers whose real meaning is something quite different from what they think they mean. And a critic who is insensitive to literary effects is certain to be seriously misled. This has been admirably stated by Mr. Farrell.

What Marxism can do, however, is throw a great deal of light on the origins and social significance of works of art. The study of literature in its relation to society is as old as Herder—or even Vico. The great bourgeois master of it was Taine—whose responses to books were so vivid that his summings up of writers and re-creations of periods sometimes rival or surpass their subjects. Marx and Engels deepened this study of literature in its relation to its social background by demonstrating clearly for the first time the importance of economic systems.

But Marx and Engels are worth listening to about literature, not merely because they invented Marxism, but because they had literary appreciation. When Lassalle sent them his poetic tragedy, "Franz von Sickingen," and asked them to criticize it, Marx replied that "setting aside any purely critical attitude toward the work," it had on a first reading affected him strongly—characteristically adding that on persons of a more emotional nature it would doubtless produce an even stronger effect; and Engels said that he had read it twice and had been moved by it so profoundly that he had been obliged to lay it aside in order to get a critical perspective. Then they make some purely literary observations: both had been poets in their youth and were exceedingly sensitive to poetry. Only after pulling themselves together and devoting some special thought to the subject, do they get to the point of analyzing the political content; but they then, in their usual masterly manner, proceed to discuss the historical period with which Lassalle's drama deals and to show him how his own political position has led him to mistake the role of his hero. One would like to be able to imagine that the members of the committee which chooses plays for the Theater Union begin by blowing their noses like Marx and Engels when a particularly affecting script is submitted to them, and only afterward go on to an ideological examination, rather than starting with a few hard-and-fast formulas and using them as a Procrustes bed.

*"A Note on Literary Criticism." By James T. Farrell. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

Mr. Farrell's way of getting at this point is to show that the social-economic pigeonholes into which the leftist critics put works of literature do not constitute "categories of value." Of course not; and the incapacity of these critics to appreciate literary values is the proof of a simple lack of competence.

Then there is the question of proletarian literature. The best discussion I have ever seen of this is in Trotsky's "Literature and Revolution." Trotsky, writing in 1924, did not believe in a proletarian culture which would displace bourgeois culture in Russia. The bourgeois literature of the French Revolution had ripened under the old regime; but the illiterate proletariat and peasantry of Russia had had no chance to produce a culture, nor would there be time for them to do so in the future, because the proletarian dictatorship was to be transitory and lead the way to "a culture which is above classes and which will be the first truly human culture." And it certainly seems to be working out that way in Russia, where they have recently, with the most positive emphasis, been falling back on their classics and on able contemporary writers who learned their trade before the revolution.

The situation is, however, certainly a little different in America. Our working class and our farmers are better educated than the corresponding groups were in Russia, and it is easier for middle-class writers to share their experience; and we have lately been getting something which is perhaps proletarian literature in the sense that it deals with industrial and rural life from the point of view of the factory worker and the poor farmer under conditions which are destroying him and forcing him to fight. Yet even here, where the themes and point of view do represent a new development in our literature, the style and the form have shown no signs of making a break with the past: on the one hand, we have had since Mark Twain a classic literature which is based on the common speech, so that a more democratic idiom is hardly possible, and, on the other hand, it is evident that the proletarian writer is able to profit by the technical sophistication developed by the bourgeoisie. One of the best of the recent strike novels, "The Land of Plenty," by Robert Cantwell, obviously owes a good deal to Henry James.

Mr. Farrell does not reckon with Trotsky, and he approaches this subject in a different way. But his theory of the "carry-over value" of literature brings one back to the same considerations.

This brings us to "Art is a weapon." It is true that art may be a weapon; but in the case of some of the greatest works of art, some of those which, in Mr. Farrell's language, have the longest carry-over value, it is difficult to see that any important part of this value is due to their function as weapons. "The Divine Comedy," in its political aspect, is a weapon for Henry of Luxemburg, whom Dante, not understanding the nationalistic movement of the Italians to get away from their Austrian emperors, was so passionately eager to impose on them. Today we may say with Carducci that we would gladly have seen his "good Frederick's" crown rolling in Olona vale: "Jove perishes; the poet's hymn remains." And though Shakespeare's "Henry IV" and "Henry V" are weapons for Elizabethan imperialism, their real center is not Prince Hal but Falstaff; and Falstaff is the father of Hamlet and of all Shakespeare's tragic heroes, who, if they illustrate any social moral—such as that Renaissance princes, supreme in their little worlds, may go to pieces in all kinds of terrible ways for lack of a larger social organism to restrain them—do so without Shakespeare's being aware of it. If these works are weapons at all, they are weapons in the more general struggle of European man emerging from the Middle Ages and striving to understand his world and himself—a function for which "weapon" is hardly the right word. The truth is that there is short-range and long-range literature. Long-range literature attempts to sum up wide areas and long periods of human experience, or to extract from them general laws; short-range literature preaches and pamphleteers with the view of an immediate effect. Mr. Farrell's definition of propaganda is relevant here: "the scheme or plan or process or technique of propagating a system, a scheme, an idea or set of ideas, a doctrine, or an attitude or attitudes, all with the aim of producing acquiescence in a proposed course of action."

And this brings us to the question of what sort of period is most favorable to works of art. There seems to be an assumption on the part of some writers of the left that revolutionary or pre-revolutionary periods are for some reason particularly favorable. This is, of course, not at all the case. The more highly developed forms of literature require leisure and a certain amount of stability; and periods of revolution make both impossible. The literature of the French Revolution consisted of the orations of Danton, the journalism of Camille Desmoulins, and the few political poems that André Chénier was able to write before they cut his head off. The literature of the Russian Revolution was the political writing of Lenin and Trotsky, and Alexander Blok's poem, "The Twelve," almost the last fruit of his genius before it was nipped by the cold wind of the storm. Pre-revolutionary periods, in which the new forces are fermenting, may be great periods for literature—as the eighteenth century was in France and the nineteenth century in Russia—though there was a decadence after 1905. But great literature is likely to be produced not by impending revolutions but by the phenomenon of highly developed literary technique in the hands of any writer who derives strength from a set of strongly established institutions. The germs of the Renaissance are in Dante and the longing for a better world in Vergil, but neither Dante nor Vergil can in any real sense be described as a revolutionary writer: they sum up or write elegies for ages that are passing. The social organisms which give its structure to their thought—Rome and the Catholic church—are already showing signs of decay. There is no use, therefore, in attempting to identify the highest creative work in art with the most active moments of creative social change. Marx suffered from no such illusion. Mr. Farrell quotes from the "Critique of Political Economy" his statement that "certain periods of the highest development of art stand in no direct connection with the general development of society, nor with the material basis and the skeleton structure of its organization."

Finally, Mr. Farrell is to be congratulated for having stood up not merely to the local boys but also to the Russian panjandrums—such as Radek, whose rubbish about Joyce in "Problems of Soviet Literature" he has been able to shoot so full of holes that I hope nobody will ever again be impressed by it. And one should mention his discussion of the class struggle in literature:

The class struggle is not something that the worker breathes, so that he goes about breathing two parts of ozone to one part of class struggle. It is an objective set of relationships, fundamental in a society, and it has a devious, shifting, differentiating influence (sometimes direct, sometimes indirect) on individuals and on classes. We cannot, then, treat the class struggle as if it were just some lumpy force pushing men in an equal and coordinate way toward two sides of a barricade where they will proceed to fire guns and throw bricks at each other. I repeat, therefore, that the class struggle, as I understand it, is a fundamental set of relationships, and that out of this fundamental set there grow many potentialities of conduct, of thought, feeling, dream, fantasy, as well as of overt action. And I say that the class struggle is not, for the Marxist, simply an article of faith. It is something that he examines, traces, correlates, understands.

The effort to examine and to understand is what Mr. Farrell has been able to bring to literature as well as to life; and it is what is most needed if the writing of the left is to perform any really serious function.

BOOKS

Soliloquy in the Dark

DAYS OF WRATH. By André Malraux. Random House. $1.75.

AFTER reintroducing Western literature to the pattern of classical tragedy in "Man's Fate," Malraux returns in this novel to that fragmentary or at least subordinate form to which it has become almost resigned in the last few centuries—the soliloquy. Through all but a few pages at the beginning and at the end we are at the center of a conflict that is waged exclusively within the individual consciousness. The antagonists, in Malraux's own words, are the hero and his "sense of life." For this struggle the central situation, the imprisonment of a German Communist agitator in a Nazi concentration camp, is a symbolical framework: the walls of the prison cell represent the impenetrable barriers set up between the individual and his fellow-men by the conditions of the modern world. Symbolical of the imminent breaking down of these barriers is the scene in which Kassner, at a particularly anguished moment, deciphers the tapping of a prisoner in a neighboring cell as the laborious spelling out of the German word for "comrade." For the most part, however, there is not even this much communication; the Nazi captors themselves are no more than the agents of a grimly automatic historical destiny. Inside there is a mind in dizzy pursuit of images that will sustain its life; outside, it is "the time of contempt," the temporary historical cancelation of those images. For unlike the heroes of "Man's Fate," whose integration was a previously accomplished fact making possible an instantaneous participation in action, Kassner is forced by his predicament into a weighing and reweighing of those ideals on which he has staked his existence. A feverish examen de conscience replaces the brilliant drama of the earlier book; action is stilled by introspection. It is as if Malraux had replied to the charge that action is no more than an anodyne or showy form of escape for his heroes by submitting one of them to the full pressure of circumstances that shall bring his faith to the test. Kassner is therefore comparable to the early Christian martyr, except that in every sense the arena is a private one. The physical torture inflicted by his enemies is less harrowing than the internal clash of the twin demons of faith and despair. What is required is not a public demonstration of faith but the more difficult proof of his faith to himself in a situation in which every hope is a mockery. And, finally, his triumph, when it is marked by his departing sane from the eleven days' confinement, is not salvation but the mere preservation of his belief in the possibility of salvation.

The soliloquy, both as an incidental and as a separate form, is a renowned vehicle for rhetoric; for in this form the individual is commonly engaged in opposing to his real or actual self an imaginative reconstruction of himself based on some system of moral or philosophical idealism. In Shakespeare the rhetoric derives from the hero's recognition, at the end, of his failure to measure up to his ideal; in the romantics, on the other hand, it is produced by an identification or perhaps confusion of the hero's limitations with his ideals. But in both cases the attempt at self-understanding involves a celebration of those things on which the individual believes his true identity can be based. For Malraux the only hope of integration for the modern individual lies in the creation of a society in which man himself will be restored as a value. That salvation for the race is a prerequisite to salvation for the individual is the first principle both of his ethics and of his psychology. It is the conviction which, operating actively in the conduct of Kyo and others in "Man's Fate," becomes rhetorically explicit in the present work. The climax is not a decision, that is, a spontaneous act of will, but an experience, the moment in which Kassner assembles the scattered fragments of his personality by identifying a strain of music heard through the walls of his cell with the struggle of his comrades throughout the world in the same cause.

It was the call of those who, at this very hour, were painting the red emblem and the call to vengeance on the houses of their murdered comrades, of those who were replacing the names on street signs with names of their tortured fellow-workers, of those in Essen who had been beaten down with bludgeons, and who, as they lay there, limp like strangled men, their faces gory with the blood that streamed from their mouths and noses, because the S. A. men wanted them to sing the "Internationale," had shouted the song with such fierce hope ringing in their voices that the non-commissioned officer had drawn his revolver and fired. Kassner, shaken by the song, felt himself reeling like a broken skeleton. These voices called forth relentlessly the memory of revolutionary songs rising from a hundred thousand throats . . . their tunes scattered and then picked up again by the crowds like the rippling gusts of wind over fields of wheat stretched out to the far horizon. But already the imperious gravity of a new song seemed once more to absorb everything into an immense slumber; and in this calm, the music at last rose above its own heroic call as it rises above everything with its intertwined flames that soothe as they consume; night fell on the universe, night in which men feel their kinship on the march or in the vast silence, the drifting night, full of stars and friendship . . .

This is rhetorical writing of a very high order, and of a general type that has perhaps not appeared in France since the romantic movement. It is language infected by positive vision until, like that of Marlowe and the early Elizabethans, it takes on vigorous new rhythms and a fresh accretion of imagery. But it is also subject to all the objections that we commonly raise against rhetoric. It is the reflection of ideas and values which have not yet been wholly assimilated by the sensibility, so that at times Kassner seems to be resolving his conflicts by a kind of verbal self-hypnosis. From the standpoint of its author's work as a whole "Days of Wrath" is almost certain to be regarded as a momentary lapse from that full conviction about his theme which made possible the highly disciplined art of "Man's Fate." Its excitement resides too much in a certain use of language and too little in the ordering of materials.

WILLIAM TROY

The Machinery of World Peace

ON THE RIM OF THE ABYSS. By James T. Shotwell. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE title of Dr. Shotwell's book does not imply, as one might assume at first sight, that the world is about to plunge headlong from a precarious precipice into the chaos of war and revolution. It refers to a figure of speech once used by M. Paul-Boncour, who "pictured the nations as in an abyss shaped in concentric circles which, from the outer rim of greatest security, constantly narrow as they deepen toward the center of the gulf where those reside who are most threatened by war and have suffered most from it." Since the danger of war menaces various nations in widely differing degrees, their obligation to take military action in case of aggression should be correspondingly graded. In a universal system of collective security built "in concentric circles of graded responsibilities for the maintenance of peace" the United States, according to Dr. Shotwell, would stand on "the outer rim" of the abyss, but not beyond the danger zone of war. The task he undertakes in this volume is to describe the forms of cooperation which the United States could establish with the League of Nations while remaining outside its membership.

Dr. Shotwell begins his argument like one who has tasted the Dead Sea fruit of disillusionment and has measured the distance between ideal and reality. He opposes both the doctrinaire pacifists, who reject all solutions falling short of unworldly perfection, and the doctrinaire isolationists, who would preserve the United States under a glass bell, free from the taint of outside political—but not economic—contacts. His middle-of-the-road program contemplates an arrangement by which the United States, without joining the League, could participate in the Council or Assembly whenever its interests were involved, thus avoiding the misunderstandings, cross-purposes, and duplication of effort which characterized the Manchurian and Chaco affairs. The United States, under Dr. Shotwell's scheme, "would have the negative duty of not impeding the pacific processes of the world community, but could not be looked to for those positive measures"—under the bugaboo Articles X and XVI of the Covenant—"which even the European states are unwilling to take unless they coincide with national self-interest."

Dr. Shotwell's argument thus appears to be based on a restudy of the role which the League may be expected to play in world politics, as demonstrated by Japan's invasion of Manchuria and Italy's conquest of Ethiopia. The cause of the League, in his opinion, is by no means hopeless; "but it is obvi-

SPECIAL SALE OF BOOK BARGAINS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail Order Book House

These offerings by America's oldest Mail-Order Book House save you up to 75% of their regular retail price. Each book is brand-new in condition, stock-perfect, a permanent addition to your library. In many cases the quantities on hand are the last remaining stocks. All orders promptly filled and covered by our 52-year-old MONEY BACK GUARANTEE.

LIMITED QUANTITIES of EACH TITLE

1. HAMMOND'S PICTORIAL ATLAS OF THE WORLD. Including illustrated Gazetteer, De Luxe Edition. Containing 64 pages of maps in full color covering the entire world and also a number of black and white maps; 64 pages of a profusely illustrated Gazetteer of the World; Gazetteer Index; complete Astronomical maps, etc., etc. 160 pages. Size 7x10 inches. 1936 edition. Only 98c
2. MY EXPERIENCES IN THE WORLD WAR. By John J. Pershing, Commander-in-Chief, American Expeditionary Forces. First edition. Illustrated with 69 reproductions from photographs and numerous maps. In 2 large volumes. 836 pages. Boxed. ($10.00) The set, $2.98
3. "THE WORK WHICH WON THE PULITZER PRIZE" "General Pershing has not only written THE MOST AUTHORITY, the most penetrating and the most decisive account of our own part in the war, but he has presented a finer spirit in narration than any of the others, more objectivity, more fullness and more balance. The book is epic in the sense that it is a GREAT NATIONAL STORY, displaying the American character in its finest aspects."—Pulitzer Prize Committee.

3. ELBERT HUBBARD'S LITTLE JOURNEYS to the Homes of the Elect

Magnificently bound and printed by the Roycrofters. Complete in one volume. Only 98c

"Secrets published for the first time in one volume." "Wherever you go in this wonderful volume, whether you are watching the development of a marvellous family, a perfect work of art, a magnificent musical instrument, or an idealistic dream, you will find, along with thrills and excitement, HUNDREDS OF PRICELESS, PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS for use in your daily life!"

4. THE OUTLINE OF ART. Edited by Sir William Orpen. Illustrated with over 300 plates. Complete in two large volumes; size 7 1/2 x 10 1/2 inches. ($10.00) The set, $3.98
5. THE SECRETS OF HOUDINI. By J. C. Cannell, Vice-President of the Magician's Club. Fully illustrated. The secrets of Houdini, the World's most famous mystifier, are disclosed for the first time in this volume. 98c
6. WOODROW WILSON'S LIFE AND LETTERS. By Ray Stannard Baker. In 2 large illustrated volumes. 708 pages. Boxed. ($10.00) The set, only $1.98
7. THE COMPLETE WRITINGS OF BRANN, THE ICONOCLAST. With a boldness that outraged convention, this wizard of words MADE THE WORLD BLUSH FOR SHAME. A rare, exciting, stimulating "intellectual cocktail." His entire works, formerly available only in 12 Vols. at $35.00, now complete in 2 volumes. The set, only $2.98
8. THE SCIENCE OF LIFE. By H. G. Wells, & large fully illustrated vols. ($12.00) The 4 volume set $2.98
9. DANTE'S DIVINE COMEDY. The famous Henry F. Cary translation. 130 full page Gustave Doré illustrations. 652 pages. Large clear type. Handsomely, durably bound in tan buckram, size 6 1/2 x 10". $2.98
10. WRITE IT RIGHT. By Ambrose Bierce. A little blacklist of literary faults, by America's foremost master of style. Useful, witty. Interesting to those who like to write and think precisely. $1.00
11. MARK TWAIN'S "1601." This much suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor." Conversation as it was in the time of the Tudors, and sketches $1.58
12. THE HOMOSEXUAL NEUROSIS. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Authorized translation by Dr. James S. Van Teslaar. ($5.00) $1.69
13. THE ART OF MARRIAGE By J. F. Hayden, B.Sc., eminent authority. 3rd edition, revised and enlarged. 279 pages. $1.98
14. THE OUTLINE OF SCIENCE Edited by J. Arthur Thomson. With over 800 interesting illustrations. Complete in four large handsome volumes; size 7 1/2 x 10 1/2 inches. $5.95

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

N-11

Established 1884

367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14
(Mark circle around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 272-N, just off press!

Name

Address

City State

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

ously at a crisis that calls for the strictest realism." Yet far from displaying such realism, Dr. Shotwell answers the major problems of our day with copy-book aphorisms, making no effort to translate them into terms of effective international action. Such general statements as "police action is not enough by itself to maintain peace"; "the only way out of the vicious circle . . . is by genuine loyalty to the system of collective security and by real effort to make Article XIX [regarding treaty revision] a more effective means for granting justice"; "collective security must mean real security"; "social justice is the basis of permanent peace"; the choice which confronts us "depends upon whether the procedure of peaceful change can really be made effective"—all these statements, while good and wholesome in themselves, are only jumping-off places for a process of thought which Dr. Shotwell fails to pursue.

To take only one important issue which hangs over the world like the sword of Damocles: what constitutes "justice" in international affairs? Is there such a thing as abstract justice? When we speak of "justice for Germany" do we mean a settlement which would satisfy Hitler, such as absorption of Austria or the German part of Czecho-Slovakia by the Third Reich, or a settlement which would take into consideration the interests of the international community as a whole? Does "justice" require the return of Germany's African colonies—or would this represent "injustice" to the natives, handed over to the rule of a government intoxicated with racial superiority? Can treaty revision, even if theoretically desirable, be effected today without resort to war? When Hitler or Mussolini attempts to gain his ends by aggression, should we make concessions in the hope of pacifying the aggressor or at least localizing the conflict, or should we resist dictatorships on the march by force if necessary?

Instead of probing these and kindred questions, Dr. Shotwell spends most of his time tinkering with the machinery of international peace, adding here a screw, there a piston, in the hope of making it work. Yet important as is the development of international institutions, it should not be allowed to overshadow the substance of life itself. The mere drafting and signing of new treaties will not advance the cause of peace. What we need is not more or better machinery, but sterner determination to use such instruments as are already available. Where there is a will to peace, a way will be found. Without the will, all the peace machinery which can be invented in the research laboratories of the world will prove so much useless scrap. In this critical period our crying need is not for engineers familiar with structural problems but for social philosophers who can tell the engineers the ends their building must serve. One looks in vain in Dr. Shotwell's book for a well-defined philosophy of international relations.

VERA MICHELES DEAN

Fable in Naples

SANFELICE. By Vincent Sheean. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

MR. SHEEAN has found the fable for his new novel in Naples at the close of the eighteenth century. A boorish king and a rapacious queen have ground the city under their heel and bled it dry. Queen Caroline, the real ruler, abhors the French, who guillotined her sister, Marie Antoinette, and adores the English; Lady Hamilton is her confidante, Nelson her hero. Through England she hopes to regain Malta for her kingdom, and with outrageous assertiveness she sends an army to fight the French in northern Italy. The campaign fails, and the court abandons Naples for Palermo. French troops, with Italian Jacobin refugees in their train, advance upon Naples, subdue a beggarly mob which has remained royalist, and set up a republic. But the infant republic, with no confederate except a France too busy to help it and with all the rest of Europe for its enemy, soon topples; its leaders are imprisoned and executed; and the old regime is reestablished.

This is the background to "Sanfelice"—an interesting and formidable background not empty of historic lessons. The parallel with pre-revolutionary France is obvious. We have an oppressed and mismanaged kingdom with every incentive for overthrowing the dominant order. We have incendiaries and philosophes prepared to agitate and lead. We have an army, even if a foreign one, prepared to effect the transfer of power. But the parallel is incomplete, and for two excellent reasons the adventure miscarries. First, the masses will not turn against their masters; second, the little republic becomes a pawn in international politics and, unaided at home, is annihilated from outside.

In so far as he has played the historian Mr. Sheean has drawn for us a vivid picture of an ill-fated revolution, explaining why it took place and why it failed. In so far as this is true, "Sanfelice" jibes well enough with the social awareness of our times and stands in little danger of being underrated as a contribution to social literature. The danger is all, indeed, in the opposite direction, and because Mr. Sheean also wrote "Personal History," I suspect that "Sanfelice" will be over-emphasized for its revolutionary utterances, for its expression of historical materialism, for its use of the past to assay the present, for anything and everything, that is, except for being a fairly orthodox historical novel. Yet despite the implications of the story's background, it remains an orthodox historical novel at heart, and will do little toward "informing" anyone not previously informed. I do not mean that it wholly lacks significance, or that the story of the lustrous Sanfelice is mere cloak-and-sword melodrama. But neither do I believe that, say, "A Tale of Two Cities" is wholly without significance, or a mere cloak-and-sword melodrama.

The Sanfelice herself is the kind of woman described in such blurb-French phrases as grande passion and femme fatale, and to my mind she is almost as stale as the phrases. An aristocratic Neapolitan married to a rotter who abandons her, she takes up with a bourgeois Jacobin, becomes embroiled in politics because she is sunk in love, remains royalist at heart while by the merest accident she is hailed as the Mother of the Revolution, and ends her life on the scaffold. As a woman she fails in these pages to transmit her glamor. As a symbol, her revolutionary role is, by Mr. Sheean's own showing, a mere coincidence—historically she is not integral to the narrative; and in order to make her carry the burden of the tale Mr. Sheean has to sharpen rather too patently his wiles as a novelist. She is the most important and the least interesting character in the book. Some of the other characters—her mother, her lover, the Duke of Lauriano—are at least striking if not quite real, while the unspeakable Queen becomes a stage character of commanding vividness. One would have been angrier with her, however, had not Mr. Sheean been so angry himself.

The romantic baggage of "Sanfelice" has not only constituted a limitation; it has been a danger. It invests the book with a tinge of something meretricious. There are varieties of romance, and I think that Mr. Sheean has hit upon the very worst kind possible. He has chosen the tone of romantic irony, which is romanticism gone highbrow, and such irony is never too far from either phoniness or sentimentality. It is in the mode of a James Branch Cabell to make the Sanfelice both heroine and martyr of a cause she never understood or believed in. Surely the honors of the book might better have gone to an agitator, a careerist, a vacillating intellectual, a man or woman of will, or even to some anonymous befuddled member of the mob. To hand them over to a woman whose only language was passion, to a woman who even failed to want power, instrument though she was at times of other people's lives, was not the way to articulate the past or explain the precepts of history. Nor to my mind does this highly geared but feebly drawn lady much adorn a novel either. She decoyed Mr. Sheean into a theatrical mood, which was unfortunate enough in itself; but she failed to be good theater, which was fatal.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

"O Time in Your Flight"

WHO OWNS AMERICA? Edited by Herbert Agar and Allen Tate. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

THIS is a symposium by the "Nashville agrarians," together with recruits to their company since the earlier book, "I'll Take My Stand," was published. Their philosophy and its application have broadened in the interval. While desire to rectify the culture of the South is still their starting-point, they recognize that this requires changes in the national economy.

Several things are to be said for these authors in the beginning, before any word of adverse comment. They are competent writing men, and so express their ideas attractively. They are publicists, trying to think of the general advantage, never seeking to serve selfish or local interest. They do not whine, but go resolutely about the work of convincing the average reader of the usefulness of their proposals. They represent very much more than a disgruntled literary rejoinder. Furthermore, human beings are the end and aim of their social thinking; they see the necessity of making abundant room for the development of moral values.

Fundamentally they object to the consequences of matured capitalism, with its functionless ownership, its concentration of control in a few hands, its separation of workers from production for their own use, its urbanization of the population. Recently they have been influenced by the exhibits of Messrs. Berle and Means, by the new emphasis upon regionalism, by the accounts of Scandinavia's successful attacks upon private monopoly, by the TVA and the Resettlement Administration. Fascism and the totalitarian state have stirred them to fresh efforts to prevent the small business men and independent farmers of America from flocking to the support of dictatorship.

But their thought has not struck deep enough into either the causes of their complaints or the construction of their own remedies. They fail to understand that they are not contending against social wilfulness and neglect but against a development which, by and large, was inevitable, and which was foretold ninety years ago. Their remedies are legislative or hortatory. They are utopians in the sense that they do not take account of the vitality of the forces which oppose them. They repeatedly lapse into mere wishful thinking. Nor are they at all consistent. They deplore the extension of state authority, and yet the intricate opportunist reforms which they advocate would require governmental action at every turn. The individual rather than the group is in their minds, yet they have to count upon all sorts of collective undertakings.

In economic matters one feels that they suffer from "the tyranny of the unread." Were they acquainted with the staples

SEND THE NOBEL PEACE PRIZE INTO A NAZI CONCENTRATION CAMP

International Relief Association
20 Vesey St., N. Y. C.

Dear Friends:

CARL VON OSSIETSKY, the outstanding German pacifist, has been suffering the hell of a Nazi concentration camp for three years. Like many others, he was imprisoned without trial or sentence and though critically ill, he is forced to labor in the swamps. His life now depends upon the active support of the friends of peace from all over the world.

We appeal for help to the men and women in the United States who cherish the tradition of Peace and Freedom. We must defend the life of this rare personality. Ossietzky's name has become a symbol.

To date 936 of the most prominent world figures nominated Carl von Ossietzky for the Nobel Peace Prize. Your aid will help get him the prize—will help to free him. Make his cause your own.

Victor Basch, President,
Ligue Pour La Defense des Droits
de L'Homme.

Contribute to the Ossietzky Fund!
Fight Fascism by Helping its Enemies!

INTERNATIONAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION

(Official U. S. representatives of Ossietzky Committee)

Freda Kirchwey, Treasurer
20 Vesey Street, New York City

I am glad to give $..... to the Ossietzky Fund.

Name

Address

.....

HOW YOU PROFIT FROM THIS DISCOVERY

For tens of thousands of miles, in millions of automobiles, the metal pipes that carry gas and oil withstand the vibration of high speeds and the jolts of rough roads. They are stronger, they last longer, because of electric-furnace brazing. Sealed in millions of electric refrigerators, vital parts made by this process keep the mechanism operating quietly, efficiently, year after year. The greater strength that comes from brazing means more dependable service for you, and fewer repair bills.

All-metal tubes in your new radio, sewing machines that make your clothing, calculating machines that serve in your bank and office—to all these, electric-furnace brazing has brought simpler, stronger, less costly construction.

Electric-furnace brazing—a process that causes copper to penetrate deep into pieces of harder metal, joining them into a solid whole—was developed in the General Electric Research Laboratory, in Schenectady, N. Y. And when G-E research gave industry this improved manufacturing method, it was saving industry—and you—millions of dollars in the cost and maintenance of manufactured products.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

of Socialist literature, they would themselves want to throw out half of this volume. We cannot recapture the practice of colonial and frontier America or restore its spirit through the self-reliance of subsistence farmers. Capitalism is not so much a misfortune as it is a fact; having come so far with capitalism, we must go farther and regain liberty by collectivist, not by individualist, means. The giant corporation which owns America is the prelude to the reassertion of common ownership. The whole social structure embodies a principle of growth which may be prompted and guided and checked but may not be gainsaid. It is useless to repine for what might have been. It could never have been. The country has gone through phases, and our hope is in the control of a new phase, not in return to an old one. Revolt against the devastating effects of capitalism upon culture is natural, particularly to sensitive minds, but to nourish nostalgia for vanished institutions is to cry down the wind.

The agrarians begin to arrive at a cohesiveness which sets them off, in their own view, at least, against the proletarian writers who are moved by economic determinism. The agrarians, who are really literary men rather than students of society, consider that there is too much mechanistic economics in the novels of revolt. This may be true, but the agrarians possess too little grasp of economic trends. They too easily become lyrical in impossible plans. They do not accept the first rule of good art, which is that of remaining within the limitations of one's medium. A good example in this collection is Andrew Lytle's article, The Small Farm Secures the State. This is Washington Irving revived for incredulous modern readers. These authors see visions and listen to voices. It is too harsh to say that they may next be turning to pastoral poetry, but every now and then, in these pages, one thinks one hears the shepherd's flute.

BROADUS MITCHELL

Art as Discipline

STORIES OF THREE DECADES. By Thomas Mann. Translated from the German by H. T. Lowe-Porter. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

THE twenty-four tales here brought together represent all Thomas Mann's shorter fiction over a period of more than thirty years, ranging from Little Herr Friedemann, published in 1897, to Mario and the Magician, published in 1929. If, as Mann urges somewhat whimsically in his preface, the volume constitutes "an autobiography in the guise of a fable" as well, the fable is easily deducible from the autobiography. His earliest novel, "Buddenbrooks," published when he was twenty-five, furnishes in itself a sufficiently fabulous index to a talent that was, apparently, dedicated to its craft from birth, with all its sacred books thoroughly committed to memory.

Few living writers have achieved a place in the sun as early in youth as Thomas Mann, or sustained their high position with a similar purposefulness. The range and variety of his major novels, moreover, make it clear—if testimony of this sort is at all needful—that Mann has shunned the repetitious in his work almost as scrupulously as he has shunned the synthetic and the second-rate. Every new novel, as well as his finest Novellen, has been in the nature of a decision purchased at the free expenditure of energies such as only the most complete and complex spirits have it in them to give out. Like the Tonio of his admirable story, he has pursued his craft "not like a man who works that he may live, but as one who is bent on doing nothing but work," confident throughout that "he who lives does not work; that one must die to life in order to be utterly a creator." His exacting concern in matters of form and technique has only added to the enormity of his labors. Gifted with a sensitivity unusual among his countrymen, he has steadfastly refused to sanction the irresponsible lyricism—as Romain Rolland in France and Bunin in Russia have not—in which sense impressions are employed to substitute ecstasy for information. "Feeling, warm heartfelt feeling," he declares in the person of Tonio, "is always banal and futile; only the irritations and icy ecstasies of the artist's corrupted nervous system are artistic. . . . The very gift of style, of form and expression, is nothing else than this cool and fastidious attitude toward humanity." Instead, he has preferred to believe, with Gustav Aschenbach, aging protagonist of Death in Venice, that the artist is "happiest with an idea which can become all emotion, and an emotion all idea."

At its finest, his work takes its polish from a conflict between discipline at its most strenuous and feeling at its highest, wherein abrasive surfaces are turned upon one another like millstones, and instead of generating chaos, refine the grist of experience between them. In all these stories, even the most trivial, the terrific and sustained impact of intellect upon passion and passion upon intellect, of art as a vital principle in the process of devising forms to contain itself, of germinal forces directed, not upon a void or an ego, but upon living materials, becomes almost physically oppressive. There comes to mind, time and again, the figure of Aschenbach, whose greatest works were "heaped up to greatness in layer after layer, in long days of work, out of hundreds and hundreds of single inspirations," and who devoted "to actual composition none but his best and freshest hours."

Just such a method, doubtless, has been as instrumental in creating a Death in Venice as a "Magic Mountain." One is, however, compelled to admit that its effect has by no means been entirely good in certain of the major pieces here collected. A story of such magical potentialities as A Man and His Dog, for example, necessitating as it does a lyric approach that is free, graceful, and not without quality of artlessness, has been at least partially stifled by over-refinement. Fiorenza, the lengthy drama in three acts, is similarly, though with more artistic justice, enervated by an urbanity too rigidly held within formal reservoirs. It is only in the more clinical appraisals of temperament, such as The Blood of the Walsungs, Felix Krull, and Mario and the Magician—each more admirable than the other—that the imposition of powerful technical restraints is completely vindicated as a discipline of first importance.

It remains in the end, perhaps, a difference between degrees of inspiration, rather than between inferior or superior methods of approach. Given a theme of great intrinsic subtlety such as Death in Venice, or a theme of great intrinsic poignancy such as Disorder and Early Sorrow, or a theme of great intrinsic moral earnestness such as Mario and the Magician, the emotional counterpoint summoned up to sustain and convey it to the page adequately complements the ideational. In the less impassioned sketches which make up a large portion of the book, wherein emotion cannot keep pace with idea, it is perhaps sufficient that Mann should say, as in A Gleam, "Hush! Let us look into a human soul. On the wind, as it were, and only in passing, only for a page or so," and conclude as summarily with, "We stop here. No more, it is enough. Just this one priceless detail." If it is true that the point of departure in cases of this sort is precisely the point at which emotion should transcend and irradiate art, it is hardly any less true that Mann has, in each of his major pieces, achieved brilliantly this very perfection of synthesis, and in so doing, achieved the perfection of art itself.

BEN BELITT

BARGAINS MAGAZINE

Where will you find economical entertainment of the highest order if not in magazines? At the huge reductions shown below, you can actually order more magazines for less money! Of course all prices are for one-year subscriptions, new or renewal, which may be mailed to different addresses. Payment may be postponed thirty days. To prevent an advance in cost to you, we suggest you order at once.

The Nation WITH

Atlantic Monthly . . . $7.50	New Republic . . . 8.75
Common Sense . . . 7.25	New Yorker . . . 9.75
Current History . . . 6.50	Readers Digest . . . 6.00
Forum . . . 8.50	Redbook . . . 7.00
Harpers Magazine . . . 6.50	Saturday Review . . . 7.75
Manchester Guardian (Weekly) . . . 7.00	Scribners . . . 6.50
Moscow Weekly News . . . 6.75	Survey Graphic . . . 7.75
	Today . . . 8.50

CONVENIENT ORDER FORM

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City

Please send me the magazines specified below. ☐ I enclose payment in full ☐ OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

MAGAZINES

SEND TO

6-24-36

"Required reading for dictators!"

GROVER CLARK'S

A Place in the Sun

"THE reader will regret that Mr. Clark can not stand before Mussolini and paralyze him with a flow of statistics. . . . It will show that power politics is just as destructive of sound economics in colonial expansion as it is in war."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. $2.50.

A plea for a new League

JAMES T. SHOTWELL'S

On the Rim of the Abyss

A study and appraisal of the policies pursued by the United States and other nations since the world war, and a suggested reorganization of The League of Nations. $3.00.

A gripping novel of a Fascist England

STORM JAMESON'S

In the Second Year

$2.50.

The Macmillan Company
60 Fifth Ave. New York

The Moral Top of the World

TRAVELS IN TWO DEMOCRACIES. By Edmund Wilson.
Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE Soviet Union is by far the most important event of our own time. In history it is a major landmark in the stirring, unromantic struggle of man, the primitive communist, to assimilate his own inventions and the gigantic fruits of his collective labor, and arrive at a final form of communism which will be a heaven on earth, paved with gold perhaps but requiring no death certificate for entry and equipped with the latest thing in streamlined bathrooms and all the arts of life.

It is no wonder that the first settlement on the high plateau of socialism should have aroused the curiosity of all peoples in an intensely personal sense. It is not surprising, either, that that little band of men and women who do the world's reporting was thrown completely off its base by a major event in world history. It is nevertheless a pity that most reporting on the socialist outpost has been either glorification or slander and that the reality of Soviet Russia has seldom broken through. The little men on the right have seized upon every backward element in a country just emerging from the Middle Ages and ascribed it to socialism. The little men on the left have indulged in a form of utopianism which would have offended Marx even more deeply than that of his own day, for if lying rosily about the future seemed to him "silly, stale, and basically reactionary," what would he have thought of romanticizing the first experimental station in socialism?

It is, of course, impossible to be impartial in reporting Soviet Russia for the reason, already implied, that every living being is too deeply involved in what it represents to see it with cold eyes. It is possible to be honest. And when scrupulous honesty is combined with a talent for recognizing and setting down significant detail, we get such an account as that which makes up the second half of Edmund Wilson's observations in two democracies. Its tone is that of a man talking off the top of his mind. Its form is casual, to give play to those quick, often violent, shifts of scene and feeling which make a Soviet journey one of the most stimulating as well as one of the most exhausting of modern experiences. But the accuracy, both emotional and pictorial, with which Mr. Wilson has set down a traveler's-eye view of Soviet life and Russian character indicates with what care the observer, as writer, ordered his materials. For another reason, although the form is casual, the effect is not. There is evident throughout an intense determination to be completely truthful in the face of a world-shaking phenomenon, "a new set of social dimensions," and this intensity gives to the whole an emotional force that binds together its apparently casual parts. Such an attitude, of course, leads Mr. Wilson to commit, in the name of reality, many a sin against left utopianism, for he reports the ridiculous, the inefficient, and the reactionary in Soviet life as well as its noble, delightful, intelligent, and moving aspects. But it also adds great weight to the affirmation with which the book closes.

"Travels in Two Democracies" is interesting from another point of view, in that it records the impact of the first socialist state upon the mind and heart of an American deeply concerned with the future of his own country. Mr. Wilson is already persuaded that socialism is the ultimate solution. He is even convinced that "the socialist ideal is more natural to us than to the Russians." But he has not yet seen devised a method for achieving socialism in a petty-bourgeois democracy whose population is not simply part slave and part free and therefore bound to proceed to a decisive conflict, but where almost every individual is part slave and part free and therefore deprived of that desperate singleness of purpose which leads to action.

The search for a solution for America and for the American is in fact the theme of Mr. Wilson's book. The first section, U. S. A. November, 1932—May, 1934, is made up of miscellaneous articles and sketches ranging from a deadly analysis of Charles E. Mitchell to a visit to the author's old family home. This section lacks the unity of the Russian section. The quality of the writing, also, is uneven. It does serve as a stock-taking of past and present, and as prelude to a Soviet journey.

Mr. Wilson's "final reflections" are illuminating and interesting. He has already noted the sense of precariousness which hovers over the first socialist settlement. "Here, even by the tomb of Lenin, . . . the fate of humanity itself must sometimes seem precarious. They must sometimes be haunted as we are by a terror lest all we have done and are doing may lose its meaning and value, and slide back to ruin again." It is not surprising that his strongest impression of the Russians is one of extraordinary heroism in all walks of life. "And the effect of this," he writes, "is very sobering. Only idiots gush about Russia. Only idiots pretend that life there is easy." It is this heroic determination in the face of great odds to establish socialism on a firm basis which makes the traveler in the Soviet Union feel that he is "at the moral top of the world where the light never really goes out." As for America, Mr. Wilson is convinced that "American republican institutions, disastrously as they are always being abused, have some permanent and absolute value," and that they will not necessarily be destroyed in the course of the transformation of society.

Mr. Wilson ends his reflections with a paragraph on Lenin's relationship to the Russian people, which every traveler to Russia must have felt. It is, as he points out, a central force in Russian socialist life. I came upon it on a Black Sea steamer when I talked to a woman from Leningrad who had been a young girl in 1917. The name of Stalin lit no fires, but when I asked her if she had seen Lenin, her eyes lighted up and her reply was the Russian word which means both beautiful and red. Lenin, she said, was "krassivy, krassivy." Mr. Wilson has offended some communist partisans by his elevation of an individual, even though it be Lenin himself, who had the genius to evoke from the "loose and sluggish plasm" of his countrymen "all those triumphs to which life must rise and to which he thought himself the casual guidepost." Mr. Wilson himself would probably be quick to agree that neither masses nor leader can function one without the other. Meanwhile American itself offers the best example of the helplessness of masses waiting to be led but without leaders possessed of that accuracy of insight and courage of judgment which Mr. Wilson celebrates.

MARGARET MARSHALL

The Instincts of a Bard

A FURTHER RANGE. By Robert Frost. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

IT IS a hard thing to say of a man grown old and honored in his trade, that he has not learned it. Yet that is what Mr. Frost's new volume, with its further range into matters of politics and the social dilemma, principally demonstrates. The new subjects, as they show themselves poetic failures, reflect back and mark out an identical weakness in poems on the old subjects. It is a weakness of craft, and it arises from a weakness, or an inadequacy, in the attitude of the poet toward the use and substance of poetry as an objective creation—as something others may use on approximately the same level as the poet did. Mr. Frost is proud of his weakness and expresses it

WOMEN:

Go to any bookstore and ask for "FACTS AND FRAUDS" (or use the coupon below) and you will obtain what may prove to be for you one of the most valuable volumes ever published.

FACTS and FRAUDS in WOMAN'S HYGIENE

A Medical Guide Against Misleading Claims and Dangerous Products

By RACHEL LYNN PALMER
and SARAH K. GREENBERG, M.D.

This volume, the work of an expert on consumer problems and of a noted obstetrician and gynecologist, does for widely advertised articles of women's hygiene precisely what 100,000,000 GUINEA PIGS accomplished in the field of foods, drugs and cosmetics.

Among the many products of varying degrees of merit —or lack thereof—treated in this work are:

Midol
Lysol
Kotex
Modess
Anacin
Novo
Orangeine Powders
Mu-Col
Fleischman's Yeast
Allonal
Gynettes
Novak's Female Drops
Amidol
Amytal Compound
Hexin
Grove's Laxative Bromo-Quinine
Chichester's Diamond Brand Pills
Zonite
Parlogen Tablets
Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound
Norforms
Pyramidon
Menstrua
Win
Antikamnia
Fibs
Ergoaplof
Amitta Tablets
Birconjel
etc., etc.

A glance at the table of contents will reveal to some degree the valuable nature of this book:

CHAPTER

- I. The Feminine Hygiene Field
- II. Menstruation—A Simple Explanation
- III. Dysmenorrhea—"The Cramps"
- IV. Drug Vendors and "Periodic Pain"
- V. Other Menstrual Irregularities
- VI. Adolescence
- VII. "The Change of Life"
- VIII. Leucorrhea, or "the Whites"
- IX. The Unnecessary Douche
- X. Lysol and Zonite
- XI. The Abortion Business
- XII. Sterility and Sterility "Cures"
- XIII. Beauty—Can It Be Bought
- XIV. Contraception—Four Methods
- XV. Contraception—The Advertisers' Way
- XVI. Contraception—The Clinic Way
- Bibliography
- Index

The price of this 312-page book is $2.00

at all bookstores

MAIL THIS COUPON TO YOUR BOOKSELLER OR TO:

THE VANGUARD PRESS

N-10

424 Madison Avenue, New York City

☐ Please send me a copy of FACTS AND FRAUDS IN WOMAN'S HYGIENE, for which I enclose check or money order for $2.15 (which includes postage and handling).

☐ Send me the above volume C.O.D.

Signed _____

Street _____

City _____

State _____

WHAT DOES EUROPE'S MAN IN THE STREET THINK? SPIVAK TELLS YOU IN EUROPE UNDER THE TERROR

Price $2.50

SIMON AND SCHUSTER

An American Experiment

By E. M. HUGH-JONES and E. A. RADICE

A detached and impartial survey at first hand, by two English economists, of American social and economic conditions under the New Deal. $2.50

The Downfall of the Gold Standard

By GUSTAV CASSEL

A challenging book by the world-famed Swedish expert, showing why the gold standard was unsatisfactory, why it will never work again, and what form a workable international monetary system on a new basis might take. $2.25

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS 114 Fifth Avenue, New York

THE Nation ANNOUNCES...

Two changes of importance to those who use The Nation in reference work will be made soon.

Date of Issue—The date of issue of The Nation will be advanced from Wednesday following the day of publication to Saturday. There will be no change in the day of publication. The next issue, on sale in the East on Thursday, June 25, will be dated Saturday, June 27, 1936.

Volume Numbers—In accordance with the American Recommended Practice for Reference Data for Periodicals, beginning with the issue of July 4, 1936, the Volume data will appear in Arabic numerals. Numbers within the volume will progress from 1 to 26. There will be two volumes published each year, as now, beginning January and July. The issue of June 27, 1936 will be Volume CXLII, Number 3704. The issue of July 4, 1936 will be Volume 143, No. 1.

in the form of an apothegm at the close of the poem called To a Thinker.

At least don't use your mind too hard,
But trust my instinct—I'm a bard.

If we may distinguish, and for more than the purposes of this review, a bard is at heart an easygoing versifier of all that comes to hand, and hence never lacks either a subject or the sense of its mastery; and a poet is in the end, whatever he may be at heart, a maker in words, a true imager, of whatever reality there was in his experience, and every resource of the mind must be brought to bear, not only to express his subject, to transform what Mr. Frost means by instinct into poetry, but also to find his subject, to know it when he sees it among the false host of pseudo-subjects. These are the labors of craft—in relation to which the bard's labors are often no more than those of a pharmacist compounding a prescription by formula. In the old bards we look mostly for history, in the modern for escape. Swinburne is the type of modern bard, Yeats of the modern poet. It may be that by accident a bard is also a poet—as Swinburne was; but a poet who writes with only the discipline of a bard writes unfinished poetry of uncertain level and of unequal value. That is the situation of Mr. Frost; and when, as now, he attempts to make poems of his social reactions without first having submitted them to the full travail of the poetic imagination, the situation becomes very clear.

More precisely, taking the longest and most "serious" poem in the book, Build Soil—A Political Pastoral, which is a blank-verse dialogue between Tityrus the poet and Meliboeus the subsistence farmer, we find not poetry but an indifferent argument for a "one-man revolution" turned into dull verse. As bad religious poetry versifies the duty of an attitude toward God, bad social poetry versifies the need of an attitude toward society. Both the duty and the need may be genuine and deeply felt—it is our stock predicament and the great source of fanaticism and deluded action—but before either attitude can become poetry it must be profoundly experienced not only in intention but in the actuality of words. It is the object of craft, and only craft can secure the performance, to complete and objectify the act of experience. Craft in poetry is not limited to meter and rhyme, cadence and phrasing, gesture and posture, to any of the matters that come under the head of incantation, though it must have all these; for great poetry, craft is the whole act of the rational imagination. It must combine the relish and hysteria of words so as to reveal or illuminate the underlying actuality—I do not say logic—of experience.

Mr. Frost does not resort to the complete act of craft. His instincts as a bard do not drive him to the right labor, the complete labor, except by accident and fragmentarily, in a line here and a passage there. In a sense, his most complete and successful poems, the short landscape images where versification seems almost the only weapon of craft needed, are unfinished fragments. The good lines emphasize the bad, the careless, and the irrelevant, and make them intolerable; which is most often the case in activities which depend at critical points upon instinct. Instinct is only dependable in familiar circumstances, and poetry seldom reveals the familiar. A consideration of Desert Places, which is as good as any poem in the book, will show what I mean.

Snow falling and night falling fast oh fast
In a field I looked into going past,
And the ground almost covered smooth in snow,
But a few weeds and stubble showing last.

The woods around it have it—it is theirs.
All animals are smothered in their lairs.

I am too absent-spirited to count;
The loneliness includes me unawares.

And lonely as it is that loneliness
Will be more lonely ere it will be less—
A blanker whiteness of benighted snow
With no expression, nothing to express.

They cannot scare me with their empty spaces
Between stars on stars where no human race is.
I have it in me so much nearer home
To scare myself with my own desert places.

The same profound instinct that produced the first two stanzas of observation becoming insight allowed Mr. Frost to end his poem with two stanzas of insight that fails to reach the viable point of becoming observation. It may, practically, be a matter of bad rhyming in the fourth stanza, of metrical shapelessness in the third; but at the bottom, in so ambitious a poet as Mr. Frost, it must have been instinct that made the second pair of stanzas evade the experience forced into them by the first pair.

R. P. BLACKMUR

Social-Security Tactics

INSECURITY, A CHALLENGE TO AMERICA. By Abraham Epstein. Third (revised) Edition. Random House. $4.

WITH characteristic incisiveness Abraham Epstein has rechristened the Social Security Act "our Social Insecurity Act." Such pointed comment from a leader whose sincerity and vigor compel respect has caused consternation among many of his admirers. In the third edition of his "Insecurity, a Challenge to America," he retreats not at all but restates his views in more extended form.

The "insurance" features of the act—the old-age benefits and the unemployment-compensation programs—are the principal object of his attack, and properly so. The old-age benefits are both ethically and economically unsatisfactory. There is little social justice in a scheme that places upon the shoulders of those in the lower-income groups the major part of the cost not only of their own old-age security but also of the "unearned annuities to be paid after 1942 to those who are now old." There is as little economic wisdom in the gargantuan reserve resulting from the naive embodiment of private-insurance principles into a social-insurance plan. This financial snowball will be difficult to control and have unpredictable, but certainly disturbing, effects on the economic system.

The provisions in the act for unemployment compensation are even more sharply condemned. Mr. Epstein points out that the federal government has shirked its plain duty of establishing minimum standards of protection in the face of a surprisingly unanimous plea for them from labor leaders, social workers, and experts. Indeed, the federal government has studiously sought to leave the states free to set up almost any type of compensation system. Thus the door is left "wide open to any weak and harmful provisions local politicians may see fit to enact." The adoption of the tax-offset device instead of the more convenient and widely urged subsidy, or grant-in-aid, to facilitate state action, further obstructs federal prescription of minimum standards and in addition exposes the act to more serious constitutional challenge. Its administrative complexity must also intensify the opposition to be expected from employers.

Mr. Epstein by his well-grounded and forcefully expressed criticisms raises three perplexing questions: Do the faults of the act justify references to "the failure of the Social Security

The sale of this volume is limited to social workers, educators, physicians, psychiatrists, lawyers and other mature persons having a professional interest in the sex problems of adolescence.

STERILE SUN

By Caroline Slade

One of the frankest and most realistic accounts, as it is also one of the most artistic, of the process by which a so-called "wayward girl" becomes a prostitute.

"Caroline Slade has written a terrible story. It should be terrifying to all of us who are in any way responsible. And who of us is not?"

Rev. John Howard Melish
in the Introductory Note to this volume.

$2.75 at bookstores, to properly accredited adults or direct from the publishers.

THE VANGUARD PRESS
424 Madison Avenue, New York City

Before you buy that car! - -

Consult the June issue of CONSUMERS UNION REPORTS (full service edition). It gives impartial, comparative ratings not only of the new Ford, Chevrolet, and Plymouth but also of the

DODGE
NASH
LAFAYETTE
GRAHAM-CAVALIER

STUDEBAKER
WILLYS
OLDSMOBILE
GRAHAM-CRUISADER

TERRAPLANE
HUDSON
PONTIAC
AUBURN

It also gives ratings of leading brands of gasoline, including Essolene, Shell, Texaco, Tydol, Sunoco, Gulf, Sinclair, and Cities Service, based on their starting, acceleration, carbon forming and other characteristics. The labor conditions under which both automobiles and gasolines are produced are also described.

Will any of the advertised MOTH PREVENTIVES really protect your clothes? The June issue of CONSUMERS UNION REPORTS (both full and limited service editions) tells you. Both editions also report on many brands of canned vegetable soups, garden seeds, and other products.

ELECTROLUX, FRIGIDAIRE, GENERAL ELECTRIC, KELVINATOR, and many other leading brands of mechanical refrigerators will be rated comparatively in the July issue. This issue will also tell you how to buy a used car and what makes and years are likely to be good buys. Forthcoming issues will contain ratings of widely-known brands of liquors, shoes, shirts, and other products.

CONSUMERS UNION REPORTS is the monthly publication of the newly organized Consumers Union of United States. Consumers Union is a non-profit technical, membership organization founded to provide consumers with information based on laboratory tests and investigations by impartial consultants of the comparative quality and prices of competing brands of products. Information includes ratings of widely-advertised brands as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable." Wherever possible, reports are also given on the labor conditions under which many products are made.

If you wish to become a regular reader of Consumers Union Reports, fill out and mail the coupon below. You will immediately receive the June issue—and will receive subsequent monthly issues for a year plus an additional yearly buying guide.

To: CONSUMERS UNION of U. S., Inc., 22 East 17th Street, New York, N. Y.

I hereby apply for membership in Consumers Union. I enclose:

- ☐ $3 for one year's membership and subscription to the full service.
☐ $1 for one year's membership and subscription to the limited service.
(Note—the limited edition of Consumers Union Reports for June does not contain the reports on automobiles and gasolines.)
... $5 to $25 for one year's membership and subscription to the full service plus a contribution toward a permanent consumers' laboratory.

I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is designated.

Signature Occupation

Address N.

Act" and the change of title that he has suggested? Is it tactically desirable to oppose the act in these terms? Why was the act passed in so faulty a form? Mr. Epstein discriminates between major and minor defects. "The defects involved in the old-age-retirement plan can easily be remedied since it is based on a sound national plan. Changes can be made without difficulty in the contributions and benefits. The huge reserves can be eliminated." He believes that the provisions for grants-in-aid to encourage the setting up of state pensions for the aged, the blind, and dependent children may be strengthened by more stringent federal control of standards, although here he seems somewhat optimistic. The unemployment-compensation program, on the other hand, can be made satisfactory only by radical change. Clearly, the weaknesses of the various parts of the act are not all equally fundamental.

The trenchancy of Epstein's attack is influenced by his fear that the present act "must affect adversely the fate of a constructive social-insurance movement in the United States." The work of years may be destroyed by "unnecessary blunders." But in considering the best tactical approach to this imperfect act it must be remembered that political reactions are guided more by the emphatic sweeping phrase than by carefully guarded words. There is a danger that Epstein's own striking phrases of wholesale condemnation may cause the American people to "become so disillusioned that they will cast out the entire act, good and bad, and conclude that social insurance is beyond the capacity of our government."

The faults of the act cannot be attributed to either experts or social reformers. In small measure they may be due to the technical complexities in the act which hindered criticism in the legislative process. In greater measure they are due to the absence of widespread conviction that any plan to give social security to the poor at their own expense is a bad plan, and to the presence of a belief that it is better for the states to be free to do little or nothing than for the federal government to provide real security. Satisfactory social security awaits a more general acceptance both of the use of the taxing power to reduce inequalities of wealth, and of the extension of federal action in fields where the states are impotent.

EVELINE BURNS

Much About a Little Man

THOMAS DE QUINCEY. A BIOGRAPHY. By Horace Ainsworth Eaton. Oxford University Press. $5.

DE QUINCEY AT WORK. By Willard Hallam Bonner. Buffalo: Airport Publishers.

THOMAS DE QUINCEY was little in almost every way. He stood only two or three inches above five feet; his courteous and intellectual face consorted queerly with one who walked so much like a spider—"with an odd one-sided, and yet straightforward, motion, moving his legs only, and neither his arms, head, nor any other part of his body"; he was both fussy and inefficient, both grandiose and procrastinating; and he never came within a million miles of writing the great books he rather humorlessly dreamed of writing. He fancied himself a philosopher who "should accomplish a great revolution in the intellectual condition of the world," but he ended up as one who had written chiefly about himself, his habits, his eccentricities, his dreams; or, if not about himself, then about an assortment of second-rate subjects ranging from the sentimental to the macabre. He was a man, in other words, for whom it has been difficult to have respect.

Yet here from Mr. Eaton's hand is a biography of more than five hundred pages dealing with every known aspect of De Quincey's existence; and in it De Quincey becomes more interesting than many men who have been greater. He turns out to have deserved so formidable and excellent a book, every leisurely page of which is sure to be read by anyone who makes the start, and every intonation of which is in perfect biographical taste. Mr. Eaton is neither worshipful nor unsympathetic toward his subject; he merely knows him through and through, and has the art to leave him in our minds as an object of clear and sober yet fascinating knowledge. Whoever reads what Mr. Eaton has written will know an individual as few individuals have been known.

One sign of this in the reader will be the discovery that he has no judgments to pass upon De Quincey. No moral judgments; the thousand drops of laudanum per day, the perpetual insolvency, the almost unimaginable inefficiency, the dreaminess, the foolishness—these will not even have to be forgiven in view of the far more interesting fact that they were. And no intellectual judgments either; it will not matter in the least that De Quincey was less the artist and the philosopher than he thought he was; the quality of his mind will be forgotten in its nature. We are won by the creature before we know it, and it may not occur to us to wish that he had been otherwise than exactly what he was. We learn to put up with as many as a hundred pages detailing the full story of his pitiful war with creditors—pitiful, and somewhat ridiculous too, and yet in the end a war in which we recognize De Quincey as the little champion whose colors we wear. Nor are we bored, as in another case we might be, by the perennial tedium of a magazine writer's relations with his editors; for De Quincey was never anything but a magazine writer, a desperate searcher after subjects, a haunted contributor whose letters explaining his delays were often complained of as too long to be convincing. He lived a literary dog's life, and we should despise it; but we do not for the simple reason that we see it being lived, and seeing it are moved both to compassion and to admiration. It is almost as if Mr. Eaton had been free to create De Quincey, and had done so in this book. Perhaps that is indeed what he has done, notwithstanding the evident fact that he never invents or supposes.

He leaves all sorts of things to be discovered or put together by the reader. It is only in footnotes, for instance, that one learns how long-lived the De Quinceys were. Thomas's mother was born in the early 1750's and one of his daughters died in 1917; not bad for a man who took opium all his adult life and himself endured to be seventy-four. Mr. Eaton, partly because he knows how to make comment unnecessary, seldom pauses in his narrative to indulge in criticism of any kind. When he does so he is telling; as when he remarks that De Quincey's "was a nature of much reason and little judgment," or emphasizes the importance for one who was to write so much about dreams of his having mastered "a great and precise vocabulary" and "large prose rhythms."

It is not slighting Mr. Bonner's book to consider it as an appendix to Mr. Eaton's. It consists of letters, new or newly edited, written by De Quincey or his daughters during the last decade of his life. Most of them concern the collected editions of his works which were being published by James T. Fields in Boston and by James Hogg in Edinburgh, though there is much in them of a delightfully incidental nature. They leave Mr. Eaton's picture of this decade precisely as it was; nor is it surprising to learn from their two prefaces that Mr. Eaton and Mr. Bonner were in possession of each other's information as they worked.

MARK VAN DOREN

FILMS

Unsettled Accounts

HOW to disturb an audience is of course as big a problem in the cinema as in the theater. Director Fritz Lang has been highly successful with the problem in his first American movie, made after more than a year of idleness in Hollywood. One might say too successful, for "Fury" (Capitol) is disturbing for the wrong reason: the problem it poses is entirely unresolved at the close. The audience is subjected to a high degree of strain during the cumulative course of the film, but one's emotions are unpurged at the end, for the catharsis is incomplete. Mr. Lang and his associates have disregarded an important corollary to disturbing an audience, that is, calming it by fulfilling its aroused expectations.

There is no misunderstanding the abhorrence with which the makers of "Fury" regard lynching. The directorial presentation of the good citizens of Strand, U.S.A., burning the jail from which they cannot snatch Joe Wilson is quite clear; to make it even clearer Mr. Lang later anatomizes every horrible detail of the mob in the newsreel shots used at the trial. But "Fury" is the story of Joe Wilson, and it is also clear that his vow, after his escape, to have the lynchers destroyed by the machinery of legal justice is a bitter and tragic one, for it means his self-destruction. At this point the film is already complete as tragedy. Joe Wilson has been changed from a sentimental and good-natured average man into an incurable victim of inhumanity; we await the resolution.

This is the meaning of lynching—not merely that human beings are capable of acting like beasts, but that the lives of two people we know, Joe and his girl, and the lives of twenty-two citizens are ruined by it. The story by Norman Krasna seemed to be a perfect invention for saying this. What are we to understand, then, when Joe Wilson enters the court just as the death sentences are being pronounced and saves his lynchers? That one man was capable of an act of perfect charity? But Wilson curses his lynchers in court and vows he'll never be the same again, although he has just performed the one act impossible to his altered character. What does "Fury" mean? Nobody's hurt; Joe and his girl are ready to marry and start life over, and the lynchers have had a big scare. The whole business is, I suppose, just one of those messes which human beings are always getting in and out of.

In directing the film Mr. Lang makes full and efficient use of his imagination only in presenting the mob and in creating small-town life. It is regrettable that he did not, or could not, make "Fury" the first-rate tragedy it might have been. Spencer Tracy as Wilson and Sylvia Sydney as the girl are handicapped by dull opening scenes, but their acting, particularly Miss Sydney's, improves as the film gains in intensity.

Alfred Hitchcock's long-awaited "Secret Agent" (Roxy) is another disappointment. As in "Fury" the situation is still unsettled at the end. The strain this time is a matter of mechanics rather than, as it should be, of suspense; the result is discomfiting rather than exhilarating. All the elements for an excellent spy film are there, including the dazzling trio of Madeleine Carrol, Peter Lorre, and John Gielgud; but the pace of the narrative is desperate, not easy, and the incontinent use of noise to emphasize emotion or situation, though it is in some cases effective, tends to become a substitute for emotion or situation itself.

ROBERT GIROUX

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by DODIE SMITH

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE
MOROSCO THEA., 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Wednesday & Saturday at 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN

with INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS

LAST WEEKS

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:45

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

IDIOT'S DELIGHT

a new play by ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

with ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE

SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:45
Matinees Thursday and Saturday, 2:45
300 Seats at $1.10

Closes July 4th—reopens Aug. 31st

CONFERENCE

Labor's Platform

will be built at

THE TAMIMENT LABOR CONFERENCE

JUNE 25 TO JUNE 28

Speakers' List Headed by President William Green
Conference fee $3.00

Lowest rate of the season: $3.00 per day.

CAMP TAMIMENT 7 East 15th Street AL. 4-3094
For regular summer rates write Camp Tamiment, Tamiment, Pa.

RESORT

CAMP MILFORD

KENT - CONN.

"MICKEY" MICHAELS D/R.

GALA OPENING JUNE 19

A modern adult camp in the heart of the Connecticut Hills; on beautiful lake. Every outdoor activity. Splendid Entertainment. Delicious meals. Congenial fellow guests.

June rate $25.00, daily $4.
Complete social and athletic activities.

JULY AND AUGUST WEEKLY RATES.

$27.50 per week $5.00 daily

Reduced R.R. fare $1.65 one way.

Write for illustrated booklet.

11 WEST 42nd STREET
Pennsylvania 6-7842

CHERRIES ARE RED IN SAN JOAQUIN

By Louis Adamic

In The Nation (Next Week)

Letters to the Editors

ARAB AND JEW

Dear Sirs: Why must The Nation accompany the splendidly objective article by Albert Viton, Why Arabs Kill Jews, in the issue of June 3 with an editorial comment that seems to ignore the facts presented by Mr. Viton? Mr. Viton stresses how incidental and relatively superficial is the Jewish problem in Palestine as compared with the more extensive Arab nationalist revolt, which is directed against all outside aggression, be it British, French, or Jewish. The Nation, however, sees fit to characterize this movement editorially as "the private war which the Arabs are waging against the Jews in Palestine."

But The Nation's remedy for the situation is even more amazing for a radical journal. In my opinion it here reaches a low-water mark in its record for consistency and liberalism. It suggests that the rise in Jewish immigration be maintained and that the British use force to subdue the Arab protests.

Is The Nation in favor of force to put down nationalist movements in Egypt, India, China, Puerto Rico, and Ethiopia? Why does the presence of Jews on the Eastern shore of the Mediterranean put The Nation in a position where it must condone the use of imperialist force? Would it not be better to reexamine the premises of Zionism than to commit oneself to such a policy?

SAMUEL HALPERIN

Brooklyn, N. Y., June 10

[If Mr. Halperin will reread the paragraph to which he takes exception he will find that it deals with the actual disorders in Palestine. There was neither space nor need to drag in a general discussion of the whole Arab nationalist movement; more especially since it was dealt with in Mr. Viton's article, to which we called our readers' attention. As for the sentence supposedly suggesting a remedy for the situation, we ruefully admit that it was open to that interpretation. Our intention was to predict, not to recommend. Our attitude toward nationalist movements is likely to be determined in each specific instance by the nature of the movement itself and the circumstances which condition its rise and development. We are certainly not opposed to the Arab revolt against foreign imperialism. On the other hand the situation in Palestine must be recognized for what it is. With some 375,000 Jews there who went in under British protection, the British government can hardly deny them protection now. Therefore it seems logical to predict that unless the Arab revolt can be settled peacefully, the British government will find itself unable to avoid the use of force.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Dear Sirs: Your Palestine correspondent, Albert Viton, makes several incorrect and misleading statements in his article Why Arabs Kill Jews. He gives a completely distorted picture of the Zionist position, even going so far as to misquote the Zionist leader, Ben Gurion.

"The Arab nationalists point out . . . that they are losing their country," writes Mr. Viton, citing in confirmation of this "loss" the growth of the Jewish population since 1919 and the sale of land to Jews. He might in all fairness have mentioned that in the same period the Arab population increased by 28 per cent. He might also have pointed out that 50 per cent of the land acquired by Jews was uninhabitable marsh and desert which Jewish pioneers made habitable through drainage and irrigation. Furthermore, when occupied land is purchased, the tenant must be provided with funds in order that he may establish himself elsewhere on the land in Palestine.

Mr. Viton states that "the Federation of Jewish Labor makes keeping work from Arabs one of its chief aims." He should have explained that the struggle for "Jewish labor" in Palestine is the struggle against the Jewish plantation owner who employs cheap, unorganized Arab labor in preference to organized Jewish workers. There is no danger of the Jew displacing the Arab worker. Arab opportunities for employment have increased tremendously since Jewish colonization, but the competition of the cheaper Arab is a constant menace to the Jewish worker in the very industries and agricultural developments created by Jews. Ben Gurion, in his speech against Jewish capitalists who replace unionized Jewish workers with exploited Arabs frequently imported from outside Palestine, did not say, as Mr. Viton wrote, "Just as it is unthinkable for a Jew to open a house of prostitution in one of the Jewish villages, so unthinkable must it be for a Jew to employ Arabs." Ben Gurion really said, "To open a house of prostitution is a lesser disgrace than to deprive Jews of their labor on the soil of Palestine." (The Hebrew text of the speech appeared in Haaretz of March 10, 1932, and was reproduced in the Communist Freiheit of December 15, 1935.)

Mr. Viton also announces that only exceptional Jews want "peace and cooperation" with the Arabs, and that "every good Zionist sees the Arab as an unnecessary obstacle to his homeland dream." This statement is both vicious and irresponsible. Zionism is based on the belief, now borne out by experience, that with the introduction of modern methods of intensive agriculture Palestine can support a much larger population, Jewish and Arab, than it does at present. Jewish colonization is not only reclaiming a barren land but increasing its absorptive capacity. The growth of the Jewish population is accompanied by a steady increase of the Arab population as well as an improvement in its standard of living.

MARIE SYRKIN

New York, June 6

EDUCATE VERMONT!

Dear Sirs: I have been following your articles in The Nation concerning the Vermont marble strike with the greatest interest. I know many people in Rutland and my relatives live in Rutland. The damnable part about the whole frame-up is that the people in Vermont do not know the truth. Even friends I have talked with assume that everything is all settled and that the Proctors have been both fair and honorable in all their dealings with the "red element," as these good citizens insist the strikers are. The Rutland papers print only Proctor reports and propaganda, and with the state officials apparently in the pay of the Proctors a decent respect for rights, liberties, and our constitutional freedom is being dragged in the mud by Vermont. This is all the more ludicrous as these same good citizens are nearly all staunch old Republicans who are making a great hue and cry about preserving the Constitution.

I think it is possible to reach these good citizens and warn them. If each reader of The Nation would clip out your article in the issue of May 27 and mail it

RESORTS

Rebecca Silver Invites You to FORESTHOUSE

At Interlaken

Miles of Lake, Hills and Dales—America's Switzerland—Excellent Cuisine—All Outdoor Sports—Indoors, conviviality. Rates Moderate. Auto or N. Y. Central—50 miles—Open all year—of course.

LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y. Mahopac 977, 688

ZINDORST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7755
Formerly a millionaire's estate.
150 acres of most beautiful country.

All modern equipments as well as all sport facilities.
Make early reservation.

OPEN ALL YEAR

A vacation retreat for the entire family... Superb sports facilities...
Special arrangements for children... nearby junior camp...
N. Y. Central to Harmon...
New low fares... easy commuting

BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE

Peekskill, N. Y. Phone 1403

... OPEN ALL YEAR ...

BREEZEMONT PARK ARMONK, N. Y.

Pleasurable retreat for rest and solitude,
among scenic hills of Westchester Co.
Hotel with camp activities, 100 acre estate, private lake, sports, golf nearby.
30 miles from city, excellent cuisine, reasonable rates.

For information, write or telephone

Gramercy 7-0135 • ARMONK VILLAGE 955

SWIM, FISH, PLAY

or rest in the salt air, and sunshine of romantic Gloucester. Camp
Annisquam—where young people keep young. Send for booklet.

A. RESNICK, Dir., Gloucester, Mass.

FANNIE GARFINKLE
AN ALL YEAR HAVEN for discriminating guests. Beautiful country.
Good food. Bathing,
tennis, other sports.
Summer, Winter and
In-between Seasons.

DEERHAUNT
Cingers, N. Y.
(Tel. Peekskill 2990)

SHAGBARK LODGE SAUGERTIES, NEW YORK

600-acre estate, private lake, newly refurbished, all sports, tennis, hand ball, boating, etc. Golf nearby, saddle-horses at door.

JUNE RATE $20

July 4th Week-end $8. Superior Cuisine
3 1/2 hours motor from George Washington Bridge.
MANAGEMENT: REGINA & JOE LICHTENBERG
Phone: Saugerties 428-J N. Y. C. Sterling 3-8481

VINEYARD LODGE

Ulster Park, N. Y.

"Garden spot of Ulster County"

Modern hotel midst beautiful 200-acre fruit and grape farm. Solarium, horses on the premises, tennis, swimming, social activities.
American-Jewish cuisine. Reasonable rates.
J. Rosenthal, Kingston 15732.

BIRDLAND CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.

Beautiful and secluded estate. 40 miles from N. Y.
225 acres woodland—mountains—5 miles of paths.
Tennis, golf, handball, swimming, and riding.
Excellent Cuisine Rates Moderate

OPEN ALL YEAR

Phone: Highland Mills 7895 or BEachview 2-3240
Dr. A. G. Selwyn, 7424—20th Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

RESORTS

A Modern Camp for Adults

Booklet on Request
33 W. 42nd St.
PEnn. 6-7663

TIMBERLAND

Pottersville, N. Y., (Warren County)
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

The Rare Charm
of An Intimate
Congenial Group

June Rate

$22.50 a week

Superior Cuisine

De Luxe Bungalows

Fare $4.65

In The Adirondacks

JULY 4th
SPECIAL
3 Full $16.50 days
Fri., Sat. &
Sun. arrive
Thurs. Eve.

The 3 R's of Camp Life REST—RECREATION—RELAXATION

at the

Forest and Stream Club
In the Green Mountains

RATE

$30.00 and up

FARE

N. Y., N. H. & H.
R.R. to Brattleboro, Vt., $3.90

On premises—9 hole golf course to please the most exacting.
Complete Social and Athletic Staff and Activities.

FOREST and STREAM CLUB
1441 Broadway, N. Y. C. PEEn. 6-3919

A Place for Adults
in the
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG, N. Y.

EVER

"New Faces"

July 4th WEEK-END

Friday Nite
Through Sunday Nite $10

City Phone: VA. 3-9875

In the heart of the Adirondacks

SCAROON MANOR

ON
SCHROON LAKE, N. Y.

9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES...

9 CLAY TENNIS COURTS
8 HANDBALL
COURTS

Twin Pines on Trout Lake

Distinguished Summer Camp in the Adirondacks

Comfortable accommodations, complete program... For reservations or details—
S. Saidel, Lake George; Dickens 2-4577

FRIEDMAN'S HOTEL

Highland, N. Y.

Seventy-five miles from New York City.
All out-door activities, saddle horses, fishing on premises. Social staff, orchestra.
Special June Rates $18.00 per week. Booklet.

Additional Resort Listing on the following page

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

RESORTS

ADIRONDACK INTERLUDE

A Prelude to Summer In the North Mountains At a Summer Camp Providing
Every Facility for a Happy Vacation.

SPECIAL JUNE RATES

$25-$30 per Week

Free Use of Golf Course in June

Reduced Train Fares

LENA BARISH SAM GARLEN

Directors

11 West 42nd St., New York City

Columbus 5-6346

GREEN MANSIONS

WARRENSBURG N. Y.

JULY 4

! * ? ! *

the time and place for a g-lorious week-end

"BUNIN'S PUPPETS"

"CRIME et CHATIMENT"

(Prize film of the year)

Special rate—

Fri. nite thru Sunday nite $9.50

Write for descriptive booklet

COOKS FALLS LODGE

Cooks Falls, N. Y.

Phone Roscoe
2F13

MOONHILL Lodge

IN THE HEART OF ADIRONDACKS

HONEYMOONERS PARADISE

Low June Rates—Every Activity in Full Swing through June.
Enjoy Golf, Tennis, Riding, Famous
Cuisine (Dietary Laws)
Write for Booklet N.
Sarah Solomon, Managing Dir.,
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y.: 45 W. 45th St. ME. 3-5450

ON SCHROON LAKE

KENMORE

LIVINGSTON MANOR N.Y.

Hotel comforts, camp activities. Private lake. FREE
BOATING, swimming pool, large casino, orchestra, social and athletic staff. NEW LOW RATES. Dietary Laws. Booklet.
S. Muravchick & Sons, Tel. 200

UNCAS LODGE

Uncasville, Conn. A modern adult camp on 165 acre charming
New England farm.
Private lake, 3 fast
tennis courts, 5 piece orchestra, saddle horses and golf. Unexcelled cuisine.

OPENING JUNE 20TH $22.50 WEEKLY

Management: Diana & Abe Berman
Phone Norwich, Conn., 1858-R-5. Reduced
Railroad fare to $2.50. Bus fare to $3.35 round trip. Send for booklet.

to his Vermont friends, asking them to read it and try to understand what is happening to freedom in Vermont, the force of united opinion might arouse them to a realization of the precipice toward which they are rushing.

STANLEY E. SAXTON

Saratoga Springs, N. Y., May 29

Dear Sirs: Replying to your favor of the fourteenth instant be assured I have been very much distressed at the Vermont Marble Company strike, but I believe that better conditions will come out of it. I believe that you have been somewhat misinformed. I sincerely hope and believe that happy conditions will be brought about.

CHARLES M. SMITH, Governor

Montpelier, Vt., May 28

HATS OFF TO MOTHER!

Dear Sirs: I have your communication requesting my stand on the question of removing hats in elevators. As you state, many people are confused on my position on the matter of hat-doffing. It seems that there have been conflicting newspaper reports, and I have also been accused of making conflicting statements.

You will understand that, on the one hand, I believe in progress; and, on the other hand, I also believe in observing our forefathers' customs. I believe that we should have the Wagner Labor Relations Act, the NRA, the AAA, and the Rural Resettlement, all of which are unconstitutional, and believe that we should do whatever it takes to get those acts. On the other hand, I revere our forefathers, especially those who wrote the Constitution, and also revere the fine old gentlemen who constitute the Supreme Court. I believe that something should be done. I believe that liberty is all right, but at the same time I do not believe that liberty is license. I believe that the spirit of optimism should prevail in this nation and that we should look forward to building a great nation in which to live and to bring up our children.

In reference to your question as to my definite position, I want you to know that I always will stand for Americanism, the fireside, and true beliefs. In this stand I do not believe that there is a man who will rise and oppose what I have had to say. Do you dare oppose a single thing that I say? Certainly not. I know you would not, because you are good Americans and you would not fly in the face of the home and a mother's heart.

MAURY MAVERICK

Washington, June 12

PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION IN BROOKLYN

Dear Sirs: It should be of interest to your readers, especially those living in Brooklyn, that a low-tuition, progressive school is opening in Brooklyn in September, in response to a long-felt need for progressive education among families of moderate means. It will be known as the Community School and will be housed in a modern, completely fire-proof building, at 2059 Bedford Avenue.

Even the most ardent adherents of progressive education find it difficult to circumvent the criticism that classes in progressive schools are too small and therefore do not afford an adequate social experience to the children in them. Since the depression, small classes have been growing smaller. The smaller the classes, the more sheltered is the school environment and the more difficult is it to prepare the child for the social scene outside.

The only way to liberate progressive schools from this dilemma is to enlarge classes to a point midway between the average of progressive schools and public schools. Elizabeth Irwin, director of the Little Red School House in Manhattan, pointed the way eight years ago. Large classes will make possible lower tuition fees, and lower tuition fees will attract a more democratic and cosmopolitan school population. In our school, as in most good progressive schools, academic subjects will receive enough attention to prepare children for accredited high schools, and the curriculum will be enriched by many creative activities, such as arts, crafts, and dramatics. Children will receive individual attention but not at the expense of their social development.

The school will be organized along strictly democratic lines, both in its administrative policies and in its provisions for parent participation. The staff will include teachers with extensive background in progressive education and an experienced child psychologist. The tuition fee is $200, plus $100 for hot lunches and supplies.

Inquiries should be addressed to the undersigned at 247 East Fifty-seventh Street, New York.

AUGUSTA ALPERT, Director
New York, June 1

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS
THE NATION. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Canadian: 50 cents a year additional. Foreign: $1 a year additional. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

JAMES RORTY, having uncovered the feet of clay of the advertising business in "Our Master's Voice," is now doing the same for medicine in a Nation series.

STUART CHASE has lately returned from the Tennessee Valley, where he obtained the material for his series of articles, concluded in this issue.

THE POETS whose work appears in this issue are all in their early twenties and were among the contributors to Ann Winslow's anthology of college verse, "Trial Balances," published last fall. Since then Muriel Rukeyser has won enthusiastic recognition from the critics for her book of verse "Theory of Flight"; Josephine Miles has been the recipient of the Shelley Memorial Award for poetry; and Clark Mills has been awarded the annual College Verse prize. Lack of space has limited our choice, but it is our belief that the poems we have selected are sufficiently representative to warrant their publication here in a group.

EDMUND WILSON, literary critic and commentator on American life, has recently published "Travels in Two Democracies," the democracies being America and Soviet Russia.

WILLIAM TROY, formerly film critic of The Nation, is now in the English Department of Bennington College.

VERA MICHELES DEAN, editor of the Foreign Policy Association's publications, has long been a student of European affairs.

BROADUS MITCHELL is associate professor of political economy at Johns Hopkins University and author of "A Preface to Economics."

R. P. BLACKMUR is a critic and poet whose verse has appeared frequently in the Virginia Quarterly Review. He is the author of a book of essays on contemporary literary figures entitled "Double Agent."

EVELINE BURNS is a member of the Economics Department of Columbia University and the author of "Toward Social Security."

GEORGES SCHREIBER, The Nation's Washington pictorial correspondent, went to Cleveland to do the drawings appearing in this issue. That special look in the Hoover portrait is due to the fact that coming home on the train Mr. Schreiber sat opposite the ex-President at breakfast.

